This aspect of tourism, this growing of the deficit in our travel account is a matter of genuine concern, I know, to the government and to all thoughtful Canadians. I should like to refer to the Bank of Canada report of 1960. At page 44 it deals with non-merchandise transactions in the balance of international payments on current account. In this respect I should like to point out that Canadians spent $215 million more in 1960 abroad than tourists spent in Canada. This is a situation that has worsened to this $215 million deficit position from a position in 1950 of a surplus on travel account of $49 million. As a matter of interest, we could go back to 1939 when there was a surplus in this account of $68 million.

I am not going to lecture the minister this afternoon on the importance of tourism or remind him that today travel is the fastest expanding industry in the world or tell him that it is the second best source of United States dollars for Canada. However, I am convinced that he must persuade his colleagues that greater effort and spending will have to be made in view of this trend to which I have referred, namely this deficit in our travel account.

Canada has one of the world's lowest per tourist expenditures on tourist promotion in other countries. When we look at the facts we find that Bermuda spends $12.50 per tourist. In the countries of Europe the average spending is $9.50 per tourist. When we realize these facts, and when they are viewed in the light of this new development and in the light of world competition, they make our efforts seem quite inadequate, when we consider that this year there will be perhaps 30 million visits to this country and that the total amount of money covered in vote 303 is $2,687,000, which means less than 10 cents per visit. I am not holding this up as a comparison with the figures I have just used. I make the statement only to point out what I consider to be the inadequate approach to this whole problem that has developed in the tourist industry in this country and throughout the world.

It is a matter of genuine concern that travel expenditure by United States citizens abroad —and this matter was referred to earlier today I believe—was up 300 per cent in the last ten years and yet travel expenditures by United States citizens in Canada is only up approximately 20 odd per cent in the same period.

We must also look at the other side of the coin. Expenditures by Canadians outside of Canada are now four times greater than they were in 1948 and they are still rising. To reduce this trend is not an easy task. I think we all recognize that fact having in mind our geography, climate and economic conditions. Quite apart from the understandable pull of winter sunshine resorts it must be realized that world wide competition for the tourist dollar is growing every year. Our United States friends have been alert to this competition and as early as 1958 a special report to the president—I think it was referred to as the Randall report—formed the basis of extensive "See America First" and "Come to America" national tourist programs. We in Canada are losing ground. The annual deficit in our travel account as I have mentioned, has now reached $215 million. Only a vigorous and extensive program directed at tourists at home and abroad can turn the tide. To ensure the success of such a program we must pursue an intensified course of raising our standards with respect to facilities and services if we are to expect our visitors from abroad to return or indeed our own people to accept enthusiastically a "See Canada First" or "Know Canada Better" program.

Tourism has grown tremendously in the past few years. Increased earnings, a shorter work week, longer holidays with pay, have all contributed greatly to making travel available to most people rather than to just the wealthy few as was the case in pre-war days. Tourism helps all segments of the economy. When people travel they spend their money on food and lodging, transportation, entertainment and a host of other services. Whether one operates a hotel or motel, a resort, a restaurant, a grocery store or is a manufacturer of sports clothes or equipment or operates a department store or sells gas or oil or even collects taxes, all benefit from the tourist dollar. Yes, tourism is everybody's business and it affects every area in this country. I believe there is a growing realization of this fact.

Considerable effort is being poured into the industry at the local, regional and provincial levels. In my own immediate area of Nipissing, which is a real vacationers' paradise, tourist spending amounts to $6 million annually. Many of our tourist operators are doing an excellent promotion job within their financial capabilities. Just the other evening at this meeting in North Bay to which I referred earlier many organizations such as N.O.T.A., N.O.O.A., Northern Ontario Outfitters Association; A.T.R.O., Associated Tourist Resorts of Ontario; O.T.C.A., Ontario Tourist Court Association and the important B.O.T.A., Board of Ontario Travel Associations were represented. These people are making a great contribution. In fact, these names are starting to sound like the various agencies of the United Nations. Of course, I should not forget our own North Bay Lakeshore Resorts Association.

I believe, however, that more federal leadership should be provided and is needed if Canada is to reverse the deficit trend in our tourist industry. Once we agree that tourism is everyone's business there should be a growing pooling of ideas and a greater spending and planning for the promotion of that industry.

We could persuade our visitors to stay longer. We could urge more visitors to come to Canada. We could urge more people to come to Canada in the winter time, and we could try harder to induce Canadians to spend their holidays in Canada.

A tourist does not have to be a person from another country. If 15 per cent of the Canadians who are now spending their holidays in other lands could be induced to spend their holidays in Canada it would wipe out the yearly travel deficit which we have with the rest of the world.

Advertising alone will not solve this problem. Very often the emphasis is just on the spending of money. Surely this is not the answer. I believe there is room for more prudent spending, more pooling of ideas and a great opportunity for leadership at the federal level in this important industry.

Before resuming my seat I wish to refer to two further items. It will be recalled that last year representatives were sent to Europe to investigate the tourist potential from that part of the world because of the resurgence of the European economy. It was a very wise move to tap as much as possible this important market in this field. I hope the minister will say something about the actions of the federal government in this regard.

I should also like to refer to one other matter which I raised in the house earlier this session. I refer to the concern that some of us felt when President Kennedy asked congress to reduce to $100 from $500 the value of tax free goods United States' tourists could take back to their country at any one time. I think we were justified in feeling some concern at that time. There was an article in the Ottawa Journal of February 7 this year which refers to the attitude of the minister. The article was written by Gordon Dewar and says:

> Little effect should be felt in the Canadian tourist industry if the U.S. congress should approve spending cuts for American tourists asked by President Kennedy Monday.

The article continues:

> This, at least, is the opinion of federal government officials, including northern affairs minister Dinsdale, whose department is responsible for tourism in Canada.

An article was written by Harold Morrison of the Canadian Press. The article originated in Washington and appeared in the February 20 issue of the Ottawa Citizen. It refers to the attitude of the Prime Minister and says:

> He—

That is the Prime Minister:

> —had heard no objections in Canada to Kennedy's proposal to reduce the American tax free exemption on tourist goods to $100 from $500.

There was another story, again originating in Washington, which appeared in the March 7 issue of the Ottawa Citizen:

> A congressional committee has deferred action on President Kennedy's proposal to reduce the maximum duty free allowance on tourist goods to $100 from $500 to permit further clarification of the Canadian position . . .

It will be recalled that the Minister of Finance, in answer to a question I asked, indicated that representations had finally been made by the minister when he visited Washington later in March.

I think we are justified in being concerned about this apparent lack of policy and the various positions and attitudes taken by this government in this very important matter. I hope the minister will have something to say on this subject.

Surely this will have a serious psychological effect on our relations with the United States in this regard. We are spending $100 million in excess of United States spending in Canada. Surely there is no justification for this action by the United States as far as Canada is concerned. I hope the minister will say a few words on this important matter in the course of his remarks.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, since the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is very active in my riding I know it will come as no surprise to the minister if I rise on his estimates to discuss his department's relations with my constituency and also to suggest to him ways in which his department can be of service in the future to Inverness-Richmond as it has been in the past.

However, I should first of all like to express my congratulations to the minister who has taken over this department so recently and has already shown such a firm and intelligent hand in its administration and in advancing the very good work begun by his predecessor, and indeed opening up new approaches himself.

I understand that the minister plans to come to Nova Scotia this summer. I must say that the people of my province will be very glad to welcome him and certainly I look forward very much to the opportunity to show him around Cape Breton Highlands national park in North Inverness. I know my colleague from Cape Breton North and Victoria will also look forward to that opportunity.

Also I should like to show the minister Fort Louisbourg in another part of my riding, which I know he would like to examine very fully when he has time to do so.

I should like to show him the famous Cabot trail, which is perhaps one of the most famous scenic spots in the eastern provinces, and I want to show him why so many tourists over the years have been attracted to this very wonderful part of Nova Scotia. He will drive over the new road that is almost completed and over the trail that will be completed by this July. I recall some 25 years ago when I first went over the Cabot trail the road was so narrow that there was scarcely room for one car. If you met somebody on the road you had to back down to a spot that was wide enough to allow the other car to go by. This was along the banks of a precipice in many cases and appeared very dangerous, even to me in those days.

I should also like to have the minister note what the Cape Breton Highlands national park has meant to the development of the tourist industry not only in Inverness country but indeed the whole of Nova Scotia. Our tourist industry has grown by leaps and bounds in the last few years and no small part of the reason for this is to be found in the attraction of the Cape Breton Highlands national park. The new camp sites built by the department and the general increase in facilities over the last two or three years have provided extra services for visitors to the park, and these services are very welcome. Indeed, the build-up of the tourist industry in that area stands as proof of the wisdom of the investment that has been made to date in the park.

Last year the registrations at the Cape Breton Highlands national park were 227,262. Every year recently there has been a big increase in the number of registrations. When we realize how important the tourist industry is, particularly to Cape Breton, we can understand what it has meant to this part of the country to have this very important and wise investment in the area. Every Nova Scotian town has a most important investment in the tourist industry, in terms of motels, hotels, restaurants and similar facilities. Nova Scotia is building up a very worth-while tourist industry and I am optimistic that it will continue to grow. We are very close to the vast population of the eastern seaboard of the United States and many of these people like to come to Nova Scotia, and they are coming in increasing numbers, to escape the heat of their cities and to feel the cool seabreezes of the maritime summer. I should like to compliment the minister and his department on the great increase in advertising respecting Nova Scotia. I am sure the increased money spent has had a lot to do with the increase we are seeing today in the number of tourists from the United States.

I may say also that in an area where the principal occupations have been fishing and lumbering the employment that has been provided to the local people in building up the park has been very welcome. The area around Cheticamp and North Inverness generally has presented in recent years a much more prosperous appearance as a result of the extra money available in those communities through the payrolls of the department. I hope this will continue, and, again, I assure the minister that every dollar spent in developing parks such as the Cape Breton national park is a good investment for Canada and the means of providing a worthwhile attraction for the tourists who will come to visit us.

As the tourist industry grows it will be necessary to continue the campsite building program and to assist in other ways to provide recreation and accommodation facilities in the park. I think it would be beneficial if a swimming pool were built on the Cheticamp side of the park. There is at present a golf course at Ingonish on the other side of the park but the time is coming when we shall need a second, and I suggest that this should be near Cheticamp.

When he is visiting I should like the minister to take a look at Cheticamp island because I believe that the acquisition of this land, or part of it, would be a valuable addition to present resources. This should be done without delay, because in a few years time the land might not be as readily available as it is today. We are going to need more campsites and recreation facilities, and Cheticamp island with its fine beaches and its tie-in with the rest of the park would be a natural addition.

Before leaving this topic I should like to pay a tribute to the superintendent of the park, Mr. F. C. Browning. He is a man well liked by all the citizens of the area and by the men who work for him. I know he has at heart the building up of the park and that he devotes a lot of time to planning and seeking out ways in which the park can be made a greater tourist attraction and of more use to the people of the surrounding area.

I should like, now, to address to the minister a few remarks on the subject of Louisbourg. I am proud to have this famous historic spot in my riding and I know the minister will appreciate that this is the fourth occasion on which I have brought up this matter in the house. I should like to express my thanks to boards of trade in the area and to other associations which have from time to time sent me resolutions, and sent resolutions to the minister, regarding Louisburg, or who have sent briefs suggesting ways in which this great Canadian monument could be refurbished. In 1963 Louisburg will be commemorating its two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the town which, as all hon. members know, was first laid down in 1713. In 1958, at the bicentennial ceremonies, a large group of people turned out at Louisburg to take part, and I am sure that by 1963 as many as 100,000 people will be on hand. I think it is important that these people, who will have come from far and near to the fortress town, may have a chance to see there something which will give them a proper reward for their visit, and that they may have a chance to carry away with them something of the story of this historic place.

There can be no doubt as to the historic importance of Louisburg. William Pitt referred to it as the "key to European power in the new world" during the days of the conflict between France and England out of which this country was born. Every day I meet Canadians from all parts of the nation who ask me: what is being done about Louisburg? Interest is widespread. Moreover, interest is not confined to Canada; it extends to those who live in the New England states, since many men from New England took part in the siege of 1745. Louisburg not only played a part in British history but in United States history as well. Further, I feel that apart altogether from the economic value which may attach to Louisburg, we Canadians are too prone to neglect the history of our nation; we spend too little time seeing to it that people learn the story of our national life. Some of the tales of Louisburg are of the greatest in Canadian history; the course of events which was shaped then has altered the lives of all Canadians today and, certainly, the bald phrases of the history books alone can never succeed in showing just what part this old fortress played in the early life of Canada.

I should like to emphasize the need for further expenditure at Louisburg while expressing my thanks for what has already been done there. I understand that this year there will be a number of guides there who will be familiar with the history of the spot and who will be able to tell visitors something about the Louisburg story. And a full-time curator is to be appointed to take over the museum. Economically speaking I am certain our tourist industry will be greatly enhanced by the development of Louisburg. At present, only about one tenth of the people who go to the Cape Breton Highlands national park make a visit to Louisburg. Building up the site will bring many people down from Cabot trail to the southern side of the island and, encourage them to spend another two or three days on the island of Cape Breton.

Along with this I think that a new road should be constructed from Louisburg to St. Peters along the southern shore of Cape Breton and Richmond counties to open up an area which is known to very few and which is not now served by a good road. This would provide a circular route for tourists coming in at Port Hawkesbury and over the Cabot trail, and would allow them to leave from St. Peters. It would provide tourist interest in that part of the province which certainly does not now have its share of visitors.

I know that the construction of highways is not within the province of the minister, but I hope some arrangement can be worked out with the province of Nova Scotia in the interest of bringing more people to fortress Louisburg and of the general development of the area.

I am not going to list the structures which I think should be built at Louisburg, or make suggestions in regard to restoration, as I know the minister is in possession of two or three briefs from the associated boards of trade of Cape Breton island in regard to this subject, as well as briefs from organizations in the town of Louisburg itself. I do think, however, that in time substantial restoration of a portion of the French town should take place.

It is important at once to acquire more land for the historic site. I am sad to say that Wolfe's Landing at Louisburg, which is east of the fortress, is not now within the historic site grounds. But the acquiring of a few extra acres would make it possible to bring this particularly interesting spot within the enclosure. I am sure that the department will wish to do this so as to preserve this site properly for all Canadians.

At this particular time, when new employment will be badly needed in Cape Breton Island, I would suggest to the minister that all possible steps should be taken to put under way, as soon as possible, a large construction program at Louisburg. Not only would the investment be a very sound one, as I have said, but the work done at the site, because of its nature, must be done by hand. It is the type of work that employs a large number of people and would provide assistance to many who will be out of work this summer if the proposed closing of some Dosco mines cannot be avoided. I urge the minister to begin to develop the Louisburg site as soon as possible for economic reasons as well as to properly display this very important historic monument in Canada.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, before the item carries I would like to ask for the indulgence of the committee for a few moments. We have heard hon. members this afternoon advocating various ways and means of increasing the flow of tourists to this country. We have heard suggestions in regard to the establishment and restoration of various historic sites and monuments in different parts of the country. It is in this regard that I would like to direct the minister's attention because, in my mind, there is no better way of graphically telling the story of a people than by means of historic sites, relics and monuments.

I would suggest that Canada abounds with history from coast to coast. All too often historic areas in perhaps more remote parts of the country tend to be forgotten in favour of the more well-known and accessible areas in the central part of Canada. In 1955 the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, on behalf of the government of Canada, proceeded with the establishment of a historic site on the easternmost tip of Canada which is, as a matter of fact, the easternmost tip of North America. This site, which is now under development as a national historic park, is equal in historic significance and import to the plains of Abraham in Quebec and other historic sites in the southern part of Ontario. This is the site of the last armed conflict in North America between the French and English during the seven years' war. It was at this site in the 1770's that the French and English fought for possession of North America. It was in the year 1705 that construction of a fort by the then British garrison was undertaken at this historic site. It was completed in the year 1711. It has been called the "Queen's fort", taking its name from Queen Anne, the then reigning monarch of Great Britain.

After this site was taken over as a national historic park in 1955 there followed a very slow period of development. I am sorry to say that to this day, some five or six years later, this historic site of national significance is sadly underdeveloped.

Regrettably, a few months ago one of the oldest landmarks in Canada, built in 1705, was destroyed by fire. With all due respect to my hon. friend, in whose constituency fort Louisbourg is located, I would suggest that this fort preceded Louisbourg fort by several years. As I say, in 1705 this grand old building was erected and in 1960 was burned down. As a result of the Department of Northern Affairs and Natural Resources in its wisdom evicting the old gentleman and his family who had lived in this building for many years, it was left without a custodian and, through lack of proper supervision, or perhaps as a result of carelessness, this historic site of national significance has been destroyed.

I would ask the minister to tell the committee when he expects Signal Hill historic park will be completed. Since 1955, when it was commenced, only a relatively minor paving program and some restoration to Cabot tower has taken place. I would suggest for the benefit of hon. members that this historic site is of interest from the point of view of contemporary history, because of the fact that in 1901 the first Marconi wireless message from Cornwall, England, was received at this site. I say this to illustrate the fact that here is a site of tremendous significance in the history of Canada, both in its early history and in its later development. I would suggest to those responsible in the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources that they immediately initiate a stepped up program for the completion of this area and for the restoration of that part of the Queen's fort which was destroyed by vandals, I believe, a few months ago for want of a proper custodian and a watchman.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I submit there are historical sites in Canada of less significance which are fully developed. I do not want to be specific but, for example, I hold in my hand a booklet put out by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources through the Canadian travel bureau on Fort Malden national historic park at Amherstburg, Ontario. I have had the privilege of visiting this site. Some of my hon. friends from eastern Canada should visit some of the sites in Ontario and see how they are really and properly developed, what a tourist attraction they are and what a sense of pride they are to those residents of this part of Canada. On the cover of this booklet which commemorates this site of a historical nature, but in my submission of not the same historical importance as Signal Hill park, there is a very apt quotation, and I shall close with it in the hope that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, who has brought so much zeal, vigour and enthusiasm to his new post, will give the attention that they justly deserve and demand to the historical sites of Canada. The quotation is by Joseph Howe, and it reads as follows:

> A wise nation preserves its record, gathers up its muniments, decorates the tombs of its illustrious dead, repairs its great public structures and fosters national pride and love of country by perpetual reference to the sacrifices and glories of the past.

Mr. McGee: I do not want to impede the progress of the committee. Perhaps before I make my request to the minister I should say that I was profoundly impressed by the arguments advanced by my hon. friend and seat mate from St. John's East. I was particularly impressed with the weight of his argument dealing with the burning of what surely must be one of the earliest structures in our national history.

I wish to ask the minister when he replies to bring us up to date on the progress of the request for the ossuary in Scarborough. For those hon. members who might not be aware of the significance of ossuaries, I would tell them that the dictionary definition describes an ossuary as a pile of bones. A subdivider in Scarborough, in preparing his land for building, discovered a mound and within the mound a substantial quantity of bones which turned out to be early Indian bones. When the Seven Nations Indians heard about this a request was made to me and to the local council to approach the federal government with a view to recognizing the significance of those bones and to establish an ossuary and a plaque. Several ambitious schemes have been advanced along the lines of providing perhaps a replica of an early Indian village similar to the type of thing found in the national museum. I understand that many persons are still interested in that aspect of the development, but I would appreciate it if the minister could bring us up to date on the progress of the Scarborough ossuary.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I thought this was an appropriate time also to speak about the old buildings we have in the city of St. Boniface.

First, I should like to congratulate the minister on his activity and the very able way in which he has conducted himself in his office as the new Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. It is a very difficult post when you have almost all of northern Canada and almost half of Canada to look after.

In St. Boniface we have what I believe to be the oldest building in western Canada. It was constructed before 1846 to receive the four grey nuns who came to St. Boniface in that year. I hold in my hand the fifth volume of the St. Boniface historical society. They have taken a great interest in this building. This book refers to this building in a rather long quotation.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I thought it would be best to do so before he started his quotation.

It being five o'clock and in order to permit the house to proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day, or at the next sitting of the house, as the case may be.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15 as provisionally amended.

SMALL LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PLACE CEILING ON INTEREST RATES

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-20, an act to amend the Small Loans Act.—Mr. Argue.

Mr. Argue: Stand.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: I rise on a point of order, if I may. There has been a long standing custom in this house over a great many years, certainly all the time that I have been here, before the advent of this government, that when a public bill standing in the name of a private member was asked to stand it was automatically stood at the request of the member in whose name the bill appeared. This was done time after time and no question was raised as to this procedure. I think the practice was a correct one and that public bills in the name of private members are in fact private member's bills. In my opinion the procedure of the house from five o'clock to six o'clock should not be based on rules set out by the government or requests made by the government. Since this government took office, and in the last couple of years particularly, there has been a disposition to stand bills such as these first by request of the member in whose name the bill appears or by the request of the whip for the party concerned. Then, the Speaker would say, "at the request of the government," and the bill would stand in a routine fashion.

However, a week ago when Bill No. C-19, standing in my name, was called, I asked that it stand. I will agree that just a few minutes before I had not been too co-operative during the consideration of item No. 1 of the post office estimates. We are not always co-operative. I think sometimes hon. members on both sides dig in their heels. It was the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) who initiated the procedure by pointing out rule 19. At that time the house leader, I take it because of what had happened a few moments before, said the government was not requesting that this bill stand. I immediately proceeded with it.

I had hoped today, however, that as a courtesy to me, this bill might have been allowed to stand without prejudice to its position on the order paper. I was informed this procedure would not be followed and that unless I was prepared to proceed with it at this time the government would not request that it stand and the bill would have to go to the bottom of the order paper. With the large number of public bills on the order paper this would mean that, for all practical purposes, the bill would be dead for this session.

My point of order is this: The rules have not been changed on this question. A practice of the house had been built up over many years, I think an excellent practice, whereby public bills standing in the name of private members would stand on the request of the private member with an indication that the government was agreeable. I suggest that the government is making a mistake in the rule that is now going to be laid down, as I understand, that private members' bills will not be allowed to stand. I feel this rule will not aid orderly discussion. I think it will make it difficult for us if we wish to stand two or three bills in order to debate a bill, say, on capital punishment in which all the members of the house may be interested. I understand that the house leader is laying down this as the practice the government will follow in the future, that private bills will not be stood at the request of the government.

I feel this rule amounts to contempt of the private members' hour. I think it shows the government is becoming very arrogant and very dictatorial in its attitude. It is now, by this means, wielding the big stick. For the first time in all the years I have been in the house the government, by this arbitrary rule, is going to say that from now on if a bill stands at the top of the order paper and is not moved, then it gets the guillotine. I suggest that on the basis of co-operation in the house, the need for some give and take, this is a stupid attitude the government is taking and a course that should not be followed.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman, as usual, has used very extravagant language to describe the adherence to the rules which have been in existence for years. This issue was first raised on March 13, 1959, by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin). The hon. member for Nickel Belt, as I understand it, is not a supporter of this government. He rose to a point of order at that time to the effect that standing order 19 required either that the motion for second reading of a bill must be proceeded with or that the bill should lose its precedence on the order paper. Mr. Speaker, in a lengthy statement at that time, indicated the way in which the rule had been applied and then said that the proper application of the rule required that bills should stand only at the request of the government. Subsequent to that, when a bill stood it stood at the request of the government with the house leader so indicating.

The last occasion on which this question was raised was, as the hon. gentleman said, last Friday. Was it a supporter of the government who raised the issue? It was not.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) raised the issue at that time. As a result of what the hon. member said, Mr. Speaker ruled as follows:

> As I understand the rules, unless the government requests the postponement of consideration of the bill it does go to the bottom of the list automatically. In this case, in the past it has been taken that the government has requested that it stand. I shall ask specifically, now, since the point has been raised.

There is no question of doubt, Mr. Speaker. Standing order 19 is completely clear. It says:

> Orders not proceeded with when called, upon the like request,—

This is a reference to the previous subsection which refers to the request of the government.

> —may be allowed to stand retaining their precedence; otherwise they shall be dropped and be placed on the order paper for the next sitting after those of the same class at a similar stage.

Now, sir on the basis of such a clear-cut rule, for the hon. gentleman to suggest that there is any contempt of private members is absurd. His use of the extravagant type of language he has used today shows that the hon. gentleman has no conception of the rules of this house.

Mr. Howard: After that impassioned appeal by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), I think I should make a comment on the point of order. I believe this procedure does indicate the great arrogance of the government and its desire to control parliament.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; I am willing to listen to the hon. member but I wish he would discuss the interpretation of standing order 19, if he so desires. I think enough has been said on both sides now as to the attitude of both sides. I should like to hear the hon. member on the interpretation of standing order 19.

Mr. Howard: Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is what I was proceeding to do. I was merely trying to follow the example set by the hon. member for Carleton.

An hon. Member: He was following your example.

Mr. Howard: The example was set by this government in its arrogant desire to control parliament.

I believe the hon. member for Carleton was quoting from the Journals for 1959, because I recognized the colour of the book he had in his hand. The hon. member said that this matter arose first on March 13, 1959. Well, in that regard he is quite incorrect. The matter arose on March 10, 1959. I shall attempt to read this quotation from Hansard to indicate to you that the practice prior to that time was precisely the practice set out by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). I am reading from Hansard for March 10, 1959, page 1796. A point of order was raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin) in respect of a bill relating to the printing of negotiable instruments in English and in French. The sponsor of that particular bill, I believe the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), asked that it stand and I quote:

> Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order it seems to me that the hon. member has asked twice that this bill stand. The question is before the house and many members of the opposition groups are interested in this matter and would like it dealt with in a very short time by having a vote taken on it.

The next speaker was the house leader, then minister of public works, and I read this to indicate to you that even that hon. gentleman, with his many years of experience in this house, believed this to be the practice. I quote:

> Mr. Green: This is not a point of order at all. The hon. member has a perfect right to stand his bill just as the other hon. members have stood theirs. No point of order whatever has been raised by the hon. member.

This was the attitude of the house leader at that time, the present distinguished Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green). I read this, sir, to show you that the practice outlined by the hon. member for Assiniboia has been the practice for many, many years. This rule merely indicates the desire of this government to interfere in the affairs of private members and to exert its control and authority beyond its jurisdiction; that is the point with which we must deal.

Mr. Nowlan: That is sheer nonsense, and I think one little word of reply should be made on behalf of private members. Many private members, for weeks and months during this session, have prepared to speak on some bill only to find that as a result of some private arrangement that has been made between members—

Mr. Argue: Or the whips.

Mr. Nowlan: —sometimes through the whips, it is true, and sometimes without any consultation with the whips, their efforts have been wasted. It was because of the desire of the private members that some order should be brought into this performance, as was established three years ago with the Speaker, that this practice has been carried out. I admit that there may be an occasion—such as that when an hon. member is sick, is unavoidably prevented from coming to this House of Commons, is away in his own constituency or is on other business—when some consideration might be given to that particular case. But on the matter of general practice, the rule is laid down clearly as adopted by this house—not by the government but by the house and by a preceding government, as far as that is concerned—and it has been laid down in the rulings of the Speaker.

I suggest that to imply that this is an imposition on private members or that this is an arbitrary action of the government is simply a play on words which should hardly be acceptable at this time.

Mr. Argue: If I may I should like to reply to the point raised by the minister. He certainly created in my mind a new impression as to what the government's practice is likely to be in the future. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) says that if a member is sick, is away on business or is unavoidably absent a different attitude may be taken—

Mr. Nowlan: Might be taken.

Mr. Argue: —or might be taken. I would suggest this does precisely the thing we are suggesting it is doing today. It lends itself to arbitrary interference by the government. It was a request which was not made by private members on this side, I am sure. I am sure it was made by the gang who sit around the minister.

Mr. Nowlan: There is only one gang.

Mr. Argue: The government now can give one type of treatment to a Tory member and another type of treatment to the opposition. I suggest that this is a flagrant disregard for the rights of members of this house.

An hon. Member: That is a figment of your imagination.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think standing order 19 is clear that if an hon. member does not wish to proceed with a bill standing in his name, it will not be allowed to stand unless there is a request from the government. I think the case to which reference was made and which arose on March 10, 1959, was entirely different. I do not think that the quotation from Hansard of the words of the then leader of the house would apply in the present case. Last week Mr. Speaker was very clear when a similar circumstance occurred. The rule is clear. The standing order gives a discretion to the government to request or not to request. Whether the government in the past has generally allowed bills to stand would not, in my view, have any application to the interpretation of the rule. I do not think I can rule otherwise than in the manner in which Mr. Speaker ruled last week. I therefore declare that unless the hon. member is ready to proceed with his bill it shall be dropped to the end of the orders.

Mr. Argue: With deference to Your Honour I wish to appeal your ruling.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The house has heard the decision. Those in favour of sustaining the decision of the Chair will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker put the question as follows:

The question is an appeal to the house from a decision of the Chair as follows:

Upon the order being read for second reading of Bill No. C-20, to amend the Small Loans Act, the hon. member for Assiniboia requested that the said order be allowed to stand and raised a point of order to the effect that it was the practice to allow such orders to stand when the sponsor so requested.

I ruled that the terms of standing order 19, paragraph 2, were explicit in this regard and that, in view of the recent ruling of Mr. Speaker on the same point, if the hon. member for Assiniboia did not proceed with the bill at this time it would drop to the foot of the list on the order paper.

Whereupon the hon. member for Assiniboia appealed to the house from the decision of the Chair.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Deputy Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the decision of the Chair confirmed.

Mr. Argue: I will proceed with my bill.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-20 to amend the Small Loans Act (Advertising).

He said: I am pleased to move once again a bill which has for its purpose the lowering of interest rates which may be charged by small loans companies in this country. I have had the opportunity to move similar bills back over the years. The first time I moved a bill in these terms was in 1954. At that time it received some support in the house. The Conservative opposition in the house of that day was silent and non-commital. The Liberal government followed the practice of putting on a cabinet minister who set forward the position taken by the government and, although this was not always the case at that time, they did follow the practice of talking the bill out.

I do not think I have been associated with any public bill or with any cause at all in a public bill which has received wider support in this nation than the contention that small loan companies are fleecing the public, that their interest rates are exorbitant and that it is time, in the interests of the consumer and the borrower, that parliament should act to further control the rates of interest which can be charged by small loan companies. When this bill was moved on a former occasion it created a great deal of stir in the country and aroused a great deal of public support.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

In 1956, I think it was, the minister of finance introduced a bill which was eventually incorporated into the Small Loans Act which extended to a large extent the area of control of interest rates that may be charged by small loans companies. Before that time the control amounted to a ceiling of 2 per cent per month on loans up to $500. With the passage of this particular amendment at that time, on loans up to $300 the 2 per cent provision was allowed or permitted; on loans in excess of $300 but less than $1,000, 1 per cent was provided and for unpaid balances in excess of $1,000 half of 1 per cent per month was the ceiling provided. There is no doubt in my mind that this step forward saved the consumers of this country many millions of dollars.

We in this group are asking by this measure that the area of control should now be further extended and that action should be taken by parliament to save the consumers and borrowers of this country millions of dollars in exorbitant interest rates. I have been discouraged, or, perhaps I should say, I have been disappointed by the attitude taken by the Conservative members in general. In the past they have not been sympathetic to these proposals. They have argued that in a free enterprise economy you should let the buyer beware; that it is the fault of the borrower if these things happen and that parliament should not be asked to increase its jurisdiction in order to protect the ordinary Canadian borrower or consumer. Recently, however, there have been signs of an encouraging change in the attitude of at least some of the hon. members who sit opposite.

A week ago when I proposed Bill No. C-19 which would make it necessary by law for small loans companies to set forth in their advertising the interest rates that could be charged I received a good deal of vocal support from certain members of the Conservative party though this support did not extend to the point of allowing a vote to be taken. Although I said to the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacLellan) that he had killed the bill by extended faint praise—by talking it out—the tenor of his remarks was more favourable than were the comments of some of the other members of the Conservative party on former occasions. The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond had this to say at one point in his remarks:

> I support the general principle of this bill. I should like to see the matter examined further by a committee of this house.

The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton) who has probably been the most active and most talkative member on the government side with regard to bills of this nature has been something of a killer member on the government side of the house. His job seems to have been to do anything he could to kill these bills, and he has been very successful. He has helped himself. He has set an example to members around him. He has talked on these bills. He has pointed out weaknesses, some real, no doubt, but most of them imaginary. He has spent a large part of his time making certain that these bills were talked out and killed. However, I noticed in that hon. member also what I took to be a change of emphasis in his statement of a week ago. He seemed at that time to have something more in mind than simply running down the provisions of the bill. He seemed to take a more constructive attitude and I hope this indicates a change in the attitude not only of the hon. member but on the part of the majority of the members on that side of the house. I would hope that this means the government will, in future, take a more lenient view to the proposals put forward in this and other bills I have moved regarding interest rates in Canada.

The hon. member for Davenport had the following to say, as reported at page 3698 of Hansard of April 14, 1961:

> Judging by the various bills that have been introduced in the house and the information put before the house within the last few years by members on all sides, I would say the time has come when the whole matter of interest, the Interest Act and the Small Loans Act, as well as this proposed legislation should be reviewed in toto.

He went on to say that there should be a periodic review, and this review should be undertaken by the banking and commerce committee. I hope that the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Bell) will follow me in this debate, and I would express the hope that when he makes his comments he will confirm the statement that was made by the hon. member for Davenport. I hope he will make it clear to the house that the government is prepared to take a more lenient attitude toward this measure. I would also make a plea that the government refer this bill, and the other bills I have on the order paper dealing with interest rates, the ceiling on interest rates, and advertising, to the banking and commerce committee this session so that we may have a thorough review of the interest provisions in these acts, and so they may be changed to provide greater protection to the consumers in this country.

There exists a provision in the Small Loans Act providing for control, as set forth in the legislation, on loans up to a maximum of $1,500. In respect of loans over $1,500 there is no control, so that a small loans company making a loan of $1,501 is able to charge 25 per cent, 30 per cent or 35 per cent. Some companies charge, as most hon. members realize, 60 per cent and 70 per cent.

I have in my hand a credit union publication which has reference to interest rates being charged on second mortgages, and it refers to this as the "second mortgage cancer in Canada".

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): What does that have to do with loan companies?

Mr. Argue: Does my hon. friend realize that I have been talking about this bill?

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) does not understand it.

Mr. Argue: I have been referring to this and other bills having to do with controls on interest rates which would make these cancerous rates prohibited by law. That is what I am endeavouring to put before the house.

I notice the hon. member does not say that these cancerous rates are not charged, but simply asks questions. Of course, he is in favour of the loan sharks. He has made that quite clear in his speeches. He likes high interest rates, but I do not. I feel they are a disgrace to Canada and the party in power.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has said I am in favour of loan sharks and high interest rates. At no time have I said that. I challenge the hon. member to show in Hansard where I have said that.

Mr. Woolliams: Hear, hear.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, the record is clear. I withdraw nothing. The hon. member can put his statement on record if he wishes.

Mr. Woolliams: The same old line.

Mr. Argue: The long-absent member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) is now back in the house. I noticed that when the Aurora Pipe Line Company bill in his name was presented we went ahead in his absence. I do not know where he was, if he was unavoidably detained or, if so, by whom. However, he was not here. He is here today, however, to make his intervention on behalf of the loan sharks and this high interest rate, by heaping ridicule on what I think is a bill having good principles and purpose.

I have a report of the superintendent of insurance in my hand, which shows what a lucrative business the small loans business is. We have in existence today the Beneficial Finance Company. It changed its name some time ago. It benefits the company but I do not know if it benefits borrowers very much. That company has an authorized capital stock of $10 million. That company has subscribed and paid up cash amounting to $1 million. According to the 1958 statistics that company made a net profit for the year of $5,230,000 on its paid up capital of $1 million, with income earned on small loans to the tune of $12.2 million.

Household Finance, the other giant in this field, has done equally well. This is a very lucrative field in which handsome profits are made, a field which is controlled by United States capital. This fact may no longer influence hon. members opposite, but the two large firms—Household Finance and Beneficial Finance—have made approximately 70 per cent of the loans in this country, and are controlled outside of this country.

I suggest that, in every respect, this bill and the other bills I have moved in this regard, warrant the support of all members of the house. I ask the government to sympathetically consider action along the lines set forth in these bills at the present session of parliament. Let us end this fleecing by bringing small loans companies under better control. Let us make a provision that interest rates charged in this country shall not be extortionate.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to set the record straight. We heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) at the beginning of his speech, shortly after another issue was settled at five o'clock, make the suggestions that this bill had been presented to the house during the past five, six or seven years, and that it had been talked out. Actually this is only the second time since changes were made in the Small Loans Act in 1956 that this bill has even proceeded to the stage where it was debated on second reading.

Mr. Argue: I referred to this and other bills.

Mr. McCleave: The hon. member has made his speech and perhaps he will be good enough to allow me to make mine.

The first bill was presented on April 17, 1959. Having read the debate for that year in that regard I can see why the hon. member for Assiniboia was somewhat irritated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Smith). The hon. member for Winnipeg North made some rather unflattering remarks about the amount of research that had not been done by the hon. member for Assiniboia in presenting the measure at that time. Since my time is short I will not repeat them, but I certainly endorse the remarks found in that particular debate.

The fact is, we have an emotional issue before us this afternoon. A debate on an emotional issue always presents an opportunity for members to rise and fulminate against the money lending section of the population. If we intended to be truly political we could certainly back up those remarks without bothering to find out the consequences of any bill we passed. I think if this measure were passed the moneylenders in this country would be automatically out of business. I might say that I am in favour of that particular course because I have, fortunately, not had occasion to go to the small loans companies so far, and hope I never will. However, perhaps more than a million individuals have had occasion to do business with them.

The purpose of this bill is really to reduce from 2 per cent per month to 1 per cent per month the interest paid on small loans. At present the rate is 2 per cent per month up to $300; then 1 per cent from $300 to $1,000; and then one half of one per cent from $1,000 to $1,500, and there the operations of the act cease. Therefore, the effect would be to reduce the amount from 2 per cent per month to 1 per cent per month on all loans up to the figure of $300.

The difficulty I find in this bill—and I should like to support it—is to know just what effect it will have. I tried to make some rough calculations. I calculated that perhaps this would reduce the amount of interest paid to small loans operators by as much as $15 million or perhaps $20 million a year. Then, looking at Mr. MacGregor's report on small loans companies, moneylenders, for the year ended December 31, 1959, I found that the gross profit of small loans companies was something of the order of $15.9 million for the year 1959. For the previous year, 1958, it had been around $15.1 million. If my calculations are correct, and unfortunately I cannot claim very much accuracy for them, it would mean that the amount of gross profit, or the profit to run the business, would practically disappear and perforce the companies themselves would also have to disappear. I am not saying this is a particularly bad thing, at least in my case, but it might be bad for Canadians who were forced to forsake this particular group to borrow their money and go to some other particular group.

You see, Mr. Speaker, the difficulty is that we have no figures in Mr. MacGregor's excellent report—and it is an excellent report and well worth reading—showing the amount of loans up to $300. For example, on page VI of the first part the figures are for loans from $100 to $500 and $501 to $1,000 and from $1,001 to $1,500. This makes it extremely difficult to calculate the exact effect of the bill of the hon. member for Assiniboia. For this reason I suggest that the best approach to the bill is to send it to the banking and commerce committee where we could find out the real effect of the change and the magnitude of what is proposed by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

I think the hon. member said on another occasion—I hope he will correct me if I am wrong—that he was not particularly wedded to these figures but that at least he wanted figures substantially lower than the rates that exist at the present time. I think I have given the gist of what he said previously. He nods his head in agreement. With that I can agree. I do think this subject needs another review. There are large areas in which our knowledge could be improved so that we would know exactly what we were getting into. At least with the small loans companies you see the shark for what he is—he is a licensed shark—but if you remove him as a source of credit or as a source of money for people who are in need, then you immediately drive them to people who will make the small loans shark appear almost like a saint by comparison. The problem, without putting haloes on these characters' heads, is to recognize at least there are much worse types of money operators in this country than these people.

Mr. MacGregor's report also gives other interesting information. But, Mr. Speaker, I see I am coming up to six o'clock. I hoped not to be in this particular position because I feel rather strongly on the subject of the bill, as does the hon. member for Assiniboia. Unfortunately, part of the time that I otherwise would have had for speaking was interrupted by a different procedure within this hour.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. McCleave: I believe I had asked to have six o'clock called.

Mr. Argue: I had not heard it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North is seeking the floor.

Mr. Argue: Just to kill the bill.

Mr. Cardiff: The hon. member killed it; he talked 20 minutes on it.

Mr. Argue: He had no speech; he just stood up to kill the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is now six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire of the house leader what the business is for next week?

Mr. Nowlan: The proposal is that on Monday the Prime Minister will move the motion with respect to hours of sitting to be applicable, I believe, the following week. Once that is concluded, the house will have a motion to go into supply which will last for the remainder of Monday and all day Tuesday. Then, on Wednesday and Thursday we will have time available, if it is required, for dealing with the estimates of the Department of External Affairs and a debate on matters involved in external affairs. Then on Friday we shall proceed with the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. These are tentative proposals and undoubtedly they will be carried out barring some circumstance arising which cannot be foreseen at the moment.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 24, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

FISHERIES

ALTERATION OF LOBSTER SEASON IN CERTAIN DISTRICTS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, due to the very difficult climatic conditions recently experienced in many parts of the maritime provinces, it is now fairly obvious that lobster fishermen would have great difficulty in commencing their season's operations in districts 7-A and 7-B on the normal opening date of May 1. These districts cover, in the main, the northeastern coast of New Brunswick, the outer coast of Prince Edward Island, the strait of Canso, part of Northumberland strait and the west coast of Cape Breton.

Officials of my department have been watching the situation carefully. We have also received a large number of representations from the fishermen for consideration in these rather unique conditions. For these reasons I am proposing to postpone the opening date of the season in districts 7-A and 7-B from May 1 to May 10, and the closing date from June 30 to July 5. It is my hope that this action and the expected return to normal weather will enable the fishermen to prosecute a full fishery with no more difficulty than is usually experienced.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

CONCURRENCE IN REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the report of the civil service commission concerning certain employees of the library of parliament, laid upon the table of the house Thursday, April 20, 1961, be now approved.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EXTENSION OF HOURS OF SITTING ON AND AFTER MAY 1

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That commencing on Monday, May 1, and on every sitting day thereafter until the end of this session, the hours of sitting shall be as follows:

Monday and Tuesday: 11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m.; 2:30 to 6:00 p.m.; and 7:30 to 10:30 p.m.; except that when a supply motion is being considered in accordance with standing order 56, the hours of sitting shall be as set out by standing orders 2 and 6, namely: 2.30 to 6:00 p.m. and 8:00 to 10:00 p.m.;

Wednesday: 11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m.; 2:30 to 6:00 p.m.;

Thursday: 11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m.; 2:30 to 6:00 p.m.; and 7:30 to 10:30 p.m.;

Friday: 11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m.; 2:30 to 6:00 p.m.; and that the provisions of standing orders 2 and 6 be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister allow me to ask a question before he moves this motion. The question is this. In view of the fact that today and tomorrow are supply motion days, and since this motion will probably take up a substantial part of the time of the house, which would cause some inconvenience and embarrassment to the opposition; and in view of the fact that it will not come into effect until a week from today, I wonder if the Prime Minister would not agree to hold it over until Wednesday of this week.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Ordinarily I would have no hesitation in doing that, but there are circumstances in connection with the legislation of which notice should be given to the house and these circumstances, I think, impel me to proceed today. I do not want at any time to be unfair to hon. members and, in particular, to members of the opposition, but as we have arrived at the present stage of our proceedings, a time when one ordinarily expects such a motion as this to be made, I would hope to proceed. I do not think it should take too long.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Chevrier: I take it the Prime Minister has some statement to make, because I understood from him earlier that he would make some announcement concerning legislation which was to be brought forward between now and the end of the session.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As I said a moment ago, at this approximate period of the session it is customary for a motion to be made extending the hours of sitting of the house. As I look back prior to the time we assumed office, such motions were made in several years on the 69th, the 71st, the 78th, the 84th and the 88th days.

I believe it is in the interests of all hon. members to endeavour at all times to proceed expeditiously with the business of the house. The extension of hours which is being sought will, I feel, be beneficial. It will bring about an actual addition of approximately 18 extra days between now and the first day of July. I mention that particular date not because there is any special significance to it with reference to parliament and the continuation of the session, but simply to show that the extra hours will mean that considerable additional time will be made available to deal with the various matters of legislation which remain to be considered this session.

Of course, in giving to the house a general outline of the legislative program I know there will be a full realization of the fact that the list in question is not an all-inclusive one, and that it does not include matters which conceivably could arise during the balance of the session. There might be some who would feel that the added hours place an extraordinarily heavy responsibility on members of parliament. I again remind hon. members that the hours of sitting in this house are far less, in the very beginning of the session, than is the case in the mother of parliaments. So far, up until April 21, we had been in session for 88 days, and it is of interest to ascertain the division in the calendar of the various matters that have come before the house.

The speech from the throne, including the opening day, took three days. The debate on what is called the baby budget took six days; private members' Mondays, six days; private members' Thursdays, two days; three supply motions, six days; the debate on March 3 on a matter of urgent public importance, one day. That is a total of 24 days in respect of debates that are fixed by the rules and the special debate. Then in supply on the supplementary estimates, four days; interim supply, two days. The main estimates, which to date have comprised the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, the Department of Agriculture and the Post Office Department, all of which have been completed, and the Departments of Labour and Northern Affairs and National Resources, incomplete, have taken 17 days, making a total for supply of 23 days, which incidentally, I believe, is somewhat longer than the total period taken in respect of supply in other parliaments.

When I mention the mother of parliaments I am not in any way suggesting that this house should follow the course followed there, but mention it simply by way of explanation that, in the experience of the years, the British parliament, which has been generally a model of expedition, has found it unnecessary to go into detail item by item in the estimates. I think the general plan there is for members to pick out particular items. All of us know, and I have that knowledge from having been in the opposition, that when each item is called, it is surprising the impetus and encouragement the calling of the items has to bring to the attention of the house matters which otherwise might not have been referred to. They are matters of much interest but not always of the same relative importance. On legislation so far we have spent 41 days, and have completed 17 bills and two motions.

I undertook to give a general outline, and naturally the house would like to have some idea as to the legislation projected or anticipated and yet to be introduced. In addition to the items in routine proceedings there will be amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act; an amendment to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act; amendments to the Criminal Code, including capital punishment; an amendment to the narcotics control legislation; an amendment to the Coal Production Assistance Act; amendment to the Financial Administration Act; ratification of the convention on the law of the sea, the Pine Point Railway Act and the Food and Drugs Act amendments.

In addition, legislation will probably be introduced with respect to amendments to the Loan Companies Act, the Industrial Development Bank Act, the assignment of crown debts legislation and the War Veterans' Allowance Act. There will, of course, be a budget debate and legislation will be based on the resolutions. Furthermore, considerable attention will have to be given to the transportation problem and legislation arising out of, if not directly founded on, certain portions of the report of the royal commission on transportation may be anticipated. In this connection there is one piece of legislation having to do with the act to make provision for the reduction of certain class and commodity rates on freight traffic or, as cited, the Freight Rates Reduction Act of 1959, which was extended in 1960. Application will be made to the house for approval of further extension of this act.

What I have said I think gives some indication of the considerable amount of legislation that yet remains for the attention of the house. As I said earlier, in the normal course of events there will, of course, be one or more matters which have not yet come before the cabinet but which no doubt will come before it between now and the conclusion of the session.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the Prime Minister would consent to allow this motion to stand until Wednesday, were it only because of the fact that, first, the discussion is likely to take some time and, as the Prime Minister and the house know, the rules of the house provide for six supply motions in so far as the opposition is concerned. There is no provision for any curtailment of that time to deal with other business of the house.

Then again there is the fact that this motion will not go into effect until next week. We on this side of the house had hoped that there would be no inconvenience to the government if this motion had been allowed to stand over until Wednesday of this week at least. However, the Prime Minister has decided against that course of action for the reasons which he gave and I am not going to pursue it any further, but I should like to deal with the motion itself. This is a motion which we have every year. It is a hardy perennial, but this session it seems to have bloomed much earlier than usual. If the motion is accepted it will mean two hours' additional sittings every morning and will add another hour to the evening sittings by providing that the house will sit from 7.30 p.m. to 10.30 p.m.

I take it that the government has been driven to put this motion on the order paper now for two reasons; first, because of the fact that the session began in November of last year, earlier than usual; and second, because of the long list of legislation announced by the Prime Minister, which is indicative of the tremendous amount of work still to be done. This state of affairs certainly cannot be blamed on the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: My friends on the other side of the house smile. I will be able to indicate in a moment that the position is not as clear as some hon. members on the other side seem to think it is. It is well known that the organization of debate as well as the organization of the business of the house are in the hands of the government and not in the hands of the opposition. That is in accordance with our rules. We in the opposition have tried to co-operate with the government in the task of arranging for the orderly conduct of the business of the house. The fact is that most of the time has been taken up by government speakers. I said I would give some indication of this situation and I should now like to do so.

I have before me a list of the time taken by speakers for the different parties in a number of debates. This list was prepared at my request by the whip's office and I have every reason to believe it is accurate. The list indicates that during the throne speech debate, which took place on Monday, November 21, there was one speaker on behalf of the government who took one hour and 15 minutes compared with 35 minutes for one speaker from the official opposition and the same length of time for one C.C.F. speaker.

In the budget debate, which took six days, there were 19 government speakers who took 9 hours and 21 minutes compared with 15 Liberal speakers who took 11 hours and 53 minutes and C.C.F. speakers who took 3 hours and 55 minutes. I put these times on the record so the house will see what the position actually is with respect to what has been said in the house. I have referred to the budget debate particularly because we had every reason to take the time we did on that occasion.

On the resolution dealing with loans to small businesses there were 12 Progressive Conservative speakers who took 1 hour and 58 minutes compared with one Liberal who took 2 minutes and three C.C.F. speakers who took 37 minutes. When Bill No. C-40 dealing with the same matter, loans to small businesses, came before the house government speakers took 1 hour and 6 minutes compared with 55 minutes for the official opposition and 28 minutes for the C.C.F.

In the case of the National Housing Act amendments the same situation is revealed. There were 24 speakers on the government side who took 4 hours and 15 minutes compared with 17 minutes used by speakers from the official opposition and 37 minutes by C.C.F. speakers.

I bring to the attention of the house the fact that on many occasions speakers from the government side have risen to compliment the minister concerned, to thank him for the resolution introduced and to tell him what a tremendous benefit it was going to be in the riding of the member speaking, and I ask the house whether repetition of that same sort of thing day in and day out could not be eliminated and a great deal of the time of the house saved thereby.

With respect to Bill No. C-45, having to do with the continuation of the operation of railways, which was dealt with on November 30 and December 1, there were two government speakers who took 1 hour and 43 minutes, four Liberals who took 2 hours and 7 minutes and 5 C.C.F. speakers who took 2 hours and 10 minutes. Then there was Bill No. C-49 with regard to technical training assistance, which was discussed on December 7 and 9 and on which 13 government speakers took up 3 hours and 1 minute, we in the opposition took up 1 hour and 16 minutes and the C.C.F. took up 32 minutes. The same thing can be said of the productivity council resolution, where 43 minutes were taken up by all the government speakers as compared with 15 minutes for this side of the house and 10 minutes for the C.C.F. As to the productivity council bill, the same thing could be said. One hour and 27 minutes were taken up by the government side as compared with 1 hour and 39 minutes by this side and 13 minutes by the C.C.F. I could go on, because I have a complete list; however, that is indicative of the attitude and the statement I made a moment ago, namely that we on this side of the house are not those who are taking up the time in dealing with these matters.

The government evidently believe that the solution for this state of affairs is to provide more time for talk. That is a very inadequate objective unless the time so provided is profitably used by a clear cut division and organization of the work of the house. The fact that the members of the House of Commons have been talking since November 17 and that such little progress has been made is clear proof that something better is required in the way of planning the business of this house. But in this motion the government obviously believe that the best solution is to provide more time for more talk.

This particular motion, if accepted, will add 11 hours to the weekly sittings of the house except during the weeks when there are supply motions, when there are added 5 additional hours. Here, as I say, we are asked to extend the hours of the sitting of the house in order to deal with government business. However, when it comes to dealing with a supply motion, something which is the prerogative of the opposition, we are not allowed to sit longer so far as that is concerned. In any event, the object of this motion is to provide the equivalent of two full days of sitting per week. We understand that it is the wish of the government to have us out of here by the end of June.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I always like to know what is wanted. On days of supply motions does he want the same hours, namely from 11 o'clock in the morning? If he does, I am always willing to accommodate.

Mr. Chevrier: If the Prime Minister will allow me to complete my remarks I think he will find the answer to the question he has just asked. I was going on to say that I understood it to be the intention of the government to conclude the sittings of this house by the end of June. This would give us a period of nine weeks within which to complete our work if we began morning sittings on Monday next. The equivalent of 15½ days would be added to the work of the house within the next 9 weeks. The effect of this proposal is to reduce the length of the session by about three weeks. Without adding further hours at this stage, and on the assumption that the pace of work would remain the same regardless of hours of sitting, the session would probably expire on July 25 or thereabouts.

We find this proposal objectionable for two reasons. First, it provides for morning sittings at an unusually early period of the session; but what is more important, it comes at a time when the committees which normally meet in the morning are just getting down to work. In that respect here are the facts. There are 24 committees in existence or in contemplation. Of these, 14 have already started to work, 18 have been organized, and 11 have had sittings regularly. Over and above that, there are four special committees that have been appointed and three of these have had regular meetings. None the less there are five committees which have been organized but have not started to work, three of which in fact are extremely important.

Then the other objection we find is that there is no provision that the extra time provided will be used properly through better organization. I want to make a proposal to the government. Our proposal will make unnecessary morning sittings which at this stage prevent effective committee work, will provide for a different but more productive allocation of the time remaining, and will oblige the government to get busy in planning the remaining work of the session in the days that lie ahead.

Our proposal consists of three points. We propose first that we deal differently with the two remaining supply motions. The official opposition is willing to dispense with the debate on possibly both the remaining supply motions. We would wish, however, to reserve our right to debate one of these motions for at least one day if circumstances call for such a debate. By making this proposal in connection with the supply motion we suggest that the government agree to call one such motion at the request of the opposition. That might not be necessary. If this first part of the proposal were put into effect, that would make available at once at least three days and possibly four days in which to deal with legislation and estimates.

The next point in the proposal is that the time spent on the budget debate—and I refer to the budget which the Minister of Finance intends to bring down at a later date—be reduced from six days to four days. We think this proposal is justified because we have already spent six days in debating the supplementary budget, and because we feel that a four day budget debate, provided the evening sittings can be extended if members wish to speak, would ensure that all points of view would be heard. This proposal would make available an additional two days in which to deal with estimates and legislation.

We asked that the government make available the final and complete list of legislation which it intends to place before the house. The Prime Minister has now done this. We should like to study this list at once so that we could—if it is the wish of the government to co-operate with the various leaders of the house—develop a definite time schedule for each item of legislation and each department of the government. It seems to me that we could very easily, having regard for this list, set aside a certain number of hours or days for each item on the program which we could attempt to follow unless such an adherence in a particular case would not be in the public interest. For instance as I look at the list which I took down I find that there are a number of items which could be disposed of in no time. I could almost immediately give the assurance to the government that at least one of these measures, if I understand it correctly, should take little time at all.

On the other hand there are measures of extreme importance. Without mentioning them, I have one in mind wherein we might say, "We will set aside X number of days to deal with this legislation," and we will give the undertaking that beyond that we will not go; with this exception, that if it became clear to us during the course of the debate that more speakers were required, we would ask that the hours of sitting of that day be extended so we could dispose of that legislation in the allotted time.

If such a time schedule were arranged, I can see no objection to extending the evening sittings of the house beyond the present sitting hours, within the confines of any such schedule of days. I may add that we have no objection to sitting an additional hour in the evening, say from 7.30 until 10.30, as the motion indicates. This would be a gain of approximately five days which, when added to the two proposals we made previously, gives a total of 10 to 11 additional days. Add to that a better organization of the business of the house, as I indicated in my last point, and I think we will have gone a long way toward meeting the desire or wish of all hon. members, not only those of the government, for an orderly consideration of the business.

It seems to us that this additional time, combined with the suggestion for planning and organization which I have made, would allow us to complete our work within the period of time which I believe the government has in mind. I see no point, however, in adding more hours, providing for more talk, and more time, without better management and organization.

There is another objection which I bring to the attention of the government. It deserves to be considered. It is the fact that additional hours work a great hardship on the staff. I need not tell the Prime Minister this; I am sure he realizes it every bit as much as I. We know what happened during the extension of the hours last year, when two members of the Hansard staff were stricken rather seriously. This also affects the very active and dynamic group of young page boys who give us such devoted service. Because of the fact that the hours begin earlier it will not be possible for them to attend school, as they have in the past. Also, this is a very critical period of the year, namely examination time.

The Prime Minister spoke a moment ago about the mother of parliaments and what was being done in the parliament of the United Kingdom. I have before me the report dated February 19, 1959, from the select committee on procedure. An attempt was made to have morning sittings and the parliament of the United Kingdom decided against them. This can be found at pages 13 to 15. I will only read the pertinent sentence, and I quote from page 15 of the report from the select committee on procedure:

> For this reason, and in view of the disadvantages which attach to morning sittings and in our view outweigh the possible advantages, we recommend no change in the present practice in regard to morning sittings.

It is true that in reply one can say there is a different arrangement in the United Kingdom. However, I am suggesting a different arrangement in the work and the planning of the business of this house.

I ask the government, therefore, in the light of what I have said and in the light of the proposal I have put forward, not to proceed with this motion today but to consider the proposals I have made in all seriousness and in all good faith in an attempt to assist the house and parliament to get on with the business. I am completely satisfied that a satisfactory arrangement could be worked out among the various house leaders which would do away with morning sittings, if not altogether, at least until the dying days of the session.

Business of the House

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister was the first to comment on the comparison of this house with the mother of parliaments, I wish he would also underline to the house that there are over 600 members in the British House of Commons, and over 500 of them live within three hours of Westminster. This makes quite a difference in their ability to attend when there are extended hours.

This particular motion affects each one of us as individuals and then there is the party sense of which we are all conscious. The house may remember that in the past three sessions, on the introduction of similar motions the C.C.F. party objected very stridently though notoriously to no avail, and the hours were lengthened.

This occasion brings us forward with a different, more co-operative attitude. This is not based on any view of the government as a villain trying to seduce us poor Nells over in the corner. There is almost complete unanimity that we should complete this session by the end of June if we possibly can. There is still much to do and there is still a certain sense of urgency both in the house and in the country that there are problems to be met. If we do not complete the session by the end of June or shortly thereafter, I think every one of us in the house must bear some burden of the blame, although the apportionment will always be a controversial matter. If the session drags and dowdles, is it primarily because of the lack of government leadership in the house, as has been indicated by the hon. member for Laurier, or is it primarily because of the obstreperous behaviour or prolixity of opposition speakers?

As an advocate of a "complex theory" of the House of Commons I would not want to give a firm answer to either of these questions. However, I would suggest that all the following facts or factors are involved. I think most of us assume that this is a national forum and that the nation is listening to us or watching us, although if we think about it I think we can all have very grave doubts as to whether this is really true.

The second point is that the majority of us, whatever our party or our individual status as politicians, recognize that time is wasted in this house in a number of ways; by overlong question periods, by repetitious speeches, by the sudden temper or whim of various ones among us, or by just misunderstandings over the course of business. Another point is that under regular hours, or extended hours, an extra burden to attend the house and committees is placed upon hon. members from distant places. This burden is increasingly noted whenever we get into extended hours.

Another point is that many hon. members of this house, despite the fact that we are all peers, or we are assumed to be peers one to the other, have much different attitudes towards attendance either in Ottawa or in the house. Many hon. members carry on businesses or law practices co-ordinate with their political duties. Many others find a greater role to play politically at home, in their constituencies, than they do in Ottawa, even during sessions. Some of us, by geographic incident, our age or lack of age, our trade or profession or lack of either, or the nature and attitude of our constituents, cannot be the political semi-pros that I have just referred to. Also, a goodly number of us find that for family and financial reasons, the longer the session lasts, the rougher and tougher is our economic predicament.

Overlying all these individual factors is the crucial one of uncertainty; uncertainty not only as to the length of the session and the dates of the session, but uncertainty even about the length of this particular parliament. There have been many suggestions for change or reform put forward by members of the house over the years, including proposals that we should split the sessions, fix the length of the sessions, confine the length of the debates, accept as a principle that being a member of parliament is a full-time vocation and arrange the parliamentary year in a regular pattern with regular duties as they have really reached the stage of doing in Britain. Another suggestion has been put forward that we should increase the role of the house committees and cut down on formal debates in the house, together with a much greater degree of inter-party negotiation, as suggested by the hon. member for Laurier, in order to speed proceedings and get them under way.

It seems to me that one can detect one major difference of opinion among members of this house—and this has nothing to do with party positions—and this difference seems to me to rest on the basis of whether they were elected for the first time before or after 1957. There is much more patience among the more veteran members regarding the length of sessions and the length of debates. Perhaps because of the influx of rather young members in 1957, and particularly in 1958, this newer group is much more ready to say "The devil take it. Let's get through the job; let's get out of here to our families and our constituencies."

Speaking as an individual and not as a party member it is apparent, I think, where I stand on this point of view. This dialectic between the patience of experience and the impatience of the newer members probably affects all parties in the house. In any event, the sense of urgency we express at this time is that we should speed this session to a conclusion. We see little reason on the order paper, or from what the Prime Minister has said, to seriously consider why we should be here throughout July. The added hours will be a blight to every one of us and especially to all those who take their attendance and their duties here seriously, though I ask the whole house to remember that there are many members who do not take this attendance seriously.

We intend to co-operate especially for this reason—and we are selfish in this, because most of us do come from distant places—that we cannot be at home week ends even if we wish to; and in order to end more quickly the load—and we know this view is shared by many of our colleagues who come from the west or from distant places in the east—we wish to amend the motion which has been put forward. We take the view that the whole hog is as palatable as the greater part, and I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena:

That the motion be amended by adding thereto: Saturday, 11.00 a.m. to 1.00 p.m.; 2.30 p.m. to 6.00 p.m.

An hon. Member: What about Sunday?

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member who has moved this motion retires, may I take it that his amendment is to be inserted after the provision for Friday? On that basis it no doubt will be acceptable.

Mr. Chevrier: I just want to say one word in connection with the amendment. For the reasons I gave earlier, so far as the opposition are concerned this amendment is not acceptable. We believe the proposal which we put forward in three points is far more attractive than this and should first be considered, if not accepted, by the government.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I find myself in a peculiar situation. That is not unusual. I have listened with a great deal of interest and respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Port Arthur, and I find myself in complete disagreement with them.

Perhaps I owe the house an apology, because for the past two weeks I have been out of touch with the House of Commons. Indeed, I returned only yesterday afternoon after being a parliamentary observer at the United Nations. It was not until this morning that I knew of the motion which has just been moved by the Prime Minister for the extension of hours, or of the amendment which has been put forward by my hon. friend from Port Arthur. Sir, I have even been warned to be careful what I say. I never thought I would be given that warning.

In the time I have been here in the House of Commons those hon. members who were here during the same time will remember what I have said on previous occasions on the subject of the extension of hours. Those who did not hear my remarks on this subject in previous sessions can find them in Hansard. This question of the extension of hours is of such importance that I cannot hold my seat and agree in silence to what is now before us. Will you allow me, Mr. Speaker, to introduce my comments in this way. As I said, I have just returned from four weeks at the United Nations. The last week was probably one of the most crucial weeks in the history of the United Nations, when matters of life and death were debated—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Winch: —yet during those all important discussions sitting hours were allowed to extend until six o'clock in the morning. In the United Nations I feel problems cannot be resolved on matters of life and death, by brilliant people of all the nations, on such a basis.

So much for what took place last week. I feel the same way about proceedings in the House of Commons. I have said before, time after time over the past eight years, that we are the 265 directors of the business of Canada. We have been given the responsibility for imposing laws which must be obeyed by the 18 million people who live in this country. We make the law, or rescind the law; we impose taxation and spend the money. As a rule the major business comes at the latter part of the session, and I say we are betraying the 18 million and those who elected us if our work is carried on in such haste that, taking account of the work to be done outside of the house, the hours and duties are such that we cannot give proper consideration and proper attention to decisions which are going to affect every man, woman and child in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that what the hon. member for Port Arthur says about responsibilities to business, and wanting to get home to constituencies and families, is correct. I have a family and a constituency as well. I have not seen my wife, my children or my grandchildren since the second week of January. I could have gone home, as many other members could; but when we accept nomination, surely to heaven we accept the responsibilities of directors of the Canadian economy whether we sit in this house in government or in opposition, and regardless of what party name we have.

Between now and the end of the session we will be passing new laws, amending existing laws, and perhaps making changes in many directions. We will be imposing taxation and spending billions of dollars, and I suggest most sincerely and conscientiously that whether the House of Commons takes six months or twelve months, it is our responsibility to proceed in such a manner, with conscience and understanding, that members of parliament do not become as tired as in 1954, when we went from a sessional indemnity to a yearly indemnity as a result or recognition of the importance of the business of the House of Commons, as well as recognition of the fact that we possibly would reach a time when, with the exception of interval recesses, this business would present a twelve month task for the members.

I feel very deeply about this, and that is why in all conscience, sincerity and integrity, and in the light of the acceptance of the responsibility imposed upon members of the House of Commons, I cannot support or vote either for the amendment moved by the member for Port Arthur or for the motion of the Prime Minister. We have a job to do; let us do it in a proper, respectful, decent and efficient manner.

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, would the previous speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver East, like to mention who warned him about speaking?

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed to the amendment will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it. I declare the amendment carried on division. The question now is on the main motion as amended.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I understood that Your Honour was putting the amendment, and I do not think the amendment has been put.

Mr. Speaker: I have put the amendment and declared that in my opinion the yeas had it.

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Speaker: There was then no call for a recorded vote.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I certainly did not understand that to be the case when you put the amendment. When I rose to speak on the amendment I indicated quite clearly that we could not accept it and, therefore, that was indicative that we would vote against it. When Your Honour put the amendment I certainly did not understand that it was being put. I think we have been put in a position which is unfair in accordance with the rules of the house.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the amendment was clearly put. You called for the yeas and nays and you said that in your opinion the yeas had it, and that was the end of it. Only four members stood up and called for a recorded vote. That is not sufficient for a recorded vote.

An hon. Member: There were five.

Another hon. Member: There were seven.

Another hon. Member: Mr. Speaker, neither is seven sufficient for a recorded vote.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word about the point of order which my hon. friend has raised. It seems to me that at a time like this, when the government is making a motion and taking the responsibility, notwithstanding a courtesy request of the opposition, to impose exceptional measures upon the house, we should not allow a misunderstanding or technicality such as has arisen at this time, and Your Honour should permit a division notwithstanding any misunderstanding that may have taken place.

Mr. Speaker: I have no authority to reverse any proceeding that has been taken except by unanimous consent of the house. The rules were followed in accordance with procedure, unless I was in error in deciding that there were not five members who rose. One or two appeared to rise but sat down again, so I did not call in the members. The hon. members at that time must have realized that the matter was decided. If, with unanimous consent, the house wishes to deal otherwise with the matter, of course, that is for the house to say.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Otherwise it is my duty to proceed with the motion as amended.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I say a word. I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has made observations in respect of circumstances to which the Prime Minister should address himself.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Laurier asked the Prime Minister if he would put this motion over until Wednesday but the Prime Minister, to my great surprise, refused to accede to what is a traditional request.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The reason the Prime Minister did that is that he did not want any discussion in this house today in respect of unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the reason.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It seems to me—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member for Essex East please take his seat.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am addressing myself to—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am just about to remind the hon. member that he is not speaking to a point of order, and that I am now—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was just addressing—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member resume his seat. If he wishes to speak to a point of order, I must say that I am not sure that a point of order can be raised with respect to a decision of the Chair on a vote. I have allowed some discussion, and if the hon. member for Essex East wishes to address himself to it before I proceed I shall hear him. However, as I have already indicated to him, I have no power to alter the circumstances to which objection is taken by means of a point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Your Honour is quite right in that you have not that power, but I was seeking to address myself to the Prime Minister who, as leader of this house, could give the house direction which I am sure would be followed. No one wants any improper adjudication to take place here today on a matter of this sort, but in view of the request made by the spokesman for the opposition, the hon. member for Laurier, surely it is open to us to ask the Prime Minister to use the power, which is his, to acquire the unanimity with which, as Your Honour said we only could proceed. Five members rose on this question.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Your Honour, whose judgment and impartiality we all accept, did say that he may have made an error. While this particular phase of the discussion was under way my colleague stood up and five of the hon. members did so also, perhaps along with others. That being the case, surely the leader of the house, the Prime Minister of this country, who refused to put this motion off until Wednesday—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot pursue that line of discussion. The question now is on the main motion as amended. If he wishes to speak on that he will be in order to do so.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to indicate, and I do so now, that I was surprised when the acting leader of the opposition asked the Prime Minister to put this motion over until Wednesday and the Prime Minister said, for some reason that is not yet clear—and he owes it to the house to explain what that reason is—that there was some important legislation he had in mind involving notice to hon. members which made it impossible for him to accede to the suggestion.

I say to the Prime Minister I cannot conceive of that being a legitimate reason. He owes it to the house to tell us why. I would doubt whether there is a record in the proceedings of this house of a request made by a leader of the opposition in such circumstances that was ever denied by a prime minister. In fairness the Prime Minister should have agreed to put this motion over until Wednesday. I can only offer as my interpretation of the reason that this was a device of the Prime Minister, on a day when we are going to have a supply motion, to preclude the opposition from discussing matters which in the Prime Minister's mind, particularly today, would be regarded as extremely embarrassing.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me the hon. member is out of order in two particulars. In the first place, we are debating a motion relating to the hours of sitting rather than the reason this motion is being proceeded with today. In the second place, the hon. member is imputing motives to the Prime Minister in proceeding with the matter, which he is not entitled to do in accordance with the rules. It is not in accordance with parliamentary practice to impute improper motives. I am not necessarily making the assumption that the imputation is an improper one, but he was imputing a motive; he was dealing with a matter which is not strictly related to the debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If you say, sir, that I had imputed improper motives to the Prime Minister I can only say I respectfully disagree with you. In the absence of an explanation, I am entitled to suggest why the Prime Minister has refused to accept a perfectly legitimate request, one which I suggest the records will show has been traditionally adopted in this house before. However, I am not going to pursue that matter. I do not think it is imputing motives at all; it is ascribing a reason, in the absence of an explanation, for the course the government has taken today.

Now, on the merits, since Your Honour drives me to that position, I would say simply that I doubt whether there is a record of any motion of this sort so far away from the expected termination of the session. We are at least some two months away, and this is on the assumption that we are going to conclude our sittings at the end of June; and I certainly do not see any hope of finishing our sittings by that time. For some reason or other, two months ahead, the government obviously has taken a course which at all times has been taken only a few weeks before the end of the session.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister says "Oh, no"; I say "Oh, yes". Let the Prime Minister show the house that that is not so. Certainly when the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, was directing the affairs of the country and of this house, when any hon. member, particularly the leader of the opposition, asked for fair consideration of the position of the opposition with respect to work in the house, that request was always acceded to; but one does not perhaps, of course, expect that kind of treatment from the present Prime Minister.

The hon. member for Laurier has pointed out that only a few of the committees of this house have even begun their work. For instance, the important work of the Department of External Affairs has not yet been referred to a committee. We should keep in mind the limited number of members of the opposition parties at the present time but, of course, who will not remain in that position too long because of coming events. Nevertheless there rests a responsibility on every member of the opposition to discharge his or her duty as thoroughly as it can be done. I say to the Prime Minister —and I paraphrase his own language when he was sitting on this side and made similar appeals which were generally acceded to— is it possible for a member of the opposition to sit in committees for two months while important business of this house is being discussed? It just is not possible.

We had an unforgettable day last session when, at a critical time in the history of the world, foreign affairs were being discussed in this house and the Prime Minister himself, as he will remember, was engaged on important matters in his own office and was not able to attend during the whole speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green). The Leader of the Opposition, whose experience in these matters is admitted, was discussing this matter at 1.30 in the afternoon when at least five committees were sitting. It was impossible for members of the Prime Minister's own party to attend to their obligations both in committee and in this house. There was a bare quorum of members sitting behind the Prime Minister listening to the important statement being made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. At that time three important committees were sitting. There never was a greater evidence of disgraceful handling of public business than on that occasion. The particular course that is now being taken by the Prime Minister will compel a repetition of that kind of situation for a period of at least two and a half months.

The Prime Minister is the leader of the largest group in this house. He can put a motion and undoubtedly his followers will support what he proposes.

An hon. Member: They sure will.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Somebody says "Sure will". I know that will be the case, and it is because I know "Sure will" is the answer that I make this appeal to the Prime Minister in the hope that, as one who understands the difficulties of discharging our responsibilities, he will not put the members of the opposition in a position where they cannot properly discharge their primary duties, which are in this chamber. Their work in this house comes before the committees.

When this matter was discussed in the fall of 1957, and a motion was made by the chairman of one of the committees for simultaneous sittings very early in the session, the Prime Minister said that he recognized the position of members of the opposition; he had sat in the opposition, he knew of the difficulties, and he wanted to give the assurance that he would see to it that the business of the house was so arranged that no member would be denied the opportunity of properly discharging his responsibilities as a member of this house.

Last year he was reminded of this assurance. His answer then was, as the right hon. gentleman knows, "I do not determine the conduct and the business of parliamentary committees". That reply was not the reply he gave when this matter was first raised after the present government came into office. I say again that it is just not possible to discharge the public business properly by having all these committees sitting simultaneously with the house in session, particularly now when we are going to extend the hours of sitting so as to preclude even that happening in a more modified form.

We have some important measures to come before us. We have the unemployment insurance amendments, which will likely be of a fundamental character. The sittings of that committee could well take over a month if we are going to discharge our functions properly. Are we then to argue that members who are interested in that particular measure shall spend all their time in the committee and not come into the house in order to discharge their functions here?

If we are in this position today, I suggest to the Prime Minister that it is perhaps because the government has not handled the business of the house this session as effectively as it might otherwise have done. I do not deny hon. members opposite the right to speak, but when they criticize opposition members for taking undue time in the deliberations of this house I would remind them of the number of speeches made on a measure introduced by the Minister of Agriculture that took almost five days of discussion, a bill which is not now before the house and may not even be passed this session because of the collaboration with the provinces that is being sought.

I say this to the Prime Minister. In this house he is not only a party leader. As Prime Minister he is the leader of the house, and by virtue of that office he is responsible, as no one else in the house is, for the conduct of the business of the house. He can rush things through if he wishes. He can make it difficult for members of the opposition to carry out their functions as critics. He can make it impossible for certain members to be in the house when they should be because they have to attend a committee, or can compel them to be in the house when perhaps in the national interest they should be at a particular time in a committee. He can force this result. If he does, he acts not as Prime Minister but as a party politician who takes first into consideration party interest and not national interest.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I suggest to the Prime Minister that he does not want to be put in that position because I know, as every other member of the house does, that on reflection he will want to serve the nation first. I suggest that in this instance the way for the right hon. gentleman to serve the nation is for him not to forget that he is Prime Minister of this country and not merely the leader of a political party.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, when I came into the house this afternoon I did not have the slightest intention of saying anything on this motion. I might say that one reason I have been prompted to say something about it, though I did not have that intention, is that, the Prime Minister having introduced a motion which to say the least abridges the rights of members of the opposition, when the hon. member for Laurier and other members of the opposition have got up to speak we have had a series of catcalls from the supporters of the government which are unworthy of this house and particularly unworthy of them when a motion of this kind is being discussed. I hope that will cease now, sir.

As hon. members know, it is not many years since I first came into the house, but as hon. members also know I have observed the proceedings of the house for a good many years. In the light of that fact I cannot imagine any of the immediate predecessors of the present Prime Minister, including Mr. Bennett, refusing a request such as was made today by the hon. member for Laurier. I have had a good deal to do with such motion in days gone by, and I can say that the prime minister of the day always discussed with the opposition the time and the circumstances in which they would be brought forward, and as far as possible sought to reach an accommodation.

We should not forget that the purpose of this motion is to facilitate the business of the house and I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is not apt to facilitate the business of the house if in the minds of members of the opposition there is created a sense of injustice, a sense that there is no fair play, no fair dealing. That is the sense that the performance of the government today has given to me.

An hon. Member: How about closure?

Mr. Pickersgill: On a suitable occasion I would be very happy to make some observations about that. However, I think we ought to be reminded of what the Prime Minister himself had to say only four years ago, following the dissolution of parliament and his recent experience as leader of the opposition. He was going about the country taking great exception to the way in which, in his opinion, the government of the day had treated the opposition, and this is what he said as reported in the Winnipeg Tribune of May 16, 1957:

> Mr. Diefenbaker . . . said cabinet domination of the parliament was the reason for the lack of action . . . The first job to be done was to restore parliament and a Conservative government would—

Well, sir, if the Prime Minister's idea of restoring parliament is to impose this kind of regime by an overwhelming vote and to permit an amendment moved by a member of the opposition to be put without the government indicating its own position on that amendment, it seems to me that this is an extraordinary and arbitrary way to treat this house. Because the rules would not permit it, sir, I forbear saying anything about the unfortunate event of a few moments ago, other than that I cannot imagine Mr. St. Laurent ever allowing a thing like that to happen.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I might say that if the purpose of the government in putting forward this motion is to facilitate the proper discharge by us of the business of the house it does seem to me most extraordinary, after the most constructive and helpful suggestions made on behalf of the official opposition by the hon. member for Laurier notwithstanding the very evident lack of co-operation by the Prime Minister with respect to the hon. member's original request, that the Prime Minister did not, as any leader before the present one whom I have seen would have done, rise on a point of order at once and ask Your Honour to permit the adjournment of this debate so that my hon. friend's suggestions could be considered properly by the Prime Minister and his colleagues with a view to doing what all of us should want to do, discharge the business of the country in a seemly fashion but also in a reasonably expeditious way.

Since I am speaking I cannot forbear drawing attention to something else. Whatever may be said about the conduct of any member of the opposition in previous sessions of this parliament, there can certainly be no criticism of lack of complete co-operation with the government on the part of the opposition with respect to all business during the present session that we regarded as noncontentious. It will be remembered that before Christmas we facilitated every piece of government legislation, while at the same time we listened to gramophone record repetition of the most tiresome and endless sort, as the hon. member for Laurier pointed out, by supporters of the government contributing nothing whatever to the debate but delaying the business of the house.

If supporters of the government had acted in the way members of the opposition did, there is no reason why we should not have concluded the baby budget debate before Christmas instead of the debate continuing after Christmas. As the hon. member for Laurier has shown, even on that measure and on every other measure, except one or two that were really contentious, that we thought were not in the public interest and that we ought to fight, there has been no delay and no time wasted on this side of the house. But for some reason or other, whether because the government is not ready with its business or whatever the reason may be, there seems to be a tendency this session by government supporters to take up the time of the house with repetition that is neither entertaining nor useful.

An hon. Member: Like now.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that even at this late date the Prime Minister would be well advised, in the interests of the very end he has in view, to accept the suggestion made on behalf of the opposition by my friend the hon. member for Laurier and to ask the leave of the house to have this debate adjourned so that the government can consider these suggestions and so that there may be a conference between the leaders with a view to getting the kind of co-operation and the kind of conduct of the public business that the people of Canada have a right to expect of us in this parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in so far as the government is concerned, its attitude has at all times been to secure the views of the opposition, on the conduct of the business of the house to the end that there be co-operation. As far as the hon. member for Essex East is concerned, I shall return to him in a moment; but at this time I simply want to say that what he is endeavouring to do is to hold the government responsible for the fact that the official opposition were uncertain as to what to do in respect of the amendment moved, did not stand up and you, Mr. Speaker, declared the amendment carried. Thereafter hon. members of the opposition began to realize the position in which they found themselves in failing to call for a vote. I want to make that point clear.

An hon. Member: They were asleep.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I came before the house this afternoon for the purpose not of determining that the end of the session should be on July 1 but simply by reason of the fact that I wanted to give hon. members the opportunity to expedite the business of the house.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the views expressed by the hon. member for Laurier. He is an experienced member of the house. I think he is able to teach a lesson to the hon. member for Essex East as to the proprieties. He presented his case in a most reasonable manner and must thereby have shocked the sensibilities of the hon. member for Essex East. He presented a viewpoint that met with a good deal of support on my part as I listened to him. There is a need for the reformation of the rules of the house. At the present time a committee is sitting, as did the committee last year, endeavouring to bring about changes which will expedite the business but which will not deny the fullest and most complete discussion of those questions that arise in respect of which there is bound to be controversy.

It is as though something unusual had happened. The hon. member for Essex East said that this is a most unusual circumstance, referring to the introduction of this motion at the present time. While I have already pointed it out, if I must do so I will repeat it and give the fullest information in that connection. I looked over the record and I found that in 1947, on the 78th day of the session, the sittings were extended. Then in 1949 the session was divided. In the first session prior to its conclusion morning sittings began on the 38th day and in the second session following the conclusion of the 42nd day. In the regular session of 1950 the house opened on February 16 and morning sittings began on the 69th day which fell on June 1. In 1951 the house opened on January 30 and morning sittings began on June 11 which was the 88th day. In the second session of 1951 morning sessions began on the 45th day. In the session of 1952 morning sessions began on the 71st day. In the 1952-53 session morning sittings began on the 84th day. Both the 1952-53 session and the 1953-54 session began in the fall of the year and in the 1953-54 session morning sittings began on May 31. Again in 1955 the situation was similar. All through the record in every year, with I think two exceptions, the house has commenced morning sittings on from the 71st day to the 88th day. Those were the halcyon days when hon. gentlemen opposite occupied the treasury seats. They said that was the proper course to follow and that it was necessary to have morning sittings.

My suggestion was not accepted. A further amendment has been accepted whereby sittings will also take place on Saturdays. I can understand the reason for that. Members who live far from Ottawa spend their week ends here, unable to return to their homes. Anxious as they are—as the hon. member for Vancouver East explained—to see their wives and families, they are denied that opportunity. Longer and longer the sessions are being extended. The general feeling of the house was obvious. Otherwise the opposition would have called a vote against that amendment. They did not do so. Obviously, it was a general feeling that Saturday sittings would be appropriate having regard to the present circumstances.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand that it is contrary to the rules of this house to discuss a decision of the house. Since Your Honour has ruled that there was a decision of the house, I trust that the rules will be observed impartially as among all members of the house.

Mr. Speaker: It is correct that it is not in order to reflect upon a decision of the house. I understood that the Prime Minister was referring to the methods or the activating force or what might be the actuating force.

Mr. Pickersgill: A decision has already taken place.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I was not reflecting in any way. The opposition sat inert, except for three members—

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that this is a discussion of a decision that has already taken place, and of a decision already made. Since the rules are to be so strictly applied today, I suggest that they be applied impartially.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the rule is against the criticism of the decision itself. I did not understand the Prime Minister to be criticizing the correctness of the decision.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I emphasize this point. The opposition had many more hon. members than were necessary to rise and secure a division. They sat silent, excepting for three who stood. The hon. member for Essex East saw what was going on behind his back while he faced the opposition, a not unusual position for him to occupy or adopt. They sat and they waited, and they waited until the Speaker declared the amendment passed. Then they rose and raised strong objection.

As far as Saturday sittings are concerned, I think no harm will be done to the opposition and I would be the last to do anything that would prevent them talking. I say this, Mr. Speaker, because as I have gone across this country I have learned that the more they talk, the better for the government, if their criticism is like some of their recent criticism in regard to measures beneficial to Canada which have been opposed simply for the sake of opposing them.

Let me go on from there. They pose today as lovers of parliament. I think Saturdays could well be set aside, if the house agrees, for dealing with the supply of various departments. There will be that fine spirit of co-operation of which hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken. On Saturdays various departments could be dealt with. I would not want to see controversial measures dealt with on Saturdays because I would want to be assured that as many hon. members as possible would be present, not only from the opposition but on the government side. In any event, I think we could get together when controversial matters are to be discussed.

I think a step forward has been made today in this regard. On Saturdays we could deal with supply in respect of which, by agreement among the leader of the government in the house, the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Kootenay West, they would have no difficulty in getting together and reaching the fullest agreement. These matters could be discussed on Saturday without in any way depreciating the opportunity of the opposition, including the hon. member for Essex East—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You know that is not true.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —to fully discuss matters as they arise.

I cannot let this opportunity pass. One hon. member opposite said he could not believe that my immediate predecessors would ever have allowed anything being done which would shock the parliamentary tradition. What has been done today has given the house every opportunity. The house took its stand on this amendment and it was passed on division. I again underline the fact that those who yell the loudest opposite were the most silent until they were sure that the amendment had in fact been passed. Then they rose.

They talk about those other days. I am not going to go back over those days. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate read an excerpt from a statement I had made regarding parliament. Mr. Speaker, do they forget the crimes they committed against parliament? Do they forget those days of 1955 and 1956? I am not going into particulars unless they ask for them. They muzzled parliament—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Nothing like this government. This government is the greatest muzzler of all parliaments.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I remember what they did to the rights of parliament. Do they remember that black Friday when they trampled on the rights of parliament? One of the leaders in that regard was the vocal hon. gentleman from Essex East.

I quote an article with approbation. I have before me—I sent for it while the hon. gentleman was speaking—the University of Waterloo Review. I know the hon. gentleman has read it. The article is entitled "The Fifties: An Ottawa Retrospect" and it is written by Mr. Michael Barkway.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A friend of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He is not generally a friend of this government, as he does not approve of what we do.

Mr. McIlraith: He is finding out.

Mr. Diefenbaker: However, he did have some views on those who sit opposite today, the three horsemen. Yes, they indeed belong to the Apocrypha. They trod on the rights of parliament and destroyed every principle for which parliament has stood through the years. And they rise today and say that because they failed to demand a vote on the amendment, which was accepted by them in silence, their rights were taken away.

We did not impose this amendment on the official opposition. The amendment was from the C.C.F., or the New Party, whichever the expression may be that applies at the moment. They sat silent. Never did the opposition place before the house an amendment that was generally acceptable until after it had been passed.

What does Mr. Barkway say? He is one observer who lived through this period in Ottawa, and he is speaking of the period between 1955 and June of 1957 as he refers to a book by James Eayrs:

> But I am one observer who lived through the period in Ottawa and find the memory both poignant and painful. They were always foreboding: a Canadian Gotterdammerung, unrealized or misunderstood by its principal actors.
> There is no question that the political gods were old and tired.

These are they who now speak of parliamentary greatness. Then Mr. Barkway continues:

> By October, 1955, the cabinet was unhappy and rudderless.

The hon. gentleman speaks about the days of my predecessors. I am reading an article by a man who is not unfriendly to the opposition. Mr. Barkway goes on to say:

> Its self-preoccupation largely detached it from public sentiment. It was giving first priority to the difficult task of hanging together. In June 1957, at the end of the period covered by Mr.

Eayrs' book, it accomplished the task in a manner which few of its ministers had thought conceivable; nine of them mounted a common gallows.

These are the words of a gentleman who, as I say, is not unfriendly to the opposition. Then he makes an observation regarding the hon. member for Essex East which I think is particularly appropriate today. This is why I sent out for this booklet. He describes the bungling, myopia and the self-preoccupation and smugness of the Liberals. He does not think much of us, either. Then he says:

Dr. Eayrs most properly devotes the longest chapter of his book to this subject. It is sandwiched between an account of the travails of the truce commissions in Indo-China and a spine-tingling tale of Mr. Paul Martin's efforts at the UN assembly of 1955 to secure the admission of new members (which loses nothing of excitement by drawing heavily on Mr. Martin's own version of it).

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I must read that article.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is dealing with those days of alleged parliamentary greatness. Then the article goes on to say:

Examples of the confusion and mismanagement in this most vital area of foreign policy could fill a book.

Then he goes on to say—and I will deal with this in future days in the form of fair debate if the opportunity arises—

Astounding as this was, it was not the worst of it. The worst of it, which has never before been told is that the draft note—

This has to do with the Columbia.

—which Mr. Pearson and Mr. St. Laurent both approved did not mention the adequacy of the 1909 treaty; it actually said that it was not adequate to deal with the Columbia case.

Then follow the words:

There can seldom have been a more timorous or unnecessary surrender.

I have given just a brief outline. I know hon. members will be encouraged to read the rest about those who in their day and generation did their best to destroy parliament, intimidate the opposition, refuse to accept any suggestion if it did not come from those surrounding them. And they tell us today that we have done a hurt to parliament. I think we have gone further than any government has gone before in giving the house and the private members of parliament the right to determine one thing: how long do they want to sit? Is it fair that we should sit for but a few hours a day as has been the case in the past for a long period of time and then, in the end, deny the fullest discussion? By what we are doing we shall provide the opposition with the fullest opportunity to discuss the issues and to debate them. On Saturdays, if hon. gentlemen opposite desire, there is no reason whatever why we should not by agreement be able to choose for discussion subjects that will not be controversial.

One word as to the observations of the hon. member for Laurier. The hon. gentleman is experienced. He has shown a sense of restraint and wide knowledge as he placed before the house his ideas. The hon. member for Port Arthur, taking a similar attitude, did the same and I feel that the suggestions made deserve to be studied. What we must try to do is to make parliament more effective and more efficient while at the same time denying to no member the fullest opportunity to discuss, to criticize and suggest alternatives, for unless there is that discussion there cannot be the attainment of any objective of legislation which is both beneficial and effective.

I will do everything I can on the basis of the recommendations made by those two hon. gentlemen. I place myself behind several of them most strongly and I hope the committee as it meets will be able to determine what changes should be recommended which will bring about the fullest discussion while maintaining at the same time a degree of responsibility in carrying out the trust which has been placed with us. In all the circumstances, of course, in so far as the motion is concerned, in view of the unanimity which has been expressed, with the exception of three who stand alone, I feel we should accept the amendment to the motion, and then in the light of experience we shall know how it will work out. If, later on, it is found that some changes might be made I shall be the first to join with hon. gentlemen opposite in suggesting such amendments as experience may dictate. What we are trying to do is not to rush the house to a conclusion. What we are endeavouring to achieve is an orderly, carefully conceived, fully documented opportunity for all to discuss these matters of great importance to the country.

Again, I emphasize that if our experience indicates that what has been done deserves further amendment there will be no delay in providing the house with an opportunity to make the necessary changes, all directed to one end, namely to make parliament stronger, more effective, and more deliberatively able to carry out the task that rests upon it and upon all hon. members of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the Prime Minister a question? In view of what the right hon. gentleman has just stated concerning the proposal which I have just made, will he not consent to the adjournment of this debate, until, say, Wednesday, at which time it might be possible for the leader of the house and the spokesmen for the other parties to consider organizing the business of the house in a more orderly way?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can only say that the organization of the business of the house is a subject which has had the attention of hon. members throughout the years. It has been discussed on occasion after occasion.

Mr. Chevrier: Not on this basis.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Last year the committee made recommendations, as did an earlier committee in 1955. This debate is, of course, concluded, but if, as a result of co-operation between hon. members opposite and those of the third party, there are changes that should be made I will be the first to suggest that they be made.

Motion as amended agreed to on division.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AFRICA—EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE TO FRENCH SPEAKING STATES

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have a statement to make concerning educational assistance to French speaking African states.

The government's attention has been directed to the present needs and to the number and complexity of the difficulties which will confront the emergent nations of Africa in the field of education for some years to come. We have been impressed by their problems and as a result the government has approved in principle the establishment of a Canadian program of educational assistance for the newly independent French speaking African states.

The plan will be entirely separate from any scheme now in existence and should serve to balance Canada's educational assistance program in general. The existing commonwealth education program, while national in character, by its very nature limits the extent of participation of our excellent French speaking institutions and resources. We are confident that these will be used to good advantage in the application of the new plan.

It is proposed that the educational assistance plan for French speaking African states will provide grants of the order of $300,000 annually. Subject to the views of the various parties concerned with the development and execution of this scheme this amount could be applied toward scholarships, the provision of teachers and teacher training or to other types of educational assistance as may seem practicable and desirable.

The countries to which the scheme would be directed are vitally preoccupied with the serious task of improving their educational facilities and with expanding educational opportunities for their peoples. They have repeatedly expressed their need for scholarships abroad for French speaking students and for French speaking teachers in their own countries. Because of our genuine interest in their welfare and progress and because we share a common language with these new states, Canada is in a unique position to render the type of assistance required. It is therefore the intention of the government to ask parliament to appropriate the funds necessary for this purpose once details have been worked out with the provincial educational authorities.

The new program will result in especially heavy demands on Canada's French speaking educational resources which, like all our educational facilities throughout the country, are already strained. Nevertheless I am confident from past experience and from the expressions of public interest already made regarding this type of venture that when an approach is made the provincial authorities and others concerned in the development and operation of the scheme will respond promptly and willingly. The government therefore intends to seek the co-operation and advice of the provincial educational authorities and the educational organizations and institutions at an early date for the successful implementation of what I am certain the house will agree is a purposeful and timely step.

It is also the government's hope to draw upon the advice and the experience of the United Nations educational, scientific and cultural organizations—better known as UNESCO—in setting up and in operating the new program. A conference sponsored by UNESCO will be held in Addis Ababa next month to examine the educational needs of the African states and to draw up plans to meet those needs in the coming years. It is the government's intention to accept an invitation to send a Canadian observer to these meetings and thus to acquire firsthand knowledge of the educational problems of the area. Information obtained at the conference would eventually be most useful in our own planning for the successful development and execution of the Canadian plan.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will be very happy about the announcement which has just been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In so far as we on this side of the house are concerned, we have no hesitation in commending the government for this step, which has just been announced, in setting aside the sum of $300,000 as a fund for scholarships.

(Translation):

The Secretary of State for External Affairs will remember that this matter has been discussed more than once in this house, not only by opposition members but by other members as well.

It seems that the decision taken by the government is not only commendable but that it will be welcomed by French universities in the province of Quebec, as well as in other provinces.

In addition, I am particularly glad that the government has decided to confer with provincial authorities regarding the program it intends to submit.

Once again I express our satisfaction to the government. When we reach this item in the departmental estimates, we will take that opportunity to discuss the matter.

I should like to assure the minister right now that we are entirely satisfied with his plan.

(Text):

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, speaking on behalf of this group I wish to say that we heartily endorse this plan announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in respect of Canada assisting in the educational development and advancement of the French speaking African states. We are quite confident that those teachers who go to these countries will do credit to Canada and will be of assistance to the people they aim to serve. I think this program will further indicate, first, our interest and concern in the welfare and development of the persons in these African states and, second, it will be a happy reflection on our national cultural heritage and its development into the international sphere.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

URANIUM—CURTAILMENT AND ALLOCATION OF CONTRACTS

Motion No. 103—Mr. Herridge (for Mr. Argue):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the federal government, or any agency thereof, and any provincial government, organization or company, since February 22, 1960, pertaining to (a) the curtailment of (b) the allocation of, uranium contracts.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this motion is accepted subject to reservations. In one instance the case is before the courts and it might be prejudicial to table the documents. In another, I observed some intimate details concerning the operation of the company which might be of interest to competitors and I think it inadvisable to table such information.

These are the type of reservations I have in mind, and the motion is accepted with that understanding.

Mr. Herridge: That is reasonable.

Motion agreed to.

HAINES CUT-OFF HIGHWAY SURVEY

Motion No. 110—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of the report arising out of the economic study or survey regarding the Haines cut-off highway.

Hon. G. E. Halpenny (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member for Skeena was the subject of a question asked by him some two and a half months ago. I would refer him to Hansard for February 8, 1961 where, at page 1844, he will find that the minister indicated that the report referred to was a privileged document prepared for an interdepartmental committee and would therefore not be tabled in parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Having heard the objection is the hon. member who moved the motion prepared to drop it?

Mr. Howard: No, Mr. Speaker, I think you should put it.

Mr. Speaker: On the motion of the hon. member for Skeena for a copy of the report arising out of the economic study or survey regarding the Haines cut-off highway, those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it and I declare the motion lost on division.

Motion negatived on division.

POST OFFICE SITE, RESERVE MINES, N.S.

Motion No. 111—Mr. Herridge (for Mr. Argue):

For a copy of all correspondence, contracts, and other documents exchanged between the Department of Public Works and any organization, company, or person since January 1, 1958, regarding the purchase of a site on Sydney road, Reserve Mines, Nova Scotia, for the purpose of erecting a post office.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION

ROYAL COMMISSION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has made any decision in connection with the four recommendations made by the royal commission on transportation in its first report?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I said the other day, the government is giving the fullest consideration to this matter, and when I am in a position to do so I will make an announcement in the house. I did point out today that, in so far as the Freight Rates Reduction Act is concerned, one of the earlier steps taken will be the continuation of the provisions of that act for a further period.

In so far as the railways and their relationship to the union representatives are concerned, yesterday the Minister of Labour suggested a meeting among the presidents of the two railways and Mr. Hall and any other person chosen by him, with a view to their having preliminary talks as a prelude to full scale negotiations between the management of the railways and labour. Both parties agreed to this suggestion, and my information is that a meeting is taking place today.

Mr. Chevrier: A supplementary question. With reference to the Freight Rates Reduction Act, which the Prime Minister said earlier would be extended, is he able to tell the house for what length of time that statute will be extended? Will it be the usual 12 months period or for a nine months period, as in the case of the former extension?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Knowing the experience that the hon. gentleman had on the treasury benches, I would think he would agree with me that it would not be proper to indicate in advance, before the introduction of a resolution in that connection, the length of time of the extension.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION IN SMALL HOLDING REQUIREMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs which is of urgent concern to a number of veterans in various localities in Canada.

Will the minister inform the house whether during the Easter recess he found the opportunity to study the comprehensive survey he mentioned on March 29 with respect to acreage requirements under the small holdings section of the Veterans' Land Act? Is he now in a position to make an announcement that will lighten the hearts of many veterans at present denied the opportunity to build under this section of the act owing to the acreage requirements?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I appreciate fully the urgency of this matter in so far as certain veterans in British Columbia are concerned. The difficulty that faces us is that what is being asked for is a change in the Veterans' Land Act, which has been in effect now for a good many years. The change would have to be applicable to every province in Canada from coast to coast. This is one aspect of the problem which makes it difficult for an immediate decision to be announced.

The second aspect is that considerable additional financial obligation will be incurred if the proposed change is made. However, what I would suggest to the hon. member is that if he will be patient for a little longer—this has been going on now for 16 years and I am just asking him to be patient for a few more weeks—perhaps we will be able to give him a favourable decision.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—INQUIRY AS TO ARREST OF CANADIAN PRIESTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is he in a position to advise the house as to the position of four Roman Catholic priests who are members of the foreign mission order in Montreal? Has the minister learned of the reasons for their arrest? What representations are being made by his department to the Cuban authorities?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, our embassy in Havana has been doing its best for some days now to obtain the release of those priests. The last word I received was to the effect that they were still in custody. In addition, a fifth man, not a clergyman, was arrested. I believe he has been released.

TRADE

URANIUM—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether he is yet in a position to advise the house as to when the delegation will be going to London to resume negotiations in connection with the uranium deal?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The date of the departure of the delegation has been under consideration, and I hope to be able to give that information very shortly.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TAKEN TO PROVIDE PROTECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. L. McFarlane (Kootenay East): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the acts of violence such as took place at Wynndel, British Columbia, on April 14 whereby over $2,000 damage was done to a grain elevator, and an attempt was made to blow up an Anglican church, will the minister advise what action his department will take to protect the lives of families in the Creston valley area?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. It gives me an opportunity to express very deep regret at this outrage and certainly to hope also that this will not mark the beginning of a series of outrages such as took place there in former years.

In so far as the question itself is concerned, I have to advise that under our system responsibility for the protection of life and property is that of the province. This has been the position maintained in this regard in connection with these incidents, subject, however, to the understanding that the federal government would at any time be prepared to consider sympathetically any reasonable request made by the province for special assistance required for the protection of life and property; but the initial responsibility is that of the province.

SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

TRADE—ALLEGED FAILURE TO PROMOTE SECONDARY INDUSTRIES

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, this motion to go into supply gives the opposition another opportunity to raise matters about which it seeks to complain from time to time. Of course, I would have preferred to have this motion put earlier. However, there are events which take place in the house over which neither the opposition nor, for that matter, a private member has control. At the outset, before going into the subject which I desire to submit to the house on this occasion, I do want to say that from time to time we have repeatedly made the statement and the charge that the main features of the present Conservative administration seem to be confusion, indecision and lack of leadership. It could be easily shown that on more than one occasion that was the position of the government. Certainly, that can be said in the field of national defence. As the house knows, the government is acquiring very expensive equipment, but no decision has yet been taken in so far as the use of nuclear weapons is concerned.

The government is building two Bomarc missile bases in northern Ontario and northern Quebec which, in order to be effective must be equipped with nuclear weapons, but still the decision in so far as those weapons are concerned has not yet been taken. The same can be said in the field of monetary policy. The government refuses to accept any responsibility—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Evidently we are to have a repetition of what was attempted by the Leader of the Opposition on the last motion to resolve the house into committee of supply. On that occasion the Leader of the Opposition began by talking about a number of subjects before indicating to the house what was to be the specific alleged grievance that was to be the subject matter of his amendment. Already the hon. member for Laurier is into a second subject and appears to be ready to repeat the tactics of the Leader of the Opposition on the last occasion.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that when objection was taken at that time you made a ruling and you were quite definite in drawing attention to and, indeed, enforcing the well established rule of the house that on an occasion of this kind an opportunity is given to the opposition to raise a grievance and on such a motion we do not proceed to a second grievance until the first one is disposed of. Other hon. members are entitled to discuss the first grievance before a second one is raised. That is the well established rule and a rule that you enforced on that occasion.

The hon. member has begun by talking about defence questions and now, as a second subject, he apparently proposes to talk about monetary policy. I suggest that if he has chosen to discuss defence as a matter of grievance other hon. members are entitled to submit their views on that subject to the house before any hon. member goes on to raise a second grievance. If the hon. member for Laurier should choose to discuss the second subject he has mentioned, namely, monetary policy, it is quite obvious that has already been the subject of an amendment on a previous occasion on a motion to resolve the house into committee of supply and has been disposed of by decision of the house. Obviously it is not open to the hon. member to raise that subject again on a motion of this kind.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I submit it would be the proper course in seeking to make debates of this kind orderly if the hon. member, who evidently intends to introduce an amendment, were called upon to indicate the nature of that amendment to begin with before entering upon a general review of a number of subjects which is apparently what he is now seeking to do in breach of the rules.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, it looked very much as if the Minister of Finance was going to take far more time than I in dealing with a point of order which I submit with deference is not well taken.

An hon. Member: With a lot more sense though.

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Finance has referred to several grievances that are being taken up by myself seriatim. That is not the case. I made one passing reference to national defence. Then I went on to another matter as, I submit with deference, I have a perfect right to do. When I come to the matter that I intend to discuss in detail I will indicate to the house what it is and then move an amendment. I say it is not contrary to the rules of the house to do what I have done up to this moment, namely, to make a passing reference to a policy or to a lack of policy on the part of the government. That is all I have done. I have dealt with one such matter and I propose to proceed to deal with another. I submit to you with deference, sir, that surely I have a right to do that in moving an amendment to a motion to go into committee of supply.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Laurier will agree with me that a supply motion offers an opportunity to debate a specific grievance and that, to avoid the problem of a debate without margins or limits, the practice on supply motions has been to indicate the general area of debate, either by indicating what the amendment is if an amendment is to be moved or by indicating what area the amendment will cover, before proceeding. Otherwise, a problem does arise, as has been pointed out by the Minister of Finance, and did arise on the last supply motion which caused some considerable difficulty because of the reference to a great many subjects which were actually not covered and could not have been covered under the amendment finally moved.

I raise no objection to the hon. member referring to a number of other items. The rule is against debating items which are not germane to the amendment that he proposes to move. I think it would be good practice, as has been established by our proceedings in the past, for the hon. member to indicate at the outset of his speech the area he proposes to cover, just as is done after the amendments are disposed of. A member rises, discusses a specific item of grievance, and is entitled to deal with only one item.

Mr. McGee: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to request direction from you. In dealing with a side issue in passing the hon. member has made a misstatement of fact, and I am wondering what position we are in from the point of view of correcting his misstatement.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to speak to the point of order and indicate that he disagrees with the interpretation of the hon. member for Laurier, he has the opportunity to do so now before the point of order is disposed of. If the hon. member wishes to make a point by way of objection, I should like to hear it.

Mr. McGee: It is not a question of interpretation. The hon. member made the statement, and I copied down his words, that the Bomarc missile requires a nuclear warhead in order to be operative. That is clearly not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry but I misunderstood the hon. member. I thought his intervention related to the point of order and not to the substance of what had been said.

Mr. Chevrier: To come back to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have no fault to find with the statement you have just made in which you indicated there is nothing objectionable about a general discussion provided the member speaking does not go into detail. That is what Your Honour ruled in connection with the earlier debate to which the Minister of Finance referred, and that is exactly what I intended to do, namely, to make passing references in a general way and then go on to the subject with which I intend to deal. As found on page 3134 of Hansard for March 20, 1961, Your Honour said:

> I have listened carefully to the Leader of the Opposition. While I expected a certain amount of general discussion as he was getting his argument focussed on the subject he intended to deal with, it seemed that after he had dealt with the convention of last week he skipped through unemployment in general terms and is now on monetary policy.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Go on. Read the next sentence.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no objection to putting the next sentence on record.

I believe that if the Leader of the Opposition has a specific amendment he should come to the point, so as to put some proper limit on this debate for those who have to follow. If he does not do so there is no limit for any other speaker.

The point is that I had not had the opportunity to deal with any matter because I was interrupted. I was saying that in the field of monetary policy the government refuses to accept any responsibility although—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise again on a point of order. The hon. member in addition to defying your ruling—

Mr. Speaker: Order. As I understand it, I am hearing the hon. member on the point of order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. With respect, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was obviously going on with his speech and, quite apart from defying your ruling with regard to stating a grievance and confining discussion to that grievance—

Mr. Pickersgill: A ruling has not been made yet.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —he is proceeding to talk about monetary policy which has already been the subject of a determination by this house in the clearest terms at the present session.

Mr. Speaker: I was looking at Beauchesne at the moment the hon. member for Laurier got beyond the point of order, if he did get that far. I wish to refer to the citation about debate on motions for supply. It is citation 234 in the fourth edition. I should like to read the first paragraph which is as follows:

234. The ancient doctrine that the redress of grievances should be considered before the grant of supplies is maintained in the House of Commons of Canada.

(1) Whenever an order of the day has been read for the house to resolve itself into the committee of supply or the committee of ways and means, the motion "That the Speaker do now leave the Chair" must be proposed, except on Wednesdays, Thursdays and Fridays as provided by standing orders 56 and 58. When such motion is proposed, it shall be permissible to discuss any public matter within the powers of the federal parliament or to ask for the redress of any grievance; provided that the discussion shall not relate to any decision of the house during the current session, nor to any item of the estimates, nor to any resolution to be proposed to the committee of ways and means, nor to any matter placed on or whereof notice has been given in the order paper.

The debate in such a case is limited by the rules respecting past decisions, anticipation, sedition, reflections on the Senate—

And so on. The reference, of course, is to "redress of any grievance". I think the fact that the word "grievance" is in the singular is significant. I refer the house to a decision of my predecessor in the chair which indicates that a specific matter should be discussed at this time. This decision will be found in Hansard of May 16, 1955, volume 4 at page 3790. I do not wish to take up more time because I think there is perhaps little difference between what I have been saying and what the hon. member for Laurier proposes to do. However, I do not agree that he can debate at large other matters than the one which he proposes to make the subject of his grievance and which he can debate only if it comes within the citation I have read. Therefore the proper course to follow in raising a grievance in going into supply is for the hon. member, when he starts, to state the grievance at least in terms sufficient to delimit the area of discussion.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think I have any fault to find with your decision, Mr. Speaker. If I understood it aright, I certainly can make a passing reference to some of the matters that have been determined by the house or have not been determined as the case may be and then come to the matter which I intend to raise.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will permit me to interrupt again, may I make this observation. What I was trying to say about passing reference was that, in the course of debating his grievance, he certainly would not be tied to the point where he could not refer in passing to other matters provided he did not enter into debate of those matters. I believe that was the substance of my remarks which he cited earlier.

Mr. Chevrier: The question I intend to discuss is one having to do with trade. I might as well tell the house that immediately. I say that here there has been the same kind of lack of leadership and the same kind of indecision—

An hon. Member: And the same speech.

Mr. Chevrier: —that we have seen from time to time on other matters. Certainly that is the case in connection with the report of the royal commission on transportation. That report has been in the hands of the government now for several weeks; and although the matter is one of grave consequence, the government does not seem to be able to make up its mind although there is a strike deadline just ahead of us on May 15 or May 16.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the hon. gentleman any more suggestions—

Mr. McIlraith: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker:—or scattergun objections?

Alleged Lack of Trade Policy

Mr. Chevrier: The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) asks if I have any more suggestions. I simply say this to the Prime Minister. The responsibility is his. He has in his hands an important document. It seems to me that the house should be entitled at this time if not earlier, to some indication of what the government intends to do. However, we are far from getting such indication. Only this afternoon did we obtain some indication of what the government intends to do in so far as the Freight Rates Reduction Act is concerned. Then again, since there is going to be an amendment to that act, as the Prime Minister has indicated, there must be a statute.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understood that the hon. member for Laurier does not propose to move an amendment in that field of transportation. It seems to me that, in addition to illustrating his point which I take it was lack of decision on the part of the government, he has gone on to debate the matter and that he should now return to his grievance.

Mr. Chevrier: I disagree with you respectfully, Mr. Speaker, I did not go on to debate the matter until after I was asked by the Prime Minister a question as to what suggestions I had to make. My reply was that the responsibility was his. From there I went on to say that here is a statute, the Freight Rates Reduction Act—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. What I said was this: What is your next scattergun objection? In other words I was simply referring to the fact that the hon. gentleman is just playing ducks and drakes with the ruling which Your Honour made.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I listened with more care perhaps to what the hon. member for Laurier was saying because I was not thinking of making any interjection. As I recall it, what the hon. member said was that he intends to discuss the matter of trade about which there has been indecision and so on and that this was characteristic of the government. In making his argument he was giving a certain number of analogies. The Chair has ruled over and over again that in argument analogies are certainly in order even if they relate to other matters.

Mr. Speaker: I think the proposition stated by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is unexceptionable. However, the hon. member for Laurier, far from limiting his remarks to an analogy, was making some positive debating assertions about the attitude of the government, a procedure which to my mind is quite out of order in view of what he has indicated hitherto.

Mr. Chevrier: I of course, accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker. However, I contend that if I went beyond the rules, it was certainly under provocation.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is in the field of trade that perhaps there has been the greatest confusion on the part of the government. We all remember the famous trade diversion proposal made by the Prime Minister in July of 1957. It was intended to increase our trade with the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom took the Prime Minister's proposal seriously and in September of 1957 it presented a counter proposal. It presented to the government a free trade proposal which was the only concrete and practical way of attaining the objective expressed by the Prime Minister in July. What was the reaction of the Canadian government to that proposal? In an earlier debate I had occasion to state what the reaction was.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): To misstate it.

Mr. Chevrier: However, in effect there is no doubt that the government refused even to consider the proposal of the British government; and in this house, in spite of our repeated demands, we were not successful in getting from the ministers any statement about this proposal. In other words, the proposal of the British government was simply ignored by those who sit opposite me at the moment. Instead of seriously considering the British offer, the government in the fall of 1957 decided to send a trade mission to the United Kingdom. But it was a buying mission, and the slogan then used by the government was "Buy British".

This was in the fall of 1957. However, in the 1958 budget the Minister of Finance decided to increase the tariff on British woollens. They constituted, as the house knows, one of the main export items of the United Kingdom to Canada. That was the answer which was made by the members of the government to those in the United Kingdom who had something constructive to offer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Does the hon. member say that, having regard to the report of the tariff board upon which we acted, and the condition of the woollen textile industry in Canada, this proposal to the house was not a proper proposal at the time, and he condemns it?

Mr. Chevrier: The answer to that question is quite simple and I will be dealing with some aspects of the textile industry later on.

However, the point is that notwithstanding the offer which was made, even although there was a proposal from the British government, the government "upped" the tariff against British woollens. There can be no denial as far as this is concerned.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Do you say we should not have done it?

Mr. Chevrier: Later during the session of 1958 the government decided to amend the Customs Act in order to re-establish the system of arbitrary valuations which had been established during the Bennett regime. This legislation gave to the cabinet and the Minister of National Revenue wide arbitrary powers to raise the tariff by order in council. This was not only incompatible with the spirit and the objectives of GATT, but also with our system of parliamentary democracy.

According to the government at that time, the new legislation had become absolutely necessary and essential to protect Canadian industry. However, as a result of strong protests from the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States we have been told that the legislation which was so essential in 1958 has been very seldom applied since.

I think in answer to a question in this house the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) was unable to say whether or not it had been used, or stated that if so, it had been used very infrequently.

Canadian industry, therefore, has not received the protection it had been led to expect from the government, but none the less ministers have retained the arbitrary powers they should not have in a parliamentary democracy. In 1959—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I do not yield the floor to my hon. friend.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not care whether or not the hon. member yields the floor; I am rising on a point of order.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) has purported to attribute a statement to my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan). The hon. member has not quoted the statement from Hansard, and I say that the statement he has attributed to my colleague is not the statement my colleague made.

My colleague said it had not been necessary to use those powers—

Some hon. Members: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister has risen to express his disagreement with a statement made by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). The practice of the house is that the minister would be allowed to rise and make the correction after the hon. member for Laurier had resumed his seat. I think this is the proper course to follow.

If the hon. member for Laurier yields the floor for the minister to make a correction, that is all very well; but if he does not yield the floor for such purpose, the practice is that such correction of a misstatement or misunderstanding should be made after the hon. member who has the floor has resumed his seat.

Mr. Chevrier: I have yielded the floor to my hon. friend on several occasions. I do not propose to do so again unless it is in accordance with the rules of the house.

I continue from where I was interrupted to say that in 1959 the government continued to follow a timid, protectionist policy which certainly did not help Canadian industry but was enough to give us a bad reputation in countries outside Canada.

The Minister of Finance continued to appear to be a strong supporter of GATT, in words of course, but how could Canada's words be taken seriously in international meetings when in fact in the fall of 1958 the Minister of National Revenue had violated the very spirit of GATT?

Meanwhile the government expressed its timid approval of the two new trading blocs emerging in Europe, although, as it now appears, it was strongly opposed to a unified European common market. This was a most inconsistent attitude to take.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true.

Mr. Chevrier: The government failed to see that the emergence of two separate trading blocs in Europe was not only artificial but also undesirable. It was obvious from the beginning that the formation of the outer seven was mainly a bargaining move intended to bring about a European trade community which negotiations between individual nations had failed to achieve.

The government's confusion, however, became complete in 1960. It accepted, with at least some apparent enthusiasm, a full membership in O.E.C.D., which is supposed to foster European economic unity, but both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) threatened to take retaliatory action against the United Kingdom—

Alleged Lack of Trade Policy

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true.

Mr. Chevrier: —if the British government accepted the terms required by the common market countries to bring about such economic unity.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true.

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Finance says that is not true. I hold in my hand a press clipping from the Regina Leader-Post entitled:

Mr. Fleming's protectionist approach to Europe paying lip service to free trade.

This article is dated November 29, 1960.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What was the source?

Mr. Chevrier: I said, the Regina Leader-Post. The article continues as follows:

A highly protectionist frame of mind and intent, based on fear, now stands revealed in two new documents presented by and given the blessing of Canada's Minister of Finance, Donald M. Fleming.

One of the documents, an address delivered by Mr. Fleming to the Canadian industrial editors' association last week at Ste. Adele, Quebec, outlined at length the official government reaction to the new European trading groups.

The article then goes on and states:

Mr. Fleming, of course, reiterates his violent opposition to Britain entering the European common market in any way. He finds it difficult to see how any accommodation which the United Kingdom might make with the "Six" nations "could fail to damage to some degree, and perhaps seriously, Canadian interests".

This article continues:

But by far the most significant words used by Mr. Fleming in both his Ste. Adele address and his Times article, filled in this important detail:

This paragraph is in quotations:

"If," he says, "the more damaging possibilities in fact materialized, if the impact on free entry and commonwealth preferences were far-reaching and if reverse preferences were created against us, there would be Canadians who would claim that the system of commonwealth preferences was at an end".

Earlier the article states:

Mr. Fleming describes such a possibility as a "threat". He sees, if it should come about, an end to the present preferential entry of Canadian goods onto the British market, hitherto so valuable to Canada. He fears especially the possibility of damage to the rate of entry of Canadian agricultural products into Britain.

Then there is this significant paragraph:

"Certainly under such circumstances, the pressures for Canada to embark on closer trade associations with other countries, particularly the United States, would understandably be greatly increased".

Then later on:

From an expressed position of advocating a trade diversion away from the United States, the finance minister within a short space of time has now come to the position of considering the possibility of adopting a policy which would be quite the reverse.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Rot.

Mr. Chevrier: The article continues:

Should it come about, there would be few if any patterns of policy development which could compare with it in the history of Canada.

Then the Minister of Trade and Commerce made no secret about his position when he was in Paris. Here I quote from a clipping from the Ottawa Journal dated December 15, 1960 and datelined Paris:

Unless the European common market substantially reduces its announced tariff schedules affecting imports from Canada, at the GATT negotiations in progress in Geneva Canada will retaliate by increasing its barriers against imports from the six European countries. That warning has been given by trade minister Hees to the European ministers meeting here.

There can be no doubt about that statement, and if it is not accurate I presume the minister will deny it. But that has not been done in this house. Then a new round of negotiations was initiated in Geneva by GATT members, and if the Minister of Finance is sincere in saying he is a strong supporter of trade on a multilateral basis the Canadian delegates at Geneva must surely have presented concrete and bold proposals for freer trade in the world. While these negotiations were going on, however, the Minister of Finance in his supplementary budget took another important step on the road to greater protection with his amendment to the provisions respecting the class or kind of goods made in Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I rise to a point of order? It is all very well for the hon. gentleman to make reference to matters which have engaged the attention of the house in previous sessions or to make reference to things which happened outside the house and which are not subject to a decision in the house, but he is now referring to a matter which engaged the attention of hon. members over the past two months, the debate of which was concluded on the third reading of the bill last week. The hon. member has now begun to discuss this matter again and I submit he is out of order.

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Finance is again wasting his breath entirely. I have not started to discuss this subject. I made reference to it, and I have completed my reference. The minister cannot remain in his seat for a moment. When anything is said which concerns his department or which affects him he must rise immediately and protest. I hope he will rise and protest on those occasions when he should do so in accordance with the rules of the house but not otherwise.

I was going on to say, after that statement, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is a great showman. He has shown that on more than one occasion, and so has the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) for that matter. But the showmanship of the Prime Minister is in the field of vision whereas, I must admit, the showmanship of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is more real. However, since the calling together of the trade commissioners in Ottawa to meet the businessmen the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been touring the country preaching a "Buy Canadian" campaign. In the fall of 1957 the slogan was "Buy British". Today it is "Buy Canadian", and the great export drive which was begun with such enthusiasm and apparent dynamism not long ago and which received so much publicity last fall seems now to have been entirely forgotten by those who sit on the other side of the house.

What will the next step be? I presume it will come when the Minister of Finance hands down his budget. Once again the Minister of Finance will probably talk about freer trade on a multilateral basis at the beginning of his speech when he refers to the international economic situation and then announce further protective action at the end of his speech just before reaching his final exhortation. At least, this is what the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion) led his audience to expect when he spoke recently in St. Hyacinthe and promised that the textile industry would soon be adequately protected against foreign competition. Did the Minister of Finance read the speech of his colleague the Secretary of State? Did he compare it with the speeches made by the Prime Minister about greater protection for the textile industry against dumping, protection for that industry in the same manner as agricultural products, for instance, are protected against dumping.

I think the Minister of Finance should read what was said by his colleague. There is no doubt that this speech, together with other speeches made by the Prime Minister, adds up to a long list of inconsistencies and contradictions. The examples I have given are not exhaustive. I have not the time to put them all on record in Hansard, but they are none the less impressive. The government has talked one way and acted another. The government has given the indication that it intended to move in one direction while, as a matter of fact, acting in the other way; although its actions, when it did move, have proved of little assistance to those industries which were in need of assistance and which required protection.

Alleged Lack of Trade Policy

Meanwhile our export trade has, fortunately, continued to expand. The government cannot take credit for this expansion, which is due not to its policies but to the dynamic economy and growth of western European industry. The increase of 9 per cent in the physical volume of our export trade since 1957 does not justify complacency on the part of the government, and there have been indications of such complacency from time to time. In the first place that expansion has not been fast enough to enable our economy to move ahead or even to retain its position. Moreover, this upward trend may well come to an end when the new trading arrangements in Europe are fully implemented at which time their restrictive features will begin to produce results.

The formation of O.E.C.D. was certainly a step in the right direction. One of the main functions of the new organization was—and I quote:

> To achieve the highest sustainable economic growth and employment and a rising standard of living in member countries while maintaining financial stability.

However, O.E.C.D. will not be able to accomplish very much in that direction if an excessive stress is placed on economic aid functions which annoy many Europeans. Moreover, the new organization can be at best a useful forum for discussion leading to a better co-ordination of economic policies and, in particular, to new trading arrangements within the north Atlantic community. But in order to achieve this most important objective, member countries must decide what trade policy is best for them and try to reconcile their differences in order to pursue a common purpose.

If this is to be done, Canada, in particular, must abandon its present confused and ineffective trade policy. The government must get out of its present dilemma and realize that it is impossible to have at the same time two conflicting trade policies, one of free trade for our export industries and one of high protection for our secondary manufacturing industries.

This basic conflict can be solved only when we become aware of the very important fact that high protection is not the only way and, in the framework of our international obligations, is certainly not the best way of helping our secondary manufacturing industries.

If we were to rely only on a restrictive trade policy to assist this sector of our economy high tariffs and quotas would be necessary. This would mean, of course, that we would have to withdraw from GATT and that our export industries would be exposed to massive retaliation. Such a restrictive policy would be a fatal blow for our export industries and it would not solve the basic difficulties of our secondary manufacturing industry.

The source of those difficulties comes from relatively high production costs resulting from a small domestic market and lack of specialization. High protection, it seems to us on this side of the house, can do very little to remove this basic weakness. At best it could offer only a temporary advantage and give to our domestic industry a larger share of a smaller market resulting from a decline of the export industries.

The only realistic long term solution to the difficulties experienced by our secondary manufacturing industry lies in the direction of free trade. Our domestic industries would then have an easy access to large markets and would be able to specialize. It could produce fewer products in much greater quantities resulting in substantially lower costs of production.

The gradual establishment of free trade would, of course, create transitional problems for our domestic industry. It would have to change its production techniques, modify its equipment and intensify its sales efforts abroad. These transitional problems, however, can be solved if the government is prepared to initiate a special program of assistance to our domestic industries. This should not be difficult because, when one considers what happened in the formation of the common market countries, where the same problems were met, and with tremendous success, one can realize that it can be done. When it is considered that these six countries, two of which have lower tariffs than ours and two others of which have higher tariffs, were able by agreement among themselves to reduce their tariffs to a common denominator —there is no doubt that difficulties were encountered in the process—and if it could be accomplished with the results, which we know over there, and give such dynamism and increase to the trade, there is no doubt that similar action could be followed here.

Such a program, as I have outlined in a general way, because I have already put it on Hansard in a more detailed manner in another debate, should be highly flexible and include loans, grants and tax incentives. It should also be carefully planned in consultation with industry in order to be well adapted to the concrete re-adjustments involved. Its large-scale implementation would not create any special financial problems because it would be accompanied by the gradual removal of a tariff burden which is estimated at more than $1 billion annually. We suggest on this side of the house, that this might well be accomplished either through the reorganization of the Department of Trade and Commerce or by the creation of a new department of industry to implement the plan that has been referred to from time to time in the house.

The program of assistance which I just outlined would solve the basic problems of our secondary manufacturing industry much more effectively than high protection. It has the additional tremendous merit of being perfectly consistent with the best interests of our traditional export industries.

Each generation of Canadians has been tempted by the apparent simplicity of high protection but has found through bitter experience that a restrictive trade policy is not suited to Canadian conditions. Throughout our history, our export trade has been the main dynamic factor of our expansion and prosperity. When our export industries experienced difficulties, as in the second half of the nineteenth century, the whole Canadian economy failed to grow rapidly. When the level of our exports was increasing substantially, as it did most of the time during the present century, we enjoyed over-all rapid expansion.

Thus, sir, the major aim of our trade policy should be to promote exports through freer trade, while enabling our secondary manufacturing industry at the same time to adjust itself to this new environment through the implementation of a special program of assistance. We should, however, be realistic enough to realize that progress toward free trade on a world scale is becoming more and more difficult. The underdeveloped countries are not likely to support such a movement. The Sino-Soviet bloc are opposed to it, and the emergence of other regional trading arrangements have given a new direction to the free trade movement. On the other hand, a free trade arrangement between Canada and the United States alone would be undesirable for us not only for economic but also, and perhaps especially, for political reasons.

The gradual establishment of free trade between the emerging European common market, including the outer seven and the inner six, and North America, seems to be the only realistic objective that we should seek. The unification of the two European trading zones in a broad common market now appears inevitable. It is also highly desirable, and we would not oppose it, provided it is developed within the framework of a North Atlantic free trade area. Such an arrangement would not only make sense for Canada but it would also strengthen all the national economies of the western world and put them in a better position to help the underdeveloped countries, and to meet the Soviet challenge. Moreover, the creation of this Atlantic trade community would consolidate the political unity of western democracies and give a new purpose to the alliance of the free world.

This great idea of an Atlantic trade community was put forward for the first time by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) in December, 1957 in Oslo when he received the Nobel peace prize. He then said:

> Now the European nations are launching themselves through the common market and its associated free trade area, on an adventure in the economic unification of peoples that a few years ago would have seemed completely visionary. Is it any more visionary to foresee a further extension of this co-operative economic pattern? Is it not time to begin to think in terms of an economic interdependence that would bridge the Atlantic?

Then again, on January 24, 1958, in a speech made in Vancouver, my leader repeated his suggestion in the following terms:

> In short, it seems that the era of gradual tariff reductions through GATT have come to an end. We do not surely wish to replace it by a western Europe and a North America aiming at self-sufficiency. If not, then surely the best alternative, and the best way to meet the Soviet economic and political challenge is an Atlantic freer trade area to complement the European customs union and free trade zone. For Canada, is this not the best way to reduce our economic dependence on the United States while expanding our trade, maintaining our economic development and raising even higher our living standards? This is a challenging prospect and is surely worth serious and immediate consideration, negotiation and planning. Could there be a finer initiative for Canada?

This idea has now received the acclaim and support of most of the western leaders. There is no doubt of the position which Prime Minister Macmillan of the United Kingdom took during his visit to this continent. Not only in Washington, but also in the speech which he delivered to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and during the press conference which he gave here on April 12 the Prime Minister of Great Britain said that the free world must think in terms of creating the largest area of free trade possible and a North Atlantic free trade area should be created. Vice President Johnson, speaking in Paris at the beginning of April, developed the same theme. In an address in Toronto in December, 1960, Mr. Stevenson had this to say:

> A working Atlantic community would do more than enhance the basic strength of the west. It would demonstrate to other areas—to Latin America, to Africa, to the Middle East and to India and Pakistan—methods by which political autonomy can be combined with supra-national co-operation.

The West German minister of economic affairs, Mr. Erhard, and of defence, Mr. Strauss, have expressed on several occasions their support for a North Atlantic free trade area.

Alleged Lack of Trade Policy

Mr. Maurice Faure, former French minister of European institutions, said recently:

> In my view the answer to European and to NATO problems is the same: at both levels we must outgrow the old-fashioned concept of a mere alliance between sovereign states and work out new patterns of organic unity. European unification and Atlantic co-operation should progress simultaneously. The ultimate goal should be a European federation within an Atlantic confederation.

Mr. Spaak and Van Zealand in Belgium, and the political leaders of the Scandinavian countries, have made statements along the same lines. Therefore, it can be seen that the idea put forward by the Leader of the Opposition in December of 1957 is now widely supported in the North Atlantic countries. The Leader of the Opposition is now suggesting an Atlantic economic conference, at the highest governmental level, for the purpose of laying the foundation for an Atlantic economic community. I submit the government should accept the suggestion and take the lead in calling such a conference.

Instead, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has rejected any idea of Canadian participation in the gradual establishment of an Atlantic free trade area. This he did at a meeting of the Progressive Conservative party in March. Before him, the Minister of Finance is reported as having said in Washington in January, 1960, that an Atlantic trade community would not be in the best interests of Canada as a world trader.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What document is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. Chevrier: It is a press statement that I have not with me but I shall be glad to get it for the hon. member.

Mr. Hees: May I ask the hon. member if he will give me the source of the statement that he says I made?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I have it here; I will send it over. Meanwhile, the minister is threatening to raise Canadian tariffs if the United Kingdom aligns itself with the common market countries in some sort of a free trade area.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What is the authority for that statement?

Mr. Chevrier: I have already put that statement on Hansard.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That misstatement.

Mr. Chevrier: Such an attitude is not only unrealistic but dangerous in today's world because it is in sharp contrast with new trade patterns, and it may lead us only to isolation or continental dependence. Dr. Hugo De

Grood, the head of the North American division at the European common market headquarters in Brussels, had this to say last December:

> It seems to us that Canada overrates its own importance these days. We want to trade with you, but you must understand that if necessary we shall get along without you.

Then again, another high official in the European common market is reported to have added:

> Much as we like Canada and Canadians, don't ever think that a market of 17 million people can threaten us into changing our basic plans.

The choice that Canada has today is not between GATT and the Atlantic trade community but between this broad association and isolation. Our country experienced sustained and rapid expansion during the present century within the North Atlantic commercial triangle. We, on this side of the house, merely propose to revive and consolidate this historical association. Canada suffered from economic stagnation in the latter part of the nineteenth century when we were isolated from world markets and the main channels of trade. If the government rejects our proposals, our country may well suffer again from isolation and stagnation, as it did in the nineteenth century.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith):

> That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "This house regrets the protectionist and inconsistent trade policies of the government and its failure to develop a long term foreign economic policy to enable Canada to participate fully in the challenging new opportunities in the field of international trade by implementing a vigorous program to promote the expansion of our secondary manufacturing industries and by encouraging the development of an Atlantic economic community."

Mr. Speaker: Before I place the amendment before the house I shall be glad to know whether any hon. member wishes to raise any point with respect to the proposed amendment?

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the amendment and I can say immediately that our group intends to support it. We note that according to the statistics our exports have been rising in recent years. However, we contend they have not been rising fast enough to meet our national needs. We have to remember that in order to obtain a satisfactory level of exports they must be at a level adequate enough to pay for the goods and services we import. In addition to paying for the goods and services we import, they must also be enough to meet our payments on our foreign debt and it is to be noted that the level of such payments has been rising with tremendous rapidity of late. We have to repay to those who invest in Canada not only the basic principal of the investment but also the interest and if equity is involved our economy is expected to return a profit on the investments that outsiders make in our country.

In addition to having to pay by means of exports for the goods and services we import and also our foreign debt, we must also regard our export needs in the light of employment needs in our own country. In the light of world needs, our group denies completely any necessity for unemployment in Canada. However, we realize at once that our exports have a lot to do with the level of employment and unemployment in Canada and we realize that we have to export an ever-growing proportion of our wealth if we are going to provide employment for all those in Canada who would like to work.

I note that according to the official statistics our over-all deficit in 1959 was $1,429 million. This is a matter of very serious concern. I agree at once that the objective of the amendment is a good one. However, we contend that in Canada we should be producing what we are able to produce economically, and the attainment of that objective will mean changes in our economic structure. We will have to make a selection of products. We will have to make up our minds what we are able to produce economically in Canada in relation to the rest of the world and we will have to concentrate on those products rather than attempting to protect the man with a greenhouse who is trying to produce bananas for Canadian consumers. I say at once that whole industries need not be sacrificed, that rather we should decide now that we must give up the production of certain products because they may be uneconomical and their continued production may be against the long term national interest.

At this time I should like to compliment the Canadian producers of industrial machinery. I believe they have realized that their continued prosperity depends on specialization and, having regard to the recession and all other factors, I believe they are doing relatively well because they have taken into account the fact that we can compete only by specializing and that we cannot compete very successfully on the basis of nationalism which is outdated in the economic world of today.

I should like to express my disappointment at the failure of Canadian industries generally to realize that they have to adjust in order to survive. If we want to have a proper approach we must realize that we are not an island by ourselves in the world today. We have to accept the world as it is and if our industries want to survive they will only survive provided they are willing to adjust to economic realities and attune their operations accordingly.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. member who had the floor at six o'clock would allow me to do so, Mr. Speaker, I should now like to give the references which I made to statements made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). I did not have them with me when I spoke. The statement made by the Minister of Finance is reported in the Windsor Star of January 7, 1960. It is entitled: "Fleming declines U.S. Plan".

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the paper?

Mr. Chevrier: The Windsor Star.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Of what date?

Mr. Chevrier: January 7, 1960. The reference I had in mind was the following:

—Mr. Fleming told reporters a new Atlantic trade community consisting of the European groups, the U.S. and Canada, would not be in the best interests of Canada as a world trader.

The other reference I made having to do with the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce before the Progressive Conservative association is from the Montreal Gazette dated March 18, 1961, and is entitled, "Red China, Free Trade, Jobless", and it is as follows:

Trade Minister Hees said Liberal party advocacy of an Atlantic free trade area meant nothing more than reciprocity between Canada and the United States. That would result in American industrial producers flooding the Canadian market with more cheaply-made goods, creating widespread unemployment in Canada by closing down Canadian industry.

As I said, this statement was made when the Conservative party's annual meeting took place.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, I was a little bit surprised that the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) appeared as the leading spokesman on behalf of the Liberal party in the debate dealing with the subject of trade. We had always been led to believe that the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) was the expert on behalf of the official opposition in this regard. I believe the fact that the hon. member for Laurier has now pre-empted the position that had been occupied by the hon. member for Ottawa West is revealed in the very wording of the amendment in its reference to expansion of our secondary manufacturing industries. Had the hon. member for Ottawa West been responsible for this amendment, I believe he would have omitted this reference of particular concern to the expansion of our secondary manufacturing industries. The hon. member for Laurier has always been well known as a spokesman for the textile industry which, as we all know, is under a severe handicap, as it has been for a considerable number of years. I can only explain the new spokesman for the Liberal party in terms of trade upon reading the very wording of the amendment that is now offered.

I regard this particular portion of the amendment as nothing more or less than a sop to the hon. member for Laurier. However, our group recognizes the fact that our needs in the field of international trade cannot be successfully resolved until we have resolved the problem of unemployment in Canada within our own national borders. I agree at once that we are unable to resolve the complications of this problem until we build up adequate markets that will relieve us of the curse of unemployment. We appreciate at once that the immediate way of resolving the problem of unemployment is to enhance our obvious home market by giving our people adequate purchasing power. However, in addition to that, much can be done to enhance our markets abroad. I should like to quote, merely for the record, a submission made today to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his cabinet by the national unemployment lobby committee. On this particular matter it reads as follows, at page 9:

More should be done to promote trade. We should seek to expand our trade with all countries. Trade representatives should go to countries where our trade up to now has done poorly. A permanent trade commission should be established to visit all countries in turn. There should be a Canadian export bank to help exporters, with loans guaranteed by the government. Long term loans and technical assistance should be extended to so-called underdeveloped countries on a still larger scale; the loans should be at a nominal rate of interest, or interest free. Capital goods, which Canadian industry is quite able to make if allowed and helped to do so, should be an important part of our aid program.

Many eminent people, here and abroad, have suggested that Canada and other countries should use 1 per cent of their gross national product for foreign aid. This would mean $360 million for Canada. We doubt that the present total is even one third of that.

May I only interject that our present total is not even a fifth of that amount. The submission continues:

Mutual aid is certainly the right way to describe this assistance, since it helps the countries giving it as well as those receiving it.

That is the end of the submission of this national unemployment lobby committee which I understand met with the government today. We ought to realize that our particular problems would disappear if we had a policy of full employment. We would not have to worry too much about specific industries that are in particular need of tariff protection from time to time. I believe we have to resolve our thinking to the point where we would agree to a policy of integration of our production with the production of other nations.

I have read wth a great deal of interest the suggestion of Dr. Hugh Keenleyside. Dr. Keenleyside advocates our entering into an agreement with the United States of America for a selective integration of production. To put it very bluntly, if the United States insist on making automatic washers for the whole North American continent, we might agree to that if they would allow us to make automatic dryers for the whole North American continent.

If the United States want to manufacture large cars for the whole North American continent, they might be persuaded to agree to our manufacturing small cars to satisfy the whole North American market.

As far as I have observed, Dr. Keenleyside in no way advocates complete integration of our production with the production of the United States of America. Rather, he advocates a selective imagination. I feel that we have to go far beyond what Dr. Keenleyside advocates, namely, we ought to work toward integration of our production with the production of all the nations with whom an agreement would be obtainable.

I regret very much the attitude of the government towards the Geneva agreement on tariffs and trade, commonly known as GATT. I regret very much reading in our press that the Canadian government is attempting to threaten the negotiations that are under way at the present time with regard to the renewal of these agreements.

I understand Canada is in effect saying that if the inner six should dare to establish a common tariff barrier on imports into those countries, we might even refuse to continue to participate in the renewal of the Geneva agreements on tariff and trade. I referred to this at the time of the last budget speech when I said I felt it would do Canada little good—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Would the hon. member give the authority for that statement?

Mr. Regier: I hope the minister reads as many newspapers as I. I believe it is no secret that Canada is most adamant at the meetings of GATT which are currently taking place and is insisting that the inner six have no right to establish a common tariff barrier on imports. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) has even gone so far as to indicate that retaliation on the part of Canada would result if the inner six were to adopt a common tariff barrier on imports.

That is what I had in mind when, at the time of the last budget, I described the minister as the abominable snowman walking across Europe with a big club over his shoulder. I am afraid we are not going to get very far with this attitude. This is not co-operation; it is not in the interests of NATO and it is not in the interests of the Atlantic community. This attitude is not in the interests of the western world.

While the Minister of Finance attempts to make much of O.E.C.D., I am afraid that O.E.C.D. may end up as little more than wishful thinking. I should like to remind those responsible for our welfare in the international trading field that the road to hell is paved with good intentions. I believe this may well apply to the organization known as O.E.C.D.

We want to have our cake and eat it too. We refuse to associate ourselves—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: You want somebody else's cake.

Mr. Regier: Hon. members may laugh, but but we refuse to associate ourselves with any of the growing and successful trading blocs of the world. They are growing not only in number but also in success. We want to keep ourselves isolated; we want the best of a number of worlds in this field.

The rate of growth of the inner six exceeds the recent rate of growth of either the U.S.A. or the U.S.S.R. If I am able to gauge it accurately, the outer seven will very soon—and much too soon, as far as our interests are concerned—be allied with the inner six.

The Middle East has its trading bloc; over a long period of years the communists have had their trading bloc; and we now have Latin America to consider.

I should like to quote from a publication issued by our Department of External Affairs in regard to the Montevideo treaty. At page 858 of this publication it says:

> The Montevideo treaty thus contains a specific declaration in its preamble to the effect that its members will persevere in their efforts to bring about the complete economic integration of the whole of Latin America.
> The Latin American "Seven" have a population of some 144 million inhabitants which accounts for approximately 70 per cent of the total population of the 20 Latin American republics.

Later on, in reference to our nation, it says:

> Canadian exports to the countries forming the LAFTA totalled just under $70 million in 1959.

approximately half our exports to Latin America and 1.4 per cent of our total exports.

I submit that the problem is very serious indeed. We have a terrific deficit. According to our own dominion bureau of statistics' publication "Review of Foreign Trade" our exports total $5,140,000,000 and our imports total $5,508,000,000. For the year 1948, in terms of constant dollars, our exports were $4,192,000,000 and our imports $4,815,000,000.

I believe that the government of the day has been most inept and most negligent in the discharge of its responsibilities to the Canadian people and I should therefore like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman):

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma and by adding thereto the following words:
"to prevent a drastic loss of overseas markets for agricultural and other primary products."

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any comment on the validity of the subamendment? If there is no objection I will put the subamendment formally before the house.

The question is now on the subamendment.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the subamendment which has just been moved and the motion moved by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) are both very welcome to the government because I do not know of any area less favourable for members of the opposition to attack than that which has been chosen by the opposition today.

The main motion, which expresses regret at what it calls the protectionist and inconsistent policies of the government, is, in itself, completely inconsistent. It purports to speak on the one hand of a free or freer trade area within the Atlantic economic community and in the same breath it expresses regret because, it says, the government has failed to promote the expansion of secondary manufacturing industries in Canada. These two courses are contradictory and represent opposite ends of the economic pole.

At no time has any government put forth a greater effort to extend trade than this government has done and we shall continue to put forward that effort. We are very anxious to expand trade throughout, not only the Atlantic community, but the whole world and we shall continue to press our efforts in the future to the same degree as we have in past years.

However, I wish to say that supporters of the government will vote against this amendment, since it constitutes a straight vote of no confidence in the government, and if it were carried the government would be out of office. We know that the people are too well pleased with the service which this government is giving, for a chance to be taken of disappointing them at this time.

Canadian trade policy has been developed over many years by successive governments, as we all know, and today it represents the best judgment of the governments of the past and of the present government in the light of economic and political conditions which have existed over the past four years. The government is fully aware that new economic and trade developments are taking place throughout the world, and has been examining its course of action closely for months past. The fact that no precipitate action has been taken to date is a measure of the difficulty of the problem, and the importance of the policy decisions as they are ultimately resolved. I can assure the house, however, that I will recommend to my cabinet colleagues free or freer trade, or the joining by Canada of any economic trade grouping, whenever I am convinced that such a step is not only in the best interest of export groups, but of the Canadian economy as a whole.

Hon. members will know that for months past detailed negotiations have been going on in Geneva to ensure the most favourable terms of access for Canada's exports to the common market. Within the next few days the second phase of the tariff conference in Geneva will begin. The major trading nations of the GATT will be entering into negotiations for the mutual reduction of tariffs, the first such negotiations since 1956. Apart from Canada the leading trading countries participating are the United States, the common market, and the United Kingdom.

These negotiations represent part of the machinery by which we hope to maximize international trade.

Senior officials of my department have been in attendance at Geneva constantly since last August when these negotiations commenced, and will be continuing in these negotiations until they are completed later this year.

I am keeping in close touch with the progress of the negotiations, and I might tell the house the assistant deputy minister of my department is returning to Canada on Wednesday this week to report fully to myself and my officials on the current status of these important discussions.

This government has also seized the opportunity of establishing the closest working relationship with the European countries of both the Six and the Seven by joining the organization for economic cooperation and development, O.E.C.D. Canada was the first country to ratify the O.E.C.D. convention signed last December. The emergence of the two trading blocs in Europe was one of the major reasons for the creation of this forum for continuous consultation in the economic and trade policy field among the countries in Europe and North America.

Let me say once again, Mr. Speaker, that the trade policy of this government is neither protectionist nor inconsistent. Our policy is simply this, to maximize trade in every commodity in every possible market and by this means to provide employment for as many Canadians as possible.

Let us look at the record but before doing so let me make sure that we are talking about the same things. References are constantly made, and have been made in this house today, about the Canadian deficit balance. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) referred to a deficit in 1959 of $1,429 million inferring presumably that this was a trade imbalance. In actual fact, the trade imbalance for 1959 was $368 million, according to the dominion bureau of statistics' publication "Review of Foreign Trade" and in 1960 the trade imbalance had been reduced to $97 million representing the lowest unfavourable trade balance figure in the last six years.

Mr. Regier: I gave the d.b.s. figures.

Mr. Hees: To return to the record, in 1960 Canada's exports reached the record of $5,395 million, an all-time high, and an increase of 5 per cent over the previous year. In January, 1961 this figure was increased by 8.4 per cent over the previous record January of last year. The facts do not seem to bear out the concerns of the opposition.

The amendment proposed by the opposition would appear to leave the impression that Canada's trade with the countries of Europe is lagging. In fact Canada's trade with this area of the world is going ahead by leaps and bounds. Last year exports to the United Kingdom were up by 16 per cent and to the countries of the common market, taken as a whole, by nearly 40 per cent.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would permit a question.

Mr. Hees: All right.

Mr. Regier: I would like to ask him whether he doubts the dominion bureau of statistics' figures that I put on the record. I do not have them with me as I had to send them to Hansard.

Mr. Hees: I do not doubt the dominion bureau of statistics' figures but I think the hon. member is misinterpreting them.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister is using the wrong terminology.

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Hees: I would remind the house that this government and my department are adopting every possible aggressive means to promote Canada's trade both at home and abroad. In December last we called home the trade commissioners from all posts abroad for a three-week conference with Canadian businessmen designed to stimulate the interest and knowledge of Canadian businessmen and to acquaint anew our trade commissioners with current business conditions and possibilities for Canadian export trade. The house will know that this conference was a great success and has excited the interest of Canadian businessmen as never before. In the two months since the trade commisioners returned to their posts over 350 new selling agencies have been established for Canadian manufacturers abroad, and more than 2,000 new agencies are under active negotiation at this very moment. We are very hopeful that these new agencies will stimulate a great deal of additional trade during the months ahead and, as I have said, in the only month for which figures are available since the conference was held, our actual trade was up by a very satisfactory 8.4 per cent.

The recent export finance facility which was introduced by this government, in cooperation with the Canadian chartered banks has already provided a stimulus to export trade. Since the announcement of this new facility last December Canadian capital goods' manufacturers have exhibited keen interest, and have been placed in the position of being able to quote on over $200 million worth of extra business that would not have been possible previously, except for the provision of this joint export financing arrangement.

Naturally Canadian manufacturers must be competitive in tough world markets, but the financing facility now available is the equal of that of any other country both in terms and in cost, and is superior to most.

Our trade commissioners, and my department, will continue to do everything in our power to help our producers make export sales and expand our export markets so that as many Canadians as possible may have jobs replacing the products that are sold. However, salesmen can only accomplish so much. There is a big job to be done by producers in this country as well. I have pointed that out on numerous occasions, and will do so again now, because I think it is important to know where the responsibility lies in providing jobs for our people.

As I have said, our salesmen are working in every possible way they can to make sales, both at home and abroad. Our trade commissioners have indicated to them that they will do everything in their power to make the contacts, give them the information they need, and act as interpreters, if necessary. In fact, our trade commissioners will do everything except actually sign an order, and that, of course, must be done by the firm itself.

We in this country, as in the United States, are up against very serious competition from countries which, until recently, were our markets. I refer to the countries of western Europe which, in many cases, were devastated by war, but have made a remarkable comeback since that time. They have done so by co-operation between management and labour, in order to get costs down, and improve design and quality. By these actions which they have taken, they have put competitive products on all the markets of the world, and are competing very seriously in the Canadian market, and as a result have had a serious effect on employment in this country.

As a first step in trying to bring about the same kind of co-operative effort here in Canada, that they have achieved in western Europe, to provide jobs for their people—they have achieved full employment over there—we have called together recently two very important conferences here in Ottawa. The first was a labour-management conference, consisting of the representatives of the top 15 labour unions in Canada, and the heads of the 15 top management organizations in Canada, such as the Canadian chamber of commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian automobile chamber of commerce, the Canadian export association, and so on. This meeting was a very successful one, and a steering committee, with a joint chairmanship composed of the heads of the Canadian congress of labour and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, was brought into being, and is planning future meetings. We are very hopeful that this will have a real effect in bringing about in Canadian industry the same kind of co-operative spirit that has proved so useful in Europe.

Five days after that conference, and one day before its counterpart in the United States had its first meeting, we had the first meeting of the Canadian productivity council, made up of representatives as members will know, of labour, management, primary industries, the public, the government and agriculture. As in the case of the labour-management conference, this was also a very successful meeting indeed.

The purpose of these groups is, in various fields, to bring about the kind of co-operative effort which, in Europe, has paid off in such large measure, and to bring about the production in Canada of products that will sell in Europe, and here, as well as around the world, so that Canadians can have jobs replacing the products that move off the retailer's shelf. If a product does not sell, then people cannot have jobs making replacements for it. The problem is as simple as that.

We have the big job of getting labour, management and the government to combine and work together in the way they have in Europe, in order to produce products that will sell, and, as a result, provide jobs for our people. If we do the kind of things they have done in Europe, and we are trying to persuade these groups that it is necessary to do so, we can have the same kind of full employment in Canada, just as soon as we decide to work for it in the way they worked for it over there, and we will achieve it in the way they have achieved it.

Mr. Speaker, it was interesting this afternoon to hear the member for Laurier make reference to the new attitude of the Liberal party toward the question of trade. I am interested to learn that they are now completely in favour of free trade. I was interested, as I am sure all hon. members of this house were, to read in the Toronto Daily Star of April 15 an article appearing under the heading "Pearson Asks Free Trade Era". That article began as follows:

> "Canada should jump with both feet" into the project of creating an Atlantic free trade area embracing the United States, Britain, Canada and European nations, Hon. Lester B. Pearson, national Liberal leader, told a press conference yesterday—

I think it will be interesting for the house to take a look at what free trade with the United States will mean for the average Canadian, because that is exactly what the Liberal party, as specified by the Liberal leader, is calling for, and would be brought into effect if this country ever had the misfortune of having a Liberal government again in the future. I will outline what the result would be of free trade with the United States, for which that party on the other side of the house is calling.

The industries in the United States have, of course, a market ten times the size of the Canadian market. Their factories are, therefore, able to produce on a much larger scale than ours, with consequent savings and lower costs. If there were free trade between our two countries, as the Leader of the Opposition said his party would bring about if it were in power sometime in the future, the United States factories would simply increase their runs by 10 per cent and pour their goods into Canada at prices against which many Canadian producers could not compete. The result would undoubtedly be the closing down of a great many Canadian factories; mass unemployment; and the resultant hardship for hundreds of thousands of our people, who are today holding down good jobs, and who would be put out of work. I say this is a very strange course of action to be favoured by a party which professes great concern for those who are unemployed.

This afternoon the hon. member for Laurier said that the Liberals are opposed to my urging Canadians to "Buy Canadian". Just what does "Buy Canadian" mean? If Canadian people buy Canadian goods they will provide jobs for Canadian people producing more of those products when they move off the retailer's shelves.

Mr. Chevrier: On a question of privilege, at no time did I indicate to the house or to anyone else that I was opposed to the "Buy Canadian" campaign to which the minister refers. What I did say was that the government was inconsistent in 1957 in advocating a policy of "Buy British" and in 1960 or 1961 advocating a policy of "Buy Canadian".

Mr. Hees: There is no inconsistency whatsoever. If at a time of unemployment such as this any Canadian advocates to his fellow Canadians that they should buy the products manufactured by their fellow Canadians, then I would say he is advocating a good sensible policy aimed at the good of the Canadian people, aimed at putting Canadians to work producing products that would otherwise come in through loopholes in the backdoor that the Liberal party advocated for nine consecutive days in the debate on the class or kind legislation.

We are in favour of Canadians having jobs here in Canada. We are not in favour of, instead of Canadians having jobs in Canada, people having those jobs in Birmingham, Turin, Toledo and Detroit. We want as many Canadians a possible to have jobs here producing Canadian products for Canadians and overseas consumption so that we can have full employment. That is what our policy is and we are proud of it.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question? How can he be so proud of that policy when there are over 700,000 people unemployed?

Mr. Hees: I have tried to outline to the hon. member and to other hon. members this evening one of the main reasons why a large number of Canadians are unemployed. It is the same reason that a large number of people are unemployed in the United States today. They are unemployed because a great many countries, particularly western European countries, for about 10 years after the war had to come to us to buy products which they needed because they had literally no way to produce them. Their factories had been devastated. They had no production then. They needed the goods; they came to us and bought them at almost any price we wanted to ask. This was the situation. By hard work, by co-operation, by management, labour and government sitting down and working together they were able to produce goods which are very competitive, good in design and quality and very competitive in price, and they are taking sales away from Canadian and United States products all around the world. It is up to us and United States to realize it. We talked to their ministers while we were in Washington. They are up against exactly the same problem. That is why they set up a productivity council. They are just as worried as we are, and they are working just as hard as we are to try to overcome this great handicap.

We have to get down to the position where we can produce products which are just as desirable to the people throughout the world, as the people of western Europe have been able to do in 15 years. As soon as we do that, we shall have full employment and we shall not get full employment by negative speeches such as the ones which were delivered today and have been delivered all during this session by members of the opposition, tearing down, trying to create lack of confidence, trying to create a picture of doom and gloom, trying to give an idea to the people of Canada that it is a bad time to invest, that people should not build factories, they should not enlarge their inventories because things do not look so good, unemployment is bad, things are gloomy in the country. This is the contribution that members of the opposition are making, and it is not the kind of contribution that any Canadian who is proud to call himself a Canadian should be making at this time. We should be all getting together and putting our shoulders to the wheel, as the Europeans do and did. That is how they put themselves right at the top of the heap after being down in the ashes 15 years ago.

As I say, it upsets the Liberal party to hear us advocate "Buy Canadian", so that Canadians can have jobs producing more of those products, because they do not want jobs for Canadians. Why do they not want jobs for Canadians? Because the more Canadians are employed the happier they will be at the next election. If Canadians are unhappy they might vote for the Liberal party, as members of the opposition hope they may do, and therefore they are trying to create a picture of gloom, doom, chaos and despair in the minds of Canadian people so that they can say, "Vote us in and we will set everything right". The Canadian people are not going to be fooled any more at this election than they were at the last election.

Mr. Chevrier: They certainly were fooled at the last election.

Mr. Hees: No, they were not fooled at the last election; they were very well pleased with what they got at the last election and they are going to be satisfied with what they get at the next one because they are going to get another Conservative government and they are going to get a lot of good legislation.

From what I have said, Mr. Speaker, I think it is pretty obvious what hon. members of the Liberal opposition have been up to all during this session. They have been against anything that would create jobs; they are against anything that will give employment to Canadians. What they want are things that will give employment to people in other countries. They are all for people in other countries. They want them to pour cheap goods into Canada to put Canadians out of work and to have mass unemployment, so that they can go to the people at the next election and say, "Elect us and we will save you from your doom". That is the kind of deal they are trying to put over to the Canadian people. The Canadian people are not going to go for it. They are once again going to recognize that their hope lies in electing a Conservative government under the greatest Prime Minister that ever held office in this country.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I think you have ruled already that when a member finds that a misstatement has been made by a previous speaker he should take the first opportunity immediately after that speech to correct that misstatement, and that is what I want to do. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has stated and based his whole speech on a statement made by the Leader of the Opposition, in which he said that our leader advocated a policy of free trade between Canada and the United States. At no time has the Leader of the Opposition, nor have I in my remarks today, stated anything to that effect. What I did state, by putting on the record the position of the Leader of the Opposition and of the Liberal party, was the advocacy of an Atlantic alliance; that is, a free trade area of the western European countries, Canada and the United States, but not Canada and the United States alone. I made it quite clear this afternoon that economic union with the United States would be undesirable for us politically and otherwise.

Mr. Hees: Then, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question. If we are in a free trade area, including the United States, does it not then mean that we are having free trade with the United States and with a lot of other countries as well? Is there anything which he could do that would stop cheap goods flowing over in tremendous quantities and putting our people out of work and causing our factories to close down?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know what question has been put to me but there seems to be at least three in the statement made by the minister. What I say in answer to the minister's question is that an Atlantic alliance can be formed among the western European countries, Canada and the United States in the same manner as a common market was formed among the six countries of western Europe and was a success.

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of attention to the speech just delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees). All we heard was a lot of words which might properly have been spoken not only during an election but some time in the 1930's. This is what we object to.

It would have been far more interesting had the Minister of Trade and Commerce chosen to speak on the government's trade policy and given the house some indication that the government is aware that there have been tremendous changes in the world which make Tory protectionist trade policies completely obsolete. I find it rather strange, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is a relatively young man, has such outmoded and antiquated ideas and theories on trade and commerce.

Hon. members will agree, I believe, that one of the most acute and urgent problems facing the government is that of trying to fit Canada and her high cost economy into a rapidly changing and increasingly competitive world market. The international picture in the field of trade is becoming more and more complex and it is difficult indeed at this stage to forecast what that picture will be 10 or 20 years from now. Yet, Mr. Speaker, if Canada is to find and adopt an advantageous and useful role in this increasingly important field of trade, it will have to adjust its sights not on short-run expediencies which can be but temporary but on an over-all long-run commercial policy which will best serve Canada's interests and be in keeping with the present trends of international trade.

There has been a profound evolution in our concept of international trade within the past 50 years. The old pattern of international trade and the protectionist trade policies of the empire era have long since been discarded and new trade relationships and policies adopted to meet new world situations. Within the past 15 years some 38 nations of the world have attained their political independence and along with their sovereignty went the responsibility of bolstering their economies which they are rightly seeking to do by the processing in their own countries of their raw materials and marketing of the products.

The rest of the world could not be and was not indifferent to the impact that this evolution has had on the international trade picture and the necessity and advantage for all to aid these new nations to stabilize their respective economies. The commonwealth trade preferences, the multilateral trade agreements such as GATT, the international monetary fund, the international bank for reconstruction and development, the Colombo plan, the United Nations technical assistance fund, all were organized to meet the new problem, and we can best judge the success of these endeavours by imagining what would have happened, both in terms of world economics and world politics, had we failed to keep up to new world demands.

Although we have cause to take some satisfaction from what has been done, it would be wrong and dangerous to imagine that the problem of trade has been solved. One has only to recall that not so very long ago we were greatly concerned with the economic plight of, and took steps to bolster, the economy of western Europe. Since then, a relatively few years, the recovery of western Europe and that of Japan have been so outstanding that not only have they increased competition in the international market but they have in fact disturbed, if not disrupted, some of our own home markets.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the problem of world trade has not been solved but on the contrary we stand on the threshold of a new era in the field of international relationships and trade, and Canada with her high cost economy, her alarming unfavourable trade balances and her urgent need to export cannot afford to lag behind with the government's outmoded, ineffective and unimaginative thinking on international trade.

There is a marked reluctance on the part of the government, if not in accepting the revolutionary changes in the international trade picture, certainly in attuning its thinking and its policies to trends which in recent years have become clear-cut. Since 1935 there has been throughout the world a gradual lowering of trade barriers, the abandonment of bilateral trade arrangements and a continuous movement toward multilateral and freer trade. It is absolutely useless for the government to try to fight this world trend toward freer trade by attempting to camouflage its trade restrictive policies behind a barrage of administrative red tape as it did in the amendments to the class and kind provisions of the Canadian tariff recently. That is the type of thinking that will not only isolate Canada from the current international trade movement but will make favourable trade negotiations with other countries impossible and ultimately jeopardize Canada's badly needed export trade.

Another example of the application of traditional Tory protectionist policy and the government's refusal to acknowledge and accept the new concept of world trade was the backing away by the government in 1958 from an offer to establish a free trade area between Canada and the United Kingdom. Nor has the government since 1958 to this day decided to scrap its traditional trade policies and thinking, which are not only obsolete but are harmful to our economy at this very crucial time. Not so long ago the Minister of Finance suggested to the United Kingdom government that it should not join the common market; otherwise Canada would be forced to take appropriate steps in retaliation. No doubt the United Kingdom government would have been impressed and alarmed at this Victorian threat some years ago but under the present world situation the minister's suggestion received the consideration it deserved, and it appears inevitable now that the United Kingdom will join the common market.

The best gauge by which to measure the depth and the scope as well as the consequences of the political and economic changes in the world and the proof that Canada will have to adopt more realistic, more imaginative and more practical trade policies are the fact that Great Britain, the mother of parliaments, the emblem of sovereignty and independence, may judge it necessary to sacrifice a part of that independence in order to maintain its economic stability in the face of changed world conditions. We cannot imagine, Mr. Speaker, how much thought, how much reflection, how much consideration must have been given by the United Kingdom to that extremely weighty problem, but we can imagine fairly well how irritatingly naive must have sounded the Minister of Finance's advice and threat at such a crucial moment in the history of Great Britain.

The United Kingdom must, just as Canada must, seek to protect and even defend its economic security as well as the welfare of its people by taking whatever measures are deemed appropriate to cope with new and challenging economic and political problems on a world scale. The western world in the past 15 years, in order to establish lasting world peace on the basis of understanding and co-operation between the nations of the world, has spared no efforts, no amount of ingenuity and no amount of money to avert a catastrophic third world war. With the United Nations, NATO and SEATO we have succeeded so far in avoiding a third world war and have at least retarded the communist military aggression in Europe and Asia. But Mr. Speaker, who would dare claim that we have enjoyed during these past years a state of even comparative peace? Who would dare assert that the tensions and strifes of the cold war are limited only to occasional military skirmishes, political jockeying for position, the nuclear arms race, the missile and space travel races? What about the world economics race which is more fundamental, a race in which we are handicapped because of the diametrically opposed principles on which western and communist economies are based?

We have sought to unite the western nations in military alliances. We have built up military defences around the world and we have been so busy in keeping the U.S.S.R. from gaining any military advantage over us that we apparently have lost sight of the fact that the real ace up the communist sleeve is their basic economic advantage over us.

The western countries have done little or nothing to bridge this gap and to prepare defences in the event of an economic war which Mr. Khrushchev himself warned us would inevitably be launched. Very little success has been achieved in uniting the western countries in an economic alliance which might be able to offset whatever economic advantage the U.S.S.R. might have over us. Mr. Speaker, it is because an economic war could achieve what the communists have set up as their dedicated objective whereas an all-out nuclear war obviously could not do so, that I am convinced that the western nations most vulnerable spot in their fight against communist domination lies in the field of world economics; and strangely enough, that is the field in which there is the least unity, the least co-operation and the least planning among the nations of the western world.

It is no doubt because of a lack of appreciation of the full impact of present economic and political changes, because of a too narrow and too short view of the international trade problem and because of a continued and incomprehensible underestimation of the Soviet threat and because of the blind adherence to obsolete traditional trade policies and political expediency that governments like this government fail to see in the common market and the free trade area the embryo of greater economic unity, co-operation and strength for the western world. I cannot help but feel that in the minds of many people and of many nations the common market and even the free trade area are considered as discriminatory and restrictive trading blocs and are looked upon as a potential danger to their own export markets.

In the light of present world problems I believe it is wrong for Canada and other nations to consider the common market only in terms of the short-run effects on some of their European exports. If indeed the world situation warrants, as indeed it does, the United Kingdom along with other European nations taking unprecedented and revolutionary steps to meet new challenges effectively, surely Canada cannot expect to meet those same challenges as well as the higher cost economy problem which she has without making some readjustment at least in her export trade.

The common market and the free trade area must not be looked upon in the very narrow, negative and indeed provincial light in which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) views them. These organizations are to me unprecedented and necessary experimentation in the field of world economics not only toward freer trade but toward an essential economic unity and co-operation which we must achieve not only in Europe but among the nations of the western world if we are to meet successfully the challenge of a changing world economy as well as to withstand the pressures of an economic war with the U.S.S.R. and her satellites.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, Canada cannot and must not continue to look upon these organizations in an unfavourable light and to remain isolated and aloof from the tremendous effort and movement that is being made to meet the world problems and challenges of this generation. On the contrary, in the light of Canada's trade deficits and her increased difficulty in competing in her own home markets as well as in foreign markets, because of the disruption of traditional trade relationships, because of the possibility of increased economic competition from the Soviet union and her satellites and because of the paramount necessity of aiding the underdeveloped nations of the world, Canada cannot afford to be without a definite, well-thought-out, long range foreign economic policy. The stakes are too high and the situation too tense for Canada to continue to indulge, as she is now doing, in off the cuff, hit-or-miss trade policies, in apologetic but none the less restrictive trade measures with all her hopes of solving her problems pinned on the loud-talking high pressure salesmanship of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the importance and consequences to Canada of world economics warrants the adoption of a definite Canadian foreign economic policy which should be based on a thorough study and understanding of present world problems and should contain both long range and short range measures to cope with these problems. Surely, under present conditions a Canadian foreign economic policy should be given at least the same consideration and importance as is given to foreign affairs policy and indeed more co-ordination and planning than are now being given to national defence policy. Certainly the long range measures of a sound Canadian foreign economic policy should include not only the acceptance of the European common market and the free trade area as the basis of a trade-promoting endeavour and not a trade-inhibiting endeavour but this long range policy should also include a sincere effort and leadership on the part of Canada to extend the membership and principles involved in these two organizations to a wider North Atlantic economic alliance as a first step to reaching economic unity and co-operation in the whole of the western world.

No one, of course, doubts the necessity and the advantage of aiding the underdeveloped countries at a crucially important point of their economic history. But how will the western world be able to give the necessary assistance and protection to these new economic entities if the western world is plagued with economic problems of its own and is further weakened by a lack of unity and co-operation in the strategically important field of economics?

It would appear to me, Mr. Speaker, that Canada's foreign economic policy should be to support and encourage the principles involved in these European economic associations and seek to extend the application of these principles to Canada and the other North Atlantic countries, in order to strengthen our own economies in the North Atlantic area so as to be in a far better position to be able to help the newly independent countries stabilize their own economies.

It would be most unfortunate if Canada and other countries, particularly the underdeveloped countries, should look on the common market or the free trade area as discriminatory and inward looking when in fact both are laying the basis for freer trade on a world scale and at a time when the economic principles being experimented with in these organizations might be the only basis on which we can hope to achieve stability in world economics without having to sacrifice our economic and political ideologies.

One would have thought that the Minister of Finance would have been ready and eager to attend the recent meeting of the O.E.C.D. instead of going there backwards and reluctantly. One would have thought that he would have taken the lead in putting teeth into the O.E.C.D. so that it might have some chance of success in co-ordinating world economies, in achieving economic growth and employment in member countries and in contributing to the expansion of world trade on a multilateral non-discriminatory basis which, as we all know, are the aims of the O.E.C.D. These aims are excellent and timely but how can they be successfully achieved if the organization has no authority to carry out its objectives?

Surely we have learned the lesson at the United Nations, that the best aims and objectives, the best motives and intentions are useless without the authority for carrying them out. Admittedly, under the circumstances, it would have been difficult, if at all possible, for the United Nations to have been given the authority it needed to carry out its objectives.

However, this is not the situation among the member nations of O.E.C.D., most of whom belong either to the common market or the free trade area, and all of whom are desperately concerned and eager to contribute toward a more stable world economy and are at the same time dedicated to the preservation of our western ideologies.

Canada could and should have taken some initiative in trying to give O.E.C.D. the authority it must have if it is to co-ordinate the economies of its members and help the underdeveloped countries develop their economies.

Most of the economies of the underdeveloped countries, as hon. members know, are based on two or three basic products, on the stability of which depend the whole of their respective economies.

Canada and the western nations have contributed large sums of money to help these underdeveloped countries help themselves. Most of these countries have used this aid very judicially. However, the fact remains that any artificial fluctuations in the prices of these relatively few commodities means that the whole economic structure of these nations could be destroyed, and whatever aid may have been given them would be wasted.

We have examples in the past where the U.S.S.R. has tampered with the price of commodities, as she did with tin, aluminium and asbestos. We can expect that the U.S.S.R.

will continue to employ very questionable trade practices with the uncommitted countries for political purposes.

Canada could and should have tried to devise some method by which O.E.C.D. might have at least made these unacceptable trading methods less dangerous by making them public, if not protecting the underdeveloped nations or any other nation from these artificial price fluctuations or very questionable trading practices.

O.E.C.D. is not now in a position to cope with this problem among the others they face. My point is that Canada could and should give leadership in making O.E.C.D. a strong economic organization, western style, and, while adhering to the principle of democracy, establish a much needed unity, co-ordination and stability of the economy of the western world.

This is the type of role Canada could play in achieving world economic stability if this government had a real economic policy in relation to the rest of the world.

Mr. H. M. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, we have again seen quite a lot of action in this house today. I suggest first of all, sir, that the subsequent motion which the opposition moved in supply did not do them any more good than their performance heretofore.

They have chosen to come forward again with a grievance with regard to trade at a time when Canada's position in world trade never had a more active champion than the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees). They have chosen to come forward with this grievance at a time when our trade is at a level which we would like to see maintained at all times in Canada and which, unfortunately, throughout a great many years of Liberal rule was lost almost completely.

One of the first things about which the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) again rose and spouted was the British free trade offer. Unfortunately, for the last few minutes of his speech I was called out of the house and did not hear whether the Liberals accepted the British free trade offer. Do they believe in it? Would they have accepted it had they been in office? Does his industrial riding know that the British free trade offer was a manufacturing free trade offer only and had nothing to do with agricultural products?

Does the hon. member for Laurier have any idea about agricultural produce and how it is supported in England, in the outer seven or the inner six? I do not think he has; I do not think anybody in the Liberal party has any idea about trade or trading. They sold Canada's birthright. They sold it year after year. They gave it away to the British many years ago in the British wheat agreement. That was the time we in western Canada started to doubt these people. That was the time we started to believe they would tell us anything to become re-elected. Fortunately for them there was a war; there was Korea, and they maintained power.

However, this question of trade is only one of the means they have used to try to divide this country. They have got up on the rooftops and in this house and spouted their free trade doctrine. I defy any one of them to tell me what it is, because they do not know. It is a myth and a figment of their imagination. There is no such thing as free trade.

Ask our farmers about free trade. Ask them where they can buy, for instance, a diesel tractor manufactured in England, or even in the United States, at a lower price than we are paying in Canada, and which is selling in those countries at a lower price.

We have no duty against tractors, and yet we even take into consideration the question of freight rates. Can we in western Canada, or anywhere else in this country, buy a tractor from these countries at the retail price plus freight? This is free trade. We cannot do it. Of course we cannot, because the manufacture of these tractors is controlled by international companies. Then where does free trade come in?

What about the British free trade offer, this great figment of the Liberal imagination? Do the textile workers in my hon. friend's constituency think it would help them? Do the manufacturing and industrial workers in any of the industrial cities right across Canada think it will help them, with our smaller market? It would not help them at all.

Mr. Chevrier: What are you doing for the textile workers?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): We have done a great deal under the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, and if the hon. member will just bear with me a moment—

Mr. Chevrier: You put 35,000 of them out of jobs.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): —I will educate him a little with regard to subsidies. We in western Canada, Ontario and Quebec have a problem with regard to hogs. We have thought about this problem a great deal, even though my hon. friend may not have done so.

We want our farmers to be able to sell their produce at a reasonable price. A year or so ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton and the former minister, now the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness), persuaded the British to admit 25,000 tons of pork into England. I suggest to my hon. friend that he look at some of the English papers published at that time to see the reaction in the British House of Commons and in Britain itself, the very mother of the commonwealth, with regard to the importation of a little bit of pork from Canada.

What did these people say? They were up in arms about it. Why? Because they, too, wanted to produce a little bit of pork. What is the attitude of the British government toward their farmers? This is why their free trade offer was a manufacturing free trade offer, and this is something hon. members should remember.

The subsidies in Britain vary from year to year. Every agricultural product which is produced in Britain is subsidized, as it is in every other country in the outer seven. One of the greatest problems the countries in the inner six have had to face is the whole question of subsidy on agricultural produce.

Just for the record, in England the subsidy now paid on a bushel of wheat is seven shillings. I am sure my hon. friends can mentally convert that into dollars very quickly. The subsidy on oats and barley is five shillings to 15 shillings. The subsidy for plowing land and putting it into cultivation is seven per acre. One third of the cost of drainage and one third of the cost of fertilizer is subsidized. The subsidy for clearing old woodland and putting it into cultivation is 15 per acre. The subsidy is eight per head for calves that reach the age of six to nine months. Other subsidies are paid on eggs, other livestock and pork.

My hon. friend suggests we should have a free trade area with Great Britain. I suggest to him that he could not do anything which would more quickly throw a great mass of workers in Canada out of jobs.

I want to take up one other thing which is particularly important to the Liberal party. They are the great traders, so-called. As I have said before, they traded us—they traded us down the river. For years and years and years they came out to western Canada and said on platforms there what a great thing free trade was for the farmers of western Canada. Then they came down here and spoke in favour of protection. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has done the same thing even in the last few years. Out in the west he is a great free trader, saying: we have got to get rid of these tariffs. He did not say we must get rid of the subsidies, though it amounts to the same thing. But down here he said: we must increase the tariff on imported automobiles. This is the great Liberal line. I understand the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) criticized us severely because we did not increase tariffs enough to protect some of the industries in that area.

All we ask of industry in Canada is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been asking, namely that management and labour should get together with the designers to produce products which will show that Canada is not as stagnant as the Liberal party would like to make out, to show that we can produce these goods in Canada if we are given leadership by the government. I suggest we are getting that leadership now, and never before in our history has Canada had a trade minister with the vigour, the imagination and with the ability to go out and sell as we are honoured to have in Canada today. As I have said, we have listened over the years to the Liberal party and their bunch of nonsense. I am surprised that they should make any attempt to bring it up again.

Hon. members opposite like to talk about trade with Japan. We have, through negotiation and common ordinary horse trading, developed a better position in our trade with Japan than ever before in the history of this country. We sell to Japan grain and other basic raw materials that we never sold before. We are selling more than ever before; the gap between exports and imports has narrowed. We have done all these things and yet the opposition has the audacity to bring forward a grievance with regard to trade.

I turn now to a subject which is of particular interest to my home province, the question of oil and gas. We know the position of the Liberal party in this connection. They did not want to export any of it. They said: we have got to keep that at home. The hon. member for Laurier and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat talked about a great free trade area including the inner six, the United States, Canada and perhaps the outer seven. Can hon. members see what would happen to our oil industry in Alberta if that were to come about? As a matter of fact, the only thing which has kept our oil industry progressive and kept jobs available in Alberta today in the oil industry has been the policy of this government with regard to oil and gas. There has been no other reason for it, and I want to compliment the Minister of Trade and Commerce for going out to Calgary not long ago and setting it on the line again to the international oil companies. I do not know if those companies paid the Liberal party before, but they certainly had them in their pockets when they wrecked the entire oil industry of Alberta. Talk about trade. These people do not know the meaning of the term. We should like to see this country, where it is at all feasible, use the oil and gas produced in Alberta and Saskatchewan and in any other province that may have it. We commend the government for its oil policy and we commend the minister for having the courage to stand up and defend it and say it is going to be implemented if these international oil companies do not do what they should have done.

The question of gas is a similar one. How many people are working in Canada today because of the national energy board, because of the export of natural gas? We have these commodities which are in surplus in Canada, and hon. members opposite would have us join a free trade area controlled perhaps by their friends but certainly not controlled to the benefit of the people of Canada.

The hon. gentleman asks: what have you done? Well, we have increased our exports to the United Kingdom by somewhere in the neighbourhood of 16 per cent while our balance with the United States has remained relatively the same. In Ottawa itself we held a trade conference and put into operation a sales plan the like of which has never been seen here before under the leadership of a vigorous minister. I know the minister can be accused of all kinds of things in this regard. He can be accused of being theatrical. But for the first time in the history of this country we are doing something about trade. When gentlemen opposite say they know the meaning of the word, I say they do not.

As an example, only last year a retired farmer from Saskatchewan was instrumental in selling a million bushels of malting barley to Peru, a market that government officials had failed to contact. I have told the people of western Canada and suggested to the wheat pools out there, and in particular to the Saskatchewan wheat pool, which is rather vocal at times, in voicing some of its ideas, that if they spent half the money they spend campaigning against this government on getting out and selling some of the produce that they are handling in the markets of the world we should be a lot better off; and if the rest of the pools, the united grain growers and the other western organizations would show a greater concern about marketing their produce rather than depending on the government the export picture would look even better than it is. Here, of course, is where socialism falls down. Government people will never show the same enthusiasm for selling a product or take the same interest in doing this job. Again, if many people in private industry would take a lead from the Minister of Trade and Commerce and accept as their motto those initials which he has engraved on his cuff links we in western Canada in the farm areas would be a lot better off.

What else have we done? We have heard a lot of jeering and have been subjected to a lot of criticism with regard to the setting up of a productivity council. We have heard it is not going to be any good. We have heard you cannot take the best brains in the country and put them together and expect them to come up with anything. If we cannot control them, it is no good, our critics say. Perhaps this is the way they run their government but I am happy to be associated with a government which does not operate that way; a government with enough courage to take action with regard to setting up a productivity council to approach business, labour and representatives of agriculture and other forms of community endeavour in order to bring them together. We need something which will encourage us to lower our costs and which will help us to produce better so that we are more able to compete for world markets. We have been criticized for this by those people who think they know something about trade.

We have now on the order paper a bill sponsored by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in respect of a national design council. This is something of importance. We have a number of people in Canada today who are designing, inventing and producing new products who need leadership and help in getting these products into the right channels so that they can in turn help our over-all economic position. In spite of all these things the opposition maintain that we have done nothing.

I would also mention the baby budget, for which we have been criticized. I will have something more to say about the class or kind legislation but I want to say something in regard to my own constituency at this point.

The provisions of the baby budget in themselves have meant the difference between 400 men working, or not working, in my own constituency. These provisions made it possible for a pulp mill in my area to continue operating. In spite of that we have been told that we have done nothing.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member would be in order in discussing the budget at this time. That is a debate we have now completed.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Thank you, sir. I acknowledge the propriety of your suggestion in this regard.

Mr. Chevrier: He has been out of order for the last half hour.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): My hon. friend felt quite free to wander over the whole subject of trade and I therefore felt that I should be permitted a reasonable time to tell him what we are doing and what we have done.

With regard to the dominion bureau of statistics' booklets put out a few months ago, I might say that they contain some of the most valuable information available to members of parliament and other Canadians who are interested. These two books are coloured blue and yellow and it is the blue book which is of particular interest to me because it indicates the products which are imported into Canada and particularly agricultural products. Canadian citizens in western Canada feel that our country is an agricultural country, and very properly so as this is the basic industry upon which we depend. However, if one looks at this book regarding agricultural products brought into this country, it will be seen that they amounted to approximately $681 million; $38 million from the United Kingdom and $365 million from the United States. In spite of this we are told that we have done nothing by the implementation of a national policy on agriculture, by diversifying the production on our farms and by setting up policies through which we can at least keep the domestic market for our own farmers. Are they free traders? No, they are not. If you attempted to explain the term "free trade", you would have difficulty in many parts of Canada.

Referring to this dominion bureau of statistics' book in regard to animal products imported, one finds that something in the neighbourhood of $143 million has been imported, $18 million from the United Kingdom and $82 million from the United States.

We are an agricultural country and we pride ourselves in this and base our economy on agriculture, yet these people have suggested that we join a free trade area. They have not referred to agriculture primarily because they do not know anything about it. I must mention that we do have problems regarding trade in respect of some of our agricultural products. We have a problem in western Canada regarding our sheep industry. We would like to see the importation of lambs and mutton from Australia and New Zealand confined to that period when our own lamb and mutton is not available to the market. We have made some progress in this regard and hope to make more so that our own farmers will have the advantage of the domestic market in this regard in Canada.

We have heard talk about free trade this afternoon. I suggest that this free trade is only a figment of Liberal imagination, and I use that word with a capital "L". They have spouted this policy during the years, particularly in western Canada, with the assistance of a few particular newspapers which I think seriously gave their assistance for their own advantage and welfare rather than for the welfare of Canada as a whole. These hon. members suggest that we should have a free trade area with the United States. I would ask them how they propose to handle the wheat problem if they do have a free trade area. The United States has now a billion bushel surplus and at last count we had somewhere in the neighbourhood of between 500 and 700 million bushels surplus. Those hon. members suggest that they are going to solve this situation by having a free trade area. Perhaps they can solve the problem by giving the wheat away if they can find someone to take it. I would suggest somewhere along the line perhaps they will be willing to pay back to the farmers of western Canada the $600 million which they stole.

The things I have mentioned my hon. friends on the other side forget about when they start talking about trade. When the Prime Minister suggested we should try to divert 15 per cent of our trade from the United States to the United Kingdom he was speaking as a Canadian not representing western Canada but Canada as a whole. The hon. members for Laurier and Essex East spout at one moment for free traders but when they get back in their own ridings they then become high protection advocates. I am afraid that I am unable to follow that policy. I believe we must be good horse traders and am very proud that this government and particularly the Minister of Trade and Commerce, represent the best horse traders that I know.

Mr. J. W. Kucherepa (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to rise and participate in this debate today because during the past year it has been my privilege to have attended several meetings of the standing committee of the NATO parliamentarians conference in Europe, during which time this question of trade was discussed at great length.

Today we are dealing with a motion made by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). I will read this motion in order to bring it back into perspective. It is as follows:

> This house regrets the protectionist and inconsistent trade policies of the government and its failure to develop a long term foreign economic policy to enable Canada to participate fully in the challenging new opportunities in the field of international trade by implementing a vigorous program to promote the expansion of our secondary manufacturing industries and by encouraging the development of an Atlantic economic community.

I think perhaps it would be wise on my part to introduce at this point some background regarding this whole problem which has been raised by the opposition in the house today. I am referring to the convention on the organization for economic co-operation and development which was recently passed by this House of Commons. I will just quote from article 1 which reads as follows:

The aims of the organization for economic co-operation and development (hereinafter called the "organization") shall be to promote policy designed:

(a) to achieve the highest sustainable economic growth and employment and a rising standard of living in member countries, while maintaining financial stability and thus to contribute to the development of the world economy;

(b) to contribute to sound economic expansion in member as well as non-member countries in the process of economic development; and

(c) to contribute to the expansion of world trade on a multilateral, non-discriminatory basis in accordance with international obligations.

I am sure that all hon. members are aware of the fact that this new organization for economic organization and development is the successor of a former organization which was known as the organization for European economic co-operation, the so-called O.E.E.C.

As you know, sir, a committee of four wise men was set up to study the whole question of O.E.E.C. and what future changes might be made in that organization. The O.E.C.D. is the result of the study of the four wise men. The four wise men, of course, were Mr. Burgess, Mr. Clappier, Sir Paul Gore-Booth and Mr. Xenophon Zolotas. Ambassador Burgess of the United States was the chairman of this committee. They brought down their report in April, 1960. When one realizes that this report which was brought down by the four wise men was the precursor of this new organization whose convention we ratified, then there develops a kind of significance. I should like to quote from the report of the four wise men regarding matters of trade, and I shall attempt to correlate it with the amendment now before the house. I am quoting from page 27:

The aim of the O.E.E.C. was to restore the economy of its member countries and thus enable them to meet fully the trade and payments obligations arising from their undertakings in world organizations. Thus the O.E.E.C.'s first trade activities encouraged the development of trade primarily among its member countries, so as to complement the stimulus that American financial aid would be exerting on the European economy and reduce and even wipe out the dollar gap. Twelve years later, a high degree of success has been achieved in this direction—

I might mention that the original O.E.E.C. was set up in April of 1948. I continue:

Twelve years later, a high degree of success has been achieved in this direction: balance of payments difficulties have, in general, disappeared; external convertibility of the principal currencies has been restored; and the liberalization of trade in industrial products is almost complete. Furthermore, the liberalization of trade in Europe has played an important role in unshackling world trade.

Alleged Lack of Trade Policy

But since the O.E.E.C.'s activity in the field of trade was in pursuit of objectives now largely achieved, and since it operated in a context which is now superseded, one might conclude that the future organization should do nothing in this field and abandon all the rules and procedures evolved in the course of 12 years of European co-operation.

One might be tempted to do this at first sight, since active co-operation in the field of trade, limited to the 18 European members of the O.E.E.C., runs up against the well-known objections which led governments to give us our task on January 14. Furthermore, bearing in mind the GATT rules and the duties (of various orders) which the industrialized countries recognize towards the underdeveloped countries, trade co-operation in a group consisting of the United States, Canada and the 18 members of the O.E.E.C. would evoke similar objections.

Nevertheless, since commercial policy, as an element in general economic policy, will certainly be within the responsibility of the future organization, it is difficult to imagine that such a clear-cut answer would be acceptable. Nor, moreover, would it be opportune, since the initial objectives of the O.E.E.C. have not been fully achieved by all its members. On the other hand it should be publicly accepted that the trade activity of the future organization will be carried on according to the principles of the GATT.

In making reference to these remarks of the four wise men, I am going to point out something which apparently has not been too apparent in this house. The people who are today proposing a free trade area of the Atlantic economic community; that is to say, of the free western world as we know it, are the people who in the year 1948 did not see fit even to join as full members the organization which at that time was known as the O.E.E.C. At that time Canada and the United States were only associate members of this organization which in the years which followed developed such great success in the field of trade and in the recovery which took place in Europe. Today we are being asked to create a free trade area. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce who replied to the amendment today made it very clear that this was a switch in the thinking of members of the opposition.

The hon. member who spoke just prior to me made it very clear that there are men who speak for the opposition in this parliament who one day say one thing and another day say another thing because when this opportunity was presented to them when they were members of the government they rejected it; they did not become members of this great Atlantic community when they had an opportunity to do so. But they criticize the present government for not doing enough, although Canada has now become a full member of the organization for economic co-operation and development.

There is an impression about that by being part of an organization such as the Atlantic economic community, then suddenly all barriers will disappear and we shall have what

I might describe as an almost idealistic state of no tariff barriers whatsoever. I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that this is not so even today in the common market among the so-called inner six of Europe who are close to economic integration and, yes, I might even suggest there is some tendency toward political integration in this particular grouping; they have not eliminated all their tariff barriers. In fact, they are progressively taking action to bring about certain changes. On July 1, 1960, the first set of internal tariff reductions in the E.E.C., which is the inner six, and the first set of these for the E.F.T.A., which is the outer seven in Europe, came into operation. In each organization their internal customs duties were lowered by 20 per cent on the basic duty. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, sometimes when we listen to the debates in this house and we hear about these free trade offers we feel that there will be no tariffs, and all this criticism about protectionists and inconsistent trade policies of the government simply flows out of the window because it just does not make sense. For example, the Federal Republic of Germany, which is a member of the inner six, also has a lot of its trade outside of the grouping known as the inner six. I might say that a high proportion of its trade is with what we call the outer seven and it has lower tariffs than the others. Tariff reduction has been used on their part to curtail inflation in that country. Germany, which is a member of the inner six, is obliged to raise its tariffs from July 1, 1960, and again before December 1, 1960, in accordance with the proposals of the commission of the European community. Therefore, we see that this proposal for a free trade area is not as simple a proposition as it is being made out by the speakers who have spoken for the opposition.

We might refer to some of the problems which face the inner six and the outer seven in Europe. Perhaps we should not forget that in that so-called Atlantic community which we speak loosely of as the inner six and the outer seven there are other, as it were, forgotten countries of the western world such as Greece, Turkey, Spain, Ireland, Finland and Iceland.

Mr. Pickersgill: Finland has joined the free trade association.

Mr. Kucherepa: Yes, but not in a direct way. My hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate interrupts.

There have also been contacts with other countries in Europe but not as part of the structure as we understand it and as we know it. These changes have taken place in Europe. These blocs have been formed, the inner six and the outer seven and we find there are great difficulties in achieving further integration of the inner six and the outer seven.

Reference might be made here to the position of the United Kingdom in this regard. At the present time the United Kingdom does not adhere to the treaty of Rome for several reasons, two of which I think are of great importance. The first is, of course, the United Kingdom's connection with the commonwealth. Some people suggest that this is not a very important force but when one realizes the extent of the trade of the United Kingdom it then becomes another matter.

The commonwealth is the world's largest preferential trading organization. Sometimes some of the hon. members to my right do not seem to be aware of that. Its exports are about 19,000 million annually or over 25 per cent of total world exports excluding trade between members of the Soviet bloc. Its imports are more than 110 million and represent 30 per cent of world imports. One-quarter of the world's population lives in the commonwealth.

A high proportion of commonwealth trade is in primary commodities from underdeveloped countries, some of whom are wholly dependent upon the United Kingdom market. It is politically unthinkable for the United Kingdom to enter into any agreement with the Six which would have as its effect the ruin of even a small British colony or country. Such action would be the end of whatever influence the United Kingdom possesses as the motherland of the commonwealth.

These things are very significant, Mr. Speaker. The fact is that there are these great divisions among the nations of Europe and they have not been able to find common ground in the European field even though they were members of the organization for European co-operation for so many years. Even with the efforts of the organization for European economic co-operation, its success can be measured by the fact that two distinct trading blocs have developed.

From what I have observed in Europe I may say that despite all the efforts which have been made on both sides there does not seem to be thus far a coming together of the thinking of the leaders of the two blocs. There is no question that the inner bloc is a much more strongly integrated organization than the E.F.T.A. which is a rather loosely organized group. Nevertheless, there are the difficulties that arise primarily because of the position of the United Kingdom which out of deference to other members of the commonwealth will not sacrifice the preferential treatment it accords to them and vice versa.

The problem has been tackled by many of the leading lights of Europe in the field of economics but no conclusions have been reached yet. The commission of the European economic community is an organization headed by Professor Hallstein, a very distinguished European in the field of trade, and on March 28, 1960 he said in Strasbourg that it will be possible for the community—the inner six—to show good will toward all other GATT members by reducing the level of the common external tariff. He went on to say that such a move, if it were matched by reciprocal action, would "open the way, particularly in Europe, to tariff reductions which will take into account all the essential needs of European trade".

We hear talk about tariffs being wiped out lock, stock and barrel but this is not so. In the few minutes I have been speaking I think I have been able to demonstrate that even within that group which we know as the inner six there are tariff barriers which are applied on the part of those countries belonging to the inner six with respect to the members of the outer seven. In the case of some members of the inner six these tariffs are more lenient than in the case of others. In particular, I refer to the German system of tariffs which provides for lower tariffs so far as members of the outer seven are concerned than is the case with some of the other countries belonging to the inner six.

Members of the opposition have brought up the question of free trade in the Atlantic economic community. I think there is no question that when the minister replied to the charges of the opposition he made it very clear that on this continent we might suffer greatly if the type of program being put forward by those who sit on my right were implemented because we have problems of which Canadians are well aware. There is the problem of transportation. The hon. member who preceded me spoke about the problem of the cost of transporting various items from eastern Canada to western Canada. What would their suggestion mean to our economy? What would it mean to Canada's economy in general? I would think that the hon. member who moved the amendment and his supporters are suggesting something in which they themselves do not believe because, as I have gone to some trouble to point out, when they had the opportunity in 1948 to become a part of this Atlantic community—and we all admit it has had certain successful results—they rejected the idea. Yet they come into the house today and say that the present government, which was the first government to ratify the new O.E.C.D. convention, is not doing the thing which they themselves failed to do when they had the opportunity to do so in 1948 and which, if they had had the foresight to do so, would have meant that we would not have the problems in the field of trade that we face in Canada today.

We have a minister who works hard, who is selling as much as he can, who is promoting trade for Canada, and I am sure the people of Canada are grateful that such a minister is occupying this position today. The point I should like to make is that those who have introduced the amendment had an opportunity to do something in this field. They had a chance to become a full member of the Atlantic economic community and they rejected it. May I call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire from the house leader whether there is any change in the program for this week announced by his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, on Friday?

Mr. Churchill: There will be no change except possibly for Friday. I may have to name a different department so far as estimates are concerned and if so I will do it tomorrow night.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister indicate now what the department will be that he intends to call?

Mr. Churchill: No.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

BROADCASTING

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. G. C. Fairfield (Portage-Neepawa) presented the second report of the special committee on broadcasting and asked for unanimous consent to move that the report be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to move his motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, while I do not intend to oppose this motion in the circumstances which have arisen as a result of the decision of the house yesterday, I feel it is only right that it should be pointed out that the work of this very important committee is going to be very seriously interfered with by that decision.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF STEPS TOWARD SETTLEMENT

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the house that the co-chairmen of the Geneva conference have now reached agreement on the steps to be taken aimed at bringing about a settlement in Laos. Yesterday, April 24, the governments of the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union issued an appeal for an immediate cease fire and called on all military authorities, parties and organizations in Laos to stop fighting and to enter into negotiations about arrangements for the cease fire.

Simultaneously the co-chairmen sent a message to the Prime Minister of India stating that they had called for a cease fire and proposing that he convene the international supervisory commission for Laos in New Delhi. It was the view of the co-chairmen that the commission will, in the first instance —and I quote from their joint message of April 24——discuss the question of the tasks and functions which should be allotted to it after the cease fire in Laos, and will present an appropriate report to the co-chairmen who will consider the commission's report and give it directions on going to Laos to carry out the work of controlling the cease fire.

The co-chairmen have also agreed that an international conference should meet in Geneva on May 12 to discuss a settlement of the Laotian problem. The countries invited to this conference are those which attended the Geneva conference of 1954; the United Kingdom, the Soviet union, the United States, communist China, France, North Viet Nam, South Viet Nam, Cambodia and Laos; in addition, the members of the international supervisory commission, Canada, India and Poland; and two of the neighbouring countries, Thailand and Burma. All fourteen have been invited to send representatives. This membership follows that proposed by the chief of state of Cambodia, Prince Sihanouk, on January 1 of this year.

Yesterday morning I saw the ambassador of the Soviet union and the acting high commissioner for the United Kingdom, as representatives of the co-chairmen, and received from them the text of the invitation to the conference and a copy of the appeal for a cease-fire and of the message from Lord Home and Mr. Gromyko to Mr. Nehru. Last evening I received from Mr. Nehru a message requesting the government of Canada to nominate its representative on the commission and proposing that the first meeting of the commission should be held in New Delhi on Friday next, April 28.

I think the house will agree that the arrangements worked out between the co-chairmen, including the call for an immediate cease-fire to be effective before the international conference begins its work, constitute an important step toward the restoration of peace to Laos.

In response to the proposal that the commission should meet at once in New Delhi, I have named Mr. Leon Mayrand as Canadian member of the commission. Mr. Mayrand, who was our representative on the Laos commission in 1954-55, is at present our ambassador in Rome, and will be en route to New Delhi at the present time; at any rate. Mr. Mayrand will be assisted by Mr. d'Iberville Fortier of the Department of External Affairs, at present our representative on the commission in Cambodia, and by Brigadier P. S. Cooper of the Canadian army as senior military adviser, as well as by various other advisers.

Steps Towards Settlement in Laos

The Canadian government also accepts the invitation to attend the conference on Laos in Geneva. I expect to lead the Canadian delegation in the opening stages of the conference, which of course will follow almost immediately after the ministerial meeting of the North Atlantic council in Oslo which is scheduled to take place from May 8 to May 10 inclusive. The alternate head of the Canadian delegation to the conference will be Mr. C. A. Ronning, the Canadian high commissioner in India, whose long and distinguished service to Canada in Asia will be familiar to members of this house. He will be assisted by Mr. P. A. Bridle, our ambassador in Turkey, who was Canadian commissioner in Laos in 1955-56, and by civilian and military advisers with experience on the commissions.

By leave of the house Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the texts of the three documents, issued yesterday by the co-chairmen, and the text of the message from the prime minister of India, printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister the consent which he requests?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs is the first intervention in which the minister has been in a position to report progress regarding this regrettable situation in Laos. The proposal of the co-chairmen, the foreign ministers of the Soviet union and the United Kingdom, as communicated to Canada and other members of the international truce supervisory commission, is of a threefold character, I would gather from what the minister has said; first of all, there is an agreement on a cease-fire; second, steps taken in Delhi for reactivation of the international supervisory commission; and third, there is to be a conference originally proposed by Prince Sihanouk of Cambodia of the Geneva and other powers.

It will be recalled that Canada, as a member of the commission which was set up by the Geneva accord in 1954, took the position that the commission could not be reactivated in the absence of the consent of the royal government of Laos. The minister did not mention whether that permission has now been extended, but I assume it is now the case that the royal government has consented to having the commission reactivated and assuming responsibilities in Vientiane. The reactivation of the commission is something that has been proposed now for some time, notably by the country represented by the chairman of the commission, namely India.

The house was happy to be assured by the Secretary of State for External Affairs some months ago that if the commission had not been reactivated, notwithstanding reports to the contrary which emanated from India, the responsibility was not that of Canada. But this is not the place to engage in polemics; perhaps tomorrow further elucidation will be given by the minister as to this particular. The minister mentioned that the commission is going to have a preliminary meeting in New Delhi. I am sure he will agree that the record of achievement of this commission, particularly in Vientiane, more so perhaps than the commission in Viet Nam and Cambodia, has demonstrated its capacity for effectiveness in maintaining the peace.

The proposal for a conference of the Geneva and other powers does not come to the minister as a surprise because I think in January of this year he himself had proposed that this might be one of the ways of providing for a settlement of this very difficult situation in an area that is so vital to the peace of Asia and as a consequence to the peace of the world. The conference itself is now to have more participating nations than the conference of 1954. This time Canada is to be a full member along with Thailand and Burma, countries that certainly have a very direct interest in what evolves in that part of old Indo-China. In 1954 Canada was—

Mr. Green: And India and Poland.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —a member of the international supervisory commission, along with India and Poland. Canada was not formally a member of that portion of the Geneva conference in 1954 that dealt with Indo-China, but she was represented there by the present Leader of the Opposition in respect of matters that had particular bearing on Korea. It is of interest to know that Mr. Chester Ronning, our Indian high commissioner in India, who had experience at that conference, will be at this new conference to assist the minister in the very important deliberations that will now affect Canada and other nations vitally and directly. The presence of Mr. Leon Mayrand as our representative on the international supervisory commission likewise would seem to be a wise appointment, in the light of his experience in 1954 on the commission in Laos.

We can only hope, Mr. Speaker, that the agreement between the co-chairmen, now confirmed by the three countries on the supervisory commission, will help to restore peace in an area that affects not only India and the other countries of south and southeast Asia but all the nations of the world, particularly at this very difficult time when there has set in such a deterioration in international affairs. One can only hope that it is not too late to repair for that country and for the peace of the world, situations that have been allowed to evolve during the course of the last year when the interests of the west and of other nations concerned seemingly have been very seriously affected as a result of the fighting in Laos.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, while on occasions we differ from the minister, we know of his serious concern for those problems which face the world today. We notice that whenever he has an opportunity to announce some good news he does so with relish.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that, in view of recent events and the possibility surrounding them, we in this group were relieved and delighted to hear of the agreement that has been effected between Mr. Harold Macmillan of Great Britain and Mr. Khrushchev representing the U.S.S.R. Regardless of all the dark clouds surrounding us at this time, and the fears that arise on occasion, it does demonstrate what can be done when persons representing the western world in the right frame of mind, the right spirit and with the right purpose do what they can to reach agreement. In the opinion of this group this demonstrates the value of the type of persons in such negotiations who can keep their feet on the ground when everybody else is losing their balance.

We are very pleased to hear that Mr. Chester Ronning, our high commissioner in India, is going to be associated with this conference. His ability, his experience and his record are sufficient to indicate that his assistance and contribution to this conference will be to the credit of Canada and for the welfare of all concerned with restoring peace in this portion of the world.

FINANCE

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT—REVISION OF RATE STRUCTURE

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house briefly of the promulgation of an amendment to the gold bullion regulations pursuant to the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act, revising the rate structure charged by the Royal Canadian Mint and the Bank of Canada in respect of gold bullion operations. The new charges are being instituted following a cost and revenue analysis of gold bullion operations. The new rate structure represents the first revision of mint charges in 30 years.

Generally speaking, melting, assaying and refining charges are being increased and handling charges—that is charges for the marketing of the gold outside Canada by the Bank of Canada—packing and storing charges are being reduced. The new rates for assaying and refining are comparable to United States mint charges; the reduced rates for handling, packing and storing more closely represent the actual cost of the service provided. The net effect of the revision will generally represent some saving to gold producers, the exception being suppliers of low grade ores.

EXPERIMENTAL TAPE RECORDING OF PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the house—and I should first inform the house that I have already consulted the party leaders—I should like to ask for the approval of the house to carry out some experiments in reporting the proceedings of the house by using tape recording machines in conjunction with our sound amplification system. The purpose is to determine whether mechanical recording can usefully be used in combination with shorthand reporting, as is being done in some other jurisdictions, and to develop this information for the guidance of the committee on procedure and of the house itself. As I have said, nothing is contemplated other than experimental recordings. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to you by way of clarification or, if it is not possible to direct it to you, may I ask my question of the house leader.

The question is in connection with your announcement, Mr. Speaker, regarding the use of tape recorders in connection with Hansard proceedings. What, if any, steps are being taken to prevent the use of these tape recordings on radio or television, or is it the intention that they be used on these types of broadcasts?

Mr. Speaker: It is not proper for the Chair to accept questions, but I asked leave of the house to have experimental recordings made, and when I asked that leave I assured the house it would only be experimental and not for use.

AIR TRANSPORT

CABINET CONSIDERATION OF APPLICATIONS RESPECTING ROUTES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has a committee of cabinet been established to hear the representations of Trans-Canada Air Lines and Canadian Pacific Air Lines in connection with domestic and international routes?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman realizes full well, whatever committees have been set up by cabinet are not revealed in the house.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is the cabinet giving consideration to an application of this nature made by either of the two air lines I have mentioned?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is not for me to say what matters the cabinet is considering. If the cabinet gives consideration to these matters and arrives at a determination, then an announcement will be made.

Mr. Chevrier: May I then direct a question to the Minister of Transport, and ask him if it is the intention of the government to ask the air transport board to hold public hearings into the merits of these applications by C.P.A. or T.C.A., as the minister indicated in his speech to the air industries transport association in Quebec city in November.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when the cabinet has reached a decision on this matter that decision will be communicated to the house.

ELDORADO AVIATION LIMITED—REPORTED TAKING OVER BY PACIFIC WESTERN AIRLINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Has the Minister of Transport seen the press reports suggesting that the air services operated by Eldorado Aviation Limited may be taken over by Pacific Western Airlines without a public hearing? If so, can the minister advise whether a public hearing will be held in respect of any such change and, if so, where and when?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): This is strictly a matter for the air transport board. There will be a public hearing, but I am not in a position to say at what date.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALGERIA—EXPRESSION OF SUPPORT FOR FRANCE ON INSURRECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs would care to make any comment or give the house any information on the situation in Algeria, and in particular can the minister inform the house whether Canada has expressed to the government of France our sympathy and support at this difficult time?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government has viewed and still views with deep concern the military insurrection which is taking place in Algeria against the lawful government of France. I do not try to conceal from the house our anxiety over the gravity of the situation and the serious consequences it may have both in France and in Algeria. There is little doubt that the insurrection was primarily directed against President de Gaulle's liberal policy in Algeria.

I wish to take this opportunity of expressing the Canadian government's unabated support for President de Gaulle himself and for his Algerian policy. I do not think I should go any further at the present time.

CUBA—INQUIRY AS TO REPRESENTATIONS TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to the delicate situation in Cuba. My question arises out of many press reports to the effect that President Kennedy has been considering direct action with regard to Cuba. I am wondering whether Canada is prepared to make a statement in this general area, and has Canada made any representations of any kind to the United States?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member can take it for granted that President Kennedy did not have Canada in mind when he made that statement.

Mr. Argue: That answer does not refer at all to my question. My question concerned reports to the effect that President Kennedy might take direct action with regard to further intervention in Cuba; it was not in regard to Canada. I wonder whether the Canadian government has made any statement or representations to President Kennedy with regard to the situation in Cuba.

Mr. Green: As I told the hon. member the other day, we cannot come into the house and explain the various representations we make to the United States or any other countries, although representations are made from time to time to various countries. At the moment I would not care to go any further than that. However, the hon. member can rest assured that when the occasion seems to call for representations by Canada, such representations will be made.

Mr. Argue: But they have not been made—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Argue: This is just a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry; I cannot entertain another supplementary question in regard to this matter. The minister has made it clear that he does not propose to answer the question, for the reasons he gave.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Argue: I thought the minister implied that no representations had been made.

SPORTS

OLYMPIC GAMES—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and ask him whether, in view of the decision of the Canadian Olympic Association awarding the location of the winter Olympics to Banff, the government is in a position to endorse the recommendation of the Canadian Olympic association.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say I see no reason to disagree with the decision of the Canadian Olympic Association, which was made after very careful study of the report presented to them.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): May I ask a supplementary question. Is the minister in a position to announce any decision with respect to federal financial assistance in the development of the site?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PETAWAWA—VETERANS PREFERENCE IN CIVILIAN APPOINTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address an innocent question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister assure the house that the veterans preference is being observed in connection with the appointment of civilian staff at Camp Petawawa?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Civil Service Act provides for preference for veterans with overseas service in appointment to positions subject to the Civil Service Act. The Department of National Defence civilian personnel regulations extend the same preference to appointments to positions exempt from the Civil Service Act. The department is not aware of any departure from the relevant regulations in regard to appointments to the civilian staff at Camp Petawawa.

Mr. Herridge: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister consider that a veteran who had been decorated for bravery qualified for overseas service?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is well aware of what is involved in overseas service, as he has been a member of the veterans affairs committee of this house for the last 15 years whenever that committee has been sitting.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGED ANTI-AMERICAN CAMPAIGN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Tremblay (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Who has authorized the C.B.C. to lauch, these last few days, an intensive anti-American propaganda campaign over the government-owned radio and television network?

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I shall take this question as notice.

Mr. Tremblay: A supplementary question. Will the inquiries made by the minister about this matter only be a routine check meant to inform us of something that we already suspect, namely that the C.B.C. is in no way to blame?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY LABOUR MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (St. Henry): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Public Works. Le Devoir reports this morning a statement made yesterday by the minister to a delegation of unemployed to the effect that pick and shovel jobs are available for the asking. As there are in my riding thousands of unemployed anxious to work, can the minister tell us to whom they should apply and how many jobs are available?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the article referred to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAYS

REPORTED INTENTION TO CANCEL MONTREAL-QUEBEC CITY TRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware that the C.P.R. is planning to cancel its night train service between Montreal and Quebec starting May 15? Does the minister intend to approach the board of transport commissioners with a view to having that service maintained?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to refer my hon. friend's request to the C.P.R. management.

(Text):

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PATENT ACT—INQUIRY AS TO REVISION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the minister's statement to the house on April 4, 1960 to the effect that appropriate legislation with relation to patents would be introduced at the next session of parliament, is it still the intention of the government to introduce such legislation during the present session?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I must thank the hon. member who was kind enough to give me notice of his question. My answer is this. It is not the intention of the government to introduce a bill to revise the Patent Act at this session. The Ilsley commission's report on inventions was the last of three reports submitted by the commission, and we are still in the process of preparing recommendations for the possible revision of the legislation on copyrights and industrial designs.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

CAUSEWAY CONSTRUCTION, P.E.I.-N.B.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the Minister of Public Works how soon he expects to be in a position to make a return of the correspondence with the government of Prince Edward Island regarding the causeway, in view of the fact that he told us 11 days ago he had received the consent of the premier to table this correspondence in this house.

[Mr. Walker.]

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to embarrass my hon. friend, but I think that was filed at the end of last week.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister point out, in that case, why it is that the officials of the house seem to be unaware of the fact that the filing took place, as an inquiry was made just before the opening of the house. At the same time, may I ask the minister if he would seek to expedite this matter as soon as he has ceased giving out pick and shovel jobs.

TRADE

SOUTH AFRICA—REPORTED ASSURANCE OF MAINTENANCE OF ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he would care to comment on reports that he has given an assurance to the South African trade mission now in Canada that there will be no alteration in the existing preferential trade arrangements with that country once it leaves the commonwealth.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): That is correct.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, April 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Chevrier, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Regier.

TRADE—ALLEGED FAILURE TO PROMOTE SECONDARY INDUSTRIES

Mr. Kucherepa: Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned at ten o'clock last night I was discussing the ramifications of the problem which faces the countries of the inner six and the outer seven in Europe in coming together and creating a European economic community.

As I glanced over Hansard this morning I noticed that some statistical information which I gave to the house last night is not in accordance with the statement I made. This is relevant to the commonwealth and is to be found on page 3958, the righthand side, the fourteenth line. I shall quote the passage and correct the statistics which appear there improperly:

> The commonwealth is the world's largest preferential trading organization. Sometimes some of the hon. members to my right do not seem to be aware of that. Its exports are about—

The figure is represented here as "19,000 million annually"; it should be "£9,000 million annually". My statement continues:

—or over 25 per cent of total world exports excluding trade between members of the Soviet bloc. Its imports are more than—

It states "110 million" here; it should be "£10,000 million annually". The statement continues:

—and represent 30 per cent of world imports. One quarter of the world's population lives in the commonwealth.

At that time I alluded to the fact that there were several problems facing the countries of western Europe in trying to come to some conclusion with regard to an economic community. As far as the outer seven are concerned, of which the United Kingdom is the leading member, I pointed out there are two great problems which face the United Kingdom in arriving at an agreement with the inner six. First there is the fact that the U.K. is a member of the commonwealth, and the statement I have just quoted from yesterday's Hansard with the corrections presents one of the big reasons why the United Kingdom cannot at this time join with the inner six in forming a European economic community.

There is another important reason why the United Kingdom cannot join the inner six on the continent under present arrangements, and that is primarily because of the nature of the farming industry in the United Kingdom. In the United Kingdom, farmers are protected not by tariffs but by subsidies. Food enters the United Kingdom free of tariffs, and the price of food is thus about one fifth lower than it is in the countries of the inner six. The United Kingdom imports no less than half its food, so changes in the support policy would have far-reaching effects.

The amendment put forward on behalf of the C.C.F. seeks to place a comma after the amendment moved by the official opposition and to add the words:

to prevent a drastic loss of overseas markets for agricultural and other primary products.

At once it becomes apparent that the implications of this subamendment would be dangerous to the interests of the farming community of our country. For this reason no one who has the agricultural interests of the country at heart or who is concerned about the interests of our primary producers could, in the face of the facts which I enumerated at some length in the course of my remarks yesterday and today, support the subamendment which has been moved on behalf of the C.C.F. group, supported, of course, by the New party.

Alleged Lack of Trade Policy

Returning to the main amendment, I remind the house that it expresses regret at what it calls the protectionist and inconsistent trade policies of the government. I wonder what the mover of the amendment had in mind when he made use of the word "protectionist". Most hon. members will agree that the policies which are presently being followed, in so far as giving some protection to our industries is concerned, existed during the time the members of the Liberal party who today sit in opposition constituted or supported the government of this country. How can they at this point bring into this house the suggestion that these policies which we have continued, to some degree, are to be regretted? They are in effect condemning themselves for the action they have taken in the past.

I cannot agree with this part of the amendment at all, because what has been done in the past has proved itself to the extent that we have thousands of Canadians employed today in industries some of which have received the type of protection to which hon. members in the Liberal party allude as being undesirable. Our concern—and I am sure it is the concern of all Canadians—is not only to maintain but to increase the number of jobs available in Canada, and this has been achieved progressively over the years by the utilization of all the methods which governments can devise to attain this end.

Further, the amendment expresses regret at what it calls the inconsistent trade policies of the government. Well, the present government has marched forward in this field. There is no inconsistency in its trade policies. It has taken an important stride forward even during the present session, and I refer to the ratification of the O.E.C.D. convention, which makes us full members of the Atlantic economic community. As to the organization which preceded it, we were only associate members; we were not really a part of that community which evolved so successfully over the past 12 years, the final result, of course, being the development of the inner six and the outer seven.

Those countries which belonged to the O.E.E.C. have come a long way and are going even further, and our country has now become an equal member of this Atlantic community within the organization known as the O.E.C.D. I think this is one of the longest strides this country has taken in the field of trade and economics for many years, and for this reason I suggest that the part of the amendment which I have just quoted has no meaning whatsoever.

The government has also been accused of failing to develop long term foreign economic policies. I do not know what the mover of the amendment had in mind when he made that statement, because it is somewhat ambiguous. Canada is a great trading nation; our export trade is most important, and I do not think any minister of trade and commerce has exerted himself more in developing this trade than the minister who now holds that portfolio.

Further on the amendment refers to a vigorous program to promote an expansion of our secondary manufacturing industries, and to encouraging the development of the Atlantic economic community. All I can say is that the mover of this amendment was a member of the former Liberal regime which held office for some 22 years, and I think the people of Canada, on reflection, will well remember the policies pursued by that government with regard to the development of our secondary industries. I do not think I need say any more in that regard.

I have spoken at some length about the development of the Atlantic economic community. This government, as I have said before, has gone a long way in participating in the economic development of the western world. We have now gone as far as any other country in the Atlantic world, by which I mean western Europe and North America. No other country has gone further. Having been associate members of O.E.E.C. we are now full members of O.E.C.D., an organization in which the countries of western Europe and North America are placing great hope.

Therefore, in view of the arguments I made last night and those I have added today I do not think it is possible for me to support either the amendment moved by the hon. member for Laurier or the subamendment put forward on behalf of the C.C.F. party.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Speaking on this amendment I do not wish, at least at this stage, to go into the arguments raised by the hon. member who has just preceded me, except to say this in regard to his last remarks during which he said the record of the Liberal administration would speak for itself. Well, we are very content to let the record stand, and it will show that during that period secondary industries developed spectacularly in this country under the great industrial leadership of Right Hon. C. D. Howe, and developed without the sacrifice of our export industries, which increased steadily and continually during that period. If the record of the present government were comparable in any respect to that we would not be supporting this amendment today.

[Mr. Kucherepa.]

This amendment speaks for itself, and the attitude taken toward it by spokesmen on the government side speaks for itself. That attitude, as taken in this debate, makes it quite clear that the government will have nothing to do with the development of what is referred to in this amendment as an Atlantic economic community, which is the hope of the future for the Atlantic countries; an Atlantic economic community with a minimum of obstructions and restrictions and a maximum of exchange among its members.

This is a serious amendment dealing with a very important and serious subject. Unfortunately, for reasons which the minister will appreciate, I was not in the house yesterday to listen to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I might have been in the house Monday of last week to listen to him but he could not have been here then, so we made a mutually agreeable arrangement, or I believe it was mutually agreeable.

Mr. Chevrier: You missed a flamboyant speech.

Mr. Pearson: I have had the privilege, although some would consider it a dubious one, of reading the minister's speech. In so far as it seemed to be concerned with a carefully thought out argument and memorandum on certain trade matters it was perhaps not unimpressive, even though we may not have agreed with it; but when the minister got out on his own, out of the field of trade and into polemics he was not very impressive. He indicated that this particular amendment was designed, if it had any purpose at all, to lay down a policy which would provide for jobs, as he put it, in Birmingham, Turin, Toledo and Detroit, at the expense of jobs in Canada. The producers of newsprint, lumber and agricultural products, and of fish and other primary products, know perfectly well, as the minister ought to know, that if there are not jobs in Turin, Birmingham, Detroit and Toledo there will not be jobs in Canada.

Embodied in this amendment is the policy of having jobs both abroad and in Canada; we will have more jobs in Canada because there are jobs and purchasing power abroad. The minister himself, who sometimes speaks from both sides of his mouth on this matter in a manner which I know he will forgive me if I characterize as rather immature and unsophisticated, said in this house as late as April 18, quoting from a speech he made in Toronto on February 7, 1961:

> Some people say the government should give greater protection to industry by raising tariffs against imports. Those who make this suggestion should realize that those against whom they would have us raise tariffs are also our customers for the exports on which we rely so heavily for our economic well-being.

Whether they are in Turin, Birmingham, Toledo or Detroit they are also our customers for exports on which we rely so heavily for our economic well-being. The minister also said in the same speech:

They must also realize that one out of every four Canadians is employed in either producing for, or shipping to, the export market.

One out of every four Canadians, according to the minister, is employed in either producing for or shipping to the export market. The minister said yesterday that the policy of his government is full employment. If that is it, then they have failed to carry out that policy when there are 705,000 or more unemployed. If full employment is the policy of the government it will not be accomplished by rejecting motions for the removal of obstructions to trade and encouragement of the expansion of trade because, as the minister puts it, one out of every four people in this country depends on exports for his livelihood.

Then the minister descended from what I have characterized as immaturity to what I can only characterize, and I know he will understand if I try to find another word to describe that which is even more superficial than immature, as drivel, when he had the following to say, as reported at page 3949 of Hansard for April 24, 1961:

They—

That is the Liberal party.

—want them—

That is the foreigners on whom we are relying for exports.

—to pour cheap goods into Canada to put Canadians out of work and to have mass unemployment, so that they can go to the people at the next election and say "Elect us and we will save you from your doom".

That statement of the purposes and motives of the Liberal party is what I characterize in this particular argument as drivel; which, of course, is what it is.

This particular amendment deals primarily with external trade. I intend to consider certain aspects of the amendment, some of which were discussed by the hon. gentleman who preceded me. I refer to those aspects which concern the possibilities of meeting some of our external trade problems in the world in which we live today by building up, as the only satisfactory solution to these problems, however it may be misunderstood or mischaracterized by hon. gentlemen opposite, an Atlantic trade area with maximum trade and minimum restrictions.

Alleged Lack of Trade Policy

The situation has changed drastically in the world, in our country and on this continent since 1911, the days of reciprocity, to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce seems to relate our policies of today on external trade. That is an indication of how unable or unwilling he has been to grasp and understand what we are putting forward. It would be very wrong, unwise and indeed harmful for us to think in this country of trade problems, trade opportunities and trade circumstances in the light of 1911. Trade barriers, trade obstructions and indeed the whole concept of free trade itself should not be thought of in terms of 50 years ago, when tariffs were about the only thing that really mattered in this field.

The situation is very different now. Since those relatively simple days of external trade there have been growing up over the years government monopolies on trade, government control, government quotas, exchange reductions, exchange regulations, control by administrative regulations, and control by deals within integrated international corporations. All these things, or indeed any one or two of them, could be as important today to trade, if not at times more important, than tariff levels themselves.

Since world war II considerable progress has been made in removing some of those obstructions. As the minister knows, they have been gradually removed as Europe recovered from world war II and was able to stand on its feet and look after itself in the realm of international trade. This removal was pretty steady and satisfactory in Europe over the years so far as it went. As a consequence our trade with Europe has increased.

Let us not forget that this removal was largely due to help received from overseas. In terms of income no country, not even the United States, supplied as great an amount of help for that purpose, for an enlightened self-interest purpose, as Canada itself. Our record is very good in this field, as I would point out to the hon. gentleman who just preceded me. This is true of our record both in regard to trade, in regard to tariff policy itself, and in regard to association with O.E.E.C.

We were criticized a few moments ago because in 1948, when O.E.E.C. was set up, we did not take advantage of the opportunity to join it and it remained for the present government to convert O.E.E.C. into O.E.C.D.; then to become a full member. If my hon. friend who was dealing with this matter had done more research he would have known perfectly well that in 1948 it was quite impossible for Canada to become a member of a strictly European organization and which we desired at that time to remain a European organization. It was only after Europe recovered over the years and got a stronger foundation for its economy that it was possible to convert it into the organization we have today.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And the United States was not a member.

Mr. Pearson: And, of course, the United States was not a member at that time. We both were observers during those years. If an offer had been made—and certainly suggestions were made during those years—of full membership it would not have been possible to accept it.

There has been progress on this international front but that progress has been, I think, if not slowing down in recent years, replaced by the development in the world of regional organizations. We know all about them. We talk a good deal about them in this house. Of course the most important of those regional developments is one that we sometimes think of only in terms of politics. The most important is the communist ideological and trade region which is centrally controlled and directed from Moscow at this time, with perhaps some assistance or competition from Peking. There is central control of trade within this bloc. This is one of the reasons we should be more interested now than ever in an Atlantic trading community. Control of trade within this communist bloc is exercised for the benefit of the Soviet union. If any member in this house wants some interesting information on this score let him read the history of Yugoslavia during the period when Yugoslavia was trying to break away from the international communist trading bloc.

Control of competition within the bloc is exercised by Moscow as well as control of communist penetration in noncommunist countries. This is done as much for political as for economic reasons. Indeed, this whole question is a sector of the cold war. If the communist regional trading bloc wishes to send MIG's to Cuba they will accept sugar for those aircraft, but only on their own terms; and those terms will be dictated, when it is necessary, by political rather than economic considerations.

Well, this is one trading bloc we have to take into consideration when we consider this subject. Others are the trading blocs growing up in Latin America, especially in the Central American region. These may be more important in the future than they are at the present time. But what we have in our minds, particularly when we talk about trading blocs, is European trading blocs. They have been referred to previously in this debate.

Ten years ago the European common market was considered a quite unrealistic dream. It is now a going concern, a reality, and it is making startling progress to the point where all trade obstructions will soon be removed, every kind of trade obstruction, among the members of this community. This is being done in a very successful way, partly —and this has a very important bearing on our own problem and the problem of the Atlantic trading development—because it is being done gradually stage by stage. European development is facing exactly the same kind of problem that we would be facing in this country and in other countries of the Atlantic area if we were trying to build up an Atlantic economic community. Five or six years ago some of these problems were considered almost insoluble by the members of the European economic community. I am thinking of the preferential arrangements for overseas suppliers, and of the problem of agricultural imports both within the community and between the countries of the community and outside. I am thinking of capital development programs and the necessity for adjusting special situations to the reduction and the removal of tariffs.

The European countries faced those problems. They were certainly problems. Their difficulties were just as great and just as far reaching as the problems we would be facing in the Atlantic community if we had initiated and were successful in bringing about that wider kind of development. The European countries have been successful up to the present. They are taking their time; it is a 10 or 15 year process. In the period that has elapsed since they began this process the trade increases within the boundaries of the countries inside that community have been absolutely spectacular.

We should not forget also that in this development, up to the present at least, consideration has been shown to the interests of countries outside the community. In spite of some statements by ministers about the dangers from this development, it would seem that those dangers have been taken into consideration by the members of the European community themselves. If we do a little less preaching and a little less whining and make an effort to adjust ourselves and associate ourselves with this development, we shall get further in regard to protection of our own trade.

In that regard I am thinking, for instance, of the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in Paris. This was his entry into the international economic lists as Minister of Trade and Commerce. He went to Paris last December and he is reported as having said, in regard to this development which I have just talked about, namely the European common market:

> Unless the European common market substantially reduces its announced tariff schedules affecting imports from Canada at the GATT negotiations in progress in Geneva, Canada will retaliate by increasing its barriers against imports from the six European countries.

Could there have possibly been a more untimely and unwise statement; that unless the European economic community reduced its tariffs against Canadian imports, Canada would retaliate? Well, the European economic community did not fall for that kind of bluff, as we know. But up to the present at least it has taken into consideration the interest of outside countries. Indeed, the first tariff reduction inside the community was extended to all outside countries.

This development of the European economic community which is of such great importance to us that it has been paralleled by the development of the European free trade area. All those other European countries which had not been willing or able to join the common market have formed a free trade area of their own, and in that regional association we have our most important customer next to the United States, namely the United Kingdom. But the United Kingdom in the free trade area has made it quite clear and there is no use of our whining or preaching about it, that it is going to move across the channel and, if it can, make arangements for association with the European common market.

It is very important, of course, for Canada to protect her position to the maximum possible extent in the face of these developments. Naturally we have to do that. Naturally we have to take every step we can to persuade the European countries that this coming together, which is desirable, should be on a basis of expanding trade with the outside world rather than restricting trade. But surely we can do that, as I hope to point out, by adopting a positive rather than that negative kind of attitude which has been adopted more than once by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Chevrier: Particularly by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pearson: The speech of the Minister of Finance at Ste. Adele is the one that is always very much not only in our minds but in the minds of commentators on this continent and in Europe. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the positive approach to this problem is that the closer Europe gets together politically and economically the better it will be for the free world, including Canada. This can be done, Mr. Speaker, and I hope it will be done, by the European countries without disregarding the interests of their friends or their own wider interests. I am thinking, of course, particularly of our commonwealth of nations.

This common market, scoffed at as a Utopian dream 10 years ago, is now, as I said, a growing concern, and the members of the European free trade area are increasingly moving toward integration with it. That trend is now clear, and no words by members of the government inside or outside the house, in Paris or Ste. Adele, are likely to stop that trend.

Mr. Macmillan made this perfectly clear during his recent visit to Ottawa and Washington, just as the United Kingdom lord privy seal, Mr. Heath, made it clear two or three months ago, I believe, in Geneva. The United Kingdom is moving across the channel and seeking a basis for membership in the common market. It now feels, according to its spokesmen, that for this purpose satisfactory solutions can be found for the three important problems standing in the way; and if they can be found for these problems affecting the United Kingdom, solutions can also be found in the wider area of Atlantic trade for the problems affecting the United States and ourselves. These three important problems are commonwealth preferences, agricultural imports and political sovereignty.

Canada, the Canadian government, in fact any Canadian government, should face this fact and face it as an opportunity to be exploited rather than a menace to be prevented or a development to be complained about. Certainly the President of the United States has faced it and has accepted the development. He said on February 16 that he welcomed the move, and I quote from his statement at that time:

> We shall support and encourage the movement toward European integration.

Then he added these important words with reference to European integration:

> It can contribute greatly to meeting the goals of the broader Atlantic community.

Indeed, our own Prime Minister in earlier days has talked along these lines of the development of the broader Atlantic community. The vice president of the United States, in a very carefully prepared and considered statement in Paris on April 6, had this to say:

> If that cohesion and capacity—

Of the Atlantic coalition.

> —is to be enhanced, vigorous measures will be required in the political, military and economic fields. Our end goal . . . should be a true Atlantic community in which common institutions will increasingly be developed to meet common problems.

Alleged Lack of Trade Policy

The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom in his recent visit confirmed that this is the position of the United Kingdom also, when he said at Boston:

> I have no doubt of what our aim should be. We ought to try to work for the largest area of free trade that we can create.

This is the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. He went on to say:

> Free trade for a free world. That may still be a vision. It may be a long time before it can take practical shape ... Yet many new and vital ideas are now being discussed by practical men which a few years ago would have been dismissed as impractical dreams.

Then he went on to say that one "new and vital" idea he had in mind was an Atlantic trading area. He invited Canada, the commonwealth and the United States to assist and encourage, rather than to shy away from and discourage, that development. The lord privy seal in his speech last February was even more specific in a special point which is always brought up by those who are hesitant about or opposed to this development. They talk about commonwealth preferences, and we know the importance of commonwealth preferences in our development over the years. But we also know that commonwealth preferences are a very different thing now from what they were 15, 20 or 25 years ago. Certainly that is the way they are now conconsidered in the United Kingdom. I know that the Minister of Finance has expressed some very strong views about the retention of commonwealth preferences, but this is what the lord privy seal of the United Kingdom said about them on February 27 last:

> Britain would have no objection to a reduction of the preferences that her exports enjoy in commonwealth markets if the Six wanted to start negotiations with the commonwealth to that end.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that Canada should be in the very forefront in starting such negotiations rather than hindering them. We should encourage European economic as well as political integration on a basis of expanded, not restricted, trade, and then we should do everything we can to convert that European economic community into an Atlantic trading area with which, stage by stage, other free countries could be associated.

There are only four courses open to us, Mr. Speaker. I have already put them on the record of the House of Commons, and I hope the house will forgive me if I put them on the record very briefly again today, because they have certainly been pointed up by developments since I last spoke on the subject.

The first of these policies is to work for the maximum of economic self-sufficiency, that is economic nationalism, the kind of economic nationalism we had from 1930 to 1935 under the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. This might have some tempting short run attractions, especially in a time of recession. In spite of the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce it seems to have some tempting short run attractions for him, when he talks about creating jobs for people in Turin and not for people in Canada. Presumably we should take action which would prevent those people obtaining jobs, so there can be more jobs in Canada.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the lessons of contemporary history and contemporary politics show that you cannot export unemployment in that way. When we have 705,000 men out of work at this time perhaps it is tempting to say, "Let us keep these goods out and we will put all these people to work". But that is running counter to the whole trend and development of contemporary international economic policy. We know now or we ought to know that we cannot export unemployment in this way, and that if we try to do so we will add to unemployment instead of reducing it. That is why we on this side are opposed to that solution. There is no salvation here.

The second possible alternative policy is economic integration with the United States in a continental free trade area. That was well put forward not very long ago in Toronto by a very distinguished American, Mr. McElroy, a man with a great deal of governmental and business experience. It may be, although I hope it will not be, that under certain circumstances we will be forced to consider that solution. If there is, and I hope there will never be, economic disintegration within the commonwealth; or if the European countries come together in a European area which excludes us or from which we on this continent have excluded ourselves, and if the procedures under GATT begin to slow down and eventually break up, then we will be forced to consider continental solutions to our problems.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, that should be a last resort for one reason especially, namely how could we keep our separate political identity in such a situation? When the Minister of Trade and Commerce says, as he said in this house yesterday, that the proposal we are putting forward in this amendment and the proposals we have put forward outside this house—he quoted me in that connection—mean that we are supporting free trade or a commercial union with the United States, he shows he has no understanding whatever of what we mean when we talk about the development of an Atlantic economic community. This has no bearing whatever on 1911 or reciprocity. I suggest the minister do a little reading and thinking on this subject. Perhaps if he would not spend so much time cheerleading and shouting slogans he might retire for a change, as it has been put, into the lonely recesses of thought.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And contemplation.

Mr. Pearson: Contemplation might be a little bit too much to expect.

Now, the third alternative is a policy of continued reliance on GATT as the international agency for broadening the area of freer trade throughout the world. As I have said, since the war GATT has undoubtedly been the major agency for the reduction of obstructions to trade. I think the previous Canadian government and the present Canadian government have done everything possible to continue that process under GATT. I think Canada has played a very good part in GATT. However, we cannot help but ask ourselves whether GATT can do much more in this direction, and whether we should not, at least as something complementary to GATT rather than opposed to GATT, take a hard look at regional development. Perhaps the current discussions which I believe open next week on GATT, in which the European common market will take part, will give us the answer to the question of whether GATT is the agency on which we have to rely for further real progress in this international economic field. In my view a new impetus is now required, and that can be given without contradiction to GATT by the Atlantic countries themselves.

This, Mr. Speaker, brings me to the fourth and best alternative. I refer to the careful, steady, stage by stage building up of an Atlantic economic community. This is not going to be done in a week or a month or a year. It is going to take a long time. During the process of development the same steps will have to be taken to protect industries that are immediately affected by these developments as are being taken successfully in Europe today in respect of industries which have been affected by the European common market. This can be done, and it should be done, over a period of five, 10 or 15 years. This process of adjustment can take place and the government, by its action and by its assistance, can participate in that program so that international economic progress will not be at the expense, in so far as it can be avoided, of individual national industries. This is what I mean, what we mean on this side, when we advocate the development of an Atlantic trading community.

I know all the difficulties in the way. I have mentioned them many times in this house. But I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that there is any other solution to our international economic and perhaps our international political difficulties. There is no solution which will be big enough and deep enough other than the one I have just mentioned. The important thing now is to get this process started.

This is a matter of political will more than economic argument. This government had a wonderful opportunity to begin that process in 1957 when the United Kingdom made an offer of free trade between the two countries, about which we used to hear so much and about which there has been a great deal of silence lately. Even as late as 1958 the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom said, while in this country, that offer was still on the table. It is not on the table any longer; it has been brushed under the rug.

But that was the time when we in this country could have started this process. We could have said to the United Kingdom that immediate free trade between ourselves is impractical and free trade among the Atlantic countries at the present time is impractical, but the two of us can start at once to discuss the building up of an Atlantic free trade community in association with those regional developments which are now taking place in Europe.

Who knows, Mr. Speaker, what might have happened during the intervening three years if that had been the stand taken by the goverment at that time? It is not too late now, but it may soon be too late if the European common market completes its development, and the introduction into it of the European free trade area is successful. It may be too late to bring about conditions for a wider common market if no action is taken on this side of the Atlantic. We on this side, even at this stage, ask the government of this country to take an initiative in this regard and show some of the vision now about which they talked so much three or four years ago.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, those who have been in the house this afternoon have listened to a repeat performance of the speech delivered yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition in Toronto. I think we will agree it has not improved with repetition. However, those who sat in the house yesterday to hear the speech of the hon. member for Laurier in introducing his amendment heard a speech which has few equals in the house as a compound of misrepresentation and distortion of the government's position and record.

If the opposition wishes to put forward a policy and wishes to praise the policy it puts forward, no one can take exception to that course, although we will reserve the right to reply to it. Evidently, however, it is necessary, when the hon. member for Laurier puts forward a position on behalf of the official opposition, to take account of the weaknesses and frailties of the case he is putting forward, because he grossly misrepresented and distorted the government's position and its record. He put up straw men yesterday, Mr. Speaker, which bore no resemblance to the government's positions; and he proceeded then, following typical Liberal tactics, to talk out of both sides of his mouth at the same time and to utter contradictory statements.

In so far as there is time today I shall endeavour to put the facts concerning the government's record and the government's position before the house in contradistinction to what the hon. member for Laurier put forward yesterday. I shall deal with the subject discussed by the Leader of the Opposition, and I shall measure what these hon. gentlemen have said against the record of the Liberal party in this regard.

The amendment, Mr. Speaker, invites the house to express condemnation of the government because it says the government has not followed a consistent policy. Mr. Speaker, I say to you that the government has followed, in relation to trade and our international financial policies, a vigorous, dynamic, consistent, forward-looking, balanced program of action.

The amendment does violence to the truth. I endeavoured to state the aims of the policy of the government in relation to trade in 1958 in the first budget speech, and I put it in these terms:

> First, to achieve expansion, diversification, better balance and greater stability in our trade with all countries.
> Second, to extend and strengthen Canada's trade and economic relations with the commonwealth.
> Third, to support and promote a regime of law, order and morality in the field of international trade; to respect the spirit and intent of international commitments and to stand ready to defend our rights and interests if they are challenged or ignored.
> Fourth, to recognize the legitimate needs of Canadian procedures; and to safeguard them against unfair trading practices.
> Fifth, to promote the balanced growth of all sectors of Canadian industry and agriculture.

That was the declared policy of this government in 1958. That is the declared policy of this government today, and it is a policy that the government has consistently followed throughout.

In keeping with this policy we have endeavoured to assist Canadian exporters to extend their markets and win new markets abroad. Gratifying successes have been gained in our efforts to secure the elimination of discriminatory trade barriers erected against imports from dollar countries after the war, and in promoting the convertibility of sterling and other major world currencies. Within the past two and a half years sterling and other European currencies became convertible and the great majority of discriminatory restrictions against dollar imports have been eliminated. Canadian exporters are now finding readier access to world markets than at any time since the war. To these highly beneficial developments I say that the efforts and the policies of the present government have made an effective and commendable contribution.

Let us think back to 1957 and the situation to which this government fell heir when hon. gentlemen opposite and a good many others left the treasury benches for all time. First, Canada in those days had an adverse balance of trade on commodity account of nearly $1 billion. In 1960 that adverse balance had been reduced to $100 million. Today we have a better balance and a better diversification in our markets throughout the world. These are substantial improvements.

Our trade with the United Kingdom has increased very materially. Our trade with the commonwealth has increased; our trade with Japan has increased. Those restrictions which had been imposed in the war and post-war years by many countries for balance of payments reasons we did our best, by persuasion and in conferences immediately after we came into office, to remove. Substantial progress has been made in that regard and very great consequent advantages to Canadian exporters have been achieved.

The international monetary fund was in existence, but with general support on the part of member countries, including strong support from Canada, the resources of that beneficent institution have been substantially enlarged.

The same is true of the resources of the international bank for reconstruction and development. An international development agency has been born out of the international bank for reconstruction and development, with a capital of $1 billion. This is an institution to which Canada gave important support in the international proceedings which preceded its birth.

As to GATT, this organization has unquestionably been strengthened by the support that has been given to it in the four years since the change of government.

In relation to the customs tariff of this country, studies have continued and adjustments have been made in it following references to the tariff board, in all cases in accordance with the letter as well as the spirit of GATT.

There have been many conferences designed to promote an expansion of trade. There have been conferences within the commonwealth. The first of them was held here in Canada at the end of September, 1957. This was the first time the finance ministers of the commonwealth had met in Canada, and important decisions flowed from that conference.

The monumental commonwealth trade and economic conference held in Montreal in October, 1958, achieved a large measure of agreement among all the commonwealth countries, notwithstanding the diversity of their interests. That, I think, was an eye-opener to the whole world.

It has since been followed by very beneficial results throughout the commonwealth. The system of commonwealth preferences has been upheld and the benefits that Canada enjoys in that regard—for which much is owed to the foresight of the late R. B. Bennett —have been strengthened and Canadian producers have enjoyed those benefits.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we come to more recent events. We have had many conferences with the United States. There have been bilateral conferences at which problems in the trade and economic field have been discussed in a spirit of mutual understanding. Benefits have flowed from those meetings.

Then there is the organization for economic co-operation and development which was born in 1960 out of O.E.E.C. There was no point in the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) in which he did greater violence to the truth, unless it was the speech made yesterday evening by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) which so completely misrepresented the position of this government in relation to O.E.C.D. If there is any government among the 20 member nations of O.E.C.D. that played a strong supporting role in bringing about the transformation of O.E.E.C. into O.E.C.D., it is the present government of Canada.

There were no such things as export credit institutions when we came into office. There are now facilities available to Canadian exporters of capital goods to find credit in Canada to assist in their export operations. Never before in Canada's history had there been an export conference like the one called by my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees), last autumn. This was something new; this was breaking new ground. Evidently it had never occurred to those who today occupy the front opposition benches yonder.

Behind the effort to maintain and extend Canada's markets there has been invested more drive and more vigour under the present government than ever existed previously. Benefits have accrued to all Canadian producers and exporters.

When we came into office the premium on the Canadian dollar in that summer of 1957 rose to six cents, and this placed a very heavy burden upon Canadian exporters. It is a very difficult problem; it is a hard thing to move; but we have done our best and we are not at all displeased that this premium has now been reduced to about one cent, with very great consequent advantage to Canadian exporters.

Hon. members opposite talk about flexibility. Well, they did not show much flexibility except in the way they handled the truth in this debate. We have shown at all times a consistent and dynamic approach to trade questions and a full realization of the importance of maintaining and expanding Canada's markets abroad.

This is not simply a short range policy; this is our continuing, consistent and long range policy. We have pursued it diligently and consistently. We have always shown ourselves ready to talk trade. There have been many bilateral discussions. There have been many missions. These have all had as their objective, and many of them have resulted in, the maintenance and expansion of trade.

We heard something said yesterday about GATT. We heard some very distorted remarks about GATT. I have said in previous debates —and I shall not delay this debate to repeat such remarks today—that this government has given consistent support, not merely to the institution of GATT, not simply to the terms of the GATT agreement, but to the spirit of GATT.

We have observed that at all times it is a great mistake to think that GATT is an inflexible instrument. It is not. GATT could not have survived if it had been utterly inflexible. GATT does make provision for amendment; it does make provision for the fact that circumstances may change in a dynamic world trading community, and it makes provision for changes according to certain procedures. Where such changes have been sought by the Canadian government they have at all times been sought in accordance with the procedures laid down in GATT. Never has there been a departure from the provisions of GATT. As to all the proposals we have submitted to the house in three annual budgets in relation to tariff changes, most of these have been preceded by very thorough investigation and study on references to the tariff board. So let us have an end to this nonsense about casting doubt, as the hon. member for Laurier did yesterday, on the sincerity of members of the government in their support of GATT.

Alleged Lack of Trade Policy

The principle of GATT is the principle of multilateral trade which seems to have lost its interest for the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). The Liberal party now is evidently turning its back—it has at least turned its shoulder—against GATT. It has lost interest. Let me tell the Leader of the Opposition that it was the present Canadian government, through its representatives, which insisted at the discussions in Paris, the three conferences which led up to the formation of O.E.C.D., on the preservation of the principle of multilateralism as laid down in GATT. It was due as much to our efforts as to those of any other country that GATT was called in and was represented at those conferences.

We heard yesterday from the hon. member for Laurier some flights in the realm of fiction with regard to the government's position in reference to tariffs. The hon. member talked about high protectionism. Evidently he does not know what high protectionism is, or he prefers to talk in fictional terms. I shall not delay the house by repeating what I have said before, that this charge is baseless. This charge which has been made by the official opposition in the amendment in this regard is false. I hope I have made my meaning clear. Whatever we have done has been done in accordance with GATT and in accordance with suggestions and reports by the tariff board. While I do not say this is the final and only test, it is relevant to point out that out of 392 items changed in the Canadian tariff by the present government in the course of three budgets, formal changes of mixed character number 203, increases number 65 and decreases number 124. I despair of an end ever coming to the misrepresentations of the government's position to which hon. members opposite have turned.

In 1958, I recall—and we were reminded of it yesterday by the hon. member for Laurier—there was a modest tariff change introduced following the report of the tariff board in the customs duty on woollen fabrics. One would have thought, Mr. Speaker, to listen to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) that the end of all creation had come—that we were going to be visited with retaliation by any number of countries. Well, the house has learned long since to realize that the hon. gentleman excels in this kind of matinee performance.

But one expected something more serious of the hon. member for Laurier. Certainly he has gone a long way since he left Cornwall, or since Cornwall left him. Gone is his interest in seeking some measure for a decent chance of survival for the textile industry. Yesterday he returned to the Bonavista-Twillingate line of 1958 and talked about the legislation of that year, the amendment to the Customs Act. He misrepresented it yesterday and said the government took power to make arbitrary changes in the tariff rates. The government did not do any such thing. Amendments were introduced to see to it that power was given to prevent the dumping of goods from abroad into this country at prices below the cost of production. This is the kind of unfair competition which hon. members opposite expect Canadian producers and Canadian workmen to face. What do they care?

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall have to ask the hon. member to reserve his question until I have finished. I shall be glad to deal with it then, but time is precious and limited today.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate told us at that time we were going to face retaliation from Italy. What happened? Our exports to Italy rose substantially in the following year. So much for the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. He was so worried about the export of codfish to Italy. He sees a codfish behind every shadow. Well, our export of codfish increased, too, so the hon. gentleman was running true to form. The fact is that this legislation well served its purpose; so well, indeed, that it was not necessary to pass orders in council enabling the minister to make orders under it. Foreign exporters knew very well what they would face if they attempted to dump goods on the Canadian market at less than the cost of production and governed themselves accordingly. That is why it was not necessary to make orders under that legislation. This enactment served a salutary purpose.

The hon. member for Laurier yesterday talked about the government following a policy of timid protectionism. At that time I asked him the simple question whether he thought the 1958 legislation was worthy of support or not. He has not seen fit to answer that question, yet he talks about timidity. He ran, and he has not stopped running yet. He roared yesterday like a mouse.

Let me pass on now to say, in relation to the tariffs and to GATT, that we are engaged in the discussions at Geneva at the present time which were detailed yesterday by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees). Some hon. members opposite still do not know the nature of discussions up to the present time, and these proceedings have been more protracted than was expected. The discussions so far have been concerned largely with working out with the six members of the European economic community an agreement in relation to their common external tariffs. Now, at Geneva, the countries represented are about to engage in what has become known as the Dillon round of negotiations. These are the negotiations in which an effort is made to negotiate further mutual concessions. This is an entirely different operation. May I say this: what has been said here by the ministers in relation to what has been going on at Geneva has had a salutary effect.

The hon. member for Laurier yesterday asserted that if the Minister of Finance was sincere in saying he was a strong supporter of trade on a multilateral basis, "the Canadian delegates at Geneva must surely have presented concrete and bold proposals for freer trade in the world." He was referring to the Geneva meetings but he evidently does not know that these negotiations have not even begun yet. His timing is away off. But that is not all. His statement totally misrepresents what has been going on at Geneva, and I could add much more to that if there were time.

I am concerned about the Liberal flight from GATT, for they have evidently decided to desert the ship. The hon. member for Laurier took some satisfaction yesterday in quoting the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition in Vancouver in January, 1958, when he said:

> In short, it seems that the era of gradual tariff reductions through GATT has come to an end.

Well, things have not come to an end just because he has ceased to be a minister of the crown. Then, in Toronto, last night, in a preview of the speech he made here this afternoon, the hon. gentleman is reported in the Ottawa Citizen as follows:

> Mr. Pearson questioned whether GATT could do much more than it has done already.

If the hon. gentleman wants to fold his hands and say "all is up" let him do so. That attitude of resignation, that attitude of inaction, is one that he has inherited typically from the government of which he was a member. That is not the attitude that this government takes. This government proposes to make its loyal contribution to this beneficent international organization in the manner in which it has for the past four years.

Then they quoted the Ste. Adele speech. I feel flattered, but they did not seem to quote enough of it. They picked out bits here and there and then proceeded to put their own fancy interpretation upon them. Let me put a couple of facts straight for their instruction. In the first place that speech I made at Ste. Adele last autumn brought substantial benefit and assistance to our negotiators at Geneva in the negotiations in which they were then engaged.

Mr. Pickersgill: They had not started yet.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That speech assisted negotiators at Geneva.

Mr. Chevrier: They had not started yet.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, they are all mixed up, the poor fellows. I pointed out that the earlier negotiations were the first round of negotiations at Geneva to work out agreement in respect of the new common external tariff with the European economic community, and that is where it was established.

That is what this Ste. Adele speech was designed to deal with. The hon. gentlemen opposite—perhaps I should not call them poor fellows, but I have a soft heart—did not realize that was the nature of the first round of negotiations last year. I may say that the declaration at Ste. Adele did help to strengthen the hands of the Canadian negotiators at Geneva in the first round of tariff negotiations there with the representatives of the six countries constituting the European community.

I must now pass quickly over some other subjects. First of all, in relation to our trade with the United States, I say that we are achieving a better balance. We were concerned that so much of Canada's trade was in one basket when we rame into office. We have been able to move some distance, not by trying to restrict trade in any direction, but by trying to expand trade. The expansion of trade has shown itself in striking form in our trade with the United Kingdom, the commonwealth, Japan and many other areas in the world. My colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce last night drew attention to the extraordinary increase in our trade with the United Kingdom in the past year, which reached an all-time record for Canadian exports to the United Kingdom. We take a good deal of satisfaction in this and congratulate all those enterprising Canadian exporters who took advantage of the opportunities that were opened up in the market, at least partly as a result of the negotiations carried on by the present Canadian government.

These conferences that I have referred to produced very beneficial results. I shall not deal with that aspect. I think I should, however, say a word on the subject of preferences because the Minister of Finance has a responsibility in relation to Canadian imports and to the Canadian tariff. The policy of this government has been at all times to seek the full enjoyment for Canadian producers, and particularly for Canadian agricultural producers, of all the benefits available to them under commonwealth preferences. These are very important benefits.

So far as our trade with the United Kingdom is concerned, here are some facts that I invite hon. members opposite to ponder. First, about 95 per cent of Canadian exports to the United Kingdom enter that market duty free. Forty per cent of Canadian exports to the United Kingdom enjoy the benefit of preferences. For most of these, but not all, the preferential rate is free. Of our total exports to the United Kingdom in 1959, 39 per cent were primary industrial materials free of duty from all sources. That is to say, there was no preference. Forty one per cent were agricultural products. The largest agricultural item, wheat, does not enjoy preference. Oil seeds, coarse grains and tobacco are the principal agricultural exports which do enjoy preferences.

On 7 per cent of our exports to the United Kingdom the creation of E.F.T.A. will result in the loss of significant preferential advantage over other E.F.T.A. countries competitive with Canada in the products involved.

At the commonwealth trade and economic conference in 1958 this subject was considered by the representatives of all the commonwealth countries. In the report of the conference, article 28:

> —reaffirmed the importance of the role that preferences have played and continue to play in commonwealth economic relations. Commonwealth countries have continued to adhere to the preferential system while adjusting their policies to the requirements of changes in the scope and character of world trade.

In article 31:

> The United Kingdom government confirmed its intention of maintaining as an important element in the preferential system the free and unrestricted entry of nearly all goods imported from the commonwealth.

We have waited until today to hear the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) indicate in his lighthearted and happy-go-lucky way that it does not matter very much about these commonwealth preferences. He has indicated that these advantages are not going to have very much of a place in his thinking from now on. They still have an important place in the thinking of the Canadian government when we realize the advantages that these preferences have offered to Canadian producers and above all, to the Canadian agricultural producers. Hon. members opposite can forget their duties and responsibilities to the Canadian agricultural producer but as far as the present government is concerned it intends to remain faithful to the interests of the Canadian agriculturalists.

I come now to our trade relations with western Europe. These are of very great importance to Canada. Over the years, 30 per cent of our exports have gone to western Europe, including the United Kingdom. We do, with the seven countries, now eight, of E.F.T.A., twice as much business as we do with the six countries of the European economic community. Here again the member for Laurier could not present his case without distorting and misrepresenting the position of the government. He said that the government was opposed to the European common market. I am being charitable to that hon. member when I say to him that he does not know what he is talking about.

At the commonwealth finance ministers' conference at Mont Tremblant in 1957, the ministers reported that they "reviewed the progress made toward the ratification of the treaty of Rome, establishing the European economic community, and the effect of this treaty on the interests of the commonwealth. They noted that the treaty would receive further consideration in international organizations.

The United Kingdom ministers reported on the progress made following the United Kingdom initiative for the establishment of a free trade area in Europe. The commonwealth ministers recognized that the establishment of an outward-looking free trade area in Europe would broaden the advantages to be derived from economic integration in Europe, not only by the United Kingdom but by all other participants. This was regarded as important as it could contribute to agreed commonwealth policies of expanding world trade.

It was also agreed that there is need for effective machinery for continuous consultation among commonwealth countries on matters related to the European economic community and the proposed free trade area.

The United Kingdom ministers reaffirmed the undertakings previously given by their government about the safeguarding of commonwealth interests in the United Kingdom market for foodstuffs, drink and tobacco."

That was the position in 1957. The commonwealth countries expressed their concern over any movement at that time of the 14 countries toward the formation of a European free trade area and suggested that care should be taken not to prejudice the interests of the commonwealth countries in relation to their exports of agricultural products to the United Kingdom market.

The United Kingdom ministers gave assurance that they would not prejudice these markets in their negotiations with a view to bringing about that European free trade area. Things went forward on that basis until December, 1958 when efforts to bring about this wider European free trade area came to nought at the meeting in Paris.

It is not for us to apportion responsibility for the failure of that effort. The fact is that the effort to form a European free trade area was made under the terms upon which it had been discussed at these commonwealth meetings, and had been harmonized with the interests of the commonwealth countries. In the face of those assurances as to the position of the Canadian exporters in the market of the United Kingdom, we had no fear.

What happened in 1959? We saw a widening of the rift between the Six and the Seven in Europe, and we expressed concern, as one of the member nations of NATO, that there should be developing in Europe an economic rift, and this was a matter for deep concern. When the hon. member for Laurier said yesterday that we were opposed to the European common market, Mr. Speaker, he did violence to the truth. Our concern at all times was that in any move in the developing trade pattern of organizations in Europe the interest of the commonwealth, and particularly of our own Canadian producers, for whose interest we are responsible, should not be prejudiced thereby. We saw opportunities there for the development of that organizational pattern in Europe without working prejudice to the opportunities enjoyed by Canadian producers either in the markets of the United Kingdom or in the markets of those European countries, as long as the policies and attitudes of those countries were outward looking and not inward looking. The great concern has been that in the development within the European economic community—perhaps in the other organization as well—outward looking policies may be supplanted by inward looking policies, and while reducing the barriers to trade among themselves, they might at the same time erect higher barriers around the perimeter. This has been our concern and any Canadian government worthy of its trust would, Mr. Speaker, in a situation of this kind, do what the present Canadian government has done. It would be vigilant; it would go to every meeting that was called for this purpose, and it would put the interests of the Canadian producers before the conference and in a spirit of reasonableness at all times, not the spirit of retaliation that hon. members opposite so mistakenly and misleadingly talk about, seek to bring about a harmonization of interest that will do justice to and safeguard the interests of Canadian producers. That is our responsibility and our trust and we will fulfil it.

What about the moves of the United Kingdom in the direction of a common market? Well, Mr. Speaker, we are talking about something that is still very tentative; indeed, in some respects, hypothetical, because it is perfectly clear that the government of the United Kingdom is not prepared to join a European economic community on the basis of the treaty of Rome, and so far the government of France has given no indication that it is prepared to consent to any modification of the terms of the treaty of Rome with a view to providing accommodation of the British in the European economic community or with other countries of the European free trade area. So, when we are talking on this subject let hon. members opposite be frank enough not to talk about this as though it were something assured. Let them be frank enough and informed enough to talk about it as though it were what it is, something very tentative, indeed, and hypothetical in many respects.

In this situation, Mr. Speaker, having regard particularly to the assurances that have been given to us by the government of the United Kingdom, that the commonwealth countries will be consulted at all stages, and while it remains the undoubted responsibility of the British government to make its own decision, we shall, of course, having regard to Canada's interest both in the United Kingdom market and in the markets of those European countries, seek to preserve the benefits that we now enjoy while at the same time recognizing the importance of the expansion of those markets and the benefits that will flow to Canada from them.

We have taken no narrow view here, Mr. Speaker. There has been the grossest kind of misrepresentation on this subject as to the position of the government. We never threatened retaliation in the meeting in London last November; we never threatened retaliation in Paris in 1960. These statements are distortions; they are figments of the imagination.

Mr. Pearson: Read the Ottawa Journal.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Read the editorial in the Regina Leader-Post and in similar Liberal organs. That is the source of the information. I am giving them the needed information; I am telling them for their information, but I suppose it will fall on unhearing ears, that their assertions are quite untrue. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I have been at those conferences and never has there been a suggestion of retaliation in my hearing. But we have done our duty in warning those other countries that if a course were taken which had the effect of closing Canadians out of certain markets, then inevitably Canadians, being enterprising people, would be looking for markets elsewhere, and trade being carried on in the world under arrangements which are so often negotiated, undoubtedly large sections of Canadian producers would expect the Canadian government to negotiate favourable terms of entry in other countries, and this is unquestionably the position in which we find ourselves. We have to take action if that is a possibility and that is why we have been so vigilant in this field.

In my concluding remarks let me say first of all that in so far as O.E.C.D. is concerned, the government takes unlimited satisfaction out of the active part that it played in bringing about the O.E.C.D. Far from hon. members opposite adopting this convention as though it were theirs, let me say to them that the present government throughout has conducted those negotiations and it is not going to be any help to deny to the O.E.C.D. now the use and the prestige that this organization needs when the Leader of the Opposition in effect did invite the countries concerned to sidestep the O.E.C.D. and in effect weaken it.

I have said that our concern at all times is for the maintenance and expansion of Canadian markets; but we do not propose to be parties to any narrow approach of the kind that is proposed by the Leader of the Opposition. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, if he is to be taken as meaning what he has said, what he is in effect proposing to do is to forswear and abandon the principle of multilateral trade for which Canada stands. He is proposing that Canada and the other countries of the North Atlantic area should turn their backs upon trade with countries such as Japan, Australia, New Zealand, Africa and other countries and resort to discriminatory arrangements, resort to more restrictions or, in the Nelson tradition, to keep one eye closed. Our view, Mr. Speaker, is that we want in all respects to see outward looking policies pursued, not restrictionist policies. If the kind of policies that the Leader of the Opposition has talked about were followed, if he means what he says—and I cannot persuade myself that he means to go as far as his words have conveyed to his hearers—it would mean that Canada would be held within the closed area of the North Atlantic, and that would not be good for Canada.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, during the time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) was speaking I could not help but recall that during the period 1930 to 1935 I frequently had occasion to sit in a very different part of this chamber. In those days the policy of the then prime minister, the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett, was to blast his way into the markets of the world. Well, today, the policy of the present government has been clearly set out by the Minister of Finance. It is to bluster its way into the markets of Europe.

Mr. Pearson: Bluster, rave and misrepresent.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. McIlraith: The extent of the misrepresentation of the Minister of Finance can best be illustrated by his reference to the amendments to the Customs Act of 1958, when he said there had been no orders issued under that act.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say that.

Mr. Pearson: You did.

Mr. Pickersgill: You said it had not been necessary.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister said it had not been necessary to issue orders. I want to point out that on April 18 his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan), as appears on page 3776 of Hansard, had occasion to apologize for the misrepresentation that had been made and pointed out that there had been a great many orders issued. He himself had made the same kind of misrepresentation and he was very quick to correct it as is fitting in keeping with what should be the manners of a minister of the crown. The correction was made in the presence of the Minister of Finance but he persists in the misinformation today.

I could go on correcting the Minister of Finance but I presume I should make my own speech. I should like to point out that the Minister of Finance seemed to be bolstering the achievements of the government by his manner and the loudness and vigour of his voice today. That is his privilege if he wishes to do so, but he kept referring to these achievements as momumental achievements of the government. I would simply point out to him that tombstones are monuments and maybe he is building a tombstone for our trade by means of the wrong policies of the government which he neglects to correct and replace with proper policies.

The minister went on to take credit for some reduction in the exchange rate between Canada and the United States. Some of us read the minister's speeches on occasion, and this is the same Minister of Finance who always disclaimed previously that the government could do anything about exchange rates without the imposition of foreign exchange controls. He took great care to point that out on other occasions but today he takes credit that the exchange rate is down a little. May I remind him that the famous baby budget, which presumably he is claiming is the factor responsible for this reduction, did not seem to bring down the exchange rate because it went up after the delivery of that infamous speech.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, it did not. It went down.

Mr. McIlraith: It went up.

Mr. Chevrier: You made a lot of miscalculations in that budget, didn't you?

Mr. McIlraith: The record will speak for itself. Another inconsistency of the minister in his remarks today had to do with the figures as to the numbers of items with respect to which there had been increases or decreases in the tariff, since the present government took office but he took great care in the figures he gave to omit the dozens of tariff items affected by the legislation finally passed last week. Those items were omitted. They were just not included in the computation.

Perhaps I might point out other inconsistencies on his part today. He talked about the European common market being tentative.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not. I talked about the approaches.

Mr. Chevrier: Did you know what you were talking about?

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I might elaborate by saying that he talked about the approaches to the common market being tentative. I must point out to the minister, however, that however tentatively he views these things they are not tentative but very real in the mind of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, as he made clear in his speech in Boston and many other speeches he made while he was on this continent.

Perhaps I should put the amendment on record again at this point because I fear it has not been fully understood. Certainly the Minister of Finance during the whole course of his speech tended to put an interpretation on it that misrepresented its content and purport completely. The amendment is in these words:

> That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "This house regrets the protectionist and inconsistent trade policies of the government and its failure to develop a long term foreign economic policy to enable Canada to participate fully in the challenging new opportunities in the field of international trade by implementing a vigorous program to promote the expansion of our secondary manufacturing industries and by encouraging the development of an Atlantic economic community."

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) moved the following subamendment:

> That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma and by adding thereto the following words:
> "to prevent a drastic loss of overseas markets for agricultural and other primary products."

I regret that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam is not in his seat at the moment because, however true it may be that the failure of the government to develop a long term foreign economic policy to enable Canada to participate in the new opportunities in the field of international trade and its failure to encourage the development of an Atlantic economic community may result in a drastic loss of overseas markets for agricultural and other primary products if we do not succeed in relating ourselves properly to these new developments, there are other consequences as well. While the loss of overseas markets for agricultural and other primary products is of major importance in this whole debate, it is only a part of the total picture. The effect of the subamendment is to limit and restrict the amendment, and I would point out that the effect of this limiting and restrictive addition to the amendment is quite diffierent from the speech of the hon. member moving it.

It seemed to me from his speech that he did not mean to limit his approval of the amendment in any way but the fact is that by the words he has used in the subamendment he has tended to limit the amendment. While I grant at once the extreme importance of the matters he has referred to in the subamendment, the words he has used have a limiting effect and therefore the subamendment is not acceptable so far as we are concerned.

Incidentally, he made an implication with reference to me in his speech which I should like to dispel at once. There should not be read into the amendment any lack of interest by me in any part of it. I am very keen about the whole of the amendment and just as much in support of the reference to secondary industry, as I hope to show later in my remarks, as anyone in the house. He is quite wrong in any deductions he made because of the amendment being proposed by one much abler than I. I assure him that this was done because of the desire and readiness of the Liberal party to work together and to have the amendment moved on this occasion by one of prime ability.

An hon. Member: Do not be so modest.

Mr. McIlraith: Unfortunately the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) has vanished, but I should like to make some references to the speech he delivered yesterday which I must admit I found rather interesting because it demonstrated the very thing about which we are complaining. I want to read one excerpt from the minister's speech. In talking about the main motion—I presume he meant the amendment—he said this as reported at page 3945 of Hansard for April 24, 1961:

> It purports to speak on the one hand of a free or freer trade area within the Atlantic economic community and in the same breath it expresses regret because, it says, the government has failed to promote the expansion of secondary manufacturing industries in Canada. These two courses are contradictory and represent opposite ends of the economic pole.

There, sir, you have an expression of the policy of the government, that there is an inconsistency in these two things. Surely, the contrary is the fact and it is important that we do both of the things proposed in the amendment. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, by that negative view, is going to leave us in a position where we would take a retrograde step and we would thereby become purely producers of primary products. Surely, that is not the government's position and yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce has clearly set it out in that way in his speech. I must say, however, that his speech of yesterday was consistent with his other speeches on this precise point.

The purpose of the amendment is to suggest, first, the failure of the government to develop a long term foreign economic policy. It seems to me that in today's world it is not good enough for the Minister of Finance or any other minister of the crown, in answering this amendment, to try to deal with it in terms of days long past. It must be dealt with in today's circumstances, today's world, and it must be dealt with in the context of the cold war which, it seems to me, is being developed more and more on economic terms. In that context, surely it is elementary that the free western countries must be brought to a consideration of the prospects of trade, a subject that ought to be foremost in our minds.

I recognize that certain short run considerations are important from time to time in the consideration of external trade. I quite recognize the day to day vicissitudes of trade and I am not one to minimize their importance. However, this amendment is concerned with long term foreign economic policy. We are concerned with the development of this long term policy over the years ahead so that we will provide the proper trading climate in the years ahead. The Minister of Trade and Commerce completely missed that point yesterday. He talked about certain trade figures, merchandise trade figures for this year and last year, without relating them to this important point.

Then, we have this problem of the government—I am making this as a direct criticism of the government in every area—being hypnotized by this short run, day to day view. The government seems to be unwilling to develop long term policies. Surely, an able government must do both. It must be able to develop long term policies as well as be able to look at the day to day problems. Our need now, in our external relations, is for a long term foreign economic policy.

I do not want to traverse ground that has been traversed. My leader made an excellent speech on February 28, which appears at page 2499 of Hansard, on the subject of O.E.C.D. I will not repeat any part of that speech now. However, there are aspects to this problem which time does not permit me to develop, which are very beneficial for Canada and for the whole free world. I refer to such matters as the expansion of trade with underdeveloped countries and the reliance of those countries on certain commodities with sharply fluctuating prices, with a resultant adverse effect upon them. I should like to develop that theme on some other occasion, but perhaps I will have to let it go with a mere mention now.

If we should develop an Atlantic trading area on a really sound footing, it would do much to stabilize prices of the basic commodities which come from these other underdeveloped countries. This would be a very good thing as anyone knows who understands the sharp reverses their economies have had.

The Minister of Finance today seemed to go out of his way to deny certain impressions that were created by his remarks, and more particularly by the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I could, perhaps, spend a good deal of time quoting the remarks of the Minister of Finance, especially from his speech at Ste. Adele. I thoroughly read again this morning the speech delivered at Ste. Adele. I was interested to note that the minister did not attribute to that speech the quotations he made from it today. He read a substantial part of it into the record.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): One paragraph.

Mr. McIlraith: No, the minister and I will have to differ on that. I was following the text as he was making his remarks. He read an important part of it and I, in common with many others, found the speech contained an implied threat of retaliation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense.

Mr. McIlraith: I read it again this morning to see if I had misinterpreted it, since the minister is so quick to challenge my original interpretation. However, my original interpretation still stands. I have a whole sheaf of quotations from the Minister of Finance here, but perhaps I will content myself by reading one from the Toronto Globe and Mail of November 22, which refers to this Ste. Adele speech. The minister is reported as saying:

> Canadian interests will be damaged, perhaps seriously, if the United Kingdom aligns itself with the common market countries in some sort of free trade area. Canada might retaliate by raising its own tariffs.

The article goes on to state:

> Certainly under such circumstances the pressure for Canada to embark on closer trade associations with other countries, particularly the United States, would understandably be increased.

Evidently the correspondent for the Globe and Mail interpreted the speech the way the rest of us did.

Then, on November 25, there were some questions asked in the house about this speech at Ste. Adele. The minister persisted, according to Hansard, page 197, in these remarks that we interpret as a threat of retaliation. He will find those remarks recorded at the top of the first column of page 197.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There never was any threat of retaliation.

Mr. McIlraith: In any event, the remarks are interpreted that way.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is the wrong way.

Mr. McIlraith: The Minister of Trade and Commerce went to Paris to deal with some foreign trade matters. He is reported as having stated—it depends on which paper you read, but all the reports are of the same nature:

> Unless the European common market substantially reduces its announced tariff schedules affecting imports from Canada at the GATT negotiations in progress in Geneva, Canada will retaliate by increasing its barriers against imports from the six European countries.
> The warning has been given by trade minister George Hees to European ministers meeting here . . .

There it is. Since this government took office the Department of Trade and Commerce has been truncated. Remnants of it are left with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I hope the jurisdiction he has over that part which is concerned with foreign trade—and it seems to be shared between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance—will be further reduced, if he is going to persist in making ill-timed statements of that sort.

If the minister has any doubt about the interpretation by others of the speeches of this government, I would refer him to the Financial Post of December 10, 1960. This is quite a long article—it covers a full page—by Clive Baxter. The article is headed:

> In Europe, they say that Canada overrates her own importance . . .

I could quote a great deal of this article; I could quote it all if I had the time. In any event, it reports that Mr. DeGrood the head of the North American division in the directorate-general for external relations at E.C.M. headquarters, who is described as a Dutchman and a friend of Canada, said:

> "It seems to us", he finally replied, "that Canada overrates its own importance these days. We want to trade with you, but you must understand that if necessary we can get on without you".

Another part of the article, not attributed directly to this spokesman, says:

> It is not encouraging to report—but impossible to ignore—that the speech seemed to worry nobody in Brussels. The departments concerned were interested in its contents but apparently far from scared by its warnings.
> "You got yourselves into this mess", commented an E.C.M. executive who didn't want his name used for obvious diplomatic reasons. "We are not to blame for what happened. But please explain to Canadians that while we sympathize with your problems, you cannot scare us with the sort of threats Mr. Fleming used.
> "If you don't like what we are doing you are of course free to take whatever measures your government sees fit. But I think you should remember this important fact: We are a unit of 170 million people. We have ambitions to build what may some day be an equal of the United States in every respect.
> "Much as we like Canada and Canadians, don't ever think that a market of 17 million people can threaten us into changing our basic plans. We will listen to your views and where possible will meet your requirements, but please don't lose your sense of proportion. You are going to have to live with us in the future and to withdraw into an angry protective shell can only mean worse and worse trouble for your economy".

Mr. Chevrier: Then they did make a threat.

Mr. McIlraith: There is the interpretation put on the speeches of these two hon. ministers. There is a rather apt statement of what would flow from the scared and angry policy of the government that was being expounded in those speeches.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, may I ask how competent is the individual whose remarks the hon. member just read?

Mr. McIlraith: I would say, much more competent than any member of the ministry of this government. His whole treatment of the subject points up and ably illustrates his understanding of it.

I am afraid the Minister of Trade and Commerce showed that he had no grasp at all of what was involved, or its significance to this government.

Mr. Chevrier: Any more than he did when he spoke about the Cubans.

Mr. McIlraith: Exactly. It is just the same kind of inconsistent trade policy illustrated by the minister when he spoke about the Cubans, when he went on with that kind of nonsense and said, "You could not wish to do business with better businessmen anywhere". Those are the kind of irresponsible and careless statements we are getting from the ministry. Those kind of statements have consequence in our international trade relations and ought not to be made in the brash, thoughtless way in which they apparently are being made.

I could digress and list a great many famous boo-boos made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but of course it is not desirable to do so at this time.

Mr. Chevrier: They have made a complete volte-face since then.

Mr. McIlraith: They would need to make a complete volte-face since then. Not only has the government done nothing appropriate about these long term policies that are required at this time, but their short term policies are regressive. It is quite clear that these policies will cause a good deal of trouble for our secondary industry in the time ahead. They have already caused our secondary industry a good deal of trouble.

In giving the figures yesterday for commodity trade the Minister of Trade and Commerce completely missed the significance of some aspects of this matter. He did not tell us that our imports were down because of the recession in business in this country. He did not tell us that our exports to the United Kingdom have increased—and we all rejoice in the fact that they have increased—because there has been a sharp upturn in the economy of the United Kingdom. He did not tell us that this year there was a very significant feature in our increased exports to the United Kingdom; in that about 5 per cent of it represented wholly manufactured goods.

The minister did not relate the significance of that fact to the possible development in this country of secondary industry, which this government is doing so much to destroy. He did not—

Mr. Grafftey: That is nonsense.

Mr. McIlraith: In dealing with the other items, he did not deal with the true significance, in long term effect, on the economy of the country. The minister merely dealt with them as if no long term factors at all were involved. He did not deal with the threat to our agricultural products, which apparently was in the mind of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam if the European common market develops into a protectionist association. The minister did not deal with that matter at all.

He did not tell us the danger we must meet in this regard. When the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Horner) was speaking last night, I could not help thinking how little he understood the danger and threat which exists to our wheat exports in certain of these movements that are going on wholly outside Canada and outside direct participation by this country. The hon. member seemed to have missed that point.

It seems to me that the two parts of this amendment are wholly consistent. In addition to developing policies by way of negotiation with these two European trading associations in order that we will be integrated in a proper association with them—as was so ably expounded by my leader this afternoon—we have the other problem. I refer to the problem of our secondary industry and its development.

The present government has made much of the baby budget delivered last fall. It is interesting to see that the President of the United States saw fit to refer to it in his message to congress. Unfortunately, I have only the newspaper reports. I would like to see the text of the president's speech. However, it is quite clear that he may already have started the chain of events which will be damaging to the economy of this country that our Minister of Finance initiated by his angry, little, wrong policies in the baby budget. In any event, the present government has failed to realize the effect of the whole of the taxation policies of the last few years and has failed to realize what they are doing to the economy of this country.

In face of the rapidly changing conditions in the economies of Europe, Japan and other countries in the world the government has failed to understand the necessity for adapting our tax policies in such a way as would provide incentives for our export industries so that they can remain competitive. It has failed to realize the role which a government can play in this field. It has failed to realize the importance of adopting tax policies, whether by tax incentives or otherwise, which would enable our secondary industry to provide itself with the most modern machinery and equipment. That is the direction which our taxation policy should be taking. Instead of that, the government has been following policies which have increased the burden placed on our export industries and lessened their ability to compete successfully in world markets. I refer to its misunderstanding of how to handle the conversion loan with its indirect consequence of an increase in municipal taxes on industry and a higher interest rate on money borrowed. Corporate income taxes have been increased. The sales tax has been increased to 10 per cent. Old age assistance tax has been increased by 50 per cent and the unemployment insurance charges on industry have been increased by between 25 per cent and 50 per cent depending on which category is involved.

All this has constituted a very heavy burden on our productivity, a direct addition to the cost of production and, indirectly, an added burden on our productivity. What is required now is an adaptation of these tax policies, every one of them, on a broad and massive front, to meet the needs so that we can once again put secondary industry into competitive production. Then we would not have these policies of fear and the retaliation which these two ministers go around talking about outside the country.

We have had in this country an excellent experience of using accelerated depreciation allowances to facilitate the transition of industry from a wartime to a peacetime basis. That policy was used to great advantage and I am at a loss to understand why in the circumstances in which we find ourselves today the government does not use this vast experience which has proved itself so effective in past years, applying it to the changed problems and requirements of today, because the need to help industry develop and increase its productivity is as great today as the need of industry for help to convert to peacetime production was then.

There are many other phases of taxation to which I could refer and upon which I could elaborate but I see I have only four or five minutes left. The corporate taxation field is neither a popular one to speak about nor an easy one, and I do not wish my remarks to be considered as meaning only that we should take the easy step of reducing corporate income taxes. It is a matter of developing all the taxes which affect corporations in a way which will relate particularly to the export problem. That would involve certain adaptations of the sales tax policy and it would also involve the use of depreciation allowances. It would involve an examination of the techniques of releasing earnings from companies for investment in new and up to date equipment. It might also involve an examination of the right of shareholders to withdraw their dividends on a more advantageous tax basis than is presently the case. It will involve some wholly new policies.

It was suggested by the Leader of the Opposition on January 20 of this year during the budget debate as reported at page 1274 that special provision might be made in the field of earnings from increased exports. My hon. friend spoke on this very point in a precise way and made a suggestion of a particular nature:

> To encourage domestic manufacturing industries to increase their exports tax incentive should be offered including a reduction in corporation income tax on the profits earned on increased export sales.

There are a great many variations in the forms of tax incentives that could be offered. In any event—

Mr. Pallett: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McIlraith: I should be obliged if the hon. gentleman would bear with me one moment and ask his question at the completion of my time.

These things are not being done by the government. Instead, it is taking retrograde steps each session in this whole field of taxation. The speech made last night by the Minister of Trade and Commerce showed a complete failure to understand the nature of the problem facing this country in the field of foreign trade, both as to its long term implications and as to its short term relationship to unemployment and the difficulties facing our secondary industries. We have sought in this amendment and in our debate to put forward criticisms of the government but to accompany these criticisms by positive and responsible suggestions capable of being carried out and, which, if carried out, would render wholly unnecessary these debates on unemployment which take place so frequently in the house when a Conservative government is in office.

These suggestions, if adopted, would eliminate the need for these parades of unemployed to parliament hill seeking to make representations to members of parliament. All these things would become wholly unnecessary. As I say, in criticizing the government we have sought to accompany our criticism with a program of the kind that should be carried out by any active and responsible government in this field and to demonstrate exactly how these policies would work. However, I am afraid the present government has closed its collective mind to any ideas of a progressive character. Hon. members opposite seem to think in terms of turning back the clock, and it is for that reason I referred at the opening of these remarks to the bluster of the present Minister of Finance and to the blasting into the markets of the world spoken of by the then prime minister of that party some 30 years ago when unemployment was as much of a worry as it is today.

Mr. J. R. Keays (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Yesterday we heard the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) move an amendment in this house which demonstrated again his ability to create the paradox of paradoxes. He criticized this government for either the lack of a trade policy or an inconsistent trade policy, while in the same breath he mentioned that there was an expansion of trade under this government. However, he found ways and means for not giving credit to those Canadians who are imaginative and possess initiative and drive. Rather, he gave credit to the dynamic growth of western Europe. In other words, he again expressed the opinion that Canadians were lazy, lacked imagination, initiative and drive.

It seems to me that in addition to preaching doom and gloom hon. members opposite are trying to destroy confidence in Canadians. In an article appearing today in the Canadian Manufacturers' Association pamphlet there is one sentence which seems to refer to that which I have just mentioned. That article suggests that public confidence in the immediate future should not be undermined or disturbed by playing up the bad and playing down the good in such a way as to distort the over-all economic picture and thus promote fear and doubt where there should be none, which would do Canada and the unemployment situation a great disservice.

As I have mentioned, hon. members opposite do not give any credit to the initiative of the government. However, some people think that the action and policies of this government in so far as trade is concerned are quite satisfactory. In an article appearing in the Citizen of December 14, 1960 under the heading "Golden Decade Has Lost Much of its Glitter" Mr. Ben Dworkin had the following to say:

> In the meantime the drive by the Canadian government to secure outside markets is believed to be a factor that will give business generally a boost.
> Despite the competition for world markets, trade envoys from all parts of the world that are attending a conference in Ottawa report that Canada stands a good chance to break in, or improve her position as an exporting nation to almost every part of the world.
> This drive for business, and the enthusiasm that has been shown by businessmen for the program all reflect optimism that new customers can be found.

There is one person who appreciates the policies of this government in so far as trade is concerned. We heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) yesterday refer to the 9 per cent increase in the volume of our export trade since 1957. This is due to the selling efforts of this government, the initiative of those ministers concerned with the problem, and to the selling ability of the personnel we have stationed all over the world. Again, we can speak about our trade imbalance which has gone from $368 million in 1957 to $97 million in 1960. I believe that these few facts speak well of the trade policy of this government.

Trade problems are growing and the United States last year voted extra millions of dollars to put more salesmen into world centres. The United Kingdom has taken similar action. This proves that the problem rests not solely in Canada but all over the world.

The objectives of the O.E.C.D. are ideal. Let no one believe that these objectives will be reached simply by the stroke of a pen. Many obstacles will be encountered by those members who form O.E.C.D. in so far as trade policies are concerned. Trade talks and horse trading will still go on not only within that zone but with those exporting nations who are desirous of continuing trade, and by the bloc countries desirous of exporting their surplus products.

The O.E.C.D., made up of 20 nations, does not represent the ultimate in respect of western trade, but its immediate objective was aimed at expanding economic aid by the industralized nations to the underdeveloped nations of the world. Canada along with two other countries—I believe they are Switzerland and Sweden—gained the compromise that after the O.E.C.D. was formed it would review the acts of the old O.E.E.C. in so far as trade was concerned. The O.E.CD. also gave all the signatories the opportunity to air problems in respect of general trade policies with a view to protecting them in relation to the defence of trade practices, when a member nation desired to bring forward a trade problem.

These are the concessions obtained by this government. As the Minister of Finance has so ably said, Canada is always aware of the problems which may arise with other trading nations and must at all times protect herself.

To substantiate my statement about the organization, which included a number of the common market members, I would refer to what Mr. Ludwig Erhard said as reported in the Gazette of January 25, 1961: under the heading "Erhard Fears 'Tragedy' of European Split":

> Mr. Erhard's restiveness about the common market is founded on his conviction that it is cementing an economic split between its members and the rest of Europe. He regards this as an economic and political tragedy and considers that it weakens rather than strengthens the free world.—
> The weight of Mr. Erhard's declaration lies to a notable degree in the intangibles of the situation. Despite his affirmation of loyalty to the written treaties, it is evident that more than technical observance of the treaties will be needed to maintain the common market momentum in future years.

Although this organization is ideal, there are problems to be surmounted. I am sure this goverment is aware of them and is protecting itself accordingly. Canada does not wish ideals but rather a commercial relationship with all its trade partners without forgetting the social or political effects of such association.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have criticized the government for failing to take advantage of opportunities for closer collaboration with other members of the North Atlantic community. Some of the hon. gentlemen opposite have chosen to cast doubt on the value of our participation in the organization for economic co-operation and development. To me this reveals a surprising lack of understanding of the significance of this most important step toward co-operation and collaboration among the 18 countries of the western community and the two North American powers.

I think hon. members of the official opposition show extraordinary lack of judgment, consistency and respect in representing O.E.C.D. in an unfavourable light. So short is their memory that they fail to see the contradiction in their taking this stand. Do they not recall the North Atlantic treaty which was signed in 1949? Do they not recall the insistence of the Liberal government, then in power, on the insertion in the text of the treaty of article 2, which reads as follows:

> The parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

We have frequently heard the Leader of the Opposition speak on this subject and we know the part he played in preparing the report of the committee of three of the North Atlantic council on ways and means to improve and extend NATO co-operation in non-military fields and to develop greater unity within the Atlantic community. Let me ask hon. gentlemen opposite what the Liberal government did between 1949 and 1957 to develop unity within the Atlantic community in non-military fields? We see no evidence of their having made any progress in this connection. We see no evidence that article 2, through the efforts of the Liberal government, was made meaningful. I think this is sufficient proof of the cynicism and hypocrisy of hon. members of the official opposition in suggesting that they do indeed support the idea of an Atlantic economic community.

This government has moved positively in assisting in the formation of an O.E.C.D. comprising the members of this community. Let it not be for the opposition to imply that we have been as negative or as negligent as they were when they held office.

Alleged Lack of Trade Policy

In so far as the subamendment of the C.C.F. party is concerned, I do not think any additional words are required. I think the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Horner) ably answered the problems brought out by the subamendment.

In so far as trade policy is concerned, has this government not moved forward since 1957, bringing in at each session legislation which enable Canada's trade policies to rank among the best in the world? Has it not under the productivity council made it possible for studies to be undertaken and an examination made of the reasons for unemployment? I am sure that if answers are found by this council they will be brought to the attention of the appropriate minister.

Has this government not extended the Export Credits Insurance Act? Has it not made available through the banks sufficient credit to enable our exporters to continue and improve their businesses? Has it not been the policy of this government to make money available to the exporters? Since this Conservative party believes in free enterprise, the government has left to the banks the responsibility of providing exporters with the money they need. The policies of this government are farsighted, vigorous and energetic. We all remember the smug complacency of the previous government. It failed to recognize the problems which were eventually surmounted.

I should like to refer to a few facts which prove that the policies of this government are an encouragement to Canadians. In this respect I am speaking about our secondary industries, because it is in those industries that we will find the answer for unemployment. They alone can give work to approximately 70 to 75 per cent of the Canadian labour force. Our policies have brought some results, as they have made it possible for Canadian manufacturers to compete in other markets. One company I have in mind is a firm called Hamilton Clamp and Stampings Limited, which is challenging two big United States industries which are exporting automotive parts to Canada. This firm has appointed a distributor in New Zealand and negotiations are under way for distributors in Australia and the United Kingdom. It is branching out in the export business with an extensive line of hose clamps that has become its mainstay.

A Swiss backed metal firm has located in Canada, and there are numerous others which have come here because of our trade policies. The Liberals have encouraged their pet project, free trade, by importing cheap goods to the disadvantage of Canadians and resulting in the closing of factories. They have ignored the change in our economy and are in favour of the traditional trade patterns which were in existence in Canada when they were in office. John Meyer, writing about the Liberal party in the Gazette of Thursday, December, 15, 1960, had this to say:

> It is only now showing evidence of concern about the extent of foreign investment in Canada. Had there been the open-mindedness to recognize the dangers of excessive foreign investment in its contemporary form, instead of assuming it to have been in its traditional form, concern about it would have been expressed in the early fifties instead of after the peak has been reached.

What applies to monetary policy, Mr. Speaker, also applies to Canada's trade policy. In those days when there was no question of unemployment, when Canada developed huge surpluses every year, the Liberal party remained smug and complacent. Those were the days when they should have introduced the legislation which the present government has introduced in the last few sessions. If they had done so, our gross national product would not have stopped growing. The impetus would have been given at that time, which was the proper time, in order to keep our national product growing.

There are some Canadians who think well of the policies of the government. William F. Shelley, president of Canadian General Fund Limited, is one. I have here a newspaper article which reads in part as follows:

> William F. Shelley, president of Canadian General Fund Limited and co-chairman of the committee of Canadian investment companies, said government action has already stimulated housing construction by liberalizing loans and placed the Canadian automotive industry in a more favourable position through increased duties on foreign cars. Shelley also told the fund's stockholders that the government has succeeded in increasing domestic production by affording further tariff protection and has provided long term stimuli for Canadian exports through new financing procedures.

I think that these actions by the government are commendable and I cannot see how we can support an amendment such as that moved by the Liberal opposition.

Other people also think well of the trade policies of the government. I should like to refer to a report of a speech by Mr. Roberge, the president of Banque Canadienne Nationale, at the last annual meeting of shareholders. The newspaper article reads in part as follows:

> Mr. Roberge declared that a compromise between the "sixes and sevens" was likely, and Canada's interests might be hurt. "Our exporters must be in a position to face foreign competition, particularly that of the common market which from now on will share with the United States the twofold advantage of modernized equipment and a vast domestic market," he said. Mr. Roberge described the federal government's budget moves to encourage the development of industry and domestic investment "as a first step in the right direction". When experience has shown their effects, he said, a more comprehensive economic policy would be needed to aid the formation of capital.

That is exactly what the government has done, Mr. Speaker. It has created the productivity council and it is going to establish a design council. These organizations will help the government to introduce proper legislation so that our trade with all nations will continue to grow for many years to come and not, as suggested by the opposition, for just a few years. Again, I do not see why we should have to import finished products simply so we may sell our raw resources. We need protection for secondary industries and, as I have said before, these are the industries that put Canadians to work. The paradox of the Liberal party seems to be that they say we should import more and sell more and at the same time they forget the development of our secondary industries which are so important to the Canadian economy.

So far as the tariff structure is concerned, the Minister of Finance has certainly made a move in the right direction when we realize that not since 1907 has our tariff structure been overhauled. The government is doing something about it because it wishes to make it adaptable to the present and the future. In the words of the Minister of Finance, this will provide an opportunity for a further reduction in world trade barriers and new opportunities for Canadian exporters.

How can the opposition criticize these objectives of the government, Mr. Speaker? Finally, may I say that I endorse fully the steps which have been taken by the government with respect to our trade policies, increasing our export trade and, more important, developing our domestic trade. We have not forgotten the one or the other but have made them all into one common problem which will be resolved by the government.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, although the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) is comparatively new as head of this department, he looks and acts as though he was born for the job. From the first day of his appointment he has taken his job seriously and initiated some innovations, which we all trust will mean more business for Canada, such as the big conference of trade commissioners from abroad, some 110, I believe. I understand that this effort was worth while. Now we are all waiting for the results and I for one wish to congratulate the minister on his enterprise.

Trade is the life blood of our nation and without it we cannot hope to thrive and prosper. But with all the energy of the minister and however great his zest may be and that of his assistants, we can never hope to gain foreign markets unless we have a favourable trade climate. This can only be brought about by legislation designed to attract foreign buyers and if we do not have it then all these efforts will have been made in vain.

Recent legislation, notably that granting the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) power to redefine for tariff purposes goods of a class or kind made in Canada or that could be produced in Canada, certainly will not create an incentive for wider trade with foreign nations, especially those which are already good customers and purchase from Canada far more than we purchase from them. This measure, fought by the opposition every step of the way, will not help the minister to realize his aspiration to increase and promote exports.

I do not think this country can afford to provide an increase in tariff protection against a surge of foreign competition for manufacturing industries which supply only a small share of the Canadian market. Unfortunately it seems that the new minister is handicapped by the tariff and monetary policies of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), as was his predecessor, now Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill). The latter was handicapped by the obstinate refusal of the Minister of Finance to introduce measures to lower the value of the Canadian dollar in relation to its counterpart, the United States dollar. As he pointed out this afternoon, however, the dollar has dropped to about 1 per cent above par. Now, we see a repetition of this intrusion with the advent of new protectionism which is nothing more nor less than the old Tory protectionist medicine. I daresay that the late Right Hon. C. D. Howe, when minister of trade and commerce, would never have allowed the minister of finance of the day to introduce legislation that would hurt our chances of selling abroad.

A brilliant member of the press gallery, in an article which appeared in the Port Arthur News-Chronicle some time ago, saw how the wind was blowing and had this to say. I quote:

> "Trade or perish" would be an apt and pungent solgan for Canada. It is commonly said that one third of all Canadian workers owe their jobs to our trade with foreign countries. This proportion is infinitely higher than that pertaining within the borders of our greatest supplier and our greatest customer, the neighbouring U.S.A. It is probably higher than in any other country in the Atlantic community.

This reporter then goes on to point out that we are building Canada into a defensively-walled trading citadel isolated on a lovely high priced plateau. Then he proceeds as follows:

Alleged Lack of Trade Policy

On December 16 Mr. Fleming told the House of Commons that he and the minister of trade, Hon. George Hees, had recently signed, on behalf of Canada, the convention establishing the organization for economic co-operation and development known as O.E.C.D.

The aims of this newly constituted organization, Mr. Fleming told the house, are "to promote policies that are designed:

(a) to achieve the highest sustainable economic growth in member countries,

(b) to contribute to sound economic expansion in member and non-member countries, and

(c) to contribute to the expansion of world trade . . ."

Just words, words, words.

O.E.C.D. is a revised version of O.E.E.C., which was just another mantle under which politicians and bureaucrats could "swan" to international debates at the taxpayer's expense despite a consistent record of absolute failure to create even one additional job for Canadian workers.

Two hundred and fifty million citizens of western Europe have decided that small national trading units do not offer an open gateway to mass prosperity and high living standards. So they have agreed to join together in tariff-free economic alliances. These two European groupings, destined one day to amalgamate, are known as the inner six and the European free trade association.

Who are we, eighteen million Canadians, to know better? Yet we have failed to negotiate our entry into either of those prosperous blocs, and we even rejected the offer of a free ride in by Britain. Today, we are not even exploring that golden pasture; we are just signing conventions agreeing to talk, talk, talk.

Now Mr. Speaker, few people would question the soundness of these observations, nor could anyone doubt that the principal cause of the problem is the imbalance of our trade with other nations. Our exports are not sufficient to meet the goods and services which we import and to meet the payments on our foreign debt. There is also a growing body of public opinion, which is substantiated by visible evidence, that Canada is suffering from duplication of production facilities for articles which have only a limited market when divided amongst the numerous participants. This situation leads to lower individual production which, in turn, causes higher prices to meet those costs and those higher costs invite imports, thus bringing new competitors into the production field to divide the small market that exists.

The president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association appearing before the Senate manpower committee had this to say on the subject.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was about to quote the president of the

Alleged Lack of Trade Policy

Canadian Manufacturers' Association who appeared before the Senate manpower committee. Mr. Kinsman had this to say on the subject of trade and competition:

> This uneconomic multiplication of firms prevents any one of them from securing the benefits of mass production and leads to increased costs and prices. Apart from preventing exports, these higher costs and prices invite imports and tend to bring new competitors into the production field in Canada to further divide markets which were already too small.

By way of example, Mr. Kinsman said there were nine refrigerator manufacturers in Canada for the domestic market, which situation does not appear to make much sense.

Representatives of the electrical manufacturers were asked by Senator David Croll of Toronto to comment upon this observation. One of the manufacturers of refrigerators, Westinghouse president, Mr. J. D. Campbell, readily agreed that there were too many companies in the business, while acknowledging that it was difficult for him to be objective. He said there was a total market in Canada for 350,000 to 400,000 units a year, while at a conservative estimate the Canadian manufacturers had enough capacity to produce one million units.

Mr. H. D. Style, president of John Inglis Company Limited and English Electric of Canada, said the same situation existed in a number of other domestic industries. He said their production capacity was sufficient to more than supply the total Canadian market, a varying share of which was now going to foreign manufacturers.

Of course, I am not suggesting that we should set up controls and prevent any company from entering any manufacturing field. It is entirely up to them. On the other hand, Canadians should not be asked to pay a higher price for commodities, which would be the result of giving increased tariff protection to inefficient, small producers, who in all probability would soon be back asking for still higher tariffs.

We certainly do not advocate cut-throat competition; nor is it our duty to ask the people, the consumers, to pay the higher prices which higher tariffs would impose.

Contrary to the common belief that high tariffs protect Canadian industries, in reality, in most cases it has the direct tendency of inviting retaliation in kind.

I am fearful that as a result of a short-sighted policy on trade and tariffs, while we may keep out a few thousand television tubes made in Japan, we may jeopardize the sale of millions of bushels of wheat to that country which, incidentally, has a large trade deficit with us. Japan's chief import from this country is wheat, a commodity of which Canada has a huge surplus. Other commodities which Japan buys from us are the products which directly benefit hard pressed industries such as coal and iron mines.

We should also remind ourselves that we are not the only wheat producers in the world; but in its trade and tariff policies this government acts as if Canada were the only source.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) devoted a considerable portion of his speech to the absurd assumption that the members of the official opposition were against buying Canadian.

I wish to remind hon. members of this house in general and the minister in particular, that on February 11, 1960, as will be found in Hansard at page 952, I urged the government to give consideration to the advisability of sponsoring a "buy Canadian" campaign. I said:

> In view of the hundreds of millions of dollars being spent importing into Canada automobiles and consumer goods of a kind already made here, has the Department of Trade and Commerce given any consideration to sponsoring a national campaign to make Canadians "buy Canadian" conscious?

The then minister of trade and commerce, now Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill), replied as follows:

> I doubt the urgency of this question, Mr. Speaker. The problem of encouraging Canadians to buy goods made in Canada is one which is of importance, and that type of campaign has been going on under the auspices of business organizations for some considerable time.

I followed up the question by asking whether the Department of Trade and Commerce had given any consideration to a national campaign sponsored by the government, and the minister replied:

> There is no consideration being given, at the moment, Mr. Speaker, to a national campaign under the auspices of the Department of Trade and Commerce. The hon. member's suggestion will be taken under advisement.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a very genial fellow and is well liked, but he is also a past master at twisting words around to create different meanings. However, he will not be able to read in my statement anything which would indicate other than that we on this side of the house are just as anxious for Canadian people to buy Canadian as any hon. member of the house, including the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce does not approve of giving any consideration to the proposition of creating a free trade area that would include the United States, Britain, Canada and some European nations.

Mr. R. M. Shaw, senior vice president of MacMillan, Bloedel and Powell River Limited of Vancouver, addressing the western retail lumbermen's association, made the following statement and I quote:

> Canada, if given access to United States markets, would undoubtedly be able to build up a secondary wood products industry to manufacture such products as prefabricated garages, summer cottages and patios, casing sets, overlays, sashes for doors and windows and garden and household furniture.

He said all these products were produced in Canada now but in insufficient volume to take advantage of the economics of mass production enjoyed by larger United States manufacturers.

At present Canada has free entry into the United States only for lumber which has been surfaced on four sides, tongued and grooved. Mr. Shaw believes that under free trade Canada would increase its volume of sales to the United States more than the United States would expand its sales to Canada of similar products.

On the broader aspects of free trade, Mr. Shaw said an outdated degree of nationalism was threatening to isolate Canada from free trade areas evolving in Europe. He said Canada should display the leadership in the free world trading community that is expected of us as a major trading nation.

However, we on this side of the house do not advocate a policy of free trade between Canada and the United States alone. Our leader has made it clear that what we favour is an Atlantic free area which would include Canada, the United States, Britain and other European nations.

Last night, the Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to the address of the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) delivered to the Empire and Canadian clubs of Toronto on April 24 and I cannot think of a more effective way to bring my remarks to a close than to quote a few paragraphs from it which will indicate the trade policy a Liberal government will establish when the Liberal party is called to form a government—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it being 8.15 o'clock it is my duty pursuant to section 4 (d) of standing order 56 as provisionally amended to interrupt these proceedings and put the question on any amendments now before the house.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Regier) which was negatived on the following division:

MOOSONEE RADAR BASE—DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR REPORT

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a grievance tonight with respect to a matter which was first brought to the attention of the house on March 14 by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel). It concerns a report by a Mr. Hegge who I believe is a business agent for the brotherhood of carpenters and joiners of America. The report had to do with working and living conditions at a federal project at the port of Moosonee. At that time the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) said that the matter had just been brought to his attention and that he would investigate it further.

On the basis of information I had been able to acquire I had occasion to discuss the matter further with the minister at that time and he informed me he was sending two officials from his department plus an official from the Department of National Health and Welfare to investigate these very serious charges. After due time a report was made and while the minister did not make the report known to the house he provided me with a copy of it, and my grievance arises out of the complete inadequacy of the report.

To illustrate this point, I think I should list the charges contained in the original news release and say something about their gravity. The news release was made by an officer of the union who professed to have gone to the site and who professed to have gone to the spot. Seldom have I seen a more scathing report than that contained in this release. On examination we find that it contains some 27 specific charges with respect to working conditions, cases of discrimination, false pretences and so on. I think I should list the charges in order to bring hon. members up to date with respect to this matter.

Some of the charges are of a minor nature while others are much graver. However, I think I should list them all because if these charges are true then the minor ones are a part of the over-all picture. The first charge had to do with living conditions and the use of double bunks in a small room, something which was claimed to have been barred from camps of this type for many years. The second charge was that there were no lockers for the men in which they could keep their clothes and personal belongings. Furthermore, there were no doors on the rooms in the bunkhouses and the rooms were open. Only two blankets were issued to each man although we must all realize that at Moosonee the temperature often falls as low as 30, 40, 50 or even 60 degrees below zero.

If I may continue with the complaint, there was inadequate heating, especially in the shower room. There were no shower curtains. There were no laundry or drying facilities. The toilets in this place were broken or there were no seats, and so forth. The basins in the washrooms were not cleaned or sterilized and the floors were never washed. The man who made the complaint said that the only time the floor ever saw water was when the sun warmed up enough so that the water formed by melting snow dripped through the leaky roof. There were no safety inspections. There was no first aid equipment in the camp. The men were transported back and forth to work in open dumptrucks when the temperature was 40 or 50 below zero. There was no doctor available to these men, although they were charged medical fees in order to provide the services of a doctor.

There were two charges that might be termed false pretences. It was stated the men were being sent up from the Timmins unemployment insurance office with the promise that they would start at $1.85 per hour with an increase in two weeks. This was not so. Statements were also made that the men would be able to acquire all the overtime they wanted. Again, this was not true. There was a charge that the men were being fined for no given reason. Some of the men, after returning to Timmins, were sent back again and refused employment. These men found themselves without money, and there was no way they could get back to civilization because the trains operated only twice a week. In some cases the men were forced to sell their personal effects or to beg money from the parish priest in order to get back to a larger community.

The men were being fired, as I said, without reason in between trains and their belongings were deposited in the snow. If any hon. member is familar with the number of dogs that prevail in a community like Moosenee he will realize what a hazard it is to have belongings placed out in the snow.

Another charge was that there were no vacation paybooks supplied to these men. This reminds me of a complaint I had last year in connection with this same construction company. The company found a loophole in the regulations and was thereby enabled to flout the intention of the law. It was alleged the company cheated men out of thousands of dollars of vacation pay as a result of this loophole. Evidently a man had to complete a year's work before he became eligible for vacation pay. The weather in this area was such that the men could not work for more than 10 or 11 months, so they never did complete one year of service. Some of these men had had been going back into this area for four or five years, but they never received any vacation pay.

There were charges of discrimination. Carpenters were being paid $1.85 per hour and labourers $1.25 per hour, but both were charged $3 per day for room and board. However, plumbers and steamfitters were being paid $3.47 per hour and they were given free room and board, free transportation and fare in and out if they stayed six months or were laid off before six months had been completed. The last charge was, irrespective of the fact wages have gone up considerably since 1956, this same company was paying $2.15 per hour for the same type of work back in 1956, with free room and board and transportation. This can be compared with the alleged conditions existing today.

Well, Mr. Speaker, this list constitutes quite a number of serious charges that warrant close investigation. After some three weeks I was supplied with this answer and I think it is only fair to put it on the record in its entirety. I quote:

> On being advised by Defence Construction Limited of the complaint concerning certain conditions alleged to exist at the construction camp located at Moosonee, Ontario, the public health engineering division of my department—

That is the Minister of Labour's department.

> —contacted one of their engineers who was in the area on departmental business and requested an immediate examination.

This, of course, Mr. Speaker, is contrary to the picture which was given us at the time. We were led to believe the agreement was that Mr. Gordon Cushing, along with another official from the labour department plus one from the health department, would make an investigation of these serious charges. I continue:

> With the assistant project engineer of Defence Construction Limited and the project manager of the construction company in attendance, the examination was made on March 15, 1961, with special emphasis being given to complaints brought to our attention. Our public health engineer subsequently reported that no evidence was found to support the complaints.
> To be specific, all washrooms were exceptionally clean and free from obnoxious odours. In no instance were there more than two men allocated to a bedroom. Double bunk beds were noted in some bedrooms, but only lower bunks were being used. Considering the traffic involved floors were reasonably clean. At the time of the visit some bedroom floors were being washed by maintenance personnel. The main camp is heated by a central steam system and it was reported that this equipment had not been inoperative during the present winter. Two blankets were issued to each employee, but if desired he may request additional ones.
> In general, it was felt that the living conditions in this camp were very good and that the procedures followed to maintain them were satisfactory.

As I stated before, there were some 27 specific charges mentioned in this press release. Out of these 27 charges, two were admitted but it was stated they did not apply. Two charges were evaded. One of these had to do with the heating in the bunkhouse and in the showers. The reply was that the plant had not been inoperative, but that was not the charge at all. The charge was that the heating was inadequate. Two more charges were given very suspicious answers. These charges referred to the cleaning ad washing. The reply was that washrooms were exceptionally clean and that the floors were in the process of being washed while the investigation was being made. This statement reminds me of the good old army days when the brigadier came around on inspection. We had at least one week's notice so that we could get everything shipshape before he arrived.

Not one of the other 21 charges was answered or even mentioned. According to this report, the inspection was made but keeping in mind the specific charges that had been made this is either a very poor report of a good inspection or a good report of a very poor inspection. I do not know which. I believe these are serious charges. I do not know whether or not they are true. I think we should know if the charges are true. I feel that the inspection carried out according to the report given to me was certainly inadequate in the face of these serious charges. These charges should be proved or disproved. If these charges are wrong, certainly the man who made them should be condemned for making them. Until such time as the charges are proved false, this situation should be investigated. If these charges are true, some definite action should be taken.

Mr. J. A. Habel (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, this matter is related to work being done in my riding, so I feel it is my duty to say a word about it. On March 14 I received a letter from Mr. Hegge and I submitted the brief which was sent along with the letter to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). In the afternoon, in reply to a question of mine, he promised to investigate the matter.

I understand that the department has investigated the matter, although perhaps not to the satisfaction of the complainant or the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin). However, I wish to inform this house that I have been a member of the Ontario legislature for 12 years and I would not take a back seat to the hon. member for Timmins when it comes to investigating these matters and seeing that employees work under fair conditions, whether it be in camps or construction companies.

The hon. member for Timmins has risen tonight and taken it upon himself to substantiate all the charges that have been made. This shows that the new socialist party has only one hope, which is to try to impress labour that they are the only ones who can talk on behalf of labour and on the protection of labour.

Mr. Speaker, there is one further point I should like to raise, and it concerns the use of information that cannot be substantiated.

If the hon. member for Timmins feels it is right for him to continue with this grievance tonight, even when he knows very well that there are very grave doubts as to many aspects of the complaints, I feel he is not helping these workers, who I hope are enjoying the privilege of working.

With regard to the wage of $1.85 an hour, the hon. member claimed that wages somewhere else were higher in other years. On the other hand, the people who were hired in this area were told by the employment office at Timmins that the rate was to be $1.85 an hour.

In his reply to me dated April 7, Mr. Hegge admitted in the second part of his letter that the rate of $1.85 an hour is the only rate quoted by the Timmins office of the national employment service. This shows that these workers knew they were going to work for $1.85 an hour. Therefore, it seems to me that a member of parliament should take his responsibility seriously enough to not depend on all kinds of innuendos and insinuations to try and prevent people from obtaining employment.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) wish to speak on the same matter?

Mr. Caron: Not on the same matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) wish to speak on the same matter?

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I did not intend to speak on this grievance, but I think I should, having regard to what the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel) has said.

It may very well be that we in this corner are the only ones who will speak for labour—

Mr. Ricard: You have another guess coming to you.

Mr. Peters: —and if these charges are made and are to be substantiated, we will certainly take the responsibility for that.

I have talked to a number of people who work in that area and live in the riding of Timiskaming. Many of these complaints have been repeated to me. Unfortunately, it is a difficult proposition to go to Moosonee alone and investigate these complaints. However, I have read the report that was presented to the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin). I agree that the report is not definite, but complaints have been made to me within the last two weeks concerning some of the conditions dealt with in this report, which report indicates that they do not exist.

The area of Moosonee is an exceptionally difficult one to get into. For this reason I am sure the hon. member for Timmins particularly stressed this matter of travel arrangements being made for someone who is going to be fired. Certainly consideration must be given to these people getting in and out of the area, because the train does not run every day; three days elapse between going into the area and getting out again. Therefore some consideration should be given to this aspect of the situation, if only because it is such a remote area.

I have been in the bunkhouses that we are discussing. They were closed for several years, with the exception of one that was kept open for the staff in the area. These bunkhouses are now being used again, and conditions cannot be as good as they should be.

I think any hon. member who receives complaints should do something about them. This is also true of the hon. member for Cochrane. If he is the labour representative that he says he is, or tries to imply, I think he has the obligation to go to Moosonee—not I, and not the hon. member for Timmins—because it is in his riding. The hon. member has an obligation to go into Moosonee and investigate this matter. It is a difficult trip; it is 150 miles up and 150 miles back; but the hon. member for Cochrane has the obligation to do that. If he does not show this interest, I think he has very little right to rise and attack another hon. member for having brought this matter again to the attention of the government.

In my opinion the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) should investigate this problem. He should investigate it by sending officials to the area and the officials should not necessarily see the company and have a planned tour. It is almost impossible to get into Moosonee as it is without the company knowing about it, because unless you fly in you have to go to the railway to make arrangements to go there. You have to notify the information director of the railway and arrange for accommodation in Moosonee, because the railway owns the only lodge in that community. Therefore it is almost impossible to go in on a surprise visit.

I think the minister should give full consideration to these charges. He should send a representative of his department into the area. If the prevailing rates are not in accordance with the rates that are being paid in other instances for this type of job in an isolation posting, and if the job requirements are not being met, I think the government has a right to demand from the contractor that wages and conditions be raised to a suitable level.

Mr. Regier: Where is the minister?

Mr. Peters: I am not responsible for the minister, and I am not particularly responsible for this grievance. However, I have talked to some of the constituents in my area who are working there, who have told me that conditions are not as good as they should be.

We agree that there has to be some leeway in the type of accommodation that is available in that area, but I point out that one of the other companies in the locality has very good bunkhouses.

The bunkhouses under discussion are very old and are in bad shape. They have not been used to any extent for some years. They have outside, steam heating that runs between one building and another, and in temperatures of between 40 to 50 degrees below zero it is quite legitimate that complaints should be registered against these conditions.

I am surprised that we should be asked to accept a report which indicates, not that the heating is not sufficient but that it had never been shut off for a period of a year. In my opinion that does not mean very much. If it is not adequate it might as well be shut off, because it will probably be very uncomfortable living in this type of quarters.

Again I repeat that if workers across the country have to turn to the C.C.F. and the New Party entirely to handle the type of complaints we have received from Moosonee, we will make every effort to see that justice is brought into this matter.

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, one thing has been made apparent tonight concerning the particular grievance raised first by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) and later by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel). If anything has been demonstrated tonight it has been the failure of the New Party, the C.C.F., or whatever they choose to call themselves, and the Liberal party to take an aggressive interest in their constituencies whether in the case of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel) or his colleagues from the same area. In the face of the unhappy conditions which were described this evening by the hon. member for Timmins it seems to me that any member of parliament in that area who heard about incidents of that kind would have gone into them and examined them. If the people of that area had had the wisdom to elect a Progressive Conservative member this type of thing would have been investigated and rectified.

Mr. Peters: Is the hon. member for York-Scarborough familiar with the situation in which this problem was raised many months ago? The government was asked to make an investigation into it and it is only recently that the results of the investigation have indicated the unfortunate situation which now exists.

Mr. Argue: What about the mess at Scarborough?

Mr. McGee: To reply to the first question first, I have taken the trouble since this grievance was made to examine Hansard. I listened most carefully, as I always do, to the hon. member for Timmins, and if the New Party has this monopoly of concern for the working man—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has departed somewhat from the grievance, as have one or two others who have spoken. If the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) has risen on the same matter as the hon. member for York-Scarborough he might as well save his time.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to assure the house that any member of this group will always take up any complaint regardless of the constituency in which it might originate. We consider that as members of this house we are responsible to the whole nation and that we are expected to do what we can on behalf of all the people of Canada.

However, I should like to place on record my sincere regret that after the member for Timmins had risen and announced his complaint the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) should have deemed it advisable to leave the house and has not even been represented by his parliamentary secretary. I should like to place it on record that both of them are absent.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I had, of course, no previous knowledge of the matters which would be raised nor have I any definite knowledge of the circumstances which surround the absence of the two members referred to, but I do know that the Minister of Labour was required to leave the house tonight to go, I am told, on official business to the United States. I take exception to the inference as to the cause of his absence made by an uninformed member of this house.

Mr. Regier: I would have the hon. lady know that I am very adequately informed as to the situation in Moosonee, and I regret that in the absence of the minister it was not deemed advisable to at least have him represented by his parliamentary secretary.

UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT REPLY TO DELEGATION

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Yesterday around one thousand unemployed marched in Ottawa to meet the cabinet and present a brief to them. I must first of all congratulate the unemployed who came to Ottawa on the orderly manner in which they conducted themselves. They presented a very well prepared brief.

What was the reaction of the members of the cabinet present? First, who were present? There was the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees), the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley), and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith). Out of the five only one was wise enough not to speak, knowing the government could or would not do much more. He was the Minister of Defence Production. He knew, after the declaration made by the Minister of Labour not very long ago, that very little more would be done and he was wise enough not to say a word during the meeting. His colleague had said, of course, that the government having done everything it could possibly do and the rest was in the hands of labour and management.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Were you there?

Mr. Caron: I take that from the newspapers that reported the proceedings.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): You should have been there and you would have known he did speak.

Mr. Speaker: One at a time. Perhaps the hon. member would state his grievance so that we might understand it. I am not sure whether his grievance was that the ministers spoke or that one did not speak.

Mr. Caron: My grievance is that the unemployed came to Ottawa, they met the ministers, and the answers they received were not equal to the present situation being faced by the unemployed in Canada. That is my grievance. What did the Minister of Labour say or promise? First, according to the Montreal Gazette, the minister said—and this is in quotation marks:

> As a government, we don't want this problem. It is not the kind any government would want to perpetuate.

I certainly admit that no government would like to perpetuate the kind of situation we have presently in Canada. I want to be fair to the minister. I do not want to believe that the government is not doing the best it can in the present situation. But the best the government can do is not enough for us nor is it enough for the unemployed of this country. The government refused for three years to admit there was an unemployment problem. For three years it said there was no unemployment, and the Liberals and the other parties were criticized as spreaders of doom and gloom. The government declined to take action until the situation was out of hand and it could do little about it. Second, the government did not act with sufficient energy and daring when finally it did attempt to do something about the situation. The only thing it came out with was the winter works program.

Mr. Speaker: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member unnecessarily but the grievance procedure at this stage permits of the expression of definite single items of grievance. It seems to me that the hon. member is allowing his grievance to range over the whole field of unemployment and action taken in that regard. I understood his grievance related to the reception given to a delegation in Ottawa yesterday. If the hon. member would confine himself to that he would be in order.

Mr. Caron: My intention is to speak about the way these men were received and the little which was given to them by way of promises by the government. I should like to speak about the way in which the government might have dealt with the matter while this delegation was here. This would cover the question of unemployment to a certain extent. These were unemployed men coming here and wanting help from the government —wanting to have the question settled once and for all by the government—and I think the grievance, put in that way, could be accepted by the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to draw the hon. member's attention to the grievance being discussed now, and that is, generally, the measures taken or not taken to meet the unemployment situation. We have had, in the course of the session, several debates which have been concluded and disposed of by the house, notably supply motion No. 2 and a motion under the heading of unemployment. There are four or five discussions listed which have all been concluded. I would think the hon. member would not be free to roam over the whole field of unemployment again. However, having initiated the grievance relating to the delegation of unemployed who were received here yesterday, he should confine his remarks to the reception of that delegation or any complaint he has to make in that respect.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege at this point. I understand that it was said in this house by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) that I was on my way to Washington on official business. I would like to point out that as a matter of fact I was, but just before I left I was detained and requested to come back to the house because of allegations made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). I should like to make it perfectly clear that I was on my way but was called here urgently as I was leaving.

I have been listening with interest to the allegations now being made by the member for Hull (Mr. Caron).

Mr. McGee: Where is the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the brief which was presented to the cabinet covers a lot of ground, I think I should be allowed to refer to this question which was brought to the attention of the minister, and it was my intention to do so this evening. If I touch occasionally on subjects which may have been discussed, it is not my intention to press in that direction. I do so only to reach the main point which has to do with the brief presented to the minister.

What did the Minister of Labour promise? According to a report appearing in the Montreal Gazette of April 25, 1961 he is reported as saying:

Jobs before elections—

In view of the number of promises made and the number which have been carried out to date, God help us if we have to wait until everyone in Canada has a job before we have a general election. I am sure the population of Canada will not wait 25 years before we have a general election.

We have two different statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Public Works. The Minister of Public Works, as reported by the Toronto Star, said that a massive public works program is not the answer to unemployment because it is the most expensive way of solving the problem.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I draw your attention to the fact that it is up to the member for Hull (Mr. Caron) to decide what speech he is going to make, but in doing so he must obey your ruling. You have called his attention to the fact that he had to stay within the boundaries of the grievance that he has chosen to put before the house, and I would ask that he confine himself to that subject and not wander all over.

Mr. Speaker: I understood that the hon. member for Hull was now discussing the answer given to the delegation by the Minister of Public Works. If he confines himself to what was said or done in the course of the reception of that delegation, I think he is in order.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, with great respect for what you have said I do think he was discussing unemployment in raising old questions that have been discussed here time and time again. I feel he should confine himself to that subject which he has chosen to present.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Hull has discovered an ingenious way of introducing all of the unemployment issues by referring to speeches that have been made. If he will proceed in the light of what has been said, I am sure there will be no further difficulty.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I am trying very hard to stay within the rules you have mentioned.

An hon. Member: You are not quite succeeding.

Mr. Caron: As I indicated, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works said that a massive public works program is the most expensive way of solving the problem of unemployment. However, on February 18, 1958 the Prime Minister announced that expenditures by government departments and agencies for works projects would total $280 million during the first quarter of 1958 and $1,185 million during the full calendar year. It is evident that the Prime Minister at that time did not think as the Minister of Public Works does now, that it is not a good way to solve the unemployment problem. He did not suggest at that time that it was the most expensive way of solving the problem but that it was one of the ways.

We have always felt that this was only one way of solving the problem. We feel that the problem could be solved through unemployment benefits, through public works projects, through a new system of education providing the unskilled with vocational training. We believe all these methods could be used as well as many more which I will mention later. We have always preached this policy and we intend to do so until we have the opportunity of meeting the Conservative party in a general election. I will say that I hope it will be as soon as possible.

Mr. Ricard: It will be too soon for you.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I hope the hon. member will appreciate that in addition to the 23 measures we have taken so far to alleviate the unemployment situation, some $100 million have been spent on public works projects this year, but we do not consider that this is the only remedy to the problem.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. minister will have an opportunity to make his speech.

Mr. Caron: Even if what the minister has said is completely true the measures taken have not proved sufficient in the face of the present unemployment situation, and I feel that a good deal more should be done.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member again but it does seem to me that he is in fact discussing the general issues of unemployment rather than the reception, by the ministers he has named, of that delegation yesterday. Unless there is something specific or peculiar in regard to a grievance arising out of that meeting I suggest he defer his discussion on the unemployment issue to a time when it is relevant.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I can say a word on this point of order which has been raised? As I listened to my friend, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron), it seemed to me that he drew attention to the fact that the Minister of Public Works during the reception of this delegation yesterday said that public works projects represented the most expensive way of dealing with unemployment. My hon. friend was seeking to point out, as a grievance, that this was exactly the opposite to what—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps some of the experts over here will speak to the point of order in their turn. I was saying that the hon. member for Hull was saying, as I understood him, in respect of his grievance, that this was an absolute contradiction of that which was promised to the people of Canada.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis) must realize that a point of order is now being discussed, and he will—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, that is why I was raising the—

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member resume his seat. I am hearing the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) on a point of order as to the relevancy of the debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I was attempting to point out that the position taken by the government in relation to this delegation yesterday—I understand this is what was being pointed out by the hon. member for Hull—was exactly opposite to that position taken by the Prime Minister when he appealed to the people of Canada just before the last general election. Surely that is a specific enough point. Surely that is a grievance that those of us who represent the people of Canada have a perfect right to put forward in this house.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members seem to have lost their constituencies or their seats tonight. If the hon. member for Hull asserts that his grievance is the disparity between what was said yesterday and the Prime Minister's previous statement, well and good. He might proceed to discuss that as his grievance but he cannot cover the whole field of unemployment by picking out the various ministers who referred to measures for the relief of unemployment and then discussing those measures.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I was carried away by the remarks made by the Minister of Labour. I admit I made a mistake; I apologize for it. I was trying to show that the answers given by the ministers were not the kind of answers which had been given at that time, and the only way I can do it is by proving with facts that they are not really up to standard with respect to the administration of this country at this time.

The Minister of Public Works made a supreme effort to help the marchers by offering two pick-and-shovel jobs, one in Hamilton and the other in Toronto. What a great help from a great heart. As a Frenchman said:

Une jolie fille ne peut donner que ce qu'elle a.

And I am not surprised that it was the only thing that the Minister of Public Works could offer to the delegation in Ottawa. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) was also there. What did he bring forward to help the situation? According to the Toronto Star again, he just accused the delegation of sneering at the productivity council. According to the Toronto Star, a minister of the United Church suggested the Minister of Trade and Commerce had accused the committee of begging for jobs when in fact, said the minister, the government has a responsibility to provide them with jobs. To prove this I will quote what the Prime Minister said in this house not this year but in a past year. I shall locate the quotation in a minute.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The hon. member has another 25 minutes to find it.

Mr. Grafftey: Lamontagne broke his stapler.

Unemployment

Mr. Caron: I may not be in a position to quote exactly what the Prime Minister said, but in 1958, during a debate in this house, the Prime Minister said—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): From what page of Hansard is the hon. member quoting?

Mr. Caron: I will give you the page of Hansard. It is page 2149 of Hansard of 1955. I happen to be able to give this from memory.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): It was 1958 before.

Mr. Caron: Here it is exactly, page 2149 of the French version of Hansard of March 15, 1955. Here is what the Prime Minister said:

(Translation):

Over the past seven or eight years there have been recommendations by the national employment commission, the Sirois commission and others, that the dominion should assume responsibility for necessary relief to the employable unemployed. It has been generally suggested that the dominion should accept this obligation as part of any general settlement with the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, that is how the present Prime Minister, the then leader of the opposition, felt that the government should consider that question of relief in general.

Mr. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member is discussing the question of unemployment in general, as can be ascertained by what he just said: "That is how we dealt with the question in general". A few moments ago, Mr. Speaker, you said that the hon. member should limit his remarks to a specific grievance, that is the welcome extended yesterday to the delegation.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Concerning this point of order—

(Text):

On the point of order raised by my hon. friend, I know he repeated exactly word for word what you said, sir, a while ago. I am trying very hard to keep within your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may be trying and I give him credit for that but he certainly is not being very successful. I think I shall have to hear another member.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I intend to follow the observations of my hon. friend from Hull very exactly and I do not intend to weary the house by repeating the headlines from the Montreal Gazette that some time before the government dares to have another election it would try to find jobs, although—

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member is out of order also.

Mr. Pickersgill: —only a year ago the same Minister of Labour went on television—and this is the grievance which my hon. friend brought up, that the reception given to those people yesterday was the precise opposite of what has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite—on the program "The Nation's Business" one night and said the depression was over and we were going to have another boom year in 1960, a year when unemployment went to the highest level it had been in 30-odd years. Also the Minister of Public Works says that a massive program of public works is the wrong way, the most expensive way, to provide employment. Well, sir, I think we had better see what those people got elected on.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, I do not agree with the hon. member's view that the grievance which has been raised entitles hon. members to discuss the range of unemployment problems in the light of the past.

The grievance relates to the reception of a committee here yesterday and if those grievances have been exhausted I suggest we turn to other matters.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, sir, I was pointing out that the reception was quite out of accord with what the unemployed had a right to expect on the basis of the terms on which an appeal was made to the people in the year 1958, which returned hon. gentlemen to the treasury benches. I say, sir, that those people who came here yesterday in this march were entitled to expect that the government would receive them and would say to them that they were going to do the kind of things that the government said before the election it intended to do, and we all remember. "Deficit or no deficit"—these were the words used—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: —the work would be provided.

Mr. Martineau: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I see the hon. member for Stormont. I take it he is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): With all deference, might I suggest that the present speaker is just as incoherent and unintelligible as his predecessor and therefore we should hear from another member of the team.

Mr. Martineau: On the same point of order, I respectfully submit that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is trying to do in an indirect way what Your Honour expressly stated was out of order, and I therefore think he should not proceed.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member who has the floor might proceed and we shall bear in mind what has been said.

Mr. Pickersgill: What I was seeking to do was to point out that the reception that was given yesterday to this delegation was completely out of accord with what these people had a right to expect having regard to the undertakings which were given on this precise subject by the leader of the government when he appealed to the people in 1958. I propose to demonstrate that point from the words of the Prime Minister which hon. gentlemen opposite seem anxious not to hear. I propose to put on record, in complete opposition to what was said yesterday, what was said by the Prime Minister at that time.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot, of course, indicate to the hon. member how he should make his speech but I think I would be correct in suggesting to him that he should first indicate the grievance arising out of yesterday's reception. If he wishes then to indicate wherein there is a grievance with respect to that reception, he might be right in proceeding, but my difficulty is that the hon. member seems to me to be reviewing a lot of statements about unemployment without connecting them with what was done yesterday.

Mr. Pickersgill: I referred at least twice, I think, to the statement made by the Minister of Public Works, a statement that a massive program of public works was not the way to deal with unemployment and was most expensive. As I was saying, it seems to me that any unemployed Canadian has a grievance and that we who represent the people and in my case, unfortunately, a very large number of persons who have the misfortune to be unemployed at the present time—

Mr. Starr: Have they not been able to fish yet?

Mr. Pickersgill: Not only have they not been able to fish but the commission for which the hon. gentleman is responsible is, as he knows, making it increasingly difficult for those people who cannot fish at this season of the year to take work as carpenters because of a ridiculous bureaucratic interpretation which has been placed on the law made by this parliament, an interpretation which was never placed on it before. The hon. gentleman knows very well to what I am referring. He knows very well why it is being done.

Mr. Starr: I know very well it is not true.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid I would be departing from the grievance now before the house if I were encouraged by the interruptions of the Minister of Labour to refer to that matter, though it is another grievance on which I would be very happy to speak.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I trust that the hon. member who has the floor will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is very difficult to proceed.

Mr. Starr: As long as he sticks to the truth.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have devised a new form of closure which makes it very difficult—

Mr. Starr: You are a master at closure.

Mr. Pickersgill: —for any member of the opposition to criticize the government—

Mr. Starr: You are a past master at closure.

Mr. Pickersgill: —with any freedom of speech.

Mr. Ricard: What are you doing now?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I feel that the hon. member who has the floor has just cause for complaint. It is impossible to proceed if members interrupt, particularly from their seats, and I trust that for the remaining minutes available to the hon. member to make his speech he will be given the appropriate hearing to which every hon. member is entitled.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, may I refer—

Some hon. Members: Closure, closure.

Mr. Ricard: Which one is going to speak?

Mr. Pickersgill: I just have one point to make and I am sure that what the hon. member for St. Denis has to say will be much more interesting than what I have to say. I should like to be allowed to make my point consecutively if it is at all possible, and I know it is very difficult for hon. gentlemen opposite to listen because nothing one can say in this house hurts them so much as to hear extracts read from the speeches that their own leader made before the 1958 election. I know they find it most distasteful. We can say anything else but the moment we pick up their leader's speeches and start to read them in the house they do their best to prevent them being repeated.

Mr. Ricard: Because you are out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I leave it to anyone to guess why. As I have said, the hon. member for Hull has pointed out that the Minister of Public Works publicly repudiated the notion that public works should be used to relieve unemployment. But what did the Prime Minister say on February 24, 1958, in Cornwall? I draw this to the attention of the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Campbell). He said:

> The Conservatives had launched a winter works program and were putting forward a huge public works program to take up some of the slack in unemployment.

That is what they were told before the election but they are told now after the election that public works are not a good means by which to deal with unemployment. But the Prime Minister went even further. With that fine restraint that the Prime Minister shows on the public platform, that moderation, that good sense and good judgment that he always shows in these circumstances, he went on to say:

> "We have acted."

The only way they acted, of course, was to dissolve parliament.

> "We are meeting unemployment. We have given young Canadians the hope. We have given them the vision."

"We have given them the vision." Unfortunately, sir—

Mr. Starr: Don't sneer.

Mr. Pickersgill: —all they got was the vision. That is all they got because the great billion dollar public works program of 1958 which was to end unemployment in this country was never carried out at all, as will be shown by the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget) on an appropriate occasion. It was never carried out at all. It was just one of those many promises that were broken.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is all I wish to say at this time.

Mr. O'Hurley: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to set the record straight by telling the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) that I was at the meeting yesterday, that there was one delegate from the province of Quebec who spoke French and that I was courteous enough to reply to him in French at the meeting yesterday morning. I want the hon. member for Hull to know that as I was at the meeting I certainly took part in the meeting in a courteous way and replied to the delegate from Montreal who spoke.

Mr. Denis: On a question of privilege—

Mr. O'Hurley: Just a minute.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member state his question of privilege?

Mr. Denis: Yes. I attended the Liberal meeting with the delegation at that time—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ricard: Liberal meeting?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would both hon. members resume their seats? The minister has the floor and the hon. member for St. Denis raises a question of privilege. If he has a question of privilege he must first state it.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, according to the minister, not a word in French was said in front of the delegation.

Mr. O'Hurley: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is contradicting the other hon. member who has the floor and that does not raise a question of privilege. If he wants to make a speech he will have the opportunity in due course. In the meantime I have recognized the Minister of Defence Production.

Mr. O'Hurley: My point was to set the record clear. I was among the ministers who met the delegation yesterday morning. There was one delegate who spoke in French and the hon. member for Hull said that I was at the meeting and did not say anything. I want to say that this delegate spoke in French as he had a right to do and I replied to him in French in the name of the other ministers. I want to set the record clear.

Mr. Caron: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, if I have offended the Minister of Defence Production I want to excuse myself because what I said was that he was the only wise one in that he did not speak. If he spoke, it is all right with me.

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, in order to be in order I should like to refer to the pamphlet entitled "Submission to Right Honourable J. Diefenbaker and Cabinet, House of Commons, Ottawa"—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member indicate whether he is rising on the same grievance?

Mr. Denis: Yes, the same grievance.

Mr. Speaker: That is, with regard to the delegation of yesterday?

Mr. Denis: As a matter of fact, I am referring to the submission made by this delegation, the same delegation which met the minister. I quote from page 2:

> "As long as I am in power, no person is going to suffer because of the inaction of the government." Chatham, March, 1958.

This statement was part of the submission and, so far as I am aware, no minister has answered that promise or that commitment made by the present government. I think an answer should have been given to the delegation.

I should like to refer to page 12 of this submission where a reference is made to the winter works program.

Mr. Creaghan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: Closure.

Mr. Creaghan: For the last half hour or so, we have been hearing a debate on a subject which you, Mr. Speaker, without any question, ruled out of order. I feel my point of order is a proper one. The opposition would be raising a proper grievance if the cabinet announced government policy yesterday to the press or to the organized marchers. My point of order is that government policy must be announced in the house when the house is in session and not to organized marchers. The opposition has no right to criticize the action of the government yesterday in not informing a group of marchers what it intends to do about this very serious problem.

Mr. Denis: I think, Mr. Speaker, you have ruled that as long as we speak about the delegation we are in order. This is the first time I have heard—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry I cannot accept what the hon. member for Westmorland raises as a point of order. It might be a matter of privilege if policy were announced, but that is not the subject matter of the grievance as I understand it. Would the hon. member proceed?

Mr. Denis: May I refer to page 12 of this submission where reference is made to the winter works program. There are three suggestions made by this national unemployment lobby committee to which the minister has not replied. I quote:

> In the first place, it is another example of government action that falls far short of the need—a mere drop in the bucket. It employs only a small fraction of the workers looking for jobs. The government's own unemployment figures prove this to the hilt.
> Second, the program offers only construction jobs. Not all the unemployed are construction workers, by a long shot. Most of them are not fitted for this kind of work, either by experience, skill or in many cases physical capacity.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has read at length from the submission, I take it, of the delegation which is the subject matter of this discussion. The grievance, as I understand it, does not relate to the submission but to the conduct of the government; that is their responsibility. What was submitted is not the responsibility of the government and I suggest that if the hon. member is going to continue he might let the matter rest there and proceed to discuss the grievance itself.

Mr. Denis: I feel that an answer should have been given to the delegation while the ministers were present, but no word has been said about an answer.

Mr. Starr: I rise on a question of privilege at this time, Mr. Speaker. I spent a great deal of time going into this municipal winter works program in answer to this brief. I am very sorry indeed that the press did not print my remarks, but if the Liberal party is going to base its argument—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have indicated to the hon. member who has the floor that he is out of order in continuing to read the document. He may take as his grievance the failure to answer the delegation, but he may not read at length from the document.

Mr. Denis: All I want to say, Mr. Speaker, is that this submission—

Mr. Pallett: I wonder if the hon. member would permit one question?

Mr. Denis: Certainly.

Mr. Pallett: Did the hon. member not hear the leader of the delegation state on television during the news broadcast at 11 o'clock last night that the Minister of Labour received them with sympathy and a genuine understanding of their problem? Is the hon. member aware of that?

Mr. Denis: These people are polite. We heard that the delegation had been received with sympathy. Of course, they were not going to fight each other. The minister had to be polite because he had nothing to offer them. The only thing he could do was to be polite.

However, I am talking about the winter works program. The delegation proved to the minister that this winter works program was only a crumb in so far as the relief of unemployment was concerned. The government should have told them, for instance, that it was going to see the provincial government in Quebec and make arrangements for sharing the cost of the winter works program, sharing not only the salaries—

Mr. Speaker: Order. In my view the hon. member is debating a matter which we have debated several times this session, namely the winter works program. Would he please return to the subject matter initiated by the hon. member for Hull.

Mr. Denis: Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it is ten o'clock. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty pursuant to section 3 (f) of standing order 56, as provisionally amended, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question now before the house.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

The estimates of the following departments were first taken up and entered for consideration:

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

67. Departmental administration, $9,574,385.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

232. Departmental administration, $3,455,378.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

402. Departmental administration, $3,395,700.

Proceedings reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business will be for tomorrow and the rest of the week?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow, in accordance with an announcement made last week and by agreement among the parties, we intend to commence a debate on external affairs which will continue through Wednesday and be concluded Thursday evening. On the order paper tomorrow, under notices of motion, will appear the motion in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as has been the custom in other years, transferring the estimates of that department to the committee on external affairs. This provides the vehicle for the two day debate.

I omitted to put this notice of motion in Votes and Proceedings, but I trust that the house will give consent to the procedure I have outlined for Wednesday and Thursday.

On Friday it is the intention to carry on with the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Speaker: So there may be no difficulty tomorrow, it will be in order for the house to now give unanimous consent to an order. I suggest it be that the motion be permitted without appearing on the order paper; and furthermore, that it be regarded as relevant to introduce a general debate on external affairs on that motion. Does the house agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: And is it agreed that the limit of the debate be two days?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

It being four minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

BOUNDARY BAY AND PITT MEADOWS AIRPORT SITES

Question No. 267—Mr. Taylor:

2. If not, has the government any plans to proceed with the development of Pitt Meadows?
3. If the Department of Transport intends to develop Pitt Meadows for light aircraft activities, would the department first allow representations to be made as to alternate sites or, as an alternative, could a public hearing be granted before development proceeds at Pitt Meadows?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): The answer to part 1 is no.

As to part 2, the answer is yes.

Regarding part 3, the answer is that over a number of years my department has received and fully considered representations from a number of interested aviation industry groups and individuals for and against a number of sites in the Vancouver area which would accommodate light aircraft activities.

In virtually every case objections to development were raised by one interested group or another, and the department had to proceed accordingly on the basis of what could be done in the absence of any local unanimity as to what was desirable or feasible. If there are further representations to be made in this regard they could be sent at any time to me or to my department and they will receive full consideration, but I am not satisfied that there would be any advantage gained by holding a public hearing at this late date. Indeed, this would only serve to delay once more development which is already overdue.

UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFIT RECIPIENTS AND APPLICANTS

Question No. 269—Mr. Deschatelets:

1. What is the actual number of unemployed drawing unemployment benefits?
2. What is the latest figure showing the number of unemployed applicants at the national employment offices?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): The answer to this question is as follows:

1. The number of active claims as of March 30, 1961, was 837,961.

PENSION PAYMENTS FOR MARCH, 1961

Question No. 270—Mr. Carter:

1. Were cheques to recipients of pensions under the Pension Act made out at the new rates for the month ended March 31?
2. If so, were they subsequently destroyed and replaced by new cheques at the old rate?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The answer to parts 1 and 2 is no, but the explanation is that the increase for the month of March was sent to the recipients by means of a supplemental cheque.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I find it is necessary for me to make a correction in the answer I gave to question No. 270. I have just been informed that in anticipation of the passing of the legislation some cheques were made out at the new rate. Those cheques were destroyed and replaced by cheques at the old rate for the month of March. Supplementary cheques were subsequently issued to correct the increase which was allowed in March.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND

Question No. 271—Mr. McMillan:

What was the net amount, excluding loans if any, in the unemployment insurance fund on March 31, 1961, with securities held (a) at par value (b) at the then or most recent market value?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): (a) $166,145,500; (b) $135,771,703.12.

In addition securities having a par value of $82,772,000 have been pledged to the Department of Finance to cover loans of $67 million.

C.N.R. WORK INSTRUCTIONS, MOUNTAIN REGION

Question No. 273—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1960, have any instructions or suggestions been given to any Canadian National Railways employees, specifically engine crews, working on passenger trains numbers 195 and 196 between Jasper, Alberta, and Prince Rupert, B.C., to the effect that such employees would be required to work through more than one subdivision (e.g., Prince Rupert to Smithers); and, if so, when and by what means of communication were such instructions or suggestions given, when was the change to come into effect, who was the recipient of such instructions or suggestions by name and occupation, and what has been the result thereof?

2. In giving such instructions or suggestions, was any consideration given to the hazard involved in operating trains in a mountainous area, and, if so, what consideration?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Instructions or suggestions involving train operations are considered to be matters of internal management. As a matter of general information, no change has been made in the operation of passenger trains 195 and 196.

2. Answered by No. 1.

C.N.R. TRAIN WRECKS, JASPER, PRINCE RUPERT

Question No. 274—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1959, have any train wrecks occurred along the Canadian National Railways between Jasper, Alberta, and Prince Rupert, B.C.?

2. If so, when did each such wreck occur, did any injury or loss of life result, and what was the nature of each such injury and the number of lives lost; did any damage to equipment result, and what specific pieces of equipment were involved and dollar value of the damage?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Order for return, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

C.N.R. MOVEMENT OF DISPATCH FACILITIES, B.C.

Question No. 275—Mr. Howard:

In the process of moving the dispatch facilities of the Canadian National Railways from Smithers, B.C., to Prince George, B.C., will the assignments and rights to job entitlement of the present dispatch employees be protected, and, if so, in what way?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows: The seniority provisions of the working agreement between the company and the employees' organization, the order of railroad telegraphers, will govern and apply.

C.N.R. PENSION PLAN CHANGE

Question No. 276—Mr. Fisher:

1. Did the Canadian National Railways consult with the Minister of Finance regarding the change in the pension plans from terminal to current funding in 1960?

2. If so, in what way?

3. If the change had not been made in 1960, and the terminal funding system used for that year, would the deficit of the C.N.R. have been $77,697,000 approximately, rather than the $67,497,000?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The answers are as follows:

1. Yes.

2. The Canadian National Railways consulted with the Minister of Finance indirectly through the Minister of Transport.

3. This is unlikely, for if the charges had been made on the former basis in 1960 they undoubtedly would have been different from the actual charges in 1959 and, if so, the use of the former basis would not have led to a deficit of $77,697,000.

C.N.R. LIABILITY TO PENSION FUND TRUSTEE

Question No. 277—Mr. Fisher:

What are the plans or methods by which the Canadian National Railways is to, or may, meet in future years the outstanding liability to the trustee of pension funds of $325,000,000?

11. If so, what were their nature?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have the answer here and it is rather lengthy. There are eleven parts altogether, and I would ask that the answer be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS INSTITUTE MEETING—C.B.C. SPONSORSHIP

Question No. 287—Mr. Pigeon:

1. Will the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation again sponsor, this year, the annual meeting of the Canadian institute on public affairs?
2. If not, on what grounds is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation withdrawing its sponsorship?

(Translation):

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in reply to that question, here is the information I have received from the C.B.C.

1. The C.B.C. does not sponsor the annual meeting of the Canadian institute of public affairs. It co-operates in broadcasting a certain number of the sessions and in paying the cost of such broadcasts.

2. In view of the foregoing explanation, the question of the C.B.C. revoking its sponsorship does not arise. It has always reserved the right to determine the extent of its co-operation with the institute or with any other social action organization.

The C.I.P.A. is free to discuss as its theme the relationship between the church and the French Canadian community. On the other hand, the C.B.C. is bound to see that such a matter is discussed in a thoroughly objective manner in its broadcasts, and that the most representative voices of French Canada are given an opportunity to be heard. It has to consider not only the specific balance of the discussions but also the general orientation of the conference, which inevitably goes beyond the part that is broadcast. Under the circumstances, the corporation this year prefers not to co-operate with the institute.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

THREATENED RAIL STRIKE—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER TALKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he could bring the house up to date on the efforts that are being made to avoid a railway strike at the expiration of the special legislation on May 15.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the other day I said that meetings would be taking place between the presidents of the railroads and the representatives of the unions. Those meetings are taking place. While negotiations are going on I am naturally not in a position to say more than that the meetings are being proceeded with and that every effort is being made to arrive at an acceptable agreement.

SASKATCHEWAN

RESERVATION ON LEGISLATION RESPECTING MINING CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister could bring the house up to date on what progress is being made in considering Bill No. 56 of the Saskatchewan legislature, whether a decision has been reached or when it might be expected.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question the other day and said the matter was receiving immediate attention by the cabinet and that there would not be any unnecessary delay. That answer still stands.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether the Prime Minister is in a position to table the documents which were referred to him in this matter and which were inquired about by the Leader of the Opposition the other day. The Prime Minister said he would table them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that the undertaking was subject to some qualification, that it was not an absolute one. At the time I said I saw no reason why they should not be tabled. I shall inquire to see what the present position is.

AIRPORTS

OTTAWA—INQUIRY AS TO SIGNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. As a result of my request, does the minister intend to have bilingual notices or posters set up both inside and outside the Ottawa airport, in order to eliminate the present unilingual notices?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the hon. member that all posters at the Ottawa airport have been bilingual for the last three weeks.

NATIONAL PARKS

BANFF—POSSIBLE DAMAGE THROUGH USE FOR OLYMPIC GAMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources as a provincial park commissioner and therefore interested in the welfare of all parks. Has the minister received a telegram from Professor Cowan, head of the department of zoology, University of British Columbia, expressing the serious concern of many people over possible damage to Banff national park through development for use for the Olympic games? Will the minister inform the house whether he considers this development possible without damaging the park, or has the minister any other comments to make with respect to this protest?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I received this morning from Professor Cowan the wire mentioned by the hon. member. As the hon. member knows, Banff has been selected by the Canadian winter Olympics committee as the most suitable site for the games in 1968. Canada's claim must now go before the international committee. Before Canada is selected—or perhaps I should be more positive and say when Canada is selected—for the winter games I assure the hon. member that the points raised by Professor Cowan will be kept in mind with regard to the necessary planning at Banff.

INCOME TAX

ACCEPTANCE OF RETURNS DELIVERED AFTER APRIL 30

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. This year April 30, the last day for filing income tax returns, falls on a Sunday. In view of the fact that most of the post offices in Canada are closed, and that if a return is sent in on Saturday evening it will not be stamped before May 1, does the minister intend to extend the period of grace until Monday?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first year in which April 30 has fallen on a Sunday. This happens, I believe, every six or seven years, depending on various factors. The Department of National Revenue has always made arrangements so that the public are not prejudiced because of this fortuitous event.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CHICOUTIMI-QUEBEC—REPORTED INTENTION TO CANCEL TRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Tremblay (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Does the minister know that the Canadian National Railways has decided to discontinue night passenger train service on the Chicoutimi-Quebec line as of April 30 next?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have read somewhere in the press that there were rumours to that effect. I understand my hon. friend does not approve of such action. Therefore, his representations will be relayed to the management of the Canadian National Railways.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—REPORTED OFFER OF CANADA TO ACT AS REFEREE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he would care to comment on a story in the Toronto Star headlined "Canada Offers to Act as U.S.-Cuba Referee", the first sentence of which reads:

Canada is quietly preparing to sound out Havana and Washington on a policy of peaceful co-existence.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): This is another of those speculative stories. I find it pays very poor dividends to answer stories of this kind.

HOUSING

SECONDARY MORTGAGE MARKET—INQUIRY AS TO SALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I wish to address to the Minister of Public Works a question which I asked him the other day. Can the minister say whether or not any of the mortgages held by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have been sold, the prices obtained, and so on?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I thank the hon. member for reminding me of that question. There have been none sold.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. In respect to the National Housing Act mortgages now being offered for sale which carry the old 98 per cent insurance, is it the intention of the government to increase the guarantee on these old mortgages to 100 per cent or to offer them for sale at a greater discount than the more attractive 100 per cent guaranteed mortgages?

Mr. Walker: I wish to thank the hon. member for having asked this question, and to say in reply that there are many regulations and matters of detail which have yet to be worked out. An announcement will be made to the house dealing with them all, I hope, at the same time.

[Mr. Balcer.]

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

CAUSEWAY CONSTRUCTION, P.E.I.-N.B.

On the orders or the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): May I take this opportunity to correct an answer I gave yesterday to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I am reminded that it was only this morning that the correspondence was tabled, and I therefore correct my answer as reported at page 3966 of Hansard.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Can the minister say whether the correspondence has now been tabled?

Mr. Walker: It has been tabled.

RED RIVER FLOOD CONTROL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I can ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether he has yet secured the concurrence of the government of Manitoba to the tabling of the correspondence with respect to the Red river flooding.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I am happy to assure the hon. member that I shall be able to satisfy his curiosity in this respect quite soon.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the hon. gentleman say whether any progress has recently been made in these negotiations?

Mr. Dinsdale: Encouraging progress is being made.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR TEXT OF PROGRAM MODERATED BY MEMBER FOR JACQUES CARTIER-LASALLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (St. Henry): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Would the minister be good enough to secure from the C.B.C. and to table the text of the program "Les idées en marche" carried over channel 2 on Sunday afternoon, April 23 last, where the hon. member for Jacques Cartier-Lasalle acted as moderator?

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if such a text does exist, the C.B.C. will be asked to send it to us and it will be tabled.

TRANSPORT

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING LOANS FOR SUBWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would comment upon his statement that the subway loan for Toronto was refused because there was no enabling power for such a loan to be made, as set beside what was said by the Minister of Public Works—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member's question has all the earmarks of introducing a debate rather than seeking information.

Mr. Fisher: Could I phrase it in this way, then. In view of the indication by the Minister of Public Works that the reason for the refusal of the loan was that the government was afraid of being accused of hogging things for hogtown, could the Prime Minister say whether the government is considering legislation to allow a loan to be made to Toronto or Montreal or any other metropolitan district in respect of a subway?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The letter in question speaks for itself. It was pointed out in the letter that the request made by the city of Toronto for loan assistance in connection with the building of a subway could not be granted because the provision of such assistance did not come within the law as it now exists.

As far as the second portion of the question is concerned, if and when any decision is made to bring legislation before the house to alter or amend the statute as it now stands, the house will, of course, become aware of it in due time.

LEGISLATION RESPECTING FEDERAL INCORPORATION OF CO-OPERATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the long-standing request of co-operative organizations for the introduction of legislation to provide for the federal incorporation of co-operatives, can the Prime Minister say whether such legislation will be introduced this session? Has the right hon. gentleman's attention been drawn to the statement of Mr. Ralph Staples, president of the co-operative union of Canada that the co-operatives are looking forward to such legislation being placed on the statute books within the next few months?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Again, the only answer I can give is that when the government has a change or amendment of policy to announce in this or in any other regard the house will be made aware of it in the proper course.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the Prime Minister would care to comment on the statement attributed to the Minister of Agriculture in The Co-Operative Consumer as follows:

Federal incorporation of co-ops is now being considered at the highest level of government.

Is this consideration being given?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That statement is not inconsistent with the answer I gave earlier.

HARBOURS

MOOSONEE, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO JOINT SURVEY REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister say whether the engineering report undertaken early last year in connection with the proposed seaport at Moosonee is complete and when it will be made available?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I shall be happy to accept that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

HONG KONG—VISIT BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): I would like to address a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the hon. gentleman any report to make in connection with the visit or the impending visit of the Minister of Agriculture to Hong Kong?

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): I think that question would be more properly directed to the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The Minister of Agriculture is now en route to Hong Kong. His purpose—and it is a purpose which he has followed with determination and success—is to secure sales for Canadian grain. I think that is as far as I can go.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Could the Prime Minister say whether this visit is in connection with negotiations for sales amounting to 80 million bushels, referred to by the Winnipeg Free Press?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The estimates or the observations of the hon. gentleman, or even of the Free Press, will not cause me to add anything more to what I have said.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That items numbered 76 to 110 inclusive, and item numbered 481, as listed in the main estimates 1961-62, relating to the Department of External Affairs, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

He said: Mr. Speaker, these are very stirring days in the field of external affairs. As all members will realize, the dull moments are few and far between. Sometimes the news is bad and at other times it is good. Today I am sure we are all very pleased that the troubles through which our old friend and ally, the republic of France, has been going during the last week end, are over. News of the collapse last night of the insurgents in Algeria was received by the Canadian government with the greatest relief.

According to the latest reports the situation is returning to normal and the French government is now resuming full civilian and military control in Algiers.

President de Gaulle, the French government, and indeed the entire French people deserve high praise for their firmness and courage in the face of a challenge which could have had incalculable consequences, not only for the future of Algeria but for France itself, and which would have posed very serious problems for the North Atlantic alliance. France has emerged from this test stronger than before, and I hope it will now be possible to proceed to a peaceful solution of the Algerian issue.

In this debate on external affairs it is my hope that as many hon. members as possible will participate. There are a great number of members of this house who have had considerable experience in the field of foreign affairs. I need only refer to the large number who, down through the years, have rendered excellent service for Canada at the United Nations, either as delegates or as parliamentary observers. Another large group have gone abroad to attend meetings of the commonwealth parliamentary association. Still others have made a practice of attending the meetings of the NATO parliamentary organization. Another group have taken part in the meetings of the interparliamentary group which consists of 24 members of the Canadian Senate and House of Commons and a similar number from the United States Senate and House of Representatives. A few months ago Canadian members of parliament also attended meetings of the interparliamentary union. There is no good excuse for many members of this house if they fail to participate in this debate on the ground that they know nothing about external affairs. Any who have attended at least one of these meetings to which I have referred should have sufficient knowledge to be able to speak for perhaps ten minutes. The day has long since passed when the members of the Canadian House of Commons should take the attitude that foreign affairs problems are for someone else and not their particular concern.

The department last year, and I take full responsibility, was late in getting out the annual report. Mind you, we get out our report for the calendar year. We do not wait for a year from the end of the previous fiscal year to do so. Today we have available the report of the Department of External Affairs for the calendar year 1960, and I believe it will be of some help to those members who wish to participate in the debate. The members of the department are quite proud of this report. We believe it has a new look, and that it will not be as dry reading as some of the reports of past years have been.

Mr. Nowlan: It is unfortunately printed between red covers.

Mr. Green: I hear a remark made by my colleague the Minister of National Revenue to the effect that the report is printed within covers of a bad colour, but I point out that they are really not red but a sort of salmon pink.

In any event, my officials, as well as myself, are hoping for some useful suggestions from the members taking part in this debate. It cannot be gainsaid that an informed Canadian public opinion on foreign affairs is vital to the future greatness of our nation. This is one aspect of the whole picture which worries me, namely whether or not Canadian members of parliament, and the Canadian people generally, are following international affairs with sufficient care to give whatever government happens to be in charge of the affairs of this country the backing required for Canada to play the part she can play in the world of today. Make no mistake, no country in April of 1961 has a greater opportunity to take a part and play a worthy role in world affairs than Canada.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: Let me put it this way. No country has a greater responsibility. Let us stress the feature of responsibility in world affairs rather than opportunity.

I go on, Mr. Speaker, to give the house a picture of the world situation as I see it today. In the first place—I think this is the most important factor—we have a great world organization actually functioning today, and I refer to the United Nations. Some people scoff at the United Nations, but when you go to New York and see the representatives of 99 nations meeting in that great world body, and when you realize the speed of communications and the fact that world opinion is quickly focused on any vital issue that comes up anywhere in the world, you cannot help feeling that in the United Nations we have the greatest world organization there has ever been. It makes mistakes. The amazing thing is that it does not make a great many more, because of necessity the transactions must be of such a complicated nature. It would repay members to watch events there and to consider that while the United Nations seems to arrive at the edge of the precipice every so often, and while it might appear that in a few days' time the whole organization would blow up, that day never comes.

Just within the last week there was a serious crisis over the financing of the United Nations effort in the Congo. For a few hours that situation looked very serious; in fact one key resolution failed to carry during the last night of the sitting. If things had rested there the result might have been that the United Nations would have been forced to recall its troops from the Congo. But good judgment prevailed; consideration of the subject was adjourned for an hour or so and delegates went out into the lounge. Perhaps they went into the bar, I do not know; I would not be there, but perhaps some were. In any event, the resolution was voted on again and carried.

Mr. Argue: Something helped.

Mr. Green: We cannot do that in the House of Commons; our rules and procedures are not quite so flexible. I do point out that this organization has gone through crisis after crisis, and I believe it will continue to do so and it will continue to grow, because without the United Nations our civilization would probably revert to savagery.

Another feature of the world situation today is the large number of new nations emerging on the scene. You know, I think it is a good thing for Canadians to see some of the bright sides of the world picture and not be concentrating only on the scare headlines. Today we have self-government spreading in the world at a rate which was never even imagined a few years ago. I was looking at a map of Africa this morning and counting up the sovereign states in that key continent. I think the number is 28. I may be out one or two because the maps are not always kept up to date, but a new nation is emerging at midnight tonight, namely Sierra Leone. It will not be very long until there are other new nations taking their place in the world from that continent of Africa.

There are, of course, some which are not so bright. One of those is that we are living in days of an uneasy coexistence, with the communist world on one side and the so-called western world on the other. I hasten to add that I do not believe any honest person can question the fact that the western grouping was formed as a defensive unit. It was not formed with the purpose of taking away anything from anybody, from the communist world or from anyone else; it was formed as a defensive grouping, and we should always keep that fact in mind.

In these two groups there are a comparatively small number of nations. The vast number of nations in the world today are in between. For example, practically all those nations on the continent of Africa are not committed to one side or the other. In fact one of their main purposes is to refuse to be committed either way. They want no part whatever of the cold war. They have too many problems of their own, building up their own nations, training the necessary leaders and all that sort of thing, to have any time for getting mixed up in the cold war; this is a fact which Canadians should remember.

Another dark spot in the world picture is that at the present time, the age in which we live, there is overwhelming destructive power. When you recall that the Soviet can hurl a missile with an atomic warhead 7,000 or 8,000 miles and land that missile within a mile of the target, and when you recall at the same time that there are now at sea Polaris submarines of the United States, each with many times the destructive power contained in all the bombs dropped in the second world war—when you realize these facts you understand that mankind today is in a position to destroy our whole civilization. Here again is another fact which Canadians in particular would do well not to forget, because we just happen to lie between the two great nuclear powers of the world, each of which has the capacity to destroy the other in a matter of hours; it does not need a very fertile imagination for a Canadian to realize what would happen to his country if there should be a catastrophe of that kind.

What is Canada's role in this world? I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there must be no escapism in Canada. As a people we have traditions of courage, of common sense and of religious faith. Our nation was not founded by people who were in the habit of wringing their hands, giving up and refusing to face facts no matter how unpleasant they might be.

This is not the character of the Canadian people. We must take our full part in world affairs and do it with a spirit of optimism. This is no day for a pessimist in world affairs. Anyone trying to deal with world problems today who is a pessimist is very likely to end up in a mental asylum. I feel that Canadians should face the world with optimism and also idealism, and this our people have been doing. Canadians from coast to coast look on world affairs from an idealistic point of view. How else can you explain the fact that there has been practically unanimous endorsation of the large programs of aid to the less fortunate peoples of the world?

Our people do not look at the world with envy. We envy no one his or her country. Canadians have had an unselfish approach, perhaps because we have so much land that we do not know what to do with it. If we had not had enough, we might have been just as greedy about taking over other people's land as some other countries have been; I do not suggest for a minute that we are any better fundamentally than any other people.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, in the world of today Canada must honour her commitments. We must stand by our allies. There are a great many Canadians gone before us who would be ashamed if they ever found that Canadians in 1961 were running out on their allies. This is not the Canadian character. When a nation fails to stand by its friends then it is not worthy of having friends, and none of us wants to put Canada in that position.

This is a day when Canada in world affairs can urge cool-headed action. It is so easy to become excited about some of these questions and start condemning some other nation, start saying things that will hurt the people of another nation, saying things which may have a far-reaching effect that is not for the good of Canada or of mankind. I suggest that we must always urge cool-headed action in dealing with world problems. We have a far wider influence in the world than most Canadians realize. I do not take any credit for that myself or on behalf of the government of which I am a member. I do not say that we are doing more than previous governments did but Canada has a very wide influence in world affairs.

Today I propose to review briefly and sketchily some of the ways in which Canadian efforts are being directed in dealing with various world problems. Before proceeding to do so, I feel that I must pay a tribute to the men and women serving Canada in the Department of External Affairs. They number about 2,000 and I believe it would be impossible to find a more devoted group than these officers and members of our department. Canada now has diplomatic relations with some 63 other countries, 19 in the western hemisphere, 22 in Europe, 7 in Africa and 15 in Asia including the Middle East, Far East and Australasia. This does not mean that we have 63 embassies because in some cases an ambassador will be representing Canada in two or in one case in four different countries; there are 16 countries to which our ambassadors from another country are accredited. I do not believe that any nation in the world has a finer group of foreign service officers today. These men have been carefully selected and trained. Our senior foreign service officers have vast experience, and in my time as foreign minister I have not found representatives of any other country who were any better.

We have been helped a great deal also by the type of ambassador sent here by other countries. We have a large number of embassies in Ottawa staffed by distinguished citizens and through their work here Canada has made a large number of friends. All over the world you run into ambassadors who have served in Ottawa and who have left as friends of Canada. It is very important that we appreciate this work being done here and also that we learn from them because each and every one of them has a great deal to offer.

Canadian efforts in the world of today have been directed in various fields. Perhaps the most important has been the field of disarmament. When I mention disarmament I mean not only the attempt to reach agreement on the reduction of arms but also the effort to bring about a cessation in the development of more fearsome weapons. There are two sides to the picture, cutting down existing weapons and preventing the invention and development of weapons which are becoming steadily more destructive.

From the start Canada has participated in disarmament negotiations commencing as far back as 1946 or 1947. Our most recent efforts in the negotiating field, were as a member of the ten-nation disarmament committee which was set up by the foreign ministers of the United Kingdom, the United States, France and the Soviet union at Geneva in the summer of 1959.

As hon. members know, these negotiations began in the spring of 1960, but in June they were broken off when the five eastern members walked out. In August, following that walkout, Canada and the United States succeeded in bringing about a meeting of the disarmament commission of the United Nations which is composed of all the member nations.

At that meeting we got through a unanimous resolution calling for a resumption of the disarmament negotiations at the earliest possible date. Nothing had been done when the general assembly met in September and Canada then introduced a disarmament resolution, co-sponsored by Sweden and Norway, which in essence called for a prompt resumption of negotiations for the selection of a neutral as chairman and for co-operation of the United Nations with the negotiators through the disarmament commission. For example, we had in mind that the disarmament commission should set up ad hoc committees to assist the negotiators and also to check the work that they were doing. Eventually, we were able to get a total of 18 co-sponsors for that resolution.

However, the atmosphere at the United Nations last fall was very tense and that, Mr. Speaker, is putting it in mild language. It really was worse than that. It was very difficult to have agreement reached on any question, let alone on the subject of disarmament. We were not able to gain our objective before the adjournment in December. Fortunately during the session which ended last Saturday morning, there was far less tension. I cannot say whether or not this was because there had been a change of administration in the United States or because everyone was tired of that quarrelsome attitude just as we in this house get tired of such an atmosphere after a few hours and decide it might be better to be less pugnacious. There is a good deal of the element of human nature in the deliberations of the United Nations, just as there is in those of the Canadian House of Commons.

Whatever the cause, there has been far less tension in the United Nations during these recent weeks.

Eventually, the United States and the Soviet union, with a good deal of assistance and a good deal of prompting from other nations—I am not being immodest when I say Canada took a prominent part in this prompting and in these negotiations—decided that they would get together and try to arrange for the resumption of disarmament negotiations at about the end of July of this year. After all, these two nations are the key nations in any disarmament negotiations. They brought in a joint resolution before the general assembly which was passed unanimously. They were unable to agree on the composition of the negotiating group. One side had suggested that there should be an impartial chairman and vice chairman. The other side wanted five uncommitted countries added to the five eastern and the five western countries. Agreement was not finally reached, but I believe that in these intervening weeks that question can be worked out.

One fact which was of great help was that at the prime ministers' conference in London in March there was a statement issued on disarmament which was published as an annex to the final communiqué. Here was a statement agreed to by all the commonwealth prime ministers on this question of disarmament. It contained the following very significant and very helpful paragraph:

> The principal military powers should resume direct negotiations without delay in close contact with the United Nations, which is responsible for disarmament under the charter. Since peace is the concern of the whole world, other nations should also be associated with the disarmament negotiations, either directly or through some special machinery to be set up by the United Nations or by both means.

Canada is working now in preparation for the resumption of disarmament negotiations. As hon. members know Lieutenant General E. L. M. Burns is our adviser on this subject and he would be heading any Canadian delegation participating in disarmament talks. I believe there is good reason to expect real progress in the field of disarmament during the present year.

Hon. members will recall that Canada has taken a firm position on the question of nuclear tests. Time and again we have said we are against any further nuclear weapons tests. We continue to follow with the greatest attention the developments in the three-power negotiations which are taking place now in Geneva on this parallel question of finding a way to end further nuclear weapons tests. This conference is one which has never been broken up. It has been going on now for nearly three years, but has been adjourned from time to time. Agreement has been reached on many aspects of the problem but there has been no final agreement and yet, during the whole of that time, not one of those three participating nations has undertaken a nuclear test. There has been a voluntary moratorium during this intervening period. This moratorium has continued until today, in spite of the demands from people, for instance in the United States, that further tests are essential and that testing should be resumed.

Before the Christmas break in the recent session of the general assembly, the Canadian position on nuclear tests was once again reaffirmed by our votes in support of two resolutions asking to reinforce the present moratorium on nuclear weapons tests. Canadian opposition to testing is based not only on concern for the radiation hazard but also on its belief that the prevention of testing will inhibit the spread of nuclear weapons.

With this consideration in mind Canada also voted in the general assembly for an Irish proposal aimed at limiting the spread of nuclear weapons at the independent disposal of national governments. Consistent with the Canadian view that temporary measures are no substitute for disarmament —and this Irish resolution, of course, was a temporary measure—under effective international control, the Canadian vote on this resolution was explained as follows, and I am now quoting from the statement made by my parliamentary secretary the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt):

> Here again, however, I must emphasize the importance of the time factor. We have stressed over and over again the necessity of resuming negotiations on disarmament and we think that the threat of the further spread of nuclear weapons is one of the most important reasons for getting on with these negotiations. If no steps are taken toward disarmament—if, indeed, we do not have even a beginning to serious negotiations on this subject—no country will be content to sit by in the hope that goodwill alone will prevent the widespread dissemination of these weapons. For our part I must say quite clearly that Canada would not be able to accept this state of affairs for very long. We have worked and we will continue to work with every resource at our command to achieve an agreement on disarmament which would include provisions to deal with the frightening problem of nuclear weapons. If, however, there is no significant progress in this field in the immediate future, we will reconsider our position on the temporary measures which are proposed in this resolution.

Another field to which Canadian efforts have been directed is in the United Nations itself. Here, Mr. Speaker, may I say a word of praise for my parliamentary secretary, for the members of parliament, Senator Blois and other Canadians who have represented Canada during this last session. At the United Nations the work is hard. I would never admit that fact to the delegation when I am in New York but, now that they are all safely home, I must admit that they work very much harder there than we do here in Ottawa. The hours are long. Constantly coming up for consideration are resolutions and amendments. There are other delegations to canvass and there are receptions to attend, and they are also quite a hazard. This is a full-time job for anybody who represents Canada at the United Nations, not only as a delegate but also as an observer. There our people have worked as a team. There are no differences between the parties. We are all there as a Canadian team. This is the main reason why the Canadian delegation has been so successful during this last session.

For the first time we have had observers from the Senate. I must say that I have found them also to be extremely helpful. When there is a snap decision to be made in a complicated situation, it helps a great deal for a foreign affairs minister to be able to talk to an old friend from the Senate who has been in the House of Commons for many years, even though in another party, and to get his view as to what Canada should do. I have appreciated more than I can say the advice and the assistance that I have received during this last session from those Senators who have been in attendance.

At the United Nations we are in contact with 98 other delegations. It is a wonderful place to make friends and to sell Canada. I use the word "sell" in the constructive sense. I think this is one of the main jobs of the Canadian delegation. That job has been done very well during this last session.

We were greatly helped by the results of the commonwealth prime ministers' conference. It was amazing to see the reaction among the representatives from Africa and Asia after that conference. They, of course, had been following very closely what went on in London. They were extremely pleased with the stand taken by the Canadian Prime Minister, and our work with those delegations was made a great deal easier and a great deal more successful by reason of Canada's position on the question of apartheid which was so important at the prime ministers' conference.

One of our main problems at the United Nations has been that of the Congo. We are one of the three European and North American countries with any considerable number of troops in the Congo. Because of those troops Canada has been a member of the 18-nation Congo advisory committee. There are differences of opinion on that committee. The African nations do not always agree and neither do the nations of Asia. Our main purpose has been to keep this pot from boiling over, to try to reduce the friction in the Congo committee and to help the secretary general take action which would be effective.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, from the beginning of the session last September he has been under terrific attacks, and very unfair attacks they have been. Sometimes I wonder why any human being would feel obliged to take all the abuse that has been handed out to Mr. Hammarskjold in these last six or seven months. However, he is a great world statesman who is there doing a job for humanity.

I suppose the realization of this fact has been what has enabled him to withstand these attacks and to carry on in such a calm and efficient manner. Canada has felt that there should be no qualifications to our support for the secretary general while he was under attacks of this kind.

Another important feature of this last session has been the question of financing. Some countries will not pay their share. Communist bloc countries, for example, will pay nothing towards the expenses of the Congo operation. They pay nothing towards the cost of the United Nations emergency force. Other nations claim they are not able to pay. This has been one of the most difficult questions faced by the United Nations.

As one of its final acts in the early hours of last Saturday morning, the general assembly voted a resolution which approved the expenditure of $100 million for the Congo operation for the period January 1, 1961 to October 31, 1961, that is, for ten months. The new session will convene in September, so this financial arrangement straddles the intervening period. It opened an ad hoc account for the 1961 expenditures as it had done for the 1960 expenditures. At the same time it decided to apportion the $100 million as expenses of the organization in accordance with the scale of assessment for the regular budget. It provided for rebates of up to 80 per cent on some of the lowest assessments in an effort to assist some of the less-developed nations in meeting their financial obligations.

What this means is that the United States will be paying a very large part of the amount required. As hon. members will be aware from newspaper and radio reports, this resolution was finally adopted after a great deal of difficulty and after it had failed in its original form to secure the required two thirds majority in the plenary body. As I explained earlier in my remarks, there was a second vote and it carried.

In addition, the Canadian delegation tabled a draft resolution in the fifth committee which called for a thorough discussion at the sixteenth session, that is, the next one, of the administrative and budgetary procedures of the organization with a view to their improvement and to meeting the peace-keeping costs of the United Nations. Our draft resolution also provided for the appointment of a working group to study these procedures with particular reference to the establishment of a peace and security fund and a peace and security scale of assessments. It was put forward when it became evident that the sentiment at the resumed session was in favour of continuing to deal with the costs of the Congo operation on an ad hoc basis. Our object was to ensure that this approach would not be continued indefinitely and that serious consideration would be given to more permanent solutions to the organization's financial difficulties at the sixteenth session. We believe these expenses should be considered as part of the regular United Nations budget.

In committee this Canadian resolution was amended to take out the main feature. Our delegation found itself obliged to vote against its own resolution as altered by these unacceptable amendments. However, when the resolution came before the plenary body the objectionable amendments failed to get the two thirds vote required, so they went out and our own resolution as it had been originally drawn, with minor changes, got the two thirds vote necessary. Thus we finally succeeded in getting our way on this particular question.

There is much more that could be said about the session, but the hon. member for Oxford will be giving the house further details. Before I leave this subject I should like to make one plea on behalf of the United Nations. The Canadian government attaches a great deal of importance to continued development in Canada of an informed public opinion on United Nations matters. It is very much aware of, and grateful for, the efforts which are being made in this direction by a wide variety of groups and associations of dedicated Canadians. Special mention might be made of the activities of the United Nations association in Canada. That association, through its national and branch offices, has taken the lead in stimulating public interest in the work of the United Nations. It has done this in a variety of ways, through the distribution of information material, the regular publication of a number of pamphlets and assistance in the organization of student United Nations groups. These groups, by the way, have been very successful. I have attended two or three of their meetings myself and have been much impressed. In addition, lectures have been organized, university and school seminars arranged, and so on. The success of these efforts so far has been reflected in the greater awareness in Canada of the value of the United Nations not only to less fortunate people in other parts of the world but to Canadians as well. Such efforts deserve the full support of the Canadian people, and I suggest they deserve the full support of the members of this House of Commons.

I turn now to another field to which Canadian efforts have been directed. I have mentioned the commonwealth. I have already said something about the prime ministers' conference and about the effects of decisions made there on our daily contacts with Asian and African nations. The addition of new members to this community continues. Sierra Leone will become a full-fledged member tomorrow and Tanganyika is to get its independence on December 28 of this year. Next year it is hoped the West Indies Federation will join the commonwealth family, and so the story unfolds. Various other countries will be coming into the commonwealth in the years that lie ahead.

Canada now has a very important part to play in the commonwealth. This has been one effect of the decision taken in London. We now have a closer working relationship with Asian and African members of the commonwealth than we had before, and we are in a preferred position to work with them in connection with problems arising not only within the commonwealth but in other parts of the world.

The Canadian government has placed great stress on the commonwealth scholarship plan. It was designed to enable 1,000 young graduates in various parts of the commonwealth to undertake a two-year course in another comonwealth nation. Canada is to provide for 250; our objective is 250 at all times studying here under this commonwealth plan. Because this is a two-year course we had only some 101 during the past year but there will be an additional number coming in the fall, and we think that at the end of the present fiscal year there will be in Canada about 230 such students from other parts of the commonwealth. I do not have the figure for the Canadians studying abroad under this scheme. It is not as large as the number coming here, but quite a significant number of young Canadians have benefited under the commonwealth scholarship plan.

In addition we have initiated a special commonwealth African aid program which is to cost Canada $10,500,000 spread over a period of three years. We have asked for a vote of $3,500,000 for this particular work during the present fiscal year. The aid will go to independent members of the commonwealth in Africa, and those who are approaching independence. Information on the needs of these countries is now being collected so that effective and useful programs can be carried out. We believe that assistance in education will be one of the greatest needs, and already requests have been received for a number of teachers in various fields.

In this connection there has been a very interesting development in that the province of Manitoba has decided to share in this work. In May of last year, Premier Roblin expressed a desire to co-operate with the federal government in providing teachers for underdeveloped commonwealth countries. We welcomed his offer, and a project in Ceylon was suggested as a pilot scheme. Three instructors are required for an institute of technology in Ceylon and an arrangement has now been worked out with the province of Manitoba under which it will recruit three teachers and pay their regular salaries amounting to $30,000 and the federal government will provide transportation, overseas bonuses and living allowances, costing from $20,000 to $25,000 per year. This federal government share will be part of our regular Colombo plan technical assistance program. We believe this is a very helpful development and we will be interested in entering into similar schemes with any of the other provincial governments.

Another field is that of the French-speaking African states. At the United Nations most of these states became members last year. They are very much interested in Canada because we are a bilingual country. They feel they have a closer kinship with us than with countries where French is not one of the official languages. In this work the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin), who was one of our delegates, has been particularly helpful, as well as the parliamentary observers from the province of Quebec. Their main task during this session has been to keep in touch with delegates from these French-speaking African countries. I believe that as a result a friendship has been built up there which has been of great value to Canada, and we hope of great value to these African nations as well.

Earlier this week I announced a scholarship plan involving $300,000 per year to provide for training in several French-speaking universities in Canada and for sending teachers abroad to these French-speaking nations in Africa. Some of these countries have put out feelers with regard to the establishment of diplomatic missions in Ottawa. We are very interested in establishing one or two missions in certain of these French-speaking countries in Africa. The ambassador to France, Mr. Pierre Dupuy, visited all of these French-speaking African countries in November and December and brought back a most interesting report in which he pointed out that they need, primarily, help in education and in health matters. We believe this is a field in which Canada can render efficient service, and one in which we can gain a large number of new friends.

Then we have the NATO field. I had intended to go into this at some length but I think perhaps I had better not do that today. There will be greater opportunity in this regard in the committee.

There is to be a NATO ministerial meeting in Oslo from May 8 to May 10, and I expect to head the Canadian delegation to that meeting. It will not be dealing at length with defence matters because the defence ministers are not attending, but there will be consideration given to long range planning for NATO. For example, there will be questions having to do with consultation and ways in which consultation between members of the alliance can be improved. Canada has always been very much concerned about this particular aspect of NATO activities. It is not easy to have adequate consultation among the representatives of 15 nations, but down through the years there has been built up an understanding and friendship among the representatives, and in my opinion, the methods of consultation are steadily improving.

There are different approaches by different nations and, as a matter of fact, some members of the alliance think that we should adopt a uniform policy on all questions regardless of whether or not they have to do directly with the NATO areas. Canada has never gone that far, our opinion being that there should be consultation on all questions which affect the members of the alliance but that it is not essential that they should adopt a bloc policy. This is particularly true with regard to the United Nations. We believe it would be unwise for the NATO nations to act as a bloc in the United Nations because there are many issues which do not directly affect the NATO alliance as a whole, and on which the views of different members of NATO vary. We believe it would be unwise to attempt to put NATO in a strait-jacket in that way.

In Oslo we shall also discuss the international situation generally. There are many problems arising in all parts of the world which will be considered, and our general approach is that Canada should do everything possible to strengthen NATO. In this connection we attach considerable importance to the efforts which are being made in the context of long term planning to define the main problems and objectives of the alliance with a view to charting a guide line for the future. At the same time we believe that in preparing for the future years we should not minimize or under-rate NATO's accomplishments, and in particular, the essential contribution it has made and continues to make to the preservation of world peace and security.

As a going concern NATO's future viability will depend largely on its ability to adapt itself to a changing world; a world of emerging new nations and revitalized old ones. It has to face complex new challenges, political, economic, psychological, as well as military, which are continuing to develop.

One of the striking features of the world today is that the situations which pose a serious potential threat to world peace often arise in the peripheral areas of the globe, as for example, in the Congo and Laos.

Canada believes that to deal with such situations we must often rely on the activities of agency or peace-keeping machinery sponsored by or under the auspices of broadly-based organizations such as the United Nations. We consider that these peace-keeping activities are complementary to the efforts of the alliance to maintain world peace and security. Canada believes that the long term aims of the alliance can be furthered if all members are prepared to recognize the important role of those peace-keeping activities in the preservation of world peace and are willing to lend their full support.

During the debate there may be some discussion with regard to trade and economic matters and the role of NATO in that particular field. I believe that the objectives of the new organization for economic co-operation and development known as the O.E.C.D. are fully consistent with those embodied in article II of the North Atlantic treaty alliance. Indeed, the new organization reflects the continuing desire of NATO countries to develop closer and more intimate relations in the economic field and provides an opportunity to translate into concrete measures and achievement the aims of article II. NATO, however, continues to have a most important role to play in assessing the implications for the alliance of the economic developments and policies of the Sino-Soviet bloc and, through consultations, in developing the political will among NATO countries to find solutions for economic problems which threaten to weaken the alliance or which threaten to provide opportunities for the extension of communist influence. In the words of Mr. Spaak, NATO can and must serve as the "political conscience" of the Atlantic community of nations. We shall be doing our best to build up and promote activities of NATO in this field, although quite a large part of the field will be covered by this O.E.C.D.

With regard to NATO, I realize that my hon. friend from Assiniboia and his fellow members of the C.C.F. party are of the opinion that Canada should withdraw from this alliance. As he knows, the government does not agree with that suggestion. We feel it would be a great mistake for Canada to take a step of that kind. I merely point out to him that we have very worth-while support in the Canadian Labour Congress. I am just wondering how he is going to square his policy with the policy of the Canadian Labour Congress and of the so-called New party when it gets formed.

Mr. Herridge: You will be surprised.

Mr. Green: Representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress presented their brief to the government on February 2 of this year and on page 30, under the heading "Neutrality No Solution", we find the following:

> While looking toward world disarmament, the congress does not believe that Canada can make a contribution in this direction by unilateral disarmament or by pursuing a policy of armed or disarmed neutrality.

The brief goes on:

> For reasons geographic, economic and historical, Canada must work in concert with those nations which share her outlook and interests, while at all times preserving her own integrity and striving for a world in which blocs and alliances will be obsolete.

I would be very interested to hear the hon. member for Assiniboia or the hon. member for Kootenay West square these declarations of the Canadian Labour Congress with the statements of policy which have been made on behalf of the C.C.F. party on the question of whether or not Canada should give up her membership in the NATO organization.

Mr. Argue: I am not tied to the C.L.C., neither is this party.

Mr. Herridge: The British Columbia trade unions voted against our remaining in NATO.

Mr. Green: I really did not raise this subject to start an argument, but I see it got under somebody's skin.

Let me leave the old world and come back to the western hemisphere where we really belong. I should like to say a word or two about our relations with the United States and with the Latin American countries. Canada continues to be on a basis with the United States under which it is possible for us to consult on all problems of mutual interest and to do so in a most effective way. We have had the utmost co-operation from President Kennedy and from his secretary of state, Dean Rusk, and from Mr. Adlai Stevenson, the permanent representative of the United States at the United Nations. I am confident that it will be possible to continue working in this friendly effective way with the representatives of our great neighbour nation.

As hon. members know, we were successful in negotiating a treaty with the United States concerning the Columbia river. This was done after a great deal of time and effort had been expended. Now, of course, we are in a position where questions are being raised by the province of British Columbia which, of necessity, is involved in this whole transaction. This is not the place to go into that in any great detail; I merely point out these facts, Mr. Speaker. A deputy minister of the government of British Columbia sat in as one of the four Canadian negotiators. There was a joint ministerial committee consisting of ministers of the federal government and of the provincial government of British Columbia, engineers and lawyers and all types of officials who were required for work of this kind. Every word of the treaty was gone over with a magnifying glass and everybody was agreed. Before the treaty was signed British Columbia was satisfied that it was a good treaty. There was no question of any doubts.

Since the signing of the treaty many different road blocks have been thrown in the way. When I was last at the coast two or three weeks ago I even heard that the federal government was now on the spot; that it must go ahead and do this because we signed a treaty. Well, we are under no obligation until the treaty is passed in parliament. Until it is duly ratified we are under no obligation to go further, and the people who will suffer if this great co-operative scheme does not go through will not be the federal government. The people who will pay the piper will be those citizens of British Columbia who will not get the cheap power they would have got under the scheme or the developments that would have taken place if the installations were constructed. This could be the greatest work-producing project that there has ever been in western Canada, and all I wish to do is to make it perfectly clear that the fault for the failure of the project to materialize will not rest here at Ottawa but will be with our brethren in the provincial government in Victoria.

I should like to say a word about Latin America. As hon. members know, we have been very anxious to build up our relationship with the 20 republics of Latin America and we have met with considerable success in this regard. We now have diplomatic relations with all but two of the Latin American countries. Of course, in some cases there is double accreditation. For example, we are establishing a new embassy in Costa Rica and the ambassador to that country will also represent Canada in Nicaragua, Honduras and Panama. As I have said, we have diplomatic relations with all but two of the Latin American countries and in one of those two we have a trade mission.

There have been serious problems in connection with Cuba. As you know, Mr. Speaker, Canada has continued to maintain normal diplomatic and commercial relations with Cuba through these recent troubled months. In doing so, Canada has acted in a manner consistent with common international practice. No country except the United States has placed a comprehensive ban on trade with Cuba and Canada has not had the same grounds as the United States for taking such action.

While Canadian businessmen have remained free to carry on peaceful trade with Cuba, the Canadian government has used existing regulations to prevent the export of strategic goods to that country. This is in keeping with Canada's general policy of prohibiting the export of military material to areas of tension anywhere in the world. The Canadian government has also seen to it that the United States embargo should not be evaded by transshipment through Canada. It has permitted the export to Cuba of only such United States goods as might be exported directly from the United States to Cuba.

These policies remain in force. As the Prime Minister recently pointed out, Canada's practice over the years has been to carry on normal relations with countries of a different philosophy.

I am sure members would be interested to know that Canada's exports to Cuba in November of last year amounted to $1.4 million compared with $1.7 million in November of 1959 while in December of last year our exports were $2.4 million compared with $1.4 million in the same month the year before. In each of these months last year the United States sold more than twice as much to Cuba as Canada did in spite of all the restrictions the Americans have imposed. For the whole of the year 1960 our exports to Cuba amounted to $13 million whereas in 1959 they were $15.1 million or $2.1 million higher than in 1960.

I might add with regard to Cuba that the government is sincerely hopeful that a peaceful solution will soon be found for the conflicts troubling Cuba. I am sure hon. members will join me in looking forward to the day when an independent Cuba, free of all outside pressures, will choose to resume its traditionally close relations with the nations of this hemisphere.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before the Secretary of State for External Affairs leaves this portion of his address, may I ask him whether he has anything to say about the new affirmation of the Monroe doctrine in view of the recent declaration by President Kennedy in this context?

Mr. Green: I thought the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) was asking me a question about that statement yesterday and I gave an answer to the effect that I was quite sure that the statement made by President Kennedy was not intended to apply to Canada. The relationship between Canada and the United States is covered by our obligations under NATO and in my opinion there is no question of this particular statement being made applicable to Canada.

I should like also to say a word about Chile. About a year ago, when the brave people of that country were suffering so terribly as a result of earthquakes, we had the opportunity to give them some help by supplying foodstuffs and air transportation, and in other ways. I think that these actions on our part have resulted in the building up of a very fine relationship between our two countries. Canada, of course, was doing only what any humane country would do. We were delighted to be able to help them. But they have shown great gratitude. Recently our ambassador to Chile had the opportunity to travel throughout the stricken area of southern Chile and there he was shown records of the distribution of Canadian flour to hundreds of needy persons. He found the most kindly feeling toward our country.

As another sequel to the airlift assistance we were able to give, the ambassador of Chile on April 20, on behalf of the Chilean air force, presented the Prime Minister with a plaque to commemorate the R.C.A.F.'s part in flying relief supplies to Chile. In the United Nations we found that Chile gave us help time and again. They were one of the first to co-sponsor our resolution on disarmament and we believe there has been a very fine friendship established between our two countries.

Hon. members may wonder what is the present position with regard to Canada joining the organization of American states. I have mentioned this question in many speeches during the last year. It has aroused a good deal of interest. Some branches of the Canadian institute of international affairs have undertaken to study the question and to let me know the results of their study. The policy of finding out from the Canadian people just what they think about this aspect of foreign policy is progressing very well. We are not yet in a position to make a decision as to whether or not Canada should join this organization. We took steps to send observers to the meeting of the organization of American states which was to have been held in Quito, Ecuador, next month. However, we received word today that the conference is to be postponed and I am not sure when it will be going ahead. It is gratifying to see in Canada the increasing interest in this question. I am wondering whether Canada is wise in adopting an isolationist policy with regard to the western hemisphere. However, that is part of the argument on one side.

I do suggest to hon. members that they give this whole question deep thought, and that they discuss it with their constituents. It would be a big step in Canadian foreign policy if we were to join this western hemisphere organization. I think the decision should be taken only when it is fairly clear that the majority of the Canadian people are in favour of this being done.

The final field of activity toward which we are directing our attention is in the Pacific. Yesterday I announced that a call for a cease fire had been issued by the United Kingdom and the U.S.S.R. as co-chairmen of the Geneva conference of 1954. They had invited India, as chairman of the truce supervisory commission, to call the commission together in New Delhi. In addition, they called for a conference of 14 nations to be held in Geneva on May 12. If hon. members read these letters, they will observe that the first job of the commission, which is Canada's main concern, will be to discuss the question of the tasks and functions which should be allotted to the commission if there is a cease fire in Laos.

The commission is to hold these discussions in New Delhi, not in Laos, and then present an appropriate report to the co-chairmen, that is Russia and Great Britain, who will consider the commission's report and give the commission directions on going to Laos to carry out the work of controlling the cease fire. This is not a perfect scheme because, at the first, we are going to be working in New Delhi, a thousand miles or so away from Laos.

In addition, it is not clear just what the tasks of this commission will be if the cease fire should take place. We are hoping that there will be a cease fire promptly and that the commission can be sent into Laos promptly and can be sent in before the conference meets in Geneva on May 12. This is the intention, as explained by the United Kingdom, and I am hoping that things will work out in that way. Canada will do her full part. It is important that there should be peace in that part of Southeast Asia if for no other reason than that a war there might lead to war all over the world. We are in a position to make a contribution in the area, and we will be glad to do so.

Yesterday the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) made some noises which rather impressed me as indicating that he was going to have something to say about the commission in Laos having been deactivated in 1958. At that time the request was made by Prime Minister Souvanna Phouma, who is the key man in the picture today. He requested that the commission get out of Laos. The majority of the members, India and Canada, voted accordingly and the commission did get out of that country. The belief at the time was, of course, that a stable government had been established and that there would be no further need for that commission. I was very pleased to find that both the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and the hon. member for Essex East had approved of that course. I have the extract from Hansard right here to prove it if they dare to attack me on the subject this afternoon.

Mr. Pearson: What is this, intimidation?

Mr. Green: Perhaps this is a species of intimidation, but it is very helpful in the circumstances. This is an issue on which I am sure all members of the house are united, and I am hoping that Canada can make a worth-while contribution.

We are also in a very influential position across the Pacific by virtue of our participation in the Colombo plan. This has made us various friends in that area and Canada has an important voice in bringing about decisions across the Pacific which will be of general benefit to our nation as well as to the rest of the world.

I should like to say a final word about China. I feel quite sure that the hon. member for Assiniboia and his associates will be dealing with that subject in their remarks. I do not believe the Leader of the Opposition or the hon. member for Essex East will be very vocal about this particular question. During the Liberal convention last January a resolution was passed with regard to the entry of red China into the United Nations which advocated that Canada should no longer vote for a moratorium on the discussion of this question in the United Nations. This resolution, of course, did not go very far. While that particular procedure has been followed for some years, the introduction of the moratorium resolution has not prevented an effective debate on the real issue of the admission of red China. The step taken by the opposition in their convention does not go more than three or four inches ahead of the position which was adopted by the former government and which has been followed by the present government with regard to the discussion of the subject in the United Nations.

May I say, too, that the world does not stand still. Changes keep occurring everywhere, and certainly the question of red China is one of the most interesting and important questions now under consideration by the external affairs department. Everyone knows the policy we have adopted, and if and when there is a change in that policy it will be announced in the ordinary manner. One fact Canadians should remember is that there are a great many people living on Formosa who are native Formosans. No one is anxious to have them turned over to red China. I think this would be a disastrous move to make, yet red China is not interested in recognition or entry into the United Nations unless her right to take over Formosa is accepted. This, of course, has been one of the very big obstacles in the way of taking steps to change the present situation. Eventually, the wishes of the people of Formosa will have to be an important factor. In considering this whole question I suggest that it would be wise for Canadians not to forget the important factor of Formosa in the whole picture.

I think I have never made such a long speech, Mr. Speaker, in my parliamentary career and I hope never to do it again. However, in conclusion may I say this. As hon. members know and as they will have found from this sketchy review of problems arising in all parts of the world, Canada is involved everywhere. In practically every part of the world Canada is involved in one way or another, to an extent and in such a manner that she can do something about every one of these problems. I suggest that this is a great challenge to the Canadian people. Whether we accept that challenge, whether we play our full part in world affairs—the part which is there to be played by Canada—will, of course, depend on the will of the Canadian people to participate, the idealism and optimism of the Canadian people and the sacrifices they are prepared to make.

I believe that Canada can render a service to mankind as a whole in the field of foreign affairs and, as the minister responsible for Canada's activities abroad, it will be my objective to do just that. I ask for the support of the members of the house, regardless of party, in bringing these facts to the attention of the Canadian people, thus helping to make it possible for the Canadian people to realize the challenge which faces them and to realize the opportunity for Canada to do something worth while in the world. If we make that attempt we shall be going a long way toward making our nation the type of nation we all think it should be.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, this is the first formal statement and the first one of any consequence in length that we have had from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) since this session began last fall. Likewise, this is the first opportunity this house has had of discussing problems of the greatest moment that affect this country and other nations and peoples throughout the world, in what one cannot help but feel is one of its most critical periods.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs will not misunderstand me, I am sure, if I say at the outset that from his remarks today, I did not draw any appreciation of the extent of the deterioration or of the critical stage at which world affairs now seem to be. With much of what the minister has said there will, of course, be acceptance and concurrence. With some of the omissions, however, I think there will be regret in this house and throughout the country. The Secretary of State for External Affairs and the government as a whole I think should know that we in this party support the basic and fundamental policies which this government has carried out, generally speaking, in the United Nations and in NATO. Indeed, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), when he spoke at the general assembly in September of 1957, said that the policy of his government would be to support the general line taken by the former government in respect of the three corner stones of our foreign policy, namely our participation as a commonwealth member, our relationship with the United States and our membership in the United Nations and, as he might have added, in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. However, having said that we give this general support, particularly at this extremely critical time—and I doubt whether we have ever discussed international affairs at a more critical time outside a period of war—this does not mean that we are to be denied the right to express disagreement with methods employed to achieve objectives in the field of foreign policy. There have been certain methods and certain attitudes taken by the government with which we cannot fully concur, and about which we regret today there has not been a full explanation, as I shall seek to indicate.

I join with the minister in affirming, as has my leader on many occasions, our support of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, not because it is intended in any way at any time to be used for aggressive purposes but because, in the complicated and dangerous situation of our world, it is the only way we have of providing through human instrumentality against the dangers that face us now as perhaps never before.

We support the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and we join with the minister and with the government in affirming our belief that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization should be strengthened both in respect of its military purposes as well as in the realization of those sections with which we have been so vitally concerned, particularly article II, an article designed to promote the economic interests and the unity of the NATO nations. Indeed, it will not be necessary for me to say that we support NATO as a necessary instrument at this time because few men in the world have done more first of all to bring about the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and then to improve it than has the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). However. I do so today because of the attitude taken by those sitting to my immediate right.

I agree with the Secretary of State for External Affairs that it is encouraging that the Canadian Labour Congress, that great organization of labour, should take the view that in this difficult situation in human affairs Canada, in her own interests as well as in the interests of those nations which share basically her ideological approach, can do no less than combine with them in their efforts for peaceful and defence purposes.

However, Mr. Speaker, I should think that today we should want to address ourselves to what seems to be, on all fronts, a deterioration that should at least be described as causing the greatest concern to every man and woman in the world who values freedom and wishes to see it preserved. Can there be any doubt that this deterioration has taken place? I am, of course, not blaming the government or any government for this situation. I am simply pointing to the fact, one which demonstrates the power of what might be described as psychological warfare which the Soviet union and the so-called Chinese People's Republic, either alone or together, have been able to promote in concert with certain other nations.

I agree with the Secretary of State for External Affairs that we must abandon a role of pessimism. We must be optimistic, knowing that ultimately our point of view, or at least the tenets of the western world still persist in the rich shadows of western civilization, and are bound in the long run to emerge triumphant. But at the same time, when I join with him in refusing to be pessimistic I refuse to be unrealistic. Therefore we cannot but address ourselves to the ferment and turmoil in Africa and the perpetual crises within the United Nations, which hardly bear out in my judgment the assessment of its role in the last few weeks and its achievements last fall, made by the minister.

In the face of the ever-present challenge of Asia, in the face of the starkness of virtually every statistic calculated on a world basis, I find no occasion for failing to note at this time the dangerous unfolding of events in so far as they affect people who value human freedom and western civilization and those principles which are pertinent to western civilization but which are shared by so many other people in the world, people such as those in India, in other parts of the commonwealth, in Latin America, in the western world generally and in the United States; yes, and in Africa.

Then, when one thinks about the developments in Laos about which we heard an announcement yesterday, I find no justification for optimism with regard to that situation as I will later indicate. Certainly the events in the Caribbean, involving as they do the relationship of one country there with our closest neighbour, is not an occasion for satisfaction. I do, however, agree with the minister that the settlement in these recent hours in Algeria, restoring to France the integrity and the prestige which is hers, under the statesmanship and great leadership of General de Gaulle is a matter of deep satisfaction. But have we not in these last months moved from crisis to crisis, causing the western world and all men and women who love freedom to take serious note of events as they confront us?

The fact is that the free democracies now face a total challenge, from within by indifference to and the debasement of our values; from without by those communist forces which are bent on our destruction and which have at their disposal all the weapons of political, economic, ideological and military warfare. Moreover these national forces do not have to worry about the problem of unity with associated nations, a preoccupation which, as Mr. Macmillan pointed out in Boston the other day, faces the west. There can be no doubt we are facing an adversary which, whether we like it or not, is future-orientated, which has its goals clearly set out and which is working toward the attainment of those goals. Yet we in the west have perhaps given justification for the assertion which some astute observers have made that we may have lost our sense of the future, that we may be more concerned about adding to our material possessions than about refurbishing our spiritual ideals. It seems to me that we have not yet fully grasped the important fact that foreign affairs no longer exist separate from our daily lives. The events that are now going on in far away Laos, for instance, may affect each of us as individuals in spite of the agreement reached between the co-chairmen of the 1954 Geneva conference. Today the world looks small, and national borders, even iron curtains, appear insignificant from the vantage point of a man in space.

The total challenge to man calls for a total response. The role of political leadership in the west will be to bring home to the individuals in our democracies the realization that they are individually affected by this challenge. I strongly agree with the wise words of one of the great economists of the English speaking world and one of the shrewd observers of international events, Barbara Ward, who in her recent book "India and the West" has written:

> Men do not win battles either of weapons or of ideas by remaining perpetually on the defensive. To want no more than to stop communism probably ensures that ultimately communism cannot be stopped. Far more important than any steps taken to lessen the threat or limit the pretensions of communism are the positive aims, policies and visions which the west wishes to achieve itself.

That is our task, and until we do orient ourselves to our goals and become articulate in their appraisal and in their appreciation, we may find it increasingly difficult to meet the challenge that is before us. We certainly shall not resolve it by overoptimism, by failure to pinpoint the difficulties or failure to use our capacity either as a nation or as a group of nations to meet the problem and the challenge, of course by pacific means.

The minister spoke of the agreement on Laos. No one who knows this situation will fail to appreciate the present significance of that country; that little nation of old Indo-China, in which it is situated is, indeed, a strategic area. Laos, along with Cambodia, Viet Nam, and North Viet Nam, may be equally the way, or the barrier, to the kind of penetration which would affect not only Burma and Thailand but that great Asian state, India, and other nations in the east. Developments in Laos have important consequences not only for them but for the peace of the world. This is so, because a decision as to the kind of world our children will inherit might well be determined by the millions of people in Asia and not exclusively by their more richly endowed brothers in other parts of the world, particularly in North America.

I believe this Laotian situation should be looked at realistically. The reactivation of the international supervisory commission was, of course, a wise decision to have taken, at long last. I want to say this: that the reactivation of the commission might well have taken place much earlier. It seems to me that Canada should have agreed to the request made months ago by India when she urged that this be done. Indeed, it was reported, although in fairness this was denied by the government, that the Indian government was presumed to have taken the view that Canada stood in the way of the reactivation of the commission. It is true the government has taken the position that the international supervisory commission could not be established in Laos unless the royal government agreed. I can say this, however, because I was in Laos in 1956 and talked to the then Prime Minister, Prince Souvanna Phouma, who thought that the international supervisory commission should cease its operations in Laos. However, the Canadian government at that time, along with its two colleagues on the commission, took the view that there was yet work to be done.

While one can understand how difficult it is for the commission to operate in the face of the reluctance of the host government to having the commission in its territories, we should not forget how the commission came into being and under what circumstances. It came into being as a result of an imposed settlement by the conference that was held in Geneva in 1954 for the purpose of keeping the peace between two dissident groups, as is the case today in the situation that presents itself in Viet Nam and North Viet Nam. In any event it seems to me that when the prime minister of India, months ago, urged the reactivation of the commission, we might well have acceded to the request of the Indian government at that time. I suspect we took another view particularly because of the view taken by the United States. I simply want to say that if that is the case, as I suspect and believe it is, the United States with its far-flung responsibilities, in my judgment, seriously misinterpreted the situation in 1956. It has now agreed to the formation in Laos of a government of a complexion which it refused in 1956.

Meanwhile, there has been civil strife, and the communist forces supported by the Soviet union, by North Viet Nam, and by communist China, has acquired a supremacy over a much wider area than was the situation when there was a cease fire and when the commission was in operation in November, 1956. I trust that the commission now carrying on most of its operations in Delhi, as I understand from the minister, will be able to determine that a cease fire has in fact taken place so that there can be a conference.

I hope that I will not be accused of pessimism but I suggest that this is one more instance where the communist world has been able, by a process of attrition, to increase its sphere of influence and its sphere of control. That will be a matter of the greatest consequence to countries with whom we have so much in common, like India, whose integrity and security is so greatly dependent upon events in that part of the world, as we know from the aggression that took place in Tibet.

The minister is going to go to that conference and I think he has made a wise decision. He will be given the opportunity there of meeting personalities with whom we have no formal or official association in the United Nations. He will be able to make his assessment of those personalities and, undoubtedly, there will be value derived from the opportunity which will be then presented, as indeed was the case when the Leader of the Opposition had a similar opportunity and carried out a responsibility in an equally important field in 1954 when he attended the important discussions on Korea in Geneva.

The situation in Laos is one incident of concern. I hope the proposed solution will work out and that there will be peace. I hope that Laos will not now become a stepping stone for further aggression on the part of those who want to extend their spheres of influence. I trust there will be no prejudice to those nations whose participation in these events is of great consequence, who want to avoid war and who want to preserve their freedom. Of course, I have in mind particularly, as I have already noted, India, whose leadership and influence, in my judgment, in that area, has been of the greatest value and consequence. If there are any achievments of which the present Leader of the Opposition may well be proud—I know there are many, and I say this because of my close association with him over a long period in these matters—his view that Canada must ever understand the peculiar situation that confronted India at a time particularly when there was great misunderstanding of India's role, is one that will be appreciated and remembered.

We must not under any circumstance or at any time, it seems to me, lose the confidence of India and particularly of its prime minister. There have been occasions—there were last year at the general assembly of the United Nations, as well as in regard to this matter of Laos—when differences between India and Canada, were not, in my judgment, calculated to reach the constructive results which I think the situation demanded.

We have also the failure of the disarmament discussions, notwithstanding the optimism of the minister, and we are likely to see a recurrence of the difficulties in West and East Germany. We will move from these crises to other crises as the Leader of the Opposition said recently during a speech in Toronto, when he referred to the conclusions arrived at in the Moscow conference last November. The Leader of the Opposition quoted in that speech the resolution of the conference in Moscow. The portions he quoted read as follows:

> "Peaceful co-existence among states does not mean—a rejection of the class war—on the contrary it implies an intensification of the struggle of the working class and of all communist parties for the triumph of socialist ideas".

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

The Leader of the Opposition added the following statement of his own when he said:

> It was made clear that peace was not an end in itself. That end was the establishment of the communist system throughout the world.

There will be other situations which will test the statesmanship and capacity of the free nations including our country. I believe we have to state our goals, not because they are expedient but because they are right. The hon. minister has referred to foreign aid programs. I believe this is an area where we can demonstrate the true quality of the west. We should share our resources, to the extent that it is practical and desirable, with those nations, where literacy is low, where poverty is high, and where medical and health standards are inadequate, not because it is the political thing to do but because it is the right thing to do. Until we get ourselves into that frame of mind we will not have the vigour of soul that attends the dedication of those who, in my judgment, unwisely support the doctrine of dialetical materialism.

Mr. Stinson: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question before he leaves the subject of disarmament with which he has just been dealing? Would the hon. member tell the house what Canada should do in regard to disarmament which has not already been attempted?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will be coming to disarmament. I believe that Canada should do more than she has done. In the last eight months, basically Canada suggested certain actions of a procedural kind. The Leader of the Opposition, and others have taken the position that Canada should put forward substantive proposals which would likely capture the support of certain nations. We have suggested that the Scandinavian nations, countries like Brazil and Mexico and certain countries in Asia would likely support such an initiative. By itself this would not resolve the problem, because it must be resolved mainly by the Soviet union and the United States, but it would have possibly a persuasive effect on the great powers. This is what I think we should do, but I am going to deal more specifically with disarmament in a moment.

We have to recognize that we are confronted with a dangerous situation in the Caribbean. Yesterday, I think, the minister wisely said that there was a stage in international negotiations when, in the public interest, a government should not have to disclose the nature of particular negotiations. In a democratic society, of course, the end result of diplomatic effort must be made known to the public and to the world. That is clear. I assume that the answer given yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) was that those situations which have occurred in the Caribbean of direct relation to our neighbour, have provoked elucidations of opinion and representation from the government of Canada to the United States; that we have made our position known as to what we regard as a desirable way of dealing with such situations. At this time I am not going to press the minister beyond this. I am assuming that we have made our position known and that we are prepared to deal with the next step, which may or may not arise. Having in mind the unity that must prevail between freedom-loving nations at this time and what we conceive to involve not only nations on the American continent traditionally covered by the so-called Monroe doctrine concept, but as well all nations of the NATO alliance and, for that matter all nations of the world who want to see peace preserved, we will not hesitate to make our position known.

The minister spent more time on Chile than he did on Cuba. While he may have his reasons for that, I formed the judgment that possibly we do not fully agree on the urgency which this particular situation creates or seems to create at this time. I would have expected the minister, particularly in the face of this situation, to tell us more of the government's attitude with regard to Canadian participation in the organization of American states. Whatever may have been the reasons before or during world war II for Canada not joining the Pan-American union, the situation today, as I see it, is altogether different. I am now expressing only my own point of view. In this instance, I have no right to speak for anyone except myself, but I would point out to the minister that in 1943, as a private member, he advocated our entering the Pan-American union. Last summer he reaffirmed his personal support of the organization of American states, and his words will be found in Hansard of July 15, at page 6375, as follows:

> It might be that the time had now come for Canada to join this western hemisphere organization. I think it would be a step forward.

I want to say to the minister I do not think that in these matters a government must always wait for the expressed opinion of the people. In foreign affairs a government must fearlessly assume a position of leadership. In the light of its experience, and particularly because of the present situation, if the government feels that Canada could serve a useful purpose in that organization, then I say the government should come forward with a policy and the house will either accept or reject it. My own view would be that if the government came forward with that kind of proposal I would give it my support, because I believe the time may have come when we should be ready to sign the Bogota charter and deposit a Canadian instrument of ratification in the organization of American states offices in Washington.

It will be recalled that General Marshall, the secretary of state of the United States, at the end of the war adopted an attitude which did not prevail on the part of that country during the war, when he proposed that Canada could play a role in the organization of American states. In view of the developments that have taken place, and the fact that Soviet arms admittedly are in the possession of the Castro forces, and in view of other developments, without in any way wanting to interfere with the form of society or with the right of self-determination of any country, it seems to me that Canada might well give consideration as to whether or not she could play a useful role in this situation now.

It is true that in his first statement in this house the minister said that he did not want to play the role of honest broker. He modified that later; but it would have been interesting to receive from him, in the light of our friendly relations with the United States and our relations with Cuba some indication as to what Canada's role might be in this situation. In any event, this is a situation in which we as a North American power cannot fail to be interested. It is one with grave consequences. We might have expected from the minister today a more concise statement on the position of the government of Canada. For instance, we might have had some indication as to whether or not the government believes that the United States subscribes to the view stated by its president in 1956 when he said:

> There can be no peace without law. And there can be no law if we were to invoke one code of international conduct for those who oppose us and another for our friends.

These are matters of the greatest moment, and we should have no hesitation in discussing them with friends, and particularly with friends; for the very essence of friendship is the ability, and the opportunity presented, to have a frank discussion.

The minister spoke of the United Nations. I think that one of the great areas of tension and concern today is the United Nations. This is not what I gathered from what the minister had to say. The fact is that the United Nations is now faced with its most critical situation largely as a result of the determined policy of the Soviet union last fall to remove from the present secretary general the powers that are inherent in article 99 of the charter of the United Nations, and of their determination to drive him from that important office.

We subscribe fully to the view stated by the minister that the United Nations is essential for the preservation of world order. If we take the view that there can be no national intervention in the affairs of states, then, of course, we must argue that there has to be some world collective security organization to provide legitimate intervention, whenever intervention does take place we believe, as the minister has implied, that it should be through the United Nations.

But in order to make effective the intervention of the United Nations in the Congo or in the Gaza strip or in any other area of the world, the United Nations itself has got to be effective. We must recognize again that the United Nations depends primarily for its effectiveness not necessarily on the unanimity or unity of the great powers. Such unanimity never existed, notwithstanding the anticipations at Dumbarton Oaks and at San Francisco. The United Nations, however, without the basic acceptance of the great powers, cannot be the effective organization it was intended to be.

I believe, with the minister, that the United Nations is the focal point. I believe unlike the minister, as I gathered from what he said, that today the United Nations is the focal point for most of our tensions. It certainly is far from a perfect body. It is clumsy, it is slow and in some cases it is cantankerous. But we must constantly battle criticisms of the United Nations which appear to castigate the institution, when in reality the criticisms should be directed at the imperfections of the member states.

The minister has referred to the situation in the Congo. The difficulties there of the United Nations and the secretary general arose first of all, of course, from the vagueness of some of the resolutions of the security council, perhaps deliberately designed by those who did not want to see an objective United Nations policy pursued in the Congo, because it did not conform to their national interests. We might as well admit that the experience in the Congo portrays a weakness in the United Nations police force, as it is at present constituted when the nations retain authority over their troops. As Secretary Rusk said, it is an unsatisfactory situation. He observed recently that the experience in the Congo suggests that we must turn once more to the possibility of constituting a permanent United Nations force specifically trained and equipped and held in readiness for immediate use.

I suggest that one of the most effective things Canada could do in addition to putting forward a substantive proposal in the field of disarmament would be to put forward, after careful preparatory work, a scheme for an effective United Nations force which must take its place in a disarmed world, if that should ever eventuate. Here is the kind of opportunity which Canada can pursue, and this may have been in the mind of the minister when he spoke of the great opportunity that a country like Canada has in the field of international affairs. Here there is a major role to be played by a country like Canada or other middle powers within the United Nations.

We certainly do not subscribe to Mr. Khrushchev's plans for reorganizing the United Nations. To substitute a committee of three to represent the western world, the communist world and the uncommitted nations is, of course, to destroy the United Nations and the office of the secretary general as it was conceived at San Francisco, or indeed, as it was contemplated when the covenant of the league of nations set up a similar office under that world body. But I believe we have got to recognize that the refusal of the Soviet union to place any confidence in the secretary general does destroy much of the effectiveness of that great public servant. I express a personal view that I doubt very much if we will see, certainly for some time to come, a westerner holding that office. That is not necessarily something to be criticized. If there is an honourable and competent Asian or African, and no doubt there is, such a person could fill that office with distinction and impartiality, but only provided he is able to carry out his functions as article 99 of the charter at present envisages.

I believe that the Soviet union wishes to destroy the United Nations as now constituted. It does not serve its purpose when it functions in the objective way in which certainly Mr. Hammarskjold and most nations, I believe, wish to see the United Nations approach its difficult assignment. This applies not only to western nations. It applies to nations from Asia and Africa as we know from the kind of leadership given by Mr. Nehru who questioned the suggestions made by Mr. Khrushchev, when he spoke so disparagingly of the person and of the office of the secretary general last fall.

But there have to be changes made in the United Nations and these changes have got to take place fairly quickly. The minister said nothing about such changes. If the United Nations is going to persist in its present form or in the reincarnation originally envisaged, certain reforms will have to be undertaken without waiting for full charter revision. The security council will have to be expanded as will the economic and social council, to take into account the newer members from Asia and Africa particularly.

Mr. Green: We have been urging that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope the minister will continue because I think that is a very essential thing to do. When the minister is urging that, he might also perhaps realize that there are certain other changes in the United Nations that should take place. If it is going to become an effective body, a more liberal interpretation must be made of the charter. There must be expansion of existing machinery and the adding of new bodies in addition to those I have already mentioned.

We must give to the administrative body of the United Nations authority in areas not now under national sovereignty. I mention outer space as one of these. There must be greater use made of the international court of justice and the development of international law, perhaps by the creation of certain existing tribunals as ad hoc tribunals from which appeals might be pressed to the international court of justice.

We must, of course, adhere to the principle of universality of membership notwithstanding what the difficulties are, as we well knew in 1955. We must make the United Nations less dependent for its income than it is now. We must not have the shameful situation that confronted it last week, when seemingly it had to beg for money to carry on in the Congo operations that were in the interests of all people of the world as well as the people of that troubled country.

Then we must press, as Mr. Nehru said, for charter revision at the appropriate time, and he thought that the time certainly had not come when he spoke last fall. So that I think while we support the United Nations we must recognize the dangers that confront it.

I see that Mr. Hamilton Fish Armstrong has suggested recently in penetrating observations that this crisis of the United Nations is one to which some nations in the west have not fully addressed themselves. He is concerned about this particular situation. He envisages the possibility of the Soviet union establishing her own international forum, if she cannot get her own way at the United Nations, as presently constituted. Whether or not that eventuates, no one can tell but these are dangerous situations, not only in the various places we have mentioned, Laos, the Caribbean, Germany and so on, but right in the United Nations itself we have a crisis. We are not going to resolve that crisis by being evangelistic about what the United Nations has done, but by recognizing the challenge that is presented to us right in the United Nations and making it an effective body. If there is no United Nations in the kind of world in which we live, with the kind of instruments of war which now persist I, for one, and I am sure this represents the opinion of every member of this house, cannot believe the peace of the world in this interdependent period can possibly be maintained only by a balance of power system.

Disarmament has been a worthy objective of the minister. Certainly he has found since his period of service as Secretary of State for External Affairs that the optimism which characterized his earlier speeches in this field has not been justified. He perhaps now recognizes that the facts of life are not as simple or as noble as they appeared, when he undertook the very heavy responsibility which he now discharges so honourably and so sincerely. The fact is that good wishes and sincerity are no substitute for wise policies in the kind of ruthless world in which we live today.

The Soviet union has affirmed its willingness, as of a few weeks ago, to reach an agreement in the matter of the cessation of nuclear tests. Last year the minister told us that there were great prospects for agreement in this area and that if we got agreement, we would have an opportunity for progress in the broader field of disarmament. My suggestion is that the events of today indicate that whatever justification there may have been for hope in that field is rapidly being dissipated. I hope this is not the case, but I know of no other interpretation to put on the words which Mr. Khrushchev addressed to Mr. Walter Lippmann as reported last week. It may be that the Soviet union is now determined to make the nuclear talks part of a package deal in connection with the whole question of disarmament. In any event, the fact is—this is no fault of Canada or, I believe, basically of most of the nations in the west—we have made no progress in this field. No progress was made when we were in office, and no progress is being made now. Procedural achievements and procedural initiatives are not real progress.

I believe that we must pursue this objective of disarmament. Even many of the experts, on whose judgment and experience we rely, now have abandoned the word "disarmament". They are now talking about arms control. I suggest to the minister that the job of the statesman is to keep the higher objective of disarmament, even though there may be a realization of how difficult that is going to be, particularly in the face of the fact that there is no known scientific method for the determination of the existence of undisclosed nuclear weapons. The minister says that the policy of this government is to continue to advocate the cessation of nuclear tests with or without controls; that is the position he has reaffirmed today, although he did point out that the resolution put forward by Ireland, which Canada supported, provides as far as this country is concerned for a limited period in which Canada will withhold a decision as to the use of nuclear weapons in Canada.

There is a conflict, undoubtedly. I do not expect the minister to admit it between the pronouncements made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) and those made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to this matter. The minister is clear when he states that the policy of the government is that there should be no nuclear tests, underground or overground, with or without controls. However, that is not what one has a right to interpret as being the view of the Minister of National Defence. I can only hope that in this matter the minister will be able to establish his position vis-à-vis his colleagues and, in particular, in his discussions with the Minister of National Defence.

A few moments ago an hon. member asked me what further Canada could do. I have indicated, I believe, that we could have gone further. I believe we could go further now and put forward a specific plan which may or may not be accepted but which, in our name and supported by certain nations, might have a persuasive influence, even though it might not bring about full results. It is worth the try.

If general disarmament is to be attained, it is certainly not going to be achieved easily. We might as well recognize this now. All one has to do is to read what men like Kissinger and Kohn have to say, to realize what has developed in connection with modern nuclear weapons, to appreciate what a tremendous job mankind is going to have in the attempt to unscramble the nuclear paraphernalia that has been devised. We should give consideration to other plans that have to be devised if we are going to have disarmament.

We should give consideration, for example, to the kind of thing I mentioned in passing a few minutes ago. What type of international police force should be established to preserve international peace and security? What principles of international law should govern such forces? What internal security forces, in precise terms, would be required by the nations of the world if existing armaments were abolished? These are questions that we have to consider. The United Nations emergency force was understandably established without any opportunity for preparation on the part of the secretariat. However, as we know now from the Congo operations, the United Nations secretariat, as presently constituted, is not in a position to provide the kind of administrative services that make such a United Nations force fully effective.

This is the kind of constructive suggestion to which we might well give careful consideration and thereby make a definite contribution of our own. There are so many other areas one could traverse, but my time is nearly exhausted. I simply want to go back to where I began by saying that these problems, the United Nations, disarmament, the organization of American states, together with the turbulent situations that now exist in so many areas, point up the difficulties that attend mankind at this time. It is not easy, we all know, to see our way clear through this situation. A nation—or group of nations—that is reluctant to use force, that is reluctant to follow the concept of even evolutionary international law, encounters difficulty when it is confronted with irresponsible actions by nations bent on implanting in the minds of men their philosophy of life. This is a very difficult situation. This is what concerns us. Statesmanship of the highest order is required in all of the countries, and our country no less than others has a responsibility. We must pursue the ideals of a world under international law but we must do so realistically, realizing what are the pitfalls; we must do so realizing that obviously, in face of the November conference in Moscow, no agreement is going to be made that does not meet at this stage of international relations the particular policy objective of the Soviet union.

I admit, of course, that we cannot leap over a chasm with one bound. This procedure has been tried previously and the results have been fatal. However, I believe that the prime minister of the United Kingdom was right when he said in Boston that the nations of the west, without violating their right to individual opinion, must recognize that at this time it is essential that there be a strong measure of prudent unity among the western powers. If we have this unity; if we have a firm will to attack vigorously our agenda of economic development, not only in terms of our relations with the common market through O.E.C.D. and the like but the economic development of other people in the world who are going to have a decision as to which of the great ideologies shall prevail; if we can strengthen the United Nations along the lines that are envisaged not as stated by me necessarily but as outlined by others who share these views rather than yielding to the destructive purposes of those who want to use the United Nations only for their purposes and for the furtherance of their aims, we may find that the road may be easier. If we can apply as much time and money in studying for peace as we do in planning for war; if, to use C. P. Snow's phrase, we can regain our "appetite" for the future—and I would say our soul as well—then we shall be true to the values of our own way of life and contribute to a more peaceful world.

The minister has an extremely difficult assignment. We respect that difficulty. However, we urge him now to appreciate, as I am sure he does—although I feel that he did not give us evidence of this today—the urgency that attends us and to indicate in bold and clear terms something that represents the character and the wishes of our people along the lines spoken of by people like C. P. Snow, Barbara Ward and other strong protagonists of the western position. That is the kind of leadership we need at this time, not only here at home but throughout the west and throughout the world.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all listened with great interest to the minister's review of international affairs and the work of this department. We all recognize the problems he faces at the present time possibly to a greater degree than ever before. We have great respect for the minister and we appreciate the work being done by his officials around the world. Although called away for a few minutes, I also listened with interest to the very eloquent remarks of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) but I do not agree with all he said.

I have listened to a great many reviews of international affairs from our secretaries of state for external affairs. I noticed that today for the first time the minister referred to himself as a foreign minister. I understand that, according to British tradition, a foreign minister always wears a top hat on formal occasions. Possibly we shall see him doing that in the future. However, while I was listening to the minister I was thinking about the two wars. There are in this house members who marched to war in the first world war and in the second one. In the first world war our battle was to save the world for democracy and in the second world war it was to fight against nazi tyranny and to bring about a system of world peace. Between the first and second world wars the statemen of the world lost numerous opportunities to bring about and develop that peace in the world.

One reading the history of the world between the first and second world wars realizes how, just through the lack of imagination or the lack of wisdom on the part of a very few people, the tide was turned in the wrong direction. Since the second world war, at the conclusion of which we all had high hopes, some nations have made various mistakes. The minister said that we should give the government our backing. We give the government our backing. He said the government recognizes its opportunity but also its responsibility. We give this government our backing if it recognizes its opportunity and its responsibility in relation to that large group of nations outside this major struggle between the two great nations of the east and the west. Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

T.V. STATION CHEK, VICTORIA—INTERFERENCE

Question No. 169—Mr. Regier:

1. How many protests have been received by the Minister of National Revenue's office and the C.B.C. as to interference from T.V. station CHEK, Victoria, to television reception in the lower mainland of British Columbia in each of the months since that station began operations until and including the month of February 1961?

2. What steps have been taken, since these complaints began, to remedy or reduce the alleged interference?

3. Does the C.B.C. consider that the major complaint of interference has now been resolved to the satisfaction of the people of the lower mainland of British Columbia?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

1. As far as can be ascertained, no letters of protest concerning reception interference by station CHEK-TV were received by either the Minister of National Revenue or the C.B.C. following the commencement of operations of that station. In August and early September of 1960, however, following the introduction of an omnidirectional signal of greater power from a relocated transmitter as authorized by the board of broadcast governors, some protests were received by the Minister of National Revenue and the C.B.C. from persons who objected to varying degrees of reception interference on channels allocated to American T.V. stations. None of these persons protested about interference with Canadian stations. Eight letters were received by the Minister of National Revenue from such individuals up to February 1961. The C.B.C. has recorded two letters and eight telephone calls in September 1960 and four letters and seven telephone calls in October 1960.

2. Such letters and telephone calls were referred to the Department of Transport and the B.B.G. A technical study was made by engineers of the former and CHEK-TV was found to be complying fully with the technical requirements of its licence. The B.B.C. conducted a study as well. Certain suggestions were made to listeners to install wave traps to reduce interference.

3. Since the C.B.C. has no jurisdiction in the matter, it has no opinion to offer as to whether the complaints made have been resolved to the satisfaction of those concerned.

LOOTING LOSSES, NAVAL STORES

Question No. 185—Mr. Regier:

1. What was the estimated loss to the Canadian government caused by looting from naval stores at each naval institution in Canada during the last year on record?

2. How many prosecutions were launched in respect to such looting during the year in question?

3. How many convictions were obtained?

4. What are the existing arrangements for the protection of government property at naval institutions in Canada?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence):

1. Total amount of loss due to theft or suspected theft at naval establishments during 1960: $4,714.

Total amount of loss due to theft or suspected theft from ships during 1960: $2,367.

2. Six.

3. Six.

4. The basic regulations governing the protection of naval property are set out in the Queen's regulations and orders for the Royal Canadian Navy.

SHIPPING TONNAGE, CONTRACTS AND SUBSIDIES

Question No. 186—Mr. Regier:

1. What was the total tonnage of shipping under Canadian registry at the end of each of the past ten years?

2. What is the total value of government contracts given to Canadian shipyards within the past three years for each of the ports of Halifax, Vancouver, and Victoria?

3. Does the government grant subsidies to Canadian shipyards, if so, what were the amounts of such subsidies to each of the three areas mentioned above in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1961?

4. What, if any, subsidies are contemplated for the present fiscal year to shipbuilding in each of these cities?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

1.

Year	Gross Tonnage
1950	2,394,250
1951	2,380,369

1959	2,472,147
1960	2,580,226

2. Total for years 1958, 1959 and 1960 for shipyards reporting to the Canadian maritime commission:

Halifax	$28,001,300
Vancouver	17,066,000
Victoria	20,153,600

3. No.

4. No subsidies are contemplated at the present time.

Question No. 188—Mr. Regier:

1. What improvements are planned for the current fiscal year to Patricia Bay Airport, Victoria?

2. What is the estimated cost of each of the improvements planned?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

1 and 2. It is difficult to foretell with certainty the degree of completion in the current fiscal year, but the following improvements are planned:

	Total Estimated Cost
Air terminal building, including power and control lines, sewer and water, road diversion, etc.	$1,020,000

TRADE

O.E.E.C.—REPORT FROM CANADIAN DELEGATION TO ECONOMIC POLICY COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have now received a report from the Canadian delegation to the economic policy committee of the O.E.E.C. which met in Paris on April 18 and 19. I should like to inform the house of several important developments which took place at these meetings.

Hon. members will be interested to know that the economic policy committee, composed of senior officials from all the member countries, is expected to become one of the principal organs of the new O.E.C.D. designed to promote closer international co-operation and consultation over the whole field of economic policy both national and international. Because this was the first meeting of the economic policy committee since ratification of the O.E.C.D. convention by Canada and the United States, considerable attention was devoted to plans for the future work of the organization for promoting closer economic collaboration among the member countries. The work of this committee is of particular significance to Canada because its membership now embraces all the principal countries of western Europe, the United Kingdom and the United States, which together account for a very high proportion of Canada's total foreign trade.

In addition to making plans for its future work, the economic policy committee on this occasion reviewed the current economic situation and future prospects of member countries particularly as they affected the trade and financial relationships among them.

With a view to extending and intensifying the work of the O.E.C.D. the committee decided to establish two working groups to study and consult upon problems of economic policy where such action seemed particularly timely and likely to produce the most valuable results. The first group will deal with problems of economic growth. The second group will deal with the balance of payments and the monetary, fiscal and other related policies. Canada will be represented on both working groups. The economic policy committee expects to receive reports from these two groups within the next few months with a view to making proposals for action to the ministerial council of the O.E.C.D. later in the year.

I should like now to table the terms of reference for the two working groups established by the economic policy committee.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members will have learned with satisfaction that some encouraging progress is being made in the work of the economic policy group in laying the foundation for the transformation of the O.E.E.C. into the organization for European co-operation and development which could be one of the most important agencies in the development of Atlantic economic co-operation. We can only hope that the encouraging progress that has been begun in the work of the economic policy committee will be continued in the meetings of the subcommittees and the meetings of the full committee to which the minister referred.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, from the standpoint of Canada I think it is a good thing that the O.E.C.D. has set up these two committees and has this work now under way. From the standpoint of our country I think both committees can be of importance, the one having to do with growth, of which we do not have too much at this time, and the other having to do with the balance of payments, which is a difficult problem for Canada even now and in the case of Europe is of very great importance. I think for Canada this is a matter of urgency, and we hope that the O.E.C.D. in the future will bring about freer trade within the Atlantic area and will make it possible for Canada to resume adequate growth within our nation.

COAL

AMENDMENTS TO AGREEMENT WITH BRAS D'OR COAL COMPANY LIMITED

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize certain amendments to the agreement made under the Coal Production Assistance Act with the Bras d'Or Coal Company Limited for the purpose of postponing the commencement of repayment of the loan made to the company thereunder to the 31st day of December, 1962.

Motion agreed to.

FREIGHT RATES REDUCTION ACT

AMENDMENT EXTENDING APPLICATION OF REVISED RATES

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Freight Rates Reduction Act to extend for not more than twelve months the period during which the revised rates under the said act shall be applicable and to increase the authorized expenditure under the act by an additional $20 million.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would comment on the statement made yesterday by the governor of the Bank of Canada to the effect that any improvement expected to take place in the economic situation will not be adequate to make a "serious dent in the level of unemployment allowing for seasonal fluctuations."

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows it is improper for anyone to make observations on evidence given in a committee of the house or of the other place.

PROPOSED JOINT CANADA-U.S. ORGANIZATION TO SOLVE UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour or, in his absence, to his assistant. A press report from Washington today indicates that Canada and the United States have decided to create a joint organization to find a solution to the problem of unemployment. Is the assistant to the labour minister in a position to comment on this report and advise the house whether the government has appointed persons to that board from the regions affected by unemployment?

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Comtois.]

[Later:]

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I have a question supplementary to the one I asked the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour. I ask the parliamentary secretary to take notice of my previous question in order that the minister may comment on this matter in a few days.

Mr. Thrasher: Mr. Speaker, I will be very happy to do that.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BANK OF CANADA—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT BY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question. Will the minister tell the house whether it is the intention of the government to move to refer the annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada to the standing committee on banking and commerce, or to any other committee of this house?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, following the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition, I really can see no advantage to parliament or to the public in that course.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the Minister of Finance not realize that as he himself has said—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the Minister of Finance not realize that, as he himself has pointed out in the house, since the governor of the Bank of Canada is responsible to parliament—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It seems evident that the hon. member wishes to convey information more than to ask for it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, as this is the first time you have acted in this capacity I will accede.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But may I ask the Minister of Finance—

Some hon. Members: Cheap, cheap.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen opposite can make all the catcalls they want but they cannot prevent us—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a supplementary question I hope he will put it now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that I have, but I have not been able to put it because of government members' interruptions in the chamber. Will the Minister of Finance, in accordance with the rights and obligations of this parliament, in the name of the government move to have the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada sent to the banking and commerce committee so this house may study that report?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is repeating a question which has already been put.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —may I say that this question has not been put.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Unless I am mistaken, the Minister of Finance has already indicated he does not consider this suggestion to be in the public interest.

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made by the governor of the bank, will the Prime Minister say whether or not he regards the governor as a prophet of gloom and doom?

[Later:]

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in order that there shall be no doubt on the matter may I ask the Minister of Finance whether he considers it not to be in the public interest to refer the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada to the banking and commerce committee of this house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this is the third time this question has been asked in the house this afternoon. I repeat the answer I gave to the question when it was asked the first time by the hon. member for Essex East, and I simply add to that answer the observation that I think will be generally shared by all hon. members of the house and the public, namely that hon. members opposite, in either examination or cross-examination of the governor of the bank, could not do half as good a job as the senators did.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What a disgraceful statement.

[Later:]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give notice from my place that on Tuesday next I intend to move that the latest annual report of the Bank of Canada be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I draw to the attention of the hon. member for Essex East citation 186 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, which states:

> Oral notices for future proceedings do not exist in the Canadian House of Commons.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge with gratitude the view you have just expressed, but I would point out that Your Honour failed to read all of the citation, as I would have expected in the circumstances. The citation goes on to indicate:

> An exception must be made in respect of certain routine proceedings dealing with the observance of proprieties of the house, the maintenance of its authority—

And so on. I would think nothing is more important than the maintenance of the authority of the house—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask you to tell supporters of the government what you told members of the opposition a few moments ago, namely that interventions would not be allowed which preclude an hon. member from making a statement which in his judgment he feels he should make to the house. Because of the interruptions may I repeat the citation:

> An exception must be made in respect of certain routine proceedings dealing with the observance of proprieties of the house, the maintenance of its authority—

And so on.

I rest my case on the phrase "the maintenance of its authority". What is the authority? Under the Bank of Canada Act, as the Minister of Finance has so frequently reminded us, monetary policy is the responsibility directly of the governor of the Bank of Canada. Of course under our system of government that does not mean that the government escapes responsibility, but under the Bank of Canada Act the governor of the Bank of Canada is responsible for the formulation of monetary policy. In the discharge of that function he is responsible to this authority, the House of Commons. Under this rule I am permitted to give oral notice in respect of something that involves not only the authority but the obligation of this house in respect of this matter, particularly when one notes that the governor of the Bank of Canada is responsible directly to this house.

Because this is so, I feel that this notice is in order, and that we are in order in discussing the motion itself and in asking that the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada be placed before a committee of this house, to which the governor of the Bank of Canada is by statute responsible. I think the situation is clear, and since to date the government through the Minister of Finance has refused to accept the responsibility which he prefers to hand over to another chamber of this parliament—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is dealing with something other than the point of order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, the hon. member for Essex East just insists on making himself more and more absurd the further he goes in this matter. He has read a portion of the citation, Mr. Speaker, and then has beclouded the whole issue with a mass of verbiage. Let me read the citation in full for the instruction of the hon. member. Citation 186 reads as follows:

(1) There are only two ways in which a question can be withdrawn from the order paper: first, by a written notice, by the member putting the question, to the Clerk of the house, and, secondly, by the member, in his place in the house, informing the Speaker that he desires the question to be dropped.

(2) Oral notices for future proceedings do not exist in the Canadian House of Commons. It is useless for a member to say: "Mr. Speaker, I give notice that I will move a certain question tomorrow." This would not give him any precedence on the next day and he would not thereby acquire the right to speak on matters not standing on the order paper. An exception must be made in respect of certain routine proceedings dealing with the observance of proprieties of the house, the maintenance of its authority, the conduct of its officers, the management of its business, the correctness of its records or any other similar matter brought up by the Prime Minister and settled without the passage of any resolution. A minister may also announce from his seat that he will later make an official statement on some important matter but he does so as a courtesy to the members. These indications of the government's intentions are not the kind of notices required under standing order 41 which must be printed in the Votes and Proceedings.

The authority of the house is not an issue here. This does not arise out of any statement or matter brought up by the Prime Minister. It does not relate to the conduct of any officer of the house or the management of the business of the house, or the correctness of the records of the house, or any other similar matter, brought up by the Prime Minister and settled without the passage of any resolution.

With great respect, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Essex East has been in the house a long time and some of us who have some regard for him do not like to see him making himself look so utterly absurd as he is insisting on doing today.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, this matter could be settled in five seconds if the minister would merely agree to have this report submitted to the appropriate committee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I say that the matter could have been settled before it started if hon. members opposite would acquaint themselves with the rules of the house and obey them.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on the point of order, particularly about the many precedents there are with respect to the very procedure which the hon. member for Essex East has adopted on this occasion. There is no difference in principle, as I am sure Your Honour will agree, between getting up and putting, as is done practically every day on the orders of the day, a question to a minister and asking him to take it as notice, and doing what my hon. friend from Essex East has done today. All he has done is to say that with respect to a matter that would not appear on the order paper at all, namely the reference of a document to a committee, that as a matter of routine proceedings he intends on a future occasion to take that action. Of course hon. members who are chairmen of committees are constantly making similar motions with respect to concurrence in reports of committees, and they get up at this stage of the proceedings and give notice that they intend to do that on a future occasion.

Of course we all recognize that if the hon. member for Essex East was trying to place something on the order paper which would give him precedence over some other hon. member, that would be an improper thing to do, because there is a precedence laid down in the regular standing orders of the house. But in routine proceedings there is no precedence. Whichever hon. members catches your eye first, be it the Prime Minister, the chairman of a committee, the whip seeking to change the membership of a committee, this is accepted by the Chair in the order in which it happens. All the hon. member for Essex East was doing was seeking to give the house advance warning of what he proposes to do in order that the house might exercise its jurisdiction and supervision over a body with respect to which the Minister of Finance disclaims any responsibility, and proclaims there is a parliamentary responsibility.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the comments of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate have clarified the point. As he says, if the notice given by the hon. member for Essex East is not intended to have this question stand on the order paper, there is no problem except that this would not be the proper occasion to give such a warning. It might be a matter of debate, but certainly not a matter to be put on orders of the day because it was not in the form of a question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before you make a final ruling, may I respectfully suggest that in view of the fact that Mr. Speaker is not in Ottawa at the present time—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —you might want to delay your final ruling in a matter of this great importance until Your Honour has had an opportunity to discuss it with the chief presiding officer of the house, the Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think that is necessary because the question seems very clear and, as I said, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has removed any doubt I might have had.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might be allowed to ask the Minister of Finance if he does not agree that the dignity of this house is degraded when an officer of parliament is permitted to testify before a committee of the other place and is denied the right to testify before a committee of this house?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to whom the hon. member refers when he speaks of an officer of parliament. The governor of the Bank of Canada is not an officer of parliament. He is an officer of the Bank of Canada by definition under the Bank of Canada Act.

SECONDARY MORTGAGE MARKET—REQUEST FOR DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I noted the reply of the Minister of Public Works last week in connection with this matter. Is the Minister of Public Works able to assure the house that an opportunity will be given for discussing his proposal to establish a secondary mortgage market by a debate this session?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, could I accept that question as notice?

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

CANADA-U.S.—INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED AIRPLANE EXCHANGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Defence Production care to comment on a report in this morning's press to the effect that the United States air force has turned down the possibility of buying the Canadian made CL-44 cargo aircraft? I wonder if the minister could say whether Canada has put before the United States government any alternative proposals for defence contracts to be let within our own country?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): In reply to the hon. member for Assiniboia, I may say I read the article that appeared in the Gazette this morning. The United States government are free to make any comments they wish on the qualities of the CL-44. I wish to state that Canada has put forward to the United States government other proposals so as to help aircraft production in Canada. Discussions have taken place with United States authorities over the past several months as to the possibilities of arrangements in the field of defence production in connection with this industry, but they have not yet reached the stage where I could usefully make a statement.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a supplementary question along the lines of the one the minister has just answered and in the light of the report which appeared in the Montreal Gazette this morning, wherein it is stated that the proposed contract would enable Canadair to produce the Starfighter in exchange for the purchase of the United States long range interceptor. Is the minister in a position to make any comment on that aspect of the report?

Mr. O'Hurley: I have no comment to make. There was an article in the Gazette this morning to the effect that Lockheed was offering part of a contract to Canadair. This is utterly false. If Canada has any negotiations to make they will be made directly with the United States government, not with Lockheed.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): May I ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Did the United States secretary of defence and the minister hold informal discussions on the possibility of acquiring the CL-44 plane, which prompted a statement from the United States air force that the Canadian aircraft is much inferior to United States planes?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): The hon. member is referring to a report in the newspaper relating to evidence given before a United States congressional committee. I do not believe I should comment on a newspaper report of that evidence.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF FEDERAL MARKETING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries, of which I have given him notice. Can the minister advise the house of the progress which is being made toward bringing into effect the recommendation of the royal commission on food price spreads for a federal fish marketing act which would enable provincial governments to pass legislation and thus regularize the negotiating of prices to fishermen?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): I want to thank the hon. member for Skeena for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The recommendation referred to in the question by the hon. member has been under study for some time. However, no decision has been made so far, nor are there any plans at present to introduce a federal fish marketing act during the current session of parliament.

Mr. Howard: I have a supplementary question. I wonder whether this particular recommendation is going to be given the same treatment as the Clark report.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, it would be purely coincidental if that were the case.

WATER RESOURCES

GREAT LAKES—PROPOSED DIVERSION FROM HUDSON BAY WATERSHED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the report that the great lakes commission is seeking the aid of the United States state department in negotiating with Canada regarding additional diversion of water into the great lakes, can the minister indicate to the house the Canadian government's position on the proposed water diversion into the great lakes from the Hudson bay watershed?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have seen the article in question. The Canadian government has received no approach from the United States on proposals of the type described. Various proposals for diversions of water from the Hudson bay watershed to offset diversions at Chicago have been considered in the past and are regarded as impracticable from an economic point of view. Canadian opposition to any further diversion at Chicago is well known.

TRANSPORT

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO LOAN FOR SUBWAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if he will explain to the house why the government of Canada is not prepared to make a loan of $50 million to the city of Montreal for the construction of a subway while, according to a report in La Presse last night, the government of France has approved in principle such a loan to the city for the same purpose?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what the government of France did, of course, is not of immediate concern to hon. members in this house. In so far as the earlier part of the question is concerned may I say this. The reason given to those making a similar application on the part of the city of Toronto was given to the mayor of the city of Montreal.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. Is it not possible for the government, should it decide to approve of these two loans, to put an item in the estimates rather than to deal with the matter by way of legislation, as the Prime Minister has suggested?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should not like to take lessons in parliamentary propriety from hon. gentlemen opposite.

HARBOURS

MOOSONEE, ONT.—STATEMENT ON JOINT SURVEY REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is the minister in a position to reply to the question I put to him yesterday concerning the engineering report in connection with the proposed seaport at Moosonee?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Nipissing, and in reply to say that the information gathered as the result of basic surveys carried out in 1960 by the federal government will be assembled in about one month's time. One key section at the mouth of the Moose river must still be surveyed, which will determine the location of the main channel where the river meets James bay. This work is now planned to be carried out early this summer, and will last approximately one month.

The results of our technical study covering all basic surveys carried out in 1960 and 1961 will then be assembled and made available to the government of Ontario. I cannot say at this time whether or not it will be published, but I should emphasize that this will be technical information only, and not a report on the feasibility of the seaport. The feasibility of the seaport from an engineering standpoint can be assessed later.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

CABINET MINISTERS' TRAVELLING EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. As the minister is absent, perhaps my question could be drawn to his attention. This is almost the five months' anniversary of an order of this house pertaining to a question of mine about the travelling expenses of members of the cabinet. I wonder whether the Secretary of State would look into this matter and see why there has been this delay in complying with the order.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will pass on this information to the Secretary of State.

PUBLIC SERVICE

GOVERNMENT TELEPHONE DIRECTORY—INQUIRY AS TO FRENCH EDITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (St. Henry): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance. According to this morning's papers, the Canadian government telephone book has been printed in English only. Does the minister intend to have a French version of that directory printed, in accordance with the promises made by the Minister of Transport?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not have an opportunity to read the report referred to by the hon. member. However, I shall read it and answer his question tomorrow.

(Text):

NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

REPORTED TRANSFER OF ADVERTISING ACCOUNT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether his department has recently transferred its advertising account to a new advertising agency.

An hon. Member: Order paper.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, so far as I am aware, several agencies are handling the advertising account of the department. Those agencies have not been changed recently.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister aware that a story to this effect appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press today?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: You will have to correct that tomorrow.

THE CENSUS

REQUEST FOR HIRING OF QUALIFIED UNEMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Now that the census commissioners have been appointed, can the minister say whether any instructions have been given to these census commissioners to give priority, when appointing census takers, to unemployed persons provided they have the necessary qualifications?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that those making the appointments take this matter very much into consideration, because it is well known how anxious this government is to provide employment for everybody who is unemployed and who can by our action become employed.

As I have outlined to the house, this is a very important task. People with particular skill and ability are required to carry out this very exacting operation. I think the choices are being made on that basis, and the census will be carried out very well as a consequence.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fine words of the minister I wonder whether he could consider the proposition and specifically suggest to the census commissioners that priority be given to the unemployed provided they have the necessary qualifications.

Mr. Hees: As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that is taken very much into consideration at all times when these selections are being made.

PUBLIC WORKS

ST. HYACINTHE—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN TUNNEL PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? According to a report published in the newspaper Le Clairon, Quebec provincial authorities—

Mr. Tremblay: Le Clairon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Denis: —Quebec provincial authorities are only waiting for a decision from the federal government to begin work on the viaduct east of the city of St. Hyacinthe. Is it the intention of the minister to communicate with the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot in order to speed up the matter, even if it meant for the latter a temporary interruption in his congratulatory letters to parents of new born babies in his riding?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, of course I have not read Le Clairon, but I want to say to my hon. friend that the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot has often had talks with me on the problem that was just raised. I am not in a position to say today exactly when the work will start, but I shall be glad to accept the question as notice and answer later.

Mr. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): A supplementary question, in order to help the hon. member for St. Denis and to dispel his ignorance. Could the minister tell us that tenders have been called and that the request—

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

(Translation):

Mr. Ricard: —and that the request—

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask hon. members not to start protesting when the question is being asked.

(Translation):

Mr. Ricard: —and that the call for tenders appeared in the same newspaper? The editor of this newspaper is as ignorant as the hon. member for St. Denis.

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

(Translation):

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I have any further comments to make.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPLENISHMENT OF FUND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance a question. In view of the fact that the unemployment insurance fund, according to the report for the end of March, is at the lowest point in history, can the minister say what steps the government is going to take to replenish the fund so that in the face of the great unemployment problem that persists at the present time, unemployed workers will not be denied their rights under the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member well knows that no unemployed worker has been denied his rights under the Unemployment Insurance Act, or will be. In reference to the proposed legislative action, the hon. member is equally well aware of what was announced in the speech from the throne and will be brought before the house in due course.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

DORVAL—REPORTED THEFT OF MAIL AT AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Postmaster General. According to press reports, some mail bags were stolen recently at the Dorval airport. Can the minister inform the house whether this is the first in the series of postal thefts for the current fiscal year?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I shall take this question as a notice, Mr. Speaker, and answer it tomorrow.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, precisely a moment ago you asked the house to let the hon. member who had the floor go on with his remarks. Well, since the beginning of this sitting, the hon. member for Roberval and a few others have kept talking louder than the hon. member who was putting a question. I hope the rule applies indiscriminately to all concerned.

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to endorse the remarks just made by the hon. member for Hull, and shall even quote some of the words spoken by the hon. members to my immediate left. On a question put by the hon. member for Laurier, the hon. member for Roberval said that he was a fat-head; I do not know what that means.

Mr. Fortin: Sit down, if you do not know what it means.

Mr. Boulanger: At the time a question was asked by the member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the member for Roberval replied that he was a floor-cloth. And when a question was put by—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I perfectly understand the point of order raised by the member for Hull, but the one raised by the member for Drummond-Arthabaska is of a different nature.

I wish to say at once to the hon. member for Hull that I thank him for calling the attention of the Chair to the application of the rules of the house. However, I either do not want to undertake to find out just who has been responsible for the interruptions. I know there have been interruptions on both sides, but I can say that the rules apply equally to all.

As for the point of order raised by the member for Drummond-Arthabaska, if I heard him correctly his reference was to statements made in the back benches and not heard nor meant to be heard by the reporters or by the house. I think it would be a dangerous precedent to record all remarks made in such a way that they can be heard only by members close at hand, but not by the whole house.

I assume that the member for Drummond-Arthabaska realizes the problems that might arise from the acceptance of a point of order such as he is raising.

If he insists, I shall make a ruling, but I would point out to him the drawbacks that might ensue.

Mr. J. N. Tremblay (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege, as I think that some of the remarks of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska were directed against me.

He referred to conversations he allegedly heard, and attributed to me statements I have not made.

If indeed the expressions he heard, or claims to have heard, arose spontaneously in his mind, I can ascribe them only to some occupational distortion and habitual bad company.

I am very sorry, indeed, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to deny the facts alleged by the member for Drummond-Arthabaska.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, on the point of privilege raised by the member for Roberval, I might add a further sentence that he uttered and that was heard by others.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, order.

Of course, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska may comment on the statements just made by the hon. member for Roberval, who rose on a point of privilege, but I would point out to him that, from the way he started his remarks, he apparently proposes to discuss the point of order, on which incidentally I have stated my views.

If the hon. member for Roberval denies the statement ascribed to him by the member for Drummond-Arthabaska, the usual course to follow would be for the member for Drummond-Arthabaska to accept the statement made.

However, it is open to him to make remarks justifying his own action in the circumstances.

Mr. Boulanger: The purpose of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, is to indicate that on this side of the house we cannot enjoy the necessary quiet to hear the speeches that are made, particularly when Liberal members are asking questions.

Mr. Fortin: It is because you are on the wrong side.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have already stated my views on the point of order.

As to the remark just made by the hon. member, may I assure him that it is the Speaker's wish that every member, on either side of the house, be allowed to enjoy his right to speak in full freedom.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Green:

That items numbered 76 to 110 inclusive, and item numbered 481, as listed in the main estimates 1961-62, relating to the Department of External Affairs, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, last evening in the three minutes at my disposal I made reference to the good work of the minister and his officials and to the failure of world leaders to seize opportunities to promote world peace between world wars I and II and since.

Our unanimous support of democratic principles and parliamentary institutions, our common objective which is the promotion of world peace, are, I know, taken for granted, and on that basis we all participate in this debate. While we may differ as to the pathway to peace and as to the meaning of current events, we all seek a single objective and welcome this opportunity to present our views with conviction as members of a free parliament.

The members of this group believe that the present circumstances present an opportunity and a particular challenge to Canada to utilize its pool of good will that exists throughout the world in taking a friendly but strong, independent and constructive approach to the tangled skein of world problems. In that connection, on behalf of this group I should like to urge the Prime Minister to speak with the same clear voice and to represent the views of the people of Canada on these world questions as he did at the recent prime ministers' conference.

In the struggle between the democratic and totalitarian forms of government Canada cannot remain neutral. We must always stand squarely on the side of freedom and with the genuine forces of freedom. However, let me point out that the nature of this struggle is constantly changing. Revolutionary developments in weapons have underlined the danger and absurdity of relying on military strength as the chief method of settling international disputes, even though in some cases it is considered to be the only method. It is increasingly evident that the traditional policy of accumulating arms diverts us from channels of action through which purely effective policies can be pursued. These developments require new departures in Canada's contribution to the emerging world community.

The C.C.F. party believes that Canada's foreign and defence policies must be reappraised and reshaped if we are to play an effective part in the world's search for peace, and particularly in view of the blunders that have been committed by the United States in recent years in the field of foreign policy. It is because of these blunders and errors, this lack of judgment in United States foreign policy, that we emphasize the need for Canada not to remain silent on these occasions, but to speak with a stronger and clearer voice.

These blunders are causing concern to many Canadians and to people throughout the world. As a matter of fact, from correspondence I have received from a wide section of the community, people who support all parties in the house, and from organizations and from meetings I have attended I gather that this criticism is growing, and there is a greater and greater demand that Canada should utilize the pool of good will toward us that exists throughout the world and speak more firmly and clearly on some of these questions.

In our opinion, Mr. Speaker, the United States government, despite its announced concern for the rights of the people and its contention that it has not forgotten its revolutionary birth, has consistently supported reactionary and right wing governments throughout the world, and no one can deny that. I am paraphrasing conversations I have had and correspondence and resolutions I have received.

At the beginning the United States government was of the opinion that President Sukarno of Indonesia did not have the support of his people. Events have proven that the United States government was in error, and only a few days ago President Sukarno of Indonesia conferred with the President of the United States. I am mentioning a few of these blunders and errors in judgment which have had serious consequences in the world in recent years.

Let me also say that the government of the United States supported Syngman Rhee with massive financial and military contributions. Events proved that he was one of the nastiest fascists going until he was driven from office by a popular uprising, over which United States policy had no control, with apparently little forewarning.

The same story can be told with respect to Turkey, where liberal thinkers and students were murdered by the reactionary government of Menderes which was supported by the United States. In Laos the United States government proved again that they could not leave well enough alone and, no doubt acting under Dulles' precept that neutralism was immoral, started subverting the 1954 Geneva agreement with a view to installing a right wing government in Laos. This plot backfired when the communists inevitably gave support to their own people and a civil war ensued.

Britain has now had to come to the rescue of the United States government to arrange a cease fire, as has happened before. Undoubtedly any government that will be set up in the future in Laos will be more pro-communist than the one which existed a year ago, until United States government intervention led to the installation of a right wing government. Only today there is word from the United Nations that the President of the United States is calling into conference the leaders of both houses to deal with further difficulties that have developed because of this blunder in United States policy in recent days.

In South Viet Nam things are no better, Mr. Speaker. Some people make much of the fact that President Diem is a professed Christian. He is a funny sort of Christian from my point of view. I have talked to quite a few representatives from Southeast Asia, and I believe he is a vulgar fascist who rigs elections as well as, or better than, any communist. According to the news from this area in recent days his days of rule are numbered in Viet Nam because he does not represent the legitimate wishes of a people seeking freedom and a democratic form of government.

Then in Saudi Arabia the monstrous Ibn Saud rules with mediaeval splendour amongst his slaves and harem, fully supported by a United States government which places the profits of the big oil companies far, far ahead of the rights of man in that area.

Then there was the unfortunate U-2 flight which occurred after the meeting of President Eisenhower with Mr. Khrushchev and which further increased world tension, suspicion, and Mr. Khrushchev's difficulties with China. On Tuesday last I spent a very interesting hour or two with a very important individual, a highly respected gentleman with great knowledge, great understanding and experience. I refer to Right Hon. Philip Noel-Baker. He was telling me about developments in these areas and of his conviction that Mr. Khrushchev wants to develop a policy of co-operation with western governments, a system to curtail armaments and to ease tension. He is opposed by the government of China in this respect, and this unfortunate U-2 flight undermined his influence with some of his own people and made particularly difficult his discussions at this crucial time with representatives of the government of mainland China.

Finally, the latest and most flagrant example of blundering has been the support by the United States government of the counter-revolutionary invasion in Cuba. Canadian opinion in this respect is well reflected in our press today. I should like to quote a few of the headlines:

The minister, when he was speaking, said we must stand by our friends. On behalf of this group—I am speaking for the C.C.F. group this afternoon, and I have their unanimous support and endorsation—let me say that the C.C.F. wants to be friendly with everybody, but our principle should be to stand by what is right first. Speaking on behalf of this group I should like to deal briefly with some aspects of international affairs, and other C.C.F. speakers, if they have the opportunity, will further develop the theme I advance in the limited time at my disposal.

We believe that because of United States blundering in foreign policy in so many areas, the thing for Canada to do is to take a friendly—you can have differences amongst friends—constructive approach to world problems and not to remain silent when those things concern Canadians and threaten world peace, and in so doing give leadership. A large number of nations have a great deal of respect for Canada. This is evident to anyone who travels in Europe or Asia. Canada is highly respected throughout the world. Canada is in a position to use influence to give leadership, and particularly moral suasion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with respect to disarmament and nuclear tests I should like to say, first of all, that we are glad to give the minister full credit for all his ceaseless, untiring efforts to promote disarmament and the cessation of nuclear tests. I am sure of this, that if it were left to our Secretary of State for External Affairs it would not be long before we would have some sort of agreement. His efforts in this respect have earned the appreciation and gratitude of all Canadians. I hear that stated on all sides, and I have no hesitation in repeating it. Canadians who are mightily concerned about world peace, not forgetting that courageous little group known as the Voice of Women, which I am glad to note has had the blessing of the Prime Minister, have expressed this point of view with regard to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In our opinion Canada should continue to support and demand an immediate ban on nuclear tests, both to avoid the hazards of fall-out and as a first step toward nuclear disarmament. We should propose a treaty to establish a non-nuclear club of nations pledged not to manufacture, store, or permit nuclear weapons on their soil, or to use such weapons at any time. In the nuclear age effective disarmament has become a condition of survival. Canada must play a much more dynamic role in the promotion of universal disarmament. To assist in this task a special branch should be established in the Department of External Affairs, adequately staffed by nuclear scientists and other experts for continuous study of the problems involved. We recognize that these problems are involved and complicated.

The minister has frequently said that war is international suicide, and we agree with him wholeheartedly. However, some United States generals do not agree with us, you know, and have suggested that such a statement is an exaggeration of the facts. In their opinion, in the event of a nuclear war, casualties in the United States would not exceed between 30 million and 50 million.

A few days ago I had a most interesting conversation, as I said before, with Right Hon. Philip Noel-Baker, whose integrity and veracity is unquestioned. We discussed the growing burden of armaments on all mankind. I think all persons will pay tribute to the great work this gentleman has done throughout the years as a member of parliament of Great Britain, for many years a member of the Labour cabinet, as a Nobel prize winner, as a member of various important international committees, and as a member of the Society of Friends.

This is a burden that is increasing from day to day. Total world defence expenditures in 1960 came to $110 billion. Those are all that can really be assessed. In 1914 there were 4 million men under arms, whereas in 1960 there were 16 million men under arms. We are not sure if that figure is accurate; it may be an underestimate. The expenditure on military research in the United States in 1960 came to $8.4 billion. The expenditure on military research in Canada for this year is nearly $45 million. Military research; what does it means? It means research into improving the weapons of war, the weapons of destruction. Military research has helped to bring the arms race to the point of frenzy; indeed, it is the arms race in its most dangerous form.

Therefore we urge every effort to reach an agreement that will provide adequate inspection and include all important states, and that will also prohibit all forms of military research and development with the testing of new weapons and training in their use. If only military research were ended and the world scientists with their present funds and equipment diverted to peaceful projects, there is no limit to the benefits which they might bring to mankind and which mankind throughout the whole world is earnestly seeking.

I now have a few words to say about NORAD and NATO. Yesterday the minister quoted from the memorandum of the Canadian Labour Congress to the government of Canada this year with what I took to be a certain degree of relish. However, let me say this. While there may appear to be some varying opinions as to the application of our socialist principles to international affairs, let me inform the minister they simply arise from minor differences in the assessment of the present situation and as to certain facts. I am sure that he and many others will be surprised with the unity of principles, policy and purpose that will be demonstrated by the progressive democratic political forces in Canada in the very near days ahead.

Mr. Pugh: Well read.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary said "Well read". I am using extensive notes on this occasion, Mr. Speaker, because I have a great deal to say in a short period. The hon. member knows that it is not my habit to read my speeches. However, I want to be as exact as possible. This is an extremely important subject, and I want to convey our views as fully as possible in the time permitted.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to say a word or two with respect to NORAD. The revolution in weapons technology makes two facts obvious to reasonable men. The first is that annihilation is now a physical possibility. The second is that there is no direct defence against nuclear missiles. Therefore in our opinion policy must be based on these realities. Canada should cease wasteful expenditure on obsolete weapons. NORAD was intended to meet the threat of manned bombers. In the age of missiles, it is obsolete. Therefore in our opinion the NORAD agreements should be terminated.

Canada must make a general and searching reappraisal of its defence role. We should institute a major reduction in defence expenditures as a first step toward peace and to release funds urgently needed for economic aid abroad and social progress at home. Just think of these facts, Mr. Speaker. The direct costs of NORAD in 1961-62—that is this fiscal year—will be $182,127,000. The direct costs of NATO in this fiscal year 1961-62 will be $455,545,000. They have been going up increasingly since the establishment of NATO. Just compare those figures with that of nearly 700,000 unemployed. We in the C.C.F. unhesitatingly say that we believe these large sums can be more fruitfully spent in providing employment at home and assistance to underdeveloped nations abroad.

I now wish to say a few words with respect to NATO. NATO has played its part in the maintenance of western European security. However, it has concentrated on a military role and has failed to adapt its policies to the growing importance of the economic and social front in the present world struggle. We believe that the extension of nuclear weapons to any further states and organizations threatens disaster to the world. We therefore oppose Canadian troops being supplied with such weapons at home or abroad.

My time is limited, Mr. Speaker. The leader of this group has placed on the record the C.C.F. position with respect to NATO. It can be found in Hansard for March 28, 1961, at pages 3443-3444. As I said, my time is too limited to permit recapitulation of this policy and the reasons for it. Suffice it for me to say at this time that this policy was adopted at the C.C.F. national convention held in Regina in 1960, and is supported by the British Columbia federation of labour, the Vancouver labour council, nearly all unions in British Columbia whether they are in the labour congress or outside it, and by dozens and dozens of local unions across Canada that have written to our office expressing their support.

I now want to say a few words with respect to Cuba. Without a doubt many Canadians are disturbed with recent events in Cuba and the policy of the United States government. This concern is reflected in editorials in numerous Canadian newspapers. To illustrate this concern I quote from three of them. First, the Vancouver Province, which normally supports the Progressive Conservatives, in April, 1961 had this to say. I quote only briefly because of lack of time. The editorial is headed "A Continent of Cubas" and reads in part as follows:

A most disturbing aspect of the Cuban crisis is its further development of a pattern already apparent in most South American nations.

The Castro revolution was neither a freak of chance nor a malignant communist plot. It was the logical outcome of the conditions that created it.

And again:

The misery of the masses and the corruption of the government (are) surely producing a revolution.

As in Cuba, the communists are confidently standing by ready to aid, assist and guide the revolutions when they come. And undoubtedly to assist in triggering them when the time is ripe.

But the revolutions are not made in Russia. They are home grown.

And unless the western world can find some effective and speedy method of achieving peaceful and friendly revolutions there, we are likely to find a continent of Cubas on our doorstep.

Next I quote from the Toronto Daily Star, which normally supports the Liberals, our friends to the left. The date of the editorial is April 22, 1961. It was sent to me directly by one of the editors of the Toronto Daily Star, hoping that I would use it. We welcome this support.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It arrived this morning.

Mr. Herridge: It arrived three or four days ago in my case. The hon. member no doubt received the ordinary general run issue. The editorial is dated April 22, 1961, is headed "Does Latin America Want Liberty?" and reads in part as follows:

President Kennedy has asserted the right of the United States to intervene anywhere in this hemisphere to block communist penetration, with or without the consent of the country directly involved.

This arrogant doctrine mocks the independence of the western hemisphere states, including Canada. It is of course, aimed particularly at the Latin American nations, and it is proclaimed in the sacred name of liberty...

Cuba before Castro was a green pasture for American sugar and oil corporations, a jackpot for American racketeers behind Havana's gambling dens and brothels, and a sunny playground for American tourists. But it was a mean country for most Cubans.

Then it goes on to say this:

There ought to be a lesson in this for Mr. Kennedy and his countrymen and indeed for all the richer nations. The revolutionary trends in Latin America and other hungry areas will not be stopped by crying "freedom", by threatening or using force, or by adopting the communists' dirty tactics, as Mr. Kennedy now seems to favour.

Then I come to the Globe and Mail of today, April 27. The editorial is headed "Global Scales Tipping Against U.S." and it reads in part as follows:

Slowly, but with a grim and constant sureness, the global scales are tipping against the United States. Even the cautious Japanese have come out with blunt condemnations of President John F. Kennedy's Cuban policy.

Then from the Globe and Mail again under the heading "Arab Suspicions of U.S. Intensified", we find the following:

Cairo—Viewed from Cairo, one of the greatest and certainly most articulate of neutralist capitals, this April is proving a black month for the west.

I could quote from other editorials all across Canada and in Great Britain but time will not permit my doing so. Serious concern is also being expressed in Great Britain, and British Labour party members are suggesting that an inquiry into all aspects of the counter-revolutionary attack on Cuba should be undertaken by the United Nations. Canadians are very concerned. We strongly urge the government first to protest to the United States against its policies with respect to the recent counter-revolutionary attack on Cuba; second, to express complete disagreement with President Kennedy's interpretation of the Monroe doctrine as permitting direct intervention by the United States in the affairs of another state; third, to urge the use of the facilities of the United Nations and the co-operation of the organization of American states to assist in the development of a stable Cuban economy and the promotion of democratic and free, parliamentary institutions in that country.

I was very glad to receive a press report on a resolution adopted by the general assembly on April 24 which deals with a complaint by the revolutionary government of Cuba. I have only time to say that in the resolution the following is mentioned:

The representatives are deeply concerned over the situation disclosed therein, which is disturbing world public opinion and the continuation of which could endanger world peace.

The final sentence is:

> The general assembly exhorts all member states to take such peaceful action as is open to them to remove existing tension.

In this field, again, we urge Canada to use its good offices and good will in the peaceful ways suggested to bring this situation to a satisfactory conclusion.

The minister mentioned the Columbia treaty. I have not time to deal with that now; therefore I will have to deal with the minister's comments under an appropriate item of the estimates of his department.

Before concluding I want to say a word or two about the commonwealth. The stand condemning racism taken recently by the commonwealth increases opportunities for enlarging the role of this unique association of peoples. We have no hesitation in saying that the members of this group are great supporters of the commonwealth and of the greater role it could play in the days ahead in working for world peace. The multiracial and geographically dispersed character of the commonwealth fits it ideally for the role of increasing co-operation among divergent parts of the world, thus reducing the dangerous effects of the cold war.

Therefore we say that Canada should support ever more effective consultation among the members of the commonwealth, both within and without the United Nations, and in so doing provide a strong and united moral force which could be very effective, we believe, in promoting the efforts toward world peace.

The minister mentioned that the United Nations is the world's most important organization. We agree with him. The minister said that without the United Nations civilization would soon revert to savagery. We agree with those words also. It is because of this appreciation of the United Nations throughout the years that this group has emphasized the need for Canada to focus its civilian and military efforts on the general assembly and the agencies of the United Nations.

The United Nations represents the hope of progress toward a durable peace for all as the only existing, nearly universal, instrument of international conciliation. The C.C.F. again pledges its full support to every measure designed to enhance the prestige, authority and jurisdiction of the United Nations and all its agencies. Canada is obligated under the United Nations charter—> —to make available ... armed forces, assistance and facilities ... for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security.

In our opinion it is time for us, in concert with other middle and smaller powers, to insist that the general assembly find ways to create a permanent international police force. Canada should immediately create a well-equipped mobile force at the call of the United Nations.

The United Nations agencies, in our opinion, should form the major channel for providing international economic aid. This is important both to strengthen the world organization and because it would avoid placing recipient nations under an obligation to a single power. Some nations do not like being obliged to another nation. The immensely increased aid program which the C.C.F. proposes should therefore be directed accordingly.

Canada should base its votes in the United Nations on the merits of the issues rather than, as it has done on occasion in the past, particularly in some years, on bloc alignments.

It is obvious that the United Nations cannot be truly effective so long as a major world power is denied membership. We believe Canada should recognize the People's Republic of China and support its admission to the United Nations. Recognition does not involve approval of China's system of government. We have said that repeatedly. However, a non-recognition which seeks to isolate China adds to world tensions, makes the settlement of major international issues, such as disarmament, difficult if not impossible, and is totally lacking in a sense of reality. We should not shirk the difficulties when we have to do something like this. We have to start to blaze the trail in this direction.

The C.C.F. welcomes the addition of many new nations to the councils of the United Nations and warmly congratulates their peoples on their freedom from foreign rule. By economic aid, appropriate trade policies and increasingly closer relations within and without the United Nations, Canada should support their independence, integrity, sovereign rights and growth.

We realize the great difficulties which face any person in the position of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He has our sympathy and our support, and we wish him well in all he undertakes for the welfare of the people of Canada and all he endeavours to accomplish in order to bring about a goal that looks somewhat distant at the present time, but a goal we must continue striving for, that of universal world peace.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we urge the Canadian government to accept its full responsibility; to accept the unique challenge offered today—and it is unique because of our position and our moral force in the world —to give leadership to all those nations that hold Canada with affection, in great respect and high regard, and who seek some guidance from us, to march with us along the road to peace.

Mr. F. C. Stinson (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, in following the eloquent hon. member for Kootenay West I should first like to say that the good wishes he expressed on behalf of his group to the distinguished Secretary of State for External Affairs are shared, I think, by all hon. members of the House of Commons.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke yesterday I was impressed by the fact that in many different fields the minister himself has made a very important and useful contribution. He has been an excellent spokesman for Canada, an inspiring leader at the United Nations, where I have had the privilege of observing him at work, and an initiator of policy. This afternoon I hope to persuade him and the hon. members of the house that this is a good time for Canada to make economic aid to the less rapidly developing countries the major initiative of Canadian foreign policy.

I know that determining Canadian foreign policy, political, economic and military, is an extremely complex matter. Certainly there are few things more difficult than deciding how our country should play its part as a member of the western defence alliance. Since our very survival is bound up with this question, our very best efforts must be devoted to building up the right kind of deterrent forces to prevent war. Many responsible persons believe that the arms race increases, rather than decreases, the chances of war breaking out. Then we all know that making weapons is a terrible waste of resources.

At the United Nations General Assembly last fall the Prime Minister of New Zealand said that 11 per cent of the productive capacities of the world are being used to produce armaments. For these and other reasons I think it was right for Canada to make disarmament one of its main objects at the recent session of the United Nations general assembly.

Many proposals were put forward, but none of them will have any effect unless the major powers are prepared to sit down and negotiate. Much as I would like to be optimistic about the possibilities of serious negotiations in the near future, I must say that the facts of life do not support optimism in this regard. I do not think there is going to be any serious negotiation on disarmament for some little time. Certainly nobody can take any satisfaction from the fact that it has been agreed that the subject of disarmament will be discussed in the early stages of the sixteenth assembly, because in that period millions of dollars will be spent in all parts of the world producing things which have no purpose other than to destroy people and resources.

I recommend that economic aid to less developed countries should be Canada's major initiative in the 1960's for the following reasons. We are not one of the main military powers and because of this, in world politics, our role must be one of an ally, an intermediary, and from time to time a spokesman for Canada and other middle powers. This has been said very often.

Canada does not have the reputation anywhere of wanting the territory of other countries for military bases or for any other purpose. I do not think there is very much anti-Canadian feeling in the areas where our aid projects have been carried out. In the uncommitted countries I am informed there is a tendency for people to look at aid from the United States or the Soviet union as having a political objective.

The next reason is that we should do what we can, and I think there is great potential in Canada in this purpose, to stamp out some of the causes of war, and I refer to the unrest and dissatisfaction that grow among people who are hungry, ill-housed and illiterate. To this I would join the reason that we should help these people on humanitarian grounds.

In January of this year I was in Hong Kong, and I think most hon. members would come close to weeping if they saw the condition of thousands of refugees in that city. In that splendid book "To Plough with Hope", Donald Faris tells us something about the distribution of food in the world. He points out that about 60 per cent of the world's population is living on a near-starvation diet. That is less than 2,200 calories per person per day. These people, if placed side by side two feet apart, would circle the world 25 times. To get an idea of the size of this population I would suggest the following: to pass them in an automobile, if they were standing two feet apart in this manner, would take three and a half years driving 10 hours a day at the rate of 50 miles per hour.

Another argument is that raising living standards in the less developed parts of the world will provide greater markets for Canadian goods. This point, among others in this connection, has been made in the House of Commons on another occasion by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). Instead of fighting to get a larger piece of the existing trade pie, why not do something to increase the size of the pie?

While the phrase may sound somewhat empty, I think an expansion of Canada's economic aid program would give us a chance to strike a blow for freedom and for free institutions. Let us do something to show that while we in the west may be second best in the race to get a man into the heavens, we are the best when it comes to helping ordinary people on earth have a more abundant life.

Canada can well afford the program I shall refer to in a few minutes. This is a rich country, and the temptation is that as we become richer we become less concerned instead of more concerned about the problems of the poor.

Barbara Ward, the eminent economist, to whose recent book, "India and the West" the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) made reference yesterday afternoon, writes in this book the following:

> From the beginnings of recorded time, rich men and rich classes have had to face the risk of being so swamped in their own affluence that they lose any sense of purpose in life or any capacity for undersanding imaginatively the woes of other less fortunate human beings. Triviality and a closed heart have proved the bane of careless wealth from the great banquet of Belshazzar down to the latest ducking of Hollywood starlets in swimming pools full of champagne. The fact that now whole communities share in the affluence does not make the temptations any less insidious.

It seems to me that if the Canadian people are given strong leadership in this matter some of their affluence can be put to work in the less developed areas.

Compared with other countries of the west Canada has a fairly good record in foreign aid. Since the last war federal government financial assistance abroad amounted to about $4,549 million. Recently, most of our aid has been given under the Colombo plan which will be ten years old on July 1, 1961. By that time I hope the new external aid office, under the businesslike direction of Mr. H. O. Moran, a distinguished member of the Canadian foreign service, will be well established and properly staffed, and that from that date our country will move forward with an aid program which will be carefully defined and made into one of the main policies of the government. I think the Canadian people will respond enthusiastically to such a program. The purposes of the aid program must be described in a way that will command respect and attention, but it is much more important that the program itself be efficiently carried out.

While maintaining its contribution to the many multilateral and international aid and financial agencies, I think the government should concentrate on three fields, and make our effort here really productive and effective. The first is the economic assistance programs of the United Nations. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) of this country is the author of two important initiatives taken by Canada at this session of the United Nations assembly; the food bank and the OPEX proposal. That is the proposal for making available, through the United Nations, operational, executive and administrative personnel for service in less developed areas. Each of these resolutions was passed unanimously by the assembly, and I was pleased to find out yesterday that the technical advisers to the director general of the food and agricultural organization perhaps better known as FAO have, within the past fortnight, approved a draft resolution which looks forward to the early setting up of depots close to areas where there might be crises in the matter of food supplies.

It is very pleasant to see that the results of those long and sometimes very tedious deliberations in the second committee of the United Nations are now coming into sight. To do this work, however, and to make it known to the Canadian people—and this is an important facet of the work—will require that the men and women working in the field be highly qualified, and that the information officer at the United Nations make an effort to give publicity to the work of the second committee.

I would like to recommend that a group of foreign service officers be specially trained as career people in the economic aid field and kept in this field. I say that it is an inefficient use of manpower to try to make our foreign service officers jacks of all trades. We should train a group of specialists in western Europe, specialists in Latin America, specialists in the Far East and specialists in economic aid. People who have been in Paris or Rome for two or three years cannot be expected to come back to the external aid office and immediately become experts in this highly technical field. Conversely, a technical assistance man is not very useful for the first few months when he is shipped to an embassy in western Europe. I shall have something to say on the question of information in a few minutes.

The second aspect of Canada's aid activities which should be given emphasis is direct grants for capital developments. Of course, if part of the money is used for purchase of Canadian equipment, so much the better. But the great need in a country such as India is foreign exchange to be used for obtaining raw materials, the purchase of equipment, machinery and for buying the services of experts. The Indians are a proud people, with an ancient civilization, who have made great contributions to the world, including the western part of it. In some instances they may wish to commit themselves to repay those grants, and arrangements might be worked out for 40-year loans at, say, an interest rate of 2½ per cent per annum.

To make the substantial loans that are needed, however, will require that more money be made available. President Kennedy recently called on the western countries to devote 1 per cent of their gross national product to assist in developments in the less highly developed countries. It would appear that this would require that Canada's share be something of the order of $360 million. Other formulae have been proposed. An authority in the economic aid field has recently suggested that the so-called "have" countries give 1 per cent of their national income. This would make our annual share about $250 million. No matter what formula is applied, the figure will be substantially greater than the amount we have been accustomed to devoting to foreign aid. Including private investment in less developed countries, the figure has never been above one half of 1 per cent of our gross national product. A columnist has recently pointed out that in 1959 we spent 2 per cent of our gross national product on tobacco and 2½ per cent on liquor.

It seems to me that we must bring home to the individual Canadian the importance of this aid program. I suggest that one way to do this is to impose a personal income tax of 3 per cent on his taxable income. This would mean that a man with a taxable income—I do not mean gross income—of $4,000 would pay $120, and the total raised by this method would be about $240 million. With this kind of money available for economic assistance, Canadians, I believe, could then go about their business with a little better conscience.

The third field which I think should be expanded is that of giving assistance and advice to volunteer agencies engaged in foreign aid projects. I advocate the appointment of a volunteer agencies officer in the external aid office whose responsibilities would be the following:

(1) To supply information to individuals and agencies as to the names, positions and duties of officers in foreign countries who have to do with economic development, public administration and education.

(2) To maintain in digest form and to keep up to date a record of Canada's economic aid program.

(3) To maintain a record of the work of volunteer agencies in the field of foreign assistance.

(4) To publish from time to time in brief form an account of the aid projects of western countries and those of the Soviet bloc countries.

(5) To assist individuals and volunteer agencies to work in co-operation with the director general of the external aid office.

I belong to a party, Mr. Speaker, which is for free enterprise and individual initiative and against paternalism. I think that by using free enterprise and individual initiative we in Canada can help those in the less rapidly developing countries to help themselves. I am not at all impressed by people who think up bright ideas for foreign aid projects and then abandon them when they find that the government is not prepared to put up the money. However, I think that, if given leadership, there are many Canadians who would like to contribute their talents and substance to well-conceived aid projects.

May I refer briefly to three of these. The first is the African students foundation, established a few months ago by Professor Ronald Cohen and a few associates, which is providing money and facilities for training of African students in Canada.

It is said that in 1956, in all the countries of Africa, excluding only Egypt and the Union of South Africa, with a population of 186 million people, there were only 14,000 students in institutions of higher learning. Until the new African countries can build up their own institutions of higher learning, I hope that Canadian institutions, with the help of the African students' foundation and other agencies, will be able to accommodate all the students from Africa who desire to come to Canadian universities for their training.

The second project to which I should like to refer is that of the Canadian freedom from hunger committee, whose work is described in the March News Letter of the United Nations association in Canada. Mr. Wilson Woodside, chairman of the organizing committee, said of this project on March 22:

> This campaign is not one for handing out relief; it is soundly based on self-help. The basic idea is to make the poor farmers of the world into better ones.

The committee has very ambitious plans, but because the people associated with them are well informed, enthusiastic Canadians I expect the plans will be carried out.

The final private agency I wish to speak about is Canadian Overseas Volunteers, with which I have had some association in the last six months. The Canadian Overseas Volunteers is an organization which, by the way, is much further advanced in its planning than the American peace corps, which I had an opportunity of examining in Washington 10 days ago. The objective of the former organization is to send recent Canadian university graduates of high intellectual and moral calibre to serve as volunteer technicians in the less-developed regions of the world. The volunteers will work within existing programs of development and welfare under the direction and administrative control of local private or governmental agencies.

The aims of the project are to provide inexpensive service to these countries and, equally as important as the first objective, to give these young Canadians the advantages of learning something of the culture and the conditions of life of people in the countries in which they will serve. Under the direction of Professor Nathan Keyfitz a course of instruction was given to some 35 volunteers this spring and 10 young men and women have been chosen for the first year's project, which will be service in India, Ceylon and Sarawak. At Laval University the affiliated association, "Volontaires Canadiens Outremer," is now engaged in setting up a course of study and calling for volunteers. The financing of this operation is through voluntary contributions, and no federal assistance is being requested.

One hesitates, Mr. Speaker, to use dramatic language when discussing these matters but sometimes it has some value. I think, for instance, of President Kennedy's recent statement that if we in the west cannot help the many who are poor we shall never be able to save the few who are rich. What are really needed are not clarion calls but rather sacrifice and hard work. There is much to be done by government and by individuals. I should like to read the last four lines of Barbara Ward's book, "India and the West", and when I do this I will be through. When considering the matter of foreign economic aid I think we should keep in mind these lines:

> It is our fortune at this point of crisis to have all the physical resources that are needed to create a new world of opportunity. It is our tragedy that we may lack the vision and the will.

(Translation):

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, in compliance with the request of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green), that members take part in the debate on the activities of his department—when he referred to the members who were present at the meeting of the commonwealth parliamentary association, of other NATO associations and the international parliamentary association union—I felt I should make my own contribution by telling the house my personal impressions of my visit to the United Nations in the fall of 1959, where I was present as an observer.

I should like first of all to extend congratulations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as did the Conservative members.

I must indeed express my gratitude to the secretary of state for the kindness and courtesy he showed us during our visit to New York. Thanks to the minister, our stay was as pleasant as it was useful. I thank him sincerely.

Before dealing with external affairs proper, I should like to say a few words about the knowledge of languages of external affairs officials, both in Ottawa and abroad. For this purpose, I refer to the brief published by the "Conseil de la vie française en Amérique" on the Canadian Department of External Affairs. On page 10 there is a reference to the number of departmental employees in Ottawa. According to this document, out of a total of 217 employees, 174 are English-speaking Canadians, of whom 7.5 per cent are bilingual, while there are 43 French Canadians, all of them bilingual.

I could quote other figures with regard to our representatives in other countries, but I shall merely ask the house to let me put on the official record some 15 lines of text.

(Text):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Has the hon. member permission of the house to have 15 lines of text included in Hansard without reading them into the record?

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, since it is only a matter of 15 lines, perhaps the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) might wish to read them?

Mr. Boulanger: It would be better to have them printed in Hansard, since they contain a lot of figures.

(Text):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Perhaps the hon. member would give the source first.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I referred to the source of my information in my opening remarks, but I would not mind repeating it. I am referring to the brief on the Department of External Affairs of Canada submitted by the "Conseil de la vie française en Amérique" under the leadership of its president, Mr. Paul Gouin. This appears on page 10.

I am making these remarks to show the meagre part which is that of the French language in that department, a part which is definitely unsatisfactory from the national as well as the international point of view, since Canada is a bilingual country.

During my six weeks at the United Nations, I can boast of having been the only representative of this house who could converse in both our official languages.

I think it would be in the interest of Canada's prestige if at least half of the members who go to New York each year to represent our country could at least converse in the two official languages. That is the suggestion I make to the minister of external affairs and I ask him to give it its full attention.

Mr. Robert Lafreniere (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska? Does he not remember that I was at the United Nations in the fall of 1959 when he was there, and that I also can speak French and English?

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I can see that the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency did not listen to my remarks, because I clearly said "during the six weeks I attended the proceedings", and, if I remember correctly, the hon. member arrived in New York one or two days before I left.

Mr. Speaker, that six-week period I was able to realize all the good the United Nations has accomplished in the 15 years it has existed.

I was also able to realize the splendid work that the countries which have inherited from Providence a higher civilization, a prosperous economy and an almost unlimited wealth have done in their efforts to promote peace.

I also saw the great spirit of understanding and fraternity of most of the delegates, and particularly those from western countries and Latin America. That spirit was reflected in a special way during the proceedings of the general assembly in 1959, under the distinguished chairmanship of Mr. Victor Belaunde from Peru. At the end of the session Mr. Belaunde said the assembly had been an assembly of peace. I feel it is proper to remind the house that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) did great honour to our country when he occupied that chair.

On the other hand, I was able to realize the difficulties encountered by the United Nations in the solution of the problems of underdeveloped countries suffering from hunger. While the problems have not all been solved, the results obtained so far are gigantic.

It must in fact be remembered that, in 1945, most African countries were either under colonial rule or under a protectorate or mandate not much different from colonial rule. The rush toward sovereignty in 1960 and 1961 is certainly epoch-making.

The movement of emancipation which is sweeping Asia and Africa cannot be reversed and, for the good of mankind we should give it our full support. Then, too, it is noteworthy that the emancipation which has taken place in Africa has taken place peacefully, contrary to what was happening before the establishment of the United Nations.

There is a point I wish particularly to bring to my colleagues' attention. It has to do with the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization, known as the FAO. This organization was set up with the hope, expressed in the Atlantic charter, that a state of peace would be established which would ensure to all countries freedom from want. Today, chiefs of state, social workers, and economists are rightly concerned with the problems the world will have to face if no help is given to starving populations. This situation was described in the autumn of 1959 during a conversation on T.V. between the prime minister of England and the president of the United States. The prime minister of England was speaking about countries with underdeveloped economies, and Mr. Eisenhower, then president of the United States, had this to say:

> In a way, I believe that the problem of the underdeveloped countries is more flexible and important for western civilization than that of the differences and quarrels between Soviet Russia and the western world. Today, 1,700 million human beings lack adequate food, shelter, and health services. Those people will not remain silent forever. They become aware of their fate and they compare it with ours. Unless we help them, they will eventually blow up. I think that the chief co-operative task facing the so-called civilized world, including the Soviets, and which the whole world should undertake together, is to see that the legitimate aspirations of those peoples are fulfilled. It is a problem in which everyone of us should take an interest, to see what he can do and how he can share in it.

And Mr. Macmillan went on:

> I think, as you do, that it is not fair that we and our fellow citizens should enjoy all those things we have, houses, hospitals, education, etc. while those people are reduced to poverty and misery . . .

That is the most crucial problem that the world must face at this time. Already someone has described this situation as a real panic. In fact, while the rich nations, with a population of 400 million, whose annual income amounts to approximately $1,000 per person, and is as high as $2,000 in the United States, one billion people in Asia, Africa and Latin America, without mentioning communist China, must be satisfied with an annual income of $60, which hardly increases and is even growing less in some countries.

One has only to read the press reports and United Nations publications to realize the state of destitution existing in the world.

In the matter of food, it is recognized that the minimum number of calories needed by people in temperate countries is 2,700, but this figure may go as high as 4,500 according to the nature of the work performed. However, in underdeveloped countries, the ration is generally between 2,700 and 3,300 calories. In other words, 50 per cent of the the average consumption is 1,570 to 2,300 calories. In other words, 50 per cent of the population of the world is getting less than the bare minimum of calories to survive.

In the matter of health, world-wide disease control programs have been set up under the UN, with wonderful results. However, much remains to be done before adequate medical and hospital care is provided.

Whereas in the United States there is one doctor for every 800 people or so, and one hospital bed for every 101 people, and in Canada there is one doctor for every 950 people and one bed for every 77 people, in underdeveloped countries, there is only one doctor for 20,000, 40,000 and even 70,000 people, and one bed for 1,000, 2,000 and up to 3,000 people. If you add to that the fact that the ratio of illiterate people over 10 years of age varies from 40 to 90 per cent, you realize in what position mankind finds itself in facing the most fearsome economic problem, with its social, political and racial implications.

While the situation is of course serious, according to some humanists, what is worse is the indifference and perhaps also the ignorance of some people with respect to world politics. Canada carries its share of responsibility in that respect.

The immediate surpluses now owned by the "have" countries would only be a drop of water in an ocean of poverty, if we decided to give them away.

It must be recognized that commendable efforts have been made by the United States and Canada to find a means of meeting the basic needs of the "have not" countries.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) suggested, at a meeting of the NATO countries in 1957, that an international food bank be set up.

In early November 1959, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) made certain suggestions to the F.A.O. in Rome, but apparently met with little success.

Today, however, now that the government has decided to dispose of agricultural surpluses and restrict agricultural production, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture seem less interested in pushing this food bank idea.

Canada would find itself in a ridiculous position today if we were called upon to supply products other than grain.

We did have pork surpluses. We were told a short time ago that we had 35 million pounds of surplus pork, but those reserves have been sold, and we no longer have a pork surplus. Perhaps we still have a surplus of butter and milk powder. With Canada's present agricultural policy, it can be said that we have practically no surpluses left to give away or distribute to starving countries.

And what will we be able to supply, a few months hence, in view of the defeatist policies now being followed by the present Minister of Agriculture in regard to price supports? We will be lucky if production can be maintained at a level adequate to meet our own needs and fill the orders from our remaining export markets.

It is true to say, and I quote from an editorial published in Terre de Chez Nous for May 6, 1959, that:

> Every time agricultural surpluses reach a level substantially higher than the commercial marketing opportunities, we are given a great show. In the forefront are groups whose true intentions are camouflaged under high-sounding phrases. Government authorities quickly lose their heads and adopt measures that are often half-baked.

What an about-face since the statements made by the Prime Minister in 1957, when speaking in Saskatoon, as reported in the Western Producer for September 10, 1959.

(Text):

> To those who think that in agriculture we have arrived at a point where we need no longer expand I say to you this: I learned one lesson at the commonwealth conference in London.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order. It seems to me that the hon. member is leaving the field of external affairs and is proceeding to a discussion of domestic agricultural production policy. Perhaps he could explain how it is related to the debate currently before the house.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I want to show this house that agriculture is related to external affairs because we must contribute food to underdeveloped countries. Besides, if we were forced to provide food to those people today, we would be late.

The Prime Minister said this at the Saskatoon conference:

(Text):

We must expand our agricultural development. With one quarter of the world's population going to bed hungry at night, methods must be found to enable the distribution of our surpluses to the end that happiness will come to the people of the world.

Together we must preserve the peace of the world and hold ourselves through agriculture as a bulwark against communism.

(Translation):

The Prime Minister could just as well have said, as the chairman of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture stated recently in Toronto:

At the present time, it should rather be said that there is not a surplus actually, but a cumulative unbalance between food production and world marketing methods.

Mr. Speaker, if the prestige acquired by Canada during the difficult war years of 1939-45, during the Korean war and the Suez crisis is to be preserved, the present government must devote its intelligence and all its power to the development of a food distribution plan to feed the 35 million babies who are born each year and doomed to die of starvation.

The chairman of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture made a suggestion with which I quite agree, that is to create a committee of the best experts in this country to study and analyse the discussions held in Rome by the world organization for food and agriculture, and make recommendations to be submitted at the next meeting.

I endorse that proposal urging authorities to think it over seriously and to take positive action as soon as possible.

The assistance provided by the distribution of food to underdeveloped countries would surely be quite helpful, but they will also have to be provided with financial means to equip and educate themselves so that they can progressively develop their agricultural production and become self-sufficient.

Canadians in general have made great financial sacrifices to help those starving countries by their participation to the Colombo plan and other assistance organizations. Others have sacrified their youth, their intelligence, and perhaps social benefits that would have accrued to them from a profession in our country, to devote themselves to the evangelization and education of those peoples who are entitled to share the spiritual and temporal wealth of this world. I refer to our Catholic and Protestant missionaries, those ambassadors of civilization and peace who are dispersed in all countries of the world and for whom we have had too little sympathy, gratitude and encouragement.

Who has not heard about the tremendous work they have done in certain countries of Africa and Latin America where the communists use all their energy and spend enormous sums of money to sell their evil ideology.

The situation is serious and urgent; no effort should be spared if we are to preserve peace and upset communist influence in the world.

To back up my remarks, I will read what Mr. Sen, the director general of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization said on January 22, 1959, in Rome:

Vast regions of Asia, Africa and Latin America accounting for more than half the world's population are starving. Their food is inadequate both in quality and in quantity to insure their health, growth and physical strength. This is the most serious human problem of this century.

Our future is at stake. What will be the world situation 25 years from now, if we do not act now?

(Text):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order. The hon. member had asked during his speech for permission to have printed in Hansard some 15 lines from the department's report. I do not think the house properly disposed of the matter at that time. Does the hon. member still make the request?

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Boulanger: With pleasure.

Mr. Pigeon: The hon. member referred a moment ago to the situation of bilingualism in the Department of External Affairs. Could he tell the house what he thinks of the attitude of his leader when he was secretary of state for external affairs and used to delay the publication of French releases by his department?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not so.

Mr. Boulanger: This is an unfounded statement of the kind the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm usually makes.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is not an unfounded statement; I found that information in Le Devoir of 1957.

Mr. Boulanger: I asked the house at that time the authorization to have some 15 lines printed in Hansard.

(Text):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Could I ask the hon. member, further, if this was a report, or a section of a report which dealt with figures or statistics, or was it simply a factual statement?

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Those are statistics.

(Text):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Has the hon. member permission of the house to have the 15 lines of this report printed in Hansard as part of his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: I object.

(Text):

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) now says he objects. I think the hon. member, who is fair-minded, will recall that he sat here a few minutes ago and finally agreed to it at the time.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member was sitting next to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) at the time. While I think there can be no objection to you, Mr. Speaker, asking for the consent of the house, as you are now doing, I think there is no doubt that at the time there was full concurrence on the part of the house.

There was some doubt on the part of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, but he later agreed. It is true that he now expresses his disagreement, but I suggest to him that, having earlier taken the position that I say to him he did take, it is not now open to him to take a contrary position.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I have not even come close to agreeing. And I stand by my decision.

(Text):

Mr. Caron: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, when we were under the impression that consent had been obtained and the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) had not said he was opposed to it, the reporters received the pamphlet and they have gone with it. Therefore it would be impossible for the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) to read it; it has gone up to the reporters' room.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Speaker, would it not be just as well to give the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska the privilege of reading it, so as to dispose of the whole matter?

An hon. Member: It has gone to Hansard.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, when I was discussing figures, I mentioned some of them and asked the house to authorize the printing of 15 lines or so of that text in Hansard. There was no objection then—

Mr. Pigeon: I objected.

Mr. Boulanger: —since the publication was fetched and I no longer have it so I cannot read it.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the house to the fact that, when the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm objected, he was not in his seat. Therefore, according to standing orders, he could not have been recognized by Mr. Speaker, because an hon. member should then be in his seat. He did not make that objection in his seat, since he was in front. Therefore, according to standing orders, he could not be recognized by the Chair.

Mr. Pigeon: I am pleased to hear the hon. member contradict his colleagues but—

(Text):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order. The Chair did recognize the remark of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) at that time objecting to the printing of these figures.

I put the question to the house again. Does the house give its unanimous consent to the request of the hon. member that these figures, which I understand are statistical and cover about 15 lines, be printed in Hansard as part of the hon. member's speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: I object.

(Text):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Agreed.

Mr. Robert Lafreniere (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, anyone with any sense of responsibility must recognize that expressing ideas on relations between countries in the world has become a delicate and even dangerous matter, because of the great international tensions which are constantly increasing. However, the position of a Canadian in this respect, is less risky, as Canada is in no way considered as a militarily aggressive country.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, we are proud to note the rate at which Canadian influence within the United Nations is increasing. The prestige of this country in that world organization is taking colossal proportions, considering that Canadian history is only four centuries old and that we scarcely have a population of 18 million. Relatively speaking, Canada compares favourably with many countries in the world.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, our strength is not based on physical or military power; it is rather a moral strength based on Christian and democratic values.

In the eyes of other nations, Canada will remain on the same level as the greatest world powers to the extent that she continues to set an example of complete respect for spiritual values while protecting human dignity to the fullest extent.

In external affairs the mission of Canada as of all other commonwealth countries and the other western nations, is to maintain those Christian principles, as a vigorous and living reality in their practical application for they are the glory of our civilization and the best guarantee against a renewal of that gory experience we have known in the last two world wars, of millions of human beings destroying one another.

And speaking of Christian principles, on behalf of those Canadians I represent here, in this House of Commons, I want to deplore the regrettable attitude of the Liberal party whose leader stated that he would rather live in a communist world than die.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Habel: Duplessism at its best.

Mr. Lafreniere: Such an attitude is extremely prejudicial, and one for which the Liberal party and its leader should be very sorry.

Such policy, Mr. Speaker, is fully rejected both by Canadians in the province of Quebec, which I represent more particularly in this house, and by all Christian Canadians in every one of our provinces.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Read out the statement he made the next day.

Mr. Lafreniere: Obviously, if we understand—

(Text):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order. I recognize the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) on a point of order.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I am not rising on a point of order.

(Text):

I should point out, Mr. Speaker, that it is not a point of order. I wonder whether the hon. member would permit me to ask a question.

(Translation):

Mr. Lafreniere: I shall let the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont ask his question when I have done with my remarks.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Read out the statement our leader made the next day.

Mr. Lafreniere: Of course, we realize that every individual has the natural and deeply human wish to see his life on earth last as long as possible. But, for the sake of future generations, would it not be more important if the ultimate goal of our life were the safeguarding, under every circumstance, of that invaluable treasure which we inherited from our two mother countries, i.e. a sound democracy with a Christian civilization, even if it cost us a few years of our lives?

I do not mean, Mr. Speaker, that we should strive to bring other powers to give up their ideologies so that we may substitute our own. That would be utopian. But our role consists in providing peaceful community life while respecting the freedom all nations and individuals have of living according to their own convictions.

I cannot help endorsing here, and with pride, the only acceptable policy for a country like ours, a policy which has been most eloquently described by the representative of the people of Canada. Our newspapers have reported in laudatory terms the views of the people of Canada on the firm, clear and definite approach shown by the right hon. Prime Minister at the United Nations last September. A practical lesson in international policy, on the subject of colonialism, was served, with all the trimmings, to the Russian prime minister. For the glory of both France and the commonwealth, I should like to repeat here that part of the speech made by the Prime Minister of Canada:

> Since the last war, seventeen colonies and dependent territories, totalling more than 40 million people, have been led by France to complete freedom. In the same period, fourteen colonies and dependent territories, totalling half a billion men, have achieved complete independence within the commonwealth. All told, it means that 600 million men, in more than 30 countries most of which are now represented in the United Nations, have achieved their freedom with the approval, encouragement and help of the United Kingdom, the commonwealth and France. Few countries can speak here of colonialism with as much authority as we can, because our country was once a colony of France and of the United Kingdom. Our country was the first one which, about a century ago, achieved its development by constitutional means and managed to pass from colonial status to independence, without having to break family ties.

Descendants of France and of commonwealth countries, as well as all Canadians, are indeed grateful to the Prime Minister for having described so forcefully and clearly the humanitarian policy applied by our two mother countries throughout the years. Those words had to be said and repeated here in this house.

As a representative of French-speaking Canadians, this impels me to underline the significance for Canada of the African countries' admission to the United Nations. Everyone knows that, in most of those African countries (including several former French colonies) a good percentage of the population speaks French. That is why, in a recent speech, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) expressed the following ideas:

> Canada is one of the only middle powers in the western world in a position to understand the problems of both the former British colonies and the former French colonies in Africa. This is why the efforts always exercised by French Canadians to promote French thought throughout Canada take on a new importance that had been overlooked up to now.
> This is where the active co-operation of the French Canadian becomes essential, not only for the Canadian cause, but especially for the cause of western civilization: that he may offer his services when a knowledge of French is necessary. Therefore, it is essential to the protection of our values that French Canadians take a positive stand in the assistance to be given to African countries. No one else is in a position to perform this duty which is, I say it again, altogether fundamental.

Mr. Speaker, this is an excellent opportunity for the government to consider increasing as much as possible the French representation at home and abroad, not only in the administration, but also in the government. It is a well known fact, Mr. Speaker, that the status of French speaking Canadians is not that of a minority in this country. They are partners on a fully equal basis.

According to international law, a minority has no real rights, but privileges. The right of having its own culture and language is acknowledged but, as a rule, its political rights are always limited. Such is not the case in Canada, because French is recognized as an official language. Since our country is of a bilingual and bi-cultural nature, other countries must be made aware of it, and this can only be done through the Department of External Affairs.

I know that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) is concerned about this problem, but he cannot instantly remedy the guilty negligence of the former administration on this point.

I now wish, Mr. Speaker, to express a few thoughts on the problem which seems most important to me and the most serious particularly at this time with regard to the relations between east and west, I mean assistance to underdeveloped countries.

Nowadays, Mr. Speaker, thanks to transport facilities, to the speed of information, the peoples of the world are closer to one another. Members of the great human family now live under the same roof, and we could even extend the analogy as far as to say that, when necessary, they eat at the same table. But as in this twentieth century we still have to deplore the fact that two thirds of the human beings on earth are living in hunger and poverty, here is the question that must be asked: How much longer will members of the same family tolerate that some live in wealth and luxury, having the best of foods to satisfy their appetite, when others are collapsing under the burden of misery and hunger?

That is why, Mr. Speaker, the executive director of the United Nations special funds, Mr. Paul Koffman, in the course of a recent session of the Economic and Social Council, made this impressive statement:

> When the history of this twentieth century is written the outstanding event to be recorded will not be the first or second world war, nor the conquest of space, but the fact that one and three quarter billion human beings whose ancestors had accepted hunger, poverty and disease, decided to tolerate these no longer.

Such is, Mr. Speaker, the nature of the problem now threatening the world, and much of the responsibility falls on the western countries. Their task is to put forward, quickly and efficiently, a program of educational, technical and economic assistance.

I must say however in all fairness that the countries concerned, and in particular those which are members of NATO, are well aware of the seriousness and the urgency of the problem. With some colleagues, I had the opportunity, in June 1959, of representing Canada at the tenth anniversary Convention of NATO in London. My official function was that of economic rapporteur of subcommittee D-3 to which the 15 NATO members presented a brief on the common economic problems of the west.

I read those briefs and made a summary of them, from which you will allow me, sir, to quote a few lines, in order to indicate how well those nations understand the necessity of taking action. I quote:

> Inaction might give rise to a peril much greater than the unpleasant prospect of being engulfed in a world where the ruling majority, impelled by envy and long pent-up resentment, might be in a position, by reason of its population and its vast territories, to exert on the west deadly economic if not military pressures. That danger is also that of a world where a triumphant communism would extend its roots in all directions. Furthermore, it would be foolhardy to underestimate the extent to which the communist system appeals to underdeveloped countries, although individual freedoms are sacrificed without mercy under it.

Such is, Mr. Speaker, the thought of the NATO countries, an organization of which Canada must remain an active member, the statements of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) to the contrary notwithstanding.

But, besides the economic aid program, we must lay emphasis on the educational program within those underdeveloped countries. Financial help and relief in the form of various products are only of a transistory nature. What counts is to give those people the necessary technical knowledge and training that will enable them to take an active part in their development and to work themselves towards their industrial and commercial expansion.

Furthermore, any help extended to underdeveloped countries must not be considered by them or by us as outright charity inspired by sympathy and pity; that help, must be considered, as it is incidentally, as an invitation to an exchange of friendly services which eventually and effectively will be materially and morally profitable to both parties.

Indeed, besides performing that humanitarian deed absolutely necessary for the recovery of underdeveloped countries, the western countries, including Canada, will be opening up important future markets for the export of their products.

It is therefore a huge task and, in the light of a normal population increase throughout the world, we can expect that this world population will have increased twofold within forty years or so, but the stakes are worthwhile, since it means preventing war and safeguarding peace throughout the world by sheer efforts.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs, his parliamentary secretary and his closest associates for the perseverance, tenacity and confidence they show on all occasions, as regards the possibility of disarmament.

I rejoiced recently when the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) announced the award in my constituency of a $4 million contract for the production of 18 million cartridges for the Valcartier armoury. Thanks to that contract, 400 employees were able to keep their jobs which they might otherwise have lost. But, how happier would I be if I learned that those cartridges, instead of being used for war purposes were to be used for partridge shooting. Mr. Speaker, it would be too bad for the partridges! In any case, let us hope that those large amounts will one day be used to promote education and peace.

In any case, difficult though it may seem, disarmament still appears as a possibility.

One of the staunchest advocates of disarmament is probably our delegate to the United Nations, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who represents what Christian nations respect most, namely human dignity in all that the word implies. We can only wish him all the courage required under the circumstances, and express the hope that human intelligence, with the aid of Providence, will succeed in creating systems favourable to peaceful coexistence of nations on this earth.

(Text):

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, seldom has this house engaged in a debate on external affairs at a time of greater world tension and anxiety than at this very moment. Some differences of opinion have been expressed in this debate already, particularly by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), with regard to certain aspects of the government's policy and with regard to certain policies being followed by some of the major powers in the world. I want to tell the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) that as he goes from nation to nation and as he speaks in the councils of the world our thoughts are with him, our best wishes are with him, and although we may disagree at times with particular policies, nevertheless with him we voice our opinions on the basis of what we believe to be in the best interests of our nation, in the best interests of freedom and in the best interests of peace in the world.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has earned for himself an excellent reputation in this country and in other parts of the world as a firm advocate of disarmament, and as a staunch supporter of a continuing ban on nuclear testing. We wish him well in all of these endeavours.

Spokesmen of the C.C.F.-New party group in the house have expressed full opposition to NATO, a position different from that taken by the Liberals. In recent months we have said that we have been disturbed that NATO has continued to be almost exclusively a military organization; that we feel more and more people are coming to the conclusion that Canada's best role in the preservation of peace and freedom is in more positive avenues than those offered by the NATO organization.

Over the years we in the C.C.F. movement, and our predecessors before us, have always been very firm and loyal supporters and admirers of the United Nations organization, and that faith remains. We wish to see everything possible done now and in the future to strengthen the United Nations organization and its machinery, since we feel that in this strengthening lies the best hope for peace in the world. We are admirers of the work, the contributions and efforts of the Secretary General of the United Nations, Mr. Dag Hammarskjold, and we view with alarm any and all efforts to downgrade his position, to divide his authority or to take other steps that would lessen the effective work of the United Nations. We are pleased that at this time the aftermath of the Cuban fiasco, to which so much thought is being given, apparently has not prevented positive action, as far as we can tell, to bring peace to Laos, and we are pleased that Canada once again will be playing a constructive and positive role in this regard.

I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lafreniere) with great interest and I certainly endorse what he said about the particular role that Canada can play because of the bilingual and bicultural nature of this country in assisting the development of the emergent French communities, particularly in Africa. I might say that for some considerable time I have been an advocate of Canada taking action similar to that announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) the other day. As far as I have been able to ascertain, and I am quite willing to be corrected, I was the first member of the house to spell out a program somewhat of the type that the government has followed. This was not an original idea with me. It was put forward in some of the French language newspapers of the country, but I felt it was an excellent idea worthy of endorsation and I was pleased to do so on March 4, 1960, in a speech delivered at Sir George Williams University, Montreal.

I took part in discussions of this question in the house following the proposal being made and when it was discussed as recently as July 14, 1960, the Secretary of State for External Affairs expressed interest but felt at that time that great difficulties presented themselves. I am pleased that some policy has been evolved and has been announced in the house. I am pleased that it has been given, as I was certain it would be, unanimous approval by members of all parties. I say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that as the policy develops of assisting the French-speaking nations of Africa by suppling French-speaking teachers from this country and providing scholarships for training people from those countries at our universities, we shall be pleased to support at any time whatever further extension of this kind of program is practicable and will be of a helpful nature to these emergent nations.

The matter that I would imagine is on the minds of most hon. members more than any other is the recent unhappy experience in Cuba. I believe it is incumbent on members of the house to speak out frankly in this regard, to place their views on Hansard and make them known to the government. In due course the government will consider those views and I would hope that the expressions of opinion by members of the house may be helpful in the future in a constructive way.

Fidel Castro of Cuba came to power, I would think, with the best wishes of most people in the South American nations and with a great deal of good will on the part of many nations of the world in the hope that his government would improve economic standards of the people of Cuba. As a Canadian and a member of this house I was disturbed at a very early stage in his regime by the excesses in which I felt his administration was indulging. I was disturbed at the blood bath in that country in the early days of his regime. The first question I asked in the house after the opening of the session in 1959 was whether or not Canada had considered these atrocities and was prepared to send an appropriate note in this connection. I am not putting this forward to try to raise the issue as it was presented at that time. I merely put it forward to point out that the excesses of that administration have been abhorred by members of this group and we have felt that Canada should make its wishes known that this kind of thing should not be continued.

However, we have always taken the attitude that the type of government evolved in any given nation is really in the main the prerogative of the people of that nation and that there should be a minimum of outside influence and interference. We think that Fidel Castro and his regime came to power because of the abject poverty of the nation, because of exploitation and widespread disease, because of extensive illiteracy and the natural desire of the Cuban people for education, health, food and a rising standard of living.

We were opposed and we are opposed to action by the Soviet union, the United States or anyone else that would interfere with Cuba and the type of government that may be in office at any given time. We were opposed to the action that was taken by President Kennedy, as revealed in what has been written by well known and respected reporters, in promoting and assisting in almost every way the attack on Cuba by counter-revolutionary forces. We think that is a mistake in itself but we also think it is a mistake in its wider ramifications. We think that this kind of inappropriate action, far from being a deterrent to communism, merely plays into the hands of the communists, and that if President Kennedy should be determined to hand the nations of Latin America into the arms of the communists this is the way to go about it.

We suggest that Canada has an important role to play in speaking out at this time in this connection and saying in no uncertain terms to the United States administration what I and this group believe to be the opinion of Canadians, namely, that this kind of risk, this kind of intervention, should not be proceeded with and is in fact a danger to the peace of the world.

Newsmen have been reporting on the aftermath of this intervention. One reporter, Frederick Nossal, says that the global scales are tipping against the United States. United States prestige in Japan is going down. Another reporter says that the Cuban affair worries the British; certainly, that is what we read in the British newspapers. Another headline in the Globe and Mail says, "Washington attitude alarms Great Britain".

The Globe and Mail, in an editorial on April 21, 1961, points out what, in their opinion, are the far-reaching results of this adventure. The editorial says, in part:

> The results of this adventure seem likely to be far-reaching and unfortunate:
> 1. The Castro regime, far from being overthrown, has been strengthened . . .
> 2. If Dr. Castro was not wholly in the communist camp before, these events may well put him there. Faced with an avowedly hostile United States, from which further attacks may come, he is likely to grasp all the more firmly the hand of friendship extended by the Soviet union.
> 3. U.S. prestige has been badly damaged in Latin America . . .
> 4. Most serious of all, the United States has damaged its moral position in the world as a peaceful, law-abiding nation, by seemingly resorting to undercover methods of warfare normally associated with the communist bloc.

This is an editorial from a respected Canadian newspaper, the Globe and Mail. Other reports have been forthcoming that are, I think, alarming and on which I think hon. members should speak out. I think it is our duty to speak out on this question. I certainly speak out, not in any sense of animosity to the United States, nor in any sense of being anti-American, but in the hope that if enough members of parliament speak out on this question statesmen in the United States might stop, look, listen and think about these representations coming from the parliament of Canada before they proceed with another adventure of this kind.

President Kennedy came to office with the almost unanimous goodwill of the people of the world. I have never known a statesman from a country outside our own who has had more widespread admiration here and in whom Canadians had more hope and faith than the present President of the United States. I am sorry to say that faith has been shaken and that goodwill that was his, accompanied as it was by much good will in other nations, has been withering away and falling off in the days since this misadventure. The past disturbs us, but the future prospects disturb us more.

I have in my hand a Globe and Mail article which quotes James Reston of the New York Times service. The heading is "No Scapegoats". The subheading reads:

> Kennedy shaken by intelligence failure but takes full responsibility.

This sounds like a courageous thing to do, and I expect it is. However, I believe there are greater implications in this situation. The article says in part:

> He took the decision to continue the training of the Cuban refugees with arms provided by the government, and for releasing the ships and gasoline to launch the attack at this time.
> He did so against the advice of secretary of state Dean Rusk and under secretary of state Chester Bowles.

We read that one of the main reasons why President Kennedy has taken this attitude of full responsibility is that he does not wish to get into a partisan debate with the Republican party as to who was to blame for the original plans having gone wrong since they were formulated by the former administration. What disturbs me is the fact that this may be an indication that bi-partisan foreign policy in the United States, with the general agreement of the two major parties and their spokesmen, will once again lead to undertaking this kind of adventure, but having learned from this one will the next time undertake to overrun and overthrow the government of Cuba by using United States forces and by so doing will endanger the peace of the world. I think that would be a mistaken policy on the part of the United States government and I would hope that is not what is going to take place.

Mr. George Bain writes from Washington as follows:

> The debate in the United States on Cuba policy has almost entirely ceased to entertain the question of whether that policy should be directed toward dislodging Premier Fidel Castro, and now concentrates only on how and when.

I hope there is a reconsideration in the councils of the United States. I would hope that there would be a change of policy. I hope that Canada will speak out in this regard.

The hon. member for Kootenay West raised this question on April 21, 1961 and at that time the Secretary of State for External Affairs, undoubtedly very worried and with his nerves taut, said something in reply that rather shocked me. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether or not the hon. member wants us to declare war on the United States.

I hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in the tradition of this country, will make the strongest possible representations to the United States, in whatever way he believes best, to the effect that a misadventure of this kind should not be repeated. I believe, as I have said earlier, that we all have a responsibility in this house. I think the official opposition has a very important responsibility. Yesterday the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) spoke but he did not contribute very much on this particular question not because, as I realize, he has not a very great knowledge in this field, but because he decided to say little about this subject. He said, as reported at page 4033 of Hansard for April 26, 1961:

> At this time I am not going to press the minister beyond this. I am assuming that we have made our position known and that we are prepared to deal with the next step, which may or may not arise.

Then he said, in the same vein, that he hoped we, meaning Canada, would not hesitate to make our position known. I hope the Liberal party will make its position known in this house. The leader of the official opposition, I understand, is scheduled to speak in this debate. In view of the great experience he has had in the field of international affairs, the great reputation that has been his and the great achievements that have been his in helping to further the peace of the world, I would hope that he would address himself to this subject. I am certain that his words will be held in respect, not only in Canada but in the other nations of the world. I think that if enough of us speak out in strong terms to the United States as I hope the Canadian government has already done, we may well, along with other like-minded democrats in the world, so influence the United States that she will forgo any further adventures of this kind.

As I said earlier, this does not mean that we do not criticize—as we do—the excesses in Cuba. We value human life. When human life is exterminated, we should speak up. We value the processes of freedom and parliamentary democracy. We value our traditions. We sincerely feel that, for the peace and freedom of the world, when actions are taken which in our judgment are wrong, even though they be taken by our friends, we should make our own views abundantly clear. This we are doing.

I should now like to turn to a more positive statement of our external affairs position. We are continuing to spend very large sums of money for defence. Over the years we have taken the attitude that these defence expenditures or some of them could be better used if channelled in certain other ways. We feel that Canada's best role today is to have a strong conventional force available to the United Nations for use by the United Nations whenever our force is needed for United Nations police work. We view with great interest, as do all Canadians, the first cosmonaut and his achievements. I am an optimist, along with the minister, as far as world affairs are concerned even though I have been pointing out some of the dangers. I think the competition between the Soviet union and the west is more likely in the years ahead to take place in the economic field, the scientific field, and in the field of conquering outer space. We are a small nation with a small population. We are wealthy in terms of our population but not in absolute terms. I should like the government to give some consideration to the question of whether or not we might be playing a small part—I know we are now playing a tiny part—shall we say, or a greater part in research, in association with other nations, particularly commonwealth nations, in the field of conquering outer space and delving into its scientific mysteries. I think this would be a more positive way in which to use some of the money that is now being spent on defence.

We have always been strong advocates of economic aid and economic assistance. Canada is doing a little bit but I am not too proud of the relatively small amount we are doing as compared with what we are doing in other fields. I have in my hand a statement given to me by the officials of the minister's department. It shows for economic aid an amount of under $60 million for the fiscal year 1959-60, just over $64 million for 1960-61, with estimates so far of roughly $62 million for 1961-62. There are other details—

Mr. Green: If I may interrupt the hon. member for a minute, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that other items for aid will be coming in. I think the figures for 1960-61 include all the supplementary items.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I am not trying to make the point that we are doing less now than we were doing a year ago or two years ago. I am merely pointing out these figures in order to show that, in relation to a present gross national product of over $30 billion, and expenditures on military establishments and defence expenditures of some $1.6 billion, this small expenditure is not good enough. I think we should do more. If the government could announce that this expenditure was being doubled or tripled or increased even more than that—for years we have said it should be 1 per cent of the gross national product and we have been given some support in recent days by a prominent spokesman for the Liberal party—or would move in this direction, I think it would be given the unanimous support of the members of this house and the general support of the Canadian nation.

I have made my own position clear. I have spoken on behalf of our group in the House of Commons. I do this with a full realization that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is an old friend and an old colleague in this house over many years. Although he may have felt that I have been critical of his policy or the policy of other nations, I assure him that it has been done with the best of good will, with admiration for the person of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and in the fervent hope that, by working together and speaking out boldly, we may have some influence on the course of events in the world to the end that peace and freedom may be better secured.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure indeed to take part in this debate, but I must confess that I had not expected to be taking part in it for perhaps another few moments. Therefore, if hon. members will just bear with me for about half a minute until I secure my brief notes, I shall proceed.

The first subject with which I should like to deal is that of the United Nations. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) in his remarks dealt with this particular subject at some considerable length. However, there are one or two additional items with which I should like to deal at this time. The first concerns world refugee year. The particular aspect of it of immediate interest to us was the movement to Canada of the third group of tubercular refugees that came here under this special program. As hon. members perhaps know, two groups of some 100 families came to Canada under this special program of world refugee year and just recently a third group have come to this country. Hon. members may recall that as one of our contributions to world refugee year, the government brought to this country two groups of tubercular refugees from refugee camps in Europe. The government paid transportation costs and maintenance costs for one year or until such time as the family became established. By January of this year only 51 refugees were still receiving treatment in sanitariums. So successful were those refugees in adjusting themselves to the Canadian environment and in becoming established in our communities that the government decided to extend the program and to admit a third group. In March of this year the third group composed of 272 persons, of whom 114 were tubercular, arrived in Canada. The total number of tubercular refugees, with their families, admitted to Canada in the three groups now stands at 826. The success of this program has been attributable in no small measure to the cooperation of the provincial governments which have been responsible for the medical care and treatment of the refugees.

I feel sure that hon. members of this house and others in Canada will be very pleased with Canada's contribution to helping those people in the world who, through no fault of their own—other than that they disagreed, politically or economically, with the countries from which they came; for no other reason than that—because of the contraction of this unfortunate illness were left to a life of despair in refugee camps. We and certain other governments have done our best to provide homes and rehabilitation for them.

Another subject with which I should like to deal very briefly is the single convention on narcotic drugs. I think this is a subject of interest to quite a large number of hon. members. In this regard a conference to adopt a single convention on narcotic drugs was held at United Nations headquarters, New York, from January 21 until March 31 last.

More than 70 countries participated and our delegation played an important part in the negotiations which led to the adoption of a single convention on narcotic drugs. Canada signed the convention on March 31 last. To a very considerable extent the single convention is a consolidation of the existing multilateral treaties and protocols on narcotic drugs.

The convention, while recognizing the necessity of controlling existing sources of supplies, also takes into account the growing importance of synthetic narcotics brought about by continuing research in chemistry and pharmacology.

The adoption of the single convention will simplify and improve the procedures for the control of narcotic drugs and increase the effectiveness of the international organizations involved in combating the illicit drug trade.

It is, I think, heartening to reflect that the community of nations, despite their ideological differences, has been able to reach such substantial agreement in the field of narcotics control, where international co-operation is really very essential.

There are two items which have been referred to by various hon. members this afternoon, including the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Stinson) and the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), I believe.

One is the subject of the so-called world food bank. As hon. members may recall, a resolution with regard to this matter was proposed by Canada last fall at the first part of the fifteenth general assembly of the United Nations. The subject was dealt with in the second committee, which deals with economic and social matters.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

After a considerable amount of discussion and consultation with other delegations the resolution was brought forward and unanimously accepted in the second committee. This resolution requested, in essence, the food and agriculture organization, which was meeting in Rome at the time, to investigate ways and means of providing emergency food supplies to countries which had suffered a disaster such as an earthquake, as happened in Chile a year ago, drought, or some other disaster. It would also assist countries where civil war or some other man-made unpleasantness had resulted.

This matter was referred to the food and agriculture organization for the purpose of working out a detailed plan which is to be submitted to the meeting of the economic and social council which is sitting in New York.

Incidentally, that particular body was properly constituted only last week, because there had been some difficulty in electing the eighteenth member. However, I should like to deal with this particular aspect of the economic and social problem a little later in my remarks.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Who is the chairman of the Canadian delegation at this meeting of the economic and social council?

Mr. Nesbitt: I am not quite sure I understand the hon. member's question. I wonder whether the hon. member for Essex East would repeat his question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was wondering who was representing Canada as the chief delegate at the meeting of the economic and social council.

Mr. Nesbitt: I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I have some difficulty understanding the question of the hon. member for Essex East, because at the moment Canada is not a member of the economic and social council.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right; excuse me.

Mr. Nesbitt: In any event, the suggestions drawn up by the food and agriculture organization will be presented at the present meeting of the economic and social council; which in turn will present recommendations to the sixteenth general assembly next fall.

If I correctly understood the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, I believe his remarks were to the effect that the Canadian government, after launching this particular effort last fall, has become less enthusiastic about it and we are dropping it. I merely make these remarks for his enlightenment.

The next item with which I should like to deal is the subject of the so-called experts bank, which was also a Canadian initiative last fall. This subject was also referred to, of course, by the hon. member for York Centre.

For some time, under the project known as OPEX the United Nations, through its secretariat, has been able to secure the services of specialists in various governmental fields to assist countries under specific conditions. Until last fall one particular aspect of this problem had been rather neglected. I refer, again, to the question of an emergency and a situation such as occurred in Chile a year ago, an earthquake; civil war or other man-made or natural disaster. Because of these disasters public services in these countries might very often be very seriously disrupted. I refer to public services such as health, transportation, public administration and the like.

We felt that some effort should be made to provide specialists who could be called upon in an emergency and would not take six or eight months to recruit. To obtain properly qualified people to perform jobs in these fields may take some time. It requires some time to persuade people to leave good jobs in Canada and accept a perilous and uncertain job in some country far afield.

We felt that member countries of the United Nations should set up rosters of expert personnel from the civil service in the fields of public administration, transportation, health and the like, who could be called upon if a disaster occurred in some part of the world. These lists should be supplied to the secretariat. Then if a disaster occurred in country A, the government of country A could call on experts from Canada or whatever country they chose to come and assist in the emergency.

If this roster of experts were set up, it would not take weeks to provide experts. They could be provided through the United Nations, on request, almost instantly. This would greatly facilitate the rehabilitation of countries after a disaster had taken place.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, one of the sad things about the United Nations, as far as reporting on it is concerned, is that one cannot tell all, so to speak, because a number of the many important negotiations taking place there are private or of a confidential nature. I would like, however, to make a few observations at this time regarding the general characteristics of the fifteenth general assembly of the United Nations which just completed its work last Saturday.

As all hon. members will realize, the assembly started its work last September, and after a recess commencing shortly before Christmas and lasting until March 7, it resumed its work, which was completed, as I have mentioned, last Saturday.

The first half of the session saw the attendance of a great many world personalities. I do not think I need say more in this regard. In general terms the atmosphere during that portion of the session was very acrimonious. The cold war was in full swing and as a result it was very difficult for any country to accomplish very much.

During the second half of the session the atmosphere was quite different. There was a more conciliatory attitude and a number of things in fact were accomplished. During my remarks before six o'clock I mentioned the two initiatives that Canada launched during the fall session, and despite the acrimonious atmosphere the resolutions concerning the food bank and the experts bank were unanimously passed by the general assembly.

Last fall the Soviet union and associated countries launched a two-pronged attack in the United Nations. This was not new but was in fact a resumption of something that had been going on for a number of years. On this occasion there was more emphasis placed on it than before. The attack took two forms. It was, first, an attack on the secretary general both personally and upon his office. Second, the Soviet countries attempted to become the champions of the newly freed or liberated colonial peoples of Africa or of Asia. I am sure hon. members followed this subject in the newspapers and I do not wish to take up the time of the house by going into this subject in detail.

The attacks by the members of the Soviet group were very virulent indeed. The suggestion was made that the office of the secretary general should be replaced by a triumverate—three under secretaries. This obviously has the disadvantage of providing, in effect, a Soviet veto in regard to all the work of the secretariat. This proposition was based on the 1-1-1 formula, as it is sometimes called. It was proposed that one secretary general should be from the west, one from the Soviet group, and one from the neutral countries. Of course, any one of the three could exercise a veto in regard to the work done in the assembly. Since the secretariat is often charged with the responsibility of carrying out the resolutions passed by the general assembly, this would provide an effective veto over anything passed by the assembly.

There have been a number of explanations given in regard to this proposal. The most generally accepted one, heard in the United Nations and elsewhere, is that the United Nations has had the effect of blunting Soviet ambitions for ultimate world control. Since the United Nations has done this the Soviet union decided to try to either control the United Nations to suit its own purposes or render it ineffectual. There was some support at the outset for these two approaches made by the Soviet group but ultimately, I think it is quite safe to say, they both failed.

The attacks upon the secretary general were maintained in all the committees and persisted throughout. However, a little more than a week ago a resolution was before the general assembly concerning the Congo operation containing a paragraph referring to the work of the secretary general. The Soviet group requested a separate vote in respect of this particular paragraph with the intention of removing it from the resolution. I do not recall the exact vote, but from memory I would suggest that 83 countries voted in favour of retaining the paragraph and 11 voted against it, with the remaining number abstaining for one reason or another. The result of this vote was in effect a great vote of confidence in the secretary general personally, and I think we can take great encouragement from this. There was, of course, in general terms, this undercurrent throughout the last session of the general assembly, but the secretary general despite that undercurrent, and the almost unbelievable attacks both personally and against his office, not only survived but came out stronger than before.

There have been a great many changes in the United Nations within the last year. Those members who attended the United Nations session some years ago would notice now even greater changes. The first time I had the opportunity of attending at the United Nations was in 1955 and I can say that it is today quite a different organization from what it was then. In that year I had the pleasure of being a parliamentary observer working under the vice-chairman, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), who was very helpful indeed at that time. I will always cherish with a great deal of pleasure my memory of that assistance.

Since that time the United Nations has expanded greatly. Indeed, 17 new countries became members last year. Membership in the United Nations now totals 99 member countries. Fourteen of these new countries are French-speaking African countries. I might say in this regard that because of Canada's cultural heritage a bond of friendship was established with these countries. We did our best to develop that friendship and I feel safe in saying that we now have very close and friendly relationships with those African members.

I would particularly like to mention those individuals who contributed in this regard. One is a member of our delegation, the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin), who did a great deal of outstanding work in developing close relationships between this country and the new French-African countries. Indeed, one or two other members were very helpful in this regard. These numbers were parliamentary observers. One is the hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Parizeau), and the other is the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Loiselle), who did a great deal of work in helping us in this regard.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out earlier in a previous announcement—and I think it is perhaps worth while mentioning in this context—the Canadian government has decided on a program of assisting in the education of students from those French-African territories to the amount of $300,000 a year. This has been much appreciated in those areas and is probably the best kind of work which we can do at the present time to help the people in those countries.

Another different aspect of the United Nations this year is the changing of the so-called blocs in the United Nations. We often hear people speak of the Latin American bloc, the Asian-African bloc, and so on. Some of those blocs have shown considerable evidence that they are changing in character or are dividing into groups. Because of the large number of new African countries, there is a tendency to find an African group rather than an Asian-African group. This is an interesting trend to those who are familiar with the United Nations, and I think it is perhaps worthy of note.

Another very important thing, of course, is the change in the voting strength in the United Nations. A few years ago the western European group, the Latin American group and some of the commonwealth countries made up the majority of the voting strength in the United Nations. Now, with the Asian and African countries, 45 out of the 99 votes belong to the Asian and African countries. This has greatly affected the tactical situation in the United Nations from everybody's point of view. Again, it is something that has happened in the last assembly which has changed the whole picture of the United Nations.

These may be self-evident things, but I think it is worth while reminding people of them because they are factors in this whole changing, and very rapidly changing, picture of the United Nations. At one time it was said that if the Asian-African countries and the Soviet group all got together they would have what is known as "blocking third" in the plenary meetings of the assembly, where a two thirds votes is necessary. But this whole situation has changed because the countries of Africa and Asia have themselves almost half of the votes of the assembly. This has a great effect on the way resolutions are worded and the way they are presented in order to meet these fundamental changes in the character and make-up of the United Nations. These changes have altered Canada's own role at the United Nations.

In the late 1940's and middle 1950's it was often said that Canada formed a sort of link between the Soviet group countries and the western countries. Judging from my own experience in the United Nations, Mr. Speaker, I would say that we still do that from time to time but perhaps one of the new roles that Canada has in this context is that we now tend to form, as well, a link between some of the western countries and the countries in Asia and Africa. We also act as a stabilizing influence with our own groups. In this regard I also think of countries such as Norway with which Canada often works at the United Nations, and other smaller countries such as New Zealand and Ireland. I could mention many others. In addition to the link that I mentioned previously, I think the role of these countries is also that of extending or acting as a link between the Asian and African countries and the countries of western Europe and North America. I think this is a very important thing. Again, it is a fairly self-evident matter, but I think it is worth bringing to your attention, sir. Perhaps it is only a shift in emphasis but it is indeed a shift.

Another thing that is worth mentioning is the general preoccupation of countries, particularly in Africa, with the desire to catch up, particularly economically, with the other countries of the world. It is my impression that those countries are not especially interested in particular economic and political theories. It seems to me this attitude is one in which the position is taken that while economic and political theories are very fine for those who have the luxury to afford them, these countries have to adjust to the particular economic and political systems that they have to suit their own stage of development, and they are more interested in catching up economically and providing the necessities of life for their people than they are in the other matters.

Sometimes a number of those newer countries in various parts of the world have perhaps behaved in a manner which some of us might consider to be irresponsible according to our standards. Although the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) seemed to feel rather depressed about the outlook in the United Nations, my own feeling is that while some of these newer countries in a new situation are expressing themselves perhaps for the first time in the world organization, and while some of their activities might seem less than desirable, I think in two or three years, this matter will certainly adjust itself. I do not think there are any grounds for pessimism in that regard whatsoever.

One interesting observation is the fact that many of the new African states have totally different views. They do not all think alike. A good example, of course, is the Congo operation and the approach to what should be done in that particular area. Most of the African countries have quite different methods of approach to this problem. There is one thing they all have in common, and that is the common desire to have the cold war kept out of Africa, and the African countries left alone to develop the continent themselves. As a matter of fact, I think most hon. members will agree that that will be very commendable indeed.

This last observation also brings up another trend which might be of interest. There is evidence of a possible trend developing in the United Nations away from the original idea of universality. I refer to the new trend of regional emphasis. By that I mean that one heard constantly in speeches on the Congo that the Congo situation was an African problem and should be left largely to the Africans themselves. Dr. Nkrumah, the president of Ghana, in his last speech in the assembly and in his remarks to the advisory committee, suggested that this was an African problem and should be left to the Africans to solve. The recent Cuban crisis was another example. It was emphasized that the situation in Cuba was a matter for the organization of American states to look after. Whether these trends are going to develop and continue to develop I do not know, but they are worthy of notice, because it is a slightly different concept of the United Nations, slightly different from that one formerly had of that body, because the trend is toward having certain areas or regions of the world look after their own problems. This may be an inevitable development, I do not know. It remains to be seen. Again I mention this because it is something that has perhaps appeared at this particular session to a greater degree than before.

As the hon. member for Essex East pointed out, there are a number of problems at the United Nations, and one of them is the question of financing. This has been a very serious problem indeed at this session. One of the big problems at the United Nations for the past two or three years has been how to finance these various peace-keeping operations, first of all UNEF in the Middle East or Near East, whichever way you wish to classify it, and then, of course, the Congo operation. The countries in the Soviet group will not contribute anything toward these peace-keeping operations and, unfortunately, there are also some other countries which behave in the same way for reasons best known to themselves. Some of these countries claim they cannot afford to pay, which may well be the case, of course, and we can understand this particularly in the case of the newly developing countries.

However, the fact that these operations have been authorized by the general assembly presents a very interesting problem. On the one hand, you have the general assembly passing resolutions demanding that certain things be done in the Near East or, most recently, of course, in the Congo. On the other hand, you have, as we witnessed last Saturday night, a situation where the assembly will not vote the money to carry out the instructions it has passed. It is a very odd sort of position and, as I have already mentioned, the reason is the fact that a number of countries feel that for these peace-keeping operations the regular scale of assessments should not be carried out but rather some new scale of assessment should be devised.

There were long discussions and many negotiations over this matter during the last session of the assembly, and eventually a resolution was put forward by Pakistan, Ghana and others temporarily to tide over the United Nations financially until next fall. In conjunction with this, of course, Canada promoted a resolution which would appoint a group of countries to examine thoroughly the question of assessments as far as specialized peace-keeping operations are concerned.

I do not wish to take up the time of the house by going into the details of this matter. I should like to say that after a great deal of difficulty Saturday evening and after several votes the resolution sponsored by Pakistan, Ghana and others was finally passed which permitted the United Nations to carry on its Congo activities until the fall. I might say that I do not think it was generally realized how close this operation came to failing completely. On the first vote on this subject, which was taken around eleven o'clock last Saturday evening, the financing resolution was defeated. This would have meant that the secretary general would have had no funds whatsoever to carry on the Congo operation and, indeed, there was some question whether the United Nations itself could have carried on because of the various borrowing operations that had gone on.

For some reason or other this did not seem to be appreciated by a number of member states and it took a very considerable amount of work on the part of the Canadian delegation and other associated delegations to change enough people's minds so that by about five or six o'clock in the morning the interim financing resolution was passed. After that the Canadian resolution successfully passed as well. It is a very real problem. I agree with the hon. member for Essex East when he says it is a very serious problem and some arrangement is going to have to be made at the next session of the general assembly. Otherwise I do not know what the result will ultimately be.

The hon. member for Essex East mentioned another subject having to do with the expansion of the security council and the expansion of the economic and social council. He pointed out, as I recall, that since the United Nations had grown so greatly in membership these councils should be expanded and that this would be a worthy field of endeavour in which to have Canada take part. I quite agree with the hon. member. Indeed, this was one of Canada's projects at the United Nations last fall. Unfortunately it was not very successful because the Soviet union blocked any enlargement of either of these councils and insisted that the question of China should be settled before any charter revision should take place. As a result, a number of the newer countries in Asia and Africa which feel they are not represented have put great pressure on countries in western Europe and, indeed, in the commonwealth, eastern Europe and Latin America as well, to give up one or more of the seats they hold on the security council or the economic and social council in favour of some of the newer nations of the world. It is a sort of share the wealth proposition.

This is highly unsatisfactory because all it does is perpetuate injustice. If some of the newer groupings in the United Nations are able to force some of the other groups to give up some of their seats, this may temporarily effect some sort of arrangement but it is not a very satisfactory solution. The only real solution to the problem is the expansion of both councils and this, of course, cannot be done until the Soviet union permits it under present arrangements in the United Nations.

Another thing in this regard that has happened as a result of this situation is that until the very end of the last assembly the economic and social council was not constituted because India and Belgium were the two candidates for seats and neither one would agree to withdraw. They each had 45 votes and a two thirds vote was impossible under the circumstances. This happened a year ago in the security council elections as between Turkey and Poland, and hon. members may recall that Canada took a rather active part in settling that difficulty. But some permanent arrangement must be made with respect to these councils so that every year at the United Nations we do not have the same acrimonious argument as to what country is going to fill what position on which council, and I would agree with the hon. member for Essex East that that is something that should be worked out. However, unfortunately it is not in our hands.

I see that my time is up, Mr. Speaker, and I was wondering whether I might, by leave of the house, continue for five or ten minutes as there is another matter with which I should like to deal.

Mr. Speaker: Has the parliamentary secretary leave to carry on?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nesbitt: I thank hon. members and I appreciate very much their courtesy. The last matter I should like to deal with concerns the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East with respect to the United Nations police force, and I wish to refer to page 4034 of Hansard for yesterday where the hon. member for Essex East is recorded as having said:

> We might as well admit that the experience in the Congo portrays a weakness in the United Nations police force as it is at present constituted when the nations retain authority over their troops.

I think the distinguished hon. member for Essex East perhaps had something else in mind when he made that statement. As the hon. member well knows, when countries turn over troops to the United Nations command they do not have effective operating control over those troops. It is true they do have control to the extent that if country A contributes so many troops to the United Nations command it can, on request to the secretary general, withdraw those troops. I am sure that is probably what the hon. member for Essex East intended, but I think his remarks perhaps did create the impression that if country A supplied troops to the United Nations command, country A exercised actual control over the use of the troops while under this command, and I thought the hon. member would not object if I clarified the situation.

A little farther down on page 4034 the hon. member for Essex East suggested that one of the most effective things Canada could do, in addition to putting forward a substantive proposal in the field of disarmament, would be to put forward, after careful preparatory work, a scheme for an effective United Nations force which must take its place in a disarmed world if that should ever eventuate. The hon. member quoted, in support of his position, a statement by the secretary of state, Dean Rusk, when he said:

> —the experience in the Congo suggests that we must turn once more to the possibility of constituting a permanent United Nations force specifically trained and equipped and held in readiness for immediate use.

In connection with the argument for having a permanent force to meet a situation of the type in the Congo, it might be of interest to note the following comments of the secretary general, Mr. Dag Hammarskjold, as found on pages 3 and 4 of the introduction to the annual report of the secretary general on the work of the organization, general assembly official records, fifteenth session, supplement No. 1A (A/4390/Add.1):

> I have mentioned the need for some strengthening of the secretariat on the military side. This, in the light of recent experience, would be my reply, as regards actions by the United Nations, to those who have found in the Congo developments new reasons for the organization of a standing United Nations force. As I have already clarified my views on this problem in earlier reports to the general assembly, I have no reason to go into the matter in any detail here. It should, however, be stressed that the Congo experience has strengthened my conviction that the organization of a standing United Nations force would represent an unnecessary and impractical measure, especially in view of the fact that every new situation and crisis which the organization will have to face is likely to present new problems as to the best adjustment of the composition of a force, its equipment, its training and its organization.
> It is an entirely different matter if governments, in a position and willing to do so, would maintain a state of preparedness so as to be able to meet possible demands from the United Nations. And it is also an entirely different matter, for the organization itself, to have a state of preparedness with considerable flexibility and in the hands of a qualified staff which quickly and smoothly can adjust their plans to new situations and assist the secretary general in the crucially important first stages of the execution of a decision by the main organs to set up a United Nations force, whatever its type or task.

In these circumstances, a Canadian initiative at this time along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Essex East might not be very productive of good results. This is not to say that a proposal to this effect should not be made at some appropriate time in the future. In this connection, we have in mind that the question of the United Nations peacekeeping machinery might be one of the subjects which an ad hoc committee of the disarmament commission could carefully pursue.

I should like to point out that one of the suggestions we have made in respect of disarmament, which I know is procedural as the hon. member for Essex East has pointed out but is still rather important, is that when the negotiating body on disarmament which will be set up outside of the United Nations later this summer is constituted, there must be some liaison between this body and the United Nations. We feel that the United Nations disarmament commission, which is composed of 99 member states, would be the appropriate body for liaison on the subject of disarmament between the negotiating body, whatever its size and composition may be, and the United Nations. We feel that a negotiating body composed of 12, 13 or 14—whatever the number of nations that may comprise this body—should report periodically to the United Nations through the disarmament commission. We feel also, in turn, that member states of the United Nations who have ideas and suggestions on disarmament should be able to transmit those ideas and suggestions for consideration by the negotiating body through the disarmament commission.

We feel also that the disarmament commission could very well set up ad hoc committees to study specific aspects of the problem of disarmament. One of the things we feel the disarmament commission should set up an ad hoc committee to discuss and carefully look into is this question of peace-keeping machinery when disarmament is largely achieved. It is a most important matter and many member states of the United Nations could very effectively serve on such a committee. When I say an ad hoc committee, I mean a committee composed of perhaps 10, 15 or 20 states. Perhaps the non-nuclear powers could very well work out an effective scheme for peace-keeping machinery. It is something that will take a long time to do.

Some people might say, why set up a committee? Why not have the whole disarmament commission study the problem? Those who have worked on committees and commissions know that 99 countries do not form a very effective committee for the conduct of business. Perhaps a subcommittee of 15 or 20 countries would do this job very much better. I mention this in passing. This whole problem of working out peace-keeping machinery will need long and continued effort. It is something that will take a great deal of thought and study, something which the committee on disarmament might very well do.

In conclusion, there is one other matter I should like to mention. Again, it relates to this question of peace-keeping machinery. As reported on page 4036 of yesterday's Hansard, the hon. member for Essex East inquired about what type of international police force should be established to preserve international peace and security. He asked what principles of international law should perhaps govern such forces. I can assure the hon. member that we have been giving very close attention to this problem. It is one of the most important problems to be solved if we are to be able to reach the final stages of general disarmament.

As the hon. member is doubtless aware, there have been a number of books and pamphlets issued proposing plans for international peace-keeping forces. Ideas in connection with this part of the general disarmament plans put forward by the west at Geneva last year were discussed between the delegates of the western five nations at the 10-nation disarmament conference. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that the difficult part of the problem is not how to make a plan for creating a force. Competent military staff officers could do this very quickly. The subject, especially as it relates to United Nations peace-keeping forces under present world conditions, has been under study by officers of the Department of National Defence as well as by officers of external affairs, and certain general conclusions have been reached. Officers of the Canadian defence services are well able to carry out a useful and practical study of this kind in view of Canada's experience in the several peace-keeping efforts of the United Nations.

The real problem, Mr. Speaker, is not how to organize, administer and operate such a force from the purely military viewpoint. The question is how it is to be controlled politically. We all know that at the present time these forces are under the control of the secretary general, and at the moment the secretary general is not accepted by the Soviet union. The five members of the security council who have the veto certainly do not agree on any of the major political problems in the world. As the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East indicate, the difficulty in this connection arises from the fact that the political objects of the communist countries led by the Soviet union and those of the countries of the west are, in most cases, opposed, I think we should all agree with that.

I should like to read an extract from a statement made by Mr. Zorin, deputy foreign minister of the Soviet union, during the discussion of the question of international armed forces in Geneva upon the resumption of talks in June, 1960. It reads:

> The western powers submitted a proposal to create a so-called international armed force. But what would this lead to? It would lead to the world continuing to live as before, in fear of the use of weapons. Instead of national armies there would be created an international army, which would in fact be the army of one side directed against the other side. We must look at things realistically. The world today consists of two parts —one socialist and the other capitalist.

This was before they divided the world into three parts.

It is clear to everyone that neither side will agree to the other side dominating the international armed force. It is absolutely clear that the western powers would not agree to the socialist countries playing a leading role in such a force. And we would not agree to assign such a role to the western powers.

Thus, it would be wrong and unrealistic to set out to create an international armed force. It would be another matter if we agree to place at the disposal of the security council, when necessary, in order to ensure the maintenance of peace, units from the contingents of police (militia) remaining at the disposal of states after the implementation of general and complete disarmament.

That is an entirely realistic measure which is also in accordance with the provisions of the United Nations charter, and it is provided for in our new proposals—

—"our new proposals" being, of course, the Soviet union proposals of the day.

Also in the statement which introduced the Soviet disarmament plan of June 2, 1960, the following sentence occurred:

Of course, such police (militia) detachments may be used solely for the purpose of maintaining peace among nations, not for the suppression of peoples who are struggling for their independence and social progress, and not for interference in the internal affairs of states.

From this hon. members will see that the Soviet union does not intend that there should be any peace-keeping force set up over whose operations it will not have a veto. This is confirmed by their attacks on the way in which the secretary general has interpreted and carried out the provisions of the security council resolutions dealing with the Congo. The Soviet union according to its own statements and actions is insisting that no peace-keeping force shall be used in a manner which is inconsistent with its own objects in promoting what it calls the "struggle for independence and social progress". Of course for the western nations and I think for the majority of other members of the United Nations any peace-keeping force, if it is to be worthy of the name, must not be subject to the veto of any nation or minority group of nations. How to devise an organization or modify the existing organization of the United Nations so to be able to carry out the function of political control and direction of the United Nations peace-keeping force is as yet an unsolved problem. It is our intention to continue to try to find a solution, in consultation with other like-minded nations, and especially with those with whom we are associated in disarmament negotiations.

There are a number of other things with which I should like to deal but I do not propose to request further time of the house. I greatly appreciate the extra time that has been given to me. On another occasion I will deal with the other matters I have in mind.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of taking part in this debate—perhaps I should not call it a debate but rather a discussion on foreign affairs—even though there is not that noisy, controversial and tense atmosphere we find in the house if we are talking for instance, about the unemployment insurance fund or even the support price for soya beans. But even though one might not gather it from the calm atmosphere of the house, Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with fundamental matters which affect the very survival of our nation and of humanity.

Before I proceed further, if I may, I should like to associate myself with what the minister said yesterday in appreciation of the intelligent, selfless and devoted service of the members of his department from the deputy minister down. He will know that I do this in no formal sense because perhaps no one in this house has more cause than I have to be grateful for the work of that department. I hope it will not make the minister feel uncomfortable if I tell him also that we on this side of the house also appreciate the sincere and honourable efforts he is making on behalf of all Canadians, as the spokesman of the government and indeed of Canada, to contribute to those causes, policies and developments which are making, we hope, for peace in a dangerous world. In this tribute to the minister I should like to include the parliamentary secretary who has just spoken to us and who has worked so hard and so long at the United Nations assembly.

Perhaps that should be the end of my complimentary references but, Mr. Speaker, I should like to add this observation. It is sometimes said by my hon. friends on my extreme right geographically that there is no difference between the two old parties that have together made, I think, a worthy contribution to the building of our nation. May I say that there is every difference in domestic affairs and that we show those differences in the House of Commons. However, there is no difference between us in our joint desire to support, on behalf of the Canadian people, policies that will bring peace and security to our country and to the world. We are at one in those objectives even though we may, do and will differ at times on how we should reach them.

We are at one in our support for the new commonwealth and for the United Nations.

We are at one in our support for NATO. In this respect perhaps we are not in agreement with my hon. friends to the right. We are one in our support for the view that Canada should discharge to the full, honourably and well, its international obligations. Just as there should be, to the maximum possible extent, and subject to our democratic right to disagree, national unity in foreign affairs, so there must be to the maximum possible extent unity inside the democratic coalition. In our own country there must be—as I believe there is, by and large—agreement on maintaining the strength of that coalition in the face of the dangerous problems with which we are confronted today. I refer to a strength which is more than military. I do not believe that there is any salvation; any hope or possibility of progress for Canada in isolation or in what we often hear called neutralism. I think that such neutralism is a dangerous development. I am not suggesting that it has reached a point yet where it is a danger. But it could become so if we in this country fell into that defeatist spirit indicated by the expression "A plague on both your houses".

I suppose, in a sense, that is the essence of one kind of neutralism, because it means—and this is a fundamental objection, surely—that we put on the same level of Canadian interest, and indeed international morality, the democratic, freedom loving United States and the totalitarian despotism of the Soviet union. There can be no assimilation, surely, of these two things in any Canadian mind.

Therefore we must to the best of our ability discharge our commitments as members of the coalition of democratic states, especially to the commonwealth and the Atlantic coalition. As the minister put it yesterday in his survey—this is another way of putting it—we must stand by our allies. But our allies must also stand by us, by making it possible for us to work with them, by not putting into effect policies which we, as their friends and allies, cannot support when they run counter to the principles on which all our own policies must be based if we are to be true to our ideals as well as to our obligations to protect our security.

If I have any criticism to make of the minister's statement yesterday—and it was made by my friend, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin)—it is that it did not convey that sense of urgency which I think attaches to the international scene at the present time. After all, within the last week we have seen Cubans rebelling against their tyrannical government. We have seen French generals rebelling against France. We have seen communist armies two miles outside the capital of Laos in southeast Asia. We have seen, of course, continued confusion—which is even worse confounded tonight, according to the news—in the Congo.

There is indeed a sense of danger and urgency in the international situation tonight. Out of these developments—and there are many others I could have mentioned—there is one however which has worked itself out in a way which must bring great satisfaction to us all. The minister mentioned this yesterday. I refer to the triumph of the forces of French decency and democracy over armed intervention on the part of military reactionaries. General de Gaulle is not in every respect these days winning the support of everybody in everything he does. But in this emergency he certainly showed himself a towering figure on the right side.

I think it is not being pessimistic to say—it is certainly being realistic—that the situation has deteriorated since we last had a debate on external affairs. I think that was some time last summer, in July. I believe the relations between the two great protagonists in the cold war have deteriorated after what was an improvement in the atmosphere following a change of administration in Washington.

That improvement was in atmosphere, not improvement in the sense that any of the problems that face the two sides had been solved. But an improvement in atmosphere did at least give the two sides an opportunity to do something about the problems. They have not been able to take advantage of that opportunity. I think even the atmosphere now is darker.

Certainly the leader of the Soviet union, Mr. Khrushchev, has shown in recent weeks and months no change in his determination to achieve on behalf of his country and his international system the objectives that were laid down for that communist system many years ago and which have not been altered, although the tactics adopted in pursuing them certainly have from time to time been altered, as one would expect.

If we had any doubt in our own minds as to the inflexibility and determination of the international communist empire to reach the objectives laid down for it many years ago, that doubt should have been removed by the communist summit conference which took place in Moscow last November. In spite of disagreement between the two wings of the international communist movement, the Chinese and the Russian, and the perhaps satisfactory resolution of that difficulty in favour of the more moderate wing, if you can call it that, it was made perfectly clear at that conference that we can expect and must look forward to conflict inside co-existence. The Soviet and her satellites have no intention of altering their strength in the world and prejudicing their ability to achieve their objectives by any form of international agreement which did not leave them at least relatively as strong as they were before that agreement was signed.

This is perhaps the most sinister thing that came out of that conference, the resolutions and statements of which really bear study.

One statement said for instance, that there would be liberation wars as long as imperialism exists, as long as colonialism exists. Of course, that is imperialism and colonialism as interpreted by the international communist in his own way.

This statement went on:

> Wars of this kind are revolutionary wars. Such wars are not only justified; they are inevitable. The communists support just wars of this kind wholeheartedly and without reservation and they march in the vanguard of the peoples fighting for liberation.

That does not necessarily mean that in November last the communists in Moscow declared war on the rest of the world in the sense that they were going to let loose the forces of military aggression. But it does surely mean that they hope to achieve their objectives now without the need of military aggression, because military aggression means nuclear war; military aggression means retaliation by nuclear weapons. Mr. Khrushchev, being a realist and knowing what this means, hopes to achieve his objectives by non-nuclear and, if possible, non-military methods, political and economic.

That, perhaps, is the main foundation for even the kind of peace that we have in the world today. By peace I mean the absence of military aggression. Nevertheless, in this situation it is impossible not to remain fearful of the future. The dangers still exist.

It seems to me that the main source of our danger at the present time is twofold. There is the danger from illusions that are created every time there seems to be an easing of the situation, a brightening of the atmosphere.

Every time Mr. Khrushchev smiles we seem to think that things are going to be all right now. In our hopes and our illusions we are tempted to throw away our unity and ignore some of the sources of our strength.

The other danger comes from fear itself. We of the west have a deep, abiding and understandable fear of assault from and destruction by communist power. The impact of that fear, unless we keep it under control, can at times provoke us to action which would be rash and unwise even though it might be essentially defensive. Fear itself can cloud and distort our judgment.

On the other hand, the destructive consequences of a nuclear war resulting from the forces which we fear, are themselves so terrifying that the very thought of them produces another fear which can imprison our policy and our diplomacy, and make cowards of us, unable to face the problems we must solve if we are to survive; abandoning all our principles in the interest of the survival of man threatened with nuclear obliteration. Our fears are justified by contemporary history, but their paralysing effect is not.

The policy of Soviet Russia, its absorption of neighbouring countries; the iron hand of its rule through minority communist parties over peoples once proudly free; massive military might to be used without scruple as the instrument of policy—all these give us cause for fear though not for surrender to it.

We have grouped together in the world to protect ourselves against the consequences of the power that provoke these fears. There are a good many associations which form the foundation of our foreign policy for this purpose, as the minister pointed out yesterday. I have not the time tonight to go into them, or speak as I would like to speak about some of them. I can only mention the new commonwealth; the link between the Asian and African countries and the western world at a time when there are very few links of this kind. I think we can take pride and derive hope from the development of the new commonwealth out of the old empire, even the old commonwealth. But it is a very different organization today from what it was a few years ago and it is going to require a high quality of statesmanship indeed to make this growing new commonwealth, with a considerable majority of new Asian and African members, work effectively for peace, security and prosperity as we all hope it will work.

Another organization which is one of the foundation stones of our policy is the North Atlantic treaty organization. We on this side believe in that organization. It would be strange indeed if we did not. We still believe in it and have not last faith in it as have my hon. friends in the C.C.F. party. We believe in it as the foundation of security, and as the foundation of our collective defensive strength. But we know perfectly well—the minister perhaps did not make this very clear yesterday—that the organization itself during the last year has faced some serious problems, and that there have been some trends and tendencies which, if they are not checked, might lead to its weakening and disappearance. I am not being unduly pessimistic or gloomy when I say that, because it must be known by anyone who has been following the development of the North Atlantic treaty organization in the last year.

When we mention these things it is only with the hope that these trends can be changed. The chancellor of the west German republic, who is one of the strongest and most fervent supporters of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, had this to say in Texas the other day:

> It looked for a time as if NATO were going to fall apart.

I should add that he went on to say that as a result of his visit to Washington he felt a little better about it.

The minister will know that the recent secretary general of NATO, Mr. Spaak, who has worked so hard and brilliantly for the organization, has had some frank and worried things to say about its future. Perhaps at this point I should pay my respects to the new secretary general who I think will undoubtedly serve the organization in the same way as did his predecessors, Mr. Spaak and Lord Ismay. I refer, of course, to Mr. Stikker who was once a distinguished foreign minister of his country, the Netherlands.

The reasons for our worry on this side—I am sure the minister, though he may be inhibited in saying these things publicly, at times shares these worries—are obvious. We feel on this side that NATO has not adapted its defence strategy to new circumstances, new threats, new situations, confronting it in the last few years. One fear for the future, surely, is in an over-reliance on nuclear weapons. To rely on nuclear retaliation alone, or for a nation to risk its existence by deliberately depending on a strategy which permits of no alternative but annihilation or capitulation in the face of every threat, is certainly a very dangerous situation. That is something that we want to avoid in NATO. To avoid it we have to strengthen NATO's conventional forces so that the organization will not have to rely too much even on tactical nuclear retaliation.

Another danger facing the organization is the introduction of colonial problems and difficulties into NATO in areas which are technically outside the NATO zone but which in fact cannot help but have an effect on NATO itself. These colonial difficulties have, I am sure, caused division and disturbance, and perhaps at times, some distress inside NATO. It will be difficult I would think, to have the kind of co-operation which is required in the North Atlantic treaty organization, if there is division between the members of NATO in respect of matters outside—divisions which reflect themselves also in policies at the United Nations. It may even be dangerous for the future, if we have to keep trying to relate co-operation in Paris to conflict at New York.

There is another worry developing in NATO. At least one member does not seem to share the views of practically all the others, that the direction must be toward greater collaboration and integration, both political and in defence.

As one who believes in this organization, I hope that these difficulties will be surmounted; that these dangers will be overcome so that NATO will be stronger both in the field of collective defence, and collective non-military action because, after all, strength is more than military.

I now want to say a few words about the United Nations. We have heard, with interest, a great deal about the United Nations from the parliamentary secretary this afternoon and this evening, and from the minister yesterday. As with NATO, I do not think it is being unduly pessimistic to say that the United Nations is facing very difficult times at present. I could not help being impressed by an article in Foreign Affairs for April, 1961 by Mr. Hamilton Fish Armstrong, one of the great supporters of the United Nations over the years, one who was also present at the founding conference at San Francisco in 1945. Under the title "U.N. on Trial", he had this to say:

> In the closing days of the general assembly last December one heard even responsible heads of delegations remark, sadly, bitterly: "The United Nations is done for."

He goes on to say:

> The United Nations, though not yet done for, is indeed on trial for its life—

Perhaps that is a little over-dramatic but there is no doubt, as some hon. members pointed out yesterday, that we are facing new problems, new difficulties, and at least some new dangers at the United Nations. We are doing this at a time when it is more essential to preserve and strengthen this world organization than perhaps at any time in its history. I say that because, as the international situation deteriorates, that is the time when the United Nations should be most effective. It should also be more effective now than it was ten years ago because it is a better reflection of the world in which we live.

It is a more complicated, at times, a more disturbing reflection; 99 members, 45 of whom as the parliamentary secretary pointed out a few moments ago, come from Asia and Africa. But with all its complexities, the difficulties and the irritations; with the large new membership and with the shifting of influence and authority to new nations, recently colonial, suspicious, sensitive, with all of that, I venture to say that this organization now reflects the world in which we live probably more accurately than that which we set up in San Francisco, which carried on the traditions, the diplomatic procedures, the political courtesies and conventions of western Europe of the nineteenth century and the league of nations in the 1930's.

We could all perhaps adjust ourselves to those changes without difficulty if we were allowed to do so by the communist bloc inside the United Nations. Yet last autumn Mr. Khrushchev showed that he was even willing to take the risk of destroying the world organization if it got in his way and he could not alter it. He showed this in the attitude of his government toward United Nations intervention in the Congo and in Africa generally.

He has also shown it in his attack on the Secretary General of the United Nations. I congratulate the minister, the parliamentary secretary and, indeed, the government on the way in which they have stood up for this great man. One of the hopeful developments in the last two or three months, after some very worrying times last fall, is the way in which the secretary general has managed to rally support around him. His position is stronger today than it was a few months ago. But the communist bloc has made it clear, I think beyond doubt, that they will do their best from now on to destroy not only this man because he has got in their way, as Trygve Lie got in their way, but also the office of secretary general. That is what in fact their proposal would amount to. As the parliamentary secretary pointed out, their proposal called for three secretaries general. Putting the office into commission with a communist, a non-communist and an anti-communist, simply means frustrating and hamstringing it so that it could not work at all. Indeed, the alternative proposal put forward, I think by India, for assisting the secretary general with three deputy secretaries general, one communist, one non-communist and one anti-communist and which, superficially, seems to be a more reasonable and perhaps workable proposal, might very well have the same ultimate effect itself on the office.

If the United Nations is to survive and remain strong it will be because the middle powers, both the uncommitted and the committed middle powers rally around an organization which is the one organization that can save them as a force in the nuclear world. In return, they are the ones, these middle powers, that can save the organization.

The minister had a good deal to say about disarmament. It is very hard at times—perhaps not so hard for the minister who is not a cynical person—not to become cynical about the absence of progress made in this vitally important field.

I have been concerned with disarmament conferences and commissions and developments since the first league of nations disarmament conference in 1932. At that time I think we got about as far after the first month of that meeting as we have got now. This is no argument for slowing down our efforts, of course, but it is an indication of the complexities and difficulties of the problem. Yet, I cannot refrain from pointing out, there are many decisions to be made by the Canadian government, especially in the field of defence, which are dependent upon progress being made in disarmament, so we are told. There is also the resolution supported by the Canadian delegation last autumn, the Irish resolution, I think, to prevent the extension of nuclear weapons to countries not now possessing them. This was supported by the Canadian delegation and I am certainly glad that support was given, but it depended we are told, on significant progress in the immediate future in the disarmament negotiations. I would hope that if there is not the kind of significant progress which the minister may have had in mind when that resolution was put forward, that this will not be used as a reason for abandoning the resolution.

Yesterday the minister mentioned the question of nuclear tests. I do not know how long—at least two or three years now—we have been struggling with that specific and concrete problem. Our hopes go up and down. There was a time when it looked as if the powers were almost on the verge of an agreement. Now they are further away from an agreement than they were six months ago.

Yesterday the minister explained why an agreement had not yet been achieved. With the Russian position at Geneva now falling back on the veto over control arrangements, I do not know how it is going to be achieved. However, the minister did say that notwithstanding, during the period of these discussions no nuclear tests had taken place. I wonder how we know that? If we can be sure that during those three years no nuclear tests took place, if we can be sure of that, then we do not need to worry about control arrangements in a nuclear test agreement. I hope no nuclear tests have taken place, but the fact that we have to insist, and rightly so, on control and inspection arrangements indicates that presumably we do not know whether or not they have.

I now come back to our own continent, and I should like to say a few words about our relations with the United States, especially in connection with the current Cuban problem, something that has been touched on by nearly everyone who has spoken in this debate. The minister said yesterday in connection with this delicate and dangerous situation, and of course he was right, that this is a time for cool-headed action and words. I think that is true. He might pass that on to his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees).

Mr. Speaker, we will not be able to understand—at least I am not able to understand—the immediate significance of the Cuban situation without studying it against the background of general Latin American developments over recent years. Social and economic revolution is taking place in certain Latin American countries. I think that is both inevitable and desirable. Mr. Macmillan's winds of change are blowing in Latin America, and not only in Cuba where they have achieved destructive gale force.

This is happening in many Latin American countries. It is one of the reasons why I am glad we have extended our representation in that part of the world. Many of those who are interested in this social and economic evolutionary development in those Latin American countries are greatly attracted, or at least were greatly attracted, by what has happened in Cuba. Many of these people abhor communism just as they also abhor some of the dictatorial non-communist rulers that they have been subjected to in their own countries. The difference between the two tyrannies, however, is that a local tyranny is only local but a communist tyranny is an international one. That is a big difference. And behind all these social and economic movements in Latin America, or in any country of the world, lurk the forces of communist imperialism, who are hiding in the background, perhaps not responsible for the initial surges and developments but ready there to exploit them and to take charge of them.

As I see it, Mr. Speaker, intervention from outside against economic and social change is both futile and dangerous. If it were only a question of a local dictator perhaps there would not be the problem in all its dangerous implications that we find in Cuba today. But that problem becomes infinitely more dangerous, more difficult and more complicated when the dictator has behind him those international forces that I have been talking about, the international communist conspiracy. That has been the situation in Cuba, of course. Something that started out as a social and economic revolution, which won the support of practically everybody interested in human progress, the support of practically everybody in the United States and in most of the Latin American countries except the dictatorial ones, has been taken over by international communist forces.

I think that what happened last week in regard to the policy of intervention by the United States was a mistake. Having in mind the way the landings worked out, it was certainly not very successful. Yet we would be wise not to lose our sense of proportion in regard to this matter. We would certainly be most foolish if our reaction were to assimilate United States policy with Soviet policy in Budapest, the Congo, or any other part of the world. The United States is our neighbour and friend. It is a free democracy where public opinion can express itself, where mistakes are made known and can be corrected. That does not apply in communist dictatorships. Furthermore, the United States today is the only power strong enough to provide the nuclear deterrent which, until there is general disarmament and we can find a stronger foundation for peace than force, is absolutely essential for the preservation even of the kind of peace which we have. Because of its strength the United States alone today can give us leadership as we face powerful and aggressive empires whom we have good cause to fear. Therefore, surely it is in our interests as Canadians to try whenever we can to support the United States to the very limit of our ability as a member of the coalition of which we are a member but to support her in the way which is both best for the coalition and best for ourselves.

We should rejoice when United States leadership is strong and wise and we should lament when things go wrong. But lamenting in that way is very different from getting almost a kind of sly satisfaction out of some American default or some American mistake; a kind of satisfaction based in part on envy. When mistakes are made, and I think a mistake was made by the United States government in this Cuban matter, that is the time to try to help to put things right rather than indulge in purely negative criticism.

Certainly Cuba presents one of these situations. We should not forget that the intervention which took place was not by Batista Cubans but, so far as I know, for the most part by Cubans who had fought against Batista in the early days of the revolution. That does not alter the fact that the intervention was a failure almost to the point of a fiasco, and the United States cannot escape some responsibility for both the intervention and for the failure.

I know that up to that time the United States showed great patience in the face of very considerable provocation. I remember when we talked about this in the House of Commons last July 15. In my contribution to the debate on foreign affairs at that time I had this to say about Cuba and I have no cause to change the words used then. As found on page 6358 of Hansard, I said:

> I think the United States of America has shown very great patience in this situation up to the present time against very considerable provocation. I suggest that the United States will have to show even more patience, and that is not going to be easy in the light of what is going on on the island of Cuba. Intervention by armed forces or intervention by forces of any kind, the illegal use of force to protect even vital economic and other interests, is not now possible in the world in which we live. The Suez incident certainly showed that, and the United States should be just about the first country in the world to draw the right conclusions from that incident.

What was the reason for this action? What should be done about it now? What should be the policy that we as neighbours of the United States should follow? What line should we take? It seems to me that the menace to the United States in the situation in Cuba is not a menace to her territorial integrity. That is nonsense. The United States could deal with Cuba in a few hours in a straight conflict between the two countries. The menace to the United States, and it is a very real one which we would certainly appreciate in this country if we were in a similar situation, is that Cuba may be used as a base for the extension of communism to other Latin American states by the centre of communist power, the Soviet union, exploiting for that purpose legitimate forces for economic and social progress in those countries and taking over those forces so that eventually they will become totalitarian satellites surrounding and pressing against the United States. This is the situation as a great many Americans see it; a communist base of that kind, not a menace to the United States directly, of course, but a menace in the way I have indicated; a base only 90 miles away from the shores of the United States, even closer than Formosa is to mainland China. Therefore American anxiety is understandable.

What should be done? I suggest not what was done last week where the worst of both worlds seems to have been achieved. I read yesterday an article from Washington written by Mr. Max Freedman who writes for the Manchester Guardian and the Winnipeg Free Press. He had this to say, and these are pretty worrying words:

> The time has come to set down certain clear facts that have emerged from the wretched tangle of error and miscalculation that haunted the Cuban affair. The Kennedy administration intends to use force if necessary against the Castro government if no effective action can be obtained through the organization of American states.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is not inappropriate for a country that is her friend to urge the United States to bring about the appropriate action that is necessary through the organization of American states. Otherwise, it means unilateral intervention. The long range result of that, however great the provocation, would surely be unhappy in terms of relations between the United States and her Latin American colleagues in the organization of American states who have shown themselves over the years to be so sensitive about American unilateral intervention even when it was justified. It would also be an unhappy development for the position of the United States in the Atlantic coalition, even more so if the United States could be charged before the United Nations, however unfairly and unjustly, even on a technicality of aggression.

Therefore I can only express the hope, as I am sure all hon. members do, that whatever action may have to be taken will be taken collectively through the organization of American states or at least attempted through that organization.

The President himself made a statement on April 20. This is the one that has caused so much interest, not unmixed with anxiety. The President said this, and these are the words that have been quoted so much in Canadian newspapers in recent days:

> Should it ever appear that the inter-American doctrine of non-interference merely conceals or excuses a policy of non-action—if the nations of this hemisphere should fail—

We are told he did not mean Canada.

> —to meet their commitments against outside communist penetration—then I want it clearly understood that this government will not hesitate in meeting its primary obligations which are to the security of our own nation.

I interpret this to mean that if there is outside aggression against a Latin American state or against the United States, the United States will discharge its obligations for assistance and for its own security, under the appropriate treaty. I get some support for that interpretation from the first sentence of that same paragraph of the President's statement which has not been quoted very much. He said this—these are good words:

> Any unilateral American intervention, in the absence of an external attack upon ourselves or an ally, would have been contrary to our traditions and to our international obligations.

I should like to think that is still the policy of the United States government. In other words, intervention will be based on collective resistance to aggression under the appropriate hemisphere doctrine. That doctrine, of course, is the Monroe doctrine which goes back to 1823. We have been told at school that this doctrine should really be called the "Canning's policy" because if it had not been for George Canning and the British navy President Monroe would never have been able to put it into effect early in the 19th century. President Monroe enumerated it in 1823. It is interesting to read his words now. All you have to do is change a couple of words and his statement is applicable to the situation today. He said, in 1823:

It was impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either (American) continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can anyone believe that our southern brethren—

The Latin American states.

—if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord.

That has a 1961 ring. This doctrine has been interpreted in various ways throughout the century. The recognized American interpretation, and the one on which the United States government has acted in recent years was laid down by secretary of state Olney in the latter part of the 19th century when he said —I hope it is still this interpretation of the Monroe doctrine which will prevail:

It does not justify any attempt on our part to change the established form of government or any American state or to prevent the people of such state from altering that form according to their will and pleasure.

The latest statement bearing on this doctrine was made at the inter-American conference at Caracas in 1954. I think it is interesting to put on the record now a paragraph from that declaration. It certainly has a bearing on this situation and, I venture to hope, will guide the policy of the United States government when it faces difficult problems in the days ahead. The United States and the Latin American states in 1954 accepted this declaration:

That the domination or control of the political institutions of any American state by the international communist movement, extending to this hemisphere the political system of an extracontinental power, would constitute a threat to the sovereignty and political independence of the American states, endangering the peace of America, and would call for a meeting of consultation to consider the adoption of appropriate action in accordance with existing treaties.

This would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, to give any member of the organization of American states adequate power to invoke collective action in the situation set out in that paragraph, that is one of communist aggression against or domination of American states. Section III of this declaration states:

This declaration of foreign policy made by the American republics in relation to dangers originating outside this hemisphere is designed to protect and not to impair the inalienable right of each American state freely to choose its own form of government and economic system and to live its own social and cultural life.

[Mr. Pearson.]

I cannot help but think that if the United States government took unilateral action—I am not suggesting it will—against the provisions of that particular paragraph there might be a difficult situation created, especially in view of what secretary Herter had to say at the Santiago conference in 1959. This also has a bearing on the present situation. He had been talking about intervention and non-intervention and relating it to the earlier Caracas conference. Secretary Herter said:

Moreover, it appears that at least some of these expeditions were organized in other countries with the knowledge and consent of officials whose governments were pledged to prevent such action. Expeditions have obtained arms from official sources in other countries despite public declarations of policy to the contrary.

Some of these movements have been justified before the public on the grounds that they were undertaken for the purpose of establishing more democratic regimes in certain countries and that thereby they helped to fulfil a principle of the charter of the O.A.S.

I do not wish to speculate on what the motives may have been behind these interventionist activities. Yet, whether or not they were commendable we cannot conduct our inter-American relations on the theory that the end justifies the means, and that the charter and other treaties may be flouted at will.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, the United States government will adopt this attitude toward the problem about which we have been talking, and I am sure that by adopting such an attitude they will get the other American states behind them, thereby enabling them to take stronger action against communist penetration than would be possible by any form of unilateral action. That is what we must have in mind in our own country because we recognize today the provocation and menace in what is happening in Cuba. We hope that this menace can be dealt with in a way that will not make it difficult for the friends of the United States who ask for nothing better than to follow her wise leadership in the search for peace and security in the world.

I talk like this tonight as a Canadian. But Canada is not in the organization of American states. We are told that President Kennedy did not have Canada in mind when he talked about the western hemisphere. I am sure he was thinking only about the members of that organization. It seems to me that if we are to recognize this new—it is at least new in its manifestations—menace of communist penetration, this use of a Latin American state as a base for communist penetration into other American states, this taking advantage of a legitimate desire for economic and social change which cannot and should not be damned; if we feel that the menace can best be dealt with by collective action through the organization of American states, and if it is a menace to Canada as much as to any other state in the western hemisphere, then perhaps the time has some for Canada to take its responsibilities as a member of the organization of American states. Perhaps we should not wait for the Canadian institute of international affairs to tell us what to do in this regard in view of this changed situation; although, I am sure the minister will get the best advice in the world from the public-spirited experts of that institute.

So I should like to echo what the hon. member for Essex East said yesterday. In view of the growing importance of Latin America in the world; its economic and commercial importance; in view of the necessity of the states of the western hemisphere working together to deal with these dangers of communist penetration, sympathetic consideration should be given by the minister now to something which he seemed to be considering very sympathetically a year or so ago, the problem of Canadian association with the organization of American states. That is one piece of advice, and I think it is the only piece of advice I have given to the minister, in a speech which is already far too long.

Mr. Douglas Jung (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the concluding minutes of this very important debate, I merely wish to speak very briefly on Canada and the Pacific. I shall confine myself to this topic for three reasons. The first reason is that as a member of NATO we agree with the principle of the need to help undeveloped countries and these undeveloped countries are situated mainly in Africa and Asia. The second reason is that we also have member commonwealth countries in the Pacific. My last reason for talking about Canada and the Pacific is that we shall have to consider the competition between the free world and the communist bloc to win those uncommitted countries, and our discussions will underline the fact that the problems facing us are changing from month to month and that we must use great imagination to solve these problems.

In our dealings with other nations, Mr. Speaker, and in our effort to find solutions to the various political and economic problems, I suggest that we must first reassess our own thinking in order to find out if some of the things in which we believed some 50 years, 25 years or 10 years ago are still valid. I particularly have in mind the concept of the sovereignty of nations. My concept of the sovereignty of nations is that each country has the right to administer its domestic affairs without interference from other countries.

A few years ago I suppose that if a country had sufficient natural resources, a large population and an economy sufficiently developed to supply the needs of its own people from its own resources and if this country had reasonably capable leaders, this concept might hold true. But is this concept true today, Mr. Speaker? Can any country stand alone sufficient unto itself? Using my earlier criteria I can think of only two great powers which come near to fulfilling these qualifications and these great powers are the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; and even these two great powers are dependent on other countries for many vital things.

It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that many countries in the free world have recognized that national sovereignty is a highly effective rallying cry for domestic politics, but in international dealings a rigid adherence to the concept of national sovereignty is unrealistic. It is for this very reason that 15 nations have joined themselves into NATO. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has said, "There is no sovereignty without survival".

I know that many Canadians feel strongly about sovereignty. There has been criticism that we are a satellite of the United States and that our armed forces are but mere appendages to the U.S. forces and therefore subject to the whim of the Pentagon in Washington.

Let us be realistic, Mr. Speaker. No matter how much it may appeal to us in our hearts and to our national pride can we, by virtue of our physical limitations, stand by ourselves in trying to solve our problems of defence and of trade? On the other hand, in spite of these physical limitations, Canada's role in international affairs is such that we are being regarded more and more as a major power. I suggest that Canada is living proof that a country need not have huge armed forces in order to be considered a major influence in world affairs.

We can therefore see that the concept of national sovereignty is altering because in NATO, by voluntarily sacrificing some of our sovereignty, we preserve our right to survive. Survival then, in modern times, is based on a collective arrangement. This implies a sharing with other nations not only of obligations but also of benefits; and this brings me to the subject of trade and assistance to the underdeveloped countries of the world and to the topic on which the minister himself spoke at length, namely, Canada and the Pacific.

On November 2, 1959, Mr. Paul-Henri Spaak, who was then secretary general of NATO, addressed the Imperial defence college in London. Among other things this is what he said:

> Provided that the military forces in the free world are maintained efficient and up to date, it may well be that Europe will no longer be the main scene of the long term struggle between communism and the free world. This will very largely take place in the economically underdeveloped countries of Africa and Asia.

His statement was followed in December by the Atlantic congress of NATO which reiterated the need to switch the emphasis from military forces to economic co-operation not only among the NATO countries themselves but also in the underdeveloped areas of the world. On November 11, 1957, I myself spoke in the House of Commons about the aspect of aid to the underdeveloped countries. Because of the shortness of time at my disposal I will not make detailed reference to or quote my own speech.

Mr. Speaker, we can be proud of our contribution to some of these countries. The assistance which we have extended under the Colombo plan has been far-reaching, ably administered and well received. If anything, we have been unduly modest in letting others know about our contribution. However, not all of the contributions of the free world to these underdeveloped countries have had the same results. There have been cases of extravagance and poor administration and, instead of earning good will and friendship, we have in some instances suffered ridicule and animosity.

In our haste to woo the uncommitted countries, we have sometimes poured money into projects which at best are of a stop-gap nature and which cannot produce lasting results. Measures designed as emergency help catch us on the horns of our own dilemma because if we were to discontinue this type of help the U.S.S.R. would step in to fill the vacuum. Yet we dare not impose control or restrictions because to direct that long range measures must be undertaken by the recipients in order to help develop industry, promote education, social welfare and the like, would leave us open to the charge that we are interfering in domestic matters.

We must therefore revise our thinking in so far as financial aid to these countries is concerned. Financial aid alone is not enough. That help must be extended with a genuine and sympathetic interest. We have heard reports to the effect that loan administrators have gone into countries and that the first thing they did was to set up a private club for their social life. There is nothing wrong with that procedure because anyone going to a strange country instinctively turns to something familiar. But let us contrast this procedure with the actions of the communist mayor of the city of Semarang in Indonesia, who works twice a week for a total of seven hours "for free" in order to help construct village roads and schools. He has also collected from the sale of empty bottles, enough money to build a primary school.

In competing to win the friendship of the people in these underdeveloped and uncommitted countries we sometimes forget to take into account their temperament, background and philosophy. Because they experiment with communism we are afraid that they will turn communist. Let us not forget that, in the eyes of these people, neither the communists nor the people of the free world approach them with spotless records. To these countries the great attraction of communism is that, under a socialist system, the U.S.S.R. has been able in a very short time to catch up with and in certain areas to surpass the west.

Let us remember that many of the Asiatic peoples have developed over a long, long time their own philosophies and cultures and that to them communism is something which appears to be another philosophy which they can examine and with which they can experiment without any danger of losing their basic philosophy. A recent example of this is the overthrow of the communist government in the state of Karala in India. These Asian people are a patient people and they are prepared to wait 10 years, 50 years or 100 years for their television sets or homes with two-car garages. However, there is no doubt that they want their independence now; and it is in this respect that they are impatient because they feel that independence will give them dignity.

To a people who were creative and artistic enough to be wearing silks and to have developed a very sophisticated culture when some of our forefathers were still roaming the country in animal skins, time is not measured in generations but in hundreds of centuries. That is why spiritual and personal dignity mean more to these people than next year's car.

Mr. Speaker, Canada's role in the Pacific is a significant one. We have had a good start with the Colombo plan. But Canada must also look to its own expansion. New expansion means more trade, but where are we going to get this trade? Even within the commonwealth we do have the trade that we would like.

In an effort to establish economic stability and to encourage economic expansion nations are now forming economic blocs without too much regard for political implications. It may well be that the establishment of the European common market marks the beginning of a new era in world trade, because nations are beginning to enter into economic alliances even where they differ geographically, politically and racially.

I suggest that an example of this is Australia. Drawn by her political and racial background to the west, she is in a natural and physical position to contribute a great deal to Africa and Asia, much more so than Canada. When the time comes, is Australia to sacrifice a magnificent opportunity purely in the name of the commonwealth, and insist on trading with only the English speaking nations of the world? I think not. For that same reason I suggest that Canadians take a new look at our relations with our neighbour the U.S.A. and every other country in the world.

In the economic battle ahead we must use every bit of ingenuity, strive for maximum efficiency and make bold moves because we are facing ruthless competition. As Mr. Khrushchev said as far back as 1955 to a group of visiting United States congressmen:

> We value trade least for economic reasons and most for political reasons.

Recent events have shown no changes in the position taken by Mr. Khrushchev. That is why I am glad to hear the minister say that he intends to pay more attention to the Latin American countries.

Finally, may I say a word about the efforts of the minister to bring about discussions on disarmament. At the United Nations he has established himself as a man dedicated to peace. To those who know him, this is not surprising. However, his efforts at the United Nations have not all been warmly received and I know there must have been times when the minister felt discouraged. But it is the mark of a man, Mr. Speaker, that in spite of these difficulties he has persisted in his efforts.

The fact that Canada was a member of the ten power disarmament committee is eloquent testimony to the work done by the minister, and I give him my wholehearted support in anything that he does which will bring about fruitful discussions.

I put on record my support for his efforts for disarmament, because there are some in this country who seem to think that our leaders are uninformed and indifferent to the consequences of a nuclear conflict.

Those who hold that attitude, in my opinion, do a great disservice to the people of Canada when they try to spread the picture of our leaders callously leading our country to destruction. No one knows better than the Prime Minister, the minister himself, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness), and others in the government, the horrors of nuclear war. Most of us in this chamber have served our country in war and no one need lecture us as to the waste and futility of war.

The mere fact that we are maintaining our defence until such time as a satisfactory formula for disarmament is found is entirely consistent with government policy. Indeed, how can anyone, in all honesty, advocate unilateral disarmament on our part when there is no similar desire on the part of others?

Disarmament could be accomplished tomorrow if the major nuclear powers could agree to the necessary procedures for inspection. But until such time we can only support the efforts of the minister in trying to bring together the nuclear powers so that disarmament discussions may be continued.

Learning how to live together is much more difficult than learning how to fight together. There are times when we will be impatient, but we cannot all at once build for a hundred years. None the less, I am in agreement with the statement made last year by the minister when he said that Canada will end this decade as one of the leading nations of the world.

When we achieve that status—and I say this without derogating in any way from the contributions made by his colleagues or predecessors in office—I am sure that the minister will derive great personal satisfaction from the contribution he has made in helping Canada attain that position.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I understand that under the rules I have no right of reply in this debate. However, perhaps hon. members of the house will bear with me for a minute while I express to those who have participated in the discussion—as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) so aptly called it a few moments ago—my thanks for the manner in which the debate has been conducted, and also for the very helpful suggestions which have been made.

Quite a few hon. members had hoped to participate in this debate but have not been able to do so because we allotted just two days for it. Of course, I was personally responsible for several hon. members being unable to take part because I spoke too long yesterday afternoon. For that I apologize.

However, I understand that the sittings of the external affairs committee are to commence next week and I plan to be available for interrogation, further suggestions and criticisms in that committee before leaving for the NATO meeting in Oslo a week from tomorrow night.

I am sure we can all look forward to further consideration of these vital foreign affairs problems and that this consideration will be a great help to our own nation, as I feel this debate has been during the last two days.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the order of the house made on Tuesday last, it is now my duty to put the question on the motion now before the house. Before doing so I may say that the special order of the house was probably wide enough, as it permitted a general debate, to permit the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) to make his last intervention. However, that does not fall to be decided now.

Accordingly, the question is the following:

Mr. Green moves that items Nos. 76 to 110 inclusive and item No. 481 as listed in the main estimates 1961-62 referring to the Department of External Affairs, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the program is for tomorrow and next week.

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow, the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. The suggested program for next week will run as follows. The first item on Monday will be No. 6 on today's order paper, Bill No. C-85 referring to the national design council.

The second item will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys dealing with the Coal Production Assistance Act. The third item will be the resolution in my name dealing with the army benevolent fund. These two resolutions will perhaps not take up much time of the house.

The fourth item will be Bill No. C-84, which is item No. 5 on today's order paper, an act respecting the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons, etc. On the order paper tomorrow I expect there will appear a bill dealing with amendments to the Fisheries Act. This will then be available as a fifth item. I am speaking now of Monday and Tuesday combined.

If time permits, we may finally reach Bill No. C-77, which is item No. 4 on today's order paper, dealing with agricultural development.

The intention at the moment is to proceed on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday with the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and, if good progress is made, perhaps the estimates of a third department will be made available for discussion on Saturday. I will announce that later.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MCGEE—REPORTED ALTERATION IN "HANSARD" BY HON. MEMBER FOR LAURIER

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege arising out of an apparent change that has been made in Hansard. This only came to my attention yesterday although the matter to which I have reference occurred on Monday of this week, April 24. You will recall, sir, that in his introductory remarks the hon. member for Laurier, in a preface to the raising of his grievance, made the following statement with reference to Bomarc missiles:

> The government is building two Bomarc missile bases in northern Ontario and northern Quebec which, in order to be operative, must be equipped with nuclear weapons—

Mr. Speaker: What page?

Mr. McGee: Page 3933, on the right hand side. A few moments later, as you will recall, I rose on a point of order in order to challenge the validity of that statement. I copied down the words he used and referred to them as found at page 3934. No reply was made to that statement of mine, and I was astonished yesterday to have it pointed out to me that in fact the word "operative" appears to have been changed to "effective". I am not suggesting for a moment that the hon. member made this change intentionally, but it would certainly seem to me that it would require some explanation.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, when I was discussing this motion the other day the hon. member rose on a point of order and said that he had taken down my words. The words which he took down were taken down erroneously. They were not the words I had used on the occasion in question.

I do not remember whether or not Your Honour was in the chair at the time, but I believe you were. However, Your Honour made it quite clear to the hon. member that he had no right to interrupt me at the time he did because he was not making a point of order but was challenging a statement I had made. Your Honour also made it quite clear to him that if he wanted to challenge a statement made in the house he should follow the rules of the house and make a statement afterward. He did not choose to do that, but today he rises in his place on a question of privilege, four days after the occasion arose. I think the practice of this house, as you have ruled repeatedly, Mr. Speaker, is that when there is a question of privilege a member should rise immediately thereafter.

Mr. Speaker: If I am correct in understanding the hon. member for York-Scarborough, his question of privilege relates to the alleged change of the word "effective" to "operative".

An hon. Member: It is the other way around.

Mr. McGee: It is my submission, Mr. Speaker, that the word "operative" was used, and upon being challenged later it now appears in Hansard as "effective".

Mr. Speaker: That is in the remarks attributed to the hon. member for Laurier?

Mr. McGee: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that the hon. member's complaint is one that warrants attention after four days have elapsed. However, if the hon. member for Laurier wishes to comment on the alleged question of privilege arising from the change of the words, I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. Chevrier: I have nothing to add to what I have already said, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FREIGHT RATES REDUCTION ACT—EXTENSION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport, and ask if the minister can explain why legislation to extend the application of the Freight Rates Reduction Act has not been presented to the house.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the resolution is on the order paper and legislation will follow in due course.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister realize that if this legislation is not passed before the day is out either the freight rates increase goes into effect or the government will have no authority to compensate the railways financially?

Mr. Balcer: This aspect of the question will be looked after in the legislation that will follow.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question arising out of that answer. Has the government made any arrangements with the railways to have them continue the reductions as they now exist, and have they been given any assurance that they will be compensated therefor?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer of the Minister of Transport is sufficient. When the legislation is introduced the hon. gentleman will have his answer. He will recall that there were occasions during the period when he occupied a seat on the treasury benches when directions were given by ministers. I hope we will not follow that course.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the Prime Minister allow this additional question. Is the Prime Minister able to point to many occasions when an amendment to a statute of this character, expiring as it does tonight, was not introduced earlier?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member's question is a debating question rather than one that is pressing for action.

[Later:]

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, following the question which I asked the Minister of Transport a moment ago I wonder whether I can add another one. Will the minister tell us whether any statutory authority exists under the Freight Rates Reduction Act to continue the reductions after midnight of April 30?

Mr. Balcer: I will ask for a legal opinion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think it is in accordance with practice to ask for information which is available equally to all members of the house, and I consider that the statutes, as enacted by parliament, are equally available to all hon. members of the house.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder, sir, whether I can ask the Minister of Justice, in that case, whether there is any order in council of which the house has not been apprised which will continue the reduction of freight rates beyond midnight of April 30 next.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, this question was answered by the Prime Minister a few minutes ago when he stated the practice and the policy of this government in matters of this kind.

Mr. McIlraith: It is a question of fact.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege affecting all hon. members, I do not think that question was ever put to the Prime Minister or answered by him and, if I may, I would like to put the question. Since it is a matter of the exercise of the executive function and of the responsibility of the executive to this parliament, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether any order in council has been passed of which the house has not yet been apprised which would have the effect of continuing the freight rate reduction, which will expire at midnight on April 30, beyond that date.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I can understand the interest of the hon. gentleman in orders in council.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the Prime Minister would answer my question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This government does not pass orders in council for which it has no authority, which is somewhat different from the group with which the hon. member is associated.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which affects me and several other hon. members of the house. The Prime Minister has made an allegation affecting the conduct of other hon. members of the house, and I challenge the Prime Minister to produce a single order in council passed by the previous administration which was not founded upon proper legal authority.

Moreover, sir, the Prime Minister made no attempt to answer the very proper question I put to him. I did not suggest for a minute that there had been an order in council passed for which there was not statutory authority. I merely asked the Prime Minister, and I did so in the politest way possible, whether an order in council had been passed of which the house had not yet been apprised. It is quite possible that there would be statutory authority for such an order in council. It is a matter of fact one way or the other, and I think the house is entitled to an answer.

Mr. Speaker: I heard the hon. member on the matter of privilege, and he proceeded from there to criticism of the answer he received, which is not in accordance with the practice. It is the responsibility of the ministry to determine the kind of answer that is given, and it is not subject to debate.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, I should like to draw Your Honour's attention to page 27 of the standing orders, rule 39, of which I think one would want to have the Prime Minister take particular notice. That rule reads as follows:

> Questions may be placed on the order paper seeking information from ministers of the crown relating to public affairs; and from other members, relating to any bill, motion, or other public matter connected with the business of the house, in which such members may be concerned—

These are the words that I think have a special bearing with respect to the reply made by the Prime Minister:

> —but in putting any such question or in replying to the same no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same; and in answering any such question the matter to which the same refers shall not be debated.

The Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, has violated that rule. He always answers questions by speaking about another subject.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I was simply imitating the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and I am glad he knows the rule now.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that the rule which he read refers to questions being placed on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think there is no need to pursue the matter further. The same rule also applies to oral questions, I might say, so that there may be no doubt. It is true that hon. members in putting their questions and ministers in answering them very often yield to the temptation of attaching a rider. I hope all hon. members will observe the rule.

Mr. Hellyer: On the question of privilege which was raised—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I see no further need for assistance on the matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister alleged that the former administration passed orders in council without statutory authority. He has provided no evidence to substantiate that statement, and he should withdraw.

He should provide some evidence or withdraw the allegation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is not in order himself in pursuing a matter that has been disposed of.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BANK OF CANADA—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT BY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday I asked the Minister of Finance the following question as reported at page 4042 of Hansard:

> I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question. Will the minister tell the house whether it is the intention of the government to move to refer the annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada to the standing committee on banking and commerce, or to any other committee of this house?

The Minister of Finance gave the following reply, as reported in Hansard for yesterday:

> Mr. Speaker, following the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition, I really can see no advantage to parliament or to the public in that course.

My question of privilege is that this report in Hansard is not in accord with what the minister in fact said. What the minister did say was "I can really see no advantage to parliament, nor is it in the public interest". I do not say that the Minister of Finance has deliberately changed these words but the reported version is not what the minister said. That I am justified in this remark is seen by what Mr. Deputy Speaker said at page 4043 of Hansard, when he made this observation:

> Mr. Deputy Speaker: Unless I am mistaken, the Minister of Finance has already indicated he does not consider this suggestion to be in the public interest.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is an observation that may be intended to have more implicit in it than is explicit about it.

I believe that Hansard, at page 4042, has correctly reproduced my answer. I saw the blues, Mr. Speaker, as usual. I thought they correctly gave my remarks and I made no change in them. The observation made by Mr. Deputy Speaker purported to state the gist, I take it, of what I had said in reply to the question asked by the member for Essex East. In any event, I consider the member for Essex East to be clearly wrong on his facts, as so often happens; and I repeat, I consider that the statement attributed to me in the second column of yesterday's Hansard at page 4042 correctly states my remark.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think—

Mr. Speaker: I think the matter should not be pursued. The hon. member has drawn to the attention of the house what he regarded as a question of privilege arising out of a change which he thought had been made, or an erroneous report. The minister has given his word in his place that he did not change the report and therefore, if there is any error, it is an error in the reporting which does not raise a matter of privilege. Consequently I think the matter cannot be further debated.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then I ask the Minister of Finance a question. Does he not think that it is in the public interest the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada should be referred to the banking and commerce committee, or to a committee of this house, for its consideration?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I really can see no advantage to parliament or to the public in that course.

COLUMBIA RIVER TREATY—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, and I hope in attempting to answer it he will not make inaccurate and offensive observations. Now that the committee on external affairs is about to begin its work, does the Prime Minister anticipate that the Columbia river development treaty will be sent to that committee in the near future?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, whether or not the Columbia river treaty will be sent to the committee will be determined in the light of circumstances as they develop, and also in the light of the request of the committee and the decision made by it.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this well mannered group I should like to ask the Prime Minister another question. Will the committee have the opportunity, even prior to consideration of the Columbia river treaty, to ask General McNaughton to appear before it to give evidence with respect to this development?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member, with his adherence to parliamentary principles, will realize that no direction to a committee on the part of the Prime Minister would have any effect whatever. I would hope it would not.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of news reports to the effect that the Laos team is split on an understanding of its role and procedure, would the minister inform the house whether the Canadian members of the commission have received specific instructions in this respect, and also would he comment on the situation?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the report in question is a bit premature, because the commission was not to meet until today. The key point in this whole Laos problem is whether or not there will be a cease fire in Laos. As I informed the house on April 25, the first step in the procedure agreed to by the co-chairmen at the Geneva conference, that is by the Soviet union and by the United Kingdom, for dealing with the critical situation in Laos was a call to the two parties in Laos for a cease fire. Both sides have accepted this call in principle.

Hon. members will recall, however, that representatives of the parties were requested by the co-chairman to enter into negotiations on, and I quote, "questions connected with the cease fire". In other words, the people who are fighting in Laos are to negotiate on that point. There has not yet been agreement in Laos, so far as I am aware, as to where or when such negotiations will begin. Continued delay in reaching agreement on this matter could have very grave consequences. I earnestly hope a satisfactory agreement will be reached promptly by the parties. Dispatches indicate that the fighting is still going on, in spite of the fact that everybody says we are going to have a cease fire.

If agreement is reached and a cease fire takes place, then the international supervisory commission, which is holding its first meeting in New Delhi this afternoon should, and I hope will, be able to begin immediately its task of verifying and supervising the cease fire, so the subsequent conference of 14 nations can be held as planned in Geneva on May 12.

The Canadian representatives on the supervisory commission have their instructions, and I am sure they will be doing their best to work amicably with the representatives of India and Poland. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, that does not mean that Canada will agree automatically to everything that is suggested by another member of that commission. These are rather complicated discussions and operations, and sometimes things are not as simple as they look on the surface in connection with the work of these commissions. But our objective throughout will be to help in every possible way to bring about a settlement of the troubles in Laos.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BOMARC BASES—INQUIRY AS TO OPERATIONAL DATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. J. Martel (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence, a copy of which has been forwarded to the minister's office. Could the minister indicate to the house whether there is any basis to the rumour that the Val d'Or airport in northern Quebec, is to be used exclusively for defence purposes?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Chapleau, I wish to state that the rumour is incorrect and that the Val d'Or airport will not be restricted to purely defence activities.

(Text):

SASKATCHEWAN

RESERVATION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING MINING CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister please inform the house whether there is any further report on the recent action of His Excellency Lieutenant Governor Frank Bastedo of Saskatchewan in deferring royal assent to bill No. 56.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has given very full consideration to this matter, and I think I shall be in a position on Monday to indicate the attitude we will take. Suffice it to say, as I pointed out on an earlier occasion, that the reservation of legislation by the lieutenant governor for the pleasure of the Governor General has generally throughout the years been dependent on a direction from the federal government and the governor in council. There was neither direction nor consultation in this case.

I think that is as far as I will go, until the beginning of next week, when a full statement will be made.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government decided whether or not to table the documents connected with this case, particularly the report of the lieutenant governor?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not think any further consideration has been given to that matter. I mentioned at the time the hon. gentleman raised this question that there was some qualification. Personally I have no objection, and I think it is only proper that tabling should take place. If there is not anything to the contrary over the years that would prevent it, I will table what we have at the same time I make the statement.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BOMARC BASES—INQUIRY AS TO OPERATIONAL DATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Can the minister say whether the two Bomarc installations, the one at North Bay, Ontario and La Macaza, Quebec, will be operational this year, as reported in the Ottawa Journal on April 26?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the two Bomarc stations to which the hon. member refers probably will not be operational by the end of 1961, but they should be operational not long after that date.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the wide discrepancy in newspaper reports in respect to this matter, I wonder whether the minister would arrange on an early occasion to make a statement which would bring the house up to date on the progress that has been made.

Mr. Sevigny: I believe the hon. member's supplementary question was answered by my reply to his first question.

[Later:]

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to direct another question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Will the minister advise the house when the control centre near North Bay will be operational, and indicate how the Bomarcs will be guided in the period before the control centre is functional?

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first part of the question, I refer the hon. member to the answer which I gave a moment ago. As far as the second portion of the question is concerned, I do not believe that it should be treated as representing a matter of urgency.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that the minister has not chosen to answer the question, will he include all the information in the full statement that I requested earlier?

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

CO-OPERATION BETWEEN ONTARIO AND FEDERAL DEPARTMENTS IN OVERSEAS MARKETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Percy Vivian (Durham): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, notice of which has been given. Would the minister tell the house the relationships which exist between his department under this government and the government of the province of Ontario in the interests of promoting trade jointly with overseas markets, and how the two departments are officially associated in this endeavour?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I was sent notice of this question relative to a statement which was made yesterday by Hon. Leslie Frost, premier of Ontario, in this regard. We welcome the initiative of the province of Ontario in developing further specialized services, as expressed yesterday by its very able premier, Hon. Leslie Frost. I am particularly happy that these plans call for dovetailing with, rather than duplication of, the vigorous efforts being made by our trade commissioners abroad.

For many years our officers in the United Kingdom and on the continent of Europe, as well as in New York and Chicago, have worked in close co-operation with all provincial offices in important matters, particularly those concerned with the attraction of industry to Canada and matters of general trade development. As do other agencies, our trade commissioners constantly report new opportunities for Canadian exporters in these markets as well as in other parts of the world.

The close co-operation between my department and the provincial authorities has been exemplified by our export trade promotion conference in Winnipeg on February 6 and by plans for similar conferences in Calgary on May 16, in Vancouver on May 18 and in London, Ontario, on May 25. We look forward enthusiastically to further conferences in at least two other centres of Ontario and in other provinces—

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I rise on a point of order. It seems to me that the answer to the question is in violation of the rules on at least two grounds. First of all, it contains debatable material and the minister does not confine his reply to the actual information asked for. Second, the minister's estimates are indicated as the business of this day when government orders are called. The hon. gentleman is now taking the opportunity to make a speech about the operation of his department and to give information of a kind which cannot properly be sought by way of answer to a question asked on orders of the day. There is no urgency about this question such as would justify it being asked on the orders of the day instead of later in the day on estimates. Therefore on three grounds I submit that the question violates the rules of orders.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether the minister has finished his answer—

Mr. Hees: Almost.

Mr. Speaker: —or whether he wishes to say anything on the point of order. If one were to draw fine or nice distinctions I think the hon. member for Ottawa West is probably correct in saying that this question is not one of urgency but rather one for the estimates as they arise. The matter is of continuing interest rather than something which requires immediate attention. Furthermore, I think the minister in his answer went beyond the terms of the question. However, I take it the matter is not now of serious moment.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TORONTO—REFERENCE OF UNEMPLOYED TO ROYAL YORK HOTEL BY EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour and, in doing so, to welcome him back on behalf of the house from his mission to Washington.

My question is this. Have national employment service personnel referred unemployed persons to apply for work at the strike-bound Royal York hotel and, if so, can the minister assure the house that this practice has ceased?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): It has always been the object of the national employment service to be neutral in these matters. People who may be referred to plants or businesses which are strike-bound are so referred on the basis that the referral slip is stamped with the words "this plant strike-bound". It is then left to the discretion of the person concerned as to whether or not to proceed with his application.

[Later:]

Mr. Pitman: I have a supplementary question arising out of the answer of the Minister of Labour. Can the minister assure the house that people who refuse to accept jobs at the Royal York hotel, when recommended by the unemployment insurance commission service, will not lose their benefits?

Mr. Starr: My understanding is that they do not lose their benefits as a result of refusal to work in a strike-bound plant. However, if the hon. member knows of any occurrence and wishes to bring a specific instance to my attention I shall be glad to investigate.

TRANSPORT

CHIGNECTO CANAL—SPEECH BY DEPUTY MINISTER AT SAINT JOHN, N.B.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister inform the house whether the deputy minister of transport was speaking for the government when he made statements about the proposed Chignecto canal at a meeting of a women's association at Saint John, New Brunswick, this week?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, whenever any policy statement is to be made it is the practice of this government to have it made by members of the cabinet.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

DORVAL—STATEMENT ON REPORTED THEFT OF MAIL AT AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Yesterday the hon. member for St. Denis inquired about the theft of mail bags at Dorval airport. I might say that an attempt was made to steal a mail bag at Dorval. The persons concerned were apprehended before the mail bag or any mail was lost, and they are now before the courts.

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): A supplementary question. I should like to know from the Postmaster General whether these bags were stolen after being left unguarded, or whether it was an attempt with violence.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): We pay rewards of up to $2,000 for people who are apprehended if it is theft with violence. There was no violence involved in this particular situation. If the hon. member wishes to apply for a reward we shall be glad to consider him, but I do not think he had anything to do with this offence, at least with apprehending the people concerned.

COMBINES

DRUGS—INQUIRY AS TO HOLDING OF PUBLIC HEARING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Acting Minister of Justice. I am not sure who he is, and that accounts for my scatter-gun glances. In view of the news reports that the combines branch of the Department of Justice has just completed a report on an inquiry into Canadian drug prices which indicates that Canada's drug prices are the highest in the world, and in view of the great interest in and importance of this matter, does the restrictive trade practices commission intend to hold public hearings on this question in the near future?

Hon. W. J. Browne (Solicitor General): I will take that question as notice and bring it to the attention of the Minister of Justice.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

TORONTO—INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON CRIME SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Justice. Was the minister consulted in respect of the proposed international conference to thresh out the crime situation in Toronto and adjoining areas?

Hon. W. J. Browne (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will accept the question as notice and take it up with the Minister of Justice.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question based on an announcement he made in the house over five months ago. When may we expect that the members of the royal commission to examine into the question of medical care insurance will be appointed?

Mr. Pearson: In due course.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I will add one extra word to the answer I gave on another occasion—very, very shortly.

TELEVISION

SASKATOON—RECOMMENDATION OF BOARD OF GOVERNORS RESPECTING LOCATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he or his department has received representations respecting the recent recommendation of the board of broadcast governors that the Saskatoon television station should be located in the area of Kindersley rather than the station at Swift Current and alleging that there were certain irregularities in respect of this matter. If such representations have been received, would the minister say what it is proposed to do about them?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check with my department before giving an answer to this question.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

394. Departmental administration, including fees for membership in the international organizations listed in the details of the estimates (also includes the national industrial design council transferred from the national gallery), $3,275,445.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by informing the house about some of the most important aspects of the work of my department. It will be impossible to cover all the diverse and wide ranging responsibilities of this department. However, I would remind hon. members that the annual report of the department was tabled on April 14 last. In it they will find a comprehensive review of economic and trade developments affecting Canada as well as a great deal of detailed information on our departmental activities during the year 1960.

My remarks today will be divided into four broad categories. I shall begin with a review of our trade and economic situation and the outlook for the next few months. Next I will outline the department's work and achievements in the field of trade promotion. I shall then give some details on the subject of trade policy and, finally, I shall review some of our efforts on the domestic and commercial fronts.

During the past year, developments in the foreign trade field have provided strong underpinnings for activity in the Canadian economy, and a higher level of exports has added to production and employment in Canadian industries. Imports, meanwhile, have edged downward. The result has been a substantial improvement in Canada's trade balance. The deficit on merchandise trade declined from $369 million in 1959 to $97 million in 1960, the lowest figure since 1954. In 1960 our merchandise exports reached $5,395 million, 5 per cent above the level for the preceding year. This followed a similar increase between 1958 and 1959.

Most of the expansion in exports in 1960 consisted of higher sales in various mineral products including pulp and paper, lumber, aluminum, nickel, copper, petroleum, asbestos, iron and steel and chemicals. In addition, the various types of manufactured products have been sold in larger quantities. The progressive dismantling of import restrictions throughout the trading world has opened up new market opportunities for this type of export.

An outstanding feature of our export trade in 1960 was a substantial growth in sales to overseas markets. Between 1959 and 1960 our exports to the United Kingdom increased by 16 per cent; to the common market by 39 per cent; to Japan by 27 per cent, and to all overseas areas taken together by about one fifth. On the other hand, our sales to the United States declined by nearly 5 per cent. However, sales of all foreign goods in the United States market were down. Thus the relative position of Canadian imports in that market was pretty well maintained.

Imports into Canada in 1960 were slightly below the 1959 level and, in fact, were less than four years ago. Despite the difficult competitive position faced by some industries, total shipments from Canadian factories, in aggregate, have about kept pace with imports of manufactured goods. Domestic manufacturers, for the most part, have been able to maintain their relative position in the Canadian market, although there have been some exceptions.

Another notable feature of Canada's trade in 1960, and in fact for several years past, has been its growing geographic diversification. This has involved in particular a lessening concentration of trade with the United States and a growing relative importance of trade with countries such as the United Kingdom, West Germany and Japan. The steadily improving competitive position of overseas industrialized countries has enhanced their importance as sources of supply for the Canadian market. At the same time strong internal growth rates within these areas have involved sharply expanded markets for Canadian products. Reflecting these broad tendencies, the proportion of our exports going to the United States has declined from 62 per cent in 1959 to 56 per cent in 1960. This means that 44 per cent of our total exports now go to overseas markets. The geographic distribution of our imports remained almost unchanged between 1959 and 1960. However, during the last four years the United States share of the Canadian import market has declined from 73 per cent to 67 per cent, while the share enjoyed by overseas countries has risen correspondingly.

There is good reason to anticipate that the improvement realized in Canada's trade position in 1960 will carry forward in the current year. Export figures have been fluctuating sharply from one month to another, but for the first two months of the current year our exports have held within 3 per cent of the record level achieved in the same months a year ago. Imports also are down moderately. In the January-February period the merchandise trade balance has shown little change from a year ago, with exports and imports near to an even balance.

Total exports have been maintained at a high level in recent months despite lower sales in the U.S. market. Economic activity in the United States has been declining, and in the first quarter of 1961 industrial production was at a level 8 per cent below the previous high point achieved in January 1960.

As usually happens, the adverse effects of this decline in factory output upon the demand for industrial materials has been accentuated by inventory liquidation. In consequence Canada's sales to the United States, as reflected in export trade figures for the last three months, have recently been running 17 per cent below the level of a year previous. In the over-all trade figures, however, lower sales to the United States have been largely offset by increased shipments overseas. Recent signs of hesitancy in the trend of activity in some overseas countries have not, up to this point, affected the upward movement in our shipments to overseas markets.

The Canadian economy, and in particular the level of trade, cannot be fully insulated from the effects of economic fluctuations in major foreign market areas. Nevertheless, forward-looking action can help to cushion the adverse effects of these fluctuations. I have already illustrated how the recent broadening out of our markets has helped to limit adverse reactions emanating from the current down trend in the United States.

The manner in which higher exports to overseas markets has helped to cushion the shock of recession in the United States further emphasizes the vital importance of diversification of Canada's trade, and the continued expansion of trade with overseas countries.

Hon. members will already have seen the dominion bureau of statistics trade figures for February and for the cumulative January/February period, which were released this morning. They reveal the fact that while our exports in the first two months of the year increased by 22 per cent to the United Kingdom, and by 37 per cent to other commonwealth countries, compared to the same period last year, a drop of 14.5 per cent in our shipments to the United States has caused a fall of nearly 3 per cent in our total exports to all countries. At the same time, while our imports from all other sources have increased, a reduction of just under 6 per cent in our imports from the United States has helped to maintain an almost even balance in our over-all trade balance.

It would be difficult indeed to find more conclusive evidence than this with which to vindicate the policy of multilateralism in trade which this government has consistently followed. While dealing with what might be termed our chronic deficit in trade with the United States, it is imperative that our exports be vigorously expanded and that we continue to seek out new overseas markets for Canadian products.

There are other bright spots in the current trade situation. The careful attention which we have given in recent years to market potentialities in mainland China has now paid off in large new orders for wheat and barley. Perseverance in the development of this market by the Canadian wheat board and by our foreign trade service has been an important contributing factor in bringing a major portion of this new business to Canada. The development of advanced types of aircraft by the Canadian industry is now showing up in substantially higher aircraft exports. Canada's new national oil policy, calling for more rapid growth in this highly productive industry, is injecting new initiative into the development of export markets. The orderly development of new outlets for natural gas provides the basis for a continuing growth in exports of this product. A substantial addition to Canada's iron ore producing capacity brings with it new export outlets for this commodity. The growth of our sales of these and other items will help to offset the temporary ill effects of economic adjustment in the United States and possibly in some other countries.

There is also a general expectancy that an upturn in United States economic activity is now beginning or is close at hand. In this event we can look forward to underlying improvement in the United States market as the year progresses. Just the same, we are not standing by waiting for markets to get better. The Department of Trade and Commerce is continuously seeking out ways to stimulate export trade, and major efforts to this end have recently been initiated.

On August 5, 1960, at page 7666 of Hansard, my colleague the former minister of trade and commerce, indicated certain changes in the organization and personnel of the department. At that time he forecast the appointment of two new assistant deputy ministers. As a result of interdepartmental examinations conducted by the civil service commission, assistant deputy ministers responsible for commodities services and domestic commerce have been appointed. This reorganization has improved administrative efficiency and has enabled the department to move ahead boldly in two very important fields of endeavour.

One of our primary functions is to promote the sale of Canadian products in world markets. I think our record is one we can be proud of. Our export trade promotion conference, held in Ottawa from November 30 to December 16, was one of the most effective means ever employed to arouse the attention of Canadians and Canadian producers to the advantages and the value of our export trade. You will remember that when we brought back all the trade commissioners from abroad there were 110 of them here. Alert businessmen immediately recognized the advantages of meeting with these officers. In fact 1,365 Canadian businessmen, representing 1,133 Canadian firms, met for a total of 10,502 interviews with our trade commissioners.

It is still too early to give an accurate measurement of the results of those meetings. However, by the middle of March we had definite word from the trade commissioners that 344 new agencies or buying connections had already been established, and that there were good possibilities for upwards of 2,000 more. Trial orders, as a direct result of the meetings last December, have already been placed in 26 countries for Canadian goods valued at more than $1 million. As we do not know the value of many other orders, the actual total may well approach $2 million. The goods concerned include the products of agriculture such as, seed potatoes and baby chicks as well as flour and frozen foods. They include a wide range of manufactured products such as wood pulp and whisky, kitchenware and cutlery blanks, lamps and leather wallets. There were substantial orders for acetate, chemicals, electrical equipment, fibre glass cloth and leather.

The spirit of this export trade promotion conference continues with the hearty cooperation of provincial authorities and business associations. My senior officers and I participated in a regional trade promotion conference in Winnipeg on February 6, when more than 600 businessmen turned out for the discussions. On May 16 we have a similar trade conference coming up in Calgary. On May 18 there will be another one in Vancouver and on May 25 still another in London, Ontario. The provincial authorities and the businessmen who are organizing these meetings are most enthusiastic about the prospects. The departmental team from Ottawa is also finding these personal contacts with governments, business and industry across the country a rewarding experience.

The trade commissioner service is the overseas arm of our department. During 1960 there were more than 120 trained officers in this sales force, stationed at 63 posts in 47 different countries. Quite apart from the special efforts connected with the export trade promotion conference, our trade commissioners were instrumental last year in establishing 847 agency or buying connections for Canadian export products. They also received and dealt with more than 9,000 inquiries from Canadian exporters about market opportunities and conditions abroad.

We are continuing to build this foreign sales force by means of an aggressive recruiting program. This year we have selected 15 promising young men who will shortly begin their training in the department. As the problems connected with international trade grow in number and complexity, greater demands are constantly made upon our resources of trained officers for special assignments and negotiation work. A large group of trade commissioners is now in Ottawa receiving training and experience in these fields.

One of our most important forms of export promotion is participation in trade fairs abroad, where Canadian goods are placed directly before the prospective agent and customer. Selection of fairs in department's program is made on the basis of active market possibilities. We show Canadian goods wherever there are good prospects that Canadian products can be sold. Results have been very encouraging. Since April 1, 1960 we have exhibited in 13 fairs outside Canada and by April 1, 1962 we will have participated in 17 more. Many of these are of a very specialized nature, because it is in the specialized fair that we find our best prospects.

We do not ignore the large, general shows, however. One such exhibition is the ideal homes show held in London in March each year. In 1960 the Canadian stand comprised 51 booths. This year it had expanded to 86 booths. No less than 36 of those who participated in 1960 returned for this year's show. We shall continue to extend our participation in the important trade fairs of the world.

Trade missions are another proven medium for promoting trade. We have given them a specialized application by planning missions for very specific purposes and organizing them intensively to those ends. Here again results have been encouraging. The two missions which we sent to the United Kingdom last fall—one on timber and the other on processed food—are still bringing results, not only in the form of new business but in the continued interest of the members of the missions who are working together to achieve improved methods and procedures. Our high level mission to the common market countries successfully achieved its immediate purpose of maintaining our exports of specific commodities. It has also had a continuing benefit, in that the leaders of industry who comprised the mission have met on several occasions since their return to discuss their impressions. The missions of consulting engineers and construction engineers which we sent to South America also give definite promise of new business abroad.

There are many risks attached to export operations which are not normally encountered in the domestic market and against which Canadian firms cannot obtain coverage through private sources. Here again the department, through the services of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, provides valuable assistance to Canadian industries by insuring them against non-payment by foreign buyers. Business done in 1960 was up 34 per cent over 1959. May I remind hon. members, Mr. Chairman, that the annual report of the corporation was tabled in the house last month.

Last November I announced in this house that the banks and the government were cooperating closely to provide financing for export sales of capital goods on credit terms. Just last week the banks announced the establishment of the Export Finance Corporation of Canada, Ltd., which has been set up to provide a new and separate source of funds for exporters selling capital goods to foreign buyers on medium term credit. Where long term credit extending beyond five years is required, the government is prepared to provide financing under section 21A of the Export Credits Insurance Act. I made a statement in this connection in the house just two weeks ago outlining the very satisfactory developments and substantial figures involved.

Such aggressive measures to promote Canada's trade at home and abroad must be supported by closer liaison with industry in Canada. This is the lesson of recent experience. Twenty per cent of the firms which took part in the export trade promotion conference had no previous contacts with the department. Expansion of industry all across Canada in recent years and a new drive for industrial development in all provinces have stimulated a growing interest in the possibilities of export trade. Greater concentration of attention on aids to small business and domestic commerce is translated into new interest at the local business level in the services which are available from the department.

Thus the need to establish regional offices of the department to provide these services more readily, and with greater continuity, is clearly apparent. As a consequence it has been decided to open regional offices in Halifax and Winnipeg in the near future. As soon as possible thereafter two more regional offices will be opened in Montreal and Toronto. At the same time our two existing offices in Vancouver and St. John's, Newfoundland, will be strengthened, to place them on a similar footing. In this way we hope to greatly increase the effectiveness of our assistance to industry and business across Canada and to provide closer liaison with provincial governments in the field of industrial development.

Let me now dwell on the department's activities and responsibilities in respect of Canada's international trade relations. In the light of the debate earlier this week on the government's trade policy, and the very complete review of our commercial relations contained in the department's annual report at pages 19 to 29, I do not intend to make a comprehensive review of this subject at this time. Members have been kept continuously informed in the course of the current session either by myself or by my colleagues.

Let me say briefly that our trade policy objective, to which we have constantly directed our endeavours, is to foster the development amongst trading nations of policies conducive to stability, growth and the expansion of mutually beneficial trade. In order for the very intensive export effort of my department and the business community to bring results, it is first necessary to have access to markets throughout the world on equal terms with our competitors.

This objective, in the main, has been realized. The handicaps under which dollar country exports laboured in the transitional period of post-war recovery have been largely removed since 1959, and together with the renewed economic strength of the major importing nations, exports have made very substantial gains.

The new stimulus which has been given to Canadian export sales as a result of the trade promotion conference places a further responsibility on the government. This department, in seeing that the conditions under which our goods move into international trade continue to improve, is therefore further intensifying its efforts to have import restrictions removed by those countries which no longer have balance of payments difficulties. I am confident that we can expect to see substantial improvements in this regard. I also look to some progress in this direction by less developed countries.

As the tide of trade restrictions recedes, the restrictive effect of agricultural protectionism abroad emerges as a problem of major concern to Canada. Barriers to imports of agricultural products by other countries are a serious impairment to our trade, and we must press forward in restoring the balance of advantage between the agricultural exporting countries and their trading partners. We are convinced that there is room here for considerable reduction in tariff and non-tariff barriers to trade.

Meanwhile Canada is participating in the work of the GATT committee which is examining ways and means of expanding world agricultural trade. We are likewise active members of the international wheat agreement, as well as of the wheat utilization committee, for the expansion of world wheat consumption and trade. Similarly we take part in regular consultations with the United States authorities for the safeguarding of commercial markets for wheat. These interests continue to be fully taken into account in the formulation of our broad commercial policy.

The enthusiastic response of Canadian exporters for the development of trade has also meant that the government's constant efforts to safeguard and improve our access to all world markets take on greatly increased importance. These efforts consist of ensuring, first, that equitable treatment is accorded Canadian exports to those markets; second, that our competitive position in such markets is not impaired by the application of measures prejudicial to our exports; and finally, that commercial markets for our goods are not disrupted by our competitors, whether in the form of subsidies, surplus disposal programs or other means.

The government, through my department, plays an important role in keeping exporters informed of conditions in each market and the best means of exploiting them to advantage, in exploring new areas where trade may be developed, and by ensuring that our trade agreement relationships with all areas are soundly based. The negotiation of the new trade agreements with both Australia and the U.S.S.R. last year exemplifies our activities in the latter field. We are constantly reviewing possibilities for similar fruitful negotiations with other countries where commercial opportunities exist.

In our endeavours to seek out new opportunities for our exports and to defend our commercial interest, this department is fully conscious of the need to have a forward looking and flexible trade policy. We must look ahead and anticipate developments and changing conditions. With our dependence on exports we must keep all doors open and ensure that the most favourable conditions for multilateral trade are maintained. We must be constructive and ever mindful that we are on a course in our international trade relations which will contribute most effectively to our future economic growth.

I have spoken previously on the subject of regional developments in Europe, Mr. Chairman, but there are two points which I should like to make again at this time. The first is with regard to the common market and the E.F.T.A. group. Both have a collective obligation to ensure no less favourable access to their areas than previously existed. We will expect both groups to live up to this responsibility. The present negotiations with the common market on the level of the common tariff are approaching the final stages, and I am hopeful of a settlement which will be satisfactory from the Canadian point of view.

The emergence of both these communities will mean that we may have to make some adjustments in the pattern of our trade with Europe. On the other hand, in the expectation that our access will generally be not less favourable than before, and provided that, collectively, their trade policies will be outward looking, we need not be pessimistic about the growth of trade opportunities for Canada. Certainly our export results in Europe have been favourable to date.

The second point I wish to make is that we are about to enter the main round of tariff negotiations at the conference in Geneva, which will provide Canada with an opportunity to obtain better tariff access to markets throughout the world, including both the United States and the common market. This is another important step in the direction which this government intends to maintain for the betterment of our exports.

Finally, we have the possibility that the United Kingdom will become more closely associated with the common market. We have no clear indication as yet as to what may come out of the British initiative. However, we have indicated to the United Kingdom authorities the importance we attach to duty free and unrestricted entry to the British market for industrial materials and agricultural products, as well as to the preferences we enjoy, particularly in certain manufactured products. I can assure the house that this matter is being followed closely, and that we will see to it that no opportunity is lost to safeguard our commercial interests in whatever arrangement may eventually emerge.

It is essential to the objectives of the department that we seek continually to extend our knowledge of supply conditions in Canada, to widen our industrial contacts and to search for products and services which can be exported. These are the primary functions of our commodity branch which, by active liaison with industry, develops a continuing exchange of commercial intelligence between posts abroad and industry in Canada. Active trade promotion programs carried on by this arm of the department have achieved success in many different directions.

We have placed sustained emphasis on the promotion of Canadian consulting engineering and construction services in foreign markets. Opportunities in markets abroad have been widened considerably for groups of Canadian consulting engineers through direct contacts arranged by the department with the international bank in Washington and the United Nations special fund in New York. This approach has resulted in an increase in exports of Canadian equipment, machinery and services. Noteworthy among these items has been equipment incorporating highly advanced design, such as telecommunications equipment, cargo aircraft, air navigation equipment and various types of automation equipment.

Let me just mention several notable successes. Specialty printing papers have been introduced into Australia, South Africa and Mexico, and fir plywood into western Germany. Gratifying results have also been obtained in stimulating increased timber sales in the United Kingdom. Substantial gains have taken place in exports of chemicals, metals and minerals. Encouraging results have recently been experienced in the promotion of manufactured consumer goods, particularly to the United Kingdom, in the wake of relaxed import controls.

Success continues to attend efforts of Canadian industry to re-establish itself in the United Kingdom market following the removal of import restrictions in 1959. Due to quality and design of the goods offered, excellent results have been achieved in the sale of synthetic and cotton fabrics, high-styled clothing for men and women, slippers, moccasins and jewelry. A concentrated effort is being launched by the Canadian food processing industry following the Canadian food trade mission to the United Kingdom last autumn. Very substantial sales of livestock and poultry products have been realized by our trade missions, and following visits to Canada by foreign trade delegations. The Latin American countries are showing a renewed interest in Canada as a source of supply.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to turn now to the domestic market. For a number of years after the war Canadian producers faced a minimum of competition in our home markets. In fact Canadian goods, both primary and manufactured, were shipped to markets all over the world. In more recent years, however, Canadian producers have faced increasing competition both at home and abroad. The reason is that countries which until recently were markets for our products have completely recovered from the devastation of war and are now producing goods of excellent quality and design which sell at competitive prices.

This increase in competition has not always meant that we have lost markets, but it does mean that Canadian industry, in order to retain its markets, must also turn out goods of high quality and design at competitive prices.

To accomplish this task there must be co-operation among labour, management and government. All our energies must be directed to improving our competitive position. We must not dissipate our strength in internal disputes and strife.

To a very large extent the recovery of industry in Europe and Japan is directly attributable to the close co-operation of labour and management in those countries. This co-operation has been so effective that industry in these countries is now producing some of the best goods in the world, at prices which are extremely competitive.

The government has taken the lead in assiting Canadian industry to adjust to these changing conditions. Under the auspices of the departments of trade and commerce and labour, leaders of Canadian industry and commerce and top union officials were called to Ottawa recently to discuss ways of achieving greater co-operation in Canadian industry as an effective means of increasing Canadian output and improving our competitive position.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Does the house give unanimous consent to the minister continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hees: I appreciate that, Mr. Chairman. It will not take very long.

Mr. Hellyer: If the minister injects his usual enthusiasm into his statement.

Mr. Hees: There was general agreement at that meeting that Canadian labour, management and government could work together to achieve the same results. Labour, management, government, and the general public are also combining their efforts through the national productivity council. The council has been meeting regularly and is developing an active program to assist Canadian industry in a variety of fields which will improve its ability to sell its goods in both home and overseas markets. The chief objective of the council is to lend every assistance to Canadian industry in increasing its productive efficiency. The council is now enlisting the support of regional and provincial groups in order to carry this work to all parts of Canada.

At the same time we have established new services in the department and have expanded a number of our existing facilities in order to assist Canadian industry in meeting the new challenges which it faces. Over the last year we have built up a strong domestic commerce service whose function it is to provide assistance to industry over a wide range of the production and distribution aspects of business. We are now in a position to give information and help on such important subjects as product design, financing, new product possibilities, industrial development, distribution, sources of material, industrial standards, production under licensing arrangements and managerial and technical training and education. This is not by any means an exhaustive list. It is, however, indicative of the comprehensive services which we are developing to help Canadian business and industry.

Rapidly changing economic conditions have often posed difficulties for small businessmen. The government has recognized these difficulties and has taken steps to assist businessmen in overcoming them. A small business branch was established in the department to provide a focal point where the small business man could come to discuss his problems and obtain assistance and advice.

As I have often stressed, Mr. Chairman, we place very great importance on good design as one means of making Canadian goods as competitive as possible. With this in mind a national design branch has recently been established in the department. The function of this branch is to encourage the improvement of design in Canada, and to foster an awareness of the importance of good Canadian design. We have also introduced legislation providing for the establishment of a national design council.

The department has been increasingly active during the past year in the field of industrial development. The industrial development branch has increased its activities in new plant establishment, production expansion, product diversification, licensing arrangements, and other aspects of industrial development. It has also given valuable assistance to Canadian manufacturers in uncovering new markets for their products in Canada. Industrial development is further stimulated through special capital cost allowances administered by the department. In all these endeavours the department is working very closely with the provincial department of trade and industry.

Another arm of the department is the dominion bureau of statistics. I need hardly remind hon. members that the bureau is acknowledged the world over as one of the foremost organizations in its field. During the past year it has kept pace with many complicated and highly technical developments. Its functions in providing statistical information and analyses have been widened and improved in response to demand. Its services to governments, industry and business in our country have been of incalculable value.

The most formidable task which faces the bureau this year is, of course, the 1961 census, which will be taken on June 1 next. This will be the tenth decennial census of Canada since confederation. The results of the census will provide a valuable national inventory of information on the composition of our population, the types of homes in which we live, the area and type of agricultural operations, and the size and nature of trade and service establishments operating in Canada. With the advantage of this up-to-date information about ourselves and our country we shall be better able to gauge our capabilities in meeting the challenges on the economic front which lie ahead.

In conclusion may I say this. It has been a very full year for the Department of Trade and Commerce, a year of growth, of change and of achievement. We have made a contribution in the development of many new and important forces designed to strengthen our economy, expand production and increase employment in Canada. We have carried out organizational and administrative changes within the department which will ensure that we shall continue to provide the most efficient possible service to Canadian business and industry.

We find ourselves in the midst of a highly competitive and rapidly changing world economy. We face new and serious problems which must and will be overcome. At the same time we have great natural wealth, many natural advantages and, most important of all, the energy and the determination for great accomplishment. Our economic situation at home and our trading relations abroad are under continuous and expert vigilance.

To those Canadian firms and salesmen who have demonstrated their competitive ability in foreign markets and who have co-operated so fully with us, I extend my thanks and my congratulations. I urge them to keep up the good work and to exert their influence on their less progressive fellows. To the men and women of the department, I offer my appreciation for their devotion and for a job well done. To all Canadians who require help or guidance in the commercial field, I hold out an invitation. The Department of Trade and Commerce is at your service.

Mr. Carter: I am sure we have all listened with a great deal of interest to the minister's presentation of the estimates of his department before this committee. The hon. gentleman spoke rapidly—almost too fast for me to take the notes I would like to have taken —but if I heard him correctly it appears to me that the statement he has just made invites some criticism because of its very serious omissions.

Before proceeding to criticize the minister's statement, however, I should like to extend my congratulations to him on his promotion to the very important department over which he now presides, and to wish him well in his new field of endeavour. The fact that foreign trade accounts for no less than 25 per cent of the jobs available to Canadians emphasizes the importance of the minister's department and places it, in my opinion, in the same category as the departments of finance and defence. I also would like to pay tribute to the minister's staff, from the deputy minister down, and in particular to the hon. gentleman's executive assistant, whose tireless efforts and devotion to duty must be a great source of inspiration to the minister.

The minister is a very optimistic person. He exudes optimism everywhere he goes. He looks on the bright side, and I think he sometimes gets carried away by this optimism to the extent that his perspective becomes a little distorted and he conveys the impression that there is no side to the picture other than the side which he himself is engaged in portraying. It is the function of the opposition to bring this picture back into proper focus. We must not allow ourselves to be blinded by the brightness of the picture which the minister has painted today.

The hon. gentleman has told us of higher exports, lower imports, lower trade deficits. That all sounds very well, but when we come to look at Canada's trade performance on a world scale we find that the picture is not nearly so encouraging. I have some figures which have been taken from the international financial statistics, dated April, 1961, which give values in millions of United States dollars, and the extract I have here is from pages 36 and 37. I should like permission to have this table printed in Hansard, but I should also like to read one or two figures from it. I think it would be better for individuals studying this debate to have the table printed as I have it here.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Will the hon. member advise the Chair as to where the table originated?

Mr. Carter: I thought I had made that clear. The figures are taken from the international financial statistics of world trade.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Has the hon. member permission of the committee to have this table printed in Hansard?

Mr. Hees: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The table referred to above is as follows:]

CANADIAN AND WORLD EXPORTS
(Millions U.S. Dollars)

	1958	1959	per cent incr.	Jan.-Sept. 1960	per cent incr.
World exports	96,080	101,780	5.9 per cent	111,300*	9.3 per cent
Canadian exports	5,386	5,652	4.9 per cent	5,767	2.3 per cent

*Seasonally adjusted at annual rates.
Source: International financial statistics, April 1961, World Trade: Value in millions of U.S. Dollars, pages 36-37.

Mr. Carter: This table shows that in 1958 world exports amounted to $96,080 million. In 1959 they went up to $101,780 million, an increase of 5.9 per cent. During that same period Canada's exports went up by 4.9 per cent, so that we did not maintain our position; we fell behind the rate of growth in world exports during that period. If we take the period January to September, 1960, and I have figures for only that period, we find that world exports went up to $111,300 million U.S. dollars, an increase of 9.3 per cent, while Canada's exports went up only 2.3 per cent. Therefore we are not holding our own in the world's markets because our increase in world trade want down from 4.9 per cent in 1959 to 2.3 per cent in the period up to September, 1960. When we compare the increase of 2.3 per cent in Canadian exports with the 9.3 per cent increase in world exports, we see that Canada is failing to keep pace with the increase in world trade.

The minister referred to the higher exports to our overseas markets, and it seems to me he was making a virtue of necessity because he failed to mention that the economies of overseas markets are experiencing an unprecedented boom which puts them in a position to buy more goods and thus increase their imports. On the other hand, Canada has been experiencing a kind of recession, and this puts us in an unfavourable position as far as imports are concerned. I do not think it is far fetched to allege that these two factors are in some way related to what appeared to be an overly bright picture of Canada's performance in the world export market and the improvement so far as Canadian imports are concerned.

Therefore my first criticism of the minister's statement is that it did not give us the complete picture. I think at a time like this we must be honest with ourselves and with the Canadian people and not try to create an impression of optimism and well-being that may not be completely justified by the facts.

My second criticism of the minister's statement is that he said nothing at all about the deficit in what we call invisible exports, and that is the major part of our overseas trade deficit problem. I would be one of the first to admit that items such as interest, dividends and insurance possibly come within the realm of fiscal policy, but they also affect the minister's department and he must work out his policies in conjunction with those of his colleagues and try to do something about this problem of the invisible exports.

There is one matter about which I think a great deal could be done, and that is the imbalance on our tourist trade. I do not have the exact figures, but I think last year that imbalance amounted to about a quarter of a billion dollars. Although it does involve the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, yet here again is a matter for collaboration among the minister and his colleagues to try to work out some solution to this problem. A more vigorous sales promotion of the goods we produce has, according to the minister, produced favourable results, and surely it is not outside our capacity or ingenuity to devise some method of promoting and increasing our tourist trade.

The third criticism I have to offer is that the statement of policy given by the minister today did not indicate any appreciation of the kind of world we are living in and the forces which are influencing our relationships, and particularly our trade relationships, with other countries and are going to influence them a great deal more in the future. I think the minister caught the imagination of the Canadian people with his conference of trade commissioners, and also with his follow-up provincial conference for trade promotion. The minister brought his commissioners here, as well as businessmen. They pooled their ideas and explored prospects. They got a pep talk from the minister, I am told, and were sent back to work harder and harder to promote sales. No one will deny that this in itself is good, but I think the question we must ask ourselves is whether it is sufficient.

It seems to me that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is somewhat in the position of a general. He has his intelligence service; he has his commissioners who are his reconnaissance troops; he has his captains of industry, and he has his little army of merchandisers. A good general not only has a good plan of action but also briefs his troops. As members of the house representing the people I think today the minister should have briefed us and the Canadian people generally more fully on the facts of life in the field of world trade.

What is Canada's position in a rapidly changing world? What are the forces influencing our trade efforts? What should be our plan of action taking all these factors into consideration? I think the first step that should be taken is self-examination. We profess to believe in a system of free enterprise and, in fact, we are not a state trading nation. Most of our deals with other countries are carried out between individuals. We have developed a system which has operated on the belief that out of the competitive efforts of individuals all striving to get the best for themselves will come the greatest efficiency; that the weak will go to the wall and the strongest and most efficient will survive, resulting in the greatest good for the greatest number.

There is no doubt that the free enterprise system we have built up has developed some great advantages. It has developed some good qualities in the individuals who are engaged in business; qualities of alertness, imagination, courage, endurance, initiative and responsibility, skill, flexibility and determination, and that is all to the good. It has also produced great material benefits in the form of inventions, manufacturing processes, jobs in the development of resources and the harnessing of power.

But we must not permit these advantages to blind us to any weaknesses that may be inherent in our system, and it cannot be denied that weaknesses do exist; because against the benefits I have mentioned we must set a list of less happy results. We know that good, sound businesses have sometimes been destroyed and that workers have been exploited. We have had walk-outs, strikes and the bitterness that results from them. We have sometimes had bad goods and sometimes when shortages were in sight we have had unwarranted stockpiling regardless of the needs of other people, with the result that production has slowed down elsewhere for lack of the materials lying unused in frozen stockpiles.

We hear sometimes of price conspiracies and conspiracies to restrict competition. We have had some examples of that in the electrical industries south of the border. There was also a report in the papers last night of something similar in the drug industry. In addition, sometimes the opposite occurs; surplus goods are flooded on the market regardless of the damage that may be done at home or abroad.

These weaknesses must be corrected if we are going to withstand the forces that we shall have to contend with in the future. I think they have developed mainly because we have had no goal outside of our own self-interest. We have been engaged in developing what has been called the affluent society, and once we have created this affluent society we somehow bend our efforts mainly toward preserving it and increasing the affluence. In other words we become security minded, and we tend to lose the driving forces, the skill, determination and initiative that created this society in the first place.

I think the irony of this situation is that once a certain stage has been reached, free enterprise people themselves clamour for government interference which in the end must destroy some of their liberties. Every time the government passes a law some individual liberty or freedom is interfered with.

For a general to encourage his troops to go out and work harder doing the same things may not help to solve our problem. I think the minister is to be commended for the emphasis he has placed on taking responsibilities. If I have read the reports of his activities correctly, I take it that he has encouraged individual businessmen to assume more responsibility for the nation and for the welfare of our economy. But I think we must go beyond that, because what we do will be determined by the goals we have in mind. We need new goals now, new motives and a new direction, because the affluent society as an end in itself does not satisfy human aspirations and the longing in human hearts. The individual businessman must have a broader and more far-reaching aim than simply running a smoothly operating enterprise purely for the purpose of making a profit or getting ahead of his competitors. If he continues to be dominated by these motives he will in the end be destroyed. We must have new, specific and overriding purposes which will govern our policies and our practices.

Yesterday our leader set forth some of these goals. The Liberal party has always stood for the freest trade possible consistent with our national security. This, he pointed out, is to be achieved not overnight but under a long, well planned program, step by step. He suggested, as a first step, that we try to work toward an Atlantic trading community.

That point was very well developed yesterday and other speakers will be developing it still further today, so I shall pass on to another point which I think should have been included in the minister's statement. The minister gave no indication today that our national security and survival depend practically as much on his department as on the Department of National Defence. We cannot separate our security from our trading activities. I feel it would have been wise if today the minister had given a much fuller outline of the forces that are at work in this part of the field of world trade.

He mentioned the emergence of trading blocs, the inner six and the outer seven, and this situation, too, will be further developed by other speakers from our party. However, he did not mention the fact that trading and industry today are a battleground in the struggle for world domination. If we are going to develop a plan we must take that into consideration. The minister did not make any reference to it at all.

We have had some very stirring examples of what is happening in this economic battleground. Russia has developed a well thought out and well integrated program which contains four points. The first point is an intensive industrial expansion inside the Soviet bloc itself. A measure of that expansion can be seen when we realize that in 1927 Russia produced only 3 per cent of world production, whereas in 1955 she produced 20 per cent and doubtless today it is much higher than that.

The second point in that program is industrial sabotage in the industrialized countries of the west. We have seen some examples of that. The third point is a selective disruption of normal trading relations of the free world. We have had examples of that, the tendency of the Soviet union to weld its satellites into an economic bloc with an economy complementary to its own.

Perhaps I might just mention one example. In 1957 there was a world surplus of tin. Russia is a great importer of tin and buys a great deal of it from red China. When we have a situation in which there is a surplus of a product, as there was with tin, we would normally expect a country to buy that product. What did Russia do? Instead of buying and stockpiling tin at that time, Russia sold between 10,000 and 11,000 tons of tin at a price lower than the world market. By so doing Russia disrupted the economies of Bolivia, Malaya and Nigeria, as well as other countries. This is the sort of thing we must expect on a much more intensive scale in the future.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, if we are going to successfully meet that kind of challenge we must develop a well co-ordinated plan. I think the first part of that plan should be concentration on building up trade with countries whose economies are complementary to our own. We have certain economies very close to us. We have the West Indies Federation, and it was a great disappointment to me that the minister did not even mention that country during his presentation today.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if I might call it one o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired in any event. If the committee wishes to give leave to the hon. member to continue after we resume on the ground that he is the chief or leading critic of the opposition, that can be done now. Would the committee give its consent to permitting the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, this morning the minister outlined certain actions which his department had taken to improve our world trade position. In reply I pointed out the fact that trade and industry are now a battleground in the struggle for world domination and that further action was essential based on that consideration. In order to be successful such action must have a global purpose, a global strategy and involve total commitment.

As a first step I suggested that, without diminishing our efforts elsewhere, we should place special emphasis on developing economic ties with those countries whose economies were complementary to our own. I then cited the British West Indies Federation as an example and expressed disappointment that in his presentation the minister had made no mention of trade possibilities with these countries.

The British West Indies Federation and the Caribbean area have been a market for salt cod for over 200 years and for that reason are of special interest to the Atlantic provinces, and in particular to my own province of Newfoundland. I am informed that this market has seriously deteriorated during recent months owing for the most part to the inability of Cuba to purchase our salted fish products. In this connection I call to the minister's attention the fact that one of the most glaring omissions in his presentation this morning was his failure to give the committee a progress report on our trade relations with Cuba. While I am on the subject of omissions, may I also mention his failure to make any reference to uranium contracts. I do not intend to take the time of the committee to dwell on these subjects because they will be dealt with by my colleagues.

To come back to the subject of fish markets in the British West Indies and in the Caribbean area, I remind the minister that fish exporters now claim that the abolition of NAFEL has handicapped their marketing efforts. I have never held any particular brief for NAFEL. It had many features which did not appeal to me personally. Nevertheless it had a purpose to fulfil. If it had not had a purpose to fulfil, it would never have been created. It now seems that the mistake has been not so much the abolition of NAFEL as the failure to put any other organization in its place.

Before I leave the subject of the British West Indies may I remind the minister also that the selling of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships fleet now also seems to have been a mistake. These ships were not costing Canada very much. The continuance of the link they provided between the British West Indies and Canada, at a time when these countries are coming together in a political federation and are trying to integrate their economies, would have well repaid the small deficits the country incurred on their behalf.

As a second step in this plan of action I suggest that some means should be developed in order to protect Canada from economic aggression and penetration. Also, on the world scale, there is a need for a body to be organized as a sort of counterpart of NATO in the economic field in order to help countries resist economic penetration and to offset any efforts that might be made to disrupt their economies such as those I mentioned this morning with reference to the Soviet purchase and disposal of tin when there was a world surplus.

Lest my C.C.F. friends misunderstand what I am proposing I should like to make it clear that I am not advocating state planning. What I am suggesting is voluntary planning by free people within the country and under government leadership and direction and, among the nations of the world, voluntary association on the part of free nations which have come together to plan with a common goal and a common purpose.

This will no doubt involve some painful decisions on the part of different industries, different sectors of the economies of the countries involved and on the part of individual countries in their relations with one another. However, on our capacity to rise above self-interest and accept this challenge may depend our survival as free men and free nations.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, to this House of Commons and to the people in general all departments of government are important, but I do not think I will be challenged when I say that in my estimation one of the most important departments of government is that the estimates of which are now before us, the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Canada is rather unique in the world. She is a country which is, I believe, almost 4,000 miles in breadth, extends from the joint U.S.-Canadian border up to the Arctic circle, is one of the wealthiest countries in the world in natural resources, is one third larger in territory than the United States, has a population of 18 million, and whose maintaining the second highest standard of living in the world is dependent upon the fact that we are an export nation.

That is why I say that the estimates we have before us now are from a department of the utmost importance. We listened this morning to a quite comprehensive statement by the minister. He undoubtedly gave us some interesting information and statistics. I must say that in my opinion a general analysis of the statement given by the minister is that it was tempered in a manner which gave a rosy hue to the export-import picture as far as our country is concerned. Because of that I must admit I was a little disappointed in the approach of the minister.

Over the years I have often heard it said that the difference between a statesman and a politician is that a statesman has read a book. I do not agree with that interpretation. I think the right definition is that a statesman says what has to be said, whereas a politician says that which he thinks will meet with the approval of his party and the people.

There are times when a tough decision has to be made. I am afraid the minister did not make that decision in his remarks this morning. He presented rather, a picture of the past and statistics, instead of what is now required from a statesman, an analysis of our present situation.

We should have been given an analysis of the possibilities, potentialities, problems and dangers of the future and how Canada, as an export nation, is going to face up to those problems, potentialities and, I am going to say, dangers.

I admit that the minister did mention some of these things, but I think the emphasis was on the wrong place. Naturally we are all very happy to receive any and all reports from the minister as to any progress that has been made, or any change that has been made to bring our trade into balance as between exports and imports.

However, I do feel it is imperative that we have on the part of the minister and the government, of which the hon. gentleman is a distinguished member, a recognition of the difficulties which we face. The statistics, as rosy as he can make them, do not take care of the 700,000 or 800,000 unemployed persons in Canada. Because of the situation in our Canadian economy, with that number of unemployed, statistics are not enough. We need an enunciation of policies that will put every Canadian to work. Canada is an export nation, and we need at least an outline as to the real and serious danger that we face today, or we will face tomorrow, because of the growing number of economic trading blocs, the inner six and the outer seven, and because of what must now be recognized in the economic cold war, which is not only being threatened by the Soviet bloc but of which we have already seen many instances in these past 18 months.

Therefore with that grave and serious responsibility, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has to face not only the situation in Canada, with its present high unemployment, but the economic cold war, the establishment of trading blocs, and the increased efficiency and automation which is going on in other countries of the world with whom we have to compete. If Canada does not compete, our economy will come very close to collapse.

Interesting as the minister's remarks were, it was that kind of emphasis, that kind of truthfulness to the Canadian people that I hoped he would express when he opened vote No. 1 this morning.

We are facing difficult problems; there is no question about that. Nobody in Canada wants to see a reduction in our standard of living. Everybody wants to see full employment. I am afraid that very often we members of the House of Commons—I include all hon. members—are not honest enough with the Canadian people in giving them the true picture that we, as an export nation, face in world affairs today.

I feel this is a responsibility that many of us do not accept to the degree and depth that we should, because unfortunately too many of us are more interested in saying things which we consider necessary.

With the establishment of the trading blocs, and perhaps more to come, the recovery of the nations of the world from the impact and holocaust of the last world war, the efficiency and automation that is going on at a more rapid pace outside Canada than it is here, there has to be a recognition that we can only maintain our status and standards by an understanding among government, management and labour. We must produce goods of quality and in a quantity to supply our consumption needs. If we fail to meet competition from abroad because of poor production efficiency and lack of co-operation by all sectors of our industry the consequences will be serious to all concerned.

As I have already said, I think that in view of the world situation in trade and commerce an increased investment in the services of the trade commissioners of the department is imperative. I heard with great regret only the other day some of the most experienced and efficient trade commissioners in the department have either left or are leaving the service at the very time when we are in greatest need of their knowledge, experience and brains. Because of their experience and their contacts they are being bought up by free enterprise in Canada, the offers made being so fantastic that despite the loyalty of these men and their love of the service they cannot reject them. I am very sorry to hear this, because if ever there was a time when we need the services of these men it is right now and in the days and years that lie ahead.

I sincerely hope the Minister of Finance is not being penny wise and pound foolish; I hope a policy of that kind has not been responsible for what occurred. Private industry may need these trained men but Canada needs them even more in these days of competition. I know the government cannot match some of the offers which have been made by free enterprise, but something more could surely be done. In the last two years it has been my privilege to meet a good many of these trade commissioners in their posts throughout the world. I think I know of their love of the service and their loyalty to it, and I have no hesitation in saying that money spent to hold these men in the service of Canada is money well spent and its provision would be supported, I am sure, by the Canadian people if the picture were made clear to them.

A few years ago when I was in provincial politics and came within one elected member of being a premier, somebody said to me "You are an electrician. What are you going to do?" I said "Hire the brains and pay for them." I think that is a good practice in government as well as in free enterprise. As I say, we have serious problems before us. We shall require clear headed and sensible thinking if we are to face up to what is developing throughout the world in the export field. The government, as well as all hon. members of this committee, will realize the complexities of this problem. They will realize that as individuals, or as groups of individuals in industry, we cannot put selfish interest before the good of Canada as a whole. This is definitely one of the problems involved in government policy inasmuch as we want protectionism at home sometimes in relation to certain industries while failing to recognize that since our economy is mainly based on export we cannot export unless we import. If we are going to be paid for export in Canadian dollars we have to import, too, whether we like it or not, rough as that may be. I have no hesitation in saying that we are not explaining this sufficiently to the Canadian people so that they may realize that individual or partisan interests must depend upon policies designed for the benefit of Canada as a whole. I have said this outside the house and I have no hesitation in saying it here.

I have until this moment been speaking in generalities, but, I hope it will be recognized sincerely and on broad principles. Much more has got to be done in the future, even if it is admitted that everything possible has been done in the past by the minister and by the Department of Trade and Commerce. We must intensify our work and effort. We must not only draw attention to those things which are rosy; we must also point out the difficulties and shortcomings which are of a serious nature and try to figure out how to correct the situation. Perhaps we have failed in the past. Let us, then, do something different in the future.

I understand that over the last four months the minister has received a somewhat voluminous correspondence from British Columbia, from a firm which has been and which still is, I think, one of the major exporters of timber from my province. I, also, have received correspondence. It disturbed me and intrigued me so much that when I was last in Vancouver I made an appointment to see the president and the executive officers of this company, and asked them to produce the material in front of me. I regret I have not had the opportunity of checking completely the information given me, but the minister can challenge it if he has found it to be incorrect.

Accepting the statistics which have been provided me, it would appear that until about five years ago Canada used to enjoy about a 50 per cent share in the sawn lumber, logs, poles and pilings imported into Japan from North America. However, the figures for exports of these materials in the five years ending in 1960 show a different picture. Of sawn lumber entering Japan from North America 11.9 per cent came from Canada and 88.91 per cent from the United States. Log exports from Canada dropped to 3.12 per cent compared with 96.8 per cent in the United States. Poles and pilings dropped to 10.51 per cent from Canada and 89.49 per cent from the United States. Information which I received in Vancouver indicated that in the first 10 months of 1960 sawn lumber exports from British Columbia to Japan were only 3.53 per cent of the exports from British Columbia and the United States Pacific states; that our exports of logs had dropped to 1.92 per cent. Our poles and pilings stayed fairly stable; they dropped from 10.51 per cent to 9.98 per cent.

I wish to make one point unmistakably clear. I am fully in support of the principle that Canada and British Columbia with their vast resources, should not have an economy in which we are hewers of wood and drawers of water. To the absolute extent possible we should process our own natural resources and not export our raw material. But, in the processing of our raw material, the timber of British Columbia, what has happened? If the information I have from this major exporter in British Columbia is correct, our sawn lumber exports to Japan which used to be 50 per cent, on a five-year average had dropped to 11.09 per cent and in the first 10 months of 1960, they were down to 3.53 per cent. I am certain that with the resources in timber which we have in British Columbia and the efficiency of our logging industry, we should be able to compete, but we have lost out.

Of course, it is important to know why we lost out, but what is more important is can we regain the market? I hope the minister will comment on this. However, there is also another point that I wish to raise, but in doing so I do not want to be misunderstood. If we can process our raw materials in Canada, let us do so. We must process. Secondary industry is a must. A manufactured product means a lot more to the economy of Canada and the standard of living of our people than exporting the raw goods and importing manufactured goods. But if there is a time when we cannot process the raw material and we cannot export and therefore the logs, let us say, are going to go to waste, then there is something wrong.

In those circumstances if because of provincial and federal responsibility a situation arises under which we would rather have the teredos eat up the logs in the water than export the logs, then there is something wrong. From the talk I had with the executive officials in Vancouver and from the large amount of correspondence I have had with different people concerned it is my understanding that because of certain regulations we would prefer to see the teredos attack the logs in the water than accept contracts from countries which would like to buy the logs. I am not speaking of our major timber, I am speaking of what is known in the terminology of the trade as short ends. I think my hon. friend from Kootenay West will tell me if I am wrong.

By reason of the provincial and federal responsibility we have this situation. There may be short end logs in the water. If a buyer in Japan, for example, should write to an exporting broker and ask him to fill an order he would be told that he cannot answer. Why can he not answer? He cannot answer because the regulation says that in order to get an export permit the logs must be in the water for no fewer than 60 days. There must have been a scaling 30 days before the expiration of the 60 days, and the logs must be offered to saw mills or pulp mills for purchase. Then, at the end of the 60 days and the 30 days scaling and two companies, the saw mills or the pulp mills, have rejected the offer to buy the short end logs for processing in British Columbia, they can then apply for an export permit.

Mr. Pugh: Will the hon. member permit a question for clarification? To my mind it is a provincial regulation. Is it in fact a provincial regulation that demands this?

Mr. Winch: There is a combination of the two. I have in front of me information having to do with the federal regulations. What I have just said applies to the federal regulation, but there is a combination of the two, and I tried to make that clear. That is why I think there has to be understanding and co-operation. But here is the point. When I was at the meeting of those forestry executives in Vancouver there were two offers which came from Japan that morning to buy millions of board-feet of those short end logs. I said to the president of that company, "What are you going to do with it?" He said, "I am going to turn them down." I said, "Why; are the logs not available?" He said, "There are whole booms of logs within three miles of where you are sitting. I cannot get them because they have to be 60 days in the water and scaled, and then I have to go to the saw mill companies and the pulp companies and get one of them interested enough to come down and say 'We will not buy'."

Under the circumstances this would mean work for the loggers of British Columbia. Those are logs which are going to be attacked by teredos; they will be attacked by teredos because that is the situation. I think this is a very serious situation. But the province of British Columbia does not want any change. In principle I can understand why. Let us process in our pulp mills and saw mills in British Columbia. But, Mr. Chairman, I ask this question and I hope the minister will comment on it. These logs are going to be attacked by toredos and once they are attacked by teredos they are no good for pulp and no good for saw mills. Why do we have to waste that natural resource; why do we have to leave these short ends on the ground or in the water, if nobody will process them in British Columbia or in Canada? Why do we have to say, "Let this natural resource rot" rather than get some return for it?

I hope this is understood by all hon. members. I repeat it the third time. I want the material to be processed in Canada. In circumstances such as these it would mean very much to our young men and much more to the British Columbia economy. Why do we have to retain provincially or federally this kind of regulation? Could something not be worked out to protect the processing in British Columbia and protect secondary industry also in that province?

With respect to the short ends left in the water or on the land when the good stuff is taken out, can a plan not be evolved whereby Canada will get a return from the export of these short ends instead of their being left for food for the teredos? There are some here who are well acquainted with the timber industry of British Columbia and they know how the teredos go to work on the logs in the booms in the ocean waters of British Columbia. I want to draw that particular point to the attention of the minister and ask for his comment thereon.

In particular, I want to draw to his attention the change not in the amount of our exports of sawn lumber, logs, poles and piling to Japan but rather the drop in the percentage we are able to export to that country compared with the amount exported by the United States. Something has gone wrong, and I draw this matter to the attention of the minister and ask that particular attention be paid to it.

In the matter of exports generally to the countries of the world, I feel quite certain that if the minister could have more men, retain his trained personnel and persuade the Minister of Finance that the expenditure of money to maintain and increase our exports is money well spent and directly or indirectly results in returns to our economy and the people of Canada, he would be able to bring about some improvement.

I conclude as I started by saying that I consider this department to be one of the most important departments of government and I hope the minister will be able to give us more information later as to how the problem facing us in going to be attacked. We will give him every assistance we can but where required we will also criticize.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, I am not as well prepared at this time to speak on this important subject as I should like to be and my remarks will be directed primarily toward problems that affect the area in which I live. First of all, I should like to extend to the minister my sincere congratulations and those of the people of the riding I represent for the splendid effort he is making in building up Canada's export market and also preserving our home market. As I said, I intend to deal more or less with local matters. I might say that in the area from which I come we grow a very large proportion of the tender fruits and vegetables that are grown in Canada and we also have more than 200 diversified industries. When I review these industries it surprises me to note the number of different types of industries we have. Some of them depend almost entirely on the export market, and I am thinking particularly of the pulp and paper industries of which we have several. We also have some industries which depend on both the export market and our own market and we have a very large number of small industries that depend almost entirely on the Canadian market.

For these reasons it can be seen that in my riding we depend very much on a balanced economy. We cannot afford to have too much in the way of imports come into the country because it may ruin industries that depend on the home market and yet we must not set up road-blocks that will interfere with our export market.

It would sometimes seem that the Customs Tariff and the provision respecting value for duty are regarded as bad words in this house but nevertheless these are two very important pieces of legislation in controlling our trade and commerce and they must be brought up to date from time to time. In reviewing the problems of our local industries one is often very much convinced that there is reason for changes in these measures. I might cite one instance that came to my attention a few weeks ago in connection with a plant that was established in our area in 1955 and started production in 1957. Many millions of dollars are involved in the building and machinery and the development that took place in order to get the plant into production. The industry in question has been able to supply its product to the Canadian trade and has also done a considerable amount of export business. The company produces a type of specialized fire brick. A considerable amount of reinforced steel is used in this production of the fire brick but the basic material required is magnesite ore.

I presume there is a lot of magnesite ore in Canada which may be suitable for this type of brick, but at the present time only two bodies of ore are in production and both are under the control of another company. The firm to which I refer is in the very unhappy and unfortunate position of having to pay a duty of 15 per cent on the raw material they bring into Canada while the finished fire brick is allowed to enter Canada duty free. There is a case where an industry is being penalized for being in business.

The point I should like to make is that there are many different items in our Customs Tariff that should be reviewed and changed. At the present time, unfortunately, practically all of these items are tied up under GATT and it is very difficult to get anything done. I might say that this industry flourished and did well. It supplied a very fine type of brick to such industries as the Steel Company of Canada, the Portland Cement Company and the International Nickel plants at Sudbury but today they find that a similar product is entering Canada from other countries duty free. This is affecting their sales and unless they receive some protection they are going to be out of business. I feel that trade and commerce is not only a matter of export but also a matter of our home market as well, and that is one of the problems I should like to place before the minister at this time.

There is also the question of value for duty purposes, something that is often debated in the house with some heat, but from my observations in connection with the values for duty on certain items coming into Canada I find that the values for duty on some goods are very unrealistic.

I might cite just one example, the matter of radio tubes. I mentioned this in the committee before, but I do not mind bringing it up again because I find the value for duty placed on these tubes coming in from a certain country is 29 and 31 cents whereas the value which has been arrived at in the country from which they come and used by the trade commissioner of that country is 60 cents. This represents a very unfair situation with which we in this country have to contend. I think that if our values for duty on imports from low wage countries were realistic, I do not mean the actual Canadian cost but the costs arrived at in the country in which they are made, we would find our imports from those countries would be very much higher than they are at the present time in dollar value.

This puts the Minister of Trade and Commerce at very great disadvantage. I hesitate to mention Japanese products, but that is one country I have in mind. We are told all the time that Japan is buying much more from us than we are buying from them. However, if a realistic value for duty were established on the goods coming into this country from Japan, I am sure the tables would be turned and we would be buying much more in dollar value from Japan.

There is another matter about which I am deeply concerned and that is that many of our industries in the Niagara peninsula have reached a point in their production where they can compete with the United States. Now, that is quite a statement to make but I know it is a fact in some cases. Many of these industries have built up quite a business with the United States. There is one practice in which the United States indulges, although I do not know whether or not they do it intentionally, and that is the changing of tariff regulations practically overnight.

I could cite the experience of one firm in this connection. This firm received a substantial contract from the United States. The goods were manufactured and a substantial shipment made. The firm received another big contract. The goods were made ready for shipment but instead of being shipped via Niagara Falls as they had been before they were put across the border at Detroit. The American customs appraiser at that point held up the shipment. Apparently he is a power unto himself because he increased the tariff from something like 30 per cent to about 45 per cent and told the company that if they did not want to accept his ruling they would have to appeal to Washington. In the meantime, the goods were held up at the border for three weeks and demurrage was paid on them. The decision of the appraiser at Detroit was confirmed. As a result this firm lost money instead of making a few dollars. This is a condition about which perhaps we cannot do anything, but I think it is a condition that should never be forgotten when we are dealing with the United States in matters of trade and commerce.

I am sure many hon. members will recall that a short time ago, almost overnight, the United States raised its tariff on bicycles imported from Canada from something like 30 per cent up to 50 per cent. This had a very vital effect on the Canadian bicycle industry.

I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a problem that is developing in Canada today in connection with not only our coastal shipping but also our lake shipping. We all know that Great Britain built up a tremendous world trade through having ships to take the goods to their destination. The condition in Canada today is deteriorating. Living along the banks of the Welland ship canal, as I do, I have noticed that the number of European ships going through the canal is increasing all the time. These ships are hauling freight at prices that Canadian ships cannot meet. I had the opportunity of visiting a British freighter last year, a 10,000 tonner, which was engaged in bringing cargo from South America. This vessel carried a crew of 40. There were five white officers and 35 Hindus who were paid $40 per month. They got their food and cooked it themselves. The agreement under which they were hired stipulated that they would sign up for three years and that they would be taken home at least once during those three years. This is a condition which we in Canada simply do not want to match.

We know that at the present time some Canadian vessels are being transferred to British registry, just as the Canada steamship lines are transferring some of their vessels to Bermuda registry. Scott Misener is considering action along the same lines. This type of thing could spread very rapidly and, in a short time, we could find we had very little in the way of Canadian shipping on our great lakes. This situation applies not only to lake vessels but also to vessels plying the St. Lawrence river and our coastal areas. I am greatly concerned about the transfer of these ships to foreign registry because I feel that should some world disturbance take place these foreign ships would be withdrawn from our service and we would not have any vessels with which to move our own goods. I feel this is a matter which the Minister of Trade and Commerce should take into consideration. If we are going to build ourselves up as a trading nation, then it seems to me imperative that we have a strong merchant fleet not only on the great lakes but also a fleet that would be capable of taking goods to practically all parts of the world. The situation is certainly not developing along those lines at the moment.

I have not got a great deal more to say, Mr. Chairman, but I should like to make some comment on a speech delivered by Mr. Coyne. If Mr. Coyne is on your side then he is your friend, but if he is against you then he is not. In this case, as always, I think his words are very true, and I should like to quote them:

> We cannot expect to go on indefinitely buying goods and services from abroad in amounts greatly in excess of our exports, that is, buying on credit on a scale which requires large further increases in our foreign debt.

Then, he goes on to say that corrections must be made and he concluded by saying:

> The sooner we can make substantial progress in this direction, the stronger and more secure will be our economic future and national integrity.

[Mr. Smith (Lincoln).]

We all know that our imbalance of trade, while it may have improved somewhat, is a matter that gives us a great deal of concern. The other day I saw some figures, and I probably cannot quote them exactly, which indicated that Great Britain purchased goods abroad to the extent of something like $54 per person per year; Germany, something like $46; the United States, $19 per person per year, and Canada, the small country that we are, was purchasing abroad about $275 worth of goods per person per year. These are figures which stagger all of us because, after all is said and done, running a country is just like running a business or a household. If you spend more than you bring in you are soon going to go broke.

This concludes my remarks at this time, Mr. Chairman and I hope I have contributed something of value toward this debate.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, it is generally conceded that Canada is going through a difficult period, more fundamental than a mere period of business recession. Were it not for the unusually large number of unemployed, the situation would not be so serious. However, we are confronted with this problem in which no one finds satisfaction; and as we analyse the causes we cannot help but point the finger to, at least as a contributing factor, the inability to maintain Canadian exports at a level which would ensure increased growth in the economy.

I have had occasion to say it before and I repeat that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, notwithstanding his industrious application to the job, which is commendable, has not been able to shake off the shackles of a tariff policy, imposed upon his department, which is not conducive to improving our trading position with other nations. I do not propose to repeat what I said here last Tuesday on the subject of tariffs. I shall, however, endeavour to indicate to the minister some of the reasons why I think we are suffering from competition in the markets of the world, the effects of which are plainly visible in our unemployment picture.

The first reason which comes to my mind is the government's attitude toward United States capital. The sport of giving United States investments another punch in the nose seems to be in some quarters as popular as ever. Indeed, some speakers seem to be forever dedicated to fostering animosity towards anything American, whether it is newspapers, telecasts, radio programs or capital investment. They do this in the name of rugged "Canadianism", perhaps not realizing that by doing so they are actually hurting themselves.

The president of the Royal Bank of Canada in a speech he delivered early in the year warned the Canadian people against what he called "The almost hysterical wave of sentiment against the import of foreign capital". Mr. Chairman, we cannot hope to expand our export business unless we have first sufficient capital to develop our primary industries. A case in point is a recent statement made by Mr. M. S. Fotheringham, president of Steep Rock Iron Mines, to the effect that it might be impractical for his company to proceed with developments at Lake St. Joseph without extensive financial backing from United States firms. This is a company which has been responsible for the export to the United States of more than 25 million tons of iron ore. The cost of the development of the Steep Rock Iron Range Mines, including the Caland Company of Cleveland ore deposits leased to that company by Steep Rock Iron Mines Ltd., was well in excess of $100 million. These ore bodies are continuously being subjected to progressive exploration. This gigantic enterprise would not have been possible without ample capital. I scarcely need to add, Mr. Chairman, that this mining operation has meant millions of dollars to the credit side of our exports. Contrary to the opinion of some people that investments in our primary industries especially from the United States are merely exploiting and are interested only in the accumulation of profits, I wish to quote from the annual statement of the company which reveals the fact that this mining project since commencement in 1945 has netted a profit of $60 million from all of which there was reinvestment in expansion and development, giving employment to hundreds of millions and not one cent has yet been paid in dividends to its shareholders. I may add that Canada expects to be exporting some 80 million tons a year of iron ore by 1975 and about 100 million by 1990. This is a statement also made by the president of Steep Rock Iron Mines.

United States investment in Canada is the story of a great contribution to the development of Canada which was made in the first instance at the instigation of private industry as well as at the invitation of the Canadian government of the day which was chiefly responsible for the great manufacturing facilities which provide most of our exports, outside of grain such as pulp and paper, nickel, aluminum, automobiles and parts and other products. Only yesterday, an account appeared in the Montreal Gazette which reported a substantial sale of car radios to the United States by R.C.A. Victor Co. Ltd., the Canadian company, designed and developed here in Canada. Incidentally, I may say that this company during the past three years has sold to the United States more than $4 million of technical equipment, and in competition with some of the largest manufacturers of electronic equipment in that country. It seems that this company policy of developing its own products has paid off and it should serve as an example to other manufacturers in adopting similar methods of enterprise.

Our economic ills have been dissected by several so-called experts. One of them, the governor of the Bank of Canada, made numerous pronouncements on the economic state of the nation. He has chosen several vehicles to launch his views. The latest was his appearance before the Senate manpower committee. According to reports, here again he was voicing the opinion that the Canadian people were living beyond their means. He pointed out that consumer debt of the Canadian public, once well below that of the United States in terms of personal income, was now almost at the same level. If he had said that we are living beyond our means in the sense that we are importing more goods in terms of dollars and cents than we are exporting, I would go along with him. But I am not of the belief that we are living beyond our means when we spend our money on goods manufactured here in Canada.

What created the prosperity and high standard of living which those of us who are employed are privileged to enjoy, is made possible precisely by the spending of the people in purchasing automobiles, appliances, better housing accommodation, clothing, furniture and a host of other commodities. Our banks and finance companies, in the majority of cases, provided the credit to finance these purchases which in turn created prosperity and not depression.

Contrary to the old fashioned thinking of putting your pennies into a sock and burying it for a rainy day, I believe that employment and a higher standard of living can be achieved in direct proportion to the velocity or speed of circulation which our currency attains and the revolving of credit.

The No. 1 objective—and I am sure it is the aim of the minister—is to trade with every country willing to trade with us on a reciprocal basis and remove the obstacles of unfair tariffs with nations who are buying more from us than we are buying from them.

While speaking on the amendment to the supply motion last Tuesday evening I gave credit to the minister for the trade commissioners' conference which he promoted last January. By way of suggestion I wish to bring to his attention that the department of commerce of the United States have arranged for exporters to explain to small businessmen and manufacturers how to break into the export market.

The exporters will explain to these groups how it might benefit them to work together. They will also offer to act as consultants and brokers, cutting through red tape and making contact with buyers.

The department of commerce of the United States has also quietly lifted a 20-year old ban on publication of who receives export licences for the shipment of critical materials to foreign nations. Exporters encouraged continuation of the practice, which dates from world war II, because I presume they did not want competitors to know who their foreign customers were. Here, perhaps, is something our own government should look into and cut all the possible barriers to markets abroad.

However, the problem of export trade cannot be solved by any single remedy. There are many sides to the question and these should be examined. I propose to suggest ways which may be found worthy of consideration by the government.

Let us take a look at what is happening in some of the major trading nations of the world. Let us first take Japan as an example. We think of Japan as a country of 90 million people all busy making cheap goods to dump on world markets. It is a comparatively small country with a very small agricultural area. The Japanese cultivate every inch of it that will grow anything; but the area is pitifully small to feed 90 million people.

Japan must therefore import 40 per cent of her food or her people will starve. To make matters worse, she lacks raw materials. She imports iron ore, nickel, chromium and copper from Canada for her industries, and wheat for the major part of her food.

Japan must pay Canadian currency for the wheat and raw materials she imports from Canada. To earn Canadian dollars she must sell something to Canada. Without natural resources she can sell only the products of her factories. In other words, there has to be a two-way trade in order that other nations may do business with us.

The objection to this is that we import things that could be manufactured here. But can we not benefit more by selling that which we can produce better, and in abundance, in exchange for things which Japan may be better equipped to provide our markets?

We can honestly say competition for Canadian manufactured goods has been brought about not by the wish of the Japanese but by the sheer necessity of their so doing, or starving.

Let us take a look at Belgium. The Belgian government has a set policy of encouraging new industry to start new factories by giving land free. Local taxes are waived for a period of years; loans are made available at 2 per cent interest. Therefore, if we look at the cost factors of Belgian goods, the principal factors are ample, low cost capital and free land. Also government income tax on corporations or businesses averages 28 per cent, against our 52 per cent. It is no wonder that Belgian goods are cheaper than Canadian in the world markets.

Customers in foreign markets are like people anywhere; they do not like to pay for goods until they receive them, and they like to buy on long term credit. I understand it is not uncommon to receive payment for goods as long as six months after they have been shipped. However, you have to pay before shipment for the raw materials that you use and, of course, the wages of the people who made the goods. To do this you have to borrow from a bank, and the interest on bank loans is today 6 per cent or 6½ per cent.

What has made possible the spectacular German recovery? It is generally conceded that one of the major factors in her favour was the establishment of a government agency to loan money to exporters at an interest rate of 3 per cent. Therefore the German car manufacturers and other exporters always have a 3 per cent advantage over Canadians.

Germany also has what is called a turnover tax of 4 per cent. For example, if company A sells steel to company B to make parts for company C, according to German tax law there would be a 4 per cent tax on the goods between company A and B and again between B and C.

However, if all three companies were owned by one organization there would be no tax. I would not advocate that this simple method be copied in Canada; I mention it only to show that by this method the German government forces integration of operations, on the theory that large volume production is cheaper than small volume operations.

This is quite in contrast with the policy of our government. We have a market of only one fifth that of Germany, and we have a so-called anti-monopoly law which tends to prevent companies from growing into large economic units. As a consequence we are forced into higher costs than those which face our German competitors.

I now wish to say a word on how France has effected her recovery. She has done so by the simple expediency of lowering the value of the French franc, as compared to other currencies, by 17 per cent. This means that French industries, through no effort of their own, are able to sell their goods 17 per cent below their former prices in world markets, and former exporters to France find their goods 17 per cent more expensive when imported into France. The result has been a tremendous boom in French industry and her economy generally. Her unemployment has never been lower than in recent years. This was happening while the value of the Canadian dollar was up on a high perch, favouring imports rather than exports.

In an address delivered to the Rotary club of Port Colborne, Mr. A. C. Rae, vice president of marketing, Atlas Steel Limited, said this among other things:

> Government has an essential function in this program. Government at all levels must be the fact-gathering agent which supplies accurate information from which private enterprise can decide what areas of development will give continuing full employment. Government must also take the lead by getting the various self-interest groups together and helping them to understand the over-all needs of our country. Government also must take the action needed in establishing the domestic policies and international agreements which are required to accomplish the combined goals set for itself by private enterprise.

I express the hope that the minister will give serious study to some of these practices which are successfully being used by other nations in the promotion of international trade. There can be no doubt that by combining our material resources with our manufacturing skills and by supplementing them with our agricultural production we can develop an integration of effort that will employ all available Canadians and create the needed job opportunities for our expanding labour force.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, during the last ACFAS convention held at the University of Montreal, a resolution was passed unanimously asking the federal government to establish a committee formed of experts in various fields—science, trade, engineering, administration—which would consider the methods of gradually introducing the metric system in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, these past few years the metric system has been used increasingly in Canada, more especially in the scientific field. It is known, for instance, that the Department of Fisheries, in its work, as well as in its publication, The Journal of the Fisheries Research of Canada, has been using this system of measurement exclusively. Moreover, at the outset of the work on the continental shelf project it was decided to use only the metric system. Finally, since the beginning of 1960, two of the most important geographical Canadian magazines, La Revue Canadienne de géographie and Les Cahiers de géographie de Québec have decided to use the metric system on an exclusive basis. In the geographical branch itself, although the metric system is not used as a matter of course by all geographers, it is nevertheless used by those who co-operate in the continental shelf project.

On January 1st last, England and all the overseas territories coming under its jurisdiction adopted the centigrade degrees to measure temperature. This change applies not only to the scientific field but also to everyday life. In other terms, since the first of January last, English newspapers, radio and television stations have been giving their weather forecasts in centigrade units, according to the metric system.

It must be noted that this change is a first step toward the generalization of the metric system in all the spheres of everyday life in England. As a matter of fact, the adoption of the metric system was recommended in England in May 1960, following an extensive survey in the course of which a very large majority of personalities and qualified organizations took position in favour of the metric system.

Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to mention a few disadvantages due to the fact that our country has not yet adopted this metric system.

When tenders were called for the purchase of equipment required by a Middle East country, the Canadian bid was the lowest. However, it was not accepted.

The reason given the Canadian representative was the following:

> Your equipment is very good and it can manufacture products that meet the requirements of the metric system, which is the one used in this country. But the trouble is that parts are machined according to your system of measurement. When the time comes for replacing those parts, this fact may mean expensive delays for us. Sorry.

The contract was therefore given to a German firm. Its bid was higher, but it was using the metric system for manufacturing parts. Those parts are available throughout the Middle East.

Mr. Chairman, these facts were reported in the December issue of the newspaper Perspectives.

A prominent Argentine manufacturer who came here on business spent hours consulting a Toronto firm's catalogue. The sales manager did not fail of course to point out to him machines which were lower priced than those offered by competing European companies. The South American scribbled figures over several sheets of paper and then closed the catalogue, took his hat and said:

> Your prices may be more attractive, but I am so confused by your measures that I would rather pay more to European suppliers. They have the same measures as we have. What I would save on the purchase price would be more than erased by the loss of time and the unavoidable mistakes in converting yards into meters and gallons into litres.

Such incidents illustrate a harsh fact: our foreign trade will probably be conditioned by our system of measures. Throughout the world, Canadian products must compete with those of foreign manufacturers who have a great advantage in that their weights and measures are easily understood by customers, whereas ours are above the understanding of most of prospective purchasers.

Since our standard of living is closely related to world trade, all Canadians are affected by this confusion about measures. Furthermore, our unpractical system only makes things more complicated for everyone, mother and student, artist and engineer, scientist and farmer.

At present the standards of measure divide the world in two blocs. The commonwealth and the United States have the British system while the metric system is used in most of the rest of the world, namely Europe, U.S.S.R., red China, Japan, South America, Central America and the new African states. That means that 90 per cent of the world population enjoy the advantages of the metric system.

On our side, we are beginning to fear for the future of our exports. Yet, sentimental attachment to a traditional system may soon be upset by the necessities brought about by economic pressures.

India adopts the metric system. Eager to industrialize, India has bought just about everywhere the things that she needed. Will she now continue to import machines that will create nothing but confusion? Would Canadians buy lathes or tools of metric standards for their plants?

Again, I have quoted from the last December issue of Perspectives.

A parliamentary committee in New Zealand has recommended the adoption of the decimal system for money, to be followed by the adoption of the metric system. South Africa started on February 14 to convert her monetary system.

In the United Kingdom, a parliamentary committee has already recommended a total revision, and conversion of the monetary system has been advocated in a report prepared by several committees representing the British chambers of commerce association and the British association for the advancement of science. More than 2,000 organizations have submitted evidence and ideas.

It seems that the English monetary system of pounds, shillings and pence, which has tormented generations of English students and innumerable tourists, is bound to disappear.

Another significant fact is that, according to the report, the metric weight and measures system will finally have to be adopted, but the report does not recommend that it should be made mandatory at once.

I would mention at this point, Mr. Chairman, that in the Department of National Defence, the metric system is fully accepted, particularly in the department's relations with our European partners in NATO.

The difficulties arising from different systems can be many and unfortunate. As an example, Bailey bridge sections made in the United States and in Great Britain could not be fitted together because the measurements were different.

Some Canadian businessmen see the situation realistically, but they are a minority.

The Canadian association of drug manufacturers made the change-over a few years ago and is now very happy about it. Measurements in electronics and photography are based on the metric system. Many of the firms involved have in fact found that the change-over had been less costly than anticipated.

Conversion on a national scale will probably depend to a large extent on the passing of a similar measure in the United Kingdom or the United States, but that is no excuse for inaction.

It is important, however, that eventually a committee be set up to consider the adoption of the metric system in Canada.

If a Canadian exporter finds he would stand to gain from the metric system, he should convert to it immediately.

Before applying the metric system across the country, we would have to have the answers to various questions. Should we act in conjunction with the United Kingdom and the United States? Should we apply a crash program or a long term one?

Some U.S. experts estimate that it will take 30 years to carry out conversion, in view of the high degree of that country's industrialization. The Indian plan provides for a 10- to 15-year period; the Japanese plan has a much shorter term. The South Africans expect it will take 18 months only to change their monetary system. A study of the metric system should be compulsory teaching in the schools. Of course, this point comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

We could also indicate the weight or volume of some products, such as groceries, in grams or litres; we might replace miles by kilometres on road maps and road signs. The biggest problem and the longest to solve will be the conversion of machine tools, dies and gauges. Both systems would be used concurrently for a few years, while obsolete machines were being progressively replaced.

It would thus be possible to carry out conversion in 10 to 15 years. What is most important is that the organizations primarily concerned, such as the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Engineering Institute, immediately start tackling the problem.

At a time when the Soviet threat to our foreign trade is a cause for concern, it should be remembered that Russia holds a tremendous advantage in the metric system. The customer always prefers the easiest alternatives.

Our scientists use metric measurements, while our engineers measure things in inches, pounds and gallons. They waste precious time converting figures in either direction to co-ordinate their work.

We can well wonder to what extent the Russian advance in the field of space research may be attributed to closer co-operation between its engineers and scientists, all of whom use the metric system.

If we do not adopt the metric system, we run the risk of incurring enormous economic losses.

A moment ago, I gave a few examples in that connection. Some day, Canada will adopt the metric system and, Mr. Chairman, we must prepare for it now.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal briefly with two matters. First of all, about unemployment statistics, and then about our trade policy.

Mr. Chairman, item 399 of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce includes an amount for the dominion bureau of statistics. For some time, I have wanted to raise that matter. As I represent a typical working-class riding, I submit that the unemployment figures provided by the dominion bureau of statistics give us an incomplete picture of the situation. In my opinion, if we want to solve that problem, we must first of all realize its scope.

That is why it is important that the dominion bureau of statistics, on the basis of new standards, should submit each month on the basis new standards, figures that accurately reflect the gravity and scope of the unemployment problem.

On April 15 or 16, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) told us that, according to the D.B.S. figures, there were, in Canada, 714,000 unemployed at the end of March. Now, as everyone knows, those figures are the result of very incomplete sampling. Perhaps they give us a picture of the situation, but I fear it is a rather sketchy picture.

A few days later, I asked the Minister of Labour how many Canadian citizens were drawing unemployment insurance benefits from our offices, at the end of March. He replied that on that date the number was 837,961.

Now, it is quite obvious that the unemployed, the man who draws unemployment insurance benefits, is unemployed within the meaning of the unemployment insurance act, because he has to submit evidence that he used to have a job, that he no longer has one for reasons beyond his control, that he has the required quantity of unemployment insurance stamps, and that he is available for work.

Now, how is it that, at the end of March, 837,961 persons were drawing benefits, while the figure given us by the D.B.S. is only 714,000?

This proves, therefore, that the D.B.S. figures are incomplete and do not show the extent of the problem.

Besides, there are millions of Canadian citizens who are out of work and who do not draw any unemployment insurance benefits.

If the minister, anxious to set up an adequate statistical system, would only refer this matter to the industrial relations committee, I would be in a position to prove that the number of unemployed who do not draw any benefits is about one third the number of those who do. At any time with the help of a few witnesses, I would be in a position to prove that.

Mr. Chairman, if we add the number of those who draw those benefits to the corresponding third of that number, we get a total of 1,110,114 unemployed. The purpose of my remarks with regard to the D.B.S. is to establish that, if we all want to solve this problem, we will have to change the standards for those statistics, because we have to know how many unemployed there are.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that this is the responsibility of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees), and not, of D.B.S. officials, even if they are experts in the matter. If the minister did set up an adequate accounting system—and we have the necessary organization to do so—we might obtain every month figures which would prove that the situation is much worse than shown in present D.B.S. figures.

Again, I think that we, in this house, who are looking for an answer to the problem, should have more adequate figures. I therefore ask the minister to pay particular attention to my request, because I propose to raise the matter at every opportunity.

Mr. Chairman, I now want to say a few words about our policy in trade matters.

If I understood the minister well this morning, when he dealt with the matter his statement was read rather rapidly, but I jotted down as much as possible of the following remarks—he said:

> We are trying to protect Canadian industry against the excessive risks of importations.

Now it is regrettable that we should have to recognize that results did not fulfil the government's hopes.

It is all right to wish and to express pious hopes, but this morning we expected a quite definite policy with regard to trade to be worked out.

In order to make it quite clear that our Canadian industries, in some sectors, are in an intolerable position, just because of imports, I would like to read a paragraph from an item published yesterday on the financial page of La Presse, and signed by Mr. Eugene Lafond, who said:

> The flooding of the Canadian market by imported textiles now seems to be beyond all control. In fact the Canadian Apparel and Textile Manufacturers' Association reports that shipments of clothing and textiles from Hong Kong to Canada have increased by 38.6 per cent last year, and have now reached a value of $8.3 million, whereas it was $6 million in 1959, and $3 million in 1958.
> For a number of years, the Canadian market was submerged by imports of Japanese textiles. Since Hong Kong textiles have appeared on our market, the latter is literally flooded; the situation has become unbearable, and when looking at the figures quoted by the association we find that, in 1960 alone, Hong Kong shipped to Canada 1,071,600 blouses, 2,366,364 shirts, 3,993,396 pairs of trousers and popular clothes of that kind, as well as 4,938,804 other pieces of woven clothing.
> It has often been said that if the Canadian industry is unable to meet this competition, it is due to the extremely low level of salaries paid in the countries of Asia.
> It is noted by the association that textiles sold in Hong Kong by Canada are not competing with the local product since ours are only partly finished goods which are finished, then re-exported; this is not at all like the situation which prevails on the Canadian market.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, our position is quite clear concerning Canada's trade policy. It was set forth unequivocally during the debate held this week, when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and other opposition members dealt with this matter. We are advocating the establishment of an economic community of Atlantic countries which, in my opinion, is one of the schemes likely to promote the development of Canadian trade.

Here is what I find in yesterday's issue of La Presse, in an editorial dealing with this debate and this matter:

> What will Canada do when Great Britain, as she now seems resolved to do, decides to join the six of the common market, thereby granting preferred treatment to the products of those countries and putting our exports in the British Isles at a competitive disadvantage. We must ask ourselves whether, under the circumstances, the Canadian government should not consider right now modifying its trade policy to ward off the blow.
> Canada has done nothing so far, nothing tangible at least, to protect our trade interests.
> It must be recognized that, so far in the debate on this subject in the house, the position of the government has been purely negative.
> Would it not be possible for our country to take part one way or another in the regrouping arrangement thought up by the European countries. It is the solution that was put forward by the opposition when it suggested the setting up of an Atlantic economic community as a complement to the defence community based on the North Atlantic treaty.

Mr. Chairman, those are the only remarks I wanted to make at this time. I will surely have questions to put when the different items of the department estimates are being looked into. Right now I should like to say to the minister that I am looking forward to the information he will give us in connection with vote 399. This vote has to do with unemployment statistics which, as I have said before, do not give a true picture of the seriousness and extent of this problem.

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I intend to be quite brief as usual and normal. First of all, I want to express my appreciation of the minister's courtesy and his very prompt attention to any matter I have brought to his attention. The same thing applies to his parliamentary secretary. I give them top marks as far as industry and courtesy are concerned, and I am sure all members appreciate that. I also want to express my appreciation of the work of the staff. A number of times I have had occasion to make inquiries and I have always found my letters and all my inquiries replied to promptly and the information given as fully as possible.

While I listened with interest to the minister's review of the activities of his department, like former speakers I believe he failed to emphasize to some extent the difficulties that Canada is facing at the present time with respect to overseas trade particularly and the possible intensification of these difficulties in the months and years ahead. I refer to the difficulties which are caused by the formation of trading blocs, by the groups of countries that indulge in state trading, various pricing policies and the lowering of costs made possible through efficient arrangements as the result of co-operation, co-ordination and planning within the country or between certain countries.

The department's report this year is most attractive in format and very informative. I think there has been a great improvement in recent years in the reports put out by various departments. This is the second one within recent days that has shown great improvement over previous years. It is a credit to the printers, the persons who design the format and the material is well drafted and presented in readable and logical sequence.

My few remarks, Mr. Chairman, are really going to be in the nature of half a dozen questions which I wish to ask the minister. Will the minister, when he speaks, tell the committee what is the difference between trade and commerce? This has always been a rather intriguing question in my mind when the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce come before this committee. So far as the dictionary is concerned, I can find very little distinction. I wonder why the department is named, trade and commerce. There must be some reason for it. This is a question which arises out of my native curiosity.

I should like to direct the minister's attention to an item that appeared in the Globe and Mail of February 28 which, incidentally, is my birthday. It is entitled, "Canada doing little to meet challenge from trade blocs", and was written by Bruce Macdonald. I shall quote from it briefly and then I want to put a number of questions to the minister:

> Despite the problems created for Canada from increasingly intense foreign competition, at home and abroad and from radically changing trade patterns resulting from the creation of new economic blocs, so far there have been few changes in Canadian policy to meet the challenge. That these developments do have serious implications to this country, there is little doubt, deputy trade and commerce minister James Roberts emphasized in a Montreal speech today.

I would not be surprised if he were present in this building today.

> "Economic decisions are now being taken by governments and businessmen in the free world which are far-reaching and which will have a profound effect on the future economic well-being of all Canadians," he asserted.

There is another paragraph of this article which I should like to quote. Mr. Roberts is a man of great experience whose opinion is highly regarded. He is reported as saying:

> Mr. Roberts, who plays a key role in the development of policies to meet the challenge facing the country, provided no prescriptions of his own. For the first time, however, he did disclose some of the findings of the trade mission of 13 prominent Canadian businessmen which he led on a tour of the six-nation common market countries of Europe last fall, findings which may hold a lesson for this country.
> "It is apparent that a major contribution to the area's economic development has been achieved through the effective co-operation and co-ordination of labour, management and government," the businessmen concluded. "The current prosperity in the community (European economic community) has been greatly influenced by the development and application of economic planning—"

Just think of it, Mr. Chairman; economic planning. This is C.C.F. policy.

> "—in the individual countries. These plans are gradually being integrated in an over-all economic plan for the common market.

In order to provide goods at lower costs to meet increasing competition, these countries in the European economic community have decided to do some over-all planning, some integration and working together on the basis of co-operation. My second question is, will the minister tell the committee what is being done by his department to develop in Canada between the various groups mentioned similar economic planning, co-ordination and co-operation which, from recent information, have proven so successful in western Europe? I do not blame the minister because he is working within a set of circumstances that exist at the moment. We all know that the minister is very active, and he is doing the best he can as an individual. I feel we have unplanned production in Canada and that production is unrelated to planned marketing, co-ordination, investment policies and so on. Members of this group believe we are going to have continuing difficulties, and possibly greater difficulties, until we develop some system which provides for over-all economic planning, co-ordination and co-operation. I should like the minister to tell the committee what is being done in that respect. This is my second question, Mr. Chairman.

The hon. member for Vancouver East made some reference to the importance to British Columbia of the export of primary products, particularly products of the forest, of the sea and of the land, including minerals, fruit and other commodities. This is a very important question in British Columbia because of the extent of our primary industries. While secondary industry can be developed to a certain degree in British Columbia, we must recognize that our economy is essentially based on the successful development of the primary industries. This is the reason there is so much interest in British Columbia in the development of overseas markets. In recent years there has been great interest in the development of markets in Pacific countries. In British Columbia, when there is a federal election—the hon. member for Vancouver East will bear me out on this—you will find Progressive Conservative candidates readily urging from the platform the recognition of red China. When these men come here, their voices are rather dim. This is due to the fact that in British Columbia they are voicing the opinions of the working people of that province.

My third question is, in view of the recent success in the sale of wheat to China and in the extension of our market in Indonesia as well as some other countries, would the minister tell the committee what his department is doing to obtain similar success in the sale of various Canadian forest products, products of the sea and soil, fruit, minerals and other commodities, to China and other Asiatic countries. I think the sale of this wheat is a very encouraging sign. I have heard that this sale will be increased in the near future. I certainly look forward to the minister making an announcement soon. We would like him to tell the committee what he is doing to obtain similar success—we do not expect everything to happen overnight—with respect to the other commodities I have mentioned.

Some years ago, in 1959, it was brought to the attention of this house that Alcan, a Canadian company, was not permitted to accept a million dollar order because the parent company in the United States said it was against United States foreign policy and interests. There was a good deal of protest at that time against this subsidiary's failure to recognize the fact that it was operating on Canadian soil and using Canadian national resources and Canadian labour to make these profits. At the same time the Globe and Mail of Friday, January 23, 1959, in an editorial under the heading "What Price Sovereignty?" had this to say:

> What is the burning topic in Canada today? Unemployment. Yet a large company meekly permits the Americans (or its fear of the Americans) to impose unemployment upon us. And how easy it is for them. They don't have to say anything, they don't have to do anything. The company's concern over what they might say, what they might do is enough to paralyse it; enough to make it take actions directly contrary to Canada's own welfare, Canada's own prosperity, Canada's own interests.

I understand that the situation was taken up at that time and that there was some improvement and some adjustment.

My fourth question is this. Will the minister inform the committee whether there have been any incidents of this type in Canada since he has taken office. I refer to incidents with respect to a Canadian subsidiary of a United States parent company refusing to accept orders from China or other countries of similar political ideology, because of instructions from the parent company or because it was against the policy of the United States.

I have two more questions. I am sure the minister takes a great interest in all the sayings and writings of people who are interested in improving our trade and commerce in Canada at this time. I am sure his attention has been directed to a speech by Hugh Llewellyn Keenleyside who made some suggestions with respect to the improvement of our trade. There are many people making suggestions without much knowledge or experience. However, I read this speech very carefully because Dr. Keenleyside was a former deputy minister. He was in charge of the technical assistance program for Canada at the United Nations through one of its agencies and he is now chairman of the British Columbia power commission. He has had a distinguished academic and administrative career. I therefore read with interest what he had to say. I am not going to read the article in full. I am just going to read one paragraph. It appeared in the Financial Post of May 7, 1960. It is entitled "He Charts a Fresh Course for Canada" and it reads in part as follows:

> Hugh Llewellyn Keenleyside, in over 30 years of distinguished public service—both in Canada and with the United Nations—has rightfully gained a reputation as an able administrator and an imaginative policy-maker. Few Canadians, in short, deserve a better hearing. He says:
> "We should work out a system of selective free trade with the selection based on the willingness of U.S. countries to allocate an appropriate portion of their total (North American) production to factories established in Canada.
> "There is no reason why it should not be extended to any country that is willing to meet the basic qualification: The establishment of new factories in Canada and free access for its products to the consumer market of the other country."

Then The Province of May 10 had this to say in an editorial entitled "A Challenge to Canadian Ingenuity . . .":

> Dr. Hugh L. Keenleyside's formula for "selective free trade" as an answer to Canada's increasing economic problems offers so many logical and practical features that no time should be lost in examining it more closely.
> The steps suggested by the British Columbia power commission chairman and former United Nations' official... have received enough preliminary publicity and discussion to warrant an exhaustive and critical study by both government and private business.
> We say both government and private business because the agreement and co-operation of both is manifestly necessary if anything is going to be done about this proposal. Neither government edict nor private business policy could, alone, bring about the desired result.

I am extremely pleased just to note in passing that even The Province is beginning to speak the language used by the C.C.F. over the years. It mentions the necessity for co-operation between government and private business in dealing with economic problems. We have advanced those views throughout the years in our development of what we call the theory of a mixed or dual economy.

My fifth question to the minister is this. Has he read of these proposals by Dr. Keenleyside and has he given them his careful study and attention? If so, will he inform the committee as to his opinion of their practical nature and of the possibility, as a result of the application of Dr. Keenleyside's proposals, of improving somewhat our position with respect to trade and commerce in Canada and consequently the unemployment situation?

My sixth and last question is simply this. I was reading the departmental report in my office, especially one section of it that is of great interest to me, namely the section that deals with small business. It was established largely to gather information, to offer advice, to publish literature and to undertake activities of that type. It is of interest to hon. members and I quite frequently receive letters making inquiries about this branch. On occasion people confuse the branch with the organization under the bill that provides for loans to small business enterprises and their improvement.

When the minister replies, will he give the committee some illustration of the work this small business branch is doing at the present time? I should like to have something a little bit more detailed than what one reads in the report. I should like to know about the literature that is being published or the pamphlets and whether this literature or this publicity is available to members. Can he give us some idea of the nature of the inquiries, of the number of small business firms that have been served by advice, by literature or by information since the establishment of this branch in this department?

With those few brief remarks I conclude my words at this time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Granger: Trade and commerce historically have been the physical body of the nation. If national idealism and principles are the spirit of the nation, then trading is its blood and commerce its bone, and sinew. I may be pardoned for saying that I come from a province which for hundreds of years has depended for its very existence on trading. In the days before we entered confederation and became a part of the Canadian family, Newfoundland exported everything it produced. It imported practically everything it consumed. Since confederation we still export practically everything we produce and we buy practically all we consume from the mainland of Canada, most of it, of course, from the industrial provinces of central Canada.

If I may make a personal observation, I should like to say that I grew up in Catalina, a seaport on the east coast of Newfoundland. As a boy, in the days of sail, when our own ships carried our own products to the foreign markets, our horizons were Spain and Italy, Portugal and Greece and the islands of the Caribbean. If you walked down the streets at any time, you would rub shoulders with sailors who were just home from "across" as we referred to foreign markets, or who were getting ready to sail to foreign markets with fish. The means of shipping has changed and steam and diesel power and vessels of other registry carry our products today but the pattern of trade remains the same as it was. Hence trade and commerce is of vital importance to us in Newfoundland. It is important to those of my constituents who are fishermen, it is important to those of my constituents who are loggers, and to all who work and depend upon the production of pulp and paper for their livelihood. It is also important to the growing number of my constituents who are engaged in mining. Thus the Department of Trade and Commerce, to us in Newfoundland, the Atlantic provinces and all Canada, is one of the most important departments of government. This is because it is the basic department of government. I wish to congratulate the minister on his appointment as head of this department, although in a way I have lost a constituent from Gander.

I wish to speak particularly of the position relative to the marketing of salt codfish. I think I can say with assurance that Canada is not holding her own in this sphere.

Certainly the number of nations now engaged in fishing off our coasts, and the increasing pressure of competition from them—competition which we are feeling in our historic markets—indicates that we have slipped rather than made headway. I have felt for some time that insufficient attention has been paid to the selling of salt codfish. I believe there are not enough trade representatives detailed to sell this product.

The minister's department has some capable men who are doing very good work in this respect, but they are too few. I feel, also, that the fish business is not receiving the proportion of attention which it needs. I believe that an intense effort should be directed toward the sale of fish, the promotion of fish sales and the development of new markets. I believe that more officials are needed to get out in the various countries, promote fish sales and interest new customers. We should not be content to do business merely with our old customers.

We must keep our old customers, of course. We must sell them larger quantities of fish, if we can; but we must keep a weather eye open for new markets. In this respect I suggest that the potential of Africa as a market for Canadian fish should be explored. I think too, that the productivity council may be interested in the developing of new products, because it is possible that in order to develop new markets some change may have to be made in the type of product we are now offering for sale to the world.

If we are to obtain new markets and develop old ones it is perhaps important that we pay more attention to either new developments or perhaps a greater production of one type of salt codfish over another.

Certainly it seems that we are suffering a loss of sales by not producing more of what is generally known as light salted shore fish. In the past, light salted shore fish has been produced largely by hand labour, and sun dried. The cost of production is high. Heavily salted fish can be produced by artificial driers, or finished by them. The cost of production is cut down in this case.

It is very possible that we are producing, proportionately with the volume of sales now being made, too much of the heavy salted article and not sufficient of the light salted article.

However, in order to produce the light salted article economically it is necessary that a means of artificial production be evolved, and this is certainly possible. I mention this in passing because I know that in these modern days it is unrealistic to expect the old, traditional method of producing fish to be used successfully.

I do not think I should go into further detail on these estimates, but I will have something to say about this matter when the estimates of the Department of Fisheries come up later. However, I do think this has a direct bearing upon our trade and our trade potential.

It is possible that by not producing enough of this particular type of fish we are rapidly losing a potential market, because if a product which people have been used to buying over the years is cut off, or is withheld long enough, the demand will soon cease to exist. I ask the minister to bear this matter in mind.

I now come back to the question of the sale of fish. The fact is that Newfoundland and all the Atlantic provinces feel—and, I believe, justifiably—that there is not enough attention and serious effort put into the building up of the fish trade. It is felt there could be more effort in this direction.

Perhaps if the same attention were given to the development of trade in fish as is given to the sale of grain, for instance, the position of the industry would be vastly improved. Certainly we have an immense wealth of food in our Canadian waters. We have the product with which trade began in the new world.

The minister is undoubtedly aware of the fact that when John Cabot discovered Canada, on sighting Cape Bonavista on St. John's day, 1497, he discovered that the waters were full of fish. At the time, according to tradition, John Cabot was looking for gold and precious stones for Henry VII who had, shall I say, an orthodox sense of values. But John Cabot discovered fish instead of gold and jewels, and fish proved to be a greater source of wealth to England than gold or jewels would have been.

It is a matter of historic record that one year after the discovery of Canada, in 1498, British merchants were outfitting fishing ships and sending them to Canadian waters, to the waters of the new world, to develop a fishing trade. Pretty soon they were followed by the French, the Portuguese and the Spaniards. Competition became keen, and that pattern has continued to exist. These historic competitors are still fishing in the waters off the coast of Canada. They have been joined by many other nations today, including Russia. They have been developing and building up their fish trade to an extent perhaps never known before in history. They recognize the value of developing this great source of food.

Certainly we in Canada, where trading in fish began, can meet and beat this competition. The methods, the means and the brains all exist. It is just a matter of focusing them on a very real problem. This is not only a Newfoundland problem, but it is an Atlantic provinces and a Canadian problem. We in the Atlantic provinces are among the best customers of central Canada. Newfoundland was at one time the third best customer of Canada. What she buys today from the mainland of Canada is very difficult to assess, but it would be more than she bought prior to confederation.

If it requires money, if it means the employing of more trade secretaries to increase our trade in fish, to build up the ancient trade and commerce of the new world, it will be a sound investment because it will mean the building up not only of the economy of Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces but the creation of wealth in which all Canada would share. I ask the minister to take a very close and sympathetic look at the development of trade and commerce as it affects the fish industry and in particular the salt codfish industry. I should like him at the appropriate time to tell this committee what the department may be doing in this respect.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, the Department of Trade and Commerce is fortunate in having the dynamic leadership of the new minister. Trade, as everyone knows, is the lifeblood of our nation, and I wish to speak principally today of just one product, oil.

We have to balance our trade with the other countries of the world and there is nothing which could balance the trade of Canada quicker than the development of our oil resources. I represent the great district of Athabasca and it should now be well known, if it is not already well known, that contained within the Athabasca district alone is the largest known deposit of crude oil on this planet. It has been conservatively estimated that anywhere from three hundred to five hundred billion barrels of oil at present lie in the sand hills there and are available whenever we are ready to take them out.

I should like to bring this to the attention of our new minister because one of these days the supply of world crude oil may suddenly be cut off from us. If proper steps are taken now—and I mean now—to tap this well nigh unlimited source, Canada and possibly the free world may be saved in time of crisis. But we have to get this plant going. It has to be financed. It has to be encouraged by the provision of both federal and provincial money. I think it would be an eternal disgrace to us if we left this, the largest oil deposit in the world, untapped and unready to be used.

It has been erroneously said on many occasions that this oil could not be taken out of the sand or that it would not be economic to take it out. Neither of these statements is correct. We have a well known process now for extracting this oil and there is only one bottleneck, namely the development of a suitable market for the product. But we have that market here in Canada if we were to take the proper steps to utilize it. The Montreal district alone uses in the neighbourhood of 80,000 barrels of heavy industrial fuel oil a day and I understand from properly informed source that if we had the benefit of this market in Athabasca we would go into full production. I know that we have at the present time very extensive plans in co-operation with our United States neighbours with reference to oil but I think we should take a long look at this situation and lay plans now for the development of the industry here.

We shall have to do it sooner or later. I do not think we want to be caught without oil at any time when it is physically available to us now. Cities Service Oil Company have a pilot plant going now at a cost of $1,500,000. They are working on an oil face which is very limited in extent but they could produce from this one cliff alone 80,000 barrels of oil a day for 60 years without moving their plant. Such figures are astronomical and it is hard to understand—the people up in my area certainly find it hard to understand—why more attention is not paid to these enormous deposits. We have the fresh water there. We have the oil itself to supply the fuel needs. We have the people of Canada willing to get in there and work, and I think we can expect the full co-operation of the Department of Trade and Commerce as soon as the province of Alberta gives the go-ahead to these far-sighted and progressive companies which are doing and wish to do the exploratory work.

This tar sand country is not only rich in oil but it has great potential for the delivery of many important by-products including sulphur, tar, salt and the crystal clear sand which remains after the process is completed; sand which would provide an excellent basis for a glass industry. I see the day when northern Alberta will become another Ruhr. All it will take is the planning and the financing which the companies concerned have already started—a progressive plan which they are looking to government at both federal and provincial levels to assist.

I see it is five o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15 as provisionally amended.

Criminal Code

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO ABOLISH CAPITAL PUNISHMENT EXCEPT FOR TREASON

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-21 to amend the Criminal Code (capital punishment).

He said: When the two-day debate on this bill concluded last February approximately 20 speakers had supported the opposite view to the one proposed in this measure. In fact, a clear majority of the members of the House of Commons had indicated their opposition to the bill and Gallup polls which were taken at the time when the debate took place indicated that a slight majority of the people of Canada shared that view. It is my purpose today to attempt to review the 20 speeches made by the retentionist group and to reply to the questions and objections which were raised to this bill.

I should like to put on the record certain information such as the Gallup poll results, which I mentioned earlier, and other information, in particular that dealing with the state of Delaware. The state of Delaware, as you will recall, sir, was mentioned in the debate last year as being a state which has most recently abolished capital punishment in the United States. One particularly interesting piece of information which I should like to place on the record today deals with a letter written to Senator Fred Farr, of the state of California. It will be recalled that about the time of the debate on my bill last year the Chessman case was very much in the news and the state of California was contemplating a debate on the merits of capital punishment at that time. Senator Farr apparently was a member of the legislative committee of the senate of the state of California and he wrote to the governor of the state of Delaware. The interesting thing about the questions he asked is that these are the questions or, if you like, the doubts which obviously were in the minds of hon. members of this house during the debate last year and during other debates in previous sessions. This letter written by Governor Caleb Beggs to Senator Farr, reads as follows:

> I acknowledge receipt of your telegram of March 7 which was received here on March 8. I regret that through a misunderstanding here a reply to your telegram was not sent for your hearing on March 9. However, I am only too pleased to answer your telegram and do so as follows:
> 1. Has abolition of death penalty increased homicide rate in your state?

The answer is as follows:

> Abolition has not increased the homicide rate in Delaware. Abolition became effective April 2, 1958. A comparison for 12 months prior to abolition with 12 months after showed no change in the homicide rate. The number of criminal homicides for 1958 was 12; for 1959 it had dropped to seven.

This, Mr. Speaker, of course, deals with the anticipated rise in the homicide rate which certain people suggest will follow abolition.

The second question reads:

> Does lack of capital punishment add to danger of police and other peace officers?

The answer is:

> There is no evidence whatsoever to show that attacks upon police officers have changed because of the absence of capital punishment. Actually in Delaware throughout the years we have had very few attacks upon police officers and there has been no change in this situation. After reviewing the evidence prior to the passage of the bill the superintendents of the state police and certain other police forces in the state in our larger cities took the position they would not oppose the passage of the bill for abolition.

The third question reads:

> Is there any substantial movement for restoration of death penalty?

The answer is:

> There is no movement whatsoever.

The fourth question reads:

> Has absence of death penalty made it harder or easier to obtain jury convictions in murder cases?

The answer is:

> We have had only a few murder trials since abolition. It is our belief that the jury is less reluctant to bring in a first degree verdict where the facts warrant it.

The fifth question reads:

> Has absence of death penalty in any way increased danger to public safety?

The answer is no.

The sixth question reads:

> Does absence of death penalty create security problem in prisons?

The answer is no.

The seventh question reads:

> Based on your experience, would you recommend abolition of death penalty by California?

The answer is:

> Our experience of two years since abolition has shown a decrease in the homicide rate. Based solely upon our experience, therefore, we can recommend abolition. Delaware's experience follows the pattern shown in all the studies that the removal of the death penalty does not increase the homicide rate.
> I trust that the above answers your inquiry and will be of service to you.

And so on.

This, Mr. Speaker, is another piece of the growing pile of evidence in answer to the understandable questions and doubts which are and still remain in the public mind.

The first hon. member who spoke against this bill in the debate last year was the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne). In the early part of his remarks he said as reported at page 1195 of Hansard of February 18, 1960:

> I completely reject the arguments they have put forward.

He continued.

> It is rather surprising to me that people so far from public opinion could find themselves in the House of Commons.

This question of public opinion is a very interesting one indeed and particularly when you examine the trend of public opinion over the last few years. Public opinion polls were taken on this subject by the Canadian institute of public opinion in 1943, 1953, 1958 and 1960, which as I indicated before was shortly after the second day's debate of this bill last year. This was the question put:

> Some people say we should do away altogether with capital punishment; that is, executing a person for murder. Do you think we should or should not abolish capital punishment?

In 1943, 18 per cent replied that capital punishment should be abolished. In 1953, the figure had risen to 22 per cent; in 1958, it had risen to 33 per cent; and in 1960, it has risen to 41 per cent. Those who would retain capital punishment amounted to 73 per cent in 1943; 71 per cent in 1953; 52 per cent in 1958; and it was down to 51 per cent in 1960. The "no opinion" factor makes up the remainder. For the record, in 1943, they amounted to 9 per cent; in 1953, to 7 per cent; in 1958, to 15 per cent; and in 1960, to 8 per cent.

The indications are clear, Mr. Speaker, not only in these public opinion polls but in the actions of juries and in other manifestations across the country that there is a growing body of persons in this country who favour the abolition of capital punishment.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the hon. member a question. Were there public opinion polls taken in the same area and could the hon. member give the areas where they were taken?

Mr. McGee: I cannot answer the question completely but I will say these were taken right across the country. I imagine the hon. member might have reference to the fact that Newfoundland might have been included in later polls and not in other ones. I do know that these polls are accumulated on a four-region basis, the so-called Atlantic provinces region, the Quebec region, the Ontario region and the fourth region being western Canada.

It is interesting to point out that in the breakdown of these figures in the most recent poll there is very little difference between the Atlantic provinces, Quebec and Ontario in terms of for and against; the only difference being the larger group in western Canada who favour the retention of the death penalty.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway went on to say:

> The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Drysdale) has on the order paper a bill which I believe comes a great deal closer to meeting the wishes of the people of Canada.

The bill of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, which was patterned closely on the English homicide act of 1957, is a move toward abolition and an attempt to reduce the application of the death penalty.

Before hon. members become too enamoured of the British experience, I should like to point out in passing that some serious difficulties have been encountered in England with this measure which, as hon. members well know, attempts to set up five categories of murder which are defined as capital murder, all other grounds being punishable by life imprisonment. One category, for instance, is the committing of a murder in the process of a theft. Another category involves a murder using a gun or a bomb. Another category is a second murder. Another category is killing a policeman or prison guard, and so on.

This attempt to stop part way along the road to abolition has produced some serious contradictions. One of these was described by Gerald Gardiner, Q.C., who happens to be the head of the British society for the abolition of capital punishment. In a speech recently he had this to say:

> For instance, if a man comes home and finds his wife with another man and picks up the nearest weapon to murder her, it is a capital offence if that weapon happens to be a gun, but a non-capital offence if it is a hatchet.

I might add there, Mr. Speaker, that presumably if the type of crime is determined by the weapon chosen a man could boil his wife in oil, strap her to a board in the style of "The Perils of Pauline" and run her into a buzz saw or use any other sort of peculiar and unusual method to commit murder and if he adopts any of these quaint methods he cannot be hanged whereas if he happens to use a gun he will hang. Mr. Gardiner goes on to say:

> If someone rapes a woman and steals her handbag, it is a capital offence; if he does not steal her handbag, it is non-capital.

Contradictions and difficulties have evolved in reaching and determining the point in the degree of culpability of murder at which a person shall be hanged. When you draw that line a case which qualifies for capital punishment will differ so infinitesimally from one just on the other side of the line that for all practical purposes there is no real difference.

I offer this also as a word of caution and advice to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) and the cabinet because, as hon. members know, they are preparing a bill to limit the application of capital punishment which will be presented to the house later this session.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway went on to say, as found on page 1195 of Hansard for February 18, 1960:

> —having regard to the protection of our police officers, surely common sense would tell us that, if a man has committed a crime where he is going to be committed to life imprisonment, is being apprehended by a police officer and is armed, there is going to be the temptation for him, knowing that he can escape, knowing that if he shoots the police officer he can be no worse off than he was before. Surely it is going to act as a deterrent to that man if he knows he is going to be hanged, something which is considerably more abhorrent to him than is life imprisonment in most cases.

This is one of these apparently attractive arguments held by those who would retain the death penalty. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and others have tried to get inside the mind of the potential murderer and have reached certain conclusions about what his reaction will or will not be. I am certainly voicing no suggestion that I can make any better evaluation of what goes on inside a criminal's mind, but I would say to the hon. members who hold this view that if they examine the 42 jurisdictions —I mean countries and states within countries where capital punishment is a matter of state jurisdiction—they will find that when capital punishment has been abolished the incidence of murder, as indicated in the letter of the governor of the state of Delaware, has not risen suddenly.

Mr. McPhillips: But you have got lynching.

Mr. McGee: Further on in his remarks the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway said:

> I believe that one of the things the public do not like about our present system is the hanging, and perhaps some other method of carrying out the death penalty should be instituted—

I suggest that this particular facet of the argument is in one sense beside the point and certainly in another sense it is inconsistent. Those who favour the retention of the death penalty by means of hanging put forward the argument that the menacing quality of death by this means forms the essential deterrent. That is the deterrent argument, but if hanging is something which is unacceptable to many people I cannot understand why a person advocating the retention of the death penalty would want to lessen the menacing character of that deterrent. It seems to me that the hon. member is on two sides of the argument at the same time.

The next speaker in the debate to whom I wish to refer was the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Rouleau). I must say that in preparing my speech one suggestion occurred to me which I might throw in at this point. I suggest it might be more desirable to have one completely English Hansard and another completely in French. I find that skipping backward and forward between translations and coming back to the place where I started is difficult. The hon. member for Dollard made this statement, as found on page 1204 of Hansard for February 18, 1960:

> In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, if public opinion is divided about the abolition of capital punishment, we should be even more cautious about this matter than we have been in the case of a Canadian flag.

Without meaning to be facetious, I would say it would be hard to be more cautious than that. The hon. member went on to say that a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate was established to consider the advisability of abolishing capital punishment. The decision of that committee, as you know, Mr. Speaker, was that for the time being it should be retained. I came across some information concerning that decision which I found rather unusual. Apparently it is the only committee in the history of the House of Commons to take its final vote on the basis of telegrams from all parts of the country. However, the committee certainly reflected public opinion at that time which indicated, as I said, that 71 per cent of the people of Canada favoured that proposition.

References were made to the fact that a private member should have brought forward such a bill. The hon. member for Dollard made such a reference and it was repeated by a number of his colleagues in the Liberal party. It seems to me that this attitude overlooks the essential function of parliament as a debating forum. Surely the debate that took place on the bill caused considerable discussion both in the house and throughout the country and as a result the government, whose function it is to assess and evaluate public opinion, was assisted tremendously.

The hon. member also made the statement that we must not forget the victims or the dependents of the victims. This was a trend in the debate which the hon. member for Dollard started and which gathered force as the debate continued on the second day. Speaker after speaker called out for sympathy, consideration and compassion for the victims of murder and their dependents. Certainly, the impression I gained in view of the rather loud applause which accompanied these continual references was that those of us who favoured the abolition of capital punishment were lacking in sympathy, understanding and appreciation of the plight of those people who remained.

I would remind the hon. member for Dollard, as well as other hon. members, that the first words I uttered in this debate were that I was not prompted by any lack of sympathy for the unfortunate victims of murder and their dependents, nor was I overly sympathetic to the accused. This rather unfortunate trend in the debate certainly was not accompanied by any positive suggestions from the retentionists to do something about the widows and orphans of the victims of murder.

I should like to put a suggestion before the house and the record will show that it was an abolitionist who put forward this proposal. A proposal has been circulated in England in these terms. In the case of murder, why should not the person responsible for the damage to the family of the victim be required to pay compensation in the same way as he would be if he were driving a car and, through negligence, killed somebody? The courts could decide that certain damages would be awarded to the victim or his dependents. It seems to me there is much merit in a proposal to have those found guilty of murder sentenced to life imprisonment in an institution where some money earning occupation could be undertaken. The money earned could be placed in a fund from which could be drawn money to assist, in a practical way, the victims and their dependents who may be in need.

Another factor worthy of consideration is that a fund could also be provided from which assistance could be given to the accused's family and children who may be in need. As I say, I am not putting this forward in any concrete form, but it seems to me this proposal is constructive and demonstrates some real interest and concern for the victims of murder and their dependents.

The hon. member went on to quote from the Bible. Many members on both sides of this question quoted from both the Old and the New Testaments in support of the views that they took. I do not want to make any reference to those questions now, but I would refer hon. members to the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) who, after studying the representations on both sides of this question, found an equal number of biblical quotations which were applicable to each side of the argument.

In concluding this portion of my statement, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that the hon. member said that capital punishment does not reflect any desire for revenge on the part of the public. I should like to agree with the hon. member in that connection but, as I have mentioned before, I am forced to conclude there is some element of revenge in the public attitude. A little while ago, I heard an hon. member shouting for a lynching and I have heard statements in buses and in the office following a particularly heinous murder that "hanging is too good for him; I should like to pull the rope myself".

This fact was never better illustrated than recently in New York when a person accused of raping and killing a child in that city was captured after an extensive search. A throng gathered outside the prison in which he was being held and many of these persons carried placards or shouted slogans.

I should like to read into the record some of the statements to indicate the feelings that may be aroused and ask you, Mr. Speaker, if perhaps revenge is not an element of the public's attitude. One person carried a sign reading, "The electric chair is too good for him; he should be burned alive." Another read, "I wanted to get him myself. The electric chair is too good for him. I'd like to set him on fire." Still another read, "We want to kill him piece by piece—not all at once."

I had a very interesting conversation with a member of the press gallery, who shall be nameless, over a cup of coffee today. He thought candidates for the gallows should be whipped every day before the hanging took place. As I say, Mr. Speaker, there is an ingredient in the public mind which would lead one to believe that revenge is an element of the public attitude toward these cases.

At that point in the debate the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) made an interjection which he later withdrew but which was raised again still later in the debate. He asked the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier) whether or not he was aware that before a trial took place each individual called to serve as a juror has to state whether he is opposed to the death penalty. I interjected to say that was not so. As I say, the hon. member corrected that statement later, but the subject did come up again. I think a statement to the effect this is not so should form part of the record of this house. It has been so in certain cases where the prosecution has seen fit to question individuals as they were reviewed before being selected for jury duty, but certainly there is no requirement that this be done.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the hon. member permit a question at this time? I think he will agree that when a prospective juror is called in these cases and he declares he is against the death penalty, he cannot serve on the panel of jurors?

Mr. McGee: As I indicated, this has happened. I believe it happened recently in Hull, and I also recall another occasion when a judge decided that one particular gentleman who put forward that view was, in a sense, malingering. The judge evidently thought this was an excuse to avoid duty. At that point the judge, in effect, I suppose, called him a liar and the man took his place on the jury. The point I wished to make was that there is no requirement that a statement of belief concerning capital judgment should be made.

The hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton) was the next one to say something about this question of commutation and the number of commutations which had been granted by the present government as compared with its predecessor. This, Mr. Speaker, affords me the opportunity of correcting another public impression. I shall not attempt to deal with the pattern and the place in our system served by commutation, but I should like to put into the record a statement by no less a person than Dean Wright of the University of Toronto law school. I must say that I was astonished to find a person in his position who, apparently, is not aware of how the law functions in Canada. When being interviewed by Mr. Howie Somerville on C.B.C.-T.V. he was asked the following question:

> What impact is the federal government's policy of commuting the death sentence having on Canada generally?

Dean Wright replied:

> It is obviously limiting capital punishment in a very real sense. While your opinion on capital punishment is purely a question of personal conviction, you cannot say it is right or wrong.

And this is the statement with which I took issue.

> I think it is definitely wrong for the cabinet to allow the courts to impose the death penalty, put a man in jeopardy of losing his life and then come along and disregard the letter of the law by following an entirely different policy.

I think you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that this is an astonishing statement to have been made by a dean of a law society.

The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stewart) followed and made a speech in which he made certain statements. I should like to apologize in part for the number of interjections I made at that time. I think the hon. member perhaps misread my intention. In outlining the safeguards inherent in our system he was making the statement that any person with good standing in a community is guaranteed a fair trial, and there followed a series of exchanges during which I tried to get him to amend that statement because it certainly was not consistent with any definition of a fair trial. Finally, he said:

> ... any person in the community is entitled to a fair trial and will get a fair trial if he is of decent standing.

It was the qualification "of decent standing" with which I took issue. As I say, in our philosophy of law or in the concept of law, as I know it, there certainly are not and certainly should not be any conditions attached to the persons in our society who are entitled to and guaranteed a fair trial. However, the hon. member proceeded—

Mr. Stewart: May I point out that the hon. member is not quoting me correctly. I did not use the word "guaranteed" at the time.

Mr. McGee: I beg the hon. member's pardon. That was one of the questions that arose.

Mr. Stewart: Quote me correctly.

Mr. McGee: His statement was:

> ... any person in the community who is entitled to a fair trial will get a fair trial if he is of decent standing.

I apologize. This is the statement that was made. However, the hon. member did come to grips with the propositions which I and other members put forward and he dealt with them point by point. He said that the first point I had raised was that capital punishment was not an effective deterrent. In reading back over my remarks I again say that does not square with what I said. I said that the point at issue here is whether capital punishment is a unique deterrent, whether there is something in the death penalty that makes it the only answer as a penalty for the crime of murder.

The whole argument with regard to deterrents in this debate has been that life imprisonment is a satisfactory alternative and has been demonstrated to be a satisfactory alternative by the experience of other countries, in some cases going back over 100 years.

Mr. Drysdale: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McGee: Yes.

Mr. Drysdale: One of the things that troubles me with regard to the hon. member's original statement in connection with life imprisonment is this, and I do not believe he clarified it at that particular point. By life imprisonment does he mean imprisonment for a person's natural life? The reason I am curious about that matter is this. He said that we can never be sure that everybody being hanged really committed a crime, but we may occasionally make a mistake. If the hon. member were going to be logical it appears to me that the converse would be true, namely that once a person has exhibited a tendency to kill, perhaps we could never be sure, if we released such a person, that he might not kill again.

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the hon. member is not rising in his own place.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member who rose is not the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry, the point of order is well taken. This is a point of order which should be observed. The hon. member is not in his seat and is not entitled, in the house, to speak except from his seat.

Mr. Drysdale: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I should like to challenge that point of order but perhaps at some other time.

Mr. Johnson: Could we remain on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, until the hon. member is able to reach his place and carry on with his question?

Mr. McGee: I should like to reply. At one point in the earlier stages of this debate I stated that I would accept as an alternative for capital punishment the punishment of imprisonment for life. That would mean that anybody convicted of murder would go to a special institution from which he would never be released unless some new evidence might be produced which would cast doubt on the original conviction. That was the view I held at that time.

During the interval that has elapsed since giving expression to that view a 14 year old boy by the name of Stephen Trescott was sentenced to be hanged. His sentence was very properly commuted. I have had second thoughts about that original proposition, attractive though it might have been in terms of gathering support for my bill. I simply could not convince myself that our society and our penal institutions have nothing more constructive to do with a 14 year old child than to put him in a cell and throw away the key. I find that I am not willing to accept that to be the case.

In the speech I made last year I said that the general criteria concerning the incarceration of convicted murderers should be based on the following general proposition, namely that no person convicted of murder should be released from custody in a correctional institution so long as his retention therein is essential to the welfare and safety of society and/or to his reformation or rehabilitation. Those would be the general standards which I would offer to those who would be working out the particular details.

Mr. Drysdale: Will the hon. member permit a question for clarification?

Mr. McGee: Yes.

Mr. Drysdale: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that in the present standing orders there is no provision indicating from what seat I should speak. However, I should like to take this matter up at some other time.

I wonder whether the hon. member will permit a question in reference to the statement he has made. Is it not logically inconsistent with the statement he has made that people should not be hanged because it is possible, through all the procedural methods, for some mistake to be made? Is not the converse true? Is it not possible that a mistake might still be made with respect to a person who has been incarcerated for life? Therefore, if he wishes to be logical in the one case, should not the person be kept in for the period of his natural life?

Mr. McGee: I agree. As I say, in order to be completely logical and consistent I should hold both views on both sides. But again I perhaps will reply by asking a question, a procedure which possibly is not a good debating tactic. However, I simply ask the hon. member this question. Does he not share my view that our penal institutions can have something more constructive to do than to lock up a 14 year old boy in a cell and throw away the key? As I say, I recognize that I have weakened my position or have given rise to the difficulties expressed by the hon. member. But those are my views as I hold them.

The next point raised by the hon. member for Charlotte was that capital punishment was morally wrong. This gives me an opportunity to clarify the record in another respect.

On February 18 a story appeared in the Ottawa Citizen, the heading of which read as follows:

> Duty of the State to Hang Murderers, R.C.'s Insist.

This heading was clearly not consistent with the content of that story and the release by the Canadian Catholic conference. This story was picked up and transmitted across the country, and as far as I have been able to determine this heading remained intact.

I heard earlier today that in fact the story was challenged by a number of letters to the Citizen and a correction was issued. I suggest this was in the terms of corrections to other news stories; it did not have the impact and coverage which the story originally received.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; the hon. member's time has expired. Without the consent of the house he has no time in which to answer a question.

Is it agreed that the hon. member who is moving this motion shall have additional time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, normally this would be quite agreeable, but I think it does place in an unfortunate position hon. members who wish to answer some of the points raised by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee). We have only a limited time available. I am not adverse to the hon. member proceeding for a few more moments, but I would not want this to cut off entirely the opportunity for other hon. members to speak.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the hon. member has the concurrence of the house to continuing for, shall we say five minutes?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member for York-Scarborough has in mind so far as time is concerned.

Mr. McGee: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I discussed this matter previously with several hon. members of the party to which the hon. member belongs. I indicated to them that it was my desire to try and complete an argument to rebut the great number of speeches made last year. That request was acceded to at that time.

Mr. Howard: That does not answer the question about the amount of time the hon. member requires.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The matter raised is not a point of order. The hon. member has 40 minutes in which to speak, except by unanimous consent of the house. Is there unanimous consent that the hon. member may proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the house. As I was saying, this statement was repeated and reissued. It was corrected by the Ottawa Citizen. Mr. Ed Mahoney, who has since graduated from the press gallery to editorial writer for the Toronto Telegram, was sufficiently concerned about the misconception involved in this statement that he approached this group and placed on the record of his own newspaper, and I presume others, the following statement:

"The state possesses authority from God to take the life of a criminal only when such a penalty is necessary to preserve the common good of all.

[Mr. Stewart.]

"If it should be discovered that long imprisonment serves equally well in deterring crime, then the death penalty would have to be abolished, for as soon as the need for it ceases, the state no longer possesses God's authority to use it".

Mr. Stewart: Would the hon. member permit a question? Did I understand the hon. member to say that I contended that capital punishment was morally wrong?

Mr. McGee: No, Mr. Speaker. I simply used the hon. member's reference to the question of morality in order to correct the record. If the hon. member would like to check his remarks, they are to be found on page 1210 of Hansard for February 18, 1960. Perhaps the hon. member would allow this reference to stand for those who are interested in following this matter through.

The hon. member then went on to say:

Then the third argument was that we hang convicted murderers with a feeling of revenge.

I dealt with several of the points raised on that matter earlier in my remarks, and I do not propose to pursue it further.

The hon. member went on to say:

Apparently the hon. member for York-Scarborough has forgotten those many safeguards which British and Canadian law provide for a person accused of a criminal charge.

I made it clear on previous occasions that I have the greatest respect for our judicial system. This was impressed upon me at every turn in my experience of serving on two successive murder juries. I am impressed by the British system and also others.

I suggest that the hon. member and others might find it more than interesting to read a book called "10 Rillington Place" written by Ludovic Kennedy and published by Gollancz press in England. This book deals with the evidence in the Christie case.

Hon. members will recall that in England a few years ago a man called Evans was arrested and charged with the murder of his wife and child. He was brought before the courts. The chief witness for the prosecution was a man called Christie, Evans' landlord at 10 Rillington Place. Evans was hanged.

A few years later Mr. Christie ran foul of the law and it was discovered that there were a number of bodies buried in his backyard. He had a number of bodies under the floor and a number walled up in the walls of the house. The victims included persons who had obviously been murdered before and after the departure of Evans. The method of murder followed an identical pattern throughout.

Christie was eventually hanged. I offer this case simply as one example where grave, grave, grave doubts have been raised concerning the guilt or innocence of Evans. An inquiry was held, and requests have been made for a further inquiry into the facts surrounding this case in order to determine whether Evans was guilty or innocent.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Is it not a fact that Evans confessed? He later retracted that confession, but he did make a confession.

Mr. McGee: In reply to the hon. member I should say that I sat up reading this book until about two o'clock the morning before last. I got about half-way through, and at the point when I put the book down reluctantly I think I was reading Evans' fifth confession. All his confessions differed materially.

Evans was a man with a mental age of 10½ years. He could neither read nor write. The strong suggestion of the defence and others who inquired into this matter was that the language and pattern of those confessions were dictated by the police to suit facts of which they had knowledge at that time.

However, I commend the book to the hon. member. If the second half is as fascinating as the first half, he will find it extremely interesting. And perhaps there are a couple more confessions which may vary as well; I do not know.

I should like to agree with the hon. member for Charlotte. We have an impressive judicial system, but it is a system made up of human beings. There are impressive guarantees in our system, but as long as human beings are human beings, mistakes will be made; and mistakes have been made.

The hon. member went on to discuss the question of deterrent. He said:

> Whether or not capital punishment is a deterrent or a sufficient deterrent is a matter of opinion. In my opinion it acts as a deterrent to the professionals who plan the crimes they commit—

Again, Mr. Speaker, there is considerable evidence to the contrary. This deterrent argument is not sound, because there are people in our society who have accumulated their motives, selected their victims and proceeded to commit murder.

The suggestion is that they are restrained from committing murder only because of the existence of the rope. If this seemingly plausible argument is sound, surely if the deterrent and the threat of the rope is removed the incidence of murder will increase.

The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) was next to speak on this subject. He put forward a very cogent argument. He challenged my submission to the house that the onus, or responsibility of proving the case that capital punishment is necessary rests upon those who would retain it. I repeat that statement. I offer again the accumulated evidence of 100 years, for this matter is no longer in the experimental stage. I submit that we are hanging persons for murder, and unless we can demonstrate the necessity for so doing I find it difficult to understand why support for it continues.

The hon. member for Calgary South made reference to certain increases in the crime rate in the interval when capital punishment was suspended. He quoted a figure of 14.8 per cent at one point during that interval. I am prepared to accept that statistic as being possible but I should also like to refer him and the house to the pattern of the crime rate during the 18-month period before abolition, the period during abolition and the period immediately after abolition. I think the figures are 285 before, 260 during and 310 or so following. This indicates that although there may have been a slight increase within the period, as an experimental period it supported the abolitionist contention.

The hon. member concluded his speech by making reference to the theme that those of us who would abolish capital punishment are not concerned with the victims, and an impressive statement it was. Again I would remind the house that all through those debates the only constructive efforts which were put forward to provide in a tangible way for an approach to this question came from those who would abolish the death penalty.

The hon. member went on to say that we were being asked to abolish a provision which had made Canada relatively free of crime as compared with other countries. Here we come to an old argument. The hon. member says we should retain capital punishment because our crime rate is low. Persons writing to me from Toronto and Montreal where crime rates have increased say we cannot abolish the death penalty because crime rates are increasing. As I said last year in the debate, one cannot have it both ways. It cannot be argued that we should retain the death penalty because the crime rate is decreasing while at the same time arguing that we should retain it now that the crime rate is going up.

One other matter which I wanted to cover was raised by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) who also had a motion or a bill on the order paper; it may still be there. The hon. member had this to say. He said that we had in Canada partially abolished capital punishment, and then he went on to suggest that we should consider leaving the judges free to inflict the death penalty or to condemn those accused to life sentences according to the gravity or the circumstances of the crime.

It seems to me that this proposal fails on two important grounds. It fails on the one hand because it attempts to pass the buck—in other words it asks somebody other than parliament to render a decision on capital punishment. The second shortcoming of the proposal is this. It seems to me that after a relatively short period—a year or so—a pattern would emerge. Certain judges would be known as hanging judges and certain others would be known as non-hanging judges. It seems to me that the variations in the equal treatment of persons who appear before the courts are sufficient at present without adding this extra factor where the decision as to whether a man lives or dies would depend on the judge selected to try the case. I think on these two grounds the proposition fails.

Mr. Howard: May I ask the hon. member a question? I preface it by saying it deals with the indication in the speech from the throne that the minister himself will bring in some amendment regarding capital punishment. I wonder what the hon. member's thoughts are concerning the probable comments of his colleagues who were either vehemently opposed to or in favour of capital punishment. How does he think they will vote when the minister presents his bill?

Mr. McGee: I am not prepared to speak for anybody in this house apart from myself, but if that bill develops so as to limit the application of the death penalty I would certainly support it as a measure moving towards abolition. I pointed out earlier in my remarks some of the difficulties which have been encountered in the United Kingdom in attempting to stop half way; but it strikes me as reminiscent of a young fellow in our gang as a youngster who every time the score was going against him in a ball game took his ball and went home. I would not like to be in that position. I would support any move toward abolition. I feel that the public attitude and public opinion on this matter will ultimately be such that we shall see capital punishment abolished.

Mr. Speaker: Six o'clock.

Before adjourning the house I should like to say that the adjournment which I propose will be on the basis that the house accepts local official time. As we go on to daylight saving time next week the adjournment will be on the basis of daylight saving time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house if there is any change in the order of business which is being announced?

Mr. Churchill: No, Mr. Speaker, there is no change.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 1, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DELAYED FILING OF PARLIAMENTARY DOCUMENTS

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will find on their desks the report of debates and Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day. I trust that hon. members will be content to put up with the inconvenience of not having these documents filed out of regard for the page boys and their schooling in these extended hours we are sitting. If hon. members will leave these papers on their desks at noon, they will be filed during the luncheon recess.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East) presented the second report of the standing committee on external affairs, and asked for unanimous consent to move that the report be concurred in.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, on that point I should like to indicate that it is going to be extremely difficult if not at some times impossible for those who sit on this side of the house to attend the meetings of this committee at the same time as the house is sitting, and I wish to draw your attention—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member defer his remarks until a motion is made later on. The house may not give consent to the motion being moved. If it does the matter may be raised when the motion is moved.

Has the hon. member unanimous consent to make this motion?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I rise to reiterate what I said earlier in connection with this report which seeks the authority of the house to sit while the house is sitting. I say it is going to be nigh impossible for those of us who sit on this side to attend the meetings of this committee and I presume the meetings of other committees which will follow and which will sit while the house is sitting.

I have in my hand Votes and Proceedings for Friday, April 28, and for Tuesday, May 2. I see that there are no less than seven committees that will be sitting from 9.30 a.m. until 11 o'clock, I take it, and then afterward while the house is sitting. Certainly the committee for which authority is sought now will sit while the house is sitting. I wish to reiterate that this is not in keeping with the best traditions of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member object to the motion being moved?

Mr. Chevrier: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: What the hon. member for Laurier has said will be taken into account in connection with the motion.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group, in principle, are strongly opposed to committees meeting while the house is sitting. However, there are very special and particular circumstances in connection with the meetings of this committee. First of all, the committee recognizes the demands on the time of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In fairness to him I think we must give some consideration to that matter and to his necessary absences from Ottawa on extremely important business.

In the second place, it is possible that during the period while this committee is sitting, some witnesses may wish to come and give evidence before the committee who have to travel a distance of over 2,000 miles. The committee thought we should have this provision in order to suit their convenience and also their pocketbooks in so obliging.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO EFFECT GENERAL REVISION

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-86, to amend the Fisheries Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Explain.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, if any explanation is necessary at this time, may I say that this is a general revision of the Fisheries Act. It changes a number of the present sections. Among other things, it removes the power of a fisheries officer to act as a justice of the peace. It will amend the section which categorically prohibits certain Canadian fishing vessels from fishing within the first nine miles of the high seas adjacent to Canadian territorial waters in the maritime provinces. It extends the application of the act to the high seas as far as Canadian vessels are concerned. It repeals certain sections that no longer have any practical application.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM AMOUNT OF BANK LOANS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act to provide that the maximum amount of bank loans made during the period ending on the 30th day of June, 1962 shall be four hundred million dollars, an increase of one hundred million dollars.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANAL CHANNELING, PITT RIVER-BURRARD INLET

Motion No. 112—Mr. Regier:

For a copy of all reports and maps submitted to the government by the Fraser river board (formerly known as the Fraser river basin board) as to the possibilities of channeling the Pitt river into Burrard inlet by way of a canal.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the only information with respect to channeling between Pitt river and Burrard inlet that has been submitted to the government by the Fraser river board is contained in the board's interim report of 1956 and the board's preliminary report dated October 31, 1958.

This latter report has already been tabled by my predecessor on January 20, 1959, who made a brief statement at that time as reported in Hansard of that date. There is another report, the Fraser river board's report of 1956. I understand that a number of hon. members, including the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier), have been given a copy of this report, but I should be quite happy to table it if this is the wish of the hon. member.

Mr. Regier: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I should like to have it tabled.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the explanation, does the hon. member wish to drop his motion?

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

Mr. Regier: If the minister is going to let me have a look at the report.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point raised, Mr. Speaker, since the minister is prepared to table the document I think the motion should be carried and the document tabled in accordance with the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Would the mover prefer to have the motion put?

Mr. Regier: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

COMBINES BRANCH REPORT ON NEW DRUGS

Motion No. 113—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of the statement of evidence by the combines investigation branch regarding the selling and pricing policies of certain pharmaceutical houses in respect of new types of drugs.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit this motion to stand until the next day motions arise.

Mr. Howard: I should be glad to, Mr. Speaker.

Motion stands.

AIR ROUTE SURVEY AND INDUSTRY STUDY

Motion No. 114—Mr. Chevrier:

For a copy of the report of the air transport board consequent upon a survey made of domestic and international air routes and a study into the air industry following public hearings held at different areas in Canada.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, no report such as has been requested has been made by the air transport board. However, the board has from time to time made the customary reports on domestic and international policy matters, and an interdepartmental report has also been prepared for study by the government. These are of course privileged documents.

As regards public hearings in Canada, the air transport board, following a staff study of regional air carriers, has held a series of public hearings in eastern Canada and will shortly hold additional hearings in the western regions in the near future. For this reason I wonder whether my hon. friend would consider withdrawing his motion.

Mr. Chevrier: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

QUEEN'S REGULATIONS AND ORDERS, R.C.N.

Motion No. 115—Mr. Regier:

For a copy of the Queen's regulations and orders for the Royal Canadian Navy.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Queen's regulations and orders for the Royal Canadian Navy is a public document, available from the Queen's printer. I understand the parliamentary library does not have a copy of these regulations but it could, if the hon. member asked for it, borrow the document from the national defence library for him.

Mr. Regier: That will be satisfactory, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he could report to the house on the deterioration in the situation in Laos and its possible effect on the work of the international commission, of which Canada is a member.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, no agreement has yet been reached between the parties to the Laotian conflict on a cease fire. It seems possible, however, from the most recent reports that a meeting for this purpose may be held today.

The international commission for supervision and control in Laos held its opening meeting in New Delhi on Friday, April 28. A message from the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) was read to the meeting by the Canadian commissioner, Mr. Léon Mayrand. Perhaps the house would agree that the text of this message should be printed as an appendix to Hansard. The commission later discussed the report which it will make to the co-chairmen concerning its immediate tasks and functions. I hope that agreement on this report will be reached at a further meeting of the commission to be held today, and that the report will immediately be dispatched to the governments of the United Kingdom and the Soviet union.

Hon. members will of course realize that I am not in a position at this stage to discuss the contents of this report but I think there is a reasonable chance that the report will be agreed to by the various governments represented on the commission and that it will urge that the commission be sent to Laos as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give consent to the suggestion that the document referred to be printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of document above referred to, see appendix.]

TABLE OF DISABILITIES, PENSION ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. On March 27 the house unanimously approved motion No. 93 ordering the production of the table of disabilities. Would the minister mind checking to see why it has taken so long to table what is a routine document in the hands of the pension commission?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I will so so, Mr. Speaker.

INDUSTRY

SHIPBUILDING—REPORTED DELAYS PENDING NEW LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the long delayed legislation to assist the shipbuilding industry, which has been announced on more than one occasion in the house, will be made retroactive to the date of its announcement.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): It will not be possible to answer that question today. As a matter of fact I think the hon. member for Laurier would agree that it would be unusual for a statement of that kind to be made prior to the actual introduction of the legislation.

Mr. Chevrier: The question was prompted by the fact that the Prime Minister in announcing legislation the other day listed a number of items but said nothing about legislation to assist the shipbuilding industry.

Mr. Green: I shall have the question looked into further.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Is the Acting Prime Minister aware of the fact—and it is a fact—that a good many plans for shipbuilding are being held up, and have been held up for some months, pending a decision as to what the government intends to do about this legislation, and that this is having an adverse effect on employment particularly in an area of great interest to the minister?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Green: I suggest the hon. member is now just making a little political speech and not asking a question.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order raised by the Acting Prime Minister, which I think is in disagreement with the ruling Your Honour made on Friday, I would point out that I asked the hon. gentleman if he is aware of the fact that shipbuilding is being held up, particularly on the west coast.

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps the odds are even.

(Translation):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister read the statement made by an official of Davie Ship Building in Lauzon, as reported in a morning newspaper, referring to the fact that out of several thousand workers who were employed in that yard, there are now only 900, due to uncertainly as to the government's plans with regard to assistance to shipbuilding. Could the minister comment on that statement?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have read the statement made, I think, by Mr. Black, as reported in a Saturday newspaper. That is probably the statement to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. Chevrier: I am referring to the statement made by Mr. Lowery.

Mr. Balcer: I have not read the latter's statement. As we have already indicated, that legislation will be considered during this session. I think the Canadian shipbuilding industry will certainly be willing to wait another week or two, in view of the fact that it waited twenty-two years under the former government.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SECONDARY MORTGAGE MARKET—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam who inquired on Thursday last as to whether an opportunity would be available to discuss the formation of a second mortgage market under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, I find it will be unnecessary to have legislation to implement this, but I can assure my hon. friend that he will no doubt have a full opportunity to debate the matter when we are considering the estimates relating to C.M.H.C.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Chown (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, today being May 1, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether he has as yet fixed the day for the presentation of his budget?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, and I do not think it will be possible to present the budget during the first half of this month.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

TORONTO—INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON CRIME SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Trinity asked me a question which appears on page 4097 of Hansard for April 28, 1961, inquiring as to whether I had been consulted in respect to the proposed international conference to thresh out the crime situation in Toronto and adjoining areas. In reply, I would like to advise that I was not consulted, but on Thursday last the commissioner of the R.C.M. Police received a telephone call from a member of one of the police commissions interested and was asked if he would attend a proposed meeting. He replied that he would attend.

That is all that has happened to date. As hon. members will appreciate, the announcement of the proposed discussion was made on Friday, and all we have in connection therewith is that telephone call to the commissioner asking if he would attend a proposed meeting.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask a supplementary question to that which has just been answered by the Minister of Justice, and direct it to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Could that minister say whether she has any evidence in her department that there are frequent border crossings by persons who are suspected of being involved in organized criminal activities?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. This type of information is not necessarily collected by my department and, as the hon. member knows, with some 60 million border crossings taking place each year it is a little difficult to screen them.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC PARTICIPATION IN DAILY PRAYERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to whom I should direct this question, but I wonder whether I could inquire as to the possibility of opening the doors to the galleries during the time prayers are in progress, in order that the general public may participate with us in our daily prayers.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ALBERTA—BESTOWAL OF RANK OF INDIAN PRINCESS ON OTTAWA MAYOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I apologize for not sending him notice, but I have been very busy. Does the government intend to send a representative to the ceremony to be held in Alberta in the near future when Mayor Charlotte Whitton of Ottawa is to be adopted as a daughter and raised to the rank of princess by one of the Indian tribes there? I ask this in view of the Minister of Justice having arranged to have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police band in attendance?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, speaking on behalf of the Department of External Affairs, the answer is no. We consider that Alberta is still in Canada.

FREIGHT RATES

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask him whether, in view of the fact that the Freight Rates Reduction Act expired on April 30 and today being the first of May, freight rates have gone up?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the government has been advised by the presidents of the two railway companies that they are going to file new freight rates, so shippers will not be charged increased freight rates as of today.

National Design Council

Mr. Gordon Chown (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister advise the house whether he intends or proposes to refer the resolution to amend the Freight Rates Reduction Act, after first reading, to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, it has been the practice in the past when this act was amended to refer this legislation to the committee, and I think it is intended to follow the same course.

TELEVISION

SASKATOON—RECOMMENDATION OF BOARD OF GOVERNORS RESPECTING LOCATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he is now in a position to answer the question I put to him on Friday, which he took as notice, with respect to representations concerning the Swift Current television station. I think the minister has perhaps had a chance now to make inquiries in this regard.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I inquired this morning about this matter. Unfortunately I cannot answer the question now, but I can assure my hon. friend that I will have an answer tomorrow morning.

NATIONAL DESIGN

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF COUNCIL

Hon. Gordon Churchill (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-85, for the establishment of a national design council.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have before me a few notes which are not my own. They have been prepared by somebody else. I should now like to introduce to the house my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Thank you. Knowing that I was going to be in the house for the next hour and a half, I left for a very important reason and I am glad to return.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the house will accept the motion now from the minister himself, so that he will not be considered to be closing the debate at this time.

Mr. Chevrier: I think we should hear from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer).

National Design Council

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, in December, 1960, responsibility for the national industrial design council was transferred from the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. For a number of years the council had functioned as a committee of the national gallery of Canada. Its prime responsibility was to foster greater appreciation and use of good industrial design in Canada. In addition the council worked closely with the design centre in Ottawa where exhibits of good design were on public display. Also, the council sponsored a number of travelling exhibitions of good design.

In recent years the council and design centre were increasingly active in the field of industrial and commercial design. It was thought, therefore, that this work could more appropriately be carried out in closer liaison with the Department of Trade and Commerce. For the reasons it was deemed advisable to transfer the council to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to make the staff of the gallery, assigned to this work, a part of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

The government places great importance on the development of good design as one means of helping to make Canadian goods competitive with those of other countries. It is not always realized that design as well as price is an important factor in market competitiveness. Good design incorporates two basic features, style and function. A commodity must be designed in such a way that it can be readily used to its full potential.

With respect to industrial goods this is an important cost factor. Industrial goods should be designed so they can be used most efficiently while in operation. At the same time they must incorporate such features as safety, adaptability and ease of servicing. In any industrial enterprise these are important cost considerations. The functional qualities of commodities are also important factors in the sale of consumer goods. Appliances, household utensils, clothing, recreational goods and the great range of consumer items should each be designed to best fulfil their intended functions if they are to receive consumer approval.

In designing a product, however, style is also important. If a commodity is to sell it should be pleasing. It must have an attractive and decorative form which complements its functional qualities. Both industry and the general public are becoming more conscious of good design and are demanding that good design be incorporated in the goods they purchase. It must be emphasized that, with the present state of competition in markets both at home and abroad, Canadian industry cannot afford to ignore design as a basic competitive factor. Canada's competitors are fully aware of this importance. They are continually devoting time and resources to the development and improvement of commodity design which will give them competitive advantages.

If Canadian products are to be able to compete effectively with those of other countries they must also incorporate the best in design as well as compare favourably in both quality and price. Basic design thinking, from the choice of raw materials to the method of production, the actual product design, and the manner of packaging can result in a better product in terms of cost to the producer and in terms of function and appearance to the purchaser. This is an enormous field of endeavour, and full co-operation among manufacturers, distributors, consumers and government is needed if we are to achieve the desired results.

In order to better assist Canadian industry in achieving these objectives it has been decided by the government to introduce legislation to place the national design council on a more permanent basis, and to give it a recognized official status. The council is to consist of 17 members chosen from the fields of industry and commerce, distribution, architecture, design and engineering, and from departments of government which have a specialized interest in design. In addition there is provision for representation from the general public on the council. Members will be appointed by the governor in council to serve for three-year terms.

The objects of the council are to promote and expedite improvement of design in the products of Canadian industry. The council will plan and implement programs to create an awareness by industry and the general public of the need for good design. It will develop methods of achieving improved design, assist industry in developing and applying good design techniques, and organize and assist committees to implement programs to foster good design. It will encourage study and research in design and will be able to recommend the granting of scholarships and grants for such purposes. For a number of years the council has sponsored the granting of awards of merit to Canadian products of outstanding design. This work will be continued and expanded.

It is the government's intention that in the future the council will work in closer co-operation with Canadian designers, manufacturers, distributors and representatives of the general public. While the main responsibility for developing good designs must rest with Canadian industry, we believe that the council and the Department of Trade and Commerce can give valuable assistance to industry in achieving these goals. I might mention that government sponsored design councils and agencies in the United Kingdom and Europe, particularly in the Scandinavian countries, have been active for a considerable time and have achieved notable successes. We are very hopeful that the newly constituted council will continue the good work of its predecessor, and that as a result of this legislation it will be in a position to be an even more effective instrument of making Canadian design second to none.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, we live in a country where we trade not only because we have commodities to trade but also because we have commodities which we must trade. Canada is a trading country, and as such nobody would deny the importance of good design in those commodities which we have to sell. Good design in those commodities is not only important in selling them within the confines of our own country; good design is also important if our commodities are to be sold in the markets of the world. Our commodities, to be sold in Canada and in the markets of the world, must not only be attractive as far as price is concerned but must also be attractive as far as design is concerned.

I think every effort should be made to arrive at some basic design which can be recognized as a Canadian design and not merely a variation in style based on the design of some other country. I think there is a distinct difference between style and basic design. If our commodities are going to be attractive to people in other countries our basic design should be such as to be recognized as distinctively Canadian. Our design should be such as to meet the modern demands which are made of design.

I think, for example, of good Canadian design in household and office furniture, household appliances, children's toys, electronic equipment; and particularly I think of good design in commodities which are going to be sold to tourists who visit our country during the warmer part of the year. I believe there is something fundamentally wrong in selling to tourists commodities that are produced in their own country.

Not only do we want to develop commodities for the tourist trade that are national in design, but we should develop commodities which are regional in design for sale to tourists. I would hope that in the not too distant future serious consideration might be given to the commodities that form an important part of our tourist trade, to the end that they would be designed not only nationally but on a regional basis. If a commodity were designed nationally it should be designed in such a way to be recognized as Canadian, and if designed for regional purposes it should be designed in such a way as to be recognized as coming from a particular region of Canada.

Another field to which we should give serious consideration is that of packaging. We have a great many commodities in this country which we want to sell particularly in our groceterias and large chain stores. Packaging, here, is particularly important. I believe that a good deal of work can be done in order to ensure that the designs produced for packaged foodstuffs and other articles are such as to attract the people who would wish to buy them.

I entirely agree with the purpose of this bill. I believe it is a good move to have the national design council removed from the national gallery to the Department of Trade and Commerce at a time when we are particularly aware of the need for increasing our sales abroad. However, I should point out that this bill is not going to give the government authority to do any more than it now has authority to do.

The industrial design committee was formed in June of 1948. This committee was charged with the responsibility of ensuring that Canadian talent was used to the fullest possible extent in developing good Canadian design. If we examine the bill now before us we can see very clearly that it provides nothing new. While all of us here would be in accord with the principle of the bill, it requires to be pointed out that this is a field in which the government already is authorized to act.

In 1953 the original committee changed its name to the national industrial design council. Its purpose was to promote a greater use of Canadian talent in designing all types of consumer goods. At that time there were 30 members appointed to this committee drawn from the fields of manufacturing, retailing, industry, design, research, education and government. A further purpose of the committee was to do everything possible to provide complete information on contemporary design. It also decided that it should award scholarships to students attending university both in our own country and abroad.

One of the main purposes of this committee in the beginning was to study the economic relationship between good design and stability in the industries concerned. Over the years this committee has made a considerable contribution to the design of Canadian commodities. I do not think, however, Canada over the years has been able to attain a particularly important place in world design. I believe that with the raw materials and the industries we have, and with a great deal of attention being paid to good Canadian design by this council, an important contribution could be made. I wish to point out again, however, that while all of us would agree with the purpose of this bill, it does not provide to the present government authority to do those things for which it does not already have authority.

Finally, I wish to reiterate that I believe that in the commodities we have to sell in this country and abroad, a design should be achieved which could be recognized as distinctively Canadian. With a distinctively Canadian design, with prices that are competitive and with materials that are recognized as being of good quality, I believe we shall be able to sell our commodities in increased quantities to other countries of the world.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I believe all hon. members will agree that the principle of this bill is good. The transfer of the design council to the Department of Trade and Commerce, where we feel it rightly belongs, should prove of benefit. This bill is important if only because of the fact that the minister states that more effort will be devoted to the functions of the design council.

It is most unfortunate that Canada definitely has been lagging behind in the field of design as compared with other countries of the world. Irrespective of where the responsibility lies, it cannot be ignored that in sales abroad Canada has been resting on its oars. We have been guilty of thinking that we would continue to enjoy a seller's market as we have in past years. We did not anticipate finding ourselves in our present position in a buyer's market.

If Canada is to increase sales at home, considerable research must be undertaken in designing goods for home consumption that will meet the requirements of Canadian buyers. We are not facing up to facts when we state that a buy Canadian program is not having the hoped for result if no effort is being made to improve the design of commodities for domestic consumption to favourably compete with imported products.

While it is important that design research be undertaken with respect to products for domestic consumption, it is also essential that great attention be paid to design in terms of export trade. I think we should note that what might appeal to the purchaser at home does not of necessity appeal to the purchaser abroad. In the extended work of the design council I sincerely hope that every possible effort will be made to convince the manufacturing industry in Canada that they must have an understanding of the thinking and the requirements of the people abroad to whom we wish to sell our goods. I know that on many occasions in the past in countries outside Canada I have found that people will say they like our product and inquire why it is not designed to meet their requirements. As I say, Canada has been resting on her oars. Canadian industry has been lagging behind and not recognizing the fact that we just cannot sit back and wait for orders to come in.

I also want to say that I think it is most opportune that on this very matter of design there was a most interesting program on television last week. I think we should take not of that broadcast and of what was said, because the people who were interviewed had some interest in design. They included, shall I say, captains of industry, research men and the head of the national research council.

What did we hear from all those men? We heard that Canada is not doing the job it should do on research and on design. The opinion was almost unanimous that Canada is far behind other countries, particularly the United States and the Scandinavian countries, in this matter of design. It was pointed out that only a few countries are paying much attention to research and design.

I do not know how it is going to be done, but I feel that this council has a big task ahead of it in trying to drive home to industry the fact that this is a subject with regard to which they cannot rely on the design council nor upon the national research council, but that they have a most serious responsibility which they themselves must accept. The council is going to be obliged to exert every possible bit of influence and pressure on industry, which unfortunately in the past has wanted to sit back and hope that its profits will continue. Also when there is something new in the way of design, the manufacturers of Canada, if possible, must expand their facilities and produce those goods themselves.

I think the people of Canada who viewed that C.B.C. program last week must have been positively shocked and taken aback at what I would term the betrayal of Canada as a country and of the Canadian people as workers, when the complete evidence was given of new designing done by Canadian research workers and of the fact that nobody wanted to take advantage of it or of the new product and put it into production, with the result that in the one instance the licence was sold to a firm in the United States. That was an instance of Canadian designing but no Canadian production. We are now importing from the United States a product which was designed in Canada and which Canada, as a manufacturing country, refused to produce. In another instance something new was designed in Canada but Canada would not touch it. Now the licence is in the United Kingdom, and we are going to import the product into Canada.

I have just used these instances in order to point out the great task which lies ahead of this continuing design council under the Department of Trade and Commerce. To use a slang term, we must pull up our socks, we must not lag behind; if it is possible we must establish leadership. All I can say is that I hope the design council can get this message of research and design across to Canadian industry so that we can not only maintain but may expand the purchase of goods which are made in Canada by Canadians and meet the competition from abroad, where research is going on at such a rapid pace.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this bill. First I should like to commend the minister on the idea set forth. However, the bill only sets up the council. As we all know, the success of the council will depend entirely upon its personnel, and in a minute or so I want to say something about that matter.

Both in their own minds and in the minds of people in a good many other countries there is the idea that Canadians are the producers and manufacturers of the utilitarian. This is one of the drawbacks that we in Canada are obliged to face. I am hopeful that the design council will start in a new direction from that traditional understanding of the Canadian product. We know of products of many types that have gone off the market in recent years for the sole reason that they have not competed in design, in appeal or in ideas with products imported from other countries. Many disappear from the market through lack of imagination on the part of manufacturers who in the past have found a ready market for their products and have been satisfied just to go on so long as the product was sold.

If there is anything that Canada needs in its export trade I believe it is a flair for design, for something different, which will bring it at least up to and possibly beyond the standards of other countries. I am thinking particularly of furniture, silverware, toys and novelties, all of which we are fully capable of manufacturing in Canada but which have fallen behind the products of many other countries in the matter of design, appeal and something new.

I think this is one of the problems which the design council will be obliged to face. As I said, I believe that the personnel of this council will be its most important feature. I hope the council will not be overloaded with members of the stolid, traditional types. I hope we shall not find too many of the personnel listed on it, from the government service and from the traditional manufacturers to the point where any bright ideas that might come up for consideration will be sat upon. I should like to see three or four crackpots put on this council.

An hon. Member: Who is available?

Mr. Aiken: Perhaps the general public would put them into that classification, but I refer to people capable of doing advanced thinking, even ahead of our time, on matters of design and artistic practicability. I do not think the minister needs to designate which of the individuals he appoints would come in this category. However, I hope there will be on the design council persons with advanced artistic knowledge so they will bring up the standard of the council to a point where they will accept and promote new and novel ideas in the design of Canadian products.

I think it would be very depressing and an absolute waste of time if we were merely going to pass a bill and put on the council persons who will not advance the ideas which are really behind the bill. Therefore I say to the minister, do not be too traditional in the members who are selected for this council; let us see something of an advance in the traditional Canadian type of utilitarian product which has been manufactured.

I should like to make one further comment, and this concerns the remarks made by the hon. member who preceded me. The hon. member mentioned two cases in which Canadians had manufactured or designed products which could not be produced in Canada. Within my riding there is an example of the other side of the coin, where the minister's department has assisted very much in the production of a Canadian product. For almost a year I have been making efforts on behalf of a man who has designed the most advanced type of printing press in the world today. This is known as the Stroud press. It has attracted the attention of manufacturers in Germany, Sweden and the United States, all of whom have sent persons to look at this particular press. It has also been examined by the national research council and the Queen's printer's office, and has been found to be advanced in its design to the point where it is revolutionary.

The inventor of this press is a patriot who wishes this press to be manufactured in Canada. He has encountered great difficulties. It would be very easy for him to merely sell his patent, as other persons have done, and let the product be manufactured outside this country. However, he has fought for some months now, with the assistance of the minister's department, and it appears that this press is going to be manufactured in Canada with assistance from the Department of Trade and Commerce, the industrial development bank and perhaps with accommodation rented from the Department of Defence Production.

If this develops to the point we hope it will, this will be an excellent example of the manufacture in Canada of a product of new design for export. I wanted to mention this one example in order to illustrate that it is possible, with the assistance of this department, to manufacture products of new design in this country. This can be done, and objects of new design can be accepted, promoted and manufactured in Canada and exported from this country.

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in connection with this bill because of the relationship it may have to the existing and proposed legislation for the protection of industrial designs. As the house knows, we have an old design act in Canada. This act was passed in 1906, and seeks to give a designer some protection for the shape, appearance or configuration of an article of manufacture. This particular act has been very unsatisfactory.

In 1958 we received a report from the royal commission on patents, copyrights, trademarks and industrial designs relating particularly to industrial designs which could be covered by this legislation. The bill, of course, gives no definition—I do not know whether it is necessary—of what is a design. However, it is interesting to note that there are many kinds of designs; there are mechanical designs, artistic designs and designs relating to the shape, appearance or configuration of an article of manufacture.

I suppose this bill would not cover what could be called an artistic design in the sense of something which really belongs to the arts, but rather would have to do with commercial and industrial designs. The latter is exactly what the old industrial design act covered and protected, and this subject matter will be covered also if the house passes another bill in the future as a result of the report made by the royal commission.

My request to the minister is to find out whether this bill will be related to the industrial design act in such away that if the government assists or suggests designs for industry through this council, it will seek to give protection to the council, to the person who designed it, and to industry, or whether the design will be made available to the country free of any charge or royalty. As the minister knows, we have gone pretty far in patents, for example. We know that the research council has a very large patent department. Although research is carried out at the expense of the people of Canada, the council obtains patents and royalties are charged to the public who use the patents.

I certainly would not like this idea to creep into this new act, by regulation or otherwise. On the other hand, the line must be drawn as to whether an individual who has invented, if you wish to use that word, or perfected a design and has received some assistance from the council, shall be barred from protection, as against a person who has not sought any assistance at all. Perhaps the minister understands my point. I hope he does. There is that line where an individual creating a new design for industry receives protection now, and will receive more protection under the new act than he has received in the past; whereas I hope a design created exclusively by the council, or entirely with their assistance, will be made available to the public freely, without charge. There is also the case of the poor individual who creates a design in part and receives only some assistance from the council; there is a point as to whether he should receive any protection at all.

This is the only matter I wish to take up at this time, because I do not see anything objectionable in this bill. On the contrary, I think we all agree that we need new designs and shapes for articles of all types manufactured in Canada. However, I think the regulations should be more specific on the question of protection. They could perhaps also be more specific with regard to the definition of a design. There is no definition of a design in this bill, and it might be well to think about this matter.

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I should like at this time to approve the principle of this bill. I feel that if this council works in conjunction with industry and our research departments here in Ottawa it could have a very beneficial effect on industry in general in this country. However, I do not like to see Canada sold short, as it were, because I feel that we in this country are quite advanced in many designs both in industry and in different types of manufacturing.

Look at our tourist industry, for example. We have a wide variety of articles which tourists pick up while in Canada, but I hear many tourists complain very bitterly that one can hardly buy any kind of Canadian designed souvenir that is made in Canada. Foreign countries copy our totem poles, our Maid of the Mist plates and design, our mounted police, our Quebec figurettes and our Eskimo carvings. All these things are definitely of Canadian design, but unfortunately there does not seem to be anything to prevent other countries copying them. Therefore I think in the setting up of this council we must not only consider the question of helping to create new designs for commodities of one kind and another, but also protecting them after they have been designed.

I hope the minister will give that point some consideration, because I think it is very important. I do not think I have anything else to say at this time. Much could be said about this matter. I do feel it is not only a question of designing; it is also a matter of protecting the design after it has been made. Again I must say I disagree with some hon. members when they say that Canada is lagging in design. I do not say we are leading, but in my opinion we are certainly not lagging.

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): I wish to add a few remarks to those already made with reference to this proposed new council. I congratulate the minister on taking the responsibility of accepting an idea proposed and first instituted by the prior administration and in this way complimenting the minister who was at that time responsible.

The party to which I belong has long been interested in design and in the promotion of Canadian manufactured goods which by their design and by their functionality will be able to compete here at home and abroad. No one, I suppose, on this side of the house or on the other side would suggest that better and more suitable design could at any time be a bad thing. However, in the set up of the national design council in Bill No. C-85 which is now before us it may be noted that there is very little dependence on the type of person who might be expected to be called upon, who would be interested by way of his profession. It is noted that only four members will be chosen from the fields of architecture, design and engineering out of a total of 17.

It might be suggested that since design is the whole purpose of the bill there are many in these fields within the dominion who should be called upon, who have formed professional organizations and who should find a place on this council. There is, in fact, a professional association in Canada which is known as the association of Canadian industrial designers, and one would expect that members of that association might be found in the make-up of the proposed council.

There was one reference to a conceivable drawback that was made by the hon. member for Ottawa East and referred to very briefly, I think, by the hon. member for Lincoln, who spoke earlier. In Canada we have had for some years a design council which has been under the aegis of the national gallery. We have had very little advance in new design, and I do wish to make a submission to the minister who will be responsible for this council that perhaps one of the things which will be necessary is the reform of our laws with respect to patents and copyrights and in particular to the registration of new designs.

The Ilsley commission has already been referred to. It was set up by the prior administration, and reported in 1958. There is a report to which I would refer the minister which is available in the library of parliament. It recommends that there should be protection of industrial design, and it may well be that one of the factors inhibiting Canadian designers is that they are not able effectively to obtain the fruit of their labour by registering their designs. In the report of the Ilsley commission there is consideration of recent legislation in the United Kingdom which tightens this matter and a consideration of the pros and cons of extending such provisions.

The Ilsley commission was not able to come to a firm conclusion as to whether giving protection to those who caused new industrial designs to come into being was something which solidified design or whether it was some thing which caused more activity in the design field. But these learned gentlemen, after hearing briefs from a number of interested persons, including a brief from the national design council through its representatives, found themselves in favour of protection and recommended to the government of the day, which is the minister's government, that a new act be drawn which would give to those who created new designs a degree of protection.

I would refer the minister particularly to page 11 of that report of the royal commission on patents, copyrights, trademarks and industrial design, published in 1958 by the Queen's printer. On page 11 appears the report of the Snow committee, which was a committee set up in England to consider this question. The report is properly called the report of the departmental committee appointed by the president of the board of trade of the United Kingdom to consider the patents and designs act. This report goes into some detail regarding the benefit to increasingly good design to be obtained by protecting the holder of the design.

There are, it is true, a number of problems to be considered. There is in existence now the registration act, which is considered to be ineffective and which has been found by those who have perfected new designs not to give them adequate protection. I suggest, therefore, that attention be given not only by the minister but by his colleague the Secretary of State to the revision of those statutes in order that new designs as they are promoted, encouraged and brought into being in Canada shall be assisted, so that one who does a great deal of work and expends a great deal of time in causing these designs to come into being shall be able to obtain, at least for a limited period, protection of that work and talent.

I also suggest to the minister who will be responsible for the new design council that relatively little has been done in Canada to assist or protect or encourage industrial designers. It is known there has been a series of scholarships given in the past, but these scholarships do not appear to have been sufficient in number or large enough in scope to permit the winners to study abroad and then spend considerable time developing new designs here. I know that in the annual report of the national gallery of Canada for 1959-1960, under "Industrial Design", the national industrial design council, which has been set up by the trustees of the national gallery and which I presume will go out of existence on the passage of this bill, has instituted a new series of design awards and a new design index listing Canadian manufactured products which meet certain design specifications, in respect of which certificates are to be given on a three-year basis. It appears in the report that the first year for such awards to be made is 1961, in the autumn, when an international jury is to be set up to choose the winner.

I hope that in causing the national industrial design council to go out of existence at this time, and having it replaced by the national design council, the plans which have been formulated by the earlier council will be continued and developed by the new body. The old body, which I presume, will now go out of existence, was an active executive group of about 12 members who met every three months. In view of the fact that it appears to be unanimous in this house that we should concentrate on the design of Canadian products, and in view of the fact that the minister indicated there should be more energy and attention paid to this particular aspect of design, I suggest that the council should meet far more frequently than is suggested in the proposed act.

The problems which the council will meet in respect of the dissemination of information, and creating public interest in design, are briefly dealt with in section 10 and other sections of the bill, where there is indication that there will be scholarships, publications and travelling shows of the kind that presently exist. I suggest to the minister that there is very little new thought here as to the proposed method of operation of this council. There are excellent displays and publications now being made available, one of which was the new booklet put out this year entitled "Design Bulletin" issued as a monthly News Letter, However, I suggest that these are insufficient and that it will be necessary to find other ways of promoting good design.

I think hon. members have seen the display of good design in respect of Christmas gifts which has appeared in Ottawa for the past two or three years under the aegis of the design centre, as well as the travelling exhibitions. I first saw this display when I was in Ottawa as a tourist. Hon. members should realize that these exhibits come to the attention not only of those who live in the area in which they are displayed but, if the area has a large tourist public, a profound impression is made on a great many additional people.

I think it is necessary to educate people in the matter of taste, appreciation and style. This is, of course, a long process. There are a number of magazines, unfortunately most of them United States publications, with perhaps the exception of one which is Canadian, which promote style in the home by photographs and discussions of new styles and new functions in respect of articles used in and around the home as well as building materials. These magazines include photographs of furniture, appliances, gardening tools and many articles of that type. They have been very instrumental in changing the taste of people in this country.

Unfortunately in Canada, whether imported or locally designed and sold, style often is accompanied by high price. It too often appears that the Canadian manufacturer feels, in respect of low priced or minimum priced goods, that design, style or function does not matter and that only those individuals with a good deal of money to spend will be interested. I suggest that it should be a function of this council to persuade manufacturers that this matter of taste is not limited to those potential purchasers with much money to spend but that it is an intrinsic thing, because everyone appreciates beauty and style regardless of their ability or inability to afford them. I suggest that those individuals who are only able to afford a bare minimum would prefer to purchase an article which is both beautiful and functional within their price range.

Those of us on this side could not fail to approve of a concentrated effort on the part of the government and interested people in the community to improve the style of products, making those products not only more saleable but providing a distinct benefit in the way of beauty to those who purchase them. We could not disapprove of this because legislation of this type was introduced by the party which now sits on your left, Mr. Speaker.

This being 1961, we could hope that those individuals on the newly instituted design council will be looking not just to this year, but ahead to 1981 in doing all there is in their power to bring new designs to our products as quickly as possible, so that design will not be a matter only of beauty to promote sales in Canada but also that we may take pride in Canadian produced articles being sold in shops all around the world. I hope this will take place as quickly as possible so that one can say with pride, that an article is indeed Canadian both in substance and design.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to follow the well designed member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howard: There is one thought that I would like to leave with the minister in respect of this bill before us, which follows suggestions made by other members in regard to one of the beneficial effects which will flow from the activities of the design council. I refer, of course, to the potential increase in the sale of Canadian made goods in other countries. There is a group of people in Canada, the largest single organized group of citizens, who are not disinterested in this question of increasing the sales of our commodities in other countries. I suggest that this group has done some research work in the field of design in respect of commodities, goods and packages which would be a marked contribution toward the activities of the design council. Incidentally, this group is represented on the national productivity council, and I feel should be represented on the design council. I refer specifically to the organized labour group in Canada.

It was the promise of this government, although it has not always been carried out, that organized labour would be represented on all the boards, commissions and agencies in which this group is interested. I suggest that this group is interested in the question of design and the promotion of unique designs reflecting Canadian attitude and spirit. This group would be interested in design itself as well as the beneficial effects improved design will have upon the sale of our goods in other countries.

In view of what I have said, I wonder whether the minister would indicate whether this suggestion, in respect of organized labour representation on the design council, is one he considers should be followed. I repeat that I feel this largest single organized group in Canada should be represented so their views and ideas can be reflected as much as possible in the recommendations and activities that may be undertaken by this council.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to support the bill. I think the time is long overdue when we should pay more attention to promoting the skill of our own people and the sale of Canadian goods. In my opinion there is nothing more conducive to such a forward step than a council of this sort. I should like to see a very large contribution made toward scholarships and also by way of grants for exhibitions at local fairs. There is a good deal of talent throughout Canada that never comes to light. There is no point in spending money or having such a council unless we bring this talent to light. We look to our young people for new and better designs. A country that has encouraged such men as Graham Bell does not need to take a back seat in the development not only of new designs but also new instruments.

I am also pleased to see that the bill contemplates the giving of awards of merit. I do not know why such awards should not be retroactive. If there are Canadian designers who have already made contributions I think they should be encouraged. Such awards may encourage them to remain in Canada where their services are needed, particularly if it is in monetary form.

I think it is a forward step that we are going to encourage exhibitions abroad. The reports I have heard about the Brussels fair indicate that Canada's activities there left much to be desired. A good many Canadians went to that fair expecting to be very proud of the Canadian displays but came home disappointed. They were particularly disappointed with the food served. I do not know why Canadian cooking should not be included within the wide scope of this bill. When we go abroad and have European or British guests we should be able to take them to the Canadian pavilion at such fairs and be able to have Alberta steaks, British Columbia salmon or other items produced in Canada which are among the world's finest foods. If we are going to sell abroad we have to display our best products. How can we do it any better than by having Canadian travellers introduce these people to the foods we know so well?

I think our Canadian embassies and consulates should be encouraged to show Canadian goods. I understand that the embassies and consulates of Canada throughout the world are filled with French antique furniture, American colonial furniture or English period furniture. When new consulates are opened I should like to see them equipped with Quebec furniture, Ontario furniture or any other furniture made in Canada so that we can show the people of other lands what we produce. No other country would be foolish enough to advertise other than its own products abroad. I think we have to act like adults now that our country has reached maturity, and fill our embassies and consulates with Canadian made goods. We have beautiful products of all kinds in every industry, and I believe we should promote their sale.

We can learn something from the way other countries do business. Before the Japanese design goods for use in Canada or the United States they send a trade mission here and conduct a kind of Gallup poll. Through our commercial outlets they find out what we want; then they go back to Japan and do not lose any time producing it. We could do the same thing. Perhaps our embassies and consulates do not have the time to do this work, but we could send teams of experts to other countries to find out what they like and then we could produce what these countries want.

I can see a tremendous field so far as forestry is concerned. The people of Asia are now awakening, and they want to be educated. I do not think one could exaggerate the amount of paper products they are going to need. We have the mills and the ability to produce such products. We could send a trade team to Asia to find out what kind of printed products they want, particularly in the form of school books. The people of China, Japan and India are tremendous readers, and here is a field that in my opinion we have not even scratched.

We rely very largely on the forest industry to balance our trade. If we can get those who produce paper and the printers to co-operate, there is no reason why we cannot print material in the languages of the people of these countries. We have Asiatics in Vancouver, and there is no question about our being able to print story books, school books and professional and technical books in the languages of these people. When we have exhibitions we can invite these Asiatic people to come and see what we can do in Canada; and for goodness sake let us also go to them and ask them what they need. We have the paper and can do the printing with the greatest of ease. I think we could open up an unlimited market in Asia.

So far as the field of sport is concerned, there is no doubt that Canadians can produce the finest sporting equipment in the world. Our Olympic athletes have made a name for Canada in hockey and skiing, and I think we should go to other countries, find out the type of sporting equipment they want and show them what we have.

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to express certain views on the principle of Bill No. C-85, the purpose of which is to create a national design council. So far as design functions are concerned, my particular interest has been in connection with products made from nickel, and in that regard I might point out that an exhibition of stainless steel products was held about a year ago at the national gallery.

There is no doubt that the bill is welcomed by all members of the house, since its primary objective is to promote the sale of Canadian products and thereby increase Canadian production. In that regard it follows the ideals put forward by the government in past years, and a previous speaker has indicated quite well the efforts made in the past to formulate ways and means of promoting Canadian design.

I understand that at present there is a staff of 12 engaged in the promotion of Canadian design. However, in view of the growth of our country and having in mind our resources there is no doubt that a more complete and elaborate organization is needed to review the possibility of bringing about a greater incentive in Canada for the creation of designs that would be definitely Canadian and would result in our products being of a better quality.

The expansion of the functions of the national design council will certainly be appreciated by all hon. members and by the Canadian people. No doubt is was a shock to many Canadians to learn on a television broadcast the other day about certain problems that have arisen in recent years with respect to designing goods in Canada and the lack of proper promotion so they could be produced here. We were told, for example, about a plane required particularly for use in the northern areas of Canada which was designed here but could not be manufactured in Canada and had to be brought in from abroad. I urge the minister to give consideration to extending the objects of the council to include assistance in the promotion of Canadian produced goods.

On a previous occasion I referred to the ceremony at the opening of the national gallery, which was an elaborate and formal affair. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration was hostess on that occasion and gave a splendid address. To my surprise most of the designs which won awards on that occasion were foreign. I am unable to give an exact indication of the proportion of awards that went to foreign entries, because I did not expect to be speaking on this subject today. However, my impression is that very few of the outstanding, award winning designs were Canadian.

I was surprised, for instance, that an automobile produced in Europe won an award for stainless steel decoration. As a Canadian I regretted that an automobile manufactured or assembled in Canada had not won this award. As hon. members know, Canada produces a major portion of the world's stainless steel. I do not have current figures, but Canada's position in the production of monel metal would be even further advanced today as a result of Cuban production being curtailed.

No doubt people will be requested to sit on the council or its advisory committee without remuneration. This is a field in which we should obtain the highest possible degree of co-operation with industry. Although the council will bring benefits to the Canadian people generally it will bring particular benefits to industry. I urge that the minister strive to ensure that there will be in the council a high degree of co-operation with industry, and that consideration will be given to doing everything possible to assist in the promotion of Canadian products.

It should be brought to the attention of the public that many Canadian produced goods are superior in design and quality to imported goods. I hope the council will direct its efforts to this end. Recently I spoke to a person who brought to my attention the fact that many Canadian textiles are superior in design and quality to foreign made textiles. We are accustomed to thinking that imported textiles are superior to ours. Certainly imported textiles are given great publicity, and attention is directed to their alleged superior quality. The council should bring to the attention of domestic and foreign consumers the superior craftsmanship and quality of Canadian textiles and other goods.

Five or six years ago I attended a lecture at which the speaker proved to the audience that a Canadian manufactured refrigerator was superior to one manufactured in the United States, and that the additional $40 or $50 which was paid for the Canadian unit was compensated for by the fact that the Canadian unit contained material of a superior quality. It is information of this sort which the council must bring to the attention of the buying public.

We congratulate the minister on the forward step that this bill represents, and urge him to ensure that the council do everything possible to assist in the domestic and foreign sales of Canadian made products in terms of publicizing their outstanding qualities.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few minutes of the time of the house to lend my support to this bill and to congratulate our young and energetic Minister of Trade and Commerce on bringing this measure before us.

Many interesting ideas have been brought to our attention in the discussion of this measure to establish a national design council, and I am sure the council will find them of value in their deliberations. May I suggest that when selecting this council the minister give consideration to the selection of a representative from the field of agriculture. We have many food products in Canada which are of outstanding quality. I think particularly of Canadian cheese, maple syrup, hams, bacon and many other fine products. Although foodstuffs do not appear to have much to do with design there is an important relationship. We have a tremendous sale abroad of Canadian products of this nature.

When travelling south of the border we often see reference made to Canadian bacon on the menus of restaurants. This is a field in which the council could promote Canada and Canadian products. I urge the council, through the minister, to bear this in mind and to have our Canadian foodstuffs of great distinction brought to the attention of people in other countries.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to make some more extended remarks, but unfortunately I was obliged to be absent from the chamber while the minister was making his speech on the motion for second reading of the bill. I want to say simply that I have always been interested in the design of inanimate objects, and I presume this bill refers entirely to inanimate objects. I think it is extremely necessary in our national life to get persons interested in form and in colour. There is a great deal in life beyond just the purely material, and the more people we can get interested in the purpose of this bill the better it will be. Ugliness is one of the factors contributing to many of our problems. People live in ugly surroundings; they use ugly equipment and ugly things. I am a great believer in the remedial effects of beauty in life.

I want to pay a tribute to those Canadians who do work in this field which is not generally known. There are some persons who make contributions to industrial and other designs across Canada. There are many more who are capable of making contributions if they have the opportunity to do so. I suggest that the council should inform the public on the widest possible basis as to its purposes and objectives. Even in the smaller places in our country there are many people—and I am thinking particularly of the younger people—with talent and ideas.

I close by simply suggesting that we should do everything possible to get the co-operation of all the people in Canada who are interested in satisfactory industrial design and the work of the council which is the purpose of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to say very much about this bill in view of what has already been said. However, I wish to make one suggestion to the minister. I am not quite sure that I would go the whole way with the hon. member for Parry Sound in suggesting that the minister should appoint crackpots to the council. I think perhaps it would be more useful to appoint to the council people who would seek designs for pots that would not crack. I commend that suggestion to the minister.

However, I think what the hon. member for Parry Sound had in mind was not really the appointment of crackpots but rather of people with ideas that had not yet necessarily caught on with the public. We know that most of the design that is good and interesting is novel. We know that after a while people get tired of one way of doing things or one way of designing things, as women seem to do with their fashions, and they want something somewhat different. I think there has been far too much of a tendency in Canada—although a good deal less in the last decade and a half than there was previously—to do things that were purely conventional and imitative of people in other countries.

I had the responsibility at one time, in a general way, along with the late Mr. C. D. Howe, for the design council as it exists at the present time. The responsibility then was divided, as it has continued to be divided between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration under the present administration. The question of whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce rather than the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration should have the prime responsibility is not, in my opinion, a matter of great importance, although there is probably something to be said for relating the council more directly to industry, through putting it directly under the responsibility of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, whoever he may be, for the accomplishment of an immediate and intimate relationship between industry and the work of the council.

I feel that it would be only right to say what I am now going to say, and I do so particularly because I have a suggeston to make to the minister. If there is one man to whom the Canadian people owe the design council and the pioneering work it has done in the last decade or more it is to Mr. Donald Buchanan, who was associated with the national gallery and who provided most of the initiative and inspiration for the starting of this work. It is a matter of the deepest regret to me and to many other Canadians, not all of them political friends of mine, that Mr. Donald Buchanan left the national gallery —I do not intend to go into that matter— and that at the present time he is not even living in his own country.

I would urge this suggestion on the minister. If he really wants the ablest Canadian who could be found to be the head of the design council, I suggest that he seek to repatriate Mr. Buchanan and get him to undertake this job. I think this would be one of the most useful and productive things he could possibly do. I felt that I should make this suggestion, and that is all I have to say.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Hees: It is about one minute to one o'clock. May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a question of privilege, if I may. I am sure the minister will not mind my raising this matter at this time. My question of privilege relates to an hon. member of this house, the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman). I wonder whether the house is aware of the fact that the hon. member for Peterborough and his wife today became the proud parents of a baby girl.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as most of us are parents I feel sure we all join in congratulating the hon. member for Peterborough and his wife on this addition to their family.

I should like to thank those hon. members who have spoken in this debate for the very constructive contributions they made. A great many good ideas have been put forward. I can assure the hon. members who made these suggestions that I and my departmental officials will take careful note of them, and they will be brought to the attention of the design council once the members are chosen and the council set up.

The hon. member for Ottawa East and the hon. member for Niagara Falls voiced concern for the designers of Canada lest they be not protected by law regarding the designs they have worked on and produced. This protection continues to be provided for our designers through the Industrial Design and Union Label Act. When the present bill becomes law, as I hope it will, it will not in any way interfere with this protection. The purpose of this bill is solely to encourage good design in Canada.

The hon. member for Skeena asked whether a representative of organized labour could be included in the personnel of the council. The hon. member for Wellington South asked whether a representative of agriculture could be included. Although there are no specific categories for organized labour or agriculture on the council, section 3 (e) does provide for two people to be chosen from the general public. Of course representatives of labour, agriculture or any other category could be chosen to fill those vacancies.

I would stress that in choosing the personnel for this council we are particularly anxious to obtain people who are outstanding, who have done a great deal of work and study in the field of industrial design, and who are thereby able to make a really important and worth while contribution to improving design in this country. If hon. members know of people of particular talent in this regard, if they will let me know who they are and what their past work and experience has been I will be very glad to give them consideration.

I think it is particularly important that in the very competitive world in which we find ourselves today we should have products of outstanding Canadian design. I say this because in a market such as we have in Canada today, or the world market, which are both very competitive, to sell a product it must have either the best design, the best quality, or be offered at the lowest price. Sometimes it is necessary for a product to have a combination of two or three of these outstanding qualities. I think we have all had experience with products of outstanding design, and we know they usually command their own market and also a price well in excess of competitive products.

I should like to give four well known examples to illustrate this point. There is the machinery produced by the International Business Machines Corporation, the machines produced by the United Shoe Machinery Company—which produces machinery for manufacturing footwear—and the engines turned out for both automobiles and aeroplanes by the Rolls Royce Company. Also the fashions that are being produced by the world's top designers in Paris, New York, London and other fashion centres command their own markets at prices far in excess of those of their competitors.

I think the best way for producers in Canada to increase sales, and thereby increase the number of jobs available to Canadians, is to develop distinctive Canadian designs for our products. If we do this I feel we can win and hold markets at higher than competitive prices. If our design and quality are no better than that what is offered by those competing for our markets, then of course our producers will always be at the mercy of the price cutter and employment in these industries will be uncertain.

This is not the kind of situation we want in Canada. We want high and steady employment. The best way to make sure that we have both is to ensure that the products we produce will be asked for by name by people throughout the world as distinctive Canadian products, because they are better than the products offered by our competitors.

We have examples of that kind of design in certain of our agricultural products. I would name three that come to mind. One is Canadian cheddar cheese. Another is our No. 1 northern wheat. Another is Canadian bacon. Hon. members will know many others. These are products which have been developed by our agriculturists and which are well known throughout the world. These are asked for by name, and they have won for themselves an important place in the commercial market. I believe that if our agriculturists have been able to develop such outstanding products as these it is up to our industrialists to prove that they are just as able to develop unique Canadian products which can command their own markets and prices.

That is the real challenge facing Canadian industry today. It is to help industry meet this challenge that we are establishing the national design council, and I believe that working together to produce distinctive Canadian designs our industrialists, our workers and our manufacturers along with those interested in design throughout the country and those who are appointed to the industrial design council can help materially to increase the sales of Canadian products, thereby increasing the number of jobs available for Canadians.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Can the minister enlarge on the question of protection of designs which I raised this morning?

Mr. Hees: I did cover that subject while I was closing the debate on second reading, but since the hon. member was not here I will repeat what I said. The industrial design act provides the necessary protection for our designers so they do not lose the benefits which might, could and should accrue to them for the work they have put into the development of new and distinctive designs. This bill when it becomes an act will not interfere with that provision in any way. The purpose of this legislation is simply to encourage good design in Canada.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): So the council itself will not have any rights in designs at all?

Mr. Hees: That is correct.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Furthermore, it will not take away any rights from designers solely on account of the fact that they have been assisted.

Mr. Hees: That is correct.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Establishment of council.

Mr. Howard: With respect to clause 3, I mentioned on second reading the possibility of having representation on the council from organized labour in keeping with the general practice of this government, as I understand it, of appointing to various commissions and boards people who are representative of organized labour. Unfortunately I had to leave the chamber for three or four minutes during the time the minister was speaking, and if he did deal with this specific question and I missed his reply I am sorry. I apologize for being out of the chamber. However, I gathered from a private conversation I had with the minister during lunch—I hope he will not mind my mentioning this—that the government was not opposed to taking the line I have suggested.

Mr. Hees: Having had to leave the chamber myself for three or four minutes I sympathize with the hon. member for Skeena. While he was out I did answer his question. I noted that he had asked that a representative of organized labour be included among the members of the council, and that the hon. member for Wellington South had asked that a representative of agriculture be also included. I pointed out that although there is no specific provision in the bill for the inclusion of representatives of these two categories, there is in clause 3 subparagraph (e) provision for two people to be appointed from the general public, and representatives of labour and agriculture could well be included there. This would have to be decided later, but there would certainly be a possibility of that being done under the subclause.

I pointed out also that in choosing the members of the council we are particularly anxious to have people who have received special training and who have done special work in the field of design, in order that they may make a particular contribution to the work of the council. I invited hon. members to let me know any people who have done outstanding work in this field, because I should be glad to give consideration to their inclusion among the members of the council.

Mr. Howard: I do not know whether the minister was absent for the same reason as myself, but perhaps that is something we should not explore at this time. I understood the minister to say that representatives of agriculture and organized labour as well as, conceivably, of other elements in our society, could be appointed under subparagraph (e) where reference is made to two members of the general public. I also understood him to say that the government is anxious to have serving on this council people with special understanding of industrial design, or with special training in this field.

I think this is commendable, but I point out to the minister and to the committee that under clause 4, subclause (4)—and I refer to this, Mr. Chairman, only because it is connected with what I am about to say—it is provided that a person can only be eligible for appointment as a member of the council if he has knowledge of the field he is to represent or of the technical aspects of design. That is made clear in clause 3, subparagraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d). You will notice, Mr. Chairman, that the two members to be appointed under subparagraph (e) are specifically excluded from this obligation. Clause 4 says in effect that the two members of the general public need not have any knowledge of the design field or of the technical aspects of the work. If it is possible to appoint two members of the general public under paragraph (e) of this clause, one could conceivably come from the field of agriculture and another from the field of organized labour. That being so, why might they then be excluded from having technical knowledge in these particular fields, while it is required in respect of the other members?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, when members of the general public are included in a council they are usually included for the purpose of having additional points of view presented in discussions of the council, perhaps non-technical points of view, or consumers' points of view. When I mentioned that representatives from the field of agriculture and organized labour could be included under clause 3, paragraph (e), I meant just that. It might be possible that those individuals chosen from the general public would be representatives of organized labour or agriculture. There would be no reason why they would not be. Who the individuals will be that are chosen I do not know, but I feel there is an opportunity for them there.

Mr. Howard: It seems to me that it would be desirable to have special reference to that effect included in this bill so as to ensure that the council will have representatives from the fields of agriculture and organized labour, in addition to the two members chosen from the general public. This would ensure that the consumers' point of view was represented as well as the points of view of the two large and important segments of our society, organized labour and agriculture. Those views would then be expressed within the council and would perhaps have some influence upon the council's recommendation.

I think it is necessary that I confine my remarks at this time to the representation by organized labour, but I would not like to be precluded from referring to that other important segment, agriculture. I feel that those members of this committee who are knowledgeable in regard to agriculture will be far more able to express points of view in that field than I am. In this regard I would like to place before the committee a motion along the lines I have suggested. I therefore move, Mr. Chairman, the following proposed amendment:

That clause 3 be amended by deleting the word "seventeen" in line 11 and by substituting therefor the word "nineteen", by deleting the word "and" at the end of paragraph (d), placing the word "and" at the end of paragraph (e), by adding the following as a new paragraph (f):

"(f) two members who shall be chosen from the field of organized labour,"

If this amendment passes I will then deal with the question of representatives from the field of agriculture. I feel if the proposed amendment is passed it will necessitate a subsequent amendment to clause 4.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I say that after glancing at this amendment, we are prepared to support it.

The Chairman: If there is no objection to the validity of the amendment, I shall put it.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, having served on committees I think we can agree that there is a limit to the size of a committee, if it is intended that the committee should accomplish anything. Under this amendment we would be including two members from organized labour. If we should agree to that proposal then it certainly could be claimed that there should be two representatives from the field of agriculture. Consumer groups as well as industrial groups, not specified here, would have an equal claim for representation. These claims could go on and on. There is no reason why the representatives chosen, for example, under paragraph (a), being five members from the field of industry and commerce, would not be men working in plants. It is not specified that those representatives from industry and commerce shall be from the management side. On the contrary, they could be from the labour side.

We intend that this council be a workable body, and I suggest there is a limit to the number of members in order that it be workable. If we attempt to include representatives from specific groups there will be no limit to the number of members. For the above reasons I am afraid the government will have to oppose the amendment. I think the hon. member will agree that this government has taken advantage of the very valuable views voiced by organized labour groups.

I might also mention that the industry-management committee which I called together several weeks ago—this is a very important committee—is made up of 15 representatives of labour unions and 15 representatives of management. In respect of the productivity council there will be an equal number of representatives from organized labour and management. I would also point out that there has never been any desire on the part of this government of which I am aware, to exclude representatives of organized labour from any discussions. I feel sure that the individuals who fill the positions outlined in paragraph (a), from industry and commerce, will represent the views of organized labour, and I would therefore indicate that the government must decline this motion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am not very much impressed by the argument that has just been put forward by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It does seem to me that we are dealing here with a national design council which will be concerned with the designing of products of industry, and that organized labour would have a more direct and immediate interest in that council than any of the other groups the minister suggested should be considered. Of course, I think consumers might have better views on the subject than anyone else, but I take it they would be covered under subclause (e), "two members of the general public". I would hope that at least one of those two members, if not both, would be a woman because I think they generally have a better conception of design than the average man and, as we all know, they are the main customers under the division of labour that seems to have come about in our modern industrial society.

However, since the minister has indicated that he is not prepared to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Skeena, I have a suggestion to make which might accomplish the purpose the hon. member has in mind and also be acceptable to the government. I suggest to the minister that he might consider asking the hon. member for Skeena to withdraw his amendment and in exchange undertake to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs to move that subclause (a) be amended so it would read "five members who shall be chosen from the field of industry"—then you would cut out the word "and" and insert a comma—"commerce and organized labour". Then there would be no doubt that it was the intention of parliament that organized labour should be specifically referred to.

The hon. member for Skeena and I are not in each other's confidence as to this matter. We just happen to agree about this particular amendment and if it is put to a vote then, as the hon. member for Laurier has already indicated, we will vote for it. But if this compromise would be acceptable both to the minister and to the hon. member for Skeena, it seems to me it would accomplish what is in mind and what I think everybody in the house would agree was a sensible thing.

Mr. Hees: I thank the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate for what he has said. At the time he started to speak the same thought was actually passing through my mind. It is a sensible suggestion, and I would ask my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs to propose an amendment to subclause (a) so it will read:

five members who shall be chosen from the field of industry, commerce and organized labour.

An hon. Member: How about agriculture and fisheries as well?

Mr. Howard: That is perfectly agreeable to me, Mr. Chairman. This then leaves the general public to be represented by members of the general public and not by members of a specific group. I would withdraw the amendment in the light of what the minister has suggested.

The Chairman: Does the committee consent to the hon. member withdrawing his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I therefore move:

That clause 3, subclause (a) be amended by deleting the word "and" in line 14 and placing a comma after "industry" and adding after "commerce" the words "and organized labour".

The clause would then read as follows:

Five members who shall be chosen from the field of industry, commerce and organized labour.

Mr. Howard: Before you put the amendment, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be sticky about the grammar. Perhaps it comes from sitting next to the hon. member for Port Arthur, but should the word "field" not be in the plural so that each field will be referred to specifically? It would then read:

Five members who shall be chosen from the fields of industry, commerce and organized labour.

Mr. Churchill: That is all right.

The Chairman: Shall I dispense with reading the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 10—Objects.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, with reference to clause 10 the objects are stated to be to promote and expedite improvement of design in the products of Canadian industry. Then it goes on to be more specific. It has recently come to my attention that it is most necessary that this be done in Canada. I have in mind crown corporations and particularly the Canadian National Railways, which very recently had recourse not to Canadian designers but rather American designers. I refer to an article published in October, 1960, indicating that Canadian National Railways has hired an American design group known as James Valkus, Inc. to do its entire corporate identity program, said to be the largest of its kind in North America. This company is an 11-man operation located in New York with a small branch office set up in Toronto specifically to accommodate this account. I think this indicates the fact that up until this time at least Canadian consumers including these branches of government, notwithstanding the council which has been in existence, have failed to take advantage of the excellent designers in Canada.

What is perhaps even more shocking is that those who use the hotel facilities of Canadian National Railways will find in their rooms a card of excellent design which I will be pleased to send to the minister. On one side it says "Please do not disturb" and on the other side it says "Maid please attend to this room as soon as possible". It is a little plastic card of excellent design and very noticeable. At the top on one side appear the words "Canadian National Hotels" and at the top on the other side appear the words "Printed in the United States".

I think both these things should be a cause of shame to Canada. It is shameful that with respect to a small plastic card such as this Canadian National Railways has not been able to find Canadian designers or, if they have found them, have not purchased Canadian designs from them. It is particularly shameful that in the larger sphere of creating a whole corporate image it has been thought necessary by Canadian National Railways to go outside Canada and hire an American concern for this very large program.

I suggest to the minister that action in this regard is long overdue. It is a matter to which there should be much more attention paid, and the products of Canadian industry should be the primary concern of this council, not those of industries of other countries.

Mr. Hees: I thank the hon. member for Niagara Falls for bringing this matter to my attention. If she will send me the card I should like to have a look at it. I will certainly ask Canadian National Railways why they bought such a card in the United States if a card of the same type was available in Canada. I have made inquiries of this kind in the past, not necessarily with respect to Canadian National Railways but with regard to others who have bought goods outside Canada which it seemed to me could have been bought to better advantage in Canada, and in almost every case, I think, I have been told that they would have liked to buy the particular product in Canada but it was not available. This again points up the need for people in Canada to emphasize Canadian design here in this country.

With regard to the use of Canadian design companies to assist other companies with their designs, I strongly urge all Canadian companies to make use of our own design companies, because this is the only way I know that our students who go through university and learn these arts and sciences can be employed in Canada instead of having to go to other countries for employment.

I am glad these matters are being brought to my attention and the attention of the house. I can assure those members who are bringing them to my attention that I will look into them carefully, and that I appreciate receiving this information. I will be glad to let the hon. member for Niagara Falls know the result of my investigation with respect to this particular card.

Miss LaMarsh: That it will be replaced, I hope.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, there is one question I have in mind with respect to clause 10, and again I have to refer to another clause, namely clause 11. Subclause 1 of clause 11 provides that the minister may refer certain matters to the council for study as he deems advisable. Subclause 2 reads as follows:

> The council shall investigate and report on all matters referred to it pursuant to subsection 1 and shall make such recommendations to the minister in respect thereof as it deems appropriate.

I am reading from clause 11, and I take it to mean the council will make recommendations to the minister in respect of the matters which the minister refers to it. Where is the provision, if there is one, to the effect that the council may make recommendations on all those maters which it undertakes of its own volition?

Mr. Hees: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think all those who listened to this debate would agree that one of the most important functions of the council is to automatically refer to the minister matters which it considers are of importance. I do not believe this function needs to be specifically set out. I can assure the hon. member for Skeena that when the council starts to operate there will be no doubt in the minds of the members of that council that I want referred to me any matters that they consider of importance or would like to refer to me. In fact I expect to be attending many of these meetings, because I am particularly interested in this matter myself. I assure the hon. member that there will be no lack of opportunity for the council to make its views known to me on any occasion upon which it wishes to do so. I will welcome those suggestions.

Mr. Howard: Then I feel that the bill should say so. If one refers to clause 11 of the bill one finds these words:

> The council shall investigate and report on all matters referred to it pursuant to subsection 1—

That is pursuant to the minister's action.

> —and shall make such recommendations to the minister in respect thereof as it deems appropriate.

Certainly I feel the council should undertake matters on its own volition, and there should be a similar statutory provision to enable the council to make recommendations and reports in respect of those matters. The minister's word may be fine and dandy. We accept the fact that he wants this to happen. However, if that is the intent of the law then that is what the law should say.

Mr. Hees: I am advised that although the wording of this bill is not the same as the one which set up the original design council, the intent is the same. I believe the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who was at least partially in charge of the original council, will assure the hon. member for Skeena that there was no reluctance on the part of the members of the council to bring to his attention, at any and all times, matters which the council felt it would like to discuss with him. Is that not correct?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is quite correct.

Mr. Hees: I assure the hon. member there is no intention here of making it difficult for the council to bring matters to my attention. This bill simply seeks to carry forward the same spirit that was written into the original act. There was no difficulty in the operation of the original act, and I assure the hon. member there will not be any difficulty in operating under this bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I might be allowed to intervene to say that I am sure it is rather more difficult to get the minister's attention than it was to get mine.

Mr. Hees: I could not agree with that.

Mr. Howard: I do not want to belabour the point. However, it is not a matter of whether or not I desire to be assured or whether or not I am assured by the words of the minister. I believe his statement is correct as to the way in which council will operate. The point is, why does the bill not say so? If provision is made for this function in one instance, why is it not made in another?

Mr. Aiken: I do not want to prolong the debate, but it seems to me that clause 10 is very clear. The objects of the council are set forth in paragraphs (a) to (g). The council, I believe, is being set up primarily to assist industry not primarily to assist the government. I think the objects are set out and the council is told it must do certain things and may do other things.

The addition of the words suggested by the hon. member for Skeena would make no difference at all. The council is not required to report to the minister unless he asks for a report, and I do not believe this council should be under the thumb of the minister. If the minister wishes assistance from the council he may secure it under clause 11. Clause 10 sets out the duties and objects of the council, and I think it is a very clear statement of what is intended. I do not believe there is any need to report to the minister except in those instances in which the council feels it is necessary.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if the minister would allow me to bring to his attention under this clause a matter to which I have already referred under another heading. This clause deals with the objects of the council, which are to promote and expedite improvement of design in the products of Canadian industry. I refer now to a matter which I discussed earlier on the budget resolutions and also in connection with the legislation on class or kind made in Canada, but having to do more particularly with the textile industry.

At that time I brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance three pamphlets that were written by an expert in the field of textiles. These pamphlets were afterwards sent to his parliamentary secretary at the minister's request. I shall not discuss that aspect, which is not germane at the moment, but there is one part of it which I think has reference to the design council. A suggestion was made at the time concerning the establishment of a textile council. I suggested to the minister that perhaps what I had in mind, namely some agency which would give consideration to improving the design of certain groups of textiles in Canada, might be given some consideration under the aegis of the productivity council or perhaps by the establishment of a textile council. The Primary Textiles Institute has since written to the press commenting on many of those things that were put on Hansard at the time, and stating that the Primary Textiles Institute, which has been in existence for some years, has been giving consideration to these very matters.

I rise this afternoon to point to one example which was given by the expert whose pamphlets I have given to the Minister of Finance, and to which I am sure the minister would want to give consideration after he has listened to what I have to say. This expert said it may well be that the design of some of our textiles has not been given the attention it should receive. For instance, he said there was a certain piece of woollen goods—he was referring to a sweater—that could be purchased in Switzerland at a cost of some $25 or $30. This sweater was akin to one which could be produced at La Malbaie or Baie St. Paul for a much lesser amount, I think he said in the neighbourhood of $15. The wool is equally good, if not better, and the work is equally good, if not superior. However, the design does not compare with the design which was produced by the Swiss. It was his view that if the design of that particular commodity could be given to a group of experts who would work on it and make it more attractive, there would be a good demand for the article and it might not be necessary to import as many of these articles as we do.

I refer only, of course, to this particular item. The pamphlet I gave the minister dealt with many others. My only purpose in rising was to ask the minister if, when the council is established whose object will be to promote and expedite improved design for the products of Canadian industry, he would give consideration to these three pamphlets that are all ready in the hands of the Minister of Finance and according to which, in the opinion of this expert, if the design of Canadian textile goods were improved it could assist tremendously in the sale of those products not only in the province of Quebec but in the other provinces and the whole of Canada. I believe there are some 780 mills, mostly in central Canada but some in the west and some in the Atlantic provinces as well. My only purpose in rising is to ask the minister to be good enough to give this matter his careful consideration.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I will certainly do so. I am very keen about the matter which the hon. member for Laurier has raised. I have been told by a number of women that women's and children's clothes in this country, in the matter of design, do not come up to those produced in the United States and other countries, and lose out in the market for that reason and for that reason only. I am told they lose out not because of price but because of design.

I can well imagine the instance brought forward by the member for Laurier. That is just the kind of case that I should like to see this design council take hold of and help the manufacturers and the mills to which he referred produce an article of at least as good design as or, if possible, of better design than that produced in Switzerland and in that way get a much better market for the Canadian product. I thank the hon. member for Laurier for bringing this matter to my attention.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Miss LaMarsh: There was one matter that I should like to mention with reference to subparagraph (g). The minister will recall, I think, that he attended a reception in the city of Ottawa about the end of last year at which an announcement was made with respect to a proposal to establish in Niagara Falls a permanent industrial exhibit. I should like to ask the minister whether, under this section, the design council will be responsible for participating in the sponsoring and arranging for such an exhibit showing particularly stylish displays of new Canadian materials in what is, after all, the foremost tourist centre in the whole dominion and a place which millions of people visit annually. It is perhaps the showcase in Canada for new and improved Canadian design. Is it anticipated that assistance—in a financial way, of course—might be given to such a permanent display under this particular clause?

Mr. Hees: No, not financial assistance. However, I feel sure that the council would encourage producers of certain light types of goods that could well be displayed at a centre of that kind to display their goods there. I am familiar with the particular centre about which the hon. member for Niagara Falls has spoken, because the mayor of Niagara Falls and a delegation came to see me about it several months ago. I was very much interested and assured them that I would give them all possible support and that I thought the idea was a good one. I still think so. I think it is a very forward looking step which the city of Niagara Falls is taking in this regard, and that the display centre will provide a very useful place for exhibiting Canadian products. More of this sort of thing is needed in Canada. I can assure the hon. member for Niagara Falls that we will give it every possible assistance.

Mr. Denis: While the hon. member for Niagara Falls was speaking I noticed that she is a woman of good taste. Everyone knows that women are noted for good taste. I wonder whether the minister should not consider the advisability of naming a woman as a member of this design council, and a young man as well. If you want to follow the fashion, you are usually young. Consider a man of my age for instance. I think the minister should consider the advisability of naming as members of the design council a woman and a young man.

Mr. Hees: There is no limit one way or the other as to the ages of these people we appoint to these councils. As I said earlier, we want to get the best possible people, those who can make a really worth-while contribution. In my experience young men and young women always make a good contribution to deliberations of this kind. I feel sure that young people will be represented on this council, having in mind the ability they have demonstrated in the past and the contribution we feel they could make to the work of the council. I might say that the lady representative on the productivity council, Miss Anna Speers, is making a good and useful contribution, and I feel sure that if there was a woman representative on this council she would make an equally good and useful contribution.

Miss LaMarsh: I wish to inquire of the minister about one other matter. This morning I mentioned certain things which the national industrial design council had proposed for this year, and particularly awards of merit in a competition that is to be decided in the fall of this year. Am I to understand that the work which is already in train under the Department of Citizenship and Immigration will be carried on uninterrupted, at least until this program is completed, under this bill?

Mr. Hees: Yes, I am assured that any work that has already been started by the council will be carried on.

Miss LaMarsh: Is it anticipated that the same personnel will be carried over to the minister's department?

Mr. Hees: Yes, it is my understanding that is going to be done.

Mr. Herridge: I have a question with regard to paragraph (f) of clause 10, which reads as follows:

(f) grant or issue certificates, citations or awards of merit in respect of Canadian products of outstanding design;

Can the minister inform the committee whether these certificates, citations or awards of merit have been decided on, or what form they are expected to take?

Mr. Hees: No, they have not been decided on. These are matters which the council itself will decide once it is set up.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it not the intention to follow the pattern that has been established by the existing design council in this matter? The minister must be aware that these awards have been made over the years and that a certain standard has come to be accepted for these things. I think it would be too bad to change that pattern.

Mr. Hees: Yes, it is our desire to carry on with the usual formula, but we are not limiting the work of the new council before it has been set up. It will, I feel sure, carry on the same general program. However, it must feel free to make whatever changes it, in its wisdom, considers are improvements.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 11—Reference to council.

Mr. McMillan: Clause 11 has to do with what the minister may refer to the council, and provides that the council shall investigate and report on all matters referred to it in pursuance of subsection 1. I was wondering whether this council could be called on to report on products admitted to Canada bearing a Canadian design. I have in mind a number of products. One in particular has to do with salmon that was imported from Japan. A year or two ago I saw a number of cans of salmon that bore the maple leaf design and on which in small letters appeared the words "Processed in Japan". I think this is pretty close to deception. People bought this salmon thinking they were buying salmon which had been processed in British Columbia. I should like to have the minister's comments on this subject.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

Mr. Hees: These matters would not be examined by the design council itself, but they are of vital interest to my department. If the hon. member knows of an example such as he has mentioned, and would write me a letter about it, or if he prefers, discuss it with Mr. Dennis Harvey, the assistant deputy minister in charge of the commodities branch of my department, we will be very glad to look into the matter. These matters are looked after by the department itself, and not by the design council.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, we have had problems precisely the same as those related by the hon. member for Welland. We had this problem a few years ago, when salmon caught and packed in Japan was exported to Canada and sold under the labels of Canadian companies. The words "Produced in Japan" were printed along the side of the label, but so close to the gummed portion, which overlapped, that often the words "Product of Japan" were covered by the gummed portion of the label. But we did not deal with this matter through the Department of Trade and Commerce; it was dealt with through the Department of Fisheries. I wonder whether there is a conflict of activity here, or is it purely within the Department of Fisheries or the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member for Skeena that we do not wish to overlap the jurisdiction of any other department. I think he and the hon. member for Welland will agree that the important thing is to have these matters dealt with efficiently and quickly.

Rather than direct the hon. member to other departments, if he will direct his inquiry or give any information that he has about this matter to my department, we will work with the Department of Fisheries. If it falls outside our jurisdiction, we will hand it over to them or any other department under whose jurisdiction it may come.

As the Department of Trade and Commerce, we are particularly interested to see that the kind of thing which has been mentioned by the hon. member for Skeena and the hon. member for Welland should not continue.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have just one question on clause 11 (1), which states:

> The minister may refer to the council for its consideration and advice such matters relating to the promotion and expedition of the improvement of design in Canada or otherwise relating to the operation of this act as he thinks fit.

My question is this. From what source would the minister accumulate information which he would refer to the council for consideration, as indicated in clause 11 (1)?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, a good example was given by the hon. member for Laurier a few minutes ago. The hon. member raised the example of sweaters that are manufactured in certain centres in Quebec and which sell at about half the price of sweaters imported from Switzerland. As the hon. member pointed out, the sweaters manufactured in Quebec are better made and are of better material. The only factor that mitigates against their ready sale as opposed to the Swiss article is that they are not as well designed.

I would refer a matter such as that, when brought to my attention, to the president of the design council and ask him to look into it, the idea being that if the mills in Quebec can be shown how they can improve their design, it is obvious that they will get a very much bigger market in Canada for their product.

I believe with a product of this kind we would develop an export market, because obviously the Swiss article is finding ready sales throughout the world—it is finding sales in Canada—and I would like to see the Canadian product moved into the world market and displace the Swiss article.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 12—Staff.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I must say that the language of clause 12 (2) seems to be singularly indirect, to put it mildly. Apparently, if one reads it correctly—and I should like the minister to tell me whether I am reading it correctly—persons other than the officials of his department can be appointed to serve the design council, with the approval of the treasury board. But even Mr. Mackenzie King at his most deft could not have put it in a more negative way than it is put in this clause.

I should therefore like to know whether this clause does mean that if the design council is unable to find anyone in the Department of Trade and Commerce with sufficient leisure and sufficient capacity at the same time to perform the functions it needs, and if they can convince the minister that those functions are important, other persons can be employed for more than merely temporary periods or for specific work?

Mr. Hees: As I read the clause, it means that if the council needs additional help for temporary periods, which cannot be provided from within the government, it may acquire that help from outside the government, but it must first receive permission of treasury board to take on that extra help.

That is my interpretation of it, and I am assured by my official here that this is the correct interpretation. I am very glad it is. Therefore I am pleased to assure the committee that this is the interpretation.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, it will not be possible to appoint anyone permanently; that is what the minister is saying.

Subclause (2) says:

> —the minister may provide the council with such professional or technical assistance for temporary periods or for specific work—

I do not imagine the minister would embark upon specific work that was eternal. The minister is not going in for salvation in that sense. Therefore can we take it that there will be no permanent staff whatever for the design council except officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Hees: Yes, that is correct; any staff will be provided from the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, could the minister give the committee an idea of the number of persons and employees of his department who are at the present time or may be in the near future engaged in this work? What number does the minister contemplate?

Mr. Hees: I understand that there will be no more than about six on the staff at the present time. I am afraid I could not give an estimate as to the exact size of the staff that will be required once the council gets into full swing.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have another question, Mr. Chairman. The minister says there are six members on the staff, or not more than six. I hope the minister knows how many there are, since he is spending the taxpayers' money.

An hon. Member: He has just told you.

Mr. Pickersgill: He said there were not more than six.

Mr. Hees: I am assured that there are six.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to know the status of those people. Are they members of the staff of the Department of Trade and Commerce? If they are not, or if they do not become members of the department before this bill comes into operation, they will join the ranks of the unemployed?

Mr. Hees: They are members of the staff of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say how and when they became members of the staff of the department? They certainly were not members of the staff of the Department of Trade and Commerce when the design council was under the national gallery.

Mr. Hees: Yes, they were transferred from the national gallery to the Department of Trade and Commerce some time ago.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 14—Financial.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, has the hon. minister some idea of what amount of money is intended to be expended? Is this to be increased over and above what has been spent in the past, in conformity with the statement the minister made this morning that there will be increased vigour and attention paid to this matter now?

Will there be any limit to the expenditure in this connection? I see there is apparently no limit to the expenditure that will be made, as there was in connection with the productivity council.

Mr. Hees: I am afraid I do not know what money is going to be required. When the council is set up and starts laying out its program, we will have some idea. I can assure the hon. member and all hon. members of this committee that money will not be wasted.

I cannot think of any better way in which money can be spent than by a council of this kind. It will operate at a very minimum of expense to the government. As the hon. member will have seen, there are no salaries paid to the members of this council. Their travelling and living expenses while away from their normal places of residence will be paid by the government. But I think when you consider the tremendous value that we get from groups of public spirited citizens such as those who will be making up this council, and who make up other similar councils which serve the government and the people of Canada, it will be seen that the government and the people receive tremendous service far out of proportion to the cost in dollars and cents.

I can assure the hon. member that expenditures on behalf of the government will be kept to a minimum and again I say I can think of no better way in which this money can be spent. I have here the figures for next year's estimates of what the industrial design branch of my department will be spending but they have no relationship to the industrial design council itself. I can only say again that any expenditures made in this regard will, I think, be returned to the Canadian people many times over by increases in sales and the increase in employment which we hope will accrue from our being able to develop designs superior to any we have been able to develop in the past.

Miss LaMarsh: I am concerned about some of the specific objects set forth in clause 10. One has to do with making grants or scholarships to individuals or institutions. Is it contemplated that the new council will have a large and expanded role in awarding scholarships to designers to study here and abroad? Has any consideration been given to how much money might be made available for such expenditures by the council?

Mr. Hees: These are all matters which will receive a great deal of study by members of the council when the council is operating. I have no idea what the council will recommend to me. We hope to get very good people to serve on this council, people who are very keen and who know a great deal about design. I feel the recommendations they will make will be good and sensible ones and I can assure the hon. member that we shall study them carefully. We shall not go over board in connection with this matter and we shall agree to expenditures only after a good deal of consideration, but just exactly what those expenditures are likely to be and how much they will amount to I cannot tell until the council has considered these matters and made recommendations to me.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 15—Report.

Mr. Howard: I have been comparing this bill with the bill which sets out the duties of the national productivity council. I am sure it is the intention of the minister to have the report of the design council included in the annual report of his department. However, the act setting up the national productivity council provides that the report of that council shall be tabled in parliament within 15 days of its receipt, I believe it is, or within 15 days of the opening of the next sitting of parliament. I wonder why a provision similar to that has not been included in this bill.

Mr. Hees: The productivity council is allotted money of its own over which it has jurisdiction, specifically $150,000 a year. Any moneys that are expended by the national design council come directly from the Department of Trade and Commerce. When my estimates are being examined next year I shall be only too glad to answer any questions regarding the expenditures or operations of the design council just as I would with regard to the operations of any branch of the department.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if it really is connected with whether or not the productivity council has finances of his own while this council operates through the funds and staff of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Surely there are other factors. I read in the act which sets up the national productivity council, or more correctly, from the bill which was placed before this house, that the chairman of the council is required within three months after the termination of each fiscal year to submit to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to the Minister of Labour a report of all the proceedings carried out under the act for that fiscal year, including the financial statement of the council. Thus, the productivity council has two subjects upon which to report. The financial operations for that year are included, and then there are the other proceedings. It would seem to me that a sensible course would be to require the chairman of the council to submit to the minister a report of the operations of the council within three months after the termination of each fiscal year, an obligation similar to that which is placed upon the chairman of the productivity council in accordance with the act to which I have just referred. Why should such a report not be tabled in parliament together with reports of other councils and agencies, crown corporations and the like?

Mr. Hees: Other crown corporations and boards are voted specific sums of money and they operate more or less independently. This council will derive its money directly from the department. Its staff will be members of the Department of Trade and Commerce and it will derive from the department itself any money which needs to be expended. It will therefore be in the same position as a section of my department. It is not given a block of money and told to go ahead and operate. It operates in a different way and, as I say, at the end of each year when my departmental estimates come before the committee of the whole I should be glad to answer any questions and give any accounting that is asked for regarding this council. There will be no concealment from members of the committee of any activities or expenditures. They will be able to fully examine those expenditures by asking me questions and I shall be glad to answer them. I hope I have made that clear.

Mr. Howard: The minister has made that part of it clear, but I do not think his answer completely covers the point I raised. Let us consider the workings of the department over which the minister formerly had the honour to preside, the Department of Transport. That department looks after the Canadian maritime commission which makes a separate report, and yet the commission receives money voted by parliament to the Department of Transport. The penitentiaries branch of the Department of Justice also comes to mind. That is a separate branch within the Department of Justice and it makes a separate report, though its sole income is that voted by parliament. Consider, also, the position of the director of research and investigation in connection with the Combines Investigation Act. He receives funds from the Department of Justice. The combines branch has no money of its own other than that which comes from the department, yet a separate report is made. Here are two or three instances which come to mind immediately of bodies which receive money only as voted by this house, yet they make reports which are tabled in parliament.

Mr. Chairman, I am asking why the report of this council will not be tabled in the house. I am not referring to any attempt by the minister to hide anything. I think we all realize that the minister will, as he has assured us, answer any questions we wish to put forward but I am wondering why this report will not be tabled.

Mr. Hees: As the hon. member knows, the Minister of Trade and Commerce issues a report of his department's activities each year. Included in that report will be a report of the industrial branch of my department, and as part of its report there will be the report of the industrial design council. All hon. members will receive a report of the activities of this branch and of the industrial design council each year in booklet form as part of the total report on the activities of my department.

Mr. Howard: That is the answer to the question I asked in the first place.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Pickersgill: At the next sitting of the house. We ought to see that amendment printed.

COAL

AMENDMENTS TO AGREEMENT WITH BRAS D'OR COAL COMPANY LIMITED

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

Bras d'Or Coal Agreement

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize certain amendments to the agreement made under the Coal Production Assistance Act with the Bras d'Or Coal Company Limited for the purpose of postponing the commencement of repayment of the loan made to the company thereunder to the 31st day of December, 1962.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to permit the company—the Bras d'Or Coal Company Limited situated at Broughton, Nova Scotia, not far from North Sydney—to defer payment of moneys loaned under the Coal Production Assistance Act. That act provides that repayments shall be made at the rate of 30 cents per ton on coal produced. The company used the money provided to buy a specialized mining machine intended specifically to increase efficiency and production. The repayment would come, in large part, from the coal produced by this machine.

In early 1959 there was an unexpected fall of ground in the mine which cut off the area where this machine and others were operating. This not only reduced the production on which the repayment was based but also forced the company to secure new machinery and spend considerable capital on a new approach to the affected area.

At the present time, the new workings have almost reached the buried machines, but it will take some time before they can be taken out of the mine, inspected, put back into operating condition, and replaced in the mine. They will not, therefore, be available for producing coal on which to base repayment, until this is completed. Because of this accident, and to conserve the working capital position, the company has requested postponement of the first repayment date to December 31, 1962 without deferment of the date on which, under the act, the final payment is due.

I must also say, Mr. Chairman, that this company obtained the first loan early in 1959 for the purpose of buying machinery to increase its production. The accident happened, the company had to stop operations, and was forced to apply for a new loan. The first loan has been regularly paid under the conditions of the loan in the amount of $14,000. Repayment has not taken place yet regarding the second loan and the company is now asking to defer the first instalment for two years.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, in the light of the explanation given by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, I do not think that I, or any of my friends on this side of the house, would be prepared to argue that this bill, by itself, does not represent the expedient thing to do under the circumstances.

I must say that I feel rather sorry for the minister in having to introduce this bill at this particular time, but because of the fact that this bill really preserves the working capital of this particular company and enables it to go on with its operations it must be doubly comforting to the minister in the light of the unpleasant news that he undoubtedly read in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of April 28 under the large red headlines "Dosco Files Formal Notice—Glace Bay Mine to Close May 31". I do not intend to go into this in any detail but we do know now that it appears that three mines are going to have to be closed in Cape Breton this year unless the federal government is able to find some means of doing something about the situation.

There is no doubt that what the minister is doing now is taking one tiny nibble—not even a bite—at a problem which is so vital to the interests of one of the ten provinces of Canada that it is in every respect a national problem amounting to a crisis.

I feel that in saying anything about this particular measure that the government is proposing to bring in, one cannot help but say that it would have been more expedient if the government had come forward with—perhaps not a solution to the problem because I do not think the government, or anyone else at this time, has any assurance of a solution—but some steps to be taken to make sure that these mines are not closed or—

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I have not interrupted the hon. member before now because I thought he was going to make some passing reference to other mines or the coal situation generally. I would suggest, however, that a general discussion regarding the coal situation, if the hon. member intends to go further, would be out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, I would agree that if we were on the bill, of which we only have notice here, it would be quite inappropriate to discuss anything except the principle of the bill. But what we are doing here, and this has often been discussed before on points of order at the committee stage of a financial resolution, is to decide whether or not a particular sum of money should be spent out of the treasury.

I say, sir, without any fear of contradiction, even by hon. gentlemen opposite, that this is one area where it would be more expedient—I follow the language as nearly as I can—to spend more money out of the treasury in order to avoid what in my opinion will be something closely approaching a national calamity. It is on that basis that I feel what I have been saying is quite appropriate. I would think it would not be appropriate to embark upon a general debate on the coal industry, but all I intended to do was to suggest in a very brief sort of way how an alternative resolution would be much more acceptable to certain members of the committee than the resolution we have before us. I grant you, sir, that I am under certain limitations in doing so. I am a member of the opposition and while it is true that I happen to be one of Her Majesty's privy councillors I am temporarily unemployed in that capacity. Unfortunately, however, there are many of Her Majesty's subjects who are going to be unemployed for a very long time if we do not grapple with the problem in Cape Breton in a more effective way than this resolution does.

Everyone agrees that we cannot mine coal just to build it into mountains. The minister did try that for a while and he became discouraged with that policy. I must say I should like to congratulate the minister, the coal board and everyone in the federal government who had any part in convincing Ontario hydro that they should use some of this coal. I am sure the minister was quite cheered up by that as was everyone who has at heart the interests of the people of that area. But there again, sir, one wonders whether it would not be more satisfactory to be generating electricity with that coal in Nova Scotia and using it in Nova Scotia.

The Chairman: Order. I do not know at what point the hon. member stopped discussing the point of order but I am quite sure it was some time ago. I must say I have not been convinced by his argument that because we are at the resolution stage we can discuss any alternative proposal in the way he put it. I think the subject before the committee as outlined by the resolution is a very limited one. The resolution refers only to postponing the commencement of repayment of a loan because of a certain accident. Therefore I am sure the hon. member will agree with me that under such circumstances we are not permitted to discuss the coal situation in general. I felt that the hon. member could make some passing references to it but now I think he is going further than that.

Mr. Pickersgill: In that case, sir, I shall be obliged, I suppose, to point out reasons why I do not think it is expedient to proceed with this resolution at this particular moment. I am sure Your Honour would not object to my taking that line of argument. I do not think it is expedient to proceed with this resolution until the government has laid before us a program to deal with the much larger and more serious problem which is imminent in Cape Breton at the present time. I say that for many reasons, not the least of which is the fact that the house is sitting very long hours and that we could economize on the time of the house if the government had brought in one single resolution dealing with the whole problem instead of taking this piecemeal approach to the problem.

Mr. MacInnis: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. MacInnis: Is it the hon. member's intention in putting forward this argument that the smaller operations in Cape Breton should be sacrificed while at the same time the government is making every effort to maintain the larger operations? Is the hon. member going to vote for this measure? Does he consider that the smaller operator also has to be taken care of?

Mr. Pickersgill: At the conclusion of my remarks I will be very happy to answer the question of the hon. member for Cape Breton South who, I am sure, is just as much concerned as I am with the well-being of the coal miners. As I was saying, it does seem to me that it would have been more expedient at this time, when the problem has already become urgent, to have brought in a resolution, to have dealt with the real problem of the area. Although the problem involved in the resolution now before us is one which ought to be dealt with and, it seems to me, is perhaps by itself being dealt with in the right way, it is nevertheless a very minor problem.

If at the same time the government could have brought in its resolution indicating what it proposes to do about the closing of mines in Cape Breton and, above all, what it proposes to do to provide not just relief but alternative employment for the people in this historic area of our country, it seems to me we would have been able to accept this resolution with a good deal more satisfaction than is possible having regard to the unfortunate circumstances which prevail at the present time and about which, I regret very much to say, the ministers seem to have nothing to propose.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Chairman, since the Bras d'Or Coal Company is located in my constituency I thought I should like to say a few words on the resolution. The Bras d'Or Coal Company is a member of the Nova Scotia independent coal operators' association and among the members of that association are Campbell Mine Limited, Chestico Mining Corporation, S. J. Doucet, Drummond Coal Company Limited, Evans Coal Mines Limited, Greenwood Coal Company Limited, Indian Cove Coal Company Limited, Joggins Coal Company Limited, River Hebert Coal Company Limited and the Springhill Coal Mines Limited.

If I may give a little of the background of the independent mine operators, I should like to point out that in 1959 these operators produced 376,454 tons of coal with a labour force of between 750 and 800 miners. The labour force was approximately 10 per cent of the miners employed in Nova Scotia. Their production has a reported value of approximately $4 million.

The importance of coal mining in any community is understood better when one realizes that 60 per cent of the value of the coal produced is represented by wages and employee welfare benefits and that the major portion of the remaining 40 per cent is spent within the community on the purchase of power, pit props and timber, transportation and so forth. It is my opinion that the importance of the independent coal operator to his community cannot be minimized and that any future assistance rendered by the federal government and the government of the province of Nova Scotia cannot exclude the independent operator. The 1959 report of the dominion coal board discusses the crisis in the coal industry and the reasons for the impact of bad times in Nova Scotia. The report contains the following short comment:

> The first of them is the extent of the dependence of Nova Scotia upon coal. There is no counterpart in the economy of any other province to this degree of dependence.

The Chairman: Order. I think I must draw to the attention of the hon. member the fact that I ruled the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate should not be allowed to debate the coal situation in general. The same ruling, therefore, would apply to the hon. member. As I indicated, the scope of the resolution is very narrow because it refers to the loan made to one company and suggests the postponement of the repayment of that loan because of a certain accident. I, therefore, would ask the co-operation of the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hasten to assure Your Honour that if Your Honour wishes to relax the rules for both sides there will be no objection from the official opposition.

The Chairman: But there might be from some quarters that we do not suspect at the moment.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): With due respect, Mr. Chairman, I may say that I realize the situation. I was trying to lay a certain foundation for my future remarks. Surely, even you, Mr. Chairman, would not expect me to stray as far away from the subject as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

There was only one more sentence in this quotation:

> There are estimates that coal is the basis, directly and indirectly of about 25 per cent of all Nova Scotian economic life and activity.

By passing the resolution before us, we will be assisting in a small way in alleviating the crisis I have just mentioned. The Bras d'Or Coal Company has been in business for almost 50 years. The present company was organized in 1916. I should like to say a few words about this company because I speak from personal experience, having worked in the mines for 15 years with the independent operators and for nine of those years I was with the Bras d'Or Coal Company.

As I said, the present company was organized in 1916. They took over the old mine of the Colonial Coal Company at Bras d'Or, which is more commonly known as the Toronto mine. When this mine was worked out, the Franklin mine was started, and it was located just outside of Florence. This mine has now closed. This is the mine with which I am more familiar, having worked in it. During that period I suffered a fractured spine as a result of a rock fall and I also experienced a mine explosion which terminated my duties underground. The Franklin mine was the first in Nova Scotia, possibly in all Canada, to be fully mechanized. It had a fully mechanized coal mining and loading system. This company was also the first in Nova Scotia to develop and prepare properly screened and sized oil treated coal for domestic use. This market development started as far back as 1913. I may say they have a group insurance plan for their employees which was started about 1927 and is still in operation. The company contributes one third and the employees two thirds of the cost.

At the Four Star mine, which is the one with which the resolution is concerned, they installed the first slope belt conveyor by means of which the coal is moved directly from the coal face to the surface preparation plant by a series of conveyors. This installation was made possible by a loan from the coal board which, I understand, was repaid in full. Then they purchased a Joy continuous miner with a second loan from the coal board and, I understand, this loan was also fully repaid. A third loan was obtained for an additional machine which was lost as a result of a creep in the mine. A creep is a cave-in whereby the roof and the floor come together. Naturally this creates a disastrous situation. This machine was lost before it had mined more than a few thousand tons of coal. It took 19 months to circumvent the disaster area and get to the point where it was felt it might be possible to reclaim the equipment. I have been informed within the last few days that they have been able to break through in these workings and locate these machines.

The company lost a total of some $350,000 worth of equipment in the cave-in. It is hoped that they will recover some $150,000 worth and put it back in service again. If they are able to recover the two Wilcox miners which are presently under water, the amount of the loss might be considerably reduced. The men employed here are all members of the united mine workers of America and, so far as I know, their relations with the company are very good. From experience I can tell you that during the years I was with the company their relations with the union were always very good. The company was most co-operative at all times. The only difficulty has been that the Bras d'Or Coal Company has never had what we would call a decent coal seam to operate. They have been mining marginal deposits, thin seams which were subleased from others. It is only too bad that they did not have some of the seams that are in mines being closed by the Dominion Coal Company. In the last few years, the company has never been idle as a result of lack of orders. There was some idle time after the cave-in, but they have never been idle as a result of lack of orders. I believe it is quite possible others could learn from these independent operators about coal mining and the selling of coal. It may be that they have not made too much profit. If they had, I doubt if they would have been borrowing money from the coal board as they did.

The company has been able to keep on a full working force and has even gone to the extent of stockpiling coal in the summer at considerable extra expense. I hope they will be able to continue that practice this coming summer. All the independent coal companies in Nova Scotia are in much the same position as the Bras d'Or Coal Company, and none of them has coal of a quality approaching that found in mines operated by the Dominion Coal Company. None of these companies receive as much by way of freight subvention as the Dominion Coal Company. The Dominion Coal Company receives $8.75 per ton to Ontario, whereas the independent operators are restricted to $5.00 per ton to the same area. Dominion gets a freight subvention on water carried coal to Montreal plus a backhaul, and an additional amount for furtherance inland, whereas the independent companies get only a percentage of the rail freight from the mine to the consumers' town or city. This puts the independent operators at a decided disadvantage in Ontario and in the eastern townships of Quebec.

Recently the independent coal operators of Nova Scotia presented a brief to the minister. I think the points they have in their brief have a bearing on the future operations of these companies as well as on future loans they may have to secure from the dominion coal board. In that brief they request that no limitation be placed on the production or distribution of coal mined by independent coal operators; that they be treated as an integral part of the Nova Scotia coal industry and not discriminated against by federal government action merely on the basis of size. I have mentioned the subventions that were available.

The Chairman: I think the hon. member is again straying from the subject matter of the resolution. If he has exhausted his remarks with regard to the resolution, I would ask him to permit the next speaker to take the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, you have raised, I would submit my hon. friend has related the subvention question very directly to this question by saying that the subventions would have an effect on the capacity of the company to repay the loans which we are now discussing. I feel that this particular observation of the hon. member is relevant to the resolution and that he should be permitted to complete it.

Mr. Herridge: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I want to assure you that there is no objection from the quarter from which you suspected there might be objection with respect to allowing both sides of the house certain latitude on this resolution.

The Chairman: I want to assure the hon. member for Kootenay West that the corner I suspected is not that about which he is thinking. I was rather thinking of hon. members in other parts of the chamber who may not have the same interest in this limited problem as have hon. members who have already taken part in the debate.

To the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate I must say this. If I accepted his viewpoint I doubt that I could attach any meaning to the word "relevancy". Relevancy is something which may vary, of course. However, it is a matter which cannot be interpreted as meaning the acceptance of any argument which, in the view of an hon. member, may be justified.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Chairman, I quite realize the difficulty there is in keeping some unruly members in their proper position. At this time I should like to cease my remarks on this point because, considering the source from which the assistance has come—it was from directly opposite me—I am rather wary of it.

An hon. Member: You had better be wary of it.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): As someone said, beware of the Greeks bearing gifts. I certainly feel that way at this moment. However, if I may, I shall continue on another point, namely the problem that is facing the independent operators today.

Based on the situation of the independent operators and this loan that has been made, there is some fear in the hearts of a company like the Bras d'Or Coal Company Limited that the recommendations in the recent Rand report—and I do not intend to go into that matter at this time—discriminate against the independent operators in Nova Scotia. I would therefore suggest that the plight of the independent coal operators be investigated thoroughly before any new policy is brought down.

I could go into details on the other matters mentioned by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, but since I am rather confined and restricted on this occasion, probably an opportunity will arise in the future for me to do so. It is interesting to note, however, that during the period from 1936 to 1956, a period of Liberal reign provincially and federally, 64 coal mines closed in Nova Scotia, and the hon. gentleman was a member of one of those governments.

The Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member has just demonstrated why it is extremely important to apply the rule of relevancy.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. Before resuming my seat I should like to take this opportunity to urge the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys and the government to get cracking on the problem confronting the miners of Cape Breton. Every effort must still be made, despite the views of the company concerned, to delay if at all possible this proposed closure of mines, to make plans for the workers involved in the event of closure and to announce those plans as soon as possible. With these few remarks I would urge this committee to give quick passage to the resolution before us because this company is very worthy of consideration.

Mr. Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Just before it carries, I want to indicate that not only are we in the official opposition completely in support of this resolution but that if, when the resolution is carried, the minister—because I understand there is a problem of a date on which the loan must be extended and so on—would like to proceed with the other stages of what is, after all, a purely routine measure involving nothing new, there would be no objection from the official opposition.

Mr. Herridge: On behalf of this group I want to say that we support this measure and will do all we can to facilitate its passage.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Comtois thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-87, to authorize certain amendments to the agreement made under the Coal Production Assistance Act with the Bras d'Or Coal Company Limited.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Pickersgill: By leave.

Mr. Comtois moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Caron: Is the bill printed in both French and English? We have no copy of it. (Translation):

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron), I must report that four or five copies of the bill have been distributed.

It is only a matter of amending an existing bill in order to give to the debtor company, the Bras d'Or Company, more time for its payments. That is the only amendment to be made.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I will not insist, but as a matter of principle and in the normal course of things bills should be available to us in both French and English on first and second readings. But I will not press the matter any further, since we are dealing with a single amendment.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, if four copies of the bill were printed, I do not see why the printer could not run off a hundred copies while he was at it; it would only take four minutes to print an additional 96 copies.

The Chairman: Order. If hon. members object because there is no French version of the bill, we cannot proceed with it. However, the house had agreed to take it up, although, normally, second reading was not due until tomorrow or some other day. Therefore, if there is no objection—

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, I for one have no objection; but it has been mentioned that only four copies were printed. Now those machines can turn out as many as 5,000 copies per hour. Consequently, I do not see why enough copies could not be produced.

Mr. Ricard: They never found out about this in 20 years.

The Chairman: I understand copies will be forthcoming in a few minutes, so if hon. members care to wait a bit—

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether in the circumstances, in view of the fact that we did consent to second reading and we are now in committee, it could be understood that we will not proceed to third reading without having copies of the bill available in both languages. I wonder whether that would meet all the difficulties.

The point is very well taken, of course, that the rights of the two languages are absolutely equal in this house and the bill should be in both languages. Of course, if we had not facilitated second reading today, by the time it would normally have been dealt with tomorrow the bill would have been printed in both languages.

All these bills have to be translated and printed anyway. One wonders whether perhaps more precautions could be taken to see that there are a few copies in each language before even the number is put on. Then embarrassments of this kind would not arise in the future.

Mr. Comtois: I must admit, Mr. Chairman, that I did not anticipate the bill being given second reading this afternoon. Therefore I did not ask for or require any more copies. I expected the bill would come up for second reading late tomorrow.

I had an understanding with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—

Mr. Pickersgill: With respect to second reading.

Mr. Comtois: —and I am afraid I did not anticipate this happening.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, the point I was making is that on many occasions since I have been in this house the government has said, "We have only four or five copies".

The printing presses run at about 5,000 copies an hour and there is no reason why, if they have four or five copies, they cannot have 250 copies just as easily.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, following your statement that four French copies of this bill have been distributed, I would point out that there are more than four French-speaking members in the house, both on the opposition side and on the government side. Furthermore, the minister who proposed the amendment is French-speaking.

The Chairman: I have already stated that if there were any objection, the committee could not proceed with the bill if it is not printed in both languages.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I think we can withdraw our objection, provided there is no recurrence of such incident.

The Chairman: I also wish to be sure that there will not be any recurrence on the hon. members' side.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Mr. Pickersgill: Next sitting of the house.

ARMY BENEVOLENT FUND ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF INTEREST, PROVIDE FOR ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Army Benevolent Fund Act to increase the rates of interest to be credited to the fund by the receiver general semi-annually on the minimum balance to the credit of the fund in each month; and to provide for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I have a short statement to make in connection with the proposed bill. The Army Benevolent Fund Act was passed in 1947 to establish a fund for the benefit of those who served in the Canadian army during world war II.

During the war extensive services were performed for the troops by various agencies, including several auxiliary services organized in Canada and the navy, army and air force institute, in the benefits of which the Canadian forces participated.

The moneys accumulated by these services, and some additional funds which became available from sales on troopships and the sales of kitchen by-products, were gathered together and added to the moneys remaining in the regimental funds of army units. The total amount of all these moneys was somewhat over $9 million.

The act of 1947 established the army benevolent fund board for the administration and distribution of these funds. Since that time the board has continued to operate in a satisfactory way with the assistance of provincial committees, and up to March 31, 1960, distributed nearly $6 million. In their endeavour to continue the measure of assistance which was originally contemplated, the expenditures from the fund have so far been somewhat greater than planned.

In 1952, in order to help this situation some assistance was given by increasing the rate of interest payable on the fund. If hon. members wish to refer to that earlier debate, they will find it in Hansard for June 10, 1952, on page 3108.

The main proposal of the present bill recognizes the same problem, together with the well-known fact that rates of interest have been consistently higher than now authorized by this legislation. Therefore an increase of one half of 1 per cent is proposed.

This would increase the rate payable to 4 per cent per annum to the extent that the minimum balance of the fund does not exceed $5 million, and 3 per cent per annum to the extent that the minimum balance exceeds $5 million.

The estimated annual cost to treasury of this proposed amendment is $32,000, which will of course reduce as time goes on. The opportunity has also been taken to include two comparatively minor administrative amendments to the act which are found to be desirable.

The first of these is to allow the army benevolent fund board to set the salary of the secretary of the board. The salary of $6,500 a year now contained in the act was set in 1947 and has never been changed. In the interval there have been a number of general salary increases throughout the civil service, and it is thought only appropriate that the salary of this officer should not be restricted as it is at present. The board now has the authority to incur other administrative expenses, including salaries for its other employees.

The second minor amendment deletes from section 11 of the act a requirement which does not now and in fact never did exist.

[Mr. Churchill.]

When the administrative organization serving the board was originally contemplated, it was expected that the provincial committees would handle funds and that their accounts would be audited on a local basis. That has not been followed and all auditing is done centrally in Ottawa.

This portion of the section is non-effective and the proposal is to drop it, following a suggestion made by the Auditor General.

Mr. Chairman, that constitutes a brief introduction to the bill. As with other bills which come under the veterans charter, it is the intention, if the house approves, to refer the measure to the standing committee on veterans affairs after second reading for further consideration. Consequently at this time perhaps this committee does not want to go into too great detail with regard to this particular fund. Following the resolution stage and first reading the bill will be distributed and it should be available for consideration on second reading tomorrow. If second reading is given, the matter will be referred to the committee on veterans affairs and in due course it will come back to the house.

I commend this measure to hon. members. It will give the fund more money for a very essential service which it has been performing for veterans who need special assistance.

Mr. Carter: I rise to indicate our support for this resolution and I should also like to take advantage of this opportunity to pay tribute to the army benevolent fund board and the work they have done and are doing. As the minister said, the board was established by an act of this parliament in 1947. Prior to that the fund had been administered by the regimental funds board who reported to parliament through the minister of defence. This change was brought about by a recommendation of a special parliamentary committee set up in February, 1947.

The bill establishing the army benevolent fund board was drafted by that special parliamentary committee and appended to its report to parliament—a very rare if not unique event. This bill provided that the fund should be administered by a board and it stipulated that at least one member of the board should be nominated by the royal Canadian legion and another by the national council of veterans' associations. No member of the board was to occupy any position in the public service of Canada. The bill also provided for a veterans welfare program and in 1953 the army benevolent fund board worked out a second program jointly with the board of directors of the Canadian army welfare fund. This program was approved by the cabinet in 1953 and became known as the Canadian army financial welfare program.

Under these two programs assistance has been given to veterans and their dependents, to the widows and orphans of deceased veterans and to second world war veterans who are still serving in the Canadian army. The type of assistance rendered is mainly of a kind intended to meet unexpected contingencies and to help veterans and their families out of various financial difficulties.

Included among these activities have been arrangements to have debts adjusted and orderly repayment made when the debts have been incurred for justifiable reasons. In addition the board has set up a counselling service which has assisted veterans' families in budgeting and money management.

Another service has been rendered to unemployed veterans. In these cases no direct relief can be given but the special employment program of the army benevolent fund board helps veterans in relocating to places where jobs are available and in retraining them and supplying them with tools of the trade. These activities have been co-ordinated with the work done by the Canadian naval service benevolent fund and the R.C.A.F. benevolent fund. Many worthy families have been saved from financial disaster and restored to a sound economic footing as a result of this work.

The funds which are being administered originated, as the minister has told us, mainly through canteen profits but they have also been augmented from other sources because many large camps had various enterprises attached to them such as theatres, curling rinks, bus services and so on all of which provided profits which would contribute to the general fund. As the minister has also told us, the original amount in 1947 was $8,134,934. It was expected that another million dollars would be added, making approximately $9 million.

On March 31 last the fund had declined to $6,863,020. The purpose of this bill, as the minister has just said, is two fold. In the first place it seeks to increase to 4 per cent the rate of interest being paid on the fund and it also seeks to make provision for certain changes in administration. We fully agree with the principle of both these changes and intend to support the resolution.

Mr. Herridge: I rise on behalf of this group to support the purpose of this resolution. I am not saying, however, that we shall be altogether satisfied with the bill when it is introduced.

It is interesting to look back to the year 1947. I was a member of the special committee on veterans affairs which dealt with this legislation, in particular, at that time, as mentioned by the previous speaker. Shortly after the act came into effect a total of something over $9 million was available to the fund. Last year, according to an excellent report submitted by Mr. Chatterton to the standing committee on veterans affairs, we were informed that the board had completed 12 years of operation of the veterans welfare program as provided for in the Army Benevolent Fund Act and seven years of operation of the Canadian army welfare program as provided for in the arrangements between the board of directors of the Canadian army welfare fund and the army benevolent fund as approved by the cabinet in 1953. As mentioned by the previous speaker, we were told that the fund had been reduced to something less than $7 million.

Throughout the years there have been certain suggestions made with respect to assistance in the administration and in recent years it has been the practice for the government to grant $18,000 a year toward the administrative costs of the army benevolent fund. We were told that the average amount of the grants was in the nature of half a million dollars a year and from personal experience I know of the excellent work which has been done by the board. This fund has served a very useful purpose indeed. In fact, on a number of occasions of which I am aware it has proved a virtual life saver to the veteran concerned.

I was very interested last year when it was brought to our attention that a veteran, who was in rather deep water, felt that if he could be granted sufficient money to purchase a horse he could skid logs and get out of debt. The board provided the money, he was able to skid the logs, and he finally got back on his feet. I would suggest this is an example of the purpose of the fund. I know of numerous cases where this fund has been of great advantage to veterans who found themselves in difficult circumstances. In view of the good work enabled by this fund, it is natural on our part to want to see that the fund is continued as long as possible, commensurate with meeting needs and circumstances of the day.

I must say that as a result of our experience after the first world war, in regard to other funds, this fund has been administered on a very sound, practical and humane basis. Originally, as I understood it, interest was set at 2½ per cent which, in the light of the circumstances at the time the fund was established, as the hon. member for Essex East would say, seemed very reasonable indeed. It was later found necessary to increase the interest, and I understand the interest is now 3½ per cent on the first $5 million and 3 per cent on the balance. This resolution, without doubt has been brought to the attention of the committee by the minister as the result of certain prodding of the government by those individuals who felt that the fund should earn more interest in view of present circumstances. I know that officials of the royal Canadian legion and the national council of veterans have had this in mind. I am quite sure from reading the reports of the army benevolent fund over the years that in recent years the officials of that organization felt there was complete justification for increasing the interest rate at this time and thereby the earning power of the fund which would in turn extend its life.

There is no mention of a specific interest rate in this resolution. Governments have the habit of sort of pulling the rabbit out of the hat later on and we will look forward to seeing what is in the hat. However, I do suggest in view of present circumstances, and because of the fact that loans are being made at 5 per cent, we could very well establish an interest rate of 5 per cent in respect of the army benevolent fund to make certain that the fund is kept in existence as long as possible. We look forward to reading the bill when it is brought forward in the house.

One other amendment I suggest we could look for in this resolution would be an amendment granting the benefits of the army benevolent fund to Newfoundland veterans. This matter has been brought to the attention of the house by the immediately preceding speaker and has been mentioned on a number of other occasions. The reason given for excluding Newfoundland veterans from receiving the benefits of this fund is that they were not, at the time they served in the second world war, members of the Canadian armed forces. I think this is splitting hairs because Newfoundland is part of confederation now. I want to join my voice with the voice of the hon. member for—I can never pronounce the constituency—

Mr. Pickersgill: Burin-Burgeo.

Mr. Herridge: I refer to the voice of that member from that isolated part of Newfoundland. The veterans resident there are entitled to their rights the same as everyone else. I would join my voice with his in urging the government to give consideration to an amendment to the act which would extend to those veterans resident in Newfoundland the privileges enjoyed by those veterans who served in the Canadian armed forces prior to the entry of Newfoundland into confederation. Those individuals fought for the same cause, for the same purpose, and are now veterans and citizens of the same country.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, in looking over the annual report to March 31, 1960 of the army benevolent fund I see the names of the chairman, the four members of the board, the members of the nine provincial special committees including all the provinces except Newfoundland, and one overseas committee, and I would like at this time to pay tribute to the chairman, the members of the board and the members of those special committees for the good work they have been doing. I have seen some evidence of this while practising medicine.

This fund was set up in 1954 to incorporate the management of the army canteen fund and other service funds. They were all brought under the one act. At that particular time the interest rate was 2½ per cent paid on the whole amount. In 1952 the act was amended in respect of interest only. According to that amendment the interest on the fund was set at 3½ per cent on the first $5 million and 2½ per cent on the balance. The minister has said today that the proposed interest rate would be up one half of one per cent in both cases. This will mean that the highest interest rate possible is 4 per cent. The government certainly cannot borrow money at an interest rate lower than 5 per cent today, which is 1 per cent higher than the highest proposed interest rate in respect of this fund. The previous government paid an interest rate very much closer to the interest rate on the market at that time.

Originally the board was guided by certain principles, one being that there would be prospective beneficiaries for 50 years. In 1958 and 1959 the fund was depleted by over $300,000 per year. Last year the fund was depleted, as at March 31, 1960, by $317,000. If the fund is depleted at this rate it will soon not exist at all. I am not criticizing the management of the fund but am calling this situation to the attention of this committee. Unless there is some extra money put into this fund, and if it is depleted at the rate of approximately $320,000 per year, it will soon be gone. It was suggested when the fund was set up that it would run for some 40 more years. I notice now that there is some $6 million with the government, and over $250,000 in conversion loans at 4½ per cent due in 1983, and the fund has already taken a loss of something over $30,000 in respect of these bonds at present market values.

I should like to ask the minister who controls these funds. Does the board have control or does he or does the Minister of Finance? I have often wondered about that. I know that there are several other funds in existence. Probably conversion loan bonds were also bought by those funds and I should like to know whether or not they also suffered losses. I do not suppose the minister can answer that question at this time.

I think the board is doing excellent work. As I said before, a number of very worthy cases have come to my notice. The fund is also in the lending field and I was surprised to learn the amount of money that has been lent to veterans and the small losses that have been sustained. After we see the bill we will be able to discuss the matter further.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I have nothing particularly edifying to say today with respect to the resolution but I cannot let pass this opportunity to make a few comments about the fund. In the brief time I have been in the house only one matter has come before the fund in which I have been concerned. I have been asked to indicate not only the approval of the recipients with respect to the action of the fund but also of a great many veterans in the area and veterans organizations.

The army benevolent fund is perhaps not too well known to the general public and not as well known to veterans as it might be. The particular case which came to my attention concerned a veteran with an exceptionally fine war record who had suffered a very debilitating disease. He has a wife and small children of school age and these people were absolutely incapable of meeting even the hospital and medical accounts. This woman came to me in sheer desperation after she had been every place where she thought she might conceivably obtain assistance. The matter was referred to the directors of the army benevolent fund in Ontario who with a minimum of red tape, which I think is most unusual in matters that are the responsibility of the government, and great consideration for the feelings of the people involved and the record of the veteran, took over the payment of these accounts. This had a most beneficial effect with respect to the wife and the children because the children were able to remain at school and the wife was able to carry on with their support. However, perhaps even more important, so far as the veteran himself is concerned, the provision of assistance has enabled him to be freed of financial responsibility and of worry so far as his family and his own future are concerned.

This is just one example of the feeling of Canadians with respect to the importance of the contribution made in the past by our veterans and indicates that Canada has not forgotten and, I hope, will never forget the contribution they made and also indicates our desire to continue to assist deserving cases.

As a former member of an army mess, I think the fund could not be put to better use. Those of us who served in second war as well as those who served in the first war are happy to know that the funds that were turned over at the completion of service are being used for the assistance of our fellows who, when they left the service or in the years since, have not been too well treated by the fates. While this is only a small thing, I cannot let the opportunity pass without extending a pat on the back to those who administer the army benevolent fund for this example at least of their generosity and their attention to detail.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I just want to express my support for the plea put forward by the hon. member for Kootenay West on behalf of Newfoundland veterans and also to express to him my personal thanks for his assistance in this regard. I hope the minister will find it possible to give favourable consideration to this matter.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to make more than a few very brief remarks at this time, but in view of some of the comments that have been made I thought it might be useful to put on the record the actual sources of these funds. These funds are available for the benefit of world war II veterans. Members who are veterans of the first world war will probably recall canteen funds from that war being put to similar use. I understand there are world war I canteen funds still in existence in Ontario, Manitoba and New Brunswick but in the other provinces they have since been exhausted.

The funds in question today arose from the second world war and were derived from these sources as a result of the army's activities: Regimental funds of army units, $3,047,000; auxiliary services such as the Y.M.C.A., Canadian Legion, Knights of Columbus and Salvation Army, $2,739,000; an organization known as Bronco, a purchasing agency for the auxiliary services, $1,264,000. The navy, army and air force institutes, which are, of course, British organizations, made a contribution on the basis of what they considered would reflect the profit they had made on sales to Canadians in the second world war, and the amount was $1,368,000. Then there is a miscellaneous amount derived from army benefit shows, sales on troop ships, kitchen by-product sales and so on totalling $875,000, and the over-all total is $9,293,000.

These are the sources of the funds about which we are talking and, as I mentioned at the start, they were derived as a result of the activities of our second world war army veterans.

As has been pointed out by other speakers in the debate, the other Canadian services in the second world war have their own funds and, as I mentioned earlier, there are some funds left from the first world war which are administered provincially and are not involved in the matter now before us. In dealing with this matter we have to consider the sources from which these funds came.

I think it might be of interest to know something of the record of assistance under this fund. It is familiar to many members. They know at first hand, as we all do, of cases of valuable assistance which has been rendered by the fund. However, as far as the statistical record is concerned, I should like to point out that from September, 1957, to March, 1960, the fund made financial grants amounting to $4,691,131. Assistance obtained from welfare and medical agencies in respect of army benevolent fund cases amounted to $345,339 and the fund obtained reductions for veterans in settlements with creditors to a value of $919,605.

In other words, the fund in a direct monetary way, through its own grants, through being able to effect assistance in the settlement of debts and in respect of assistance obtained from welfare and medical agencies, rendered assistance to a total value of $5,956,075, almost $6 million. This is a very considerable amount of assistance and, coupled with the wise counsel that the fund gives through its officers in the various provinces who give their time voluntarily in order to serve their fellow veterans in this way, is of inestimable value.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Churchill thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-88 to amend the Army Benevolent Fund Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time, next sitting?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister would like to have second reading now?

Mr. Churchill: I am not certain that the bill is ready for distribution. Second reading tomorrow would be quite satisfactory.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES, ETC.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-84, respecting the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons and the co-ordination of rehabilitation services.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of this legislation is to authorize the government of Canada to enter into agreements with the provinces respecting support for their efforts to develop a comprehensive and co-ordinated program of vocational rehabilitation for disabled persons. It is an honour for me to be associated with legislation, the high purpose of which is to help ensure that thousands of our disabled citizens will have more useful lives.

As was expected, hon. members from all parties endorsed the purpose of this bill when they spoke at the resolution stage. Wherever possible it is more desirable, more beneficial and more humane to restore the disabled to vocational usefulness than to support them in demoralizing dependency. I want to thank hon. members who have spoken on this subject. They have obviously studied the present situation, and in doing this they must have realized that under present provisions, securing the various services necessary to the vocational rehabilitation of the disabled can be a baffling and time consuming process. I feel, and I am sure we all feel, it is time to remove much of the confusion surrounding this field.

I feel we must pave the way for the development of an orderly, co-operative and co-ordinated pattern of vocational rehabilitation. With such a pattern, and assured of federal support, the provinces will be able to plan expansion of their programs with vigour and imagination, resulting in greatly increased federal financial participation.

In presenting the resolution to the house a few days ago, Mr. Speaker, I did not claim—I should like to make this perfectly clear—that this government had invented vocational rehabilitation nor, of course, do I lay any claim that it was invented by the previous administration. The whole concept and philosophy have developed gradually over a great many years. The principles were first practised in Canada on a large scale after the first world war. Some of our provincial workmens' compensation boards were quick to grasp the value and the common sense of this approach to the problem of the severely disabled. Our voluntary agencies were similarly inspired. Other progressive nations introduced constructive measures to develop comprehensive programs of vocational rehabilitation.

In spite of this, it was not until 1951 that a national conference was called on the subject here in Canada. It was not until 1953 that a limited degree of financial support was made available to the provinces to encourage the development of rehabilitation as a co-ordinated and co-operative effort. The steps taken at that time, I feel and I am sure everyone will agree, have been useful. They provided a basis for experiment. The experiment has resulted in a degree of success which has confirmed our belief in the basic principles of vocational rehabilitation. However, in operation, weaknesses that required correction have been revealed.

At the eighth world congress on rehabilitation held last year in New York, a prominent Canadian made this statement to the representatives of 60 nations. I should like to quote his words:

> I know of few fields in which the problems of organization and administration of a program are so complex and as baffling as they are in the field of rehabilitation.

In a program in which so many divisions and levels of government, so many professional disciplines, and so many voluntary groups are involved, the authority for the program must be clear as to its intent. The administrative framework must be as simple as is possible in a complicated situation. When we are dealing with the provinces in a proram designed to bring services to individuals, it is much easier for them to develop these programs against the background of a statute that is clear in its purpose.

At present, in recovering the federal share of the costs of supplying vocational rehabilitation services, the governments of the provinces must do so through two separate federal departments. Administration will obviously be simplified and made possible by this bill, that is Bill No. C-84. It will only be necessary for the provincial rehabilitation authority to make recovery through one federal department. The national advisory committee on the rehabilitation of disabled persons has repeatedly asked the government to consider the possibility of legislation in this field. I now have every reason to believe that this bill will be met with a great deal of satisfaction by all the provinces across Canada. It is for these reasons, Mr. Speaker, that in close cooperation with my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith), this measure has been drawn up.

The basic purpose of this bill is to authorize the making of agreements with the provinces to provide for the sharing of costs incurred by the provinces in carrying out programs of vocational rehabilitation for disabled persons. The title of the bill is "The Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Act". The definitions indicate the segment of the population that we seek to benefit and the types of services that may be necessary in a program of vacational rehabilitation.

To implement the provisions of the bill the minister will be authorized, with the approval of the governor in council, to enter into an agreement with any province for a period not exceeding six years. These federal-provincial agreements will provide for financial assistance for costs incurred by the province in implementing a comprehensive program for the rehabilitation of disabled persons. The agreement will set out how, and in what manner, various provisions of restoration, training and employment placement may be made available to the disabled. The principal services for which costs may be shared are outlined.

The vocational rehabilitation of the individual must be based upon adequate counselling and a proper assessment of his potentialities. Where full employment is not possible, economic gain can be sought by assisting the seriously disabled to dispense with institutional care or the services of an attendant. The desirability of training staff as counsellors or administrators is quite obvious. Such staff is essential to the proper co-ordination of services and bringing them to the disabled individual as required in an orderly, organized manner. Additional services that may be necessary may be included as required in individual cases. As an example, we could share the cost of tools without which employment could not be accepted.

The responsibility of co-ordinating federal services that relate to vocational rehabilitation is placed with the Minister of Labour in co-operation with the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Department of National Health and Welfare, working with provincial health departments, is responsible for the development of all those services and facilities required to meet the health needs of our people. This responsibility includes the encouragement of the maximum use of all treatment measures conducive to complete cure or maximum recovery.

The health grants, and particularly the medical rehabilitation and crippled children grant, have stimulated the expansion of physical medicine and medical rehabilitation facilities in hospitals and rehabilitation centres. Equipment has been supplied, staff has been trained. These services speed up recovery and reduce the eventual degree of permanent disability. The creation of facilities and services, and the setting of standards in this area are, and must always be, the responsibility of our medical people.

Authority is given to the Minister of Labour to carry out research as it relates to vocational rehabilitation, where appropriate, in co-operation with any province.

The duties of the national advisory council on the rehabilitation of disabled persons are clearly set out. Its purpose basically is to give consideration to and advise the minister on all questions relating to the operation of the act. In addition to the federal and provincial representatives, the council will draw its ten remaining members from labour, management, the medical profession, the universities and the national voluntary agencies that work with the disabled.

To ensure that when purchasing medical services for individuals this is done in harmony with the developing pattern of health services, all regulations for this area will be recommended jointly by the Minister of Labour and the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

It can be seen, therefore, that the measure sets out specifically the responsibilities of the federal government in this important field. The resulting agreements will enable the provinces to indicate the services that they are willing to provide. This in turn should enable the provinces and the voluntary agencies to work out a co-ordinated approach in which the role of each in a total rehabilitation program is understood and defined.

This is not primarily a training program. Vocational training is an important part, but only one part, of vocational rehabilitation. Where training is given, it is based upon the abilities and desires of the individual and the opinion of the national employment service as to whether or not such training should lead to placement. The national employment service works closely with provincial rehabilitation offices, and I am proud of the fact that they have, in the past years, placed thousands of disabled persons in jobs that they are well able to perform.

It should be noted that under this vocational rehabilitation program, costs are not assumed for services that are generally available to all citizens under other programs. This is necessary to avoid overlapping. Where a voluntary agency can provide one of the necessary services, they assume this responsibility. The whole success, however, depends upon a well organized process through which the disabled can be guided to assume their rightful place in our economy.

Money is not actually spent on rehabilitation. It is invested, I submit, in order to provide a better future for our disabled citizens and the dividends that are returned in their greater happiness and their increased contribution to the economy more than offset the initial cost.

I am sure that all members of this house and of the entire nation will welcome this expression of our basic belief in the true principles of democracy and the provision, as far as possible, of equal opportunity for all.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, this bill will put into statute form authorization for the government to enter into agreements with the provinces on a cost sharing basis to co-ordinate all federal activities in the field of vocational rehabilitation. It will also provide for all co-operative work with the provinces in that field, including medical, surgical and remedial treatment as well as research in these fields. It will also provide for the setting up of an advisory council and authorize the payment of a chairman and other expenses.

As was said in the house the other day, there is nothing actually new in this bill except that henceforth payments in respect of helping the handicapped will be classed as statutory expenditures instead of a vote in the estimates. Every year when this vote in the estimates has come up for consideration in the committee, the minds of hon. members have been focused on the handicapped and they have had the opportunity to discuss the matter in debate and to bring their opinions to the attention of the government. I know that the minister said—and he repeated it today—that this is not something new; but when he brought this measure into the house at the resolution stage I think he left the impression that there was something in it when he used these words:

> —it will bring new hope and encouragement to many of our less fortunate citizens.

I think we can see that those words are not, in fact, true for the fact is that our handicapped people will have available to them now nothing that they did not have available previously under the votes in the estimates.

I recall that back in 1954 when this measure was first introduced in the house, it and similar measures had no greater sponsor and advocate in the house than the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). At that time the hon. member was minister of national health and welfare. I have heard him sponsor this and similar measures in the house on various occasions. I say that no one in this house has been more active than he in sponsoring social security measures.

As the minister said, helping the handicapped started by a vote in this house in 1954. On the resolution stage of this bill the other day the minister gave some statistics. I think he said 5,266 seriously disabled people had been helped. They had over 3,000 dependents, and 80 per cent of them were without earnings.

Instead of being a charge to the taxpayers of Canada to the amount of $3.9 million a year, these people have been able to earn up to $9.6 million a year after rehabilitation. They have earned a total of $29 million since rehabilitation. I think this is evidence enough that this program was started at an earlier time under the former government.

Many people who are physically handicapped will receive the benefit of advances in medical science. Much has been done in the field of orthopaedic surgery. Much can be done to help those with defects in vision. Also, with the new braces and new artificial limbs I think these people can be helped a great deal more. Many of them have been helped a great deal so far.

The minister said this bill was being introduced in order to give assurance to the provinces that this program will be carried on. I did not think it was necessary for us to give any further assurance to the provinces than we have in the past. However, if anybody in the provinces needs any assurance, this is it.

Many advances are being made in medical science and we want to continue to help the physically handicapped. Therefore I think everybody in this house should vote for this bill.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, at the resolution stage the representative of this group expressed support for the principle of the bill it was proposed to introduce. We are naturally very pleased to now see the actual bill and therefore obtain a greater understanding of its purport, how far it will go and just what it is that the government has in mind. Undoubtedly the principle of the bill is good and its effects will be far-reaching.

As has been pointed out by the minister, in these days it is possible, with modern science and teaching, to recognize the great possibilities that exist for the rehabilitation of those persons who have become disabled.

Through the past operations of workmen's compensation boards in this country and the activities of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, we have seen just what can be done in the rehabilitation of those who have become physically disabled. Because of that experience we very much welcome the introduction of this bill which will make statutory a policy of assisting the provinces to help the disabled throughout this country.

We fully understand that the particulars of the bill make it necessary for the initiative to be taken by the provinces and for agreements to be reached between the provinces and the federal government as to the scope of the rehabilitation measures.

We in this group sincerely hope that all provinces will take the fullest possible advantage of this legislation and that the federal council which is to be established, and the minister who has the responsibility, will have a broad vision as to the potentialities of the principle of rehabilitation.

I hope that during the course of the discussion on this bill the minister will outline, in perhaps more detail as we discuss the various clauses of the bill, what he considers to be some of the problems which have to be met and what he considers to be the breadth and scope of the bill.

The reason I mention this is because in days not so long past a person who had lost an arm, both arms, or a leg might not—and most certainly could not, I would say—be able to adapt himself for other occupations through vocational training because of the type of orthopaedic equipment which was available in those days.

However, in the past two or three years in particular very great advances have been made in the realm of artificial limbs. If one is injured, under the workmen's compensation provisions there is in most provinces not only the opportunity for vocational training in new occupations, but there is also the opportunity of acquiring the most modern and up to date artificial aids.

If a person is not covered by workmen's compensation and has been disabled in a non-industrial accident, I should like to be assured that if he is able to assimilate vocational training he will receive assistance under this bill. Is there provision in this bill for artificial limbs to be supplied which would enable such a person to take up a new occupation? The minister nods his head, and I gather that this assistance will be forthcoming. I am certainly glad this is so, because I think it is an important part of rehabilitation.

There is also this point, Mr. Speaker. A person who has undertaken vocational training is, under the workmen's compensation provisions, in receipt of assistance which will enable him to carry on vocational training and meet his costs of living.

I presume that those who will be covered by this bill will, to perhaps a considerable extent, be drawing welfare assistance. Welfare is basically just sufficient for a bare existence, to the shame of this country. But if one is to undertake vocational training, I think I can say from past experience that a little more than straight social welfare is required.

There, also, I should like to know whether there is provision in this bill to not only take care of the actual vocational training, but also the living expenses of a disabled person while undertaking that training.

After the training is completed there arises the question of placement. The minister has made it clear that he recognizes the importance of placement and that one of the purposes of the council will be to do everything possible to see that after vocational training these disabled citizens are placed in employment. That is as it should be. Perhaps we could hear at a later stage from the minister just what emphasis will be placed on this matter and whether or not consideration will be given to some of the problems which have to be met and to the policies by which they might be overcome.

A number of industries have been doing an excellent job in the placement of disabled persons but I think it is unfortunate that to a considerable extent industry has not shown evidence of a concrete interest in this matter. I believe a major educational campaign must be waged in order to get a sympathetic acceptance by employers in this country of the value not only to themselves but to the Canadian economy and to the individuals concerned of employing a percentage of disabled persons who have received a good training. I know that in some countries in the world employment of disabled persons is governed by law. Employers who have a certain number of employees are bound to engage a percentage of disabled persons. However, I hope it will not be necessary to go to that point in Canada and that we can persuade industry to take in disabled persons from a spirit of citizenship and responsibility.

I should also like to throw out a suggestion which came to my attention recently. It is this. In some of the countries of Europe the placement of disabled persons who have been trained in certain occupations has not been left solely dependent upon possibilities of employment already in existence. The government itself takes a primary interest in the question and has established either government-owned or government-assisted concerns or small industries where only the disabled are employed. Thus there is not only a continual educational program going on to encourage private industry to take a percentage of trained disabled persons but the government itself has a direct concern in industries whose primary purpose is the employment of disabled persons. I have only been aware of this situation in recent times but I am given to understand that it has been a most successful policy and it is one which I commend for the consideration and, I hope, the approval of the minister or of those who will have the responsibility of the administration of this measure.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, this is in our opinion a most important bill. It represents a step forward. It represents a recognition of the responsibility of government and of all those who are not physically disabled to take an interest in the rehabilitation of those who are less fortunate. We commend the government on the introduction of this bill. We shall most certainly support it and perhaps when we are engaged in the committee stage we shall have other words to say on the details of the measure as it proceeds.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I thought a member of the official opposition was about to rise. If that is the case I will resume my seat. I spoke on the resolution stage and I am going to be very brief now. When I rose I thought the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) was going to rise, I noticed that when the hon. lady spoke about an hour ago she said that what she had to say was not very edifying. I am sure all hon. members will agree with me when I say that what the hon. lady has to say is always edifying, and sometimes, indeed, electrifying. That was why I was happy to see her, as I thought, about to rise, and perhaps she will do so before the conclusion of this debate.

I have a particular hobby as far as the rehabilitation of both human beings and nature is concerned. Conservation has been a hobby of mine during most of my life in these two aspects. On that account I am very pleased to see the introduction of this bill and glad to note that the expenditure for this very worth while purpose is to be on a statutory basis. Without doubt many persons who will receive training under the terms of this bill can be placed in employment as a result of that training but I am going to make reference to that smaller percentage who will find it very difficult to find employment because of certain unfortunate circumstances or the unfortunate nature of their disabilities. In some cases it is not possible to employ such people in the usual places of business or occupation. My experience in this respect and my knowledge of a number of cases throughout the years leads me to suggest we shall have to do more. Federal and provincial governments and other agencies will have to do more than simply provide for training according to the terms of this legislation. It is going to require the co-operation of all levels of government, private agencies and individuals to promote and finance, shall I say, what I consider specially organized activities in the light industrial field and in certain phases, shall I say, of light agricultural production.

As far as industry is concerned—and I have felt this for some time—we should have some method of getting together representatives of the federal government, the provincial governments, the agencies and the individuals interested to provide, say, in each constituency or suitable area some particular light industry where these unfortunate people can be employed so as to earn their own living and have a sense of purpose in so doing. I suggest there are certain opportunities in light woodworking, the making of toys and in the making of special products from wood from waste from saw mills and other forest industries. At the present time certain industries require stocks of a certain size—small blocks of wood of a certain size; certain types of material for packaging and so on production of which could be undertaken in a light woodworking industry in which many of these unfortunate persons could be employed.

Then, as far as agriculture is concerned, I have felt there should be an opportunity for some form of state operated or co-operatively owned farm under, shall I say, state sponsorship providing opportunities for persons to engage in poultry farming and the production of vegetables and small fruits. I am speaking particularly of those persons who have to have guidance, persons who can perform simple operations and who find satisfaction in doing certain light work in association with people who care for them. In this connection I wish to bring the attention of the house to the tremendous opportunity there is in this country for the growing of black currants. That does not sound very important, but I remind hon. members that we import into Canada a very large amount of black currant jam and preserves in other forms. The demand for black currants is growing, particularly since people are becoming aware of the medicinal properties and value of black currants.

I see some hon. members smile, but there is an opportunity in this respect. We are now importing from European countries and the United States a great many of these products. I mention this as one feature of the fruit-growing industry that could be developed under perhaps co-operative farms of the nature I indicated.

There are other opportunities which exist in this field. In the district which I represent there are thousands of acres of blueberries which go to waste every year. They are beautiful blueberries. Possibly this situation exists in other members' constituencies. There are acres of huckleberries going to waste as well. Years ago these blueberries and huckleberries were picked and shipped in carloads. Families were able to make on the average $10 a day—father, mother and child. It is almost impossible today to get people to do this sort of thing. They will pick only their own requirement and will not undertake this work in a commercial way.

Several small communities in my constituency used to ship an average of seven carloads of these blueberries to the Calgary market each year. On the present market they are worth 30 cents a pound in Calgary and other prairie points. At 16 cents per pound a person can earn a fair wage. They cost 5 cents per pound to package and transport to Calgary.

One can see the opportunity that exists here which could be developed by individuals who are interested in doing something to assist these unfortunate people. I am not suggesting this could be done overnight. It would require improved and extended legislation as well as co-operation among federal and provincial governments, private agencies and individuals. However, I do rise to make the suggestion that this is one approach to the problem faced by the more unfortunate with whom we are concerned at the present time. It is a suggestion that should be given further study in an effort to see what can be done on a co-operative basis to assist that percentage of unemployed individuals today who will never be placed in normal or usual employment.

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) for his remarks. He is one of those hon. members who has made me welcome in this house. I am very grateful to him in this regard.

There are certain items in the bill which the minister has proposed with which I do not agree. One of these is that the definition indicates that this legislation is to be available only to those persons who are incapable of pursuing regularly any substantially gainful occupation. The employment placement which is referred to again is such only the objective of which is to enable those persons of becoming capable of pursuing regularly any substantially gainful occupation. It is a fact that there are many individuals in this country who are disabled from disease. They may not have lost a limb, their sight or hearing but they are disabled to the extent that they are, while capable of taking training, many at their own expense, through the ordinary system of schooling in the various provinces, because of their disability—I am thinking particularly of the local individuals in my riding—unacceptable to industry. Many of these individuals have acquired clerical training and therefore do not fall within the definition of this measure because they are capable of pursuing regularly any substantially gainful employment, but nevertheless are unable to find jobs.

This is a situation which has not arisen as a result of economic conditions of the last one or two years but has existed for many years. These individuals are incapable of obtaining employment largely because of the reaction of employers and employees who are uncomfortable in the presence of these people notwithstanding the fact that they are capable of doing a job. Too many employers, and this group unhappily includes the Ontario hydro and arms of the provincial and federal governments, will not employ an individual who is disabled, although capable of doing a job and having a livelihood, because of the fact that they are in a position where they will be seen by the public, and the companies feel this is not good for public relations.

It is a most unhappy situation for those who have used their own resources to acquire training when they find they are not only unable to secure a job with private employers but on many occasions because of pension and insurance provisions—they are incapable of being insured—they are unable to find employment even with arms of the governments. I would ask the minister to consider this definition carefully, before he brings the bill before the house, as to whether it would be of benefit to widen the definition to include those individuals who are trained and capable of holding jobs but because of their appearance, resulting from an impairment, are unacceptable in employment. This problem does not involve training or re-training but is a matter of placing the individuals.

I have reference to a particular individual who has been unemployed for upwards of ten years. I employed him myself so long as I had a position open for him but before and since that time he has been to every arm of government in and out of Ontario in an effort to secure employment but has been unsuccessful because employers are afraid that his would-be fellow employees would object to his appearance.

The individuals to whom I refer should not be thrown on a garbage heap. These individuals are capable of making a contribution to our society and require the assistance of employers in placing them in positions which they are capable of handling. I would therefore ask the minister not to disregard the problems of those individuals who are trained and capable of doing jobs by excluding them under the plan of Bill No. C-84.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased indeed to hear the remarks of hon. members who took part in the debate on second reading of the bill in that they showed so much interest in this matter and, if I may say so, sincere interest. I feel that I have covered the scope of the bill at the resolution stage and also in moving the motion for second reading. However, a number of questions have been posed by various members who have participated in the debate.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) brought up the problem of the provision of artificial limbs and so on for disabled persons. There is provision for prosthetic appliances as part of the restoration process and it includes limbs and all such things that are necessary. With respect to the matter of living allowance during the period of training, living allowances, proposed by the provinces and approved by the federal government are payable to these people during the period of training.

I wish to say to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) that I appreciate his keen interest in this matter. He is a man of kindly heart and amiable disposition and I know that the human aspect of this matter is very close to him. The collaboration of all agencies and people is essential, of course, in this matter, including the voluntary agencies, the provinces, the federal government, the national employment service and individuals. I might say to him that the question of sheltered employment to aid in the rehabilitation of workers is receiving close study. We are always on the lookout for opportunities for the disabled in a rural setting and we have in mind such means as he mentioned. However, this is an area where more research is probably needed and we are going to do everything we can in this respect.

The hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) referred to a particular case that had come to her attention and in which she was interested. I might say that we feel that the combination of training and counselling has a great deal to do in the placement of this type of person. In the approximately 200 national employment service offices across the country we now have some 230 special placement officers who do nothing else. They are properly trained for this work and they are engaged in counselling and endeavouring to place such people in suitable employment. They are in constant touch with possible employers and with those who are seeking employment. They are available to these people and are more than happy to be of service to them. They too are interested in the problems of the disabled in the same way that we are, and it gives one a great glow of satisfaction to know that they have been able to help so many people who are disabled.

I have nothing further to add except to say that we hope that by having the bill passed we will be able to assure the continuation of this type of work and federal financial participation will thus be assured in the minds of the provinces.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Agreement authorized.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, subclause 3 of clause 3 reads as follows:

In this section, "costs" incurred by a province means the costs incurred by the province determined as prescribed in the agreement—

I was wondering, since in a number of these cases rehabilitation might require long hospitalization, whether or not the agreement here would apply to the costs assumed by the provinces in this connection or whether the federal government assumed that they would be paying their half under the hospital insurance scheme?

Mr. Starr: Yes, we pay our half under the hospital insurance.

Mr. McMillan: You would not be paying any more under this act?

Mr. Starr: Not for straight hospitalization.

Mr. McMillan: In a number of these cases there is no hospital insurance. I know that happens in Ontario and the municipalities have to put up a considerable amount of money to cover the hospitalization of these people. Would the federal government be assuming any portion of that cost?

Mr. Starr: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McMillan: In other words, the federal government is not assuming 50 per cent of the cost of the scheme?

Mr. Starr: Yes, we are, but the hon. member is talking about something else altogether.

Mr. McMillan: People who are handicapped sometimes have to be hospitalized to receive orthopaedic surgery.

Mr. Starr: This bill, Mr. Chairman, is primarily designed to take care of rehabilitation of the disabled. It is not for hospitalization. If in the particular instance the hon. member mentions, the surgery were part of the rehabilitation of the person, then we would assume 50 per cent of the cost. However, if the disabled person entered a hospital because of illness and not as part of a program for rehabilitation, then that does not come within the scope of our arrangements with the provinces.

Mr. Herridge: Clause 3, paragraph (1), Mr. Chairman, reads:

The minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, enter into an agreement with any province, for a period not exceeding six years, to provide for the payment by Canada to the provinces—

Are these agreements with the provinces for varying periods of years as between one province and another?

Mr. Starr: Up until now the agreements have run for a period of five years. It is proposed under this bill to authorize the federal government to enter into agreements with the provinces for a period of six years.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask the minister if he knows of any of the provinces which have compensation acts under which the provinces do not supply vocational training? Are there any such provinces? I believe there are.

Mr. Starr: I am told that the provinces do not supply it, but they do have the power to pay for it.

Mr. Winch: That is the reason I was asking. I could not say with certainty, but I thought there were some provinces that did not supply vocational training to those who were entitled to benefits of workmen's compensation.

The reason this fact came to my mind was that this clause says the provisions of the bill do not apply to any disabled person whose disability is the result of any injury in respect of which benefits are payable to him under any workman's compensation law. There may be benefits which are payable because of a permanent or partial disability but there are not disability benefits. If there are compensation laws in which there are not disability benefits so far as vocational training is concerned, then this means that the people of that province, because of the dereliction of the government of that province, cannot come under this act.

Mr. Starr: Yes, the hon. member is correct, Mr. Chairman, in that respect. However, I feel it is the responsibility of the province to undertake such a program under their workmen's compensation measure. Even though the province may not have such a program we, as a federal government, would be prepared to counsel individuals in respect of this matter. I think the provinces should undertake such training of disabled persons, particularly under workmen's compensation acts, under which they are being trained and rehabilitated in most provinces.

Mr. McMillan: Is the government assuming one half of the cost of rehabilitating persons handicapped by mental illness? The definition clause says that a disabled person means a person who, because of physical or mental impairment, is incapable of pursuing regularly any substantially gainful occupation.

I have referred before to the fact that people might be confined to hospital for prolonged periods as a result of a disability which could be corrected by orthopaedic surgery. According to clause 2 of this bill, mental impairment should apply also. I should like to know the differentiation the minister is trying to make.

Mr. Starr: Here again, Mr. Chairman, mental illness comes under provincial jurisdiction. However, if a person who has undergone treatment for mental illness is restored, then we will participate in his rehabilitation.

Mr. McFarlane: I should like to ask the minister if the construction of buildings and the supplying of equipment will be the subject of a 50 per cent donation from the federal government?

Mr. Starr: This bill does not take care of that. That is handled through the health grants and other means available.

Mr. McFarlane: As I understand it, then, the maintenance of buildings would be handled through the same branch?

Mr. Starr: Under this measure we would not participate in those costs. We are only concerned with the actual training and rehabilitation process.

Mr. McFarlane: The way I see the picture at the moment, then, if I may just ask another question, is that the province makes a decision as to where this work is to be performed and we accept it, in principle?

Mr. Starr: Yes.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister this rather intricate question. Here is a case of a veteran who suffers a war disability as a result of overseas service. He has a stiff leg. He is in a car accident and the rest of the passengers are able to jump out and save themselves, but because of his stiff leg this man is not able to jump out and, as a civilian, suffers a disability. Who would be responsible for retraining?

Mr. Starr: We could accept that case under this program under those circumstances.

[Mr. Starr.]

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I only want to say a few words about clause 3. I note that under this clause:

> —the minister may enter into an agreement with any province, for a period not exceeding six years, to provide for the payment by Canada to the province of contributions in respect of the costs incurred by the province in undertaking in the province a comprehensive program for the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons.

This is a joint federal-provincial program. May I point out at this stage that I would have liked very much to hear what our Conservative friends of the province of Quebec had to say about this, because opinions are divided in the province of Quebec regarding those joint programs. There is already—

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. We are now on a clause of the bill, and the hon. member is discussing the principle of the bill despite the fact that we have had second reading.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, clause 3 refers to a joint plan, obviously because it empowers the minister to enter into an agreement with a province. I say that this joint plan we are now considering is not viewed favourably by all political groups in the province of Quebec, because there are those who consider such joint plans as encroachments on the autonomy of the province of Quebec. As a matter of fact, here is what Mr. Talbot had to say in this connection as reported in Le Soleil for April 20, 1961:

> We cannot at the same time live on the central power and recover our heritage. We have to make a choice—

The Chairman: Order, order. I have indicated to the hon. member that his remarks concern the principle of the bill whereas we are now considering the bill clause by clause. Those comments cannot be related to the phraseology of clause 3, so I think they are out of order in view of the rule governing consideration of the various clauses of a bill.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I shall abide by your decision. However, in view of the fact that we are now considering clause 3 which, I think, is the key provision in this bill, I wanted to give my hon. friends from the province of Quebec an opportunity to vote either for or against the bill. I would therefore ask you, Mr. Chairman, to call for the yeas and the nays, in order to find out where our hon. friends stand on a joint federal-provincial scheme.

(Text):

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Clause agreed to: Yeas, 53; nays, nil.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

On clause 6—Research program.

Mr. McMillan: How are these research programs to be carried on? Are grants to be made to universities for certain aspects of this program?

Mr. Starr: Through the provinces. We will approve any projects submitted by the provinces.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

AGRICULTURE

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS RESPECTING MARGINAL LANDS, RURAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-77, to provide for the rehabilitation of agricultural lands and the development of rural areas in Canada.

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister this evening who, as I am sure the house knows, is away on a mission that is of importance to everyone in Canada, I take pleasure in making a few remarks on the motion for second reading of this bill to provide for the rehabilitation of agricultural lands and the development of rural areas in Canada.

At the resolution stage the minister outlined the broad philosophy which this bill is intended to convey. He stated that the main purpose is the improvement of the economic position of those farmers whose lands are at present classified as marginal or submarginal. However, it has not only the intention of improving the economic status of a great number of farmers who live in these economic units; it will also have the effect of simultaneously improving the position of farmers possessing more economic units. The bill itself fits into the broad philosophy of this government in respect of agricultural policy.

The subjects of bills that have been introduced into this House of Commons and have been passed as legislation include the following: a program of price stabilization to alleviate the effects of the fluctuation of prices owing to economic conditions beyond the farmers' control; the introduction of a crop insurance program designed to minimize the effect of fluctuation in yields caused by weather conditions beyond the farmers' control; the implementation of a comprehensive farm credit program to assist farmers in developing more economic units and to provide farmers with the opportunity of developing their operations to the point where they can effectively carry on in the face of changing economic conditions in the world today. This program fits into that broad general picture.

There are three attitudes that a government can take towards agriculture in the country as a whole. It could do nothing and could allow the agricultural economy to develop of its own accord. As I think most hon. members would agree, you would get the results that you should expect from that type of policy.

The second attitude is that you could leave nothing to the farmer; you could direct him completely in the production, marketing and selling of his products. We prefer not to take this attitude because we firmly believe that farmers in this country are not only capable but desirous of carrying on their own farming operations and making their own decisions on the farm.

We prefer to adopt the attitude that governments can provide an environment whereby people can take advantage of their own native abilities, initiatives and desires, and by providing that environment they can achieve for themselves that position which it is necessary for them to maintain if they are to keep pace with the other forces in our economy.

There are several approaches to this problem. The bill outlines in three separate phases the intention of the government. First of all there are the projects for the alternative uses of land.

The minister has on several occasions indicated what he has in mind in this respect. He has outlined that many areas of Canada which are presently being used for agricultural purposes could be put to better use for the production of trees or as reforestation projects.

A number of these projects have already been put into effect under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act. These are designed to bring into effect the proper utilization of our land resources.

There are several other aspects of land utilization programs that I could cite. One in particular that comes to my mind at this time is the program dealing with wildlife conservation. This is a program that has often been discussed but in respect of which very little action has been taken.

It is perhaps a sad commentary on our system that in the past we have found that too often municipal programs, provincial programs and even individual programs are in conflict with national programs. I think it is fair to say that under the rural development program the intention will be to co-ordinate the efforts of not only provincial and federal governments but those of municipal and private organizations also, even down to individual farmers, in the proper utilization and conservation of our land resources.

The definition of the word "agriculture" has often taken many meanings. The dictionary itself uses many ways of describing it. However, in my opinion the definition that most appropriately describes agriculture is not contained in the dictionary but comes from some experience and knowledge in the practical application of farming methods.

In many respects agriculture seems to be regarded by the non-farmer as a very complicated business. Perhaps this is because we are living in an age where complications are worshipped. I prefer to think of agriculture as a technique whereby you continue to produce food from the land for as long as food is needed, but you will only continue to do that if what you take out of the land is replaced.

Here again the bill does provide for proper conservation methods and, in addition to this, the development of rural projects designed to complement the existing agricultural potential of a given area.

There are many ways in which projects can be carried out under the terms of this bill. Perhaps it might be appropriate, since I am from the province of Manitoba, to outline at this point what this particular province has done in attempting to prepare themselves to co-operate with the federal government in the development of their own resources.

First of all, starting shortly after the present government assumed office, they began to conduct a land classification survey—the only one in existence in Canada—to determine the agricultural potential of each area.

Following this they have carried out several economic surveys to determine what the industrial potential, in conjunction with the agricultural potential, of a given area will be. Several of these surveys have been completed and others are currently under way.

In the economic survey areas the province has set up what they call community development corporations, composed of individuals, businessmen, bankers, farmers and whoever may be interested, to decide upon projects that might be complementary to the existing economy of that particular area.

After having decided what projects will be best suited to their particular area, these development corporations will then apply to the provincial government, through the Manitoba development fund, to assist them in carrying out the projects they have in mind.

[Mr. Jorgenson.]

Provided that these projects are complementary to the plans for that area, they can receive financial assistance to carry on these projects.

As I mentioned earlier, several of the projects have been completed. I should like to quote briefly from part of the report on the economic survey of south central Manitoba, by Ebasco Services Incorporated, of October, 1960. On page 75 of the report, under the heading "Guidance for Development", the third paragraph reads:

> In any such plan all levels of government—

They are speaking here of plans for rural development:

> —will be involved and voluntary organizations such as chambers of commerce, agricultural societies, and community development corporations must lend their assistance to a co-ordinated program.

This is a point which I made earlier, and I think it is one that is significant because it appears repeatedly throughout this report. On page 76 under the title "Land Use and Economic Planning", this is what they have to say:

> Land use planning should be applied to the entire area of projected community growth of all urban centres to ensure the welfare of local citizens, the protection of commerce and industry through the prevention of improper land uses, the provision of adequate space for schools, hospitals, parks, playgrounds and industrial locations, and development of aesthetically pleasing street patterns and residential areas. It should be noted that security of investment in housing, commercial establishments and industrial plants can only be achieved if firm zoning and land use restrictions are applied consistently. At the present time new industries prefer to locate in centres with adequate land use planning. In future this preference may be expected to reach a point where location of new industries may be contingent upon such measures.

I think this indicates clearly the necessity of the implementation of this measure to assist communities and provinces in the proper utilization of their land resources. It is also interesting to note in the report of the delegation of the Canadian Department of Agriculture dated February, 1960, presented by request to the special committee of the Senate on land use in Canada, some of the observations of that body. At page 56 of the report, the following recommendations appear:

> Team effort of local people.—One of the basic tenets of the rural development program is the belief that local people can do things to help themselves if they are provided with motivation, leadership and financial aid.

As I outlined earlier, this is the philosophy which this government has adopted with respect to the development of our rural areas. We do not believe we should provide complete direction. I shall read the paragraph which occurs a little later on in this report and which corroborates this attitude.

This has been accomplished through the mobilization of local citizen groups under the guidance of the federal-state extension service and many community minded leaders. It was of interest to the delegation to learn about the large number and varied kinds of projects that local leaders and committees had put into operation and were considering for future action.

Later on they say:

The fact that the members of the local committees have a personal interest in bringing about improvements in the economic and social structure of the area is the real key to success.

This underlines the point I made earlier with regard to the Manitoba program where the initiative and the direction of community development programs takes place at the local level. Once they have decided upon a course of action they can request assistance from provincial and federal governments in carrying out the program.

In the fourth paragraph it is stated:

The real problem is to stimulate imaginative and critical thinking on the part of the local people so they are able to see the potentials and opportunities and the need for action . . . This is a town-country approach, and sectional interests are lost in the common good.

Some indication of the need for focusing on local effort in the development and direction of projects was noted by the delegation in at least two different states.

This observation is very important:

Where the line of direction was from the federal or state authority down to the local level, projects failed because of lack of local interest and support. The delegation found a strong feeling that the organization and direction should remain in the hands of local people but the stimulus and motivation, especially in the early states, should come from state and federal bodies through the co-operative extension service.

I think this clearly underlines the intention of the bill which is now before the house and certainly it is an indication that in many respects we can follow the experience that our neighbours to the south have gathered in the course of their rural development programs.

Perhaps it would not be amiss if I read here tonight from a statement which appeared in the Canadian Federation of Agriculture news and information bulletin of January, 1961. It gives a fairly clear indication of what type of rural development program could be organized in an area which is in need of some reorganization. This item appears on page 2 of this bulletin and it is entitled: "A Rural Development Project in Quebec". It says:

In recent speeches, agriculture minister Hamilton has made the point that in the future many farmers would be wise to develop alternative sources of income to supplement their returns from conventional sources. He has mentioned pulpwood as one of these alternative sources. There are no doubt others that come to mind and many have been developed in the United States under their expanding rural development program. The MacDonald Farm Journal, the monthly publication of MacDonald college, McGill university, edited by Leslie G. Young, the secretary of the Quebec Farmers' Association, carries a very interesting story in its December issue, which spells out how one farm family sought out an alternative source of income that has grown into a community project.

This story is set in the Sutton mountains, at the town of Sutton, 63 miles from Montreal.

I am sure the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) will be interested in this.

There are many mountains and hills in that area, and some of the farms are of a marginal type. One young farmer, Real Boulanger, a confirmed skier, decided that the community had real potential as a skiing resort. He and his family and friends organized Mount Sutton, Inc. in February of 1960, and purchased 2,300 acres of land on the north side of Mount Sutton, the highest peak within 100 miles of Montreal. Then came the development of a first-class ski resort. Experts were brought in to lay out the trails, and all summer long workers have been busy installing a double chair lift, a T-bar and building a chalet. A new road was built and parking for 2,000 cars was provided in time for the opening at mid-December. Jean Lessard, one of Canada's 1960 Olympic skiers, has agreed to provide skiing lessons. What has it meant to the community? Sutton is a rural community, and most of the local businesses were dependent upon the farm trade. The resort has brought new business. Twenty five people have been employed on the project, and it will provide full-time employment for from 15 to 20 people all winter. It is expected that the ski run will take from $60,000 to $70,000 the first winter, and that the total revenue in the community will be between $250,000 and $300,000. Real estate prices have soared, and many people have come out from the city to buy lots for country homes. The town has several new shops and stores, and there is a boom in the room and lodging business. Some 150 people in the town have listed rooms for skiers. The mayor of Sutton is most enthusiastic, and the Brome Country Farmers' Association has taken the initiative in seeking zoning bylaws to prevent the construction of sub-standard tourist accommodation.

This is just one example of rural development carried on through the initiative of a group of local people. It is not too difficult to imagine how many more projects somewhat similar in type could be carried on throughout Canada if some assistance in planning and financing could be given through provincial and federal governments. As I have already indicated, my own province of Manitoba is a province which is very active in laying the foundations for a development program to complement the existing economy, providing alternative uses of land, and thereby providing employment opportunities for people who are presently flocking to the cities, swelling our unemployment ranks.

It does seem to me that the intention of this bill is to create many new opportunities for farmers throughout Canada and, most important of all, to provide for the continuation of the land resources of this country so that future generations will have the opportunity or making their living from the soil and providing food for the nation and, indeed, for the countries of the world for as long as food is needed.

I am sure that the minister would have made a far more extensive statement at this time than I have, and I trust that when he returns he will have the opportunity of commenting further and elaborating on some of the points I have made. Knowing of his enthusiasm for the contents of this bill, and with knowledge of the energy he has applied in bringing into effect the many programs which we felt are not only desirable but necessary for the continuation of our land resources, I am sure that hon. members of this house will support this bill. I have taken a great deal of pleasure in having had the opportunity of saying a few words at this particular stage of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I think it a matter of regret to many hon. members, certainly to some of us on this side of the house, that a situation has arisen this evening which I do not think, with proper management of the affairs of this house, should have arisen, in that the committee of agriculture is sitting at the same time as this important measure is being debated, and I agree with the parliamentary assistant, that it is an important measure. This is another illustration of the handicaps under which we are operating at the present time.

Mr. Pallett: How many members of the hon. member's party are in attendance at that committee, can he say?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not intend to transgress the rules of this house even though tempted to do so by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett). I do say if the hon. member for Peel were doing his duty as chief whip that committee would not be sitting at the time this debate is going on.

Mr. Pallett: There is not a Liberal member down here.

Mr. McIlraith: That is not a correct statement and you should not put falsehoods like that on the record.

Mr. Pallett: I am sorry, there is one.

Mr. McIlraith: That is not a fact.

Mr. Pallett: You had better go and count them.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): You had better start counting the members of your party at that committee.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The discussion so far has been irrelevant.

[Mr. Jorgenson.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I will not challenge your ruling, sir, although it does seem to me that the incapacity of hon. members to take part in a debate on a particular measure of this kind and at the same time to take part in the deliberations of an important committee of the house is relevant. Perhaps more hon. members from this side of the house would be in the house participating in this debate were that committee not sitting, or would be in attendance at that committee if this debate were not going on. However, I do not intend to pursue this line further.

I do feel that we are perhaps fortunate, having in mind the desire of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to finish the session by the end of June, in that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) is not here, and that the parliamentary assistant, who is somewhat more modest, should have introduced the bill instead because, as he said himself, his speech was a great deal shorter, although I am not sure its content was substantially less on that account. Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not have the same capacity for verbal inflation that the Minister of Agriculture possesses.

An hon. Member: Listen to who is talking about inflation.

Mr. Pickersgill: It may seem rather surprising to some hon. members, although it will not to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jorgenson) that I should be speaking on this particular measure. As the hon. member for Provencher no doubt knows at second hand, because he is too young to know at first hand, my father homesteaded in the bush of northern Manitoba when I was six years old.

Mr. Jorgenson: In one of the areas that will benefit most by this bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, in one of the areas that will not need to benefit by this bill because in that area around the village of Ashern, notwithstanding the fact that the land and climate there are not as good, as in many other parts of Manitoba, there has been a great deal of skill used over the years in developing crops, particularly specialty crops, such as certain kinds of seed, as the hon. member knows, which has made that particular community—I attended last year the fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of that settlement where I went 49 years ago —one of the more prosperous areas in that part of Manitoba, although it is not favoured with the best soil and conditions such as the Portage Plains and some other favoured parts of Manitoba. I think that is a very good illustration of what can be done if there exists good community spirit as has existed in that place throughout the whole of its history. I can speak from detailed personal knowledge because its history only began the year before I went there.

Anyone who can recall, as I can, the wave of homesteading that took place in 1910-11-12, and the number of people who went up there after filing at the dominion land office in Winnipeg on a quarter section never having seen the place, who spent every cent they had and ran into considerable debt, and got heaps of rocks that could never possibly be made into farms, will realize that this is not an ideal way to settle and develop a farming community. If we had had the foresight, and I am not criticizing anyone in saying this, to see what some of these problems were at that time, we would have had much less need for legislation of this kind and other legislation that has been passed over the years.

I also remember very well the period immediately after the first world war when the soldiers' settlement board was being used as a device for getting the troops out of sight as quickly as possible when the war was over. My father was in the lumber business for the short while he lived after the war and I had a good deal to do with that business at that time and, as a consequence, was in a position to realize the debts that were run up but that never were repaid because the settlers could not possibly do so. I remember the over-capitalization with respect to land that ought never to have been settled, though some of it could have been used as part of larger holdings with some advantage, in the way that it is gradually coming to be used now.

Just as in our industrial development we have developed slums because of a lack of foresight and allowing nature to take its course rather too much, so too in the rural development of Canada there is no doubt that we have something analogous in far too many parts of the country.

Then, of course, in the thirties we had the terrible disaster of the dry weather which was so ruinous to so many people who had really established themselves very well and considered that they had permanent economic security. We had to take another hard and painful look at the whole problem of use of land in the prairies of western Canada. I think that anybody who has had the privilege that I assume most hon. members have had, and which I had once again at Easter time, of driving through and flying over great areas of the southern prairies will feel that in the 25 years since the period of the great droughts we have done a great deal collectively, through the federal government and through the operations of provincial governments whatever their political character, to rehabilitate the prairie land so as to make more effective use of it and to provide a measure of security not against drought, because we cannot have real security against drought, but against the worst effects of drought.

I think that we in this country can take a great deal of satisfaction out of the operations of the prairie farm rehabilitation legislation in the 25 or 26 years it has been in effect. I take it that it is mainly on the experience of the prairie farm rehabilitation administration that the present legislation is based.

I am very happy to have the opportunity to recall to the minds of some hon. members who were not here at the time that the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, from the time he was counsel to the royal commission on federal-provincial relations, the so-called Rowell-Sirois commission, was very much impressed by and interested in the work that was being done on the prairies through federal soil surveys, P.F.R.A. and in other ways to conserve the soil and make the best use of it. It was largely through Mr. St. Laurent's own initiative that the ladies and gentlemen of the other place undertook the study of land use which has been drawn upon so heavily by the present Minister of Agriculture in the preparation of this legislation.

There is no doubt whatever, sir, that the extension, expansion and development of this work is an urgent problem. When all is said and done, no matter how great our industrial development, agriculture will always, at least in the foreseeable future, remain one of the main industries of this country. My own suspicion is that the economic importance of agriculture relatively, though perhaps not the proportion of our manpower engaged in it, will grow and not diminish in the next generation. I admit that is based, of course, on one very tall assumption, the assumption that we are not going to have a catastrophic world war.

But if we assume we are not it seems inevitable that the population of the world will go on growing. There is no doubt that North American agriculture is in the main so much more efficient than agriculture in any other part of the world. I am watching the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) shaking his head, but I think he will find, having regard to the number of persons engaged in North American agriculture, that production on the whole is very much greater than anywhere else in the world. It may be that in other places more intensive methods are used, but there is no place where the application of capital and of modern methods and techniques has transformed an industry more than it has transformed agriculture in the memory of everyone in this house. When you go out to the prairies today and see the number of people required to grow much bigger crops of wheat than were ever grown in the days of the horses when the farmers had to grow fuel for the horses in the form of oats, when you see the number of people that can produce what we are producing today and realize that the only part of the world where there are great agricultural surpluses is in North America, I think that the accuracy of my general proposition would be very hard to challenge successfully.

There is another very good illustration, of course. We can produce wheat in this country and sell it in the markets of the world but unfortunately we have not yet been able to produce many fully manufactured articles that we can sell competitively in the markets of the world. In other words, generally speaking our agriculture is more efficient in world terms than our manufacturing industries are.

At the same time we have far too large a proportion of our population engaged in agriculture that is not economic in any sense of the term, in agriculture that is very close to being subsistence agriculture. I do not think we have any genuine subsistence agriculture in Canada. I do not think in a country as far north as we are it would be possible to have real subsistence agriculture, but we come very close to it in far too many areas of this country. Far too many people are devoting far too much energy to a little patch of land without having the best kind of machinery, without the best kind of methods, without the best kind of knowledge, and as a result they are getting a very meagre living.

These is no doubt that from a long term standpoint legislation of this kind, properly administered and wisely and scientifically planned, can do a very great deal of good. I think that any step forward in this direction should be applauded by every hon. member on both sides of the house. But I think there are one or two cautionary words that also ought to be said. This legislation is not going to contribute in any way at all to the solution of any of our immediate problems. Indeed, it may do the reverse unless we are very careful because, at the present time, it would be a very grave error indeed to take anyone off a subsistence farm in order to consolidate holdings and make someone else's farm more efficient and put the person removed from his farm in the slums in one of our cities on relief. That would not be an advantage. That would be a disadvantage. That would be a backward and not a forward step.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Now, I do not want to be misunderstood. I am not suggesting for one minute the government has any such intention. I do not believe it has. But I do say that we must remember you cannot consolidate these uneconomic small holdings, you cannot remove every second farm family, without having some place for these others to go. While there is a lot to be said for seeking to decentralize industry for the sake of getting small industries into rural communities where they will provide alternative occupations at certain seasons of the year, where they will provide supplementary income and so on, we ought to remember that even more urgent than getting industry into these rural areas, at any rate while the people still have farms and are still making some sort of living, is to get some industries into the coal mining areas. There are a lot of people in those areas who will not have any way of making a living at all. We have not done much of a job in that direction.

There is only one situation in which legislation of this sort can work, and that is in a dynamic, growing society. We cannot have rural rehabilitation with three quarters of a million unemployed at the same time. This is a basic fact that we have to keep in mind. It is a good thing to plan. It is a good thing to get ready so that when we do get out of the economic doldrums, when we do start on the upturn again and when there are alternative opportunities, we will be ready to take advantage of them. These are all very good things but I do hope the Minister of Agriculture who is sometimes, I believe, more blinded by his own vision than is anyone else, will not go about as the Prime Minister did on a recent television show and talk about this measure as something that is going to be the immediate economic salvation of the country. It is not. This is not to condemn it at all, but it will have no immediate effect whatever. It cannot have and, what is more, it should not have because it is going to require a lot of hard thinking and hard planning unless it is going to go on the rocks as a result of bad management or bad organization.

We have had enough of these rural schemes in our past history to be aware of the many mistakes that can be made. There has been one conspicuously successful effort at rural settlement when we did profit from previous experience, as I think everyone would agree. I refer to the administration of the Veterans' Land Act after the second world war. This required a lot of planning, a lot of careful, detailed organization in order to keep the mistakes to a minimum. I hope that in carrying out this legislation, which I am sure will meet with good will from all quarters of the house, it will be remembered that progress forward relatively slowly will be better than one leap forward and two leaps backward. I suggest that that kind of caution is necessary in commending this legislation.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) as a minister of the crown. I have listened to him as a representative of the fishermen. I have talked to him as an historian. I know that he is also a coming gentleman of the legal profession.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, no.

Mr. Herridge: But never before have I heard the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate speak as a rural philosopher and agricultural expert. I enjoyed his remarks this evening. However, before proceeding, I do want to suggest that when he saw me shaking my head as he mentioned that the most efficient farming in the world was in Canada—

Mr. Pickersgill: In North America.

Mr. Herridge: I understood him to say in the world.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think perhaps before the confusion grows I might just repeat what I said. I said I thought that, everything taken into account, North American farming was the most efficient in the world.

Mr. Herridge: Oh, but I cannot agree with that statement, Mr. Speaker. Anyone who has studied the history of farming, and I am sure some hon. gentlemen opposite will agree with me, knows that so far as the average production per acre is concerned, North American farming is lower than that of Great Britain or western Europe. Incidentally, the highest return per acre of agricultural land in Canada is found in British Columbia.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is part of North America.

Mr. Herridge: In any event, I enjoyed the hon. member's speech. Indeed, I could see that he was living in the past for a short time, thinking of the pioneering days and so was I. I come from a family that was among the thousands of other families in Great Britain who were sold land at the beginning of this century for $100 to $200 per acre in British Columbia; our family was fortunate, and obtained good land. However I know dozens of people who bought rockpiles for $100 per acre, that was an obvious unplanned development. This land was sold by the department of lands headed by the father of the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) to various land companies in southeastern British Columbia and these land companies sold it to green Englishmen as well as various other people from eastern Canada. We are, therefore, making some progress in respect of the utilization of land. I quite agree with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that we have made some mistakes and blunders in the past in settling land that never should have been settled. We have placed burdens upon people who wanted to gain their income from the soil, burdens that were completely unnecessary and in many cases unethical.

Having got those observations off my chest, I wish to say that we support this bill which makes possible a long term program to meet a long time outstanding need, that is the rehabilitation of our rural areas on a logical, scientific basis. As the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said, this is not going to put men to work immediately. This measure will do little, in fact, to remedy present economic circumstances. This program should have been put into effect 30, 40 or 50 years ago, but I am glad we are starting now. It will take 15, 20 or 30 years before we realize any large scale effects from its application.

The people of the United States have been considering this question, just as we have. The problem there is similar in many of the states, particularly in some of the western and southern states. Since the introduction of the resolution by the ministers, I have been looking up some of the literature that has been published in the United States and reading about some of the programs that have gone into effect. I find that in 1955 a rural development program was initiated as a co-operative effort of the federal, state and local governments, including participation by private individuals and agencies, to develop the human resources of rural America, with particular emphasis on improving the conditions of the numerous low income families, both farm and non-farm, living in rural areas. In a special message to congress on April 27, 1955, the president directed attention to the problems of low income rural families and presented a recommendation for a concerted program developed in a study and report prepared by the department of agriculture.

Then, by an executive order of the president, dated October 12, 1959, the president established a committee of economic advisers in connection with this rural development program. Since that time, there has been a great deal of interest stimulated in the various states in connection with the program to which I have referred. I have read some of the literature. I have read the programs of the various states. I have read of the co-operation between governments, federal and state and local agencies, labour unions, farm organizations and womens' organizations. I think we could draw somewhat from their experience because they have moved fairly quickly in this direction.

However, I might say that I prefer our approach to this question by the introduction of legislation such as we are considering now which provides for the division of responsibility as outlined and for co-operation between governments as well as the funds required to give the program effect. It outlines the specific purpose of the program, provides for co-operation between governments and also the funds required to give the program effect. I prefer this. The United States program is really a program correlating the activities of the numerous agencies in the United States in a rural development program without any central piece of legislation.

However, this program is very extensive. It provides for the conservation of soil, water and wildlife, co-operatives, credit for farming, conservation and home improvement; employment assistance; extension of educational facilities in rural areas, financial aid and services necessary to rural areas; food distribution in certain poverty stricken areas; forestry and forest product development, conservation and forestry management; health and sanitation provision in small towns and in rural areas; income maintenance for old age, survivors' and disability insurance; programs for Indians; development programs in rural areas; industry development in rural areas; marketing improvement; price support; public works planning; rehabilitation of the disabled.

It is interesting to note how these programs are similar to some of ours. Then there is research and resource studies; road and highway improvement in farm areas; vocational training and the development of water resources for domestic irrigation and power purposes. That is a very large scale program to which effect is being given in various states. I was interested to note the scope of the services as outlined in this handbook which is the rural development program handbook issued by the committee for rural development program, Washington, D.C., in September of 1959.

I am particularly interested in forest conservation and forest farm management. I was interested to notice this interesting piece of literature published in connection with the development of forest industry opportunities in rural parts of the United States. I am going to quote briefly from this handbook. I was very much taken with the format and the material in this booklet. It deals with the location of saw mills and things of that type. In any event I quote from this one page in order to emphasize the value of a tree planning program and of tree farm management. At page 4 of this booklet it is stated as follows:

> Timber owners of course benefit from the sale of timber but it is worth noting that for every dollar the timber owner gets for his stumpage an average of $17.60 more value is added to the original worth of the wood by the time it reaches the ultimate consumer. These additional dollars go out as wages for workers and income for companies engaged in harvesting, processing, fabricating, transporting, and distributing the forest product. If you don't have the industry in your community to convert your trees into forest products, those extra wood-based jobs never show up and those extra dollars just don't circulate among your people.

Then it goes on to deal with the necessity for dealing with tree planting on marginal land and the opportunities in the forest industry on a small scale and so on. It mentions particularly the possibility for the efficient and successful operation of small scale lumbering industry and manufacturing industries. It is proven from their experience under efficient management and with the co-operation of the state agencies concerned with the industries small companies can operate with eight to ten men employed producing lumber just as efficiently and just as cheaply as does a large concern under those particular circumstances.

Then I was interested to note that later on there was a reference to the fifth annual report in connection with this rural development program which interested me in view of the fact that we are now dealing with legislation to commence a similar program in Canada. I quote briefly from it. It is a very interesting report indeed. The thing that interests me is that once the leadership was given by the federal government and by the state government in co-operation with the universities farm organizations and in some cases labour organizations, co-operation was received from farmers and individuals and citizens in the smaller towns and communities to make this program work. It mentions here that there was a feeling "You have got to show me" in the first instance but as this program got rolling, its momentum increased and I am sure ours will too if we get it going. Respect and understanding developed, and respect came with understanding. I think we can learn a great deal from the five years' experience they have had in connection with this type of program. However, to quote briefly from this report:

> In spite of many difficult obstacles, the rural development program has consistently been enlarged and made more effective year by year since it was announced in 1955 . . .
> The record of achievement and progress has been remarkable, especially with the problems to be overcome.

In 1956, less than 25 rural counties in only a handful of states had begun formal programs. Today some 210 counties in all major sections of the nation have the work underway or in the final stage.

Reports show more than 2,000 projects to improve farms, build new industries and expand existing ones, help both youth and adults to obtain the training they need, improve health, and accomplish other aims.

Thirty states and Puerto Rico now have rural development work underway. Regional meetings are going forward throughout the nation to help leaders in all states plan and inaugurate rural development activities.

The whole book is written in an optimistic tenor and gives the statistics in relation to certain developments which indicate that the optimism is justified.

Tonight we are considering second reading of this bill. It is a first and long needed step. It will require over-all and careful planning. It will require careful surveys in co-operation with the provinces of areas that are particularly going ot be attacked. Then it will require understanding on the part of the local people. When you begin to inaugurate a program of this kind you very often run into local misunderstandings or local objections. I have on occasion met men who, if you threatened to move them off 10 acres of rocky land where they had lived for a good many years would resist to the limit. There must be an understanding on the part of the local people of what the provincial and federal governments aim to do for them. I am sure that understanding and co-operation will come with the co-operation of all the government and local agencies concerned. This bill plans to improve agriculture, industrial land, water, forest and wildlife management. It is fortunate that this program has come in at this time. It should have come in years ago. However, regardless of our difficulties at the present time I believe that we are entering a period in Canadian history that presents an unusual challenge.

It is easy to do things when it is easy to do them. However, we are facing problems which will challenge our ingenuity and our ability to co-operate with one another as Canadians, whatever our status and whatever our occupation and will challenge our initiative and our wilingness to work together. I am sure that in the future—and in the very near future I may say—we are going to see more and more people turn from the large centres. As far as I am concerned, in some respects the larger cities are cesspools of iniquity. I have always been in favour of decentralization of population. Mind you, I also realize that with large cities you get great opportunities for cultural activities. Life is full of compensations. But I think people will turn more and more to the rural areas and the small towns that serve them. I see this coming in the future. I have found a change in young men in the last year or two. Young men coming home from the war were anxious to go into industry because of the larger wages there. These were sons of farmers. I find some of them now thinking of going back on the land.

While the income per month is less, the cash is less, a good many of them found out that at the end of the year they saved more from working on the land than they had in what appeared to be well paid jobs in the larger centres. This is because of the higher costs, the tendencies to spend more, get into debt, and so on.

I am sure that, through the rural rehabilitation program, in the rural areas there can be found all the resources required in the future, together with the necessary living and working space to enable people to live and work under satisfactory and happy conditions, with the recreational opportunities which Canadians enjoy.

Where this progam is given effect, in the years to come I am certain it will provide rural economic growth and maintain a vigorous and happy rural life.

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it is very seldom that I take up the time of the house to discuss problems. I am particularly gratified tonight to follow the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), especially as they have both indicated their pleasure in supporting this bill.

The hon. member for Kootenay West, belonging to the very quiet and honourable group in the corner, had very little to say but to praise the bill. Like the hon. members, who preceded me in this debate I am rising to support this bill.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate mentioned several aspects of this matter, particularly those concerning the former government. He mentioned the fact that his father homesteaded. I should like to remind the hon. member that my father homesteaded also. This bill is designed particularly to rehabilitate agriculture generally, and as a son of a homesteader I look forward very much to its implementation.

I am in the particular category of farming which the hon. member mentioned. That is what is commonly known as the category of family farms. I do not think it is the intention of this government—although it may have been the intention of former governments—to remove every other farmer, as I think was mentioned, or the small family farmer.

I maintain very strongly, Mr. Speaker, and I say this for the benefit of the hon.

member for Bonavista-Twillingate, that the family farmer in Canada today can compete quite successfully, for the very reason that he is a family farmer.

I have a farm in southern Alberta. It is a family farm. The family consists of six children, as a matter of fact. I do not wish to take up any more time of the house on this point, but I simply say this. My family and I have no trouble in producing agricultural products in competition with so-called larger and more efficient units.

This bill lends itself particularly to the conservation of soil and water. It has been mentioned this evening that it is a long term bill and we will not see any results from it in the near future. However, in supporting this bill tonight I should like to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the subject of the conservation of soil and water. These are immediate problems, and I am quite sure there will be very rapid beneficial effects as a result of this bill.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate mentioned the community spirit being adequate in agriculture at the present time. I take rather keen exception to the fact that the community spirit should be regarded as the answer to what this government has recognized, after so many years, to be a national problem. It certainly cannot be cured any longer at the community level.

It is difficult for me to discuss this rehabilitation bill without relating it to other departments. This bill involves the question of our national economy. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees), for instance, has pointed out across this country, and I think in so doing has captured the imagination of all Canadian people, what Canadian industry must do, not only to survive but to reach a proper economical level. This must apply to the agricultural economy also.

For instance, in January last in my constituency of Lethbridge, in the vegetables section of one of the chain stores I saw something that I rather disliked. I saw carrots done up in beautiful packages encased in cellophane. I picked up one of these packages and found that it came from California. Compared with the carrots that we raise in our area, these tasted like kindling wood. I am sure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will recall what kindling wood tastes like, if he is a homesteader's son.

The point I wish to make is this. I talked to the manager of that chain store and said, "Sir, how much of this exists today in our local market?" The answer was that 80 per cent was imported. This is in an area which is supposed to be highy specialized, a highly productive area, with irrigation and years of experience; yet that situation exists.

This brings me back to my point. For the information of hon. members opposite, this is the reason I tie it in with other departments and industries in Canada, because you must complete the wheel; if you have a spoke out of a wheel, the wheel is no good.

Shortly after the war, and actually up to two or three years ago, Canada had little worry with regard to export markets, in relation to agricultural commodities. It was purely a sellers' market and producers could get almost any price for any product they wished to sell. That situation does not exist today. I could quote from Hansard, as a matter of fact, some remarks which have been made by former ministers in former governments which have actually got us nicely into some of this trouble. At that time we were promoting the sale of primary products —iron, or nickel or agricultural products, etc.—at a time when we should have been promoting secondary industry.

That brings me back to the illustration I gave a moment ago concerning the importation of agricultural products. That is actually the result of the lack of promotion of secondary industry as related to the agriculture industry. We in the agriculture industry must face the same situation as all the other industries in Canada are facing today. We must face the necessity of producing a product that will sell, and then go out and sell it, to quote the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees).

As I said previously, I am happy to follow the two previous opposition speakers who have indicated their support for this bill, because it really is something for which the country has been waiting, something of which the country has been in dire need for many years; so long, in fact, that waiting for it has almost got to be a habit. The minister who now holds the portfolio of agriculture, together with his predecessor and this government as a whole must be given a great deal of credit for initiating this bill. Certainly they had a good foundation on which to build. The foundation was the need over the years amounting to a habit that has led up to the present difficulty.

In addition to the problems of production and of secondary industry is the problem of quality control. Today in this house we talked about national design. We must also bear in mind that in addition to design we need Canadian quality. There is no one in this house I am sure who will disagree with the statement that there is no substitute for quality. Quality control goes right along with the development of secondary industry in all industries as well as the agriculture industry. In short, the rehabilitation bill which the minister has introduced means to me as a simple farmer and as the son of a homesteader a move to restore something to its former usefulness or to its former self.

With that explanation, which is a simple explanation, I begin to wonder what the former self was and why it is not its former self today. I have discussed that at some length, pointing out some reasons for the introduction of this bill and some solutions to the difficulties of the industry itself.

Recalling the former usefulness of the agriculture industry in my area, I can go back 40 or 50 years and it brings to mind the early Mormon settlers, the pioneers of irrigation in my area. Actually, irrigation is related to commercial production in Canada. They developed this industry in our area and produced high quality products for the market in that day making use of a most abundant water supply and most fertile land. Today, markets are different. We need an even higher production. We need even more specialization if we are to compete in world markets or even in our own national market. That is why I am so happy to rise in my place in this house tonight to support this bill. My experience—and my experience has been consistent in my area for years and years because I have watched some of these things develop over the years—is that effective government action has long been needed. Actually, I have abhorred the lack of government action particularly at senior government level.

Tied in with all these things is one subject that I should like to emphasize most of all at this time, the conservation of soil and water. These older irrigation companies—and when I say older irrigation companies I am speaking of irrigation companies in my area in particular and in the constituency immediately east of me, Medicine Hat—I have seen these develop to the point where at the present time we have several irrigation companies, some 16 or 17 of them actually, which by way of comparison may be compared with a municipality since they are corporate entities.

That brings another point to mind. I see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) is here tonight and I should like to recommend that corporate entities such as these irrigation companies might be considered in another year as eligibile to participate in the winter works program. These companies have reached the point today where their capital works have deteriorated to the stage where it is becoming impossible to bring them up to their former standard of usefulness.

Then again, the land, itself, has deteriorated. One irrigation company in particular has told me that they have written off 16,000 acres as being no longer useful land under the present set up. Now when you multiply that by at least four or five large irrigation companies that adds up to 50,000 or 60,000 acres of formerly good, prime productive soil which is no longer useful. However, it is not past redemption. To bring it back to its former usefulness would require financial aid. I think that perhaps under this bill when it is finally implemented the former usefulness of this land may be increased.

May I say with emphasis that I am happy to rise in my place tonight in support of this bill because never before in Canada's history has it been possible for the federal government to financially assist the various areas of Canada in the restoration to its former usefulness, of what I consider the most important economy in Canada, and I refer of course to the agricultural areas. This will take time but if we have patience we can succeed. There are one or two aspects of the solution which will perhaps not take as long to accomplish as some hon. members opposite think.

The problems I mentioned before in respect to drainage and spoilage in soil resulted from poor management, lack of capital for proper construction of irrigation transmission lines, and other related things, but probably the greatest fault lay in the lack of experience.

The irrigation system to which I have referred was the first applied in Canada on a commercial scale and was quite successful. However, after a period of perhaps 20 to 40 years certain practices were found to be no longer advisable. The experience gained from these unhappy times has perhaps been of value to the construction of later irrigation systems. Through this experience we look forward to increased irrigated acreage in Canada, which will lend itself to increased agricultural production.

I refer particularly to those areas of Saskatchewan which will be irrigated following the completion of the Saskatchewan dam. Surely the experience gained by the solving of the problems encountered in the construction of the early irrigated areas in Canada will be put to use in future years. The present bill will provide an answer to the irrigation problems facing many areas in this country. Although it may be said by some that additional highly specialized agricultural producing areas in our nation should not be developed, I would suggest that within a very short time the necessity of having such areas will be clear. It is essential, therefore, that we profit from the experience of past mistakes and in doing so perhaps recompense those individuals who have suffered in this regard in the past.

This bill refers to conservation of water as well as soil. In my area the conservation of water is very important. It is perhaps more important than even we who live in that area commonly known as the dry land area, realize. I suggest we should be very cognizant of this program because the problem is perhaps more acute than most of us realize. As an example of this, I might suggest that last year there was a water shortage in the Lethbridge northern irrigation district which is primarily supplied by Old Man river which, in turn, is supplied by a rather small watershed in the eastern Rockies, and particularly the Livingstone gap.

Some of the younger people in that irrigation area consider there was a water shortage last year and that the lack of supply was abnormal. However, the long term record shows that it was actually a normal year. I would point out that some of the older hon. members, including perhaps the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and myself, will remember the drought years. If one could picture conditions following perhaps one, two, three, four or five drought years in relation to last year's normal condition one could realize what might happen if water is not without adequate storage, it is not difficult to visualize the effect on water supply of a drought period followed by, let us say, a forest fire, in the relatively small area of the eastern Rocky mountain watershed. I would suggest these facts have contributed to the present shortage, not only in our area but also downstream.

Mr. Speaker, I must apologize for dealing with the problems of other government departments, and in this case I refer to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, and the Department of Forestry, but I would strongly urge that immediate surveys be made for the location and development of extra water storage facilities, and a program developed to prevent the over-grazing of forest reserves. I make these suggestions not only in respect of my own area but in respect of areas to be developed in the future, such as these areas in Saskatchewan to which I have referred.

Mr. Speaker, to digress for a moment, I would like to commend the ministers of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Labour for introducing the vocational training bill. This has established a precedent. Never before in Canadian history has it been possible by way of legislation for the federal government to contribute financially to such a vocational training scheme. This again must be related to agriculture because, as I pointed out a moment ago, there was a lack of knowledge which resulted in what some people might call poor management. In this day and age in a highly competitive economy, it is all the more necessary that there be specialized training in this particular sphere of the Canadian economy. I am sure that a vocational training scheme properly utilized can be applied usefully and certainly can be a great benefit to this rehabilitation program.

With the permission of the house I should like to dwell for a moment on vocational training, what I term real vocational training compared with what has been the practice of the departments of education in the various provinces of our nation. Possibly I am going a little far afield but my experience has been that in Alberta, for instance, our young people of high school age spend two, three or four years taking a course in agriculture, mechanics, welding or farm management and after they have spent that period of time in study they are not given any certificate. So far as education in Canada today is concerned, I think we are hampered and held back by hidebound provincialism when, from the national point of view and having in mind the state of transportation and communications today, our education should be on the basis that we are a member of the world community. I hope that as the provinces take advantage of the vocational training scheme, and I am relating it at the moment to agriculture, the provincial departments of education will see to it that after our young people have spent two, three or four years at high school they will not only receive a certificate when they graduate but will have received what I would describe as true vocational training.

By that I mean simply this. The student spends his time on automobile mechanics, a business course or an agricultural course and at the same time there should be a well-rounded program including such subjects as commercial law, business English and so on so that when the young person graduates with a certificate he will have a well-rounded education and what I regard as a real vocational or technical training.

Probably I should apologise for taking so much of the time of the house in mentioning other departments but all this must tie in because it is purely and simply related to this problem. I should like to emphasize that the agricultural industry is no different from any other Canadian industry. It must meet competition. When I was home during the Christmas recess and again at the Easter recess I was sorry to see all the imported products. I do not blame Canadian industry as a whole. It is true that Canadian industries must do their part. Government legislation cannot do everything. As we have been told many times, it is hard to help people who will not help themselves. However, I have great faith in the people who contribute to the agricultural economy of Canada. In my estimation this bill makes it possible for the first time in Canadian history for them to go ahead on their own and certain financial assistance is provided that is available for the first time in Canadian history.

I should like to urge the departments concerned to have in mind soil and water conservation and the restoration of these assets for the benefit of the agricultural industry of Canada, particularly so far as my area is concerned which should be an area of specialized production of a product of good quality that is readily marketable not only in Canada but in the export markets of the world.

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few minutes to express certain opinions relating to the general principles found in the bill. Having regard to what was said by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), in order to ensure that members will listen to what I have to say I feel I should establish my connection with agriculture.

I am pleased to say that I was born and raised on a farm in the Verner region of northern Ontario which is known to be one of the most active agricultural areas in that part of Ontario. The hon. member who preceded me as well as other hon. members expressed surprise that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) should be the first speaker on behalf of the Liberal party this evening in regard to this matter. It is my conviction that any member of the opposition who at one time held a ministerial post is definitely of the required calibre and fully qualified to speak on most problems that are of such interest as the bill we are now discussing, and undoubtedly the Canadian people realize that.

I also regret very much that while we are discussing the fundamental principles of this bill having to do with agriculture a measure which the government undoubtedly considers should receive the greatest of attention, the standing committee on agriculture, directed by the house to study the problems of that industry, is at present sitting and has sat all day.

I did not attend the meeting of that committee tonight, but chose to speak on this matter. I think it is most unfortunate, and the finger is pointing at those who engineer the business of this house, that this evening we find many hon. members who have made special studies in connection with this matter unable to attend to listen to the remarks of other hon. members or make contributions themselves. They should be entitled to do so.

There are principles in this bill, Mr. Speaker, with which I do not necessarily fully agree. There is one in particular upon which I should like to touch. This bill mentions the possibility of further research into agricultural problems. Undoubtedly this is a field from which the people engaged in agriculture can receive the most benefit. The government should make sure these people receive the best technical assistance and the best advice as to production methods.

On the other hand, if you read through the entire bill in an attempt to find the major principle, and if you leave aside the desire for greater research into agricultural problems, you find the bill then becomes a mere political pamphlet. In this bill there is a preamble such as we do not find in other bills of this nature. We find, too, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) is given powers by means of which he may become involved in the problems of other departments. If one reads the bill one can readily see how the Minister of Agriculture may become involved in the problem of unemployment. The minister also has unlimited authority to become involved in major river projects. Anyone reading the bill will realize that the South Saskatchewan river project could have been initiated by the minister on his own authority. Furthermore, the bill contains no provision as to the amount of money which may be involved in any agreement that may be made with the provinces.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that according to the British North America Act agriculture is partly the responsibility of the federal government and partly the responsibility of the provinces. The phraseology which is employed in this bill leads one to believe that the Minister of Agriculture could pay 100 per cent of the cost of a project within a province. In my opinion we do not find this type of provision in other bills which we have discussed here on previous occasions. The usual practice has been to state the extent to which the federal government could become involved under the bill. The powers given to the minister by this bill are absolutely unlimited. Although the farmers do receive some encouragement from this measure with regard to the research that would be undertaken, I feel it would be most dangerous to accept all the principles which are set forth in the bill.

I shall be most pleased to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Jorgenson) certain clauses of the bill which give the minister unlimited power when the measure is discussed in committee. I shall refer also to those provisions which enable the minister to take over responsibilities of other departments.

I am certainly in support of what I consider to be the main principle of this bill, namely ways and means for encouraging further research into the problems of agriculture. Undoubtedly, the farmers cannot do this for themselves because they lack the equipment, the laboratories and so on to do this work. Agriculture is one of the most important industries in Canada, and at this time the government should certainly promote the necessary research to assist the farm population in taking care of their soil, finding better methods of controlling the soil as well as ways and means of conserving water. We fully realize that the implementation of this bill will assist our farmers, and for that reason we are in favour of it. Certainly when we are discussing the measure in committee, Mr. Speaker, I shall indicate the points which I consider to be wrong in principle.

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly very glad to be able to speak in support of Bill No. C-77. Those of us who come from the province of Saskatchewan and who have watched the career of our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) for many years, are proud to be able to speak in support of a bill which will endeavour to divert submarginal and marginal farms to more profitable use. This evening we have heard some discussion which has been broad in its aspects but rather vague in some of its generalities. I have listened to some of the opposition members speak, and particularly the last hon. member who referred to the principles which are involved in this bill.

Those of us who have been closely associated with rehabilitation in the past do not have to go very far to find on what principles this bill is based. Twenty six years have now elapsed since the inception of the prairie farm rehabilitation program in 1935 under a Conservative government, to deal with the immediate problems of drought and soil drifting which were then having severe effects on agriculture in the Canadian prairies. During this period of time many policies and projects have been undertaken, varying widely in their nature and scope, to meet the various situations.

Basically, however, they have all had as their one objective better land utilization and more efficient use of available water resources as a means of providing greater security and stability for prairie agriculture. I do not want to apologize at the moment for bringing in prairie agriculture, Mr. Speaker, because we will find in the application of this bill, principles which are fundamental to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, an act which provided for the rehabilitation of agricultural land and the development of rural areas.

In this connection, much progress has been made and much valuable knowledge and experience has been gained on which to base future long range land and water conservation planning in western Canada. Initially, this work has involved the introduction of those systems of farming, land use, and water supply, which would provide greater economic security for the agricultural population on the prairies and more recently, the development of larger and more comprehensive land utilization and water development schemes that will serve entire agricultural districts and prairie communities.

Cultural improvements which have been made have led to almost a completely new approach to the economics and practice of dry land farming. Techniques in soil management and methods of making more efficient use of limited supplies of soil moisture available, have been developed and are now in common use, which have helped materially to minimize the drought problem in drier area. The development of assured farm water supplies throughout the drought region for domestic, stockwatering and irrigation purposes, has also contributed greatly in bringing about more stable agriculture over a wide area. In particular, the development of assured feed supplies through irrigation for the winter feeding of livestock, and the provision of reserves of feed to carry livestock over periodic dry periods, has given much increased stability to the livestock industry and has been a major factor in encouraging greater agricultural diversification in the plains region.

Finally, the permanent removal from cultivation of lands which have proven submarginal for cereal crop production, and the fencing, regrassing, and other improvement of such areas for community pasture purposes as well as the resettlement and rehabilitation of farmers operating such lands, principally to irrigation projects, has been a major factor in bringing about necessary adjustments in the pattern of land use required on the prairies.

Where these adjustments have been of considerable benefit to the agricultural economy, new and growing demands for water required by larger municipal and urban centres for domestic and industrial purposes, as well as to support large-scale irrigation, have made necessary the development of larger and more comprehensive water storage and irrigation schemes where more dependable and plentiful water supplies can be obtained. To this end, P.F.R.A. in more recent years, has devoted an increasing amount of its attention to this type of development.

Under the terms of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, an initial appropriation of $4,750,000 was made to cover the cost of rehabilitation activities for a period of five years, and an advisory committee was established by the act to give leadership to the program.

Rather than establish new services, existing agricultural services were given assistance to expand their operations to handle the work. In particular the experimental farms service played a major role. As the P.F.R.A. program developed, however, a separate administration was set up in Regina in 1936 to direct water development, while the cultural improvement program continued under the direction of the experimental farms service. Then by amendment to the act in 1937, the P.F.R.A. was extended to include land utilization and resettlement.

It was realized, however, that for the development of a sound agricultural economy on the prairies, more long term measures for rehabilitation would be necessary. In 1939, therefore, additional financial allocations were made and the five-year limitation to the P.F.R.A. was removed.

From the way in which P.F.R.A. has developed, it can be seen that it certainly gave us a sound basis for expansion in the act we have before us tonight. There are other aspects of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act which I am sure will be of interest to those who come from those areas where they can be applied. I want particularly to deal for a few moments with land utilization and resettlement. In order to provide for this type of program an amendment was made to the P.F.R. Act in 1937. The act was broadened in its scope to include land utilization and land settlement. This opened the way for a program which has had a far-reaching effect on the stability of agricultural production in many areas throughout western Canada. By agreement with the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, lands not considered suitable for cereal crop production may be transferred to the federal government for development by P.F.R.A. into community pastures.

The province concerned selects the area to be developed and obtains control of the land. The land is then leased to the government of Canada which in turn agrees to construct, maintain and improve community pasture facilities in the area selected. In this way land subject to the hazards of soil drifting is removed permanently from cultivation and is again protected by a grass cover.

As these submarginal and marginal lands are converted into productive pastures, livestock production on the surrounding farms is being increased, thus making possible a greater diversity of farm income. Since the community pasture program began in 1937, a total of 1,886,364 acres of land have been developed into 65 separate pasture units. These pastures, primarily intended for reserve grazing areas to supplement farm and ranch pastures, are now providing controlled spring, summer, and fall grazing for over 120,000 head of stock annually belonging to some 6,331 farmers. In addition, a considerable tonnage of hay and some grass seed has frequently been harvested from these pastures. The program of pasture improvement carried on by P.F.R.A. has provided leadership to farmers in the development of their own farm pastures.

The resettlement of farmers from these submarginal areas has been handled jointly by the federal government and provincial governments concerned. Where available, the provincial governments provide suitable crown land on which to resettle farmers. P.F.R.A. in turn accepts responsibility for moving the farmers and their effects to their new locations, and the development of the submarginal areas turned over to P.F.R.A. for pasture purposes. Every effort is made to resettle farmers on lands which are located close to existing or proposed pastures so that the farmers may take advantage of the supplementary grazing facilities the pastures provide.

Where it has not been possible to find crown lands suitable for resettlement, P.F.R.A. has provided its own through irrigation development. Two such schemes have been built specifically for resettlement purposes in Alberta. The first involved the development of a large block of land adjacent to the eastern irrigation district called the Rolling Hills project, on which 118 farm families from the drought areas have been moved. The other is the Bow river irrigation project where approximately 27,000 acres in an area called the Hays district has been set aside for resettlement. There are now 162 farm families settled in the district.

Similarly on somewhat the same principle, five resettlement and rehabilitation projects have been built in the heart of the drought area in southwestern Saskatchewan. The only difference is that for these projects the purposes and objectives of the resettlement and rehabilitation program have been achieved without necessarily involving the movement of farmers to new locations. The five schemes, namely the Valmarie, Eastend, Consul, Maple Creek and Swift Current irrigation projects, are subdivided into 40-80 acre plots which are leased out or sold to farmers in surrounding districts for feed production. On the irrigated land, farmers can be assured of producing adequate and dependable winter feed supplies as well as reserves of feed to carry stock over prolonged drought periods.

In a similar manner hundreds of farmers have been rehabilitated without the necessity of moving from their farms by the development of farm-size and small community irrigation schemes built throughout the prairies with P.F.R.A. assistance.

With regard to water development, this work is carried out under the supervision of the water development division of the agricultural services branch. Projects constructed under this program are divided into two main categories according to the size of the project, the number of people benefiting, and the cost of construction. These include individual and neighbour projects, and community projects.

Individual and neighbour projects include those works which serve the needs of one or two farmers. These are generally in the form of small dams and dug-outs that supply water for stockwatering and domestic use, and/or for irrigation purposes. In such cases P.F.R.A. provides all engineering services required to plan and design the project, and a portion of the construction costs.

The rate of assistance paid on individual projects is based on yardage of earth moved and amounts to seven cents per cubic yard up to a maximum of $250 in the case of dug-outs, $300 for stockwatering dams and $600 for irrigation projects.

Where two or more farmers pool their water resources to build neighbourhood projects, assistance is paid up to a maximum of $1,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has risen to a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I have been listening quite carefully to what the hon. member has been saying, and recalling at the same time Your Honour's decision earlier in the day in respect to another measure.

I am wondering how a detailed, historical account of what has been going on under another act of parliament which has been in operation for many years can be related to a debate on the principle of this bill.

It does seem to me, sir, that in view of the fact we are being asked to sit very long hours in this house to expedite the business of the house, there should be on the part of the supporters of the government the same kind of relevancy that is expected from those of us on this side of the house.

[Mr. Ormiston.]

Mr. Ormiston: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member who has just resumed his seat that when I began discussing this bill I said it was based on rehabilitation. The principles of rehabilitation have been well advanced under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, the principle of which will be the basis of the present legislation.

The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act will be taken over by this bill in so far as concerns the rehabilitation of agricultural land and the development of rural areas, and will be an integral part of that act. For this reason I believe it is most relevant to show hon. members what they can expect under the advancement of this legislation.

I have not very much more to say, Mr. Speaker. However, I should like to mention that while the immediate needs of farmers are being met by P.F.R.A., attention has also been given in more recent years to the construction of larger irrigation and reclamation projects involving the development of many thousands of acres of land.

Such undertaking are in line with the long range land use plan to provide for expansion and stability in Canada's growing economy. Of an estimated 3 million acres of potentially irrigable land in western Canada, 1½ million acres have been or are in the process of being developed. The aim is, when conditions warrant, to develop the remainder of this valuable resource.

The development of these large irrigation and reclamation works in western Canada, which either because of their size or location have not been included under the regular P.F.R.A. appropriation, has in recent years been under the supervision of the prairie farm rehabilitation administration.

These projects are undertaken by agreement between the federal government and the provincial government concerned, on a cost sharing basis. Special authorization of parliament is of course required for the construction of these major projects.

In conclusion, may I remind the house that this will of course be a fairly expensive project. However, the money will be used to make productive what is not now productive, or is only scantily so. It will be used to train farmers in different and more productive types of farming. It will be used to preserve the remaining natural resources of this nation, which we hope can be restored to their natural value.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in my place tonight with the sincere desire, in speaking on this measure, to bring to the attention of hon. members of this house the absolute necessity at this time of acting on this measure which deals with the conservation of soil and water resources, and the terrible consequences of any delay on the part of the governments concerned.

I confess that I am indeed greatly disturbed by the tenor of the opinions expressed by the hon. members in opposition tonight and in other discourse on this measure. These hon. members seem to be dealing in generalities and political expediency rather than with the consequences of such a measure in relation to agricultural and other resources of this great nation of ours.

I am sure that if they indeed understood the ramifications of this bill they would be more fully aware of the absolute necessity that we act, and at the earliest opportunity.

The quotation commonly used, that familiarity breeds contempt, can in no manner be more fully illustrated than in regard to the attitude of some of the occupants of this country toward its soil. Soil is a commodity of which it was thought that we, a comparatively new country, had an endless supply. The degree of fertility of soil is the very basis of the life of humans on this earth today.

This soil is not unlimited either, because it is only the very top few inches of soil which is the direct source of the world's food supply for man and beast.

I think the contempt with which we treat this vital resource is truly appalling. Consider even the descriptive names that we use, such as earth, dirt, filth, mud, dust and grit. These are hardly terms of endearment. Indeed, our disregard for this commodity in this country has reached such a degree that it is a fact that we have in Canada more fertile soil covered by broken down machinery and used cars than the total fertile soil area that can be found in some countries.

In this country we take soil, and what do we do with it? We dump it in rivers; we put it in swamps; we use it to fill lakes, crevices, craters and ravines. We seem to do everything that we can to be rid of it.

On the other hand, in other countries it may be looked upon almost as a treasure. If found, it is carried home gently in a pail, a cloth or even a basket and is carefully tended in order to produce a tiny quantity of food for a hungry people.

It is well known that in regard to food prouction per given unit of soil, our country either equals or excels any other nation in the world. It is true that our basic agricultural problems today are perhaps caused by the overproduction of various kinds of food. Why would an area such as Kent county, which I represent—or indeed all southwestern Ontario, which is one of the high production areas of food in Canada—have need of a conservation program for soil and water? What need have we for tree farms, community pastures, or indeed government aid under a bill such as we have before us tonight?

I should like to elaborate on this point because I fear hon. members are not aware that we in these areas of high production have perhaps some of the most submarginal land that can be found in Canada today. May I point out to hon. members that too often when disaster is about to strike the indications are least evident. This is a fact often borne out by history. Hon. members will recall the history of the races of Indians who used to inhabit Central America and the southern United States, nations which were in an advanced state of civilization. Their main food was corn. This corn was grown on ground from which the virgin forest had been burnt off. This burning served to kill the weeds and sterilize the ground. It provided a fertile source for the corn, and the process served very well for two or three years. When the time came when the weeds had choked out the corn it was a common practice to burn off another part of the forest and move to the new area.

These nations practised no form of conservation and their neglect led to terrible consequences. Indeed, when there was no more virgin forest left to cultivate the nation almost starved to death, because when the weeds choked out the corn they had no method of controlling them, not even that of pulling out the weeds.

We can recall the dust bowls in the United States, in our own west and in other countries, dust bowls caused by the scarcity of rainfall and by our own agricultural practices which remove the grass cover. May I dare to say that lack of knowledge and direction is more serious than most people imagine or could even dream? As I pointed out, lack of proper conservation even in our richest farm land is causing us to lose our topsoil fertility at the rate of hundreds of thousands of tons, not in a generation but each and every year. Farmers are the first to become aware of the forces that are constantly at work to waste and destroy this greatest of our national resources, fertile soil, which is in effect the lifeblood of our world.

All too often the picture conjured up by the word "erosion" is the rushing of water caused by melting snow or heavy rains pouring down the hills and slopes to creeks and rivers and carrying with it topsoil from the surface in its violent rush and depositing this soil in lakes, rivers and oceans. This is witnessed today by the tremendous expenditure each year on dredging this sediment from channels and river mouths. This erosion is a fact, but I might point out that it represents only a small part of the picture. There are other ways in which soil is eroded, not so violent but equally deadly, and these processes are at work on our soil 24 hours of every day.

One of them is our method of farming. By constantly cropping for cash crops we remove tons of essential elements from the soil and return little in their place. The cultivating methods used by farmers today tend to keep our soil in a loose, friable condition in which it is most liable not only to erosion by water but to seeping down in fine particles through the soil itself into the subsoil out of reach of the searching roots of plant life where, very often, through man-made underground water drains they are ultimately carried by surface water to rivers, lakes and seas.

May I have the indulgence of the house to illustrate by a small example the magnitude of the problem? In an experiment conducted by the soil and water conservation research centre, Ohio, as reported in the February 1961 issue of "Successful Farming" on page 47, the following facts were noted as having been achieved. Each of two watersheds was planted to corn following two years of meadow. Here is the manner in which the two identical watersheds were treated in order to determine the amount of possible erosion and the effects, if any, of a planned conservation program which took the form of a change in the accepted practice in the planting of a crop of corn. The one was ploughed across the slope, disked twice, harrowed once, planted on the contour, and cultivated twice to control weeds. Hon. members familiar with this crop will, I am sure, agree this is normal procedure. The fertility level of this tract was low; the soil was limed to a PH of 5.4—this is an index reading of the degree of acidity of the soil—and an alsike red clover-timothy mixture was the meadow crop ploughed under.

The conservation method, one of minimum tillage, was ploughed on the contour, following the natural curvature of the slope, throwing the furrow slices uphill. The planting operation followed the ploughing, planting inside the tractor wheel tracks, and there was no further working of the soil, hence the term minimum tillage. This watershed had a high level of fertility; it was limed to a PH of 6.8 on a ploughdown of clover-alfalfa-timothy mixture. The run-off and eroded soil were measured on each watershed and the results seem almost unbelievable. In one season, the results of the conventional method as compared to the conservation method were as follows based on a unit of one acre; water run-off, 98,000 gallons compared to 270 gallons; top fertile soil 7.1 tons compared to 60 lbs; yield, 70 bushels of corn compared to 82 bushels. What better proof is needed of the tremendous need of a conservation program in our best farming areas?

How can we detect erosion? Does it require a trained technical expert and elaborate experimental equipment? Not at all. Anyone who takes the trouble to really see the soil they look at, can see it all around them. First, there is often a very marked decrease in the amount of produce derived from a given area of land. The character of the soil itself often changes very radically and instead of being soft, granular, sweet-smelling and springy, it becomes hard, cement-like in texture, resistant to water penetration and has a tendency to dry very quickly and blow very easily.

To this, however, is added the more insidious and dangerous fact that the food from such soil becomes constantly lower in its nutrient content. There is less mineral content, less protein, carbohydrates, and in some instances a tremendous scarcity of the trace of essential elements normally found in such foods, with the result that such food used for man or beast can cause many diseases and malformation directly attributable to malnutrition. For further proof we have only to compare the chemical analysis of such food with those produced from new or virgin soil. The difference is startling in its magnitude.

We find also that not only are crops on eroded soils stunted and of lower food value, but are more adversely affected by the elements and by drought, and far more subject to attack by disease and insects with a consequent further drop in production. It is true we have learned to augment some of the fertility of the soil by chemicals called fertilizers but even to these we have to continually add more and more elements to spur production. In many instances even this fails and the farmer soon learns that fertilization is a medicine and not a cure.

One other effect of soil erosion is the reduction of soil population. Hon. members know, I am sure, that soil should be living. Every cubic inch of soil contains billions of micro-organisms so very necessary for the growth of plants and the production of food. These micro-organisms work on insoluble elements in the soil and, either by the production of acids or enzymes, or concerted action with other species, reduce rocks, elements and vegetable matter to a substance, soluble and in a form available to plants as a food. When these micro-organisms are not in the soil in sufficient numbers, plants will not thrive or even grow at all.

Farmers can see this on their farms. Vegetation ploughed down in the fall should be worked on by these organisms and by the next growing season should be broken down to a rich black mulch containing a high percentage of plant food. In a great many instances today, ploughs are turning up vegetation of a previous year almost in identical condition as ploughed down. The micro-organisms are not there and the soil becomes hard in nature, difficult to work and water runs off instead of percolating through. As a result we have a poor farm incapable of providing a normal standard of living for the occupants. This complete breakdown in soil is the direct result of erosion aided and abetted by the elements and could, if allowed to proceed unchecked, starve a nation.

Fortunately through the years by trial and error, by research and experiment, man has learned to combat this force to a limited degree; limited only by finance which curtails the necessary experimental work, and by legislation which would provide a co-ordinated and directed effort to fight this erosion—in other words, soil conservation. For this reason I wish not only to go on record as strongly supporting the principle of this bill, but to ally myself with the hon. members for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Campbell) and Halton (Mr. Best), and other hon. members who have long advocated a federal agriculture research committee to co-ordinate all experimental work in agriculture in order that advances may be much greater with far less duplication. These hon. members are on record as being in support of this proposal and I too wish to be placed in that category.

May I now pay tribute to industry which has recognized this problem to a remarkable degree. In Kent county very many industries, such as fertilizer companies, canning companies, and some machine companies, as a public service will either themselves test a farmer's soil for deficiency and recommend fertilizer and tillage methods to correct these defects, or using a local company, such as the C & D Sugar Company, who run experimental farms in the area, carry on research, grow demonstration crops and hold field days to enable the farmers to observe the results for themselves, and all of this at no cost to the farmer, except an earnest desire on their part to conserve and preserve the fertile soil to increase its productivity. This company—and as I am proud to say many companies in Kent county; Libby's Canners, C.I.L. and Canada Packers—actually has a staff of agricultural specialists available at no cost to farmers to aid and advise in all matters of soil conservation and production.

At this time I would like to pay tribute to the agricultural schools, colleges and agricultural representatives who have graduated from these schools and colleges, who offer such tremendous help in pointing out the value of soil conservation, and who have introduced practices to combat the deadly scourge of erosion.

May I suggest to hon. members that the problem of soil and water conservation of this nation should not be left entirely on the shoulders of such companies, noble as is their effort, but should instead be guided and co-ordinated by a joint federal-provincial agency. This agency should have the end in view of accomplishing the maximum amount of conservation in the minimum amount of time, and have sufficient funds placed at their disposal to allow them to begin the great measures necessary to counteract the tremendous forces of erosion ever present in Canada today.

I fail to see why all hon. members cannot endorse this measure completely. I would like to go on record as supporting this bill in its entirety and would very seriously entreat all hon. members to look into this aspect of soil erosion of our very fine farm lands today.

An hon. Member: Mr. Speaker, may I call it 10.30 o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is 10.30 but I see the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stefanson) rising.

An hon. Member: It is 10.30 o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We should call it 10.30.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is 10.30.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, before I ask the house leader what the business is for tomorrow, might I respectfully suggest to him that instead of carrying on with this debate while waiting for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) could we just adjourn this debate until he is back to wind it up and go on instead with something else in order that we make more progress? I hope the minister will give us plenty to do tomorrow because it is going to be another long day.

Mr. Peters: Could I also suggest that this matter be deferred while the agricultural committee is meeting, as it has been today, because the majority of the hon. members who wish to speak on this bill also have to attend the meetings of the agriculture committee and it seems to me that they should not be expected to divide their attention beween the two.

Mr. Churchill: All these sugestions will be taken under consideration, Mr. Speaker.

Tomorrow we will have third reading of Bill No. C-85 regarding the national design council, followed by the consideration of Bill No. C-87, concerning agreements under the Coal Production Assistance Act. Then we will follow with second reading of Bill No. C-88 dealing with the army benevolent fund. These three items will not take up much time of the house.

The next item will be second reading of Bill No. C-86, an act to amend the Fisheries Act, followed by second reading of Bill No. C-77, the bill we have just been debating. I presume the Minister of Agriculture will be here to conclude the debate on second reading. That will be followed by a resolution in the name of the Minister of Transport dealing with freight rates reduction. The seventh item I have marked here is the resolution which appears on the order paper today in the name of the Minister of Finance dealing with the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister consider the possibility at some early stage of completing the deliberations on the motion to set up the sessional committee on railways and shipping so that the committee can proceed? I take it that the debate is practically over.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, that will be done very soon.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

OPEN TENDERS ON FEDERAL WORK

Question No. 184—Mr. Argue:

1. Are federal (a) government departments (b) crown corporations, required by law to call for open tenders on work to be performed for them by private firms?

2. If so: (a) under what statute or regulation is this required in each case? (b) what general criteria are used in the selection of an accepted tender?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

Assuming that the words "open tenders" refer to tenders requested by public advertisement and that the word "work" refers to works projects or construction projects, the answers are as follows:

1. (a) Yes, within prescribed limits, except for contracts entered into under the Defence Production Act but in the latter case it is standard practice to advertise tenders publicly whenever practicable.

(b) Yes, within prescribed limits, for departmental corporations named in schedule B to the Financial Administration Act. No, for agency corporations and proprietary corporations named in schedules C and D, respectively, to the Financial Administration Act except, within prescribed limits, for those listed in 2(a) below. However, for corporations not listed below the common practice is to advertise tenders publicly whenever practicable.

2. (a) Government departments—the Public Works Act and the government contracts regulations (P.C. 1954-1971, December 16, 1954).

Departmental corporations—the government contracts regulations.

Agency corporations—national harbours board—National Harbours Board Act.

Proprietary corporations—St. Lawrence seaway authority—(P.C. 1954-1087, July 13, 1954).

Questions

(b) Total cost to the crown, compliance with specifications, ability, financial resources and integrity of bidder.

Assuming the words "open tender" refer to tenders opened in public the answers to questions 1(a) and (b) and 2(a) are "No" except in the case of the national harbours board where pursuant to the National Harbours Board Act tenders are to be opened in public within the limits prescribed therein. Moreover, the treasury board has issued instructions to all departments to the effect that within practical limits tenders for construction projects are to be opened publicly.

Assuming the word "work" refers to purchase contracts, there is no requirement to call tenders by public advertisement and the usual practice is to invite bids from a representative list of suppliers.

PURCHASES FROM DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES, VANCOUVER

Question No. 197—Mr. Broome:

LAOS—MESSAGE TO SUPERVISORY COMMISSION FROM PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA

May 1, 1961

Message from the Prime Minister of Canada to the Opening Meeting of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos, April 28, 1961

The international commission for supervision and control in Laos resumes its duties in difficult and indeed critical circumstances. Relief that the co-chairmen have called for a cease fire and that the parties in Laos have in principle expressed agreement to this must be mingled with concern regarding the prospects for its early implementation and the conditions which will then obtain. It is my earnest hope that the parties in Laos will with the utmost speed arrive at satisfactory understandings on the orders to be given to implement a cease fire and that immediately following such agreement the commission will be able through its own representatives to verify that the cease fire is in fact being observed so that the conference may take place as planned on May 12. I am well aware of the difficult and arduous nature of the tasks with which the commission is likely to be confronted. The Canadian government will make every effort to ensure that the activities of the commission will promote the objective, which I am sure we all share, of a genuinely pacified, independent and neutral Laos. I wish you well in the tasks ahead.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 2, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

TRADE

GRAIN—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SALE TO CHINA

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the house will recall that on February 2 I informed hon. members that a sale of 40 million bushels of wheat and barley, valued at approximately $60 million, had been contracted between the Canadian wheat board and the China Resources Company.

I now inform the house that there was an additional sale to China of 2.2 million bushels of wheat, valued at $3.7 million, for shipment during March to May, 1961. Those connected with shipping grain through the west coast ports have made a fine effort to meet these commitments. As a result, the grain sold to China for delivery between March and August is being loaded ahead of schedule.

Simultaneously with the fulfilling of the first order there have been discussions and finally negotiations between the Canadian wheat board and the China Resources Company concerning further amounts of grain that could be made available. Because of the quantities of grain involved and other factors, the Canadian government felt there should be an over-all agreement to facilitate orderly marketing.

I am now pleased to report that a long term agreement has been signed. This long term agreement covers the period June 1, 1961 to December, 1963. Under this agreement we have committed ourselves to provide up to six million tons of barley, wheat and flour. Of this amount approximately one million tons will be barley. To put this into approximate bushels and value, it would provisionally be 186.7 million bushels of wheat and 46.7 million bushels of barley, worth approximately $362 million.

If one adds the previous order for 28 million bushels of wheat and 12 million bushels of barley, valued at $60 million, then the total transaction that could provisionally be expected for the three calendar years 1961, 1962 and 1963 will be 217 million bushels of wheat and 58.8 million bushels of barley, with a total approximate value of $425.6 million.

I mentioned earlier that the first order of 40 million bushels was being moved satisfactorily. As an extension to the order now being filled, a contract to provide additional grain from June 1 to November 30 of this year has been signed. It is the first contract under the long term agreement. The amounts are 750,000 long tons of wheat, 360,000 long tons of barley and 32,500 tons of flour, to be shipped mainly from west coast ports. The equivalent in bushels is 28 million bushels of wheat, 17 million bushels of barley and 1.5 million bushels of flour. The estimated value of this order is $66 million. The terms of payment under the long term agreement are 25 per cent cash and the balance in 270 days.

Hon. members will appreciate that it is beyond the resources of the Canadian wheat board to extend credit facilities for the quantities involved in these transactions. Accordingly the government, reflecting its intensive efforts to sell grain in volume to new markets, is prepared to guarantee to a maximum of $50 million the credit necessary for the Canadian wheat board to conclude these transactions on a short term credit basis. I have made it clear that there is a long term agreement. Under that agreement one contract has been signed. Each future contract will be negotiated in respect to price and quantity.

A sale of this order will spread substantial benefits through the Canadian economy. Not only will it provide a welcome increase in western farm incomes, but this in turn will release new purchasing power for the goods and services required by farmers from the business community at large. Additionally the sale will generate increased employment for country and terminal elevator operators, railway and dock workers, and others engaged in the domestic handling and export movement of grain and flour. It is apparent that new grain sales of this magnitude will add significantly to Canada's total earnings from exports. Business activity in general will therefore be stimulated to a marked extent by the conclusion of this new sales contract with China.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): We on this side welcome the minister back from his trip across the Pacific to Hong Kong, where he has been successful in negotiating a long term agreement with the communist government of China and a considerable sale of wheat, barley and flour for the current year 1961.

So far as the long term agreement is concerned we can only hope on this side that an agreement of this kind negotiated with a government of this type will work out satisfactorily for our own country. There is, of course, an element of insecurity in an agreement negotiated with this kind of government, because political considerations often intervene between the purchaser and the seller. It is perhaps somewhat ironic that famine in red China, a country with which we have no diplomatic relations, has meant this large sale of grain which we welcome. We welcome also the reduction in our surplus together with the increased activity that the sale will provide.

But, of course, this is not normal trade. This is a windfall. Two factors make this sale even more unusual. One is that credit terms are now being given to the communist government of China, as mentioned by the minister. We sell wheat to our friends for cash. We sell it now to a government which we do not recognize diplomatically, for credit. Also the minister is reported as stating at a press conference in Vancouver that we shall accept pounds sterling for this sale, pounds acquired by communist China through the sale of rice to sterling countries.

It is clear, of course, that the United States is not a competitor for this trade, because United States trade with China in all commodities is now illegal. While that is not a reason why we should not develop our own trade with China in commodities which are not on the strategic list, a position we have taken on this side for some years, this deal, however, undoubtedly will mean that the United States may not feel itself under the same obligations as it was previously in co-operating with us in the sale of agricultural products abroad.

Considerations governing this arrangement show that in government thinking there is a distinction to be observed—and this applies also to South African developments—between political ideology and commercial advantage, and that political ideology does not prevent a commercial embrace.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, if my memory serves me correctly the former Liberal government sold wheat to Poland on long term credit.

Mr. Pearson: We recognized Poland diplomatically.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I am perhaps out of my element in commenting on this subject, but if the hon. member for Assiniboia were here he would say that we welcome this announcement. We are glad the minister has been able to make this contract for the sale of this wheat, but with over 500 million bushels of surplus grain on the prairies and with an annual production of grain of approximately 500 million bushels, the minister must continue actively searching for markets which will bring even greater results if we are going to meet the needs and the expectations of the producers of grain in western Canada, for whom I speak today.

[Later:]

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of his interesting statement this morning. Did the minister indicate in Vancouver yesterday that payment for some of the grain to be sold to communist China would be in pounds sterling; and if so, what proportion of the payment would likely be made in pounds sterling?

Second, in his statement I think the minister said that the shipments would be made mainly from west coast ports. Have any deliveries so far, under the agreement which commenced in February, been made out of eastern Canadian ports, and does the minister contemplate that some deliveries will be necessary from other than west coast ports during the 1960-61 shipping season?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, dealing with the portion of the question concerning shipping, all the first order has been shipped through the four west coast ports. If the additional orders starting in June overlap the previous orders it will be necessary to ship a portion of them, about 300,000 tons out of the 1.2 million tons, out of the St. Lawrence ports.

With regard to the part of the question dealing with sterling, as I understand it all the payments will be made in sterling.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture and ask whether he is aware of the fact that the port of Prince Rupert is 500 miles nearer to the Orient than Vancouver, and every opportunity should be taken to use the grain terminal facilities there.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had been following the announcements which I have been making these last three or four months he would understand that the port of Prince Rupert has never been so busy, and that situation will probably continue for some time to come.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister not realize that I only want to see it busier?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BANK OF CANADA—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT BY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with notice which I gave orally last week I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa West:

That the annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada to the Minister of Finance and statement of accounts for the year 1960 be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce for study.

Mr. Speaker: Undoubtedly the hon. member has considered whether this motion can properly be made, and if he can indicate any precedent for a motion of this kind I would appreciate him doing so now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, last week this matter was discussed. The report of the discussion will be found at pages 4043 and 4044 of Hansard of April 27, 1961. The presiding officer of the chamber at that time took the position that under citation 186 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, there would be difficulty in a private member of this house giving oral notice in respect of a motion of this sort. It was pointed out that under that citation certain exceptions were provided in respect of routine proceedings. It was argued per contra that this involved proceedings affecting the maintenance of the authority of this house.

Some discussion took place between the presiding officer at that time and the member for Essex East, later participated in by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. The remarks of the Deputy Speaker, to be found at page 4044 of Hansard of April 27, 1961, I believe support and warrant the initiative taken by me this morning. He observed, as reported in the right hand column at the bottom of the page as follows:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the comments of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate have clarified the point. As he says, if the notice given by the hon. member for Essex East is not intended to have this question stand on the order paper, there is no problem—

Then later on at page 4045, in the left hand column, about a quarter way down the page, he says:

I do not think that is necessary because the question seems very clear and, as I said, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has removed any doubt I might have had.

I believe I should be frank in this matter, Mr. Speaker. At the time I myself had understood that the Deputy Speaker had taken a position against the submission I had made, but on a careful perusal of Hansard, as I am now indicating by some excerpts, it is clear I think that the Deputy Speaker did in fact concur in the clarification so ably provided by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

On the merits, Mr. Speaker, the submission briefly is that, under the Bank of Canada Act, the governor of the Bank of Canada is responsible only to parliament, according to the Minister of Finance. By way of parenthesis I say, of course, that exception is taken to that interpretation of the governor's constitutional and legal responsibilities. Nevertheless, in part, that is the legal position; the governor is responsible to parliament with respect to monetary policy. His report is in the hands of the government and has been made available to members of this house, but no opportunity exists for an examination of its contents, based upon interrogation of the governor or otherwise. It would seem to me incomprehensible that the governor of the Bank of Canada, who is responsible to parliament, should not be available for questioning by parliament. This brings the matter within the bounds of what is a routine proceeding, and is covered by the explanation of citation 186 and clarified by the ruling which Mr. Deputy Speaker gave on April 27.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this written motion of mine, oral notice of which was given last week, is in order. It is the only procedure available to this house in view of the government's reluctance to have the report of the Bank of Canada placed before a committee of the house for consideration. It would render completely ridiculous the legal responsibility of the Bank of Canada to parliament if parliament was not given the opportunity in the face of the government's refusal and reluctance, to examine the report of the Bank of Canada. It would mean that the governor was not responsible to parliament in fact but was responsible only to the government, a contention that is denied by the government.

For these reasons I submit that this motion is in order and that the house ought to be given a chance of passing judgment on the merits.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has perhaps served his purpose in trying to discuss the issue that he would like to raise today under the disguise of a point of order. The point of order, Mr. Speaker, is quite clear and the Deputy Speaker of the house, who was in the chair on April 27, has dealt with the matter completely and succinctly. When the hon. member for Essex East sought to raise the matter and to purport to give an oral notice, the Deputy Speaker, as appears at page 4043 of Hansard, quoted citation 186 from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, as follows:

> Oral notices for future proceedings do not exist in the Canadian House of Commons.

As the discussion proceeded I read the remainder of the citation, which simply confirms the ruling that was made by the Deputy Speaker at that time; because by no stretch of the imagination could what the hon. member for Essex East is attempting to do here now be possibly justified in view of the terms of citation 186. What was attempted by him at that time was a complete nullity, and what is attempted by him here today is, under the rules of the house, a complete nullity. He is seeking to make new rules to fit the occasion, Mr. Speaker, and those rules are not to be made in quite this way. The only way such a private member's motion could proceed would be by unanimous consent, and that unanimous consent is not given.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could say a word before you make your decision on this point. In the first place, sir, it seems to me, however much respect we may pay to citations from Beauchesne, that when one examines the standing orders of the house one will find there is no prohibition against a private member getting up and moving a motion having to do with routine proceedings. In fact that is done practically every day in the house, as Your Honour well knows and as is pointed out in the citation referred to by the hon. member for Essex East.

Only yesterday there was at least one motion, if not two, for concurrence in the report of a committee moved by the person who is chairman of that committee but who in the house is merely a private member. Moreover, motions are frequently made to change the composition of a committee and, in fact, one was made yesterday by the hon. member for Elgin.

There have been occasions—I remember well when the question first arose in recent times—when there has not been concurrence in these motions being moved immediately; and the question of notice, which was never published anywhere, was settled, I think, by Mr. Speaker Macdonald by a suggestion that they might be printed in routine proceedings, but there is no such requirement in the rules.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Fundamentally, the point I wish to make is a very simple one. It is a recognized principle of our constitution, one particularly dear to those of us on this side of the house, that we have responsible government in this country and that the executive is responsible to the house. It seems to me, in default of any specific prohibition in the rules, that it must be assumed that there is a procedure, a method, by which that responsibility can be exercised, and that it certainly would be a denial of the rights of hon. members to deny them the possibility of testing the views of the house with respect to whether any report should be referred to a committee.

The government should not have control of that. That should be in the control of the house, even where the report in question is a report made to the house by a government department. But the situation, of course, is tremendously aggravated in this particular instance by the view taken by the government that it has no responsibility and that there is a direct responsibility to this chamber.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member in that line of argument is perhaps dealing more with the merits of the motion than with the point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was only the aspect of order with which I was seeking to deal. If this house is to exercise that responsibility which we have under the constitution, it is important that members of the opposition should be able to make the necessary routine motions in an effective way when the government does not do it, and this is particularly important where it is argued that there is no direct responsibility to the government.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will say no more than this. In the years I have been here and when hon. gentlemen opposite were in the government, at no time was it ever permissible for a private member to move the type of motion that has been moved today. When the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate talks about those on the other side now believing in responsible government, I am glad they have at last achieved a belief in something they so continually disregarded when they sat over here. I simply point out, and it is interesting to note this, that after all their examination, which must have been meticulously careful, they were unable to find one example to support them in their contention.

Mr. Hellyer: Where is your championing of the rights of parliament now?

Mr. Speaker: I think the practice, procedure and interpretation of the rules are reasonably clear. There are two matters involved in the motion submitted by the hon. member for Essex East. The first is the question of whether oral notice of motion can be given, and that was discussed the other day. I think our standing orders and practice are clear, and I refer the house to standing order 41 which reads as follows:

> Forty-eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address... Such notice shall be laid on the table before six o'clock p.m., and be printed in the Votes and Proceedings of that day.

Then I refer to Bourinot, fourth edition, page 295, where he says:

> In the House of Commons, when a member has prepared his notice of motion in writing, he hands it to the Clerk...

Further on the same point, citation 186 of Beauchesne, fourth edition, reads in part as follows:

> Oral notices for future proceedings do not exist in the Canadian House of Commons.

I think it is fair to conclude that this is a well established practice in our house. Whenever a notice is required it has to be in writing. In standing order 42 it is provided that in certain cases notice may be waived by the house, but that involves unanimous consent, and it is not the case which falls for decision.

The other point is whether notice of motion of this kind can be brought on routine proceedings and, if so, by a private member. The hon. member for Essex East has failed to produce any precedent for the rather unusual course which he suggests. Motions made during routine proceedings include motions relating to the business of the house, according to Bourinot, fourth edition, page 219, footnote (s). On the same subject Beauchesne says in citation 85 of his fourth edition:

> The motions allowed on routine proceedings are motions relating to the business of the house and for the discussion of reports from committees.

Standing order 32 of our rules, subparagraph (1) (m), gives us a general idea of the kind of motions which can be made during routine proceedings, and I refer hon. members to subparagraph (m) of this order which is the order relating to debatable motions. Subparagraph (m) says that the following motions are debatable:

> (m) such other motion, made upon routine proceedings, as may be required for the observance of the proprieties of the house, the maintenance of its authority, the appointment or conduct of its officers, the management of its business, the arrangements of its proceedings, the correctness of its records, the fixing of its sitting days or the times of its meeting or adjournment.

Assuming only for the purpose of argument that this motion does relate to the business of the house, which I shall deal with later, the further question remains whether it could be moved by a private member. It is well established and certainly has been the normal practice that the responsibility for the business of the house and for initiating motions with respect to the business of the house rests with the house leader. Motions which might come under that section are motions relating to the time of sitting as well as the business of the house, approving appointments, transfers, dismissal or retirement by the civil service commission of certain officers of the house, expressing sympathy for the death of some prominent person, or acknowledging any gift made to the house, or accepting or making any invitation, or making an unimportant correction in the debates, Votes and Proceeding and Journals of the house, or for the election of the chairman of committees of the whole house or for the appointment of the special selection committee. Questions of privilege, when raised under routine proceedings, also come within that category.

At any rate, that is the type of motion admitted. I think it might be worth while to put Bourinot's further views on record. In his fourth edition, at page 301, he says:

> Motions applying to the business or arrangements of the house are called, in the ordinary daily routine, after the presentation of committee reports and before the introduction of bills. As a rule these motions require notice, but some are of such a purely formal nature that by general consent notice is not insisted upon.

Also Beauchesne in citation 87:

> It is a fundamental rule that with the exception of certain matters dealt with under routine proceedings, no question can be considered by the house unless it has been previously appointed either by a notice or a regular order of the house.

Then citation 88 (2):

> All motions referring to the business of the house should be introduced by the leader of the house.

I think it is reasonably clear that the business of the house is normally introduced by a motion of the house leader, and it is also reasonably clear what type of transaction is included in the business of the house.

There are some instances of the kind of motion which the hon. member for Essex East has in mind and of how they have been dealt with. I have just picked out two for the information of the house. They are quite recent. They are instances from last year. I have here the Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day for Monday, March 7, 1960. At page 2 under the heading of "Daily Routine of Business" there are listed the following:

> Introduction of bills; first reading of Senate public bills; Government notices of motions.

The government notice of motion for that day was one standing in the name of the Minister of Finance, as follows:

> That the public accounts I and II, and the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ... be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

That is a motion of this type and it was dealt with on the motion of the Minister of Finance, under government notices of motion. It was then, of course, transferred to and dealt with as a government order in due course. The same thing is found on Friday, March 11, 1960, where under the name of the Prime Minister, under the heading of government notices of motions, stands the following motion:

> That the report of the Canada Council for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1959..., be referred to the standing committee on public accounts—

And so on. This proposed motion is about a report of the Bank of Canada or deals with a report of the Bank of Canada, which, as the hon. member says, is required to be made to parliament under the Bank of Canada Act, and is of the same order and character as the two reports or documents referred to committees by the government under notices of motion, as I have indicated, and dealt with subsequently under government orders.

The hon. member raises the question of whether a private member can do the same thing. I think it is clear that a private member can do so if he can use the notice of motion procedure which is open to private members under our rules. But, of course, that procedure would involve the giving of written notice of 48 hours. The notice of motion would then appear on the order paper at a place where, at this stage of the session, it could not be dealt with.

The hon. member's complaint, I take it, is that because this motion cannot be dealt with in the way that is normally open to a private member, therefore there must be some way of dealing with it under our rules. I think that is the fallacy of the argument. Our rules speak for themselves and our practice has been settled. We must interpret them as they are. If they are defective in not giving a private member of the house an opportunity to make a motion which he feels he should make, or to take a procedure which he feels he should take, the remedy is to amend the rules, not to depart from the practice which has been well established.

I therefore think I must follow what appears to me to be the logical course and indicate to the hon. member that I do not think he, as a private member, without notice, can make the motion which he proposes to make except with the unanimous consent of the house. I think that covers most of the points that have been raised and is my best judgment of our practice as it applies to the hon. member's motion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise not to take issue with your ruling, but first of all to thank you for the great care you have obviously taken in trying to protect the rights of the private members of this house.

You have said that in your judgment there is no procedure open to a private member to make the kind of motion which I submitted a few moments ago. However, in the course of your remarks you made the observation that it would be permissible to seek to raise the matter in another by way of a question of privilege. Whether Your Honour had made this observation or not, in my effort to exhaust the possibilities open to us I was about to raise—in the light of your ruling, not in contempt of it—a question of privilege.

My question of privilege is one that affects me as a private member of this house, and indeed it is a question that affects the privileges of all members of this house. The question of privilege is that we are not given the opportunity which I believe duty demands of us in the examination of a document which is now in the possession of the house and which in my judgment—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member proceeds may I make this observation. If his question of privilege is what he appears to indicate now, I am afraid he is not warranted in trying to make a matter of privilege out of a point of order. The rules of the house are set by the house itself. It is not a breach of the privileges of the house to observe its own rules.

I think I perhaps omitted one point which the hon. member made and which he asserts as a privilege, namely that there is no opportunity for him as a private member to deal with this situation which he feels should be dealt with. I do not accept that assertion. There are other opportunities in the procedure of the house to raise the question of the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada. The only thing that I am proscribing this morning is a motion by a private member, made without notice upon routine proceedings to refer that report to a committee. Other opportunities and courses may be open to the hon. member. I am sorry that I cannot accept his question of privilege. I therefore consider the matter closed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I say that I have a motion based on the question of privilege, which I have not completed and which is incorporated in the following motion:

Whereas the bank—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps if the hon. member would indicate his motion, then the neat point of privilege will be indicated there and it will fall to me to decide whether there is any prima facie question on which the motion could be raised.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The motion is as follows:

Whereas the Bank of Canada Act as interpreted by the Minister of Finance provides that the governor of the bank is not responsible for monetary policy to the government but only to parliament; and whereas—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he is really presenting an argument here under the guise of a motion of privilege. I am afraid he has taken the wrong course. I have seen nothing of privilege involved so far. Unless there is a neat point of privilege which arises—and I cannot see where it would arise—I think the hon. member should desist.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, it is only because this matter is of the greatest importance that I beg leave to indicate to Your Honour that this, through the exact form of the motion, I believe will be a means by which this problem can be dealt with by hon. members in the absence of any positive way of having this report referred to a committee of this house. This has been done only after the most careful consideration.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I certainly like to hear the hon. gentleman talk, but I think after you make a ruling that ruling should be observed. I thought a ruling had definitely been made. The hon. gentleman persists in this course, which he must know —I say he must know—is contrary to the rules of the house, and I ask Your Honour to proceed accordingly.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister is quite right in saying that when I have come to a conclusion, as I have both on the point of order and on the question of privilege, the matter is then disposed of. The other course open to the hon. member is to appeal the ruling that has been given.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to appeal your ruling—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Then sit down.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —but I do propose to say to the Prime Minister that I am not yet of the disposition to accept lectures from him.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister is within his rights, as the hon. member recognizes, in drawing attention to the fact that a ruling has been made. The question of privilege has been disposed of and the matter is closed.

RESEARCH

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. John Pallett (Peel) moved:

That the name of Mr. Danforth be substituted for that of Mr. Robinson on the special committee on research.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe no notice has been given of this motion, and according to the ruling just made it would require notice, which it is improper for a private member to give. There is not unanimous consent to proceed with the motion.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Speaker, I bring this motion as a member of the special committee which was appointed at the beginning of the session to deal with the composition of committees of the house. If hon. members opposite, who also comprise this committee have objection to the change, then I think we will have a meeting of the special committee and determine this matter there.

Mr. Speaker: It may be that our practice has departed somewhat from principle in that a member of the committee, rather than the house leader, proposes the motion. But certainly this type of motion has been so well established, in my experience of parliament, that I do not propose to accept an objection to it at this time.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

THREATENED RAIL STRIKE—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER TALKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has any statement to make on the reported breakdown of negotiations between the non-operating unions and the railway companies.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no official information in this connection, although I have been advised that there was a discontinuance; not a permanent discontinuance, but a discontinuance. I hope, and I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will agree with me in this connection, there will be an immediate resumption of negotiations. I do not want to say anything that would prejudice those negotiations in any way, but I do think every effort should be made by both the railway companies and the unions to arrive at an agreement in this connection, because the Canadian people do not want a strike.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Would the Prime Minister confirm the statement he made in this house on November 30 last, as reported at page 359 of Hansard, that if there is an agreement to raise wages it shall go back to January 1, 1960?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would not think a reference to a statement made in November, 1960, would be a question for the orders of the day.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING PREMIER OF KATANGA PROVINCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Laurier Regnier (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the tense situation in the province of Katanga in the Congo because of the arrest of Mr. Moise Tshombe, has Canada made any representations to the United Nations and to the commander of the Congolese soldiers, General Mobutu, requesting the release and safe conduct of Mr. Moise Tshombe of Katanga?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. The actual position of Mr. Tshombe remains obscure at this time and we are not entirely certain that he is, in fact, under detention. The Canadian attitude has been to refrain from interference in the internal political affairs of the Congo and to leave these to the Congolese themselves, with whatever help and advice the United Nations can give. We have confidence that the secretary general of the United Nations will take whatever appropriate and useful action is open to him.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

ROUYN, QUE.—APPEARANCE OF NEW POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister received complaints from the population and public bodies of Rouyn, Quebec, concerning the ugly and disgraceful appearance of the new post office building in that community? If so, will the minister tell the house what action he intends to take to remedy the situation.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have not personally received any notice of this serious charge, but I should be very glad to accept this question as notice.

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the minister looks into the matter and finds that it is a disgraceful building, will the minister assure the house that this kind of soap box will not be built elsewhere in Canada?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, nobody knows more about soap boxes than the hon. member.

Mr. Denis: May I direct a question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The artistic merits of the post office already constructed seem to me not to be of such urgency that they should be raised on orders of the day. As for those built in the future, this is a purely hypothetical question and I suggest the hon. member has not presented a proper supplementary question.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Postmaster General. I should like to know whether the Postmaster General approved the design of that building, or does he have—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN EAST COAST AND MAINLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In his absence I will direct it to the acting minister. Has the hon. gentleman's attention been drawn to an article in last Friday's Daily News of St. John's, Newfoundland which stated:

> Transport minister Balcer said yesterday in Ottawa that the question of a ferry service linking the east coast of Newfoundland with the mainland is "still under study".

Could the hon. gentleman say when he expects the study will be completed?

Hon. George H. Hees (Acting Minister of Transport): My attention has not been drawn to that particular article, but I shall mention it to the Minister of Transport and I am sure he will deal with it in his usual prompt and efficient manner.

FREIGHT RATES

REPORTED STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER ON APPLICATION OF SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would care to comment on a report issued by the Canadian Press on April 28 to the effect that the right hon. gentleman had said that the government notice given to the commons earlier this week in relation to the legislation to extend the roll-back subsidy on freight rates would act in the same way as a budget proposal which becomes effective when it is announced, subject to later parliamentary approval?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I would not care to comment on that.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO CONSISTENCY OF AMENDING BILL AND BILL OF RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Justice. I apologize for not having given him notice, but at the same time I am sure this is a question which he will be able to answer without preparation.

I wonder whether the minister has exercised his responsibility under section 3 of the bill of rights and looked at Bill No. C-86, an act to amend the Fisheries Act, sponsored by the Minister of Fisheries. If so has he found any inconsistencies in that bill with the terms of the bill of rights?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I can assure the hon. member that the Minister of Justice always exercises his responsibility under section 3 of the bill of rights and the answer, as I am sure he has anticipated, is that this has been done in the case referred to and no inconsistency has been found.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question. May I ask whether the minister has examined Bill No. C-76 standing in the name of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, and whether he has found any inconsistency there or not?

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Justice has looked at the proceedings of the house and the purported Bill No. C-76, and had discussions on that matter with the Chair. It is my view that this is not a bill which is properly before the house at all in that it purports to be a bill to amend a statute while actually it does nothing more than re-enact the same statute. In my view it is nothing more than an abuse of the procedure of this house, but I do not care to go further than that at this time.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): On a question of privilege, this house gave first reading to the bill of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, and the minister is now clearly criticizing a decision of this house which said this was a bill and that it should be printed as a bill. It seems to me that in those circumstances it becomes a matter for the house and not for the Minister of Justice to decide whether or not this is the kind of measure which would commend itself to the house. The minister has a clear duty under the bill of rights to examine every bill that is presented to this house and to take the action which parliament prescribed he should take, but not to substitute his own opinion for the decision of parliament.

Mr. Fulton: On the question of privilege, it is true that the house gave leave to the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo to introduce a bill. In accordance with ordinary custom the house accepted the explanation of the hon. member, leave to introduce the bill was granted and the bill was read a first time without being examined. May I point out that in my view the explanation given by the hon. member is not borne out by the contents of the bill itself. The explanation given was that it was a bill to—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but it does not seem to me that the matter of the bill in question can be dealt with at this time or questioned at this time in this way. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has made a question of privilege out of what the Minister of Justice said, but as far as the bill itself is concerned it stands on the order paper for second reading, and I would think any discussion of its introduction, or its position, or its legality, if you want to use that word, can only be raised by motion or when the bill comes before the house for second reading.

Mr. Howard: I asked the minister a supplementary question as to whether he had examined Bill No. C-76 in the light of his responsibility under section 3 of the bill of rights and, if so, whether he had found any inconsistency. The hon. gentleman did not answer that question.

Mr. Fulton: I was in the course of doing that when I was interrupted by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: You had sat down.

Mr. Fulton: I have not concluded my consideration as to the propriety of Bill No. C-76, I imagine that the subject matter which the hon. member for Skeena has in mind will be discussed in the course of proceedings on the bill introduced by the Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice on what ground he would state that Bill No. C-76 is not properly before the house.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I cannot accept that question. I have already stopped the Minister of Justice from discussing that matter. It will come before the house in due course when the bill is called for second reading.

NATIONAL DESIGN

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF COUNCIL

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-85, for the establishment of a national design council.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

COAL

AMENDMENTS TO AGREEMENT WITH BRAS D'OR COAL COMPANY LIMITED

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-87, to authorize certain amendments to the agreement made under the Coal Production Assistance Act with the Bras d'Or Coal Company Limited.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

ARMY BENEVOLENT FUND ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF INTEREST, PROVIDE FOR ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-88 to amend the Army Benevolent Fund Act.

He said: I have nothing to add to what I said yesterday on the resolution stage. The bill on examination will be found to contain the three changes I mentioned at that time; the change in interest rate, authority to the board to determine the salary of a secretary, and the striking out of a phrase in the act which the Auditor General considers to be unnecessary.

If the bill is given second reading it is my intention to move that it be referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): It is unnecessary to say much, but I cannot refrain from expressing the disappointment of members of this group that there is not provision for at least 5 per cent interest on the moneys held by the government on behalf of the army benevolent fund. However, we shall have an opportunity to go into all that when the bill is referred to the committee. That is all I wish to say at this stage.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs.

FISHERIES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO EFFECT GENERAL REVISION

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-86, an act to amend the Fisheries Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving the second reading of Bill No. C-86 I should like at the outset to point out that, with the exception of some minor amendments, the last one of which was made in 1949, there have been no major changes in the act since 1932.

The Fisheries Act is the basic statute under which the fisheries of Canada are administered. In the last three decades many new problems in the administration of fisheries have arisen, problems created by the variety of species involved and the geographical distribution of the fisheries, as well as problems arising out of federal-provincial responsibilities for the development of the fisheries and the international character of the sea fisheries adjacent to our extensive coast lines.

During the same period much progress has been made in biological and technological research and the development of new fishing vessels and fishing gear. It has therefore become necessary to amend the basic act under which the fisheries of Canada are administered, so as to bring it into line with present day requirements and practice.

One of the difficult problems arising out of the existing provisions of the act relates to the arbitrary exclusion of Canadian trawlers from the 12 mile coastal zone in the Atlantic coast provinces. This exclusion of fishing vessels using an otter trawl has been part of the law of Canada for more than half a century. During that time fishing by draggers has increased to the point where we now have on the Atlantic coast about 281 small draggers operated by Canadian fishermen and about 75 large draggers, sometimes called trawlers. This method of fishing now accounts for about 40 per cent of our total production of groundfish on the Atlantic seaboard of Canada.

Following world war II the advent in increased numbers of foreign fishing vessels to areas along our coasts, particularly off the coast of Nova Scotia, has created the anomalous situation where foreign trawlers in certain areas fish up to the three mile international limit, whereas Canadian trawlers are not permitted to come closer than 12 miles in the same areas. This 12 mile restriction applies only in the maritime provinces. It does not apply to Newfoundland where, by virtue of arrangements made at the time of the union of Newfoundland with Canada, the Fisheries Act was amended so as to permit Canadian trawlers to fish up to the three mile limit. It does not apply on the west coast of Canada.

The minister is given authority under the act to exempt small draggers from the 12 mile prohibition. This exemption has been accorded to small draggers 65 feet in length and under for a number of years, and they may fish up to the shore line in all areas with the exception of those where, by regulation, zones have been established within which their operation is banned, subject to the restriction that they will not interfere with the other methods of fishing. The minister has, however, no authority under the existing section of the act to except larger draggers from the 12 mile prohibition.

An amendment to section 55 of the act is therefore proposed which would give the minister the same authority with respect to the larger draggers that he now has with respect to small draggers, but only in areas designated by him between three and 12 miles from the coast of the Atlantic sea coast provinces excepting Newfoundland, where, as I have pointed out, the 12 mile restriction has been reduced to three miles by an amendment in 1949. The proposed amendment would enable the minister to establish zones where fishing by larger draggers would be permitted. The establishment of such zones would be undertaken with due regard to the interests of local fishermen.

Another problem for which a solution must be found, by providing a more flexible regulatory system, refers to the necessity for rapid closures or extensions of fishing times, particularly in the case of the anadromous species such as salmon, the runs of which to spawning streams and lakes are closely watched on a day to day basis and where a set fishing season may have to be closed or extended on short notice. In such instances it becomes virtually impossible to enforce proper conservation measures without giving regional and provincial officials the necessary authority for that purpose. The proposed amendments would empower the governor in council to prescribe this required authority.

Another subject requiring attention relates to the removal of any doubts that the act and any regulations enacted under it apply to Canadian nationals and fishing vessels not only in the territorial waters but also on the high seas. It is trite to say that fish take no cognizance of arbitrary boundary lines, and it is not possible to provide adequate conservation measures in respect to any species that migrate freely in and out of the territorial waters unless fishing activities can be regulated inside as well as beyond the territorial waters either unilaterally, in cases where only Canadian fishermen are involved, or by international agreement where fishermen of other states fish in the high seas for the same stock of fish. One of the proposed amendments to the act would clarify the scope of the application of the act.

In recent times problems of pollution of waters frequented by fish have become accentuated. The sections of the act dealing with pollution need to be strengthened in order to cope effectively with these problems. The proposed amendment would increase the penalties and make provision for giving notice to the public by the governor in council of any substance which may from time to time be found harmful to fish life.

Although in certain respects the powers of regulating under the act are inadequate for present day requirements, in other respects some of the powers contained in the act relating to enforcement of the act go beyond present day requirements. I refer to the judicial powers of fishery officers who are, by virtue of the act, justices of the peace with power to convict on view and to confiscate valuable equipment on view. While these powers may have served a useful purpose many years ago because of the lack of properly constituted courts of criminal jurisdiction in remote and isolated areas, there is little justification today for an officer of the executive branch of government to exercise judicial functions. In fact, by administrative control, these powers were seldom used in recent years.

The act is being accordingly amended to relieve fishery officers of the responsibility of exercising any judicial functions, and to place it in the hands of the courts where it more properly belongs. The enforcement sections have accordingly been rewritten in some detail.

There are other minor amendments proposed in the way of clarification, but they are very minor. Those are the main amendments to which I wish to refer. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing more to say at this juncture.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I would like to—

Mr. Creaghan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to speak from the seat he is now occupying?

Mr. Creaghan: That was my point of order, Mr. Speaker. I felt the hon. member should be occupying his own seat.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid the hon. member must speak from his own seat in accordance with the rules, which require him to rise in his own place.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, on the second reading of any bill we are concerned with the principle of the legislation, and our rules prevent us from discussing clauses in any detail. From what the minister said yesterday, or even from what he said this morning, it is very difficult to determine just what principles are involved in the amendments this bill proposes to make to the Fisheries Act.

In explaining the purposes of the bill yesterday the minister said it was a general revision and that:

> Among other things, it removes the power of a fisheries officer to act as a justice of the peace. It will amend the section which categorically prohibits certain Canadian fishing vessels from fishing within the first nine miles of the high seas adjacent to Canadian territorial waters in the maritime provinces. It extends the application of the act to the high seas as far as Canadian vessels are concerned. It repeals certain sections that no longer have any practical application.

This explanation is to be found at page 4137 of yesterday's Hansard. Judging from what I have just read from the minister's statement yesterday and what he said this morning, I would say it appears that the principles involved in this bill are twofold. First, as the minister said, the idea is to bring the act up to date so it can be made more applicable to the situations with which we have to deal at the present time. In this connection the minister pointed out that, apart from the amendment in 1949, there have been no major amendments to this legislation since 1932. If the minister had gone back a little further I think he would have discovered that perhaps there had not been any major amendments right back to 1867.

I might say, sir, that we are all in accord with the purposes which the minister has outlined to us today. It seems there is also a second principle involved in this amendment, namely to bring the Fisheries Act in line with the bill of rights. After all, we had no bill of rights when the first Fisheries Act was passed by parliament, and neither was there any bill of rights when the previous amendments were made. Today we have a new situation in that we have a bill of rights which was to have an impact on all future legislation, and consequently should have an impact on this bill.

Mr. Fulton: It has.

Mr. Carter: I hear the Minister of Justice say "It has". I welcome that remark, as I welcome this particular bill because the minister and the house know that on March 22, I think it was, I introduced a bill which was designed to achieve the second principle I have just mentioned, namely to revise the Fisheries Act and bring it into conformity with the bill of rights.

As I look through the bill I am very pleased to note that the sections which I had in mind and which I outlined in the explanation I gave to the house on that occasion, namely sections 19(1), 35, 51(1b), 64 and 75 have all been taken care of in this bill which we are now discussing.

This morning I was interested in the question asked of the Minister of Justice by the hon. member for Skeena about the reports that the minister is obliged to make, in accordance with standing order 40, on bills which are introduced in the house. If I understood the minister aright he indicated that he had done his duty in this regard. I take it that should mean that the report he made on this legislation should be available. Yesterday I asked the Clerk if he could let me see the reports, and he replied that they were not available at that time.

I am still not sure, in spite of what the minister said, that this bill entirely conforms with the bill of rights. I notice that it still retains one practice which I regarded as inimical to individual rights and to which I am personally opposed. The practice to which I refer is that of seizure and forfeiture of ships and property. I cannot bring myself to believe that offences committed under the Fisheries Act should be treated differently from offences committed under any other act of parliament. Under most acts of parliament which prescribe penalties for offences, the penalties consist mainly of fines and imprisonment. I think that is fair and just because we prescribe exactly the same treatment for every offender under exactly the same circumstances. But when we introduce this practice of seizing property and causing the offender to forfeit the property we are departing from the principle of equity, of fitting the punishment to the crime and of treating every offender in the same way. In many instances, and particularly in my own riding, the property is the means of a person's livelihood. Certainly under the bill of rights a person has a right to live. I think that is the most fundamental right any human being has and one that we will maintain at all costs. When you deprive a person of his livelihood, or of his means of livelihood, you deprive him of his life in theory and in some instances in fact.

Mr. Drysdale: He can get another job.

Mr. Carter: It is not a case of getting another job. The merits of the case depend upon the circumstances which surround it. Even though a person may not be deprived of his livelihood there is still an inequity which is foreign to my concept of justice, because the property which might be forfeited by one person will have no relationship to the property which might be forfeit by another offender under exactly the same circumstances.

I hoped the report of the Minister of Justice would have something to say on this matter. It was for that reason I was so interested in getting the minister's report before introducing amendments which, under other circumstances, I hoped would have been made to my own bill as it passed through the house.

We readily admit that some steps must be taken to prevent unfair or undue violations of our fisheries rights, and to protect and conserve our fisheries resources. However, when an offender has only one boat and you take that away from him, you place him in a very different position from that of a big operator who may have a number of boats so that the loss of one particular boat does not affect his livelihood to any appreciable extent. The same principle is true in respect of fishing gear and nets.

This is particularly appropriate to my own constituency, where approximately 90 per cent of the fishermen are engaged in the shore fishery, either by hook and line or by net. The boats they have are small, under 40 feet in length, and if nets are used they are vital to the way these fishermen prosecute the fishery. Perhaps some fisherman may have three or four nets, but even if only one of these is confiscated that man's means of livelihood is certainly imperilled.

I regard the retention of the right to seize and cause an offender to forfeit his property as a sort of hangover from the middle ages, and something which certainly—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): A Liberal government.

Mr. Carter: I am not interested in who put it there or who left it there. I am only interested in removing what I regard as an injustice, not only an injustice but an inequity. Certainly if the bill of rights has done any one thing above another it has been to focus our attention on our rights. We are now more concerned about them. After all, it was this government that took great pride in producing this bill of rights. A lot of fanfare was made about it. We had every right to expect that if things were going to be corrected, then they would be corrected in the legislation introduced by this government. I am personally surprised that the Minister of Justice would put his stamp of approval on this kind of practice.

The minister referred to another amendment which I believe will receive general acclaim. If there was any one thing that infringed a person's rights it was the power of the fisheries officer to act as judge, jury and lord high executioner, all in one. We are glad to see that the power which made a fisheries officer a justice of the peace has now been removed. I think everyone will rejoice at that development. Under the old act, Mr. Speaker, a fisheries officer did not need to have evidence that there had been an offence. All he needed was a suspicion or a thought in his mind, and he could proceed to confiscate a fisherman's property.

Mr. Morris: That was Liberal legislation.

Mr. Carter: I am not interested in whose legislation it was. My hon. friend is not making any contribution to the debate by sitting in his seat and making these irrelevant remarks. If he wants to get up and join in the debate he will have plenty of time later on.

I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that within the last two weeks I have had a case brought to my attention which was prosecuted under this old act that is still in force and will remain in force until this bill is passed and receives royal assent. I received a letter from a fisherman who had set out nets to catch bait for his lobster traps. Unless he can get this bait he cannot engage in the lobster fisheries. My hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Browne), will perhaps be surprised to learn that the gentleman was one of his constituents.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It sounds familiar.

Mr. Carter: Yes. This person set nets in Placentia gut, where he claims he has a right to set them. He claims he was not infringing any boundary and, in any case, there were no marks on either side of the bank to indicate where the boundaries were. He set those nets in what he claims were legal waters. However, the fisheries officer came along and confiscated them. Now the fisherman is left without any means of acquiring bait and no means of prosecuting his livelihood.

I have written a letter to the minister about this. I know he has not had time to receive it because I did not get it typed soon enough. The letter is in the mail, and I hope the minister will take prompt action to have the fisheries officer restore these nets to the owner, because it is a very serious matter to him. He told me in his letter that he was heartbroken. He is a poor man and now he has no chance at all to earn his livelihood.

These things are very serious. When an act like that can be carried out on the initiative of one person, without evidence being required, I think that is something that should never have been permitted in the first place, and I am glad to see the power to do so is being removed under this bill. I hope the minister will not wait until this legislation receives royal assent before he takes action to have the spirit of this legislation and the spirit of the bill of rights enforced in this particular case.

The bill itself empowers the government to make regulations for the proper management and control of sea coast and inland fisheries. It is a great disappointment to me to have to point out to the minister that this bill will not take care of the most serious hazards to our Newfoundland fisheries. In my own particular riding, and this is true in practically every coastal riding of the province, the fishing grounds are located outside the three mile limit, from three miles to 12 miles offshore. Any bill which confines the authority of the government to within three miles of land is not going to deal with the most serious problem we have to face in my province.

The greatest threat to the Newfoundland fisheries, particularly in my own riding, comes from foreign draggers. Last winter the foreign draggers were particularly active. On one occasion for at least two weeks they prevented the fishermen in my riding from prosecuting the fishery at all. They could not prosecute the fishery because, as I said earlier, these fishermen use very small boats about 40 feet in length or under, and they dare not go out on the fishing grounds because of the danger of being run down by these numerous foreign draggers. The same thing is true with respect to their gear. They dare not set their gear because of the danger of having it destroyed by the operation of these draggers. Of course they cannot afford to take the risk. If they once lost their gear they would have no means of replacing it, and their livelihood would be imperilled.

On one occasion it was found that one of these draggers—it was a Spanish dragger named the Santa Amalia—was actually violating the three mile limit. Statements were made to that effect. Affidavits were made by at least two fishermen who took radar bearings on this ship. This particular ship destroyed approximately $350 of gear belonging to one of the fishermen in my riding. We have no recourse. Therefore unless we do something about the 12 mile limit this bill is not going to have very much effect as far as the protection of the coastal fisheries of Newfoundland is concerned.

I know this bill does not define territorial waters. However, the minister and his colleagues must do something about this problem. The patience of our fishermen is wearing very thin, and the time is going to come before too long when they are going to take the law into their own hands. It would have happened this winter; if they had had the weapons with which to drive these draggers off they would have taken offensive action against them.

Another flaw in the enforcement of this legislation which the minister has put before the house is that we have not the means of enforcing it. We have not sufficient patrol boats to see that even our territorial waters are not violated. The patrol boats we have are small ships 65 feet or 100 feet in length, and they are too small to be out in rough weather. They are all right for rescue work, which they do, and they perform a very good service in that respect; but when it comes to chasing away these foreign draggers they are not at all equal to the task.

Here I want to express my thanks to the minister for all he did this winter in trying to help find a solution to this problem. He sent the Cygnet from Halifax, and at one time he was good enough to work out a plan whereby we had naval ships patrolling these waters. We also had an aerial survey by the Royal Canadian Air Force. However, we must have more and bigger ships if we are going to protect our Newfoundland fisheries. We need about five times as many patrol ships as we have at the present time, and we need ships that are about five times as big.

There is really only one solution to this threat from foreign draggers, and that is to extend our territorial waters out to the 12-mile limit. The minister told us this morning that one section of this act, I think it is section 55, will remove a handicap under which Canadian trawlers now suffer in that Canadian draggers are obliged to fish outside the 12 mile limit while foreign draggers can fish in to the three mile limit. We have no objection to that; we do not want to see our Canadian fishermen deprived of rights which we accord to foreign fishermen. However, it would be better for all concerned if this limit were pushed out to 12 miles offshore, and not only 12 miles following the contour of the coast but 12 miles from headland to headland. We nearly achieved it at the conference at Geneva a year ago; there was only one dissenting vote. But there is no reason why the minister and the government should not work out a convention with those nations which are agreeable to that arrangement of six miles of territorial waters and a further six miles for conservation of fisheries.

We must impress upon the foreign draggers that we mean business in this regard. If we cannot work out a proper agreement with other nations which should be interested in this problem, the only thing left for us to do is to take unilateral action. I think the government should make it clear that we intend to do that and that we intend to stop pussyfooting in this matter of having foreign draggers encroach and deprive our own fishermen of their livehood.

The other criticism I have to make about this legislation in so far as protection of the fisheries is concerned is that it is designed to protect the fisheries against the little man but that there is in it no means or no machinery to protect them from the big operator. We feel that steps should be taken to deter the big commercial operator. However, the small man—the single man, the inshore fisherman—is the one who is going to be picked up under this legislation. He is the one who is going to have his nets confiscated when some fisheries officer gets the idea that he is going to commit an offence.

I want to conclude by making a special plea to the minister to insert somewhere in this act, or in the regulations that are permissible under this act, some provision whereby we can take steps to protect or to exempt from confiscation the property of the lone fisherman, the person who has only one boat and only three or four nets, particularly the person who is obliged to set nets to get bait. I think some exemptions are provided in this act in the case of lobster fishermen. I would ask the minister to give the same protection to the little man and in particular to those fishermen whose nets must be set in order to assure a supply of bait.

I think I have said everything that need be said at this time, Mr. Speaker. When we come to clause by clause consideration of this bill I will make other suggestions.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have the habit of moving out into the aisle here, but in view of the comments made and the ruling given a while ago I think I had better be a little careful to stay in my particular place, in case an hon. member raises a point of order about it.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo made an observation with respect to the relationship between this particular bill and the function of the Minister of Justice in studying it to see whether or not it was inconsistent with the bill of rights. The hon. member said he had checked with the Clerk of the house yesterday to see whether or not a certificate had been deposited with the Clerk as required by the regulations, as I understand them. A few moments ago I again checked with the Clerk, and no such certificate has yet been filed. I see the minister waving a document in the air. I assume that is the certificate to which I have been referring.

I only mention this matter as an aside, Mr. Speaker, because it seems to me that even though the Minister of Justice did say, in answer to a question of mine, that he found no inconsistencies in the bill, it is not a wise practice to proceed with the second reading of a bill before this certificate is filed with the Clerk. I should say that in as much as the Minister of Justice is in reality giving a legal opinion—which I understand he is not competent to do in so far as his capacity as minister is concerned, but nevertheless that is what he has done—when he says that a particular bill is or is not inconsistent with the provisions of the bill of rights. I think hon. members of this house are entitled to agree or disagree with that opinion.

I intend to disagree with the opinion of the minister when he says this particular bill is not inconsistent with the bill of rights. I also feel that the minister should have acted with a little more speed in considering Bill No. C-76 and whether or not it was inconsistent with the bill of rights.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That bill does not arise in this debate.

Mr. Howard: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I am leading up to the point that I think the very fact that we have Bill No. C-86 before us in the name of the Minister of Fisheries is proof, if ever it were needed, that the present Fisheries Act is inconsistent with the bill of rights. In fact the bill introduced by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo is also inconsistent with the bill of rights.

I recall that during consideration of the estimates of the Department of Fisheries last session I raised this question and quoted certain sections of the Fisheries Act. I asked whether the officials of the department had looked at those sections from the point of view of their inconsistency with the bill of rights. The minister indicated that this would be done.

I notice that one of the sections which I quoted is now being repealed. The reason given is that the department does not want a fisheries officer to be a justice of the peace and able to marry people. However, I submit that the real reason is its inconsistency with the bill of rights.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo as heartily and as warmly as I can for having introduced a bill which prompted the Minister of Fisheries to introduce the bill currently before the house. I offer these congratulations openly and sincerely to the hon. member. It is not like the Liberal party to show such courage, but perhaps the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo is an exception to the general Liberal party attitudes that we see and hear from time to time.

Part of the bill seeks to remove the arbitrary powers of fisheries officers to confiscate property, convict on view, or arrest and detain fishermen or persons suspected of operating contrary to the act. It also prevents, as I said, fisheries officers from marrying people in the future. I am sure this function has never been performed by any of these officers, and perhaps they did not relish performing it.

To the extent that this bill seeks to remove these arbitrary and dictatorial powers of arrest, conviction and detention on the part of fisheries officers and others, we think it is very commendable and support it wholeheartedly, because in this respect it is based upon the rights and freedoms of individuals. However, there is another inconsistency in the bill. This inconsistency is also being left in the act, and I think it should also be dealt with in the concept of the rights and freedoms of individuals.

This question is connected with our general concept of freedoms and, as I understand it, the teachings of law schools. I refer to the concept of British justice, to the extent that an individual is presumed innocent until he has been proven guilty. This bill is contrary to that principle in one or two instances, inasmuch as an individual is presumed guilty and must prove his innocence.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Howard: At the hour of the adjournment, at one o'clock, I had reached a certain stage of discussion on one phase of the legislation before us.

Before I proceed along that line I should like very much to know from the Minister of Justice, who has more than a passing interest in this particular bill, at what time it was today—I presume it would have been today—that he received two copies of the bill before us from the Clerk of the House of Commons in order that he might proceed to examine the bill. I have in my hand the regulations made pursuant to the bill of rights—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I question whether the hon. member is debating the subject at issue in dealing with the reference of any bill, including this one, to the Minister of Justice pursuant to the bill of rights. That procedure does not arise in this debate. This debate has to do with the principle of this bill on second reading.

Mr. Howard: That is correct, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I can explain what I was seeking to do. You will recall that before the adjournment I had mentioned that the minister's examination and report upon this bill was in fact a legal opinion as to whether or not it was consistent with the bill of rights. I am trying to ascertain now how the minister could have reached such a legal interpretation with respect to this particular bill in the very short time that must have been at his disposal before I asked him a question about the matter on the orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: That is really not in issue. The hon. member is entitled to discuss whether or not the principle of the bill is, in his opinion, in conflict with the provisions of the bill of rights, but there is no machinery by which he can at this time make the inquiry he wishes to make from the Minister of Justice. Furthermore, the procedure of reference to the Minister of Justice is not relevant to the present debate, in my view.

Mr. Howard: I shall certainly bow to your wishes in that regard.

Mr. Speaker: I do not say the hon. member could not use the opinion of the Minister of Justice, if he had it; but how it was reached is not, in my opinion, relevant.

Mr. Howard: I do not intend to proceed along those lines if, as you say, it would be out of order to do so. But with respect to this bill being consistent or inconsistent with the provisions of the bill of rights, I submit that the opinion of the minister is invalid in view of the fact that he has not had time to study this particular bill. Perhaps the arguments of any other member seeking to show that there are inconsistencies in the bill would have more validity than the opinion of the minister, because other members are not bound by the regulation which orders the Minister of Justice to do certain things.

I should like now to proceed to the contention that there are at least two provisions in this legislation which are completely contrary to what I have always understood to be the basic principle of British justice which states that a person is presumed innocent until proven guilty by the courts. There are two references in this legislation which in fact say just the opposite, namely that a person is presumed to be guilty and must prove his innocence. Looking at the act as it is at the present time one finds in section 55, in subsection 3 and again in subsection 6, that the burden of proof of innocence rests upon the person who is accused.

Surely we should not expect a motion for approval of legislation of this sort from a government which lauded itself so highly and which was commended so highly on having introduced a piece of legislation such as the bill of rights. This is certainly in my opinion inconsistent with the declarations which the Prime Minister and members of his cabinet have made on so many occasions about the rights and freedom of individuals. Surely it is the undeniable right of an individual who is charged with an offence to have the crown prove that he is guilty. I know of no other instance, although I am relatively unfamiliar with the field of law, where the contrary occurs, and I have spoken on this matter with a couple of members of the legal profession.

We are aware, of course, of instances where the actions of this government and its words have not been consistent. For example, the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act presented in 1959 were an example of a presumption of guilt being attributed to an individual charged with an offence.

These particular sections in the legislation should, I think, be altered. They should be removed from the act. The crown should be obliged to prove a person guilty under this legislation in the same way as under other statutes.

Part of this bill deals with the so-called 12 mile limit or three mile limit placed on territorial waters. One of the proposals of this bill is to authorize the governor in council to exempt certain classes of fishing vessels from the prohibition. The act now states that on the Atlantic coast most vessels must fish outside the 12 mile limit. It is suggested now that they will be allowed to fish within the 12 mile limit but not closer than the three mile limit. This change will allow, at the minister's discretion, Canadian and foreign fishing vessels to operate in to the three mile limit and will remove that unfair provision of the law which has been in existence in respect of the Atlantic coast for many years.

I think this is the wrong approach to the problem. I do so in the light of information received from officials of the minister's department and other individuals, with knowledge of this subject, from the Atlantic provinces. Much more damage will be done as a result of allowing certain types of fishing vessels to operate in to the three mile limit in so far as conservation is concerned. If it is desirable to follow principles of conservation in respect of our fisheries, then it would be more acceptable for this government to take action to establish a 12 mile territorial limit rather than by taking this negative approach.

I suggest there have been ample international discussions and conferences regarding the extension of territorial waters. The latest conference in this regard with which I am familiar was initiated by a proposal put forward by Canada and supported by a number of other western nations, which was defeated by one vote. If that nation had voted for the proposal there would now be agreement in regard to this question. To my knowledge nothing definite has occurred since that time in regard to the extension of territorial waters.

While I can appreciate that the officials of this government are extremely sensitive to the opinions of other nations in regard to so-called historical fishing rights, this country should follow the example set by Iceland and establish a unilateral 12 mile limit. The establishment of such a limit would allow this government to cope much more adequately with fishing problems than by the proposal put forward by the minister today.

Mr. Morris: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to answer any questions when I have completed my remarks, providing of course there is sufficient time at my disposal.

I also suggest that the proposal contained in this bill in respect of the seizure of fishing vessels, fishing gear, fishing equipment and appliances is not consistent with our desire to allow individuals the right to earn a living. This power if granted to fishery officers will interfere with the right of individuals to follow the vocations of their choice. It must be remembered that it is not a requirement under the law that a conviction be entered against an individual before the fishery officer can make such seizures. These seizures are done purely and simply on the ground that a fishery officer has reasonable grounds to believe and does believe that certain things have taken place. It is easy to imagine a vessel operating close to the zone limit and viewed from some distance by a fishery officer who, being perhaps zealous in carrying out his duties, would believe there was a contravention of the act and, in consequence, seize the vessel and the equipment. The possibility of this type of thing happening is certainly inconsistent with our desire to protect the rights of these individuals.

Perhaps I can make a comparison to illustrate my point. If a police officer had reasonable grounds to believe that a taxi driver was in fact selling liquor without having a licence to do so—in effect bootlegging—the police officer could not seize the taxi and its contents until such time as he had laid a charge and the individual had been convicted. Following that, of course, the liquor would be confiscated and other penalties imposed. I do not see why it is necessary to have such arbitrary powers in respect of the Fisheries Act placed in the hands of the enforcing officers.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the suggestions I have made I feel that certain amendments must be proposed when we reach the committee stage, making the bill consistent with our desire to protect the rights of the individual. While the provisions proposed in this bill are in themselves commendable, there are many inadequacies such as the one I have just mentioned. I feel we must solve the problem in respect of territorial waters as well as perhaps others before we can be satisfied with this legislation. Having accomplished those changes we will then have an act which will be, in the fullest possible sense, compatible with the rights and freedom expressed in the bill of rights itself.

Mr. Morris: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was kind enough to indicate that he would endeavour to answer any questions put if permissible under the rules. In regard to his remark that territorial limits should be unilaterally established, I would ask him how he would propose to enforce this limit upon nationals of another country not subject to Canadian domestic law. In the case of Iceland, for instance, we are aware of what took place there and the reaction of the nationals of another power. This question is not an antagonistic one, but I should like to know how the group to which he belongs would go about enforcing this limit.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, there have been attempts made over a number of years to reach agreement in this regard. There has been a compromise reached with the United States in regard to the 6-6 formula, but presumably there is no further possibility of reaching a more adequate agreement. I do not know what this government has done to explore the possibilities of reaching agreement with other countries in regard to this particular question. If such unilateral action were taken I would suggest that we must use adequate methods to protect the interests of our fishermen in this regard. If we encounter difficulties with other nations we must deal with them in the best possible way available to us. If we do not follow this course then we are making laws in this nation at the behest of those interested in Washington, and we have been doing that far too often.

Mr. Pearson: The Russians have a 12 mile limit.

Mr. Morris: Mr. Speaker, to be specific, if a Russian trawler entered the area which we closed, would the hon. gentleman recommend unilateral action such as the use of gunboats?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is trying to start a war with another nation.

Mr. Morris: I am not the one trying to start a war.

Mr. Pearson: How do the Russians enforce their limit?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I suggest it is unreasonable to pose a hypothetical question of this nature with the expectation of receiving a definitive answer. I think the answers given by the Prime Minister in the past in respect of similar questions would apply. That is in the light of the circumstances, and taking into account all of the factors which exist at the time, we must ensure that our rights are protected.

Mr. L. R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): The statement made today by the Minister of Fisheries with regard to the amendments that are to be made to the Fisheries Act by Bill No. C-86 will be most welcome to all fishermen on the east coast, and especially to those engaged in deep-sea trawler operations. While there are a number of amendments in this bill, I should like to speak briefly on the 12 mile limit, for in recent years it has become somewhat of a symbol of discrimination by governments against Canada's deep sea fishermen. If all the resolutions passed with regard to this act, and all the speeches that have been made, were placed end to end they would no doubt reach from the Atlantic to the Pacific, for there has been widespread interest in this regulation.

At the recent meeting of the Fisheries Council of Canada, held in Toronto on April 10-12, the following resolution was passed:

> Whereas Canadian east coast fishing trawlers over 65 feet in length are required by Canadian law to fish outside the 12 mile limit off the mainland east coast, while all foreign fishing boats of any length are permitted to fish within three miles of the Canadian east coast mainland; and
> Whereas such regulation discriminates against Canadian fishermen;
> Therefore be it resolved that the Canadian government be urged to repeal this law at the earliest possible date and give Canadian fishermen the same privileges and fishing rights as are enjoyed by all foreign fishermen.

The wording of this resolution parallels some of the speeches I have made in this house with regard to this problem, and now that the law is to be amended I think it only fitting that the original reasons for this regulation be placed on the record. The best source of information I could find on this subject was the report of the royal commission investigating the fisheries of the maritime provinces and the Magdalen islands, as filed at Ottawa on May 4, 1928. This is a comprehensive report on all the fisheries problems in the east coast area, but a particular section deals entirely with deep-sea trawlers and their effect on the ground fishing industry.

As most hon. members are aware, a trawler tows a large net or bag about 150 feet in length along the bottom of the sea. The mouth of this huge net is kept open by boards or doors called otter boards, rigged so they operate like kites. Once these trawlers reach the fishing grounds the fishing operation is continuous for at least six or eight days, when the ship returns to port. The net scoops up practically everything on the bottom, from a scallop to a 3,000 pound anchor, along with any fish that may be available; and the immature fish, or those unsuitable for processing and marketing, are thrown back into the sea.

From this brief outline hon. members can readily see that trawler fishing is more wasteful of the fisheries resources than the hook and line method, and it was for this reason that a large number of hook and line fishermen around the turn of the century raised strong objections to the operations of trawlers on the fishing banks.

According to the royal commission report there was only one trawler operating out of Nova Scotia ports in 1910, and between this date and 1927 the number increased to only 10. However, since these trawlers began to operate and dispose of their catch in Canadian markets they have been the subject of keen controversy in the maritime provinces. Their chief opponents were the shore and schooner fishermen who used the hook and trawl line method of catching fish. They argued that the trawlers towing their nets over the bottom destroyed the spawn of the cod and haddock; that they destroyed the feeding grounds of the fish; that they took large quantities of immature and unmarketable fish, causing the inevitable depletion of the fishing grounds; that they destroyed the trawl lines of the fishermen without making restitution; that they market an inferior product, and that they are responsible for over production and consequent glutting of the market, thus preventing the hook and line fishermen from disposing of their catch.

So strong was the protest that on September 9, 1908—and I am quoting from the royal commission report—an order in council was passed providing that "the use or operation of trawlers for the purpose of catching fish is prohibited within the three mile limit of the bays and harbours of Canada". This was obviously an admission that some trawling was injuring the shore fisheries and that it required regulation and restriction. However, no changes were made. Protests continued unabated, and on February 5, 1912, with only two trawlers operating from Nova Scotia ports, the minister of marine and fisheries said in the House of Commons:

> It is realized that if many steam trawlers are shortly placed in commission on Canadian coasts the hand trawls and long line fishermen will find it hard to compete, and anything that the government can do to protect them, it is anxious to do.

In the meantime protest meetings of fishermen were held in various places, notably in Canso, Lunenburg and Riverport, in Nova Scotia. From a meeting of the deep-sea hook and line fishermen held at Lunenburg on February 9, 1912, a delegation was sent to Ottawa to interview the federal government, with a petition asking that steam trawlers be prohibited from landing their fish in Canada and from obtaining Canadian coal and supplies. Well, that type of resolution would not go down too well today in view of the agitation from Cape Breton to sell more of our coal. However, during the session of 1912, the legislative assembly of Nova Scotia endorsed a resolution to the federal government strongly opposing the operation of trawlers on our east coast. The recommendation made on behalf of the fishermen of Riverport, Nova Scotia, was for prohibition or curtailment of otter trawling, and that a duty be enforced on all fish landed from trawlers of other than Canadian registry.

During the early summer of 1912 a conference was held in Washington attended by representatives of the United States, by the Canadian minister of marine and fisheries and by the prime minister of Newfoundland, as he was then called, with a view to investigating the whole question of steam trawlers and making observations on the results of their operations. After negotiation it was arranged that during the season of 1912 investigations would be carried out by each country independently, with the understanding that upon completion of the work a conference would be held with a view to reaching an agreement for the entire prohibition of trawling on this side of the Atlantic. Meanwhile the war had started, and it was decided to postpone the project and the international conference until the end of the war, but the proposed conference was not held.

In the meantime, in order to protect the hook and trawl line fishermen, the Canadian government in 1915 enacted a regulation under the Customs Act whereby the master of any steam trawler was required, before being granted a clearance for the fishing grounds, to give the customs officer a declaration that he would not fish within 12 miles from the shore. This regulation was to apply to all steam trawlers clearing from a Canadian port on the Atlantic coast. This is the history of the 12 mile limit, and it has been applied since 1915 to the present day.

In fairness to the hook and line fishermen, the objections they raised were valid in their day. They were interested in the conservation of the fisheries. They were concerned with the loss and destruction of their property when trawlers, by day and by night, towed through their trawl lines and destroyed their fishing equipment. They were vitally interested in the serious economic consequences caused by the overproduction of fish by the trawler fishermen and the resultant glut on the market.

Today, however, the situation is considerably changed. The hook and line fisherman setting trawl lines from a dory is almost extinct. The once proud fleet of Bluenose vessels that numbered over 120 at one time out of the port of Lunenburg has now dwindled to a handful. They have been replaced by diesel powered trawlers ranging in size from 65 to 140 feet; by the long-liner which still catches fish on hooks by the use of a long trawl line set astern of the ship; by the gill net fishermen and the Danish seiner. The inshore fisherman is today using at least one of the types of boats I have mentioned, or he may be operating a deep-sea scallop dragger on George's bank, a type of fishing unthought of in 1915. In any event, it is rather ironic that the same areas which made strong representations in 1912 to impose the 12 mile limit on trawlers have been making equally strong representations to this government and to me since I was first elected in 1957 to remove this unfair and restrictive law.

This morning, I listened with interest to the remarks that were made by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. He complained about the confining sections of this bill. He said foreign draggers still pose the greatest threat to his inshore fishermen, and mentioned a Spanish trawler in particular. He said the minister and his colleagues must do something about these international trawlers, especially those operating along the coast of Newfoundland.

But I ask, Mr. Speaker, what does he propose? This problem, as I mentioned, has been in existence since the year 1900, when the first trawlers started operating on the east coast. All during the years his party was in office no action was taken. In my opinion, control of these foreign trawlers becomes an international problem. The hon. member further suggested that we extend our territorial waters by unilateral action to the 12 mile limit. This suggestion was supported this afternoon by the hon. member for Skeena.

[Mr. Crouse.]

The statements made by both these hon. members show a remarkable lack of knowledge with regard to our fish marketing problem. I submit that unilateral action of this nature would cause serious repercussions in Canada's export markets, especially in the United States where approximately 80 per cent of our east coast fish production is sold. The New England fisheries association would quickly propose higher tariffs on our fish entering the United States, thereby creating further economic problems for the Atlantic provinces.

We on the east coast, Mr. Speaker, have suffered for 22 years because of this type of Liberal thinking. In my opinion any action taken to extend the east coast fishing limits must be by international agreement. The changes made in the Fisheries Act are a move in the right direction. I know it will meet with genuine approval of the trawler captains operating trawlers on the east coast. I again commend the minister for his foresight in providing Canadian deep-sea fishermen with opportunities equal to those enjoyed by fishermen from other nations.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us to amend the Fisheries Act has some provisions which I think will receive unanimous support in the house and others that will cause questioning. There are some omissions from the bill as well to which the attention of the house, I have no doubt, will be called. Certainly some amendment to the Fisheries Act is overdue. I understand there are some provisions in the present act which have not been changed since 1867, and conditions have changed somewhat since that time.

The bill we have before us was not one mentioned in the speech from the throne as something which was going to be introduced this session. It was not even mentioned last week when the Prime Minister gave the list of legislation which would be brought before the house this session. Perhaps the introduction of the bill at this time can be related to the constructive initiative of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, who introduced a private bill amending the Fisheries Act. Shortly after that, Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced.

The bill, among other things, does remove some arbitrary powers which are now vested in officials under the act, and that is all to the good. But, as has already been pointed out in this discussion on second reading, the bill does not, in our opinion, go far enough in that respect to establish beyond doubt the principle of innocence until guilt is proven. However, it does help to bring the existing act into conformity with the bill of rights.

There is one aspect of this bill to which reference has already been made and with which I wish to deal at this time. That is the question of territorial and jurisdictional waters. The bill has some provisions in that regard. It does remove the discrimination now suffered by Canadian draggers as compared with foreign vessels, and that is an improvement. In our view, however, the amendment should have gone further and established a 12 mile zone of jurisdiction enforceable against all vessels, Canadian or foreign.

The hon. member who just preceded me has indicated that this would be a very dangerous course of action to take unilaterally. He was very worried about the repercussions that action of that kind taken by Canada might cause in the United States, and the effect that such action might have on our market for fish in that country, the importance of which of course is recognized by all of us.

The hon. member criticized the Liberal approach to this problem of markets, the approach which I have also just indicated to the establishment of a 12 mile jurisdictional zone. If it had not been for the Liberal approach, implemented by legislation based on international treaty with the United States in 1936, there would not be the present market for Canadian fish in the United States. But the caution displayed by the government in this matter of taking national action to establish a jurisdictional zone, this timidity, if I may put it in that way—certainly was not displayed by the Prime Minister and the members of the present government when they discussed this subject in 1957 and 1958 during the election campaigns. At that time they were all for Canadian action to protect Canadian fisheries interests by the establishment by Canada of a 12 mile fishery zone. I only quote one excerpt from a report—and there are a good many others—of a speech of the Prime Minister on March 26, 1958, appearing in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, when he declared for aid to fishermen and for protection of the rights of Canadian fishermen by a 12 mile limit to be established for all fisheries. That, Mr. Speaker, is what we are asking for now. That is the stand we are taking and have taken as a party since 1957 in respect of this matter.

There are three ways by which Canadian rights over a jurisdictional zone wider than that of the territorial waters zone could be established. In this respect we must, of course, make a distinction between the zone of territorial waters and a jurisdictional zone. Up to the present time we have accepted a three mile territorial zone established on the base line theory, the line from headland to headland, but we believe that beyond the territorial zone, whatever may be its agreed width—and we accept at the present time three miles—there should be a jurisdictional zone especially for fisheries protection and fisheries conservation purposes.

As I have just stated, there are three ways by which this might be done. The first and by far the most satisfactory way of doing it is by international agreement through an international convention. We all know that in recent years efforts have been made at international conferences under United Nations auspices dealing with the law of the sea to get general international agreement on the width of the territorial belt and also of the jurisdictional zone. The present government some time ago—I think it was at the beginning of 1960 or the end of 1959—issued a pamphlet on the law of the sea which explained in detail a Canadian proposal which had been put forward at the Geneva conference for this purpose. That Canadian proposal came to be known as the six plus six theory, and provided for a six mile territorial zone to which would be added a six mile jurisdictional zone, making a belt of 12 miles from the base line over which Canadian law could be exercised. Indeed, that Canadian solution—it really is in effect a 12 mile solution—was put forward, as this pamphlet indicates, as early as the eleventh session of the United Nations general assembly in 1956.

No agreement was reached at the first conference at Geneva with regard to the establishment of any international law of the sea. At the second conference held last year—I think it was in March and April, 1960—a further and very strenuous effort was made to get an acceptable international agreement on this extremely important matter. At that conference, as hon. members know, eventually four proposals were put forward, one by the U.S.S.R., one by Mexico, one by the United States of America and one by Canada. The Mexican and Soviet union proposals were dropped and were replaced, I believe, by an 18-power proposal, while the United States and Canada got together on a compromise one because the difference between their two proposals was not very substantial. The Americans at this time were not objecting, as I understand it, to the 12 mile jurisdictional zone or fisheries control zone, but they attempted to insist that historic fisheries rights or traditional fisheries rights be observed inside that 12 mile zone by the power which had jurisdiction over that zone, and that rights of foreign countries which had established them over the years should be respected. The compromise which was reached between the United States and Canada with regard to this matter was a 12 mile zone and a 10-year period, I think it was, during which these traditional rights would be respected and during which period—in the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he made a statement on this matter, I think it was last summer—they would be phased out.

This was a very serious effort to get international agreement with regard to this important matter. Unfortunately agreement was not achieved, as my hon. friends know. While a simple majority is sufficient in committee, a two thirds majority is required in plenary session. According to the report of the Department of External Affairs on April 26, when the final vote was taken with regard to this matter which would have disposed of this question which has troubled international lawyers and international politicians for generations, the result was 54 in favour and 26 against. That meant that the Canada-United States proposal failed to carry by one vote only. Indeed, if one delegate who was not present at that meeting had turned up and had voted for the resolution, the law of the sea would have been laid down and we would not be debating today whether or not a 12 mile limit is required and, if so, how to bring it into being.

In any event, the proposal was lost and there seems to be no immediate prospect, as far as I know, of a third conference on the law of the sea to deal with this matter; so this first and best way of dealing with it has, for the time being at least, had to be discarded. But we do not need to let the matter drop because of that. There are 54 countries that voted for this 12 mile proposal with a 10-year period for the observance of historic rights.

So another way of establishing this zone in Canadian law is to get those countries which accept this 12 mile zone to agree among themselves that as far as they are concerned it is international law, and that it will be observed and enforced by them. Last summer, in the last session, I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs what steps were being taken by Canada or by anybody else to negotiate a convention among those countries which accept this 12 mile zone, so that it will be accepted by them as enforceable. At that time the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated that while no formal negotiations were going on, discussions were taking place. We have not heard anything about the result of those discussions since that time, so we are forced to conclude, Mr. Speaker, that no progress has been made in the direction of a limited international convention; indeed it would not be very seriously limited, because 54 votes were cast at Geneva in favour of such a proposal.

The third alternative is for our own government to take unilateral action, as other governments have done, and decree that there will be a 12 mile fisheries jurisdiction zone laid down in our domestic legislation and that we will exercise jurisdiction in that zone. It was pointed out this afternoon in a question by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Morris) that action of this kind might not be recognized as valid by other countries. He said, "What do you do in that case?" and he mentioned Russia in particular.

If I may say so, the hon. member did not give a very impressive illustration of the difficulty of enforcing this kind of action, because I believe Russia itself has laid down a 12 mile territorial waters zone. It is not likely, therefore, that Russia would challenge the right of Canada to exercise jurisdiction over the same width of sea as she exercises herself. In any event, Mr. Speaker, other countries have done this. They have protected their own interests, in default of international agreement, by taking action. That action has been recognized, although not always without a good deal of dispute. There comes to mind at once the difficulty between Iceland and the United Kingdom in the efforts of Iceland to establish a jurisdictional zone. That dispute has now been resolved in favour of Iceland, and Iceland has made good its claim to an area of jurisdiction outside territorial waters. So, also, has Norway. If these countries can do this, so can Canada.

Therefore we feel that we are missing an opportunity, in introducing legislation of this kind in not taking action which will establish our own rights and protection over a 12 mile zone and letting our friends know that in default of international agreement on this point—and we have done our best to bring about international agreement—we propose to take this kind of action. Surely we are not expected to wait indefinitely; we are not expected to wait long, until other countries get together at an international conference to do this by international agreement. We have tried for a good many years now to get such international agreement. We have failed. We almost succeeded in 1960, but we have failed.

Therefore it is not necessary to accept for any length of time the failure to agree internationally on this matter. It is possible, I think, without being provocative in this matter at all to do what other countries have done and establish a 12 mile fisheries zone, and then take steps to get that area accepted by other powers.

That is what I suggest we should do now, and that is what I suggest might have been done in the amendments to the Fisheries Act now before us.

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, the bill that is before the house must certainly be received with interest and, generally speaking, with approval because of its attempts to reform long existing legislation. However, its very nature and importance, particularly to us from the seaboard districts, are such that it does require very careful scrutiny by this house.

The bill is obviously intended to rectify existing legislation and bring it more into line with modern needs and thinking. In so far as it deals with pollution I think the suggested amendments are good, because under the old act the penalties were so light that a big operator could, if he wished, break the law with impunity. There are teeth in these amendments, teeth which I think should be there.

With respect to some of the penalties, however, particularly the seizure of gear, I agree with the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, who pointed out that if a fisherman broke the law and his traps or nets were seized, he would be placed in a position where he would automatically be unable to earn a livelihood. For instance, if the nets which he used to catch bait were taken, his whole fishing season could be ruined.

Therefore it occurs to me that a very careful second look should be given to this matter of penalties and the type of penalties which should be exacted. We should carefully consider whether or not fishing gear or fishing property should be automatically confiscated upon guilt being proved. We should consider whether a fine or imprisonment should be instituted in place of confiscation, because there is no doubt that the confiscation of property can work real hardship, not only on the guilty party but on his fishing partners, his associates and his family. The actual penalty might in fact be far out of proportion to the crime committed, because the property or gear seized might be worth only a few hundred dollars but if it means the loss of a season's work it runs into much more money than that.

I am sure the minister and all of us want the punishment to fit the crime. In saying that, I should like to make it clear that I understand the necessity of making sure that the punishment does fit the crime and is not too light, because unless the Minister of Fisheries were in a position to enforce the acts which are necessary for the conservation of the fisheries, the whole purpose of these fisheries regulations would be defeated; and without proper protection, certain fisheries may in time cease to exist.

Therefore in asking for a new look to be given to the penalty part of this bill I am not suggesting that flagrant violations of the law with regard to conservation should be overlooked. Rather I am trying to point out, if it is necessary for it to be pointed out, the desirability of having a punishment for violations whereby teeth could be kept in the regulations but it would not be necessary to cause undue and prolonged hardship to the person affected.

There is the matter of enforcing the regulations and the patrol of coastal waters. I agree with the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, who appealed for more and larger vessels, but I go a step further than that. I do not think it would be economic to maintain the number of vessels which would be required to adequately protect the coastal waters of Canada. The Department of Fisheries would have to have its own navy. Well, they have one now, and a very good one. However, I think you would pretty soon, get into the law of diminishing returns if you built enough ships to patrol all the coastal waters of Canada. I do suggest that we should have more and larger patrol ships we should have patrol which can stay at sea in bad weather, as some fishing ships can. As the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) pointed out, more of these ships are certainly needed.

In addition, I would suggest an increase in the amount of air patrolling. At the present time I believe there is a limited air patrol carried out by the Department of Fisheries. I do think it would be highly desirable and highly effective if an air patrol were maintained off the coast of Canada. In this connection I think that the search and rescue unit of the R.C.A.F. which is already established at Torbay, for instance, as well as in other places, could provide such an air patrol or supplement the air patrol carried out by the Department of Fisheries. Such a patrol, working in conjunction with an adequate inspection fleet would do much to protect the waters off our coast.

Now we come to a subject to which reference has already been made by a number of speakers. I think the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenberg (Mr. Crouse) have each referred to the question of the 12 mile limit. I agree completely with what was said by the Leader of the Opposition and by the hon.

member for Burin-Burgeo. I disagree completely with the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg who seems to think that all the ills affecting the fisheries are due to Liberal thinking. The hon. member was using the word "Liberal" with a political connotation. I would say, using the word "liberal" in another sense, that we have been much too liberal in allowing foreign fishing vessels the free use of our territorial waters.

The presence of a Russian icebreaker equipped with helicopters to fly sealers into the ice fields off our coast this year is perhaps of more direct significance for Canada than the Russians having the first man in space. Certainly the waters off Newfoundland, Labrador, Nova Scotia and our west coast are Canadian waters and their use affects not only individual provinces but all provinces. I should like to strongly support the suggestion made that Canada should have a 12 mile limit from point to point and that this 12 mile limit should be strictly enforced. This can be done.

As I have said on many occasions, the presence in our waters of so many ships belonging to our foreign competitors is bound to have an adverse effect upon our own direct interests and the growth of competition makes it highly desirable that Canada should take steps to preserve the rich waters off our coasts for her own use and for the benefit of her own citizens.

Mr. W. L. M. Creaghan (Westmorland): I have only a few words to add to the very interesting debate on this bill. I am chiefly concerned with section 64, or, to be more precise with section 64(a) of the act. I wish to draw the attention of the house and of the minister to what I consider to be something which may cause discrimination in the enforcement.

The hon. member who has just spoken emphasized the hardship caused by confiscation after seizure. Well, in some cases confiscation is necessary. My concern relates to the confiscation of goods when the owner is innocent or when the identity of the owner has not been ascertained. Under the bill, if a person is charged and defends himself, and is then convicted, the owner, if he is not the accused person, has 30 days after the conviction in which to make application to a judge for an order to have his equity protected.

However, on the other hand if at the time of the seizure no one is charged and the owner of the goods is not identified there is only a period of 30 days allowed. I hope that when the bill is in the committee stage the minister will give some consideration to extending the period of 30 days allowed for making an application for protection to a judge.

[Mr. Granger.]

I am mainly concerned about goods owned by an innocent person for example after a theft. When goods have been stolen they can be used illegally or improperly by the thief and the innocent owner might not know of the offence until the period of 30 days had expired.

Mr. H. C. McQuillan (Comox-Alberni): I was interested in the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) regarding the unilateral establishment of a 12 mile limit. I am thinking, now, especially in terms of the Pacific coast. I think we should all like to see it, but there are some difficulties in establishing this limit unilaterally because of the nature of the boundaries between British Columbia and the United States. Such difficulties will arise particularly in such places as the straits of San Juan which in many areas are considerably less than 24 miles in width, in the neighbourhood of Hecate strait between the Queen Charlotte islands and the mainland, and along the southern part of what we call the Alaskan Panhandle.

I cannot see how we can establish a 12 mile limit unilaterally. I think it would have to be done by bilateral agreement. I believe that any attempt to establish such a limit unilaterally would result in a great controversy between ourselves and the United States and would inevitably result in bloodshed. I think the United States fishermen would resist an attempt to enforce such a boundary unilaterally in the same way as our fishermen would resist it in areas where a unilateral United States definition of a 12 mile limit was not in their interests.

I should therefore like to suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that his remarks apply with more force to the Atlantic coast. His suggestion might be feasible there—it might be practical—but I think if we were to try it unilaterally on the Pacific coast we would be asking for a lot more trouble than we could handle.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I do not intend to detain the house very long on this bill because, as hon. members will all appreciate, I make no claim to skill or knowledge as a fisherman, at least as far as sea fishing is concerned. The closest acquaintance with the art of fishing that I can claim—and it has been a very pleasant one—is, of course, by way of fly fishing, and perhaps I could take this opportunity to put in a boost for that splendid domestic fish known as the Kamloops trout, the finest sport fish in North America.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: I recognize, however, that this bill does not concern this branch of the art, and that it relates mainly to problems of no concern to inland fisheries.

I wish to take part in the debate for two specific reasons. First, I want to deal with some remarks which have been made as to the incidents surrounding the introduction of the bill. Second, I wish to deal with the understandable concern and interest of hon. members in the relationship between this bill and the provisions of the bill of rights.

First, with respect to the circumstances of the introduction of the bill; it has been suggested by some hon. members that the bill may have been introduced because of an attempt made by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) to introduce and proceed with a private bill of his own. Let me assure the house that is far from correct. While we in this government do pay a good deal of regard to private members and their views, and are always anxious to obtain the benefit of their views, in this situation, while appreciating the interest of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, let me assure you that the bill now before the house was in preparation long before that purported bill of his saw the light of day.

This bill was in preparation in the Department of Fisheries last fall and has been considered in detail in my department, in the context of the bill of rights, as far back as last December.

Indeed it would be, in large part, correct to say that one of the main reasons for the introduction of the present bill was the concern of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean) with respect to the situation in which he and his officers found themselves under the present Fisheries Act as a result of the bill of rights. I can assure the house that my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries is, as are all members of the present government, most careful to review the legislation and the activities of the officers for which he is responsible to ensure that the legislation does not place him or his officers in a position where things are likely to be done contrary to the bill of rights. It was because of the concern of my colleague with regard to this matter—that was one of the main reasons—that he sought approval for the introduction of this bill to revise the Fisheries Act.

As has been pointed out by all of those hon. members who have spoken on this bill, it is a tremendous improvement, with respect to this kind of matter, over the Fisheries Act as it is presently. I should like to remind the hon. members of this house, when they are considering and recalling to their minds some of the things that were said at the time of the debate on the bill of rights—that it would be of no effect, was nothing but words, and other suggestions made by members of the opposition—that we have here before us today a very concrete example of the effectiveness of the bill of rights. When you see the extent to which the Fisheries Act, a statute which has been on the books for many years, has offended the provisions of the present bill of rights, you will understand the important step forward made in introducing this piece of legislation entirely in conformity with that bill of rights.

I am not going to attempt to go far enough back into history to assess particular responsibilities for these objectionable features in the present Fisheries Act, but I do point out to you that our predecessors had 22 years of opportunity to remove them but did nothing about it, yet within a very short time of the passage of the bill of rights by this government we have this concrete example of the seriousness with which, under the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), human rights and fundamental freedoms are observed.

I do not propose to go into a long dissertation at this point on the matter of the due process of law, which is that portion of the bill of rights of main concern in connection with the enforcement provisions of the Fisheries Act, but I do want to assure the house in general that I have been at pains to satisfy myself that this bill is in conformity with the bill of rights in every respect. Something has been said here with regard to the report of the Minister of Justice in respect of the bill of rights which leads me to believe that it may be well to outline to the house again the procedure that is to be followed in connection with ascertaining that legislation introduced in this house is not contrary to the spirit and provision of this house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should remind the hon. minister that I prevented the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) from questioning the minister or raising a question in regard to the process, procedure or machinery under the bill of rights because in my view it was not relevant to a discussion of this bill. A question in regard to whether this bill complies with the bill of rights is another matter, of course, and has been discussed by many hon. members, but I think it would be out of place, as the hon. member for Skeena has not been allowed to proceed, if the Minister of Justice were to do so.

Mr. Fulton: I will endeavour to comply with your remark which, in my understanding, is that there should not be an attempt to go into the detail of the procedure by which I form my opinion but rather to discuss the opinion itself. I might say just before coming to that point, in connection with the comparison between this bill and the present Fisheries Act, that while, as I said a few minutes ago, we do appreciate the views and interest of private members, I want to make it very clear that it was not the introduction of the bill by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo that occasioned the introduction of the present bill by the Minister of Fisheries. It was far from that because, if you will examine the bill introduced by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, you will observe that far from actually seeking to eliminate any of the objectionable provisions of the Fisheries Act, which he appears to believe are contrary to the bill of rights, my hon. friend has solemnly attempted to re-enact every one of them.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to correct the Minister of Justice in that—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member is correcting the minister I suggest he will have the opportunity to do so in regard to any misinterpretation that the minister has put on his statements, but that is not a point of order.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will have that opportunity if I am mistaken, but I do not think I am. The point I am making is that simply because—

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would elaborate on that point he has just raised by explaining what was wrong with my bill?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, you stopped me this morning when I attempted to discuss in detail what was wrong with the hon. member's bill. The point I am making now is that the hon. member's bill does not accomplish anything by way of removing the features which he says are objectionable in the present Fisheries Act, but rather expressly seeks to re-enact them. That seems to me to be a very strange way to go about bringing legislation into conformity with the bill of rights. We have on the one hand an hon. member who says he considers many provisions of the present act are contrary to the bill of rights, and on the other his introduction of a bill which in fact would re-enact them.

This government has had this under consideration since last fall, shortly after the bill of rights became effective, in order to bring in legislation which will remove the objectionable features so that the officers of the Department of Fisheries, from the minister down, will be administering a piece of legislation which is in conformity with the bill of rights.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Carter: Will the hon. minister permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, gladly.

Mr. Carter: Is the hon. minister maintaining that when a bill is introduced in this house it must be in perfect form and brought in with the assumption that no changes will be made during its passage through this house and the other place?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am sure most hon. members have always proceeded on the assumption that when an hon. member invites this house to support a piece of legislation which he has introduced, he has introduced it considering it to be worthy of the support of this house, and not legislation which he considers should be thrown out. What kind of a farce would it make of our proceedings if hon. members asked support for a bill with the explanation that the purposes are worthy, and then, having received support, the bill does not seek to carry out those purposes at all?

Mr. Carter: Does the hon. minister consider that changes made in the bill to make it conform to the bill of rights are not worthy of this house?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, that is not the purpose of the hon. member's bill as it is drafted. The purpose of the hon. member's bill as drafted is to re-enact the present Fisheries Act—

Mr. Carter: In conformity—

Mr. Fulton: —which my hon. friend has said he considers to be inconsistent with the bill of rights.

Mr. Carter: In conjunction with the report made by the minister as to whether it offended the bill of rights.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should call both hon. members to order. It seems to me that the other bill, although it may be referred to incidentally, cannot in itself be the subject of our consideration today.

Mr. Howard: Will the minister permit another question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Howard: Following up the reason advanced by the minister for the drafting of this legislation, preparation for which began last December, which reason he explained was to bring the Fisheries Act into conformity with the bill of rights, can we now expect that similar amendments to the objectionable features of the Feeds Act of last session and the Customs Act will be brought in this year?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member certainly is getting away from the subject matter before the house. I think I would be only encouraging an irrelevant discussion if I were to allow the question to be answered.

Mr. Howard: The minister is saved.

Mr. Fulton: The problem of enforcement of fisheries legislation from the point of view of the bill of rights arises largely out of the fact that there are some pieces of fisheries equipment which are used for illegal purposes which, if not disposed of promptly, will in fact carry out that illegal purpose to the prejudice of the general public. It therefore becomes desirable to provide a method under which the offending equipment may be disposed of immediately in order that the public interest may be protected. It is in connection with the devising of a procedure that gives a speedy method of disposal, but which at the same time does not arbitrarily deprive an individual of his rights, that the problem arises. And it is that specific problem that the new draft bill before us has met and, in my view, has met fairly and successfully.

Under the old Fisheries Act it is true that wide powers of forfeiture on view were given to fisheries officers, with the result that where a fisheries officer felt that an offence was being committed, he had wide powers of seizure resulting in an automatic and complete forfeiture of the goods in question.

I should go on to say that an owner, even an innocent owner, had no recourse against such a forfeiture. I use the word "innocent" to describe an owner whose goods might have been used without his permission or knowledge for the offensive purpose; even that owner had no recourse against the complete forfeiture to the crown, which resulted from the unilateral action, without a hearing, on the part of the fisheries officer. Of course, Mr. Speaker, it is essential that that situation should be remedied and it has been remedied in the bill now before you.

The scheme of the present bill is that in general there should be no forfeiture without a hearing. The article with which the offence is alleged to have been committed must be ordered to be forfeited by a court under proceedings to be brought by the minister. It is true that the present bill does authorize fisheries officers to seize, and this seizure would have the effect of forfeiture if nothing else were done. It is provided here that since the forfeiture itself can only be ordered by the court, an owner shall not be effectively deprived of the right to his property by the minister refraining from bringing action. Hon. members will appreciate that if the article is seized and nothing is done, the owner would otherwise be effectively deprived of possession. Therefore, we go on to provide that unless the minister brings action within three months from the date of seizure the goods shall be restored to their owner. In other words, if the minister finds that he has not got a case, or that the seizure was made in error, then he cannot simply let the matter drop and effectively deprive someone of his rights. If he does not bring action within three months the goods are automatically restored. As I say—

Mr. Carter: Will the minister explain how that boat and equipment are going to catch fish while they are confiscated for three months?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am endeavouring to explain the scheme under which this very difficult problem of enforcement and of protection of the fisheries in the public interest has been resolved. It is true that with respect to one class of fisheries equipment there can be a forfeiture without the owner having been in effect notified, and that is in connection with lobster pots. My understanding is that frequently lobster pots are found out in the sea, in an area in which lobster fishing is prohibited, or in an area at a time when the lobster season is closed.

Those lobster pots are, of course, actually being used for an offence and there is not much point in leaving them there while the fisheries officer goes back to court. Further lobsters will crawl into the pots while the fisheries officer is off in court; the offender may come and remove them while his back is turned. Therefore, it is provided with respect to this particular item of fishing equipment that it may be forfeited and disposed of immediately as the minister directs.

However, it is further provided in the next proposed section that if there is an owner who is an innocent owner even of items in this class, he may within 30 days make application to the court, and if he establishes that the property was his and that it was being used without his knowledge or consent, then he is entitled to the return of his property, or, if it has already been disposed of, to the return of the equivalent value. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think it will be generally agreed that in view of the really difficult problems of enforcement that exist, the scheme that has been devised is one which is reasonable and which protects the public interest without prejudice to the rights of individuals as they are declared in the bill of rights.

As I have said, I do not want to go into a long dissertation on this question of "due process", although it was around this point that the main difficulty revolved namely, are we depriving people of their rights without due process of law? We have done some research on it and the house may be interested in a brief summary of the position. It will be appreciated, of course, that in connection with this phrase "the due process of law" there is not much jurisprudence in Canada, nor is there, indeed, in the United Kingdom. The main jurisprudence is found in the United States. While I do not suggest for a moment that the United States cases will serve as binding precedents, I certainly think it is not unlikely and not unreasonable that our courts would turn to examine the views of the courts in the United States to see what has been the thinking on this subject and the interpretation given to the due process section. Therefore, I think the house might be interested in a summary of one of the leading cases in the United States on this question.

I refer to the case of Lawton versus Steele in 1893, reported at 38 United States supreme court reports at page 385. It is interesting to note that this case arose out of a fisheries statute of the state of New York, which contained the following provision:

> Any net, pound, or other means or device for taking or capturing fish, or whereby they may be taken or captured, set, put, floated, had, found, or maintained, in or upon any of the waters of this state, or upon the shores of or islands in any of the waters of this state, in violation of any existing or hereafter enacted statutes or laws for the protection of fish is hereby declared to be, and is, a public nuisance, and may be abated and summarily destroyed by any person, and it shall be the duty of each and every protector aforesaid and of every game constable to seize and remove and forthwith destroy the same, ... and no action for damages shall lie or be maintained against any person for or on account of any such seizure and destruction.

This provision was attacked and alleged to be unconstitutional and void for the reason, amongst others, that it deprived a citizen of his property without due process of law. In coming to its decision, the court said as follows:

> The extent and limits of what is known as the police power have been a fruitful subject of discussion in the appellate courts of nearly every state in the union. It is universally conceded to include everything essential to the public safety, health, and morals, and to justify the destruction or abatement, by summary proceedings, of whatever may be regarded as a public nuisance.

Perhaps I should pause here to observe, Mr. Speaker, that although we do not have the doctrine of police power developed in the same precise form as is the case in the United States, nevertheless it is apparent to all hon. members that powers of enforcement such as are contained in this bill rest on the doctrine of police power, namely that the governments, on behalf of the public, must do those things which are necessary and have a right to provide legislative sanction for the doing of those things which are necessary for the protection of the public interest. However, all jurisdictions under our system of democracy have recognized, and it is inherent in the bill of rights, that the state cannot rely on the doctrine of police power to go so far as arbitrarily to deprive a citizen of what are his fundamental rights without due process of law.

The supreme court of the United States which, as I said, is a country where this whole problem of reconciling police power with individual rights has been exhaustively considered by the courts, went on to say this:

> ... To justify the state in thus interposing its authority in behalf of the public, it must appear, first, that the interests of the public generally, as distinguished from those of a particular class, require such interference; and, second, that the means are reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of the purpose, and not unduly oppressive upon individuals. The legislature may not, under the guise of protecting the public interests, arbitrarily interfere with private business, or impose unusual and unnecessary restrictions upon lawful occupations. In other words, its determination as to what is a proper exercise of its police powers is not final or conclusive, but is subject to the supervision of the courts.

I pause here to interpolate that under our bill of rights we have assured that provisions enacted by the legislature here are similarly subject to the supervision of the courts.

The judgment continues:

> —the preservation of game and fish, however, has always been treated as within the proper domain of the police power, and laws limiting the season within which birds and wild animals may be killed or exposed for sale, and prescribing the time and manner in which fish may be caught, have been repeatedly upheld by the courts.

The court then turned its attention to the act in question of New York state from which I have read and which, as I have pointed out, went so far as to say that any net, pound, or other means or device for taking or capturing fish, and being used in violation of any existing or hereafter enacted statute of the state, is a public nuisance, and may be seized and summarily destroyed. It was that provision to which the supreme court of the United States turned its attention, and they said this:

> The main, and only real difficulty connected with the act in question is in its declaration that any net, etc., maintained in violation of any law for the protection of fisheries, is to be treated as a public nuisance, "and may be abated and summarily destroyed by any person, and it shall be the duty of each and every protector aforesaid and every game constable to seize, remove and forthwith destroy the same." The legislature, however, undoubtedly possessed the power not only to prohibit fishing by nets in these waters, but to make it a criminal offence, and to take such measures as were reasonable and necessary to prevent such offences in the future. It certainly could not do this more effectually than by destroying the means of the offence. If the nets were being used in a manner detrimental to the interests of the public, we think it was within the power of the legislature to declare them to be nuisances, and to authorize the officers of the state to abate them.

Then, sir, the supreme court of the United States turned to a problem which has exercised us here. We have provided in the present bill that large items of property, expensive items, where either the value of the property or the ease of determining ownership, or both, make it patently absurd to provide a situation where they could be ordered to be forfeited simply because somebody says he cannot identify the owner—we have provided that shall not take place without a hearing in so far as fishing vessels or vehicles are concerned, and a determination must be made of the issue of whether or not an offence has been committed with such articles, at which time an innocent owner may be given an opportunity to come in.

However, in the case of these small items of the class I have mentioned, this problem is much more difficult. It is highly likely there will be no trace of ownership, no means of identification in the first place. In the second place, if they are being used to commit an offence, and they are of small value, then obviously no one is going to identify them because by so doing he renders himself liable to the penalty for committing the offence. Therefore, there will be no one coming along and claiming ownership, so the only practical result is that ownership may be forfeited by the very commission of the offence.

The supreme court of the United States said this in respect of this matter:

> But where the property is of little value, and its use for the illegal purpose is clear, the legislature may declare it to be a nuisance, and subject to summary abatement. Instances of this are the power to kill diseased cattle; to pull down houses in the path of conflagration; destruction of decayed fruit or fish or unwholesome meats, or infected clothing, obscene books or pictures, or instruments which can only be used for illegal purposes. While the legislature has no right arbitrarily to declare that to be a nuisance which is clearly not so, a good deal must be left to its discretion in that regard, and if the object to be accomplished is conducive to the public interests, it may exercise a large liberty of choice in the means employed.

Finally, I should like to put this passage before the house dealing with items of this class:

> The value of the nets in question was but $15 apiece. The cost of condemning one, (and the use of one is as illegal as the use of a dozen) by judicial proceedings, would largely exceed the value of the net, and doubtless the state would in many cases, be deterred from executing the law by the expense. They could only be removed from the water with difficulty, and were liable to injury in the process of removal. The object of the law is undoubtedly a beneficent one, and the state ought not to be hampered in its enforcement, by the application of constitutional provisions which are intended for the protection of substantial rights of property. It is evidence that the efficacy of this statute would be very seriously impaired by requiring every net illegally used to be carefully taken from the water, carried before a court or magistrate, notice of the seizure to be given by publication, and regular judicial proceedings to be instituted for its condemnation.

That case is not exactly similar to all the cases that may arise under this legislation, but it is interesting I think to see something of the general approach which the highest court in the United States took to this matter, a court very much seized with the importance of human rights and fundamental freedoms. It is interesting because in the general discussion, parts of which I have read here, they dealt extensively with this problem of the proper exercise of the police power, proper protection of the public interest on the one hand, as against the protection of individual property rights on the other.

So, Mr. Speaker, I say to the house through you that, in the drafting of this legislation, we have been scrupulously careful to ensure that every reasonable protection—and indeed more than reasonable protection—is given to property rights of the individual and that where it is physically and practically feasible to do so within the confines of an effective enforcement measure, no arbitrary powers of confiscation, seizure or forfeiture are given and no one is liable to have his property taken from him and disposed of without the right to a hearing and to defend his rights and his interests.

As I said, the bill was reviewed from this point of view in our department from as far back as last December. It has been examined by me in that process and I have no report to make to the house as to any inconsistency with the bill of rights. May I remind the house that, under the bill of rights, my obligation is to report inconsistencies; it is not my obligation to make a general report if I find no inconsistencies. Therefore, if there is no report that means that no inconsistency has been found. In every case, of course, a copy is required to be deposited with the Clerk bearing a certificate that it has been examined in the Department of Justice. That is required under regulations worked out between my department and Mr. Speaker for the efficient information of the house under the terms of the bill of rights. So that in so far as concerns the suggestion that an official report from the Minister of Justice is expected with respect to every piece of legislation, may I say that is not the approach that is taken. What is required from the Minister of Justice by the statute is a report if he finds inconsistencies between a piece of legislation and the bill of rights; and in my view, there are no such inconsistencies in this bill.

Mr. Carter: May I ask the minister a question—

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Carter: —or may I ask two questions? One is this. Did he find no inconsistencies in Bill No. C-76? What is the purpose of this report which he is required to make under standing order 40 if it is not to guide the house in the framing of amendments to take care of inconsistencies?

Mr. Fulton: Your Honour has already ruled that a discussion on the process by which I arrive at my opinion is out of order and also has suggested that a discussion of Bill No. C-76 and whether or not it is in conformity with the bill of rights is not in order in a debate on this bill. This morning I commenced to indicate my opinion of Bill No. C-76 and the Speaker stopped me. This afternoon I have pointed out that with respect to Bill No. C-76, in the explanatory note and in the explanation that the hon. member gave when he introduced it, it was said to be a bill for the purpose of revising the Fisheries Act and bringing it into conformity with the bill of rights. However, the bill as drafted does nothing of the sort. It merely re-enacts the Fisheries Act. I do not think I should go any further in the course of this debate.

Mr. Carter: Your Honour or Mr. Speaker said I would have an opportunity to contradict a statement or to correct a statement that the minister made. The minister has just now made another statement that is wrong and I want to quote—

Mr. Broome: Speaking to a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I believe the intent was that the hon. member would correct it in committee or at some succeeding place in the debate. He has already spoken on second reading. It is my understanding that an hon. member can speak only once on second reading.

Mr. Carter: Speaking to the point of order may I say that it is common practice and within the rules to make a correction immediately after a misstatement has been made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Of course the hon. member may correct a statement made by another hon. member if the statement refers to what the hon. member has said and is a misinterpretation of what he said. If the hon. member wishes to rise and take the opportunity at the end of a speech, he may do so. But this is not the situation. The hon. member may not rise only to correct a statement of fact made by another hon. member. It must refer to what he said. If that is the purpose of the hon. member I will give him the floor.

Mr. Carter: That is right Mr. Speaker. I wish to correct a statement which the minister made just before he took his seat. I want to quote from the explanatory note in my bill just one sentence as follows:

> The purposes of this bill... therefore are:
> 1. To determine whether any of the provisions of this bill are inconsistent with the Canadian bill of rights: in particular, the provisions of clause 35 which empower a fishery officer to accuse a person of violating the fisheries laws and then to adjudicate on that person's guilt or innocence;

I could quote more but I think I have quoted enough to correct the statement the minister just made.

Mr. Fulton: What the hon. member has quoted, far from correcting what I have said, confirms what I have said.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think this discussion is out of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: For the guidance of hon. members I think perhaps I should read standing order 37 which states as follows:

> No member may speak twice to a question except in explanation of a material part of his speech which may have been misquoted or misunderstood, but then he is not to introduce any new matter and no debate shall be allowed upon such explanation.

I therefore think we should close the matter at that point.

Mr. Fulton: With respect, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that the hon. member rose by way of a question first. Then the matter of Bill No. C-76 had been included in the comments made this afternoon. Then the hon. member commented on something I had said, and as he put it, he corrected me. I am simply seeking to point out that his bill when it is examined, clearly does not do what he says is its purpose. What it does is to re-enact the Fisheries Act, the very piece of legislation to which he says he has objections.

Mr. Pickersgill: A successful breach of the rules.

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay the passage of this important bill. However, because of the importance of our fisheries to our great dominion and because I represent one of the most important fishing industries and fishing communities in Canada I feel that I cannot allow the occasion to pass without saying a few words in support of the bill. In our fish industry we have a Klondike which is just as great as any gold claim that has ever been utilized or sold in California. Every year there are caught off our coasts both east and west millions of dollars worth of fish of all descriptions. Reference has been made to this bill, to what the Liberal government did not do and to what it should have done. In my opinion for what it is worth, this bill was brought about because of the bill which was introduced by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter).

Mr. Grafftey: Nonsense.

Mr. Tucker: The fact that the Liberal government did not do anything to improve the conditions about which the Progressive Conservative government feels something should be done, does not excuse it for not doing anything. We are glad to see that steps have been taken by the Progressive Conservative government to improve our fisheries.

There are two important factors that are to be considered in connection with this bill. One is the enforcement of the fishing regulations and the other is the protection of our fisheries against foreign powers.

If we have not sufficient vessels to see that our rights are protected, I think this government or any government should take steps to see that the necessary protection is given to this important industry.

It seems to me that our officials are more concerned with enforcing the law upon our own fishermen than they are in seeing it enforced upon foreigners.

Last year I asked a question of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean). My question is reported at page 2123 of Hansard for 1960:

> I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has his attention been called to a report that a foreign sealing vessel is operating within the territorial waters of Canada and, if so, what action is his department taking?

The minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, a telegram has been received in which the sender says it was reported to him that a foreign sealing vessel was operating within Canadian territorial waters.

The minister added that he had taken immediate steps to investigate the situation. At that time the minister had not received a report from his officers, but later he did receive a report and a plane was sent out to investigate the incident. Because of the type of investigation carried out, no grounds were found for the complaint.

I have here a flag which was taken from a vessel within the three mile limit. It is not the type of flag about which we have heard so much political propaganda in the house recently, but it was taken from a sealer and it is of foreign origin.

An hon. Member: It is a red flag.

Mr. Tucker: It is a red flag, not a blue one. This brings me to the question of the 12 mile limit. Previous speakers have said they fear what would take place if Canada were to put real teeth into the regulations to enforce a 12 mile limit.

I should like to read from an editorial in a recent issue of the Evening Telegram of St. John's:

> Just over two years ago the government and the people of Iceland became very concerned about their livelihood, especially the portion that depends on the fisheries.
> Whereupon Iceland, unilaterally, i.e. "on her own hook", without consultation with any other maritime nation or world organization, extended her traditional three mile fishing limit to 12. This was vigorously opposed by Britain, an ancient friend of Iceland, which has been sending fishing ships to Icelandic waters since the Middle Ages. But Iceland was stubborn; there were incidents when her patrol vessels interfered with British draggers; at one stage British men-o-war went along as escorts.

After 13 years of the arbitrary establishment of fishing limits Iceland has agreed to proposals that future disputes should come under the jurisdiction of the international court of justice.

These proposals, which were published recently in London, provide for the immediate recognition by Britain of Iceland's 12 mile limit, with a three year phase out during which British vessels would be allowed to fish in certain areas up to six miles from amended base lines.

The case of Britain and Iceland shows that the latter did not lose her ancient friend, but instead won recognition of the vital nature of her own valuable fisheries.

As soon as we have the courage to state where we stand and look after our fisheries, I think the better off we will be.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few brief comments on this bill. I agree with what the bill tries to do in general. How well it does this I suppose we will be able to discuss at the committee stage.

Like many other hon. members of this house, I believe that this bill has been hurried in its presentation because of the bill which has been given first reading and which was presented to the house by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter). I commend the hon. member for the remarks he has made and for his efforts to have the Fisheries Act amended in order to bring it up to date to meet present-day requirements.

Like many other hon. members of the house, I am a little bit concerned about the penalties to be imposed upon these poor fishermen. I speak with some knowledge of this matter because of those with whom I have had some dealings.

The type of thing that bothers me is this Let us take the case of a fisherman who is accused of committing an offence under the Fisheries Act, whose fishing gear is taken away from him and who is afterwards found to be innocent; or perhaps after a period of three months it is decided to take no action and his gear is returned to him.

If we are talking about the lobster industry in Newfoundland, the salmon industry, or to a large extent the cod fishery, by the end of those three months the period in which this man could have made a living has expired. I think that preventing such a man from making a summer's wages, or a season's wages, as the case may be, imposes a very severe penalty upon him for an offence which he may not have committed.

Another thing that bothers me about this question is this. A man may have committed an offence under the act. I hold no brief for those who commit offences under the act; they should receive the full penalty of the law. But if a man has committed an offence under the act and has been punished by order of the court, must he also be punished by suffering loss of wages due to his fishing gear having been taken away from him?

Perhaps when we reach the committee stage on this bill we will hear from the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) as to how this particular situation can be prevented. I believe that this question of the penalties to be imposed upon fishermen needs to be examined very closely.

This bill also makes reference to the protection of fisheries. I wish to refer for a moment or two to the protection of inland fisheries. I am referring particularly to sport fishing in Newfoundland. In the section of Newfoundland from which I come sport fishing brings to the area a large number of tourists every year, and has done so for more than half a century.

We feel that sport fishing is the attraction which brings so many tourists to our part of the province. We hope protection will be given to the inland fisheries so that sport fishing can be conserved for the future and will remain a drawing card for people to come to the province of Newfoundland during the warmer periods of the year. I feel that at the moment insufficient protection is being given to this particular industry.

I believe more guardians are needed on the rivers to see that the fisheries are protected. I believe, also, that they should begin their work before the season opens and that they should remain at work for a period after the season closes. I am going to suggest now —and I intend to do so again when the estimates of the minister are before the committee of the whole—that a complete survey should be undertaken to determine what conservation and protection measures are required to safeguard the fishing of the west coast of Newfoundland and that having made such a determination we should carry out the protection measures required at the earliest possible date.

Coming from Newfoundland, or from the Atlantic provinces, I am, of course, concerned about fishing limits. On numerous occasions fishermen have told me that foreign draggers are fishing well within the three mile limit. I have no knowledge of this personally but neither have I any reason to doubt the stories that these fishermen have told me. We on the west coast of Newfoundland—and this may well apply to other parts of the province—have a situation where four or five miles off the coast there exists a fishing shoal, a fishing bank or fishing grounds. Fishermen from the nearby communities have fished these grounds for years and years.

In many cases the people who live in the nearby settlements have to depend upon these grounds for their livelihood; they find that they are their only means of employment. Yet draggers from foreign countries will come and in one season drag these grounds so that they are no longer able to provide a living for the number of men who have to live in the area. I recognize that some of these grounds are outside the three mile limit. Nevertheless, these foreign draggers are destroying the means which these people have of making a living and I suggest this is a matter which deserves very serious attention.

I regret the fact that in discussing these things today some of our speakers have got a little bit political. That might not be a good thing today as far as Newfoundland is concerned. Some of the things which have been spoken of here were all done by this parliament before Newfoundland came into the picture and if we were to go back further we should find that Newfoundland, in trying to solve her fishing problems, was not very well served by the federal government at a time when a Conservative government was in office.

Mr. Grafftey: Of course, you are not being political now.

Mr. Batten: I am doing exactly what you were doing. I think we could have discussed this bill and left all these things out, especially as there is agreement—

Mr. Grafftey: Your objectivity floors me.

Mr. Batten: I am not concerned about you. I would be enhancing the value of that remark unduly if I called it stupid.

Last year during the debate on external affairs I had some comments to make about the 12 mile limit and I believe the time is coming when Canada will have to make some decision about this question. There is no need here to make any further observations as to the importance of the fishing industry to Canada as a nation but I think one thing we should never forget is that when we are talking about the importance of an industry to the nation as a whole it is sometimes wise to pay attention to the importance of that industry to a particular region. An industry may not be especially important to Canada as a whole but it may nevertheless be of total importance to one small region. I think we sometimes have to view an industry in that way.

In the last few years world production of fish has increased by about 35 per cent while the total production by Canada has remained about the same. An odd thing about this is that the increase in world fisheries production, or a large percentage of it, has been taken from the Pacific and Atlantic coasts of Canada. In order adequately to preserve the fisheries in the northwest Atlantic I believe it is necessary for this country to institute fishing limits. These limits have been discussed internationally in the past. There was the Hague conference of 1930 and there was the Geneva conference in 1958, and while the Geneva conference in 1958 might not have arrived at the conclusion which we would have liked so far as territorial and fishing limits are concerned I would not infer from that that this conference was a failure. Far from it. I think it laid some very important groundwork upon which fishing limits can be based.

Then there was the conference of 1960. I think it was unfortunate that Canada came so close to having its contention acknowledged; it was unfortunate that the proposition which the Canadian delegation placed before the convention was not voted on in such a manner as to bring it to a successful conclusion.

I am wondering what could be done failing international agreement among all the nations who took part in that conference of 1960. Of the 87 nations represented at that conference, 54 voted in favour of the Canadian proposition, 28 voted against and five abstained. If it is not possible for all the countries represented at that conference to arrive at some conclusion, I am wondering if it would not be possible to have some agreement reached between those nations which voted for the Canadian proposition in 1960. I recognize that this would not constitute an international agreement but it may be we shall find that reaching an international agreement on this question is going to take a lot of time if, indeed, it can ever be done.

In the meantime the failure of these countries to reach agreement is producing a reaction on our fishing industry which none of us wishes to see. As I say, it may be that one thing we could do would be to attempt to reach agreement with the 54 nations voting for the Canadian proposition. If that is not possible, perhaps it would be possible to arrive at some agreement between the nations which now fish in the northwest Atlantic. If this cannot be done I would have to agree that perhaps the only course we could take would be to declare unilaterally a 12 mile limit around the coast of Canada.

If every other proposition fails I think that is what Canada should do. There are many other nations in the world which have declared their fishing limits unilaterally, some of them recently and some of them years ago. In 1906 Norway declared a fishing limit of four miles. Last year Norway declared that her fishing limits would be increased to 12 miles according to a statement made by the foreign minister of Norway after the Geneva conference of 1960.

Let us examine the unilateral declarations made by other nations and the years they were established. In 1907, Argentine, 12 miles; in 1909, Spain, 6 miles; 1912, Italy, 7 miles; 1914, Greece, 6 miles; 1923, Colombia, 12 miles; 1933, Ecuador, 15 miles; 1938, Brazil, 12 miles; 1949, Costa Rica, 200 miles; 1951, Korea, 50 to 60 miles; 1952, the Dominican Republic, 12 miles; 1955, El Salvador, 200 miles; India, 100 miles and Ceylon, 100 miles. I have taken these figures from a table provided by the secretariat of the United Nations in 1958 when this discussion, in which I was particularly interested, took place in that organization.

If other nations have been able to extend unilateral fishing limits, and if no other method is found to solve our own problems, I would suggest Canada will have to declare unilaterally a 12 mile fishing limit. I recognize immediately that if we should do so many problems will arise regarding our relations with other nations, particularly the United States, in respect of our markets for fish. I believe, however, if Canada were to declare a unilateral 12 mile fishing limit it would be possible to enter into agreement with those other nations which are particularly concerned with Canadian fishing limits. I see no reason why we cannot enter into bilateral agreements with other countries in order to protect their interests while, at the same time, protecting our own markets.

I recognize that by declaring a fishing limit we give rise to various problems, particularly the patrolling of that area inside the limits. I believe that a solution can be found, that most countries would be willing to recognize Canada's fishing resources, and that protection must be given them. If no other method is found to solve this problem then I would suggest that a declaration of a unilateral 12 mile limit must be made.

Mr. Drysdale: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would the hon. member suggest that the 12 mile limit off the coast of British Columbia would be measured from Vancouver or the west coast of the Queen Charlotte islands? What does he contemplate in this situation?

Mr. Batten: I would not be able to provide a good answer to that question. All the references I have made this afternoon have had regard to that portion of Canada with which I am familiar, namely, the east coast. I realize that fisheries on the west coast of Canada are very important to the people there, but I would not, with my limited knowledge of the coast of British Columbia, be able to decide just how the 12 mile limit should be imposed, whether it should follow the contour of the land or follow a line adjoining the headlands. I would think that hon. members from ridings on the west coast could certainly present some solution to the problem.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, this bill is particularly important to residents of British Columbia because of the fact that approximately half of the commercial fish in Canada are caught there.

The development and control of fisheries is a function of government. In respect of inland waters this is a responsibility of the provincial government; in respect of coastal waters, it is a responsibility of the federal government. Since our fisheries are almost entirely coastal water fisheries, and involve the great streams emptying into the Pacific coast—still salt water fisheries—the control is a responsibility of the federal government. In view of this situation any advancement in respect of this industry is dependent upon the action taken by the federal government.

Many of the changes proposed to the Fisheries Act have been requested during the past two years by representatives of that industry. I believe this proposed bill will meet the needs of those representatives. It may be of interest to hon. members that the fisheries association of British Columbia made a submission to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects in which it was stated that commercial fishing represented the fourth largest primary industry in British Columbia, and that it employed directly some 18,000 individuals, and indirectly, some 75,000.

One of the most important features of this bill is that clause regarding the control of the pollution of waters. This is becoming a very pressing problem. I do not intend to go into it in detail as I am sure there will be much said in this regard when the bill is before the committee for consideration. Generally speaking, what has been suggested is that the Fisheries Act be made to conform with the bill of rights.

I would like to ask the minister whether he has considered that penalties in regard to violations be set by regulation so as to permit adjustment upward and downward. Since 1932 the penalty provided was so low companies did not even change their methods of disposing of wastes. These companies felt they could afford to pay the penalty and continue discharging poisonous and toxic matters into the streams. The penalty as now proposed will certainly make this an undesirable course to continue.

We have listened to a great many references to international waters and the establishment of a 12 mile limit. It has been established by international arrangement, between the United States and Canada, that the waters lying from the south end of the Alaskan Panhandle, which divides the waters known as the Dixon entrance, south to the Queen Charlotte islands, and south again to Vancouver island, and the waters between those islands known as Hecate straits, to the mainland, are Canadian.

Foreign vessels do, however, operate in these waters. If at this time we were to declare the territorial waters lying between headland to headland, our jurisdiction in this regard is not being exercised. I realize that questions of reciprocal favours in regard to our fisheries may exist but if foreign vessels are to be allowed to fish in these waters it should be by sufferance and not by right. They should be allowed to do so perhaps by permission granted each year so that the permission can be withdrawn if it is in the national interest to do so.

One other problem has been puzzling me which the minister can perhaps consider. That is, how will the department prevent vessels in waters such as the straits of Georgia from jettisoning oil waste material into these waters? I might mention that in British Columbia we have a water pollution act which exercises a certain amount of control. It was brought into being because of the fact that the Fisheries Act, as it read, did not exercise control because of its inadequacy. There is a proposal in this bill to change that, and it will perhaps provide some control over vessels operating in inland waters and prevent the discharge of waste material. I will reserve any further comment in this regard until we come to a detailed clause by clause consideration of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on the second reading of this bill I do not intend to traverse the ground that has already been covered by my colleagues from Newfoundland. Suffice it to say that I agree thoroughly with the observations they have made about this bill. I must say I cannot refrain from making a brief comment—and a very brief comment, because I do not think it deserves much more—about the very laboured attempts of the Minister of Justice, using United States precedents, to show that he was introducing freedom, United States style, into Canada and in doing so justifying police methods which most people who supported the bill of rights thought were going to be ended by the bill of rights. I think perhaps until we get into committee that is all his speech merits by way of reply.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse)—he was in the house until just a moment ago and I wish he was here—I see he is here, but not in his accustomed place—had something to say which I think merited more serious attention than the observations of the Minister of Justice. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg who is, I am sure, just as anxious as everyone else who represents a fishing riding to have the fisheries of Canada adequately protected, was disturbed lest unilateral action by Canada, if it should be taken, would provoke retaliation from the United States. Well, I must say I regard that as a sensible concern, and I think every Canadian ought to regard as a sensible concern anything which might endanger our market for fish in the United States which is absolutely essential to the well-being of the fisheries. I certainly agree with the hon. member about that; but I felt it rather strange that the hon. member should have waited until May 2, 1961, to express this concern because he had a wonderful opportunity to do it in June of 1957. I happen to have in my hand a clipping from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of June 4, 1957, which reports the peregrinations of the hon. gentleman's leader through Nova Scotia, and in this report I read:

> During his day-long tour, with scheduled stops at Chester,—

A place familiar to the hon. gentleman.

> —western Shore, Mahone Bay, Lunenburg and Liverpool, Mr. Diefenbaker criticized the federal government—

That was the Liberal government.

> —for not making a stand regarding laws which allow United States draggers to fish within three miles of the Canadian coast while Canadian draggers have to respect a 12 mile limit off their own coast. He said that the federal government apparently was afraid of annoying the United States, although "if the United States was interfered with they would immediately make their stand known."

I assume the hon. gentleman was under the wing of his leader on that occasion, but there is nothing in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald that I can find to show that the hon. gentleman expressed his apprehension about the views that his leader was expressing at that time, apparently for the purpose of getting votes for the hon. gentleman. It seems to me that that would have been the time to express this fear, that would have been the time to point out to the Prime Minister that he did not really know what he was talking about, that he was going to lose the market for our fish by threatening the United States in this way.

Well, sir, I do not believe in threatening the United States; I do not believe in any of this nonsensical business of trying to appeal to the public in the way in which the Minister of Finance used to do when he was over here. "We will speak in no uncertain terms". We all know the way he whimpers in Washington now compared with the way he used to talk. But I do say, sir, that I do not believe that, having gone through what we have gone through in the interval between 1957 and 1961, there can possibly be any real danger of any such retaliation for this reason.

We have had the conference on the law of the sea at which the present government put forward the views that were outlined by the previous government, views on which both Canadian governments agreed, and I am glad they did agree because I think the position we put forward was in our national interest and it was a good thing that all Canadians should have agreed on that. We very nearly got everybody else to substantially agree on that at Geneva. With one amendment which, if we did act unilaterally, we would want to make as a condition of our action, we did secure agreement and got the co-sponsorship of the United States. If it becomes necessary to act unilaterally, I would not advocate for one moment that we should do so without prior consultation not only with the United States, but consultation with all those other powers, particularly those that are interested in fishing in the north Atlantic who were willing to agree to the convention on the law of the sea.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you might call it five o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

Mr. Broome: Would the house consider continuing on with this measure from five to six? It might be possible to get unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; I did not hear the hon. member. Would he mind repeating his suggestion.

Mr. Broome: I was wondering whether the house might give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate continuing his speech?

Mr. Pickersgill: Much as I like to talk, I do not think I myself would be able to give any such consent.

PRIVATE BILLS

AURORA PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. S-2, to incorporate Aurora Pipe Line Company —Mr. Woolliams—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, when this bill was last discussed, which I think was some two weeks ago, we had another excellent contribution by the hon. member for Vancouver South. Once again he demonstrated not only his considerable knowledge of this particular subject but also his courage in standing up to what has been certainly very severe criticism in maintaining the stand that he has taken throughout this whole debate, a stand which I believe should recommend itself to many more of the party which the hon. gentleman represents. I was very glad to see the hon. gentleman take this stand, Mr. Chairman. Unfortunately, examples of courage of this kind are not seen too often, and certainly the hon. member must be made of pretty good stuff to stick to his guns the way in which he has.

We see quite a difference between his actions, for example, and those of another hon. member of his party who did differ on one vote and then disappeared when the matter was finally dealt with in the house. This criticism of the hon. member has gone on not only in the house but outside of the house as well. There is an article by Mr. Raymond Rodgers, who writes the Ottawa letter in the April 1, 1961 issue of Saturday Night. He has some comments to make on this situation and believes that some middle course should be struck on matters of this kind. This writer feels that some compromise could be reached between bloc voting and party anarchy.

This bill appears in many respects to be completely contrary to the announced policy of this government, of many of the cabinet ministers and even the Prime Minister. It is rather strange, therefore, to find only the hon. member for Vancouver South who seems to really believe this policy expounded by his leader and the other members of the cabinet. Certainly he has been the only one who has demonstrated during this particular debate that he believes what he says and that he really stands by what he says. One or two other hon. members have expressed some doubt about the matter, but that is as far as they were prepared to go.

I feel it is very important that we in this committee bend every effort to try to reverse the alarming trend toward more and more United States control of the Canadian economy. We have seen it in many fields, and we see it now extending into the natural gas and oil industries. I feel, and the rest of the members of this group feel, it is high time some steps were taken by this parliament to recognize this trend and to reverse it. We see a situation in which present company treasuries are becoming the instruments for extending United States monopolistic control over so many of our industries.

I hasten to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am not anti-American. I certainly do not believe the hon. member for Vancouver South is anti-American. Two members of my family have become citizens of the United States. I have many relatives and many friends in the United States. I should like to state categorically that I am not anti-American. However, I am anti-American-control of Canada's destiny. I feel that Canada's destiny and Canada's industries should be controlled by people in this country who would have at heart first and uppermost the interests of this country. I do not blame the people of the United States for doing what they are doing in our economy. They would be silly if they did not. If our Canadian government is crazy enough to hand over our country on a silver platter to the United States industrialists, they would be crazy enough not to accept it.

As I mentioned before, the Prime Minister and many of our cabinet ministers have, on different occasions, made clear and strong statements condemning the former Liberal government for allowing this to happen. Things were going to change. Unfortunately, we did not see too much change and certainly the bill that is before us now represents no change at all. This is another of the many unfortunate things we have seen in the past, and the bill is going to permit almost complete United States control of another industry. This has been the policy for the last 20 years, but certainly it has been accelerated as the years have gone by. We hear lots of fine talk, and then after the talk is finished we see a bill like this presented. Only one member of the government is prepared to stand up and fight for the very things for which the government professed to stand.

At the moment, Mr. Chairman, over one-half of our manufacturing industry is controlled from outside the country, mostly from the United States. Over three quarters of our mining industry is controlled from outside the country, again mostly from the United States. The bill which is before us is going to open one more loophole which will enable United States control to be exercised over our oil industry. This means that many of the decisions which are of vital importance to the Canadian people are going to be made by people who do not live in the country and whose allegiance and interests are not necessarily those of the Canadian people.

It could be argued, as has been done on many occasions here, that we need United States investment in Canada. We need United States investment for Canadian development. This could be true to a certain extent, but what we do not realize is that most of this so-called United States investment does not come from the United States at all. In studying the issue for 1959 of U.S. Business Investment in Foreign Countries, which is issued by the United States department of commerce, we find that less than 20 per cent of the money invested by United States companies in Canada actually came from the United States. This means that over 80 per cent of the so-called United States investment in Canadian industry has actually grown up right in this country. It represents income generated in Canada by industries controlled by people living outside of Canada. This money represents undistributed profits, depletion allowances, depreciation, all United States controlled and allowed to accumulate in Canada because of the softness of our tax laws. These tax laws are much softer than those of the United States which relate to the same situation. This, of course, is one of the reasons these investors are so eager to get over here.

What this points to is that we are now permitting the Americans to buy us out with our own money. Certainly this is something that should be of vital concern to all hon. members in this chamber. This is a trend that is going to have to be reversed. This is one of the reasons that you so often see growing up in this country a kind of anti-Americanism which is not really based on facts at all. It is not realized just what the true facts are. In the Atlantic, the issue of May, 1961, I find the Atlantic report on Canada. It has some interesting things to say about this feeling that is growing up in Canada. It states:

> During the last months of the Eisenhower administration, signs of a critical deterioration in Canadian-American relations were everywhere apparent in Canada. Canadians were simply in a mood to be unimpressed by anything attached to an American label, from the Bomarc missile misfires to the U-2 incident, the uproar over Cuba, and the curtailment of U.S. spending abroad. Yet this cultivated contrariness had almost nothing to do with the political complexion of the American administration. The greatest boom the country had ever seen was grinding slowly into a recession of major importance and the Canadians were taking out their frustrations on the suppliers of the capital—American industry.

Then it goes on to say this:

> That "American" is a dirty word in Canada cannot be denied. But it is used completely without animus or rancor, in the sense that "Colorado" is used with potato beetles, "Spanish" is used with influenza, and "German" is used with measles. In Canada, "American" only means where the problem comes from and it means no more than that. The problem itself is the end product of a series of economic developments of the last ten years. Like an instalment-plan addict without sales resistance, Canada has lived on cloud nine for the better part of that period. It borrowed frantically to finance its development. Then it borrowed to pay interest on its foreign debt. It sold off its resources and it mortgaged its future.

I might add this, Mr. Chairman. That appears to me to be a much better assessment of the situation in Canada than we often see in United States publications. However, I think this bill before the committee today is one very good sign of where this trouble lies and where it is developing. I think this has been pointed out clearly by the hon. member for Vancouver South. I also note again today that neither of the co-sponsors of this bill appears to be in the chamber. In spite of the eloquent plea of the hon. member for Vancouver South the last time we debated this bill, apparently we are still not going to receive any answers to the pointed questions he asked with regard to this bill.

In view of the oft-stated policy of this government and in view of the situation and the problems I have outlined here today, I cannot see how, in all conscience, hon. members of the House of Commons can give this bill passage until these questions are answered. I do not know why we cannot receive any answers today. I do not know whether the sponsors—I refer to the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Winnipeg South—have lost all interest in this bill. Possibly, if the answers were supplied to these questions that were asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South, hon. members would be of a different mind.

An hon. Member: One of the sponsors is here.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I am glad to see that the hon. member is back again. Since he is back I wonder whether he is prepared to answer the questions that were asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South when this bill was debated a few weeks ago.

Mr. Chown: They have been answered. I think the hon. member for Vancouver South would agree to that statement. It would not change his position on the bill but I think he was satisfied with the answers I gave him and put on the record.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): The hon. member for Vancouver South has demonstrated many times in the past that he is quite able to speak for himself, and I have not observed him to rise in his place and admit to the fact that he is satisfied with any answers he has received. In fact, the last time I heard him speak here he was complaining bitterly because answers had not been given. I recall full well that he said the other day that the answers had been given when he was away. He also pointed out that while he might have been away during one or two debates on this bill, he had carefully searched Hansard and had failed to find any answers to those questions.

Certainly, those questions have not been answered to my satisfaction, regardless of whether or not they have been answered to the satisfaction of the hon. member for Vancouver South. Until those questions are answered, I certainly do not see how hon. members sitting on the government side can salve their conscience in passing a bill like this one in view of the policy that has been so often stated on behalf of their party.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I last spoke on this bill a little over a month ago, namely on March 28. At that time I dealt with a plea that was made that every bill presented to the House of Commons was deserving of a vote. I expressed my opposition to that basic concept because I was elected under certain terms of reference, and the greatest term of reference, of course, is our rule book. If I feel very keenly about any matter, I consider it my obligation to use every rule available to me in order to prevent, if I can do so, the passage of a bill that I consider to be undesirable as far as the interests of the Canadian people are concerned. I also mentioned the fact that we are trustees of our national resources; that Canadian resources are meant for Canadians and for all mankind; that I did not subscribe to the idea of "finders, keepers"; that I am a keen believer in economic democracy as well as in political democracy; and that it ill behooves us to hand over to very selfish interests the distribution and the monopoly control resulting therefrom of one of our basic resources. I do not believe that this parliament ought to put itself into a position where it hands over the control of any one of our basic resources to any individual or any group of individuals.

I welcome, as do many other Canadians, the role that the private entrepreneur may have to play in the development of our nation. However, I do contend that the private entrepreneur of today must also primarily be responsible to the national interest and the interests of our whole society as well as to his own equity capital.

We have learned in the past that so very often this equity capital is very, very small indeed in relation to the assets, and more particularly in relation to the amount of wealth that is under consideration.

The hon. member for Vancouver South mentioned that in the Middle East, royalties on oil resources in Saudi Arabia are in the neighbourhood of 50, 60 or 75 per cent, and that in Alberta these royalties are only 12½ per cent. I should like to point out that, if my information is correct, the royalties in a country like Venezuela run as high as 85 per cent. I believe it is high time the Canadian people realized how little of the natural heritage of our land is really handed back to the people of our country.

I am also very amazed to discover, after having done a little bit of arithmetic, that this proposed pipe line is supposed to cost $3,784 per linear foot. To me this is a most amazing revelation, and I wonder just how much watered stock is contemplated in the proposal that is now before the House of Commons.

Like the hon. member for Vancouver South, I believe in a "Canada first" policy and I believe in the slogan "my fellow Canadians". However, like the hon. member for Vancouver South, I believe we need to follow our words with actions and deeds.

Pipe lines are like highways, railroads and air lines; they are a public utility, or they ought to be a public utility. As such they very definitely ought to be publicly owned. However, if the government of the day will not buy the concept that public utilities should be publicly owned, it ought to at least pay a little recognition to the fact that in days gone by this parliament recognized another company as being a legitimate company, a Canadian company in fact, and not a company owned by outside interests. This company, in its submission at least, had consideration for the production of all the by-products in this particular field and it had consideration for the interests of the whole of Alberta.

The company now before us, as I understand it, is prepared only to skim off the cream and to let the producers of by-products go hang. I believe that the bill ought to be opposed on that one issue alone, if for no other reason. It ought to be opposed for the reason that this company is proposing to take only the cream and will ignore the interests of the whole of the province of Alberta.

It has been said that we ought to agree to the incorporation of this company and leave the rest of the decisions up to the oil and gas conservation board of Alberta and the national energy board. I believe this is very poor advice indeed, because as far as I am concerned I have no assurance that the national energy board or the Alberta board are going to act on behalf of all Canadians, or even on behalf of all Albertans, in regard to this particular problem.

I believe it is very poor advice to ask us to willingly delegate our responsibility in this matter to a board appointed either by the government of Alberta, in the case of the oil and gas conservation board, or to the national energy board.

I think that in this instance we who are representing the Canadian people have to make our own decision. As far as I am concerned, the decision is basically this. Apart from whether or not this ought to be a public utility, the decision is: are we going to permit a bona fide Canadian-owned company to proceed with its plans, or are we going to throw uncertainty into those plans by authorizing the organization of another company, a competing company which is almost in its entirety owned and controlled outside of our borders?

I believe we have a responsibility in this regard. It is a responsibility that ought not to be shrugged off on to the shoulders of either a board appointed by the Alberta government or a nationally appointed energy board.

I believe this is a matter that hits at the very essence of the campaign launched by the Conservative party at the time of the last election. I think any real conservative, with a small "c", ought to listen very carefully to the advice of the hon. member for Vancouver South. The hon. member is such a true blooded Conservative that I should almost like to welcome him into the ranks of the New party. I say this because if, as has often been stated, we need a realignment on the Canadian political scene, I feel that we really need a realignment not only as to right versus left, but also as to the rights of members of parliament to speak their own opinions versus the rights of a political party.

In the case of this bill I regret very much that it has obviously become a decision of the party caucus. The government of the day, as has regrettably happened in other days, has decided that any interest or any individual who has the money with which to present a bill to the House of Commons should automatically receive the endorsation of the party which happens to have the majority. I feel this is regrettable.

Mr. Grafftey: You sound like a third-rate professor.

Mr. Regier: I may sound like a third-rate professor, but I am attempting to excite the Canadian people into defending their own interests. I regret very much the attitude that merely because a company or an individual has the money to bring a bill up to this stage, it has to be endorsed by the government, the party with the majority, regardless of whether or not the government endorses the basic principles of the bill.

I am very happy to see the Prime Minister in his seat. I should like to commend to him the speech made the other day by the hon. member for Vancouver South. If ever there was a sincere endorsation of the right hon. gentleman's own appeal to the Canadian electorate in 1958 it was the speech made in this house on this particular bill the other day by the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. Howard: I hesitated to rise because I thought the hon. member for Vancouver South had risen to speak, but I see he does not intend to intervene at this point. There are a number of important matters which have yet to be cleared up. I think that they might, perhaps, be attended to in a short while and then we would be able to proceed to assess the impact of other clauses of this bill on the nation's economy.

The hon. member for Vancouver South has on two occasions used words to the effect that this was a private bill and that consequently there was no party discipline or control attached to it, that members were free, in consequence, to speak and vote as they desired. The implication is, of course, clear, it being that on matters which are not private bills, private members on the government side are not free to vote and speak as they see fit but that they are instead required to speak and vote as the party machine dictates or decides.

Mr. Pallett: Apparently the hon. member was not in the house on a previous occasion when I very carefully outlined the fact that the private members' hour belonged to members of the house and that there was no question of members being obliged to vote or speak in a particular way. The hon. member may not have heard me say that, or if he did hear he did not understand.

Mr. Howard: Well, if the private members' hour belongs to private members I wonder why the government insists on keeping its thumb on every bill put forward by a private member even to the point of insisting that such a bill should not be allowed to stand in accordance with the desire of its sponsor. Perhaps the hon. member for Peel was not here when that decision was reached by the Minister of Veterans Affairs and subsequently confirmed by the Minister of National Revenue who refused to follow the traditional practice of this house of allowing bills in the hands of private members to stand at the request of the private member concerned. That is certainly not in keeping with the concern for freedom and rights we have been led to think exist in connection with parliamentary procedure.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): On a point of order, the hon. member for Skeena is talking about something which is beyond the scope of this bill, and because of that we cannot proceed to discuss other bills which are of interest to hon. members. If there is any abuse of the procedures of this house it arises from the kind of speeches made by hon. members in that corner of the chamber; speeches made in a repetitious manner which is entirely unnecessary.

The Chairman: I accept the point of order. I think it is clear. I would simply ask the hon. member for Skeena to return to the bill under discussion.

Mr. Howard: I will speak to the point of order, if I may. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has just castigated this house for making a decision in so far as the rules are concerned and for saying that on Tuesdays between five o'clock and six o'clock private bills shall have precedence and that public bills shall have precedence on Fridays. That was a decision of the house, and if the hon. member does not agree with it he should say so.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I just wanted you to be relevant.

Mr. Howard: I am being relevant. I was replying to a question which was raised by the government chief whip, the hon. member for Peel.

[Mr. Pallett.]

The Chairman: The hon. member will realize that he has given a sufficient answer and that he should now return to the bill under discussion.

Mr. Howard: Thank you for agreeing with me that the answer is sufficient. I hope the hon. member for Peel will also think it is sufficient.

However, because the hon. member for Vancouver South has expressed a difference of opinion—apparently his opinion differs from that held by other members on the government side—he has been accused in some circles—I think, wrongly and unfairly—of breaking party lines.

Mr. Broome: On a point of order. The hon. member for Vancouver South is not under discussion today. It is Bill No. S-2.

Mr. Howard: I am not discussing the hon. member for Vancouver South. I would not presume to do that in any circumstances. If we look at page 3765 of Hansard when Aurora Pipe Lines was under discussion on another day, namely April 18, we shall see some words spoken by the hon. member for Vancouver South right at the bottom of that page. In the last paragraph on that page, and then continuing over, the hon. member says:

> I am not going to labour the points which have been pressed in this committee before with regard to capitalization stretching into millions to build half a mile of pipe line. The testimony in regard to this particular phase of the operation has been gone over in this committee time and time again. But it would be well for hon. members to read the testimony given to the standing committee and try to find out exactly what is being attempted. If they do I think there will be more of them come around to my way of thinking. The chief government whip has said that this is a private member's bill and hon. members are free to vote for or against it as they so choose to do. That is true.

I am relating my observations to those remarks which I have just quoted and to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South on an earlier occasion when he dealt with this same question of party control and whether people were free to vote for or against this particular bill. I am dealing with Aurora Pipe Lines in the light of the relationship between the ownership of the pipe lines company and the announced policy of this particular government in office, should this particular measure obtain the approval of parliament. I am dealing with the effect of that ownership upon our economy. This is where my remarks will lead.

As I said, I think the hon. member for Vancouver South has been unfairly charged with having crossed party lines. In my opinion he is the only member on the government side who really agrees with the Tory policy; it is the other hon. members on his side of the chamber who have crossed the party line and who are in disagreement with the announced policy of this government as set forth in the speech from the throne in two separate places and as announced on a number of occasions by ministers of the crown who have spoken in this chamber to the effect that they intend to do everything possible to ensure a greater degree of Canadian ownership and control of industry in Canada. That is the party line, and the hon. member for Vancouver South agrees with it. But every one of his colleagues obviously disagrees with it if they support this particular bill, because the effect of the establishment of this company by virtue of this bill, having in mind the international financial relationships which exist between Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company, the parent company, and the United States-controlled Continental Oil Company will be greatly to strengthen the interests of another country in the development and use of a basic Canadian raw material.

In view of the internal financial relationship existing between the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company and the United States controlled Continental Oil Company it is apparent that someone on the government side deviated from the concepts contained in the speech from the throne. I do not say this with any intent to derogate the speech from the throne or His Excellency, but do so in view of comments made by government members both in this chamber and outside, in regard to the fact that it is desirable for this country to develop Canadian ownership and control of our natural resources. In this regard I commend the hon. member for Vancouver South who apparently is the only hon. member holding true to the concepts therein contained.

We could go into discussions regarding the interpretation of the National Energy Board Act, but this has been done often in the past. I would suggest that it should be uppermost in our minds in order to protect the development of our national resources in favour of Canadian industry, economy and workmen, to curtail, as far as we possibly can, ownership falling in the hands of interests other than Canadian. This subject has also been discussed on many previous occasions, and information in this regard has been placed on the record by many hon. members, with the exception of hon. members belonging to the Liberal party who have not done so because of the tenderness that exists there in regard to pipe lines.

Mr. Peters: Once bitten, twice shy.

Mr. Howard: Information in regard to the ownership and control of this company has been brought to our attention. Canadian national ownership is something that should be kept in mind during any discussions we may have regarding bills of this type. I do not think it is in keeping with the best sense of direction in respect of the ownership and control of our industries and resources to authorize this particular company to become established with a capital and share structure as is now proposed, because it will be contrary to our voiced concepts in this regard. I suggest companies that are established by virtue of the passing of private bills in this house should have share structures enabling them to discharge their duties with the best possible result to Canadian people and Canadian economy, and should not be allowed to be in a position where, because of outside ownership, their primary concern is the serving of interests in another nation.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South, the co-sponsor of this bill, and perhaps the sponsor in lieu of the hon. member for Bow River, has placed quite a bit of information on the record which is contained in a letter I understand was addressed to him. This information appears at page 3766 of Hansard for April 18, 1961. This information was provided in answer, at least in part, to some of the questions asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South with respect to ownership of the company itself.

This information shows that on December 31, 1960 Canadian ownership of the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited was 2.96 per cent. This was apparently an increase in ownership from 1957. The increase in total shareholdings was the difference between 306,000 and 525,000. The 2.96 per cent represents an increase of approximately 75 per cent in ownership of shares held in Canada since 1957. When one considers that 67.77 per cent of the shares are held by the Continental Oil Company, controlled in the United States, the 2.96 per cent is a drop in the bucket, and quite inconsequential. I would suggest that the increase in the number of shares held by Canadians, which has taken place over this three year period, is also inconsequential.

A further letter addressed to the hon. member for Bow River was read into the record and appears at page 3428 of Hansard for March 28, 1961. It also dealt with the question of Canadian ownership. It is suggested in that letter that it is desirable that Canadian ownership in the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited be increased. This suggestion is then qualified by the statement that the officials would like to see this increase take place. Because this has been a concern of the hon. members of this committee for some time I would suggest it is natural for those officials to make such a statement. There were further statements made but perhaps I should not trust my memory in this regard. I will read from the letter as it appears on page 3428 for March 28, 1961:

> At the present moment the company does not have any need for additional equity capital to finance its operations and accordingly, cannot make any definite prediction as to the timing or possibility of a further issue of treasury shares which could be offered to the Canadian public. However, we believe the past actions of the company in making a distribution of a portion of its capital stock back in 1957 before there was any strong public clamour for such action is the best possible kind of indication of the company's attitude and thinking on this subject.

While it may be outwardly desirable on the part of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company to have this percentage of ownership by Canadians increased, I wonder what is the attitude of Continental Oil Company toward relinquishing its 67.77 per cent ownership? The desire of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company is expressed in the letter, and it may be taken at its face value. Its desire, it says, is to have more Canadian participation in ownership but, according to the letter, this can only come from the issuance of additional shares from the treasury. This means that the percentage of Canadian ownership will not bear the same relationship as it does now.

If for argument's sake, they issue a certain number of treasury shares, then Canadians will have to buy in the same ratio as they now hold in order to maintain the same percentage of ownership in the particular company. If the amount of stock issued is increased and if the value of the stock increases because of activities on the stock exchange resulting in the turnover of shares—and the value of the stock could easily change the other way; but even if all this should happen—what about Continental Oil Company's 67.77 per cent ownership?

Is Continental Oil Company going to issue the shares that it already owns? Is it going to relinquish its 67.77 per cent control over Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company? Is it going to put on the market the shares that it holds? Is it going to sell them on the Canadian market through the Toronto stock exchange or some other exchange in order that Canadians may have the opportunity of purchasing them at whatever the going price may happen to be at that particular moment?

This is an important question. If it were not analysed from this point of view it may lead some people to believe that within 10, 15 or 20 years we may expect Canadians to have not 2.96 per cent ownership but 3.96 per cent, or 4.96 per cent ownership in Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company. But, without the action of Continental Oil Company, which has the controlling interest, in so far as offering or selling shares that it now holds is concerned, regardless of the number of Canadian shareholders, Continental Oil Company of the United States will still have the controlling interest in Aurora Pipe Lines through Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company. By that means, the ownership of the industry exploiting these resources will still, psychologically if for no other reason, be serving the interests of Continental Oil Company of the United States rather than the interests of the Canadian people.

These are questions which I think we must keep uppermost in our minds when considering whether this particular bill should be passed, or whether any changes can be made in it by the committee itself. I do not know whether it can, or whether it is desirable that it should. But I say that if we look at this from the principle established in the debate or by the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver South who I think did a commendable service for this country and the committee by taking the attitude he has and by using the approach he has, if we look at it from this point of view, from the point of view of serving Canadian interests and developing Canadian resources and owning an industry in Canada so that it serves the interests of the Canadian economy and the Canadian people we will be much better off in considering this bill than if we degenerate into—and I am guilty of this myself at times—lowering our sights and talking about relatively inconsequential differences of opinion as to what the national energy board should do or what the Alberta gas conservation board may do, has done, or will do.

This is the approach we must keep in mind. We must keep our sights on this particular question. I think if all hon. members will do that they will, as the hon. member for Vancouver South said—I think I can dig out his words very quickly as they appear on page 3765 of Hansard of April 18:

> If they do I think there will be more of them come around to my way of thinking.

This is what the hon. member for Vancouver South said. I am not using my own words. I would not advocate that hon. members on the government side come around to my way of thinking because I know what the immediate reaction would be. The hon. member for Vancouver South used this approach and made his appeal from the point of view of Canadianism, from the point of view of announcements in the speech from the throne and from the point of view of his own party's public pronouncements. Perhaps they should do what I am attempting to do now, even though on some occasions I may have gone a little overboard in niggling differences of opinion about side issues.

Mr. Drysdale: The hon. member can relax; it is six o'clock.

Mr. Howard: So soon? I had so much to say. Mr. Chairman, at the suggestion of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond perhaps you would call it six o'clock.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 7.30 p.m.

FISHERIES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO EFFECT GENERAL REVISION

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLean (Queens) for the second reading of Bill No. C-86, to amend the Fisheries Act.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned this debate at five o'clock I was dealing with the fears that had been expressed by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse) to the effect that if we undertook to establish a 12 mile jurisdiction over the fisheries contiguous to our coast the United States might retaliate. I said that this was a legitimate consideration which we should take very seriously. I reminded the hon. gentleman that his leader, in peregrinating through the hon. member's riding in 1957, had promised to talk tough to the United States about this. At that time the hon. member, so far as the record shows, expressed none of the fears, none of the apprehension, that he expressed today. I suggest that perhaps that would have been the right time to do it.

An hon. Member: Why didn't you do it?

Mr. Pickersgill: Why didn't I do it? I was not campaigning to put a Conservative government into office in this country. I was not trying to do anything to deceive the people of this country, either.

Mr. Pallett: Not at that time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nor at any other time.

Why is it so important that there should be jurisdiction for the government of Canada over the fisheries out to the 12 mile limit? I think the best reason is the very reason given by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg when he explained to us why it was that Canadian trawlers were kept by Canadian legislation 12 miles out from the Canadian mainland provinces on the Atlantic coast. It is very important, not only to give a reasonable opportunity to the trawler fisheries but also to give proper protection to the inshore fisheries.

I was rather astonished that the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg should have said, as he did this afternoon, that the inshore fisheries did not seem to matter very much any more. I am afraid the hon. member would find it difficult to obtain much support for that view. I have here in my hand an extract from the Chronicle-Herald of Halifax for Saturday, April 29, three days ago. The article contains a report of a speech made by Dr. Henri Fougere, who is on the staff of the fisheries technological station at Halifax. In the course of his speech, as reported here, Dr. Fougere pointed out that as recently as 1959 the inshore fishery accounted for 78 per cent of the cod landed in the Atlantic provinces. This means that the inshore fishery is extremely important.

As long as we are going to consider, sir, that under international law we have to allow foreign draggers to come within three miles of our shore it is no longer tolerable to keep Canadians 12 miles away from the coast of Nova Scotia. It is an indefensible position. It has been an indefensible position for some time. The only reason it has been allowed to continue—I am not blaming the government for this—is that the government has sought a solution of this problem by international means which would give the government jurisdiction over all trawlers, both foreign and domestic. I do not believe it would be reasonable to keep all trawlers out beyond the 12 mile limit everywhere along the coast. I do not think it would be reasonable, but I am not an expert. However, in those areas in which there is a flourishing inshore fishery, it is a shocking thing to have gear torn up by draggers, either foreign or domestic. This is the situation, and the inshore fishery is being ruined by these draggers.

If we had jurisdiction domestically, if we Canadians could decide where and under what circumstances fishing could take place, then there is no doubt but that we would be able to reach some reasonable modus vivendi with those countries such as the United States, Portugal, Spain and France which historically have fished in these waters, and perhaps even some of the newer countries, for a 10-year period of phasing out such as was defined by the proposal the United States co-sponsored. I would think, sir, there should be support for the suggestion which was made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) a year ago to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) and to which the Leader of the Opposition referred again this afternoon, that we should seek agreement among the 54 nations that voted with us and the United States for our joint resolution. We should do so quickly, and should not dawdle about. Having reached an agreement with them, then we should do what many another country has done successfully, Iceland being the most recent example, and make a unilateral declaration that we consider our fisheries jurisdiction extends out to the 12 miles, and that we are going to endeavour to enforce it.

If we cannot get agreement among the 54 nations, then we should go to the half dozen nations that do fish in the northwest Atlantic to see if we can get a reasonable understanding among them, as the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) suggested a few moments ago. If that is not possible then surely if the 150,000 people living away up on the edge of the Arctic circle in Iceland can assert their sovereignty against the majesty of the Britannic crown surely a great country like Canada is not going to be afraid to protect what is our patrimony, what is our birthright, and what brought our ancestors to this country in the first place, the fishery of the new world.

I cannot believe, sir, that the United States government, which co-sponsored the proposal in Geneva, would repudiate that action. I grant that the United States has had historic rights. I am one of those who believe that we should always seek understanding with the Americans. I do not believe in making idle threats or in talking in no uncertain terms. I think there is a great deal more to be said for talking about these matters in certain terms, in moderate and calm tones and in sweet reasonableness wherever possible. In the free world today it seems to me that we have so many things in common and are faced with such great hazards that I would not feel that determined, reasonable and quiet negotiators would have any great difficulty in reaching agreement with the United States about this matter.

An hon. Member: Why did you not do it before 1956?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman, I think, asked why we did not do it before 1956. We started on a course in 1956, as my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition pointed out this afternoon. We started in 1956 on a course which has been followed precisely by the present government. Indeed, we had an example—and perhaps I have been provoked into saying this by the hon. gentleman—of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green), at the very opening day of the session a year ago, producing this little booklet on the law of the sea and distributing it to all of us, so confident was the hon. gentleman that he was going to be able to accomplish what the Leader of the Opposition had started when he was in office. It was perhaps a little like the Columbia river matter. Perhaps hon. gentlemen anticipated their success a little before it had arrived. In any event, they were taking the absolutely essential first step. Obviously, the right thing to do is to get international agreement, if possible. I commend the government for following that course. I commend them for the zeal and vigour with which they acted at Geneva. The only thing I cannot commend them for is that they did not succeed.

I am not blaming them for that. I just say that I cannot commend them for it because they did not succeed. We all regret that fact but we must face it. This is a matter really of life or death to the oldest industry in Canada, the first of all our industries. It seems to me that it needs to be pursued with a good deal more vigour than that with which it has been pursued in the last year since the failure at Geneva.

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Howard: Are you a fisherman too?

Mr. Morris: —it is always refreshing, although not necessarily convincing, to hear the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) admonish the rest of us to sweet reasonableness. I must say at the very outset that I thought that his remarks were a great deal more reasonable than were those of some of his colleagues. Indeed, in some of the remarks he has just made he was in fact giving the answer to those on the Liberal side who spoke earlier this afternoon. I am glad for the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I was a little bit concerned about him yesterday when on agricultural rehabilitation and development he got himself out pleading the case of the western wheat grower. I suppose today, having thought the matter over, he decided he ought to get back closer to the hearts of his constituents.

I had not intended to speak on this matter at all. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) asks me whether I am a fisherman.

Mr. Howard: A fisherman too.

Mr. Morris: The answer to that question is that I am no more or no less a fisherman than is the hon. member for Bonavista-

Twillingate. Indeed, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is not now even what he described himself to be in his last nomination papers. He is no longer a ship owner and ship operator.

Mr. Pickersgill: Are you sure?

Mr. Morris: The hon. gentleman asks me from his seat whether I am sure. Of course I am not sure because all I have to go on is his own word.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is more than one ship on the sea.

Mr. Morris: I wish to speak very briefly on one of the principles—for that is what it is—in the bill now before us and so defined by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) who led off in opposition in the debate on this item earlier today. I refer to the item dealing with the 12 mile limit and the three mile limit.

Hon. members who were in the chamber this afternoon may now recall that during his remarks I asked the hon. member for Skeena, who had recommended unilateral action to enforce the 12 mile limit, how he would propose to enforce this 12 mile limit. I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman has remained in his seat throughout the debate because the issue of enforcement has been neatly avoided, in my opinion, by hon. members who have spoken here this afternoon. Indeed, the Leader of the Opposition—a man who has experience in international diplomacy and who knows that much more than fishing is involved in the breadth of the territorial sea—said that, in his opinion, I had chosen a very poor symbol when I inquired about enforcement.

For example, I asked what the hon. gentleman would do if a Russian trawler sought to enter the sea. The Leader of the Opposition said that the hon. member for Halifax —if I am paraphrasing him correctly—is apparently not aware that the Russian area is 12 miles. I do not like to disappoint the Leader of the Opposition. In the field of international affairs there are vast areas of knowledge which are not in my possession. However, it just happens that I did know that fact. Indeed, I think I knew a little bit more about it than the Leader of the Opposition put on record as his knowledge today. There appears to be confusion in the house when we speak about territorial limits and fishing rights limits. The position of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is identical wth that which it commenced in Czarist days. Since 1909 the Soviet union observed a 12 mile territorial area.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Soviet union had not come into existence then.

Mr. Morris: I said earlier that the Soviet union had followed the same principle as that initiated by the Czarists in 1909. This was to define an area of 12 miles as the territorial sea.

Hon. gentlemen who are provoked or inspired by today's debate could consult the publication of the Society of Comparative Legislation and International Law available in the library of parliament. It was consulted earlier in this debate by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten). I have no doubt that other hon. gentlemen have seen it. It gives a synoptic table of national claims to the breadth of the international sea and the territorial sea. Therein they will find, as the hon. member for Humber-St. George's listed today, claims varying from three miles to two hundred miles. But this was not the Canadian position. If I understand the matter aright—and in responsible representation of my constituents I hope I understand it aright, and I have thought that I did so—at the Geneva conference the Canadian position was that we should like to see enshrined a three mile territorial sea.

Mr. Pickersgill: Six.

Mr. Morris: If the hon. gentleman will desist from interrupting me I will presently come to the full story. I quite accept the proposition that it was ultimately resolved at six miles, but I should like to tell my own tale about this. The position taken originally by the Canadian delegation was for a three mile territorial sea, but with an additional nine miles in which the coastal state would have exclusive fishing rights.

We already have rights, some of them extending beyond three miles, for other activities of government. I think we claim customs jurisdiction out to nine miles. It may be that my recollection is correct and we have customs jurisdiction out to nine miles. Various nations have claimed jurisdiction for sanitation, fiscal policy, immigration, the breadth of the territorial sea and fishing areas.

The original Canadian position at Geneva was for a three mile territorial sea and a nine mile exclusive fishing area. The United States' position was not this at all. The compromise position was a six mile territorial sea and a six mile additional sea, which the Canadian delegation would have accepted for exclusive fishing rights, but the United States' position would have confined this to a non-exclusive fishing zone wherein would be granted the so-called traditional rights in perpetuity.

Indeed, this was carefully explained to the house on July 25, 1958, by the then minister of northern affairs and national resources. I will cite what the minister is reported as having said as reported at page 2683 of Hansard of the House of Commons for that date:

> —in the final analysis the central issue before the conference was not whether there should be a fishing zone but whether it should be subject to existing traditional rights as proposed by the United States or whether it should be exclusive and without impediment as proposed by Canada.

So in respect of the area of territorial sea Canada has not laid claim to a 12 mile area. Yet today, if I paraphrase the remarks of hon. members correctly—and I seek to do so—we heard the hon. member for Skeena recommending unilateral action. The hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Tucker) said, if I heard him correctly, that all that was required was courage to go out to 12 miles.

The hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) was more modest and said that we ought to seek some understanding with the 54 nations who voted with us.

Mr. Batten: I said nothing about territorial limits.

Mr. Morris: That is quite right; the hon. gentleman did not say anything about territorial limits. I accept that. I did not identify him or any hon. member as being individually confusing and confused about this matter. I am simply saying that in the debate this afternoon, and I can become more vigorous about this—

An hon. Member: Please do.

Mr. Pickersgill: Go ahead.

Mr. Morris: —hon. members talked about unilateral action towards the development of a 12 mile limit but desisted from saying how it would be enforced.

It is all very well to say that all that is lacking is courage. It does not take any courage to be a braggadocio. It often takes courage to be reasonable and to take reasonable steps. I am sure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will forgo in patience the reading of his newspaper to hear the reiteration of that sweet word describing a characteristic which he so often himself admonishes us to manifest. Reasonableness may be a more sure and courageous ground than what is described as courage. In the press of other business it is easily forgotten that at Geneva we did not have the support of the United Kingdom, the United States of America—which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate says we should now seek to obtain—nor did we have the concurrence of China, France or the U.S.S.R. Indeed, I believe that was the first occasion upon which a simple majority had been carried over the objection and negative vote of five permanent members of the United Nations security council.

The question that I asked this afternoon still begs an answer. How would we enforce a 12 mile limit? The hon. member for Humber-St. George's has referred to a Latin American nation which lays claim to a 200 mile limit. At the time the hon. member looked at me quizzically because I was shaking my head, by which I intended to convey to him the impression that he surely did not mean to suggest that this was a valid or enforceable territorial sea. It is violated, if one may use that phrase; it is certainly entered, traversed and countertraversed many times every day because other nations do not accept it as the territorial limit.

Mr. Batten: But they declared it as such.

Mr. Morris: They have declared it as such. The hon. gentleman and his colleagues, if I understand them aright, would have us declare a 12 mile limit for Canada but they will not answer the question of how to enforce it. What purpose is served by legislating for domestics and nationals a law which cannot be enforced?

This afternoon I used the example of a Russian trawler. I do not wish to pursue that because in other matters affecting marine life and the conduct of other fishery in the high seas we are making, and we hope we will continue to make, good progress with Russian negotiators. We are all responsible here, even private members, not to exacerbate international relations which are apparently progressing to the good service of our people.

With regard to the Icelandic experiment in which Iceland declared a 12 mile limit, I was interested in the interpretation put upon this by several hon. gentlemen this afternoon. They said this proved that you could enforce a 12 mile limit. With all respect to their opinion, the Icelandic situation has appealed to me more as a case which proved, not that you can get agreement but that you almost cannot get agreement.

Is there anyone in the house, least of all the Leader of the Opposition, who will say that dealing with the government of the United Kingdom, which has a tradition of fair play reasonableness and justice running back centuries, if you are Icelandic, is like dealing with the U.S.S.R.? If it is, it has not been apparent in years of negotiation to which all of us have been witness.

I conclude by drawing the attention of the hon. gentleman to the convention on the territorial sea and contiguous zone which was arrived at in Geneva. Article 14, says in part:

Subject to the provisions of these articles ships of all states whether coastal or not shall enjoy the right of innocent passage through the territorial sea.

Thereafter it says:

Passage of foreign fishing vessels shall not be considered innocent if they do not observe such laws and regulations as the coastal state may make and publish in order to prevent such vessels from fishing in the territorial sea.

That is very clear. It defines the innocent passage of a fishing vessel for the purpose of our debate. But the territorial sea in Canada extends for three miles, and the most we ever tried to achieve was six miles, not 12. As to the additional six miles, we came to no effective result because of a divergence between the position taken by Canada that the additional miles should be reserved exclusively for our nationals and the United States' contention that regard should be paid to the traditional rights in perpetuity of other fishing nationals. The convention says:

The coastal state may take the necessary steps within its territorial sea to prevent passage which is not innocent.

Then, further on:

The term "high seas" means all parts of the seas that are not included in the territorial sea or in the internal waters of a state. The high seas being open to all nations, no state may validly purport to subject any part of them to its sovereignty.

The burden of what I wish to say is this. The anomalous situation which has prevailed since 1952—and I wish to arouse no partisan disaffection with regard to this matter—has, of course, given rise to criticism. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said correctly that the proper course to have taken was to have sought international agreement. The position I take is that this is still the correct course of action, and that the use of the term "unilateral action" is—and this is the harshest word I shall speak tonight, for want of a better—grandstanding. Here is a situation which presents a great anomaly. Foreign vessels are fishing up to three miles of the Canadian coasts while Canadians are required by statute—by the Fisheries Act enacted under a previous administration—not to come within 12 miles for the purpose of fishing, and this is the situation which has been left until now for amendment by the present government. Canadians are required by statute to stay out to a limit of 12 miles.

Hon. gentlemen opposite know that this angers, irritates and arouses Canadian fishermen. What do they offer as a solution? The grandstand technique of saying that Canada could and should unilaterally move out to 12 miles. Well, the test of that is whether it can be enforced.

Mr. Carter: Are we enforcing the three mile limit?

Mr. Morris: We are enforcing the three mile limit because it is internationally accepted.

Mr. Carter: We are not enforcing the three mile limit. All you are talking is nonsense.

Mr. Morris: All my talking is not nonsense, but we shall leave that to other judges. The internationally agreed territorial limit has been three miles, and hon. gentlemen well know that. We are enforcing the three mile limit upon other nationals. What I am trying to say is this. If you say that unilateral action to 12 miles is a desirable course, how do you propose to enforce it? Would you enshrine in statute form a law which could not be enforced? To limit the breadth of the territorial sea, important as that is to our fisheries, is not solely confined in its significance to that industry. It has important defence repercussions, and hon. gentlemen well know, or should well know, that the U.S.S.R. at Geneva let it be known in informal talks that it would stand firm on a 12 mile territorial sea because there are things which cannot be done in a 12 mile territorial curtain of sea that can be done between 12 miles and three miles off the coast.

Earlier today I put a question to the hon. member for Skeena. We shall come to this matter again when we consider section 55 of the Fisheries Act and the amendments thereto. I asked the hon. member: how do you propose to enforce this? If a Russian trawler or another foreign trawler did come within 12 miles, what would you do? How would you be prepared to enforce it?

Mr. Batten: What do you do inside the three mile limit?

Mr. Morris: We enforce the Canadian domestic law upon those who are proper subjects of Canadian law, that is, upon nationals of Canada.

Mr. Carter: Do you not enforce it on foreign boats?

Mr. Morris: We enforce the three mile limit because it is generally accepted internationally.

Mr. Batten: You will have to tell it to somebody else.

Mr. Morris: I may have to tell it to somebody else. The point is that we are not discussing the three mile limit now. We are discussing a 12 mile limit. The solution put forward by hon. gentlemen opposite is to go out to 12 miles but nowhere in this grandstand play has one of them proffered a definite assertion that the opposition, if it had the responsibility, would take the responsibility for enforcing the statute should some other national come in and call our bluff. The proof that the opposition would not do it resides in the fact which was simply and correctly stated by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

If hon. members who sit with him will read his remarks tomorrow they will discover that he has pulled the rug from under them. He said quite properly that the opposition, when they formed the government, had sought an international agreement. They had the opportunity then to go to 12 miles and the action they took is generally known. It is no use at all telling our fishermen we can enforce a 12 mile limit unless we mean to enforce it, and this cannot be done unless we are prepared to go to the extremities of enforcement.

Mr. Carter: Have we not enforced it on our own people?

Mr. Morris: It is always a matter of perplexity to me to understand what transpires in the hon. gentleman's mental apparatus.

Mr. Carter: That is mutual.

Mr. Morris: I may say this to the hon. gentleman. During his remarks, when I asked him a question he very discourteously told me that I could make a speech later on. I should like to be able to make that speech, if the hon. member does not mind. However, if he wishes to engage in a debate there will be one winner and one loser.

It would be widely acceptable to my fishermen if we could get out to 12 miles. But how do you get out there? How do you enforce it? Would you ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) to send Royal Canadian Navy forces to fire shots across the bows of foreign vessels? The United Kingdom did this in the waters off Iceland. Are we prepared to do it? What I am suggesting is that the unilateral action which was recommended here, except by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, is not the right solution.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. gentleman is not consciously seeking to misrepresent what I said. He has repeated that statement two or three times but it does not happen to be a fact. I said if we could not secure any kind of international agreement we should make a unilateral declaration, and I stand by that statement. I would prefer that the hon. gentleman would not go on, by repetition, appearing to create the impression that I said something different. I think that all other courses should be taken first.

Mr. Morris: I did not intentionally try to misrepresent the hon. gentleman. Today he made one of his few lucid speeches, but it is usually difficult not to misrepresent him. I agree that he said every course should be explored but, in saying that, he did not agree with his fellow hon. members. The other hon. members wanted unilateral action. The hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Tucker) said all that was needed to go out to the 12 mile limit was courage. If that hon. gentleman really meant that, let us see him get behind a gun shield and enforce it, because if he does not mean to enforce it, it would not be good law and should not appear on the statute books.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman, before he, in a manner of speaking, takes his seat, would permit me to ask him one question? The hon. gentleman talks about grandstand plays. Would the hon. gentleman say whether, when his leader was travelling around Nova Scotia promising that if he got into office he would establish the 12 mile limit, he described that as a grandstand play and asked the right hon. gentleman how he was going to enforce it?

Mr. Morris: Mr. Speaker, I am not in the habit of defending the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) against a man who was born in Winnipeg and now sits in a Newfoundland seat in respect of which he has not even had a nominating convention.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I was not born in Winnipeg.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Lucky old Winnipeg.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I intend to review for a few moments some of the contributions that have been made to the debate this afternoon. Before doing so I would like to point out that as far as the action in respect of amending the Fisheries Act is concerned, we have seen over the last year and a half to perhaps two years, a classic example of an age old gambit indulged in by the opposition. This is perfectly within their rights so to do. I have no objection to those members of the opposition doing so at all. The tactic is, of course, to try to pressure a minister, by repeated questions and suggestions from time to time, into making premature statements with regard to government intentions, or ill conceived statements on government policy so that if, because of events which subsequently transpire, the government is not able to make good in regard to the statements the opposition will be in a position to belabour them.

I have been asked time and again what we intended to do about amending section 55 of the Fisheries Act which, in certain areas of Canada, the maritime provinces, requires large Canadian trawlers to stay 12 miles from our shores. Intermingled with this question have been a great many questions about the law of the sea, a subject which is actually entirely different. Hon. members are out of order in discussing it on this particular bill, although it is closely related. I have no apology to make when I say that it has been my habit, perhaps partly from training, and partly by nature, to be rather reticent when questions of this sort have been put to me in the past.

The second move open to the opposition is an attempt to guess what government intentions are. Having satisfied themselves that they have guessed, members of the opposition then announce as their own policy what they think the government is about to do and, therefore, try to claim credit for it. This is all strictly within the rules but is, of course, a strategy as old as oppositions are. I am not finding fault with these tactics at all but I would not want those members of the opposition to think they have discovered some new tactic in this regard. I hope they have not deceived themselves into thinking they have succeeded in creating the illusion that they thought of these tactics first, and that they forced the government into panicky action practically against its will, because nothing could be further from the fact.

A number of hon. members expressed the opinion this afternoon that the government was panicked into suddenly taking action to amend the Fisheries Act because a private bill was introduced on March 22. I do not want to detract in any way from the initiative of the hon. member who introduced that bill. However, I would not like to let him or anyone else in the opposition think that these were the facts of the matter, that this proposed bill to amend the Fisheries Act was thrown together in panic by the government.

I should like to assure you, Mr. Speaker, and all hon. members, that these amendments are put forward now as a result of long study, the accumulation of knowledge with regard to the deficiencies of the present act, and as a result of complaints that have been made on the one hand by individuals of the public who felt they had been discriminated against and, on the other hand, by the staff of this department which has from time to time reported that, because of the way in which the act was drawn enforcement was from time to time frustrated.

The Leader of the Opposition cited, as proof of the theory presented, the fact that this bill was not mentioned in the speech from the throne. I think it is common knowledge that a government is not obliged to mention, in the speech from the throne, each and every bit of legislation which it proposes to introduce in a session of parliament. The fact that this bill was not mentioned therein does not in fact prove anything. I find this exercise on the part of the members of the opposition quite amusing because of my familiarity with it, having sat in the opposition perhaps longer than most of the hon. members now there. As I have said, these are not new tactics at all. I would suggest, however, with the passage of years the present members of the opposition may develop more skill in this regard so it will not look so obvious.

Mr. Pickersgill: Methinks the lady—or in this instance the laddie—doth protest too much.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I do want to say that I welcome the implied support for this bill because, after all, imitation is perhaps the greatest means of flattery. I am sincerely appreciative of the fact that most hon. members, regardless of where they sit in this house, although they have naturally had certain reservations and criticisms, generally conceded that this was a step in the right direction. It may be grudging support, but nevertheless I accept whatever measure of support they see fit to give the bill.

I hesitate to say this because I fear it might sound condescending but I do not mean it in that sense at all. I was in opposition for quite a while. This business of trying to guess what the government is going to do and then jumping on the bandwagon is quite a fine tactic if it is executed with finesse, but in doing this an opposition member is in danger, when he jumps on the bandwagon, of reducing himself to the status of the fly in the Aesop fable who sat upon the axle tree of the chariot wheel and said, "What a dust I do raise". I certainly would not want that to happen to any of my hon. friends in the opposition, but I think we should look at what are the facts of the matter.

Last year on the estimates, when the question was raised of amending the Fisheries Act with regard to the insufficiency of penalties for permitting the pollution of waters to occur—I believe this was raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) —I said that this was under careful examination with the idea of bringing the act up to date in that regard. Then the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) raised the question whether the bill of rights when passed would be in conflict with the Fisheries Act. I remember I told him on that occasion that since the bill of rights had not passed this was a hypothetical question and therefore I had nothing further to say except it was the concern of my department to see that there was no conflict in the legislation which I had the responsibility of administering. There were other questions. I was asked by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse), I believe, whether section 55 of the Fisheries Act would be amended, and I answered him on that occasion by saying that the problem was being studied even then, and further back than that, which is the fact.

We come now to March 22 of this year when the private bill was introduced. Hon. members suggest that this was what prompted the government suddenly to introduce this amendment to the Fisheries Act. I should like to point out that on March 14, eight days before the bill was introduced, I had this to say in the house with regard to amendments to the act, as reported at page 2963 of Hansard:

> I am hopeful that it will be introduced. We have been working on suitable amendments to the Fisheries Act for several months and I am hopeful that we shall have a bill to bring before this session of parliament.

As I said, I have been reticent about making flat statements as to what is going to happen in the future. I think it cannot be said that this was something that was thought of after March 22, when I said on March 14, as reported in Hansard that we had been working on this very amendment for many months. I do not intend to belabour the point, but I want to clear up the situation and give credit where credit is due, namely to the officials of my department who are concerned, as I am myself, with protecting the resources of the sea and making sure that those renewable resources are protected so that those engaged in the fisheries will in perpetuity have the opportunity to win their livelihood from those resources of the sea.

Various members devoted a great deal of time to the question of territorial waters. As I have said, strictly speaking, I think this question is out of order so far as this particular measure is concerned and I do not wish to impose on the house but I should like briefly to say that the question of the law of the sea affects many departments of government. Besides the Department of Fisheries, it affects customs, transport, defence and many others. Therefore, these various interests are brought together in the Department of External Affairs in dealing with other countries. Because the law of the sea is an international problem therefore it is the responsibility of the Department of External Affairs.

I should like to mention at this point that an excellent job was done through external affairs by the Canadian delegation at the two conferences on the law of the sea in Geneva. We almost won success; we just missed it by one vote.

A great deal has been said about the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his actions during previous election campaigns in saying that we will stand up to the United States and see to it that the rights of Canadian fishermen are protected out to 12 miles. I should like to point out that this government has gone about this problem in a logical way. We made an attempt to seek international agreement on the widening of the territorial limits and an exclusive fishing zone contiguous to it, and gained a great measure of support from the nations of the world in this regard and had the success of eventually having the United States come to common ground with us as far as this problem is concerned.

As I said, this is the responsibility of the Department of External Affairs and I do not presume to speak for that department, but I can say that the government is continuing to address itself to this problem with undiminished zeal. The fact that the anomalous situation which has existed for years has increased in severity under changing conditions because of section 55 of the Fisheries Act has no direct connection with the wider problem. The fact that this anomaly is now being removed by this measure does not indicate in any way that the other problem is hopeless, or that there will be any diminished effort to gain international agreement with regard to a wider territorial limit and/or a contiguous, exclusive fishing zone.

This particular problem of our own larger trawlers not having the same privileges as foreign trawlers in certain areas is a domestic problem which is being rectified by our own legislation, as it should be. The fact that this is being done does not imply, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) seemed to think, there has been no progress in the field of achieving agreement in the wider field of international affairs.

A great many members suggested that the thing for us to do was to take unilateral action. The Leader of the Opposition and some other members seemed to think that the situation had now got to the point where this was the only course left open to the government. That is not the case. I want to assure the house that no avenue will be left unexplored, no stone unturned, in order to secure action which will result in greater benefits for Canadian fishermen in the waters adjacent to our own coasts.

However, this matter of just declaring unilaterally that we are widening our territorial waters or exclusive fishing zone, is not as simple as that. We have to be able to establish sovereignty if we choose to follow that course. This is not something that is easily accomplished if other nations do not accept the stand taken by Canada. I think there is still good hope of international agreement being achieved in this field, at least among a major group of nations.

The Leader of the Opposition deplored the fact that there was no amendment to this act to declare unilaterally we were widening our territorial waters. I should like to point out that this act is concerned only with the regulation of the fisheries. I should like also to add that the act of parliament which gives the government power to declare what are and what are not our territorial waters for fishing is the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act. The government has power under that act, if it deems wise so to do, to declare certain waters to be territorial waters for the purposes of fishing without any further legislative action. If the government proposed to declare a zone for exclusive fishing rights, that might be a different situation and might require some legislation or amendment to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

I do not intend to say anything more on this subject because, Mr. Speaker, I feel that strictly speaking I have been out of order for the last 10 minutes or more. I think Your Honour, in fairness, would not call me to order since other members who preceded me have been given considerable latitude in connection with this matter.

Several hon. members expressed some doubt about the wisdom of the right of seizure of fishing equipment by fisheries officers. At least one hon. member said that it was not at all reasonable that fisheries officers could seize equipment and then the minister be under no obligation to return it for 90 days if no legal proceedings were taken in the meantime. I should like to point out that at the present time there is no time limit. I believe that everyone will agree that a limit of 90 days is an improvement over no limit at all.

I should like to point out further that this 90 days is the maximum in practice. If equipment is seized, legal proceedings are taken as quickly as possible. If and when this amendment to the act is passed, it will be for the courts to decide whether or not the equipment is forfeited. I think this will be a great improvement on the present act under which the minister and the fisheries officers have very wide arbitrary powers so far as the seizure and forfeiture of equipment is concerned.

The fact remains, however, it is necessary under some circumstances to seize gear, especially gear that is illegally set. If it is left alone, it continues to take part in the breaking of the law. If it is not seized, the law will continue to be broken until the person responsible comes back to recover not only his gear but his illegally caught fish after the fisheries officer has gone. In many cases, this equipment is part of the evidence and it is impossible to convict without it.

I want to add, though, that the law is designed to protect the vast majority of Canadian citizens who are law abiding. I am convinced this act will place no hardship on them. It is directed against people who are breaking the law. I might say that ignorance of the law is no defence. The purpose of the seizure of equipment is to protect the law abiding fisherman and the resources upon which he depends for a livelihood so that his efforts to earn an honest living will not be sabotaged by those who would, for their own quick gain, destroy the resources on which the majority of the people depend. I am proud to add that the vast majority of fishermen agree with this point of view. They insist on strict enforcement of the law when they see it being flagrantly broken by someone who has no regard for it.

I might say, too, that this power of seizure does not necessarily mean forfeiture. Whether or not the equipment is to be forfeited will be decided by the courts. If it is forfeited, that may be part of the penalty or the court may order the equipment returned. In this way, as one hon. member expressed it, the punishment will fit the crime. That is not the case at the moment. In many cases now equipment is seized but the court does not order that it be returned nor does the court order that it be forfeited. Often the guilty person is fined. In some cases the fine is small and is imposed in anticipation of the fact that the equipment that has been seized will be forfeited by order of the minister. The party who was found guilty of an offence then appeals to the minister for the return of his boat, truck or whatever it happens to be. He cites the small fine which was imposed as an indication that the infraction was regarded as a minor one and, therefore, he should not suffer this additional punishment. These matters will now be considered by the courts and if forfeiture is ordered, it will be ordered only as part of a larger penalty or it may be the whole punishment.

I think it goes without saying that it is not the purpose of this act or of the Department of Fisheries to make life difficult for those who try to abide by the law. If the law is broken inadvertently on occasion we try to temper justice with mercy, so to speak. I think the situation is as fair as it is possible to make it.

There is little I want to add, Mr. Speaker, except to say that many of the amendments which we now propose to this act are introduced so that no penalty will be suffered by anyone until a determination has been made as to whether or not he is guilty of any infraction of the Fisheries Act or the existing regulations by the due process of law.

In that way we hope that the interests of innocent parties will be protected to a greater degree than they have ever been protected before. These amendments are not perfection but I am convinced that they are a vast improvement on the Fisheries Act as it now exists and has existed for a great many years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—"Fishing vessel".

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, it is usual for a minister, when winding up the debate on his bill, to spend the greater part of his time replying to criticisms that have been made on second reading. This evening the minister occupied at least one third of his time, I would think, in trying to refute an argument, which was put forward not by me but by some of my colleagues, that this bill had been hastened because of another bill which I had introduced some time earlier this session. I made no such claim and I do not think it is important enough to spend all that time upon it. However, from the fact that the minister took so much time in trying to disprove this point, when added to what the Minister of Justice said earlier today, it seems that we have touched a sensitive point. As my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate pointed out in his quotation from Shakespeare, "Methinks the lady"—or laddie—"doth protest too much".

We have certainly had a great deal of protesting here today. We have had much more protesting about this matter than we have had argument. A clever man once said that if you throw a stone in the dark and a howl comes back, you know that you hit something. It seems as though my colleagues happened to hit something here.

Mr. McCleave: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Carter: Later I will answer any question the hon. member wants to put to me.

Mr. McCleave: Does that remark apply to boomerangs?

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

Mr. Carter: It is not important who thought of this first. I can put on the record the fact that I had made a draft bill three years ago. Then we had the bill of rights. However, there is no point in doing this. The important thing is that this bill is before the House of Commons today and I am happy, and I expressed my delight. Whether it speeded anything up or whether it had no effect at all, certainly the fishermen are going to benefit by the fact that this bill is before us much sooner than we had a right to expect either from the speech from the throne or from the list of legislation which the Prime Minister gave us only a few days ago.

My chief reason for taking the floor is to reply to some of the arguments made this evening by the hon. member for Halifax. I do not know how we are to distinguish him from his colleague. I think perhaps we can do it by calling him the shorter member from Halifax. The hon. member is a fine example of a person who, if he does not succeed in convincing anyone else either by his logic or his oratory, leaves no doubt that he himself is thoroughly convinced. This evening it seemed that he was carried away by the exuberance of his oratory and talked himself into a bit of a trance.

The hon. gentleman made a great deal of the question of enforcement. I dealt with that point of enforcement this afternoon. I said that in my province we did not have the means of enforcing even the three mile limit and that we were not able to enforce it this winter. I have case upon case which I can cite in order to prove that statement. I put one case on the record when I cited the Spanish trawler by the name of the Santa Amalia which violated the three mile limit and destroyed the gear of our fishermen.

We cannot enforce the three mile limit with the small ships we have. I made that point quite clear. I said that we wanted not only ships that were five times larger than the ones we have now but that we wanted five times as many of them. This is an example of the talking in circles that was performed by the hon. member for Halifax this afternoon. He took the position that it was impossible to enforce a 12 mile limit. Just a few minutes ago the minister told us, as he told us yesterday—

The Chairman: Order. I was not in the chair when the discussion on second reading started, but the minister has raised the point that it was out of order to discuss this question of the 12 mile limit. Before the debate continues on that line, I should like to hear what the hon. member who has the floor or any other hon. member has to say on this point. If the changing of the three mile limit would involve an amendment to an act other than the Fisheries Act, it seems to me that the point made earlier by the minister would be well taken. Even if this matter was discussed on second reading, the hon. member will realize that a discussion on clause 1 of a bill in committee is not necessarily the occasion on which to continue the debate which has been closed.

Mr. Carter: On the point of order may I say this. I feel that I should have the right to reply to arguments that have been made in this chamber this evening by an hon. member. That is all I am seeking to do. I would call to your attention, Mr. Chairman, the fact that I have not mentioned territorial waters. I have used the term "12 mile limit". I do that for a purpose. It is a phrase that is meaningful to the fishermen in my constituency. When we say "12 mile limit" we are not splitting hairs about whether it is territorial water. We are mainly concerned with the fishery and the protection of fishing rights. Whether you call them jurisdictional waters, an area of jurisdiction, or zone of fishery rights is immaterial. As far as we are concerned, it is a zone of water in which the fishermen's rights to fish are protected. If you wish me to be technical I will refer to it as a zone of fishing rights; but that is all I mean by the phrase.

The Chairman: I have to be technical, as the hon. member realizes, because we are studying the bill clause by clause. If the hon. member agrees with what the minister has said, that to extend the three mile limit for territorial waters, or fishing rights to 12 miles would necessarily require an amendment to another act, he will agree with me that it is out of order to discuss it now.

Mr. Carter: Surely, Mr. Chairman, I have the right to reply to argument that has been made in the house this evening by another member.

The Chairman: As I have indicated to the hon. member, the debate on second reading has been closed. We have to be relevant in committee in discussing the bill clause by clause.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I may make an observation since you invited observations from other hon. members on the point.

I think it has been the custom of the house, and a custom that was frequently reiterated and almost codified by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, particularly when he sat on this side of the house —though I have not heard him argue so strongly for it from the other side of the house—that a brief general discussion on the first clause of a bill, the kind of argument that arose in the debate on the principle of the bill, has always been permitted. Not extended speeches, but a brief discussion has been allowed.

I think it would probably save the time of the committee, considering that the debate was largely concentrated on this particular point, if the one or two hon. members who wish to clarify one or two points in this connection were allowed to proceed, as has seemed to be customary. I do not anticipate that many hon. members will wish to speak on this matter.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, if I may say a word on the point of order, I think that even those who are quite skilled in international law and various other aspects of this matter may find it difficult to arrive at a line of demarcation between the amendments proposed here and the larger problem of the law of the sea.

In view of the fact that such a wide range was allowed in the former debate, I suggest that perhaps there would be no great objection if some latitude were given in this regard. I think it might expedite discussion of this bill, rather than prolong it.

The Chairman: Very well, as long as I am relieved of any responsibility.

Mr. Pickersgill: We will be tolerant, sir.

Mr. Carter: The hon. member for Halifax belaboured the point over and over again, how are you going to enforce a 12 mile limit? We have been enforcing a 12 mile limit on Canadian nationals and there is a clause in this very bill which is going to remove that 12 mile limit for Canadian nationals. Surely there is no difference as far as the means of enforcing a 12 mile limit is concerned. The means of enforcing it in respect of one ship will also be the means of enforcing it for another.

This is done by ships, the same as is done in the case of a three mile limit. It is the same thing. The means will be the same, but you will need more facilities to carry out the enforcement. You will need more ships, more patrols. You will probably need naval ships and air patrols. But the machinery and methods that work in the case of Canadian ships will certainly do the same job in the case of foreign vessels.

The hon. member cited the experience in Peru. Has the hon. member forgotten that even though Peru has extended her area of jurisdiction 200 miles out to sea, it is not so very long ago that she confiscated three whaling ships belonging to another power—I think they were under Greek registry—and took them into her home ports. That is what we would have to do.

Mr. Morris: Mr. Chairman, may I just draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that I did not mention Peru at all. It is pretty obvious that he was not paying any attention to my remarks. I do not know where he gets his information from, but I said nothing about Peru.

Mr. Pickersgill: The record will show.

Mr. Carter: I am pretty sure I heard the hon. member mention Peru, and I will look at the record tomorrow. However, we do not have to rely on Peru. We have the example of a little nation like Iceland. We have the example of a small nation like Norway, which is smaller than Canada. Norway has found some way of doing it.

Surely, if little countries like Iceland and Norway can enforce a 12 mile limit, what logic is there in saying that Canada cannot do the same?

It may be all right for my hon. friend; he may not have many constituents who are suffering because of the encroachment of foreign draggers. But I can assure the hon. member that last winter foreign draggers did affect not only Newfoundland fishing ships but mainland fishing vessels that were operating out of Port aux Basques.

I should like to tell the committee what happened in this case and I will quote one or two excerpts from a telegram I received from Mr. T. J. Hardy of Channel, Port aux Basques. This gentleman sent me a telegram on behalf of the fishermen of that area.

For the information of hon. friends I may say that Mr. Hardy is one of the most enterprising fish operators in my province. He is a man who owns and operates a fish plant. If one of his skippers becomes sick, he can get aboard that dragger, take her out and set his gear the same as any skilled fisherman; and he can build his own ship and fit her out. That is the kind of man we have in Newfoundland, and he knows what he is talking about.

This is what happened. The fishing in this area was good—

Mr. Broome: How many copies of that speech are you going to send out?

Mr. Carter: —and the fishermen were bringing in catches of 150,000 pounds of fish a day. The foreign draggers came, and the catch fell from 150,000 pounds a day to 20,000 pounds a day. It does not take much imagination to realize what effect that has on the livelihood of these fishermen.

Mr. Grafftey: Read the telegram.

[Mr. Carter.]

Mr. Carter: Not only were our people deprived of their livelihood, but the fish that were being caught were largely wasted. The fishermen were not able to handle the catch on board these foreign ships; the weather was cold; it was freezing a little and too fast for them to handle the fish. They had to throw the catch away, or it was washed away. There were so many dead fish floating around in this area that it was possible for people who worked in the offices there to pick up, after office hours, 1,500 pounds of fish per person. That is the sort of thing that is happening.

This was wealth of which my constituents were deprived and it was wealth that was being wasted. It was not doing anybody any good. This sort of thing goes on over and over again, year after year. My hon. friend thinks we should be satisfied to let that situation continue indefinitely. We are not going to let it continue indefinitely. We are getting pretty well fed up with it. It is all right to be sweet and reasonable, but how long can you be sweet and reasonable when your family is starving and when your livelihood is being taken away from you?

The answer to that situation is this. I think the hon. member himself put on the record this afternoon that at the Geneva convention 54 nations were in agreement on a six mile territorial limit plus a six mile zone of fishing rights. If those 54 nations were sincere in reaching that agreement, what is there to prevent them from getting together themselves and making that agreement work? How long should one remain sweet and reasonable while all those 54 nations who agreed to it in principle and supported it in Geneva and worked out a solution delay in putting it into effect?

An hon. Member: What would you do?

Mr. Carter: I say we have been pussyfooting long enough. The time is coming when we must stop pussyfooting, and if it means taking unilateral action, I say we should take it.

Mr. Morris: Perhaps I can make a few brief remarks. I was not in the chamber when the hon. gentleman said that for the purpose of definition he would call me the smaller member for Halifax—

Mr. Carter: The shorter.

Mr. Morris: Perhaps I could refer to that. Heretofore, Halifax, which is an anomalous constituency resembling that of the hon. Minister of Fisheries inasmuch as it is represented by two members, used to have what was described by hon. members as a senior and a junior member. I always thought this was somewhat pompous and I must say I would be delighted if the hon. gentleman cares to distinguish between my colleague and

I by referring to the longer and to the shorter hon. member for Halifax. I can tell the hon. gentleman that it is in no way offensive. The best things in the world come in the smallest packages.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a reflection on your colleague.

Mr. Morris: It is not a reflection on my colleague at all. It is simply an assertion that we do not have a senior and junior member in Halifax as used to be the case.

I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but, frankly, I think the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo is a great deal more convincing when he is talking the language of lake Couchiching or Mackinac island, than when he is talking about taking unilateral action. Moral Re-Armament comes much stronger from him than these statements that we should go it alone and do this and that. Certainly reasonableness should be the language of M.R.A. rather than talk of unilateral action. It is gratuitous of the hon. member to say that I am not concerned. I am concerned. We are all concerned. I am concerned about the Newfoundland fishery because I am a Canadian and because I am a member of parliament. I have said nothing here which should have aroused the hon. gentleman's vigour or acerbity in any way. I simply ask whether those who recommend unilateral action are prepared to enforce its consequences.

Hon. members opposite say that we can now enforce the three mile limit. The answer is very simple. It is elementary. We have jurisdiction under Canadian law over the nationals of Canada both in Canada and abroad but we have no jurisdiction over the nationals of another state. What would hon. members opposite advise doing if nationals of another state came inside the 12 mile limit? Is the hon. gentleman prepared to get into a boat and fire the first gun? That is the question he has not answered.

Mr. Carter: The answer is very simple. We would do exactly the same as we would do if they came inside the three mile limit, and if the hon. gentleman was not so dense he would know. The chief duty of any nation and of any government is to defend its nationals and to protect their livelihood. That is our duty here. The livelihood of our people is at stake and it is being jeopardized by nationals of some countries who themselves claim or at least try to claim a 12 mile jurisdiction. The hon. gentleman has spoken as though the three mile limit were something sacred, something handed down from Mount Sinai. It was only the range of an old time cannon. That is all the three mile limit was, and then a number of nations agreed on it. Well, we have outgrown the three mile limit. We have outgrown the cannon. We are out in space now. We are orbiting around the world. The cannon with the three mile range is out of date and we have to bring ourselves in line with events.

Mr. Granger: I intend to be very brief. I made my contribution this afternoon. However, I must make a comment or two about some of the observations made by one of the hon. members from Halifax. I shall be very careful how I refer to him because I was in the kindergarten group that he lectured a little while ago when he climbed onto Mount Olympus and looked down on us from a great height.

Despite the fact that the hon. member spent some time talking about the 12 mile limit, only two things seem to emerge. One was that he seemed to think that any extension of sovereign power beyond the three mile limit would be an act of aggression against, I presume, the rest of the world. The other point was expressed by his repeated question, how would we enforce it? The hon. member inferred that any attempt to extend our rights to 12 miles would automatically involve armed action. That was the inference, although it was not stated in so many words.

My own impression is that Canada, which has been active in negotiating the extension of territorial waters, could, if she negotiates long enough and hard enough, win by means of negotiation alone. The prospects are by no means hopeless. In any case I think our position would be so well established on moral grounds by general agreement that, helped out, perhaps, by a little of that braggadocio about which the hon. member talked, the 12-mile limit would become an accomplished fact.

Mr. Morris: We have just seen precisely in the last two minutes the contradiction of which I spoke in my remarks on second reading. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo said "Take unilateral action." The hon. member who has just sat down said "The situation is not hopeless; I believe in negotiation".

This is precisely the point. I did not say anything in my remarks against the 12 mile limit. My remarks were directed against unilateral action to try to secure it. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said he would resort to unilateral action only as a last resort, by which he meant he wants to have the best of both arguments. I say it is perfectly apparent that hon. members opposite are not prepared to enforce a 12 mile limit. It cannot be enforced. If a law cannot be enforced, it is not a good law, and if it is not good law it should not be on the statute books. I believe in negotiation. Now that this matter has come out in free wheeling debate, I may say I was appalled to hear a former Nobel peace prize winner come into this house this afternoon and advise taking unilateral action. Negotiation is the only way to achieve a 12 mile limit. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate did not check his script with that of the Leader of the Opposition because they said opposite things. You have got to negotiate because you are not prepared to enforce it. If we can establish a six mile limit it will be better for our fishermen than a three mile limit. I am saying that I do not believe in unilateral action at this time. I do not believe the hon. gentlemen, who have said they do, are prepared to take the consequences in the way of enforcement. What could be clearer than that statement?

Mr. Pickersgill: Since the hon. gentleman seems to know better what I said than I do myself—

Mr. Morris: That is possible.

Mr. Pickersgill: —perhaps I can put this in a way that even that hon. gentleman, who has neither the will nor perhaps the capacity to understand, will find it hard to misrepresent. My position is not necessarily that unilateral action be taken and that was precisely the position taken by my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition. I think that the people of this country will be rather more impressed by the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition as to what might be possible in international politics than they will by the shorter hon. member for Halifax. The fact of the matter is that they all know that a little country like Iceland, having made a unilateral declaration, has succeeded, as I pointed out earlier, in getting the majesty of Great Britain to accept it, reluctantly, and in some instances with some difficulty. I do not believe that we are such pusillanimous people, that we Canadians are so frightened by our own shadows that if we can get a convention, by agreement in advance with other countries concerned, we will not do so. I do not believe that if we set our hands to this task we will fail. In fact, I am quite confident that we occupy such a position in the world that we would be successful in doing this.

Mr. Drysdale: How long would it take?

Mr. Benidickson: The Conservatives will take too long.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the members of the government are as much interested as the hon. member for Halifax in securing this, it will certainly take until after the next election, and until my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition becomes prime minister.

Mr. Ricard: That will take another 25 years.

Mr. Pickersgill: When that happens it will not take very long, as it will not take very long to get this country moving again.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I have listened this evening to the debate since 7.45 and have found some of the remarks most interesting indeed, especially those made recently by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. I wrote some of them down. He said, we enforce the 12 mile limit on Canadian nationals and they obey the law. It is only natural that all east coast fishermen who are good Canadians would certainly obey the law. The hon. member went on to say, if we can enforce the 12 mile limit on Canadian fishermen we can enforce it on fishermen from other countries. He said it was easy to do this. He suggested that all we need is more patrol ships and more air patrols and that we, like Norway, could enforce a 12 mile limit on any ship operating off the east coast.

I believe tonight that the opposition has really gone on record in so far as the east coast fisheries are concerned. I do not believe that hon. members want to see large trawlers leaving Halifax, Lunenburg, Louisburg or St. John's, Newfoundland, under protection of gun boats supplied by the Royal Canadian Navy, and aircraft supplied by the Royal Canadian Air Force. If that is the position of the Liberal party, and I think it has been well stated, I am pleased to see that it has finally been placed on the record. I do not approve, as the member for one of the largest fishing ports on the north Atlantic coast, and I raise strong objection to the remarks put on the record by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

I believe this government realizes that it has a duty not only in respect of deep-sea fishermen, but inshore fishermen as well. I have both types resident in my riding and I recognize the value of inshore fishermen to the Canadian economy. It is evident that the Liberal party does not wish deep-sea fishermen to have equal chances, as do fishermen of other nations. Members of that party discussed the situation in such a way that they have led us to believe they want our fishermen kept 12 miles off the coast without the opportunity of enjoying the same rights as those fishermen of other nations. I think this is a wrong approach and would suggest, under this government, that there will be no second class citizens, no second class fishermen. We intend to protect their rights.

We have heard other statements made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate suggesting that I was not interested in inshore fishermen. In my riding of Queens-Lunenburg there are a large number of inshore fishermen, lobster fishermen, as well as ground fishermen, and I should like to go on record as stating that as long as I represent that riding I will endeavour to see that they receive a fair share of the harvest from the sea.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

AGRICULTURE

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS RESPECTING MARGINAL LANDS, RURAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, May 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Churchill for the second reading of Bill No. C-77, to provide for the rehabilitation of agricultural lands and the development of rural areas in Canada.

Mr. Eric Stefanson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in support of Bill No. C-77, I wish to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture for introducing this bill. I want to say at the outset that this is one of the most important pieces of legislation that have come before parliament this session. This bill is of great importance to the people of my riding and I personally feel that it will have the effect of raising the standard of living of many people in the area.

The interlake area is primarily an agricultural area and is composed mostly of mixed farming. In the Selkirk constituency we have some excellent land. We also have some marginal and some submarginal land. This legislation is designed to raise the standard of living of those engaged in agriculture and primarily of those on marginal land. I can see that this legislation has great possibilities of doing that for farmers in my constituency.

The interlake area has never been included in a P.F.R.A. district. The reason given for excluding it was that the P.F.R.A. was set up for drought areas and conditions in the interlake area were the opposite. No matter how you look at it, damage caused by soil being too wet or flooded is every bit as bad as or worse than damage caused by drought.

Under this legislation the interlake area will now receive the benefits that other areas have received under the P.F.R.A., and therefore this area will probably see more immediate benefits than many other sections. Farmers will now be eligible for assistance for dugouts and the greatest benefit will come from the establishment of community pastures.

This piece of legislation is bold and imaginative. It deserves the support of all the people of Canada. If this plan for rural development succeeds, and if the federal and provincial governments advance the money to make marginal farm rehabilitation successful, this legislation will have important social and economic results for agriculture and for Canada.

In the past the trend has been for farmers to move off the farms and when several leave the same district it makes that particular community poorer. If this legislation bolsters the income of marginal farmers and of other more successful small farmers as well, it can revitalize the whole rural scene and renew prosperity for small business in rural areas as well. It is important that this legislation be supported by provincial and municipal governments. It offers social and economic benefits to rural people, and it will stop the exodus of rural people to the large cities. It is important that local chambers of commerce, service clubs and other organizations render support to this rural rehabilitation and development program. If everybody digs in and gets behind this legislation it cannot help but succeed.

When the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin) was speaking on the bill last night he adopted a rather negative attitude. He did admit that he was supporting the bill but nevertheless he found fault with the preamble. Actually, the preamble is an excellent one. It reads as follows:

> Whereas agriculture in Canada is undergoing technological changes that necessitate adjustments on the part of many Canadians engaged in this basic industry in order to maintain or raise their standard of living;
>
> And whereas all Canadians, and Canadians engaged in agriculture in particular, may benefit by projects providing for the alternative uses of agricultural lands that are marginal or of low productivity, by projects for the development of new opportunities for increased income and employment in rural agricultural areas and by projects for the development and conservation of the soil and water resources of Canada;
> And whereas such projects can best be advanced on the part of Canada by the undertaking of research and the providing of assistance to provincial governments and agencies thereof with respect to such projects;—

From the preamble hon. members can see that the bill covers a very wide scope and deals with the alternative uses of land and rural development projects. It is true, as has been said in the debate previously, that some of those projects will not give immediate benefit. It will take time for them to show real benefits to the people.

I wish to make a passing reference to the remarks made last night by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). In speaking on this bill last night the hon. member referred to having lived in the bush of northern Manitoba. These remarks can be found at page 4186 of Hansard. This was the second time during this session that the hon. member referred to Ashern as being in the bush in northern Manitoba. The first reference may be found at page 3657 of Hansard. I am sure that the people of that town and the surrounding area do not appreciate being referred to in these terms, since this type of reference gives the impression that they are backward. This is directly opposite to the truth. The town of Ashern and the surrounding area are a very progressive community.

Mr. Pickersgill: Having two cabinet ministers at the same time.

Mr. Stefanson: That is correct, but I do think that the hon. member himself has got bushed and is completely out of touch with the conditions in Manitoba. The people of this district are industrious and proud of the opportunity of being able to help themselves. Through their hard work and initiative they have prospered.

When speaking on this bill last night the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate went on to refer to being in the bush of northern Manitoba. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Jorgenson), interjected, as reported at page 4186 of Hansard:

In one of the areas that will benefit most by this bill.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said "no". This indicates that he has lost touch with Manitoba, or else he just does not understand the bill. It is true that the farmers in the area are growing oats, wheat, barley and some specialized crops. However, there is only one grain elevator located on the C.N.R. line north of Warren and that is at Moosehorn, nine miles north of Ashern. This does indicate that the area is not a heavy grain producing area. The main revenue for this district is derived from livestock and livestock products. There are four creameries located in the district at Lundar, Eriksdale, Ashern and Moosehorn. This area, being a heavy livestock area, will benefit greatly from this legislation. Farmers will now qualify for assistance for dugouts, stock water dams, irrigation, irrigation projects and the greatest benefit of all to this type of area can be community pastures.

Throughout the years the people of the interlake area requested to be included in the P.F.R.A. district but their requests fell on deaf ears. These requests were made through the rural municipal council, and the council of the rural municipality of Signes was one of those councils making a request. Anyone who looks at a map of the P.F.R.A. district can see that the interlake area sticks out like a sore thumb because it has been left out of the green area which is the P.F.R.A. area. I have a copy of the 1958-59 report for anyone to see.

These municipal councils have passed resolutions at their district and annual conventions requesting the federal government that their areas be included in the P.F.R.A. district. I am sure the people of that area of Manitoba will not forget the shabby treatment they received at the hands of the former government, a government of which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was a member. About a year after I was first elected I submitted this report to the government. At that time these people had given up hope of ever getting any action on this type of legislation. The report I submitted to the present government was received with sympathetic consideration and is now being implemented through this piece of legislation. The interlake area will now receive the benefits which it was previously denied, that is the benefits that are granted under P.F.R.A.

The hon. member also mentioned that he had been in that part of the interlake area in 1911. I came to that area a little later with my parents in 1915, and not to the town of Ashern because they settled in the district of Vestfold. The only difference is, however, that I have a far greater assocation with the district than the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate since I arrived there in 1915 and have lived there continuously except for eight years spent in Winnipeg. This particular piece of legislation will bestow many benefits upon the interlake area because it deals with alternative use of land. We have many small farmers in that area who are located on a quarter section of land which is not good farmland. I am sure that in time, through the instrumentality of this measure, these people will be relocated.

The people of the area will receive a great deal of benefit as a result of the establishment of community pastures. I want to refer to the district where I first settled in 1915 with my parents. There were many settlers living in the district of Vestfold at that time. Today there are only a few farmers left. There have been great improvements made in the breed of cattle. In those days most of the farmers did not have good stock, but today you will find some of the finest cattle herds in Manitoba in that interlake area. A farmer by the name of Albert Thorgilson from Vestfold, Manitoba, exhibited two animals at the winter fair in Toronto last fall. This indicates the type of stock being raised in the interlake area. In addition, a hog producer, Clarence Edwards, from Stonewall, for the past two years won an award for marketing the largest number of grade A hogs in the province of Manitoba. I believe he has marketed 90 per cent or better in grade A hogs, so you can see that the area produces quality hogs.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I just want to reiterate that I feel this bill deserves the support of all members in this house and the support of all the people throughout this great land of ours.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have not the slightest desire to quarrel with the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stefanson). We are very good friends, and I hope will remain so. I do think he misrepresented what I said last night, and I should like to correct him. When I went to Ashern in 1911 there was a good deal of bush. Even in 1915, when the hon. gentleman came to that part of the country, there was still a lot of bush. If the hon. gentleman had read on from the word "No" in the middle of page 4186 of Hansard for yesterday, he would see that I said this community would not need the benefits of this kind of legislation because of the progressive things that had been done by the people there. The hon. member mentioned those things in his speech, the wonderful cattle and the wonderful hogs being raised there. The people have done these things for themselves, and it was in seeking to praise that that I said what I said last night.

Mr. Harris Rogers (Red Deer): I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating the minister on his appointment and I commend him for bringing down this legislation. Fifty years ago, Mr. Speaker, a man with a stout heart and a skeleton outfit could set himself up as a farmer with fairly good prospects of making a success. In other words, he could get a foothold on a quarter section of marginal type land and make a success. Time and the advent of mechanization have changed all this. Tractors and power machinery are very expensive. They require larger units of land for economic production and operation.

The operator of the family farm soon found himself in difficult circumstances, with rising costs barring the way to expansion, while retarded produce prices tended to limit and depress his standard of living to the point where the very existence of the traditional family size farm was seriously threatened. This was and is a problem all across the world. It is certainly not confined to Canada. Some countries surrendered to the trend and concentrated their agricultural operations in huge collective and corporate farms, while others instituted immense programs of subsidization, control of production and so on.

This government has committed itself to a different course of action. First, it believes that the independent family farm is the backbone of our economy as well as of our traditional democratic way of life. Second, Mr. Speaker—this is the point I want to stress—the government believes that the custody of our most precious natural resources, the productive topsoil of our arable areas, can most safely be entrusted to the care of family ownership where conservation and continuity of interest go hand in hand to preserve this heritage.

To qualify this statement a bit, may I say this. I mentioned the trend in different countries toward such things as collective or corporate farms. It stands to reason that management and workers on this type of operation would not have the down to earth feel of the soil. Their interest under pressure must be to take out as much as possible, without giving much thought to the preservation of the soil for future generations. Family ownership, on the other hand, can be entrusted from generation to generation to take care of the soil.

Mr. Speaker, I am reminded of an incident that happened to me on an Ontario farm when I was very small. One day in talking to me my grandfather picked some soil up in his hand and rubbed it a bit. He said to me, "Son, you be good to the soil and it will be good not only to you but to future generations". I think this is an important point. Years hence when we have exhausted our oil and mineral reserves, our top soil if properly protected will go on producing in perpetuity.

Third, this government believes that Canadian farmers, if given an opportunity, would be fully capable of reorganizing their industry into economic family units, each capable not only of producing a good livelihood for the operator and his family but of repaying long term credit.

These convictions led the government to set up, for instance, the Farm Credit Act which reflects a new concept of agricultural credit. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this measure has set up a creative process which should revitalize agriculture and do so on a self-liquidating basis. I think the fact that such a solution is possible is in itself a tribute to the basic soundness of Canadian agriculture and to the character of the Canadian farmer.

The previously mentioned legislation and other measures that have been brought down are only part of a major offensive. The Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act—I refer to Bill No. C-77—apart from working in certain specific areas of marginal and submarginal lands, will co-ordinate and make use of all these provisions previously mentioned in order to resolve the problems facing the agricultural industry today.

This legislation encompasses the widest participation and will enable the federal government to enter into agreements with the provincial government. The minister has stressed the fact that this participation must be started at the grass roots something which is the saving feature. In other words, it must start with a firm foundation and work up from the people themselves, rural and urban, through the municipal level to the senior governments. It is what I call a nation-wide project. This measure provides our non farmers as well with an opportunity to take part in this national revolution. I should like to remind them that the health and welfare of our farming industry is fundamental to the health and welfare of our whole economy.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the future of Canada is not dependent upon the wealth and resources of the country but rather upon the character of its people. I submit that this legislation provides an opportunity for the expansion of a sound economy and, as well, the development of a strong character in our people.

(Translation):

Mr. Jean-Paul Racine (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I believe that, at the resolution stage, we, on this side of the house, have supported the principle of this bill. However, we supported it because the minister had given it a tremendous build up.

I am sorry that this legislation should come before the house at a time when the committee on agriculture and colonization is sitting, as was also the case last night. I also regret that the government whip saw fit, last night, to accuse us of not being present at committee sittings. As a matter of fact, as reported on page 4186 of Hansard he stated:

> There is not a Liberal member down here.

Mr. Speaker, I find this statement quite strange, as he himself was present at the beginning of the sitting, and I want to rectify the gratuitous statement he made last night in the house.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, we did approve the principle of Bill C-77 with regard to the proper use of soil, and more particularly to the rehabilitation of agricultural lands and the development of rural areas in Canada.

As a matter of fact, we have been promoting this principle for a long time, because, if I am not mistaken, the Senate committee appointed by the former government went thoroughly into the matter.

We all know that farm revenue in some districts is inadequate; the minister stated so himself at the resolution stage, when he said that, in the province of Quebec, only 47 per cent of the farmers would benefit from this bill. Yet, when the resolution was discussed, the minister said he had great hopes of being able to consult the provinces as well as the farm organizations between the time the resolution was submitted and the discussion of the bill itself. That is what he said, as reported on pages 3263 and 3264 of Hansard:

> Following the introduction of the resolution in January I thought there would be a debate for two days. Then I intended to go to each of the provinces, see the provincial governments, sit down with them and work out the general framework for a series of agreements that I thought we should work toward, especially the areas where research has to be done before agreements can be completed. Following that meeting with the provinces there will be a time lag, as they work on this, in some instances of three or four months. I want to discuss with them the terms of the bill to see if it is broad enough to cover the various types of agreements we have in mind. Second, I want to go to the farm organizations, who have been most co-operative and helpful over the years in suggesting this idea, show them the legislation and ask if they have any ideas for broadening it.

When the minister closes the discussion, I hope he will tell us whether he took these steps by getting in touch with the provinces and farm organizations.

Moreover, on March 23, 1961, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) made the following statement, which appears on page 3278 of Hansard:

> Let me read to the committee the recommendation of the minister of agriculture of the province of Saskatchewan, Hon. I. C. Nollet—

Now, Mr. Speaker, comes the part of the recommendation quoted by the federal Minister of Agriculture:

> 1. Provision of financial assistance in connection with agreed upon projects, on an approved basis.
> 2. Making top level technical and professional advisors and consultants available, as requested by the province.

I wonder whether this bill includes a particular formula, as it seems to be rather general in scope.

Yesterday, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, it was his parliamentary secretary (Mr. Jorgenson) who introduced the bill. He stated among other things, as reported on page 4183 of Hansard for May 1:

> The bill itself fits into the broad philosophy of this government in respect of agricultural policy.

The subjects of bills that have been introduced into this House of Commons and have been passed as legislation include the following: a program of price stabilization to alleviate the effects of the fluctuation of prices owing to economic conditions beyond the farmers' control; the introduction of a crop insurance program designed to minimize the effect of fluctuation in yields caused by weather conditions beyond the farmers' control.

I was quite surprised to hear the parliamentary secretary boast about the crop insurance act, as we all know that very few provinces have yet availed themselves of this scheme and that in fact, the scheme is being tried out in only one of the provinces, namely Saskatchewan.

The parliamentary secretary went on to say:

The bill outlines in three separate phases the intention of the government. First of all there are the projects for the alternative uses of land.

The minister has on several occasions indicated what he has in mind in this respect. He has outlined that many areas of Canada which are presently being used for agricultural purposes could be put to better use for the production of trees or as reforestation projects.

Here again, I think the act is too general and raises some doubts, because if you look at this year's estimates, you find that the Department of Forestry will spend $400,000 on reforestation. In future, will reforestation be carried out by the Department of Agriculture under this act, or will it be carried out by the Forestry Department? That is a question I should like the minister to clear up.

Furthermore, the parliamentary secretary, on page 4184 of Hansard, quoted yesterday from a report wherein it was stated that in any such plan, all levels of government, and I quote:

—will be involved and voluntary organizations such as chambers of commerce, agricultural societies, and community development corporations must lend their assistance to a co-ordinated program.

Therefore, it means that once again the government is counting on the co-operation of organizations for the implementation of this bill. It should not however be inferred from this statement that chambers of commerce and farm organizations have not done their share in the past to help the cause of the farmers.

I said the bill is unusually brief and that we are unable to detect any definite project in it.

In addition, I frankly admit that the statement of the parliamentary secretary caused us to wonder further when, as reported on page 4185 of Hansard, he said that this statement was taken from an item in the Canadian Federation of Agriculture news and information bulletin of January 1961 and entitled "A Rural Development Project in Quebec". This is what he said then:

There are many mountains and hills in that area—

He was addressing himself to the member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey).

—and some of the farms are of a marginal type. One young farmer, Real Boulanger, a confirmed skier, decided that the community had real potential as a skiing resort. He and his family and friends organized Mount Sutton, Inc. in February of 1960, and purchased 2,300 acres of land on the north side of Mount Sutton, the highest peak within 100 miles of Montreal. Then came the development of a first-class ski resort.

A little further, we read:

Jean Lessard, one of Canada's 1960 Olympic skiers, has agreed to provide skiing lessons. What has it meant to the community? Sutton is a rural community, and most of the local businesses were dependent upon the farm. The resort has brought new business. Twenty five people have been employed on the project, and it will provide full-time employment for from 15 to 20 people all winter.

I say that this bill is too wide in scope, since everything seems to come under agriculture. We have reached the point where we are dealing with the development of ski clubs.

I wonder if indeed the object of this bill, and the purpose of the minister, is to promote such developments on submarginal farms.

And so, we can think up almost anything, or contemplate any project at all under a bill as vague as this one.

Moreover, as I was saying, this bill provides for no clear-cut project; it rather deals with such things as studies, researches and enquiries. Naturally we approve the principle of the bill, but it must not be limited to research, enquiry and study; it should also provide for projects that could be undertaken on submarginal farms.

This bill offers nothing in the way of definite projects with the result that, when it is passed it will be impossible for us to tell farmers on low yield land that such or such project may be undertaken on their farm. We were expecting something better and we feel that the bill could contain specific projects. Moreover we believe that if the bill is passed this year, the act could not be put into force immediately, since there is no provision for it in the estimates. It means that no subsidy will be paid this year unless we are requested to approve a supplementary vote.

During the debate last night, the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Ormiston), a government member, said the proposal would be very expensive. He surely meant that the government would be providing large amounts so as to make this legislation practicable. It is rather hard to assess the government's generosity because we still do not know what the program covered by this legislation will be.

There has been reference to conservation in western Canada and to development of marshlands in the maritimes. There again, it is nothing new since both items are in this year's estimates for agriculture.

Last night, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) referred to reforestation and forest products. As I said a few moments ago, we can well wonder whether the proposed new legislation, in the matter of reforestation, will be administered by the Department of Agriculture—which already had a similar division—or by the Department of Forestry.

As can be seen on page 4199 of Hansard, the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Danforth) said that the opposition is disturbed.

We certainly are not, because we feel there is really nothing here to disturb us. This legislation is too vague to enable us to discuss properly projects that might come out of it.

Mr. Speaker, we are relying on the Minister of Agriculture, and we shall find out after a while whether this bill will give the results which the minister promised at the resolution stage and promised previously in the build-up given this bill, which had inspired confidence among farm organizations of the province and throughout the country.

However, as I was saying, Mr. Speaker, we approve the principle of this bill.

(Text):

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): At the outset I should like to voice my disapproval of a statement made last night by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) to be found at page 4188 of Hansard. It reads as follows:

> This legislation is not going to contribute in any way at all to the solution of any of our immediate problems. Indeed, it may do the reverse unless we are very careful, because at the present time it would be a very grave error indeed to take anyone off a subsistence farm in order to consolidate holdings and make someone else's farm more efficient and put the person removed from his farm in the slums in one of our cities on relief.

I just want to say that provision is made in Bill No. C-77 for certain action to be taken which would refute that statement. I do not know what the hon. member means by "immediate". I know it could be soon.

This bill has also as one of its objectives the arresting of migration from the land. The main part of the hon. member's statement implied that persons removed from farms by the application of this bill would go to the slums. That is a reflection on our rural people.

This legislation is unlimited in the benefits it can render to the whole nation, especially to rural life. This bill is of particular interest to me owing to the fact that agriculture is the largest industry in my riding. Therefore, I welcome the opportunity to support it.

Bill No. C-77 provides an incentive for constructive and visionary thinking. It creates an atmosphere of awareness of the vast scope of possibilities which can be useful in the improvement of farm income and the restoration of certain natural resources so vital to the accomplishment of the desired result.

This bill, with all its ramifications, when implemented in co-operation with provincial governments or agencies thereof should provide a wide field of diversification for rural people, and as a result many families will be able to maintain their way of life on their limited holdings.

In my constituency of Grey North and the surrounding areas we have some fine farms and progressive people. We also have many marginal and submarginal farms which do not make sound economic units. Many of these farms are being vacated and sold to holders or larger units. However, others on these farms, where they have perhaps spent their lives, as their parents before them did, are reluctant to leave. Anything that would supplement their income so that they could continue living on these locations would be acceptable. With these people in mind, I will make some suggestions which I think will be helpful.

The government could assist by soil testing and other research necessary to provide a sound basis for any of these operations.

Financial assistance will be a necessity in some of these fields of endeavour. I am thinking now of enterprises that could be satisfactorily adopted by family units. We have many areas suitable for blueberry production on which the Department of Agriculture has up to date information. Other low lying areas could be utilized for the production of cranberries. Marked success has been achieved by several in this field. This could also be said about blueberry operations, especially in Newfoundland where this is a million dollar industry.

Game farming is relatively new and offers excellent possibilities. Pheasant and other game birds are raised to supply the ever increasing number of hunt clubs. A few others offer sportsmen the opportunity to hunt pheasant and other game birds on their farms on a per day or per bird basis. These birds are produced on the farm and released when stock on the preserve is in need of replenishment. Many more of these farms will be required to supply the thousands of sportsmen who would like to hunt where game is available.

While I am on the subject of catering to sportsmen, I would like to mention fish farming as another means of bolstering the rural income. We have thousands of sport fishermen searching the country for streams, ponds or lakes which might yield some reward for their hours of angling. Many farmers own excellent locations for the development of fish farms. I might add that thousands of fish farms are being operated profitably in the United States. We do have some such farms operating successfully which derive most of their revenue from supplying large hotels and restaurants with their requirements of speckled and rainbow trout. Many more people could be absorbed in this industry.

Fur farming has made a worth-while contribution to rural life in Canada over the past 50 or more years. However, expansion in the field of mink and fox production is not warranted at this time. We did, however, import over $7½ million worth of persian lamb skins last year. It is claimed that these can be produced profitably in Canada and could, of course be maintained on submarginal land during the pasturing season. This production would not create a meat problem as the lambs are killed shortly after birth.

We also imported in 1961 over $2 million worth of muskrats which could be produced on our own marshes and lakes. The provision in the bill for water conservation and resources management should remedy this situation and add substantially to rural income. Other fur imports to Canada in 1961 amounted to nearly $14 million. This is perturbing when one considers that we are traditionally a fur producing country.

Not far from my home in Grey North there lives an enterprising young man, Mr. Arnold Kuhl, who can rightfully claim to be the originator in Canada of a promising young industry known as "farm vacations". The idea has now spread to several provinces and each year more farmers will identify themselves with the enterprise and share and expand its possibilities. These farmers supply accommodation in their homes to urban families seeking an opportunity to enjoy rural life. This sort of holiday is becoming very popular because whole families can now enjoy a splendid vacation at reasonable rates in an environment that is healthful and appealing to children. Many farms through the country possess spacious homes which provide ideal circumstances for the promotion of farm vacations. Of course, these people are quick to provide other attractions, of which there is a large variety. Farm vacations open an avenue by which farm people may secure a larger share of the tourist dollar.

A sugar bush can be maintained on rough areas which are unfit for agriculture and, properly managed, can be the source of extra revenue to the family farm.

These sidelines which I have enumerated could be promoted on family units over a wide area of the country. Some of the projects would also lend themselves to specialization. I draw attention to them in the hope that provincial governments, or agencies thereof, through the provisions in this bill, might promote them among the rural people, 20 per cent of whom now operate farms that yield less than $1,200 a year to their operators.

It has been mentioned that marginal and submarginal farms could be converted to forest or tree farms. The Christmas tree farm is the only part of this program that would make a practical operation for individuals. Other reforestation of any magnitude is a long range program and would of necessity be the responsibility of large pulp and paper companies, the provincial and federal governments, or all three working together. This bill provides for such action, which should be one of the projects for immediate consideration and expansion.

Reforestation of large areas which have been timbered is taken care of to some extent by nature, but these areas, if properly managed and if proper trees are introduced, would, in the years ahead, be much more productive. This holds true in my part of the province where we had many fine stands of hardwood, but now these areas are cluttered up with tree tops and brush. They are of little value as pasture land and reforestation is the only hope of putting such properties back into useful production.

Since we have such large areas denuded by timber exploitation and erosion, our water levels have dropped so that many wells go dry for several months of the year. The minister through Bill No. C-77, hopes to rectify this situation, and I feel sure this can be accomplished with an accelerated reforestation program. I would suggest an immediate survey be made of the facilities available throughout the country for the production of seedlings. If more accommodation is required to supply the quantities needed, steps should be taken, in co-operation with the provincial governments, to get these establishments under way promptly. Reforestation, it seems to me, offers the best means to the end result which we hope will be accomplished by Bill No. C-77; that is, to state it briefly, to promote conservation in all elements and create better circumstances for rural people in the unsatisfactory income brackets. The benefits of reforestation would affect our whole economy. We have much secondary industry dependent on forest products. Wood has never been replaced as man's most valuable servant. Instead, thousands of new uses have been found for it and old uses have been continually improved.

Most of western Ontario is vitally concerned with the matter of water. Cities are exploiting the areas adjacent to them, and farm people in many localities are transporting water to their farms by tanks and milk cans. Reforestation, in the proper places, can do much to relieve this situation.

In our county of Grey, there is the highest point of land in Ontario, 1,735 feet above sea level. This is the great watershed of a vast territory of western Ontario. This great ridge, which embraces approximately 40,000 acres, should be completely reforested. In so doing, results would be forthcoming and, in a comparatively short time, the Grand, the Humber and the Credit rivers, which flow south, the Saugeen which flows west, and all the streams and rivers flowing north into Georgian Bay, could be restored to their natural flow, and with the assurance that spring floods would be at a minimum. The same program could be instituted at the head waters of all western Ontario rivers or in any other province where such conditions exist.

Without a doubt, the day is not far off when this program will be an absolute necessity, and I would commend it for early consideration, under this bill, with the co-operation of the provincial government.

These 40,000 acres of which I speak could also serve the purpose of a national park and game sanctuary. Under the authority of this bill more suitable areas should now be designated for national parks while choice virgin timbered locations are still available. Fire and exploitation have lost to our people some ideal territories for this purpose.

More game sanctuaries are required if we are to maintain our wildlife populations. We have thousands more joining the ranks of our hunters each year, and sport magazines continually report the scarcity of game in widespread areas. This is particularly true of the white-tail or red deer. Submarginal land or waste land could be converted to suitable game refuges.

Our local conservation authorities are to be commended for the contribution they have already made toward restoring our natural resources. Bill No. C-77 provides legislation that will extend the help and direction the authorities have hoped for, and of which they will not hesitate to take advantage.

This government should give some thought to introducing legislation in respect of the future settlement of all new areas in our country so that many of the obstacles we are now legislating to correct would be avoided.

Surrounded by a wealth of natural resources that seem inexhaustible, the pioneer in any area naturally shows more energy in using what is at hand to keep himself fed, warm, clothed and in business, than foresight in preserving any of it.

I am not in agreement with cutting our wheat acreage. This is a commodity that can be stored for lengthy periods. It is used for food the world over. It is not difficult to handle or transport. It could be our most potent weapon for maintaining peace. It could save millions of lives. It could save our own if great catastrophe overtook us. Our great western plains are reputed to be the bread basket of the world and, as such, they should continue. More of our wheat should go to those now starving. This will not hurt our market as these people are not in a position to buy. However, such humanitarian treatment could win them over politically now and for mutual economic advantage later.

I am in full accord with the remarks of President Kennedy when he said in his inauguration address "If a free society cannot help the many who are poor, it can never save the few who are rich".

In conclusion, I compliment the Minister of Agriculture on his initiative in respect to Bill No. C-77, the effects of which could permeate far into the future and affect many generations.

I would remind this house of what the scripture says through the prophet Isaiah:

"They that shall be of thee shall build the old waste places, Thou shalt raise up the foundations of many generations, and thou shalt be called the repairer of the breach, the restorer of the paths to dwell in."

(Translation):

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, representing a riding where there are many farmers, I consider it a privilege to comment tonight on this piece of legislation, one that is most important not only to the farmers in my area and farmers generally, but to everybody in Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, at this stage in the debate three things have become most clear in the present legislation which is before us. First, it is legislation designed to keep Canadian farmers on the farms. Second, it is also designed to raise farm income in every section of this country, be it in the west or east. Third, it is legislation designed to give the farmers of this country a fair share of the national income. This is something that this government has striven for in the past, as it is striving for now.

In my brief remarks I would like to state that the legislation before us adheres to certain definite principles which this government always keeps before it in promoting legislation. In reading the present bill, hon. members will see that it is realized that the provinces and the local people know best what is best for themselves. Unlike other administrations, the present administration consults rather than dictates. Thus this is very broad legislation which sets out the purported agreements with the provinces on a local level. I repeat that this government believes most forcibly and truly in the principle that people know best what is best for themselves on the local level.

Another principle of this legislation relates to the notion that this government and this party have an obligation to the future. Up to the present time many speakers have outlined the fact that this legislation has to do with conservation and reforestation which will bear much fruit for farmers of future generations.

In past debates much was said about this pamphlet entitled, "A.R.D.A.," coming out in contravention of the rules of this house. There is nothing in this pamphlet which implicitly states that an act of parliament had already been passed. This pamphlet just goes to show that this government and this party do not dictate to the people what is good for them. We consult the people.

I can inform all hon. members that the farm forums right across this nation and all farm groups are taking a particular interest in this legislation. They are reading this pamphlet; they are discussing it in their farm forums in all parts of the country. I repeat, this pamphlet recognizes the fact that it is best first to consult with the people when legislation of this kind is put before parliament. I repeat, we consult, sir, we do not dictate.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I wish also to congratulate and thank the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Jorgenson) for his remarks concerning the Mount Sutton development in the Brome-Missisquoi riding.

I can say that this project will be helpful not only to farmers in my area, but to the economy and to people in general.

I also wish to congratulate the Boulanger family, of Sutton, and their associates for their noteworthy initiative. This is a good example for many regions of our young country, Canada.

(Text):

I should just like to mention, sir, the initiative that is being shown by the citizens of Sutton regarding the development so ably mentioned by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jorgenson) the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture. With him, I should like to congratulate the citizens of Sutton on the initiative they have shown in the Mount Sutton development. So far as this bill is concerned, it shows what can be done when action and enterprise of this sort are undertaken. The present legislation is being discussed by farmers and farm forums throughout the length and breadth of this land.

In his remarks yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate tried to suggest that possibly while the government did not intend this to happen, farmers earning a gross or a net income of $1,200 a year or less would be forced to leave the farm. Such is not the case. The real intent behind this legislation is to raise farm income and to keep farmers on the farms. I think it would be irresponsible to suggest that either directly or indirectly this is legislation which will encourage farmers to leave the farms. It is most irresponsible to suggest, as was done indirectly by certain hon. members, that this legislation will drive farmers in the low income brackets off their farms. I know this was suggested in my own area by certain individuals and I should like to deny this rumour right here and now. As I said at the outset of my remarks, this is legislation designed to keep farmers on the farm, to raise farm incomes and to give the farmers of this nation a fair share of the national income.

I am sure it is legislation which will be received well not only by farmers in my area but by the farmers in all sections and in all provinces of this country. For that reason, along with other hon. members who have just spoken, I should like to commend it to hon. members.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a western member and representative of one of the best farming constituencies in Canada, I am very happy to have this opportunity to rise and support Bill No. C-77. Since it will take more than two minutes to outline my support, may we call it 10.30?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that it is 10.30?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I can suggest to the house leader that we go on with legislation tomorrow. We seem to be making pretty good progress with legislation and it might facilitate the conclusion of the session.

Mr. Churchill: I welcome all these suggestions, Mr. Speaker, but I think we will follow the program as outlined. Tomorrow we shall carry on with the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. If they are finished tomorrow that will shorten the session and then we shall go on with the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, followed by the estimates of the Department of Fisheries. According to the time which was spent on these departments last session, we should finish the three by Saturday evening. If not, we have available the estimates of the Department of Transport.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

CIVIL DEFENCE

NATIONAL EXERCISE TO BE HELD ON MAY 5

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house I should like to make a statement on the national exercise in civil defence to be held on Friday, the purpose of which will be to test the emergency measures being developed by the federal and provincial governments and the municipalities.

This exercise was announced in March. At that time I said in a press statement that the purpose was to practise those emergency measures which are necessary for national survival and the continuity of government at all levels, to test the preparations that have been made and locate whatever gaps exist in planning and preparations.

The threat of a nuclear war is a constant companion of all who occupy positions of responsibility and trust, and because of that fact this government has put forward every effort on behalf of disarmament. I know there are some who say that the taking of any defensive preparations in the military or civil fields amounts to an admission of the inevitability of war. We do not take that view. Rather it is a recognition of the facts and realities that causes us to make preparations to the end that we shall be ready in the event that war should take place.

The survival operations which will take place on Friday are designed, with the co-operation of the provinces and municipalities, to assure that as far as possible many who otherwise would be certain victims might survive. The exercise will commence with the sounding of warning sirens now being operated by the army. There will be a broadcast explaining the nature and purpose of the exercise, and the public will be informed by continuing statements by radio and television that what is taking place is only an exercise and that there is no need to take alarm. Indeed, this morning I heard one of those messages put over C.B.C. advising people well in advance so that nothing in the nature of fear could possibly overtake any of our people.

In this exercise the public is not being asked, however, to participate as individuals or as families. The main operation will take place at a central headquarters and at ten regional headquarters. The central headquarters will be located at Camp Petawawa, and at that location the government will be represented by the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Defence Production, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and possibly by one or two other ministers. I would appreciate it if Her Majesty's loyal opposition were to feel it could name one of its members to attend—I see a smile on the face of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), who has always taken an interest in this regard—and perhaps members of the C.C.F. group would choose one of their number. They could join with the others at Camp Petawawa and see the operations at headquarters. There will be more than 150 officials from federal departments and agencies and from the army participating in the exercise at Petawawa.

At the regional centres which have been set up in connection with this particular exercise there will be representatives of the civilian side of the federal government, of provincial governments and of the army. In some cases ministers of provincial governments will be present. Senior army officers will be there to direct the work of the army in the field in connection with survival operations.

As I informed the house in August last, it is the intention in the event of war to designate in advance in each of the regional centres of government a senior representative of the federal government who will have authority to act on behalf of the federal government, particularly when communications with the national headquarters are interrupted or inadequate. Among the representatives of the government who will occupy the role of regional commissioners for the purpose of this exercise will be the Minister of Justice, who will do so at the centre at Nanaimo. The Associate Minister of National Defence will do so at Valcartier, Quebec; the parliamentary secretaries to the Prime Minister will perform this role at Camp Borden, Ontario, and at Fredericton, New Brunswick. The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence will do so at Aldershot, where the Nova Scotia headquarters will be. In Nova Scotia, I might point out, the defence aspects of the arrangement are of particular importance. For the three prairie provinces the parliamentary secretaries to the Ministers of National Revenue, Veterans Affairs and Agriculture will represent the government in the provinces in which they normally reside. The federal emergency measures regional officers for Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland will serve as acting regional commissioners at the centres in those two provinces.

This major exercise will require the co-operative efforts of hundreds, if not thousands, of persons in municipal, provincial and federal civilian services. The co-operation shown has been most commendable. We have to be prepared, and without having had any previous experience with anything like it there is only one way in which these preparations can be made. That is in the manner we intend to follow on Friday, to substitute for an actual experience which all of us hope will not occur in our country or in any country in the world.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, like the government we believe every effort should be made to work out a world wide disarmament agreement while there is yet time, but in the interim we believe it is only prudent that we should plan for any eventuality which might occur. In this respect we have stated our position, that in the event we have to live in a world where two great powers face each other over a period of years or decades, each with a capacity to wipe out the homeland of the other, we must take such precautions as we can by way of passive defence.

The Prime Minister has said that this exercise is being sponsored to determine the extent to which the planning to date is effective, and to determine the gaps that exist in the planning. We will permit the Prime Minister a bit of poetic licence this morning. We suspect that the situation now is that the gap exceeds, so far, the concrete results which have been achieved.

There is, we understand, a fall-out pamphlet which has been prepared and is now ready for distribution. We should have thought it logical that this pamphlet would have been distributed in advance of the exercise so the public at large might have had the opportunity to peruse it and to make such preparations, and give the matter such thought, as would seem fitting to them. We understand, however, that it will not be released until after the exercise on Friday, and until after the Prime Minister has appeared on the television news program that evening.

The interest of the hon. member for Essex East in these matters is well known. He has contributed much to the public interest, not only in the matter of disarmament but also in regard to steps which must be taken to prepare ourselves for any eventuality in our homeland. He has put forward a number of worth-while suggestions, and we are glad to see that the government has taken some of them into consideration. Those of us on this side have also shown interest in extending the plan. You will recall the dismay we felt last summer, when we learned that even the basic equipment necessary for civil survival had not yet been acquired by the government. We understand that some crash programming has been done in the meantime, and we now look forward to learning something of the extent of it as a result of the exercise on Friday.

We are glad to hear that so many members of the government will be participating in this exercise. It is also nice to know that it is the government's belief that at least one member of each of the opposition parties should be spared in the event of an attack. That does not seem an unreasonable ratio having regard to the distribution of hon. members in the House of Commons at the present time. All we can say is that we hope the facilities provided for survival at these particular locations, which have been so designated, will be such that the government members, and indeed the opposition members who are privileged to be there, will themselves have the opportunity to survive and join the rest of us after the exercise is finished.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, let me say that members of this group do not wish to make any political capital out of the unfortunate necessities of our time. We appreciate the action of the Prime Minister in informing the house of the plan and of some of the details of this survival exercise. We are also glad to know that the public is being well informed in advance. This is very necessary in exercises of this kind. However, Mr. Speaker, I am certain that all hon. members, regardless of party, hope that the efforts of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and all those associated with him in the United Nations and other gatherings to promote disarmament and work for peace will be crowned with success.

We in this group trust that this exercise will emphasize the necessity of increasing support for those who are doing their best under very difficult and frustrating international circumstances to make certain that the genuine article so far as survival is concerned will not be required.

PUBLIC SERVICE

TABLING OF PROGRESS REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I wish to table copies in English and in French of the first progress report of the royal commission on government organization. Copies will be made available today to members of the House of Commons.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—EXPANSION OF DEVELOPMENT ROAD CONSTRUCTION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to announce an expansion in the government policy for the construction of development roads in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. In doing so, Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to welcome the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie) back to his place in the house. This is an occasion that he can help to celebrate with us.

Hon. members will recall that since 1958 the government of Canada has been actively engaged in the construction of roads to encourage prospecting for and the development of resources. This policy parallels in the territories the roads to resources program in the provinces. It has resulted in a thousand miles of development roads now in use or in some stage of construction in northern Canada. Practical experience has shown that to keep pace with the upsurge in northern development, and also to meet the diversified needs of the north, greater flexibility is required in road construction policy.

Under the new policy, four categories of development roads will be recognized. There are area development roads, which open up relatively undeveloped regions, and mine development roads, which serve an area where two or more mining companies have made substantial progress toward large scale production. These will be financed entirely by the federal government. Mine access roads which serve the property of one mining company capable of achieving production on a large enough scale to warrant federal assistance will be financed two thirds by the federal government and one third by the company concerned. This parallels similar arrangements existing in the provinces under the roads to resources program.

The former policy made no provision for tote roads or trails. These are low standard roads, built to provide temporary, seasonal, or year round access to the property of an individual company to bring in supplies or equipment for exploration, development or small scale production. To meet this special need parliament will be asked to approve annual grants in the amount of $50,000 to each territorial government, from which the territories may assist the companies concerned.

The new policy will provide assistance in the development of a number of mining prospects which are of great importance to the Northwest Territories, the Yukon and Canada as a whole.

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, before I comment on the statement made by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, perhaps you would allow me to say a few words on a question of privilege, shall I say. In the past three months there were times when I had serious doubts of ever returning to this house. As hon. members know, cancer is a very emotional word. At the same time, I feel I have come through dark days and am now back in the house to stay for some time.

I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, and through you the Prime Minister, the leader of my party, the leader of the C.C.F. and all other members of the house and their wives for what they have done for me and my family over the past few months. I am sure it had a great deal to do with my being here today.

At this time I should also like to express my sincere gratitude to my physician and surgeon, the staff of the Civic hospital and the doctors and staff of the Ontario cancer foundation. They treated me royally. They have done all they can and all I can do now is hope. I also want to express my sincere thanks to the staff of the House of Commons and members of the press gallery. I am sure that each and every one of my many friends in the house, along with my friends from coast to coast and the people of my riding, who sent me cards, letters and telegrams with words of encouragement and who offered their prayers for me have had a great deal to do with my recovery.

As a matter of fact, the other day I was feeling fairly good and I paid a visit to a woman I had met in the hospital a year ago. She told me about an old fellow of about 80 or 85 who lived near her. She said, "Everybody around here is praying for him to live and he should be dead". She said, "I told them to lay off". You know, this business of prayer snowballs. She said, "There is real power in prayer". Before I left she said to me, "Do you want me to put you on my list for a few prayers?" I did not refuse, of course; I said, "If you have that kind of faith and a man who should not be here is here, I would be happy to be on your list".

I also wish to thank my wife who spent many hours waiting at bus stops on her way to and from the hospital to visit me once or twice every day. I say again, ladies and gentlemen of the House of Commons, that I am glad to be back, and I want to thank each and every one of you from the bottom of my heart. I do not think words can express the feelings I have for each of you.

With regard to the statement made by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, I am sure the people of the north will be very happy to hear of the new policy on development roads which will provide more flexibility with respect to companies that find ore, in the building of roads to their properties. I am sure the people of the north will agree with me today when I say that I am very happy to have heard the statement of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it is very obvious indeed from the applause that all members of the house rejoice at the return of the hon. member for Mackenzie River to the house after a lengthy and severe illness. I am sure we all admire his excellent spirit and courage, and hope he will soon be restored to such health that we shall have no hesitation in criticizing him as usual when we differ. I think it was a happy coincidence that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources should have made his announcement today. Knowing him, I judge it was a very kindly gesture.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the management of Canadian National Railways advised as follows:

1. No final decision has been reached with respect to proposed new design and colours for new locomotive and passenger cars, although certain experiments are now being conducted. A model of a locomotive in new colour is depicted on the cover of the 1961 timetable. New design and lettering for box cars was approved in November, 1960.

2. There has been no significant change in the cost of repainting box cars. Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. There have been failures encountered in the normal course of operating diesel locomotives which involve, to some degree, the overheating of locomotive components.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this question seeks a good deal of information which is not available here in Ottawa and which will have to be secured elsewhere. 1. Yes.

2. The Combines Investigation Act makes it clear that it was the intention of parliament that any inquiry by the director is to be conducted in private and that any report or statement of material prepared by him is restricted to use in proceedings b fore the commission. This is because a statement prepared by the director is not necessarily conclusive of the facts and conclusions disclosed therein with respect to parties who may be involved in the inquiry, and it is parliament's intention that opportunities should be given to persons who may be affected by the statement to make representations to the commission presenting their explanations and points of view before any official finding or report is made public.

I am informed that on receipt of the volume of material compiled by the director, the commission invited submissions and representations from drug firms from which the director had received information, from trade organizations, public health and welfare groups and from other organizations and individuals who might be expected to be interested in the matters involved in the inquiry.

The commission desired to obtain in this way all possible additional information and views which would be of assistance to the commission in considering the director's report and conducting any hearings arising out of it.

The volume containing the material compiled by the director has not been published by the commission, but in order to assist in the preparation of submissions copies of the document have been made available to the interested parties for this purpose.

Any publicity given to the material contained in the director's statement must therefore have originated from some person who had received a copy from the commission for the purpose of preparing submissions. This is unfortunate, but does not relieve me from the obligation of maintaining privacy.

The statement of the director and the submissions of interested persons are in due course, under the scheme of the act, made the subject of a full report by the commission to the Minister of Justice, and at that stage that report, which contains all the relevant information, is made public.

I consider, therefore, that disclosure of the names and addresses of persons to whom copies of the statement have been supplied, at a time when the proceedings before the commission have not been ordered by the chairman to be conducted in public, would be a violation of the principle of privacy. I must therefore take the position that the information requested by the hon. member cannot properly be disclosed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

COMBINES BRANCH REPORT ON NEW DRUGS

Motion No. 113—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of the statement of evidence by the combines investigation branch regarding the selling and pricing policies of certain pharmaceutical houses in respect of new types of drugs.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as I said previously in answer to the starred question to which I have just replied, the whole tenor and provisions of the Combines Investigation Act make it clear that it is the intention of parliament that proceedings and inquiries by the director under the act should be conducted in private. All relevant information is contained in the commission's report when that is compiled, and that of course is made public.

In the circumstances the house will appreciate that I am unable to accept the motion for the production of the statement of material of the director.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member prepared to drop the motion?

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): No, Mr. Speaker. Part of this has been made public already, and if the act does not prohibit part of it being made public, I think the whole works should be made public.

TRANSPORT

SOULANGES CANAL—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL DISPOSAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport whether he has reached an arrangement with the government of the province of Quebec with regard to the Soulanges canal?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in a letter to the minister of game and fisheries of the province of Quebec, I have offered, on behalf of the federal government, a property about 13 miles in length along the Soulanges canal. In addition, we have set aside a certain area for industrial construction. I cannot say exactly how many acres are involved, but it extends about one mile along the canal. However, this proposal has been turned down by the provincial government, so we are now reconsidering the whole question.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question? Since the discussions were started between the two governments, have any industrial corporations approached the government with a view to locating plants in the area set aside by the minister?

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Balcer: Not directly, Mr. Speaker, but a number of chambers of commerce in the area have made representations to have this federal government property set aside so they may have time to approach various industries with a view to bringing industrial construction into the area.

NEWFOUNDLAND—FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN EAST COAST AND MAINLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Trinity-Conception referred to an article in the St. John's Daily News in which I am quoted as stating that the question of a ferry service to the east coast of Newfoundland is still under study. As I stated some days ago in reply to a question by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria, the report of the interdepartmental committee on this matter is now under study, but in reply to the second part of the hon. member's question I cannot say at the present time when it is expected that the study will be completed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BANKING AND COMMERCE—INQUIRY AS TO NEXT SITTING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member for York North who acts as chairman of the banking and commerce committee. Can he tell the house—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member proceeds, I think I should ask him for his authority for putting a question to a private member in his capacity as chairman of a committee. Standing order 39 (1) provides:

Questions may be placed on the order paper seeking information from ministers of the crown relating to public affairs; and from other members, relating to any bill, motion, or other public matter connected with the business of the house, in which such members may be concerned.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the matter about which I was about to pose a question to the distinguished member for York North had to do with a public matter of concern to this house. Your Honour has asked for the precedent. I would think the rule to which Your Honour has just referred would be my authority. Your Honour will recall that last year a similar question was put by me to the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Small), a very distinguished member of the industrial relations committee, which has not functioned at all this year; nor did it last year, in spite of the fact that it has one of the most efficient chairmen. That question was permitted last year. It had to do with whether the chairman would call that committee together so we could study the matter of unemployment. The question was permitted. If it was permitted last year, it ought to be permitted this year. The standing order to which Your Honour has referred is ample authority for my question. I am sure the hon. member is very anxious to reply.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member should put the question and then we can determine whether it is a matter of public business of the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member for York North, the chairman of the banking and commerce committee, when that committee will hold its next sitting, and will that sitting be before the Minister of Finance brings in the budget?

Mr. C. A. Cathers (York North): Mr. Speaker, I shall take this question as notice.

COMBINES—REFERENCE OF SUBJECT MATTER OF MERGERS TO BANKING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the large number of mergers which have taken place recently in the financial, banking and industrial fields, and in view of the statement made by the minister in the banking and commerce committee last year when it was reviewing the merger sections of the Combines Investigation Act, is it the intention of the minister to introduce a motion in the house to refer either the subject matter of the merger sections of the Combines Investigation Act or the sections themselves to the banking and commerce committee for study?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): This suggestion has not been considered, Mr. Speaker, in the course of our studies of this question.

SHIPPING

INGONISH HARBOUR, N.S.—REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF ICEBREAKER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, as the result of several communications from the area concerned I have a question for the Minister of Transport, notice of which has been given. Can the minister advise whether it would be possible to have an icebreaker go to Ingonish harbour, thus enabling the fishermen of this area to commence fishing operations which have been prevented up to this date because of unusual ice conditions?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the department has no icebreaker small enough and at the same time powerful enough to go and clear this harbour. If we were to send a large icebreaker into this narrow harbour it would involve too dangerous an undertaking, I would say.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): On Thursday, April 27 I posed a question to the Secretary of State, as shown on page 4047 of Hansard. It reads as follows:

> I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. As the minister is absent, perhaps my question could be drawn to his attention. This is almost the five months' anniversary of an order of this house pertaining to a question of mine about the travelling expenses of members of the cabinet. I wonder whether the Secretary of State would look into this matter and see why there has been this delay in complying with the order.

It was answered by the Minister of Transport, who indicated that he would pass on the information to the Secretary of State. Is the minister now in a position to answer my question?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): It is in the course of preparation, and I will produce it as soon as possible.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he can explain how he can provide an answer, as he did today, to starred question 268, and not provide by this time an answer to starred question 264, which he made an order for return two weeks ago, since a great deal of the information is overlapping.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answers to both 264 and 265 are being filed today.

TRADE

GRAIN—SOURCE OF STERLING TO FINANCE CHINESE PURCHASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, in the unavoidable absence of the Minister of Agriculture I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister assure the house that no part of the sterling that communist China is using to pay for its purchase of Canadian wheat was confiscated by the government of red China from British or other foreign nationals as alleged in a letter to the editor in this morning's Gazette?

An hon. Member: Sour grapes again.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not read the particular letter. However, naturally such assurances cannot be given by this government, since it is no part of its responsibility.

BARBITURATES—INQUIRY AS TO CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (St. Henry): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice. Could he tell us whether amendments will be made to the Criminal Code during the present session in order to control the traffic of goofballs?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member kindly repeat his question?

Mr. Lessard: Could the minister tell us whether amendments to the Criminal Code will be introduced during the present session in order to control the traffic of goofballs?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I believe that my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) will be making a statement shortly on this subject.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUCLEAR DISARMAMENT—REPORTED INSTRUCTIONS TO MILITIA FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister assure the house that units of the Canadian militia have not been instructed by their commanding officers to organize groups to take political and other action against the supporters of nuclear disarmament, as alleged in a letter to the editor signed by Farley Mowat of Palgrave, Ontario, which was published in the Ottawa Citizen on April 22, 1961?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to state categorically that no such instructions have been issued from national defence headquarters, nor is there any intention of so doing. Moreover, the issuance of instructions along the lines suggested in the letter by any commanding officer of a militia unit would be contrary to regulations.

The writer of the letter, in his search for publicity, has on more than one occasion in the past resorted to innuendos and insinuations and has made allegations that have proven to be utterly false. One of the latest of these was his allegation that nuclear weapons were stored at United States bases in Canada.

AIRPORTS

DORVAL—PROVISION OF PUBLIC TRANSPORTATION SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I regret that he has not received notice. Is the government contemplating the establishment of a public transportation system inside the monstrosity known as the new airport terminal at Montreal?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

BATHURST—DALHOUSIE, N.B.—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the government decided to build a runway at Bathurst and at Dalhousie, New Brunswick?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, delegations from both communities came here to meet with officials of my department, and asked how the Department of Transport could help them, since these are municipal airports. We gave them the necessary information and we are now waiting for their requests.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister intend to make a statement soon about this matter?

Mr. Balcer: As soon as authorities of either of the two municipalities will again have got in touch with the department and indicated their intentions, there is no doubt that the Department of Transport will take those requests into serious consideration.

TELEVISION

SASKATOON—RECOMMENDATION OF BOARD OF GOVERNORS RESPECTING LOCATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate inquired concerning a recent recommendation of the board of broadcast governors regarding the establishment of a new rebroadcasting or satellite television station in Saskatchewan.

The board of broadcast governors, at its eighteenth public hearing held on April 11, 12 and 13, 1961, in Ottawa, recommended to the Minister of Transport for approval an application for a licence to establish a new rebroadcasting or satellite television station at Stranraer, Saskatchewan, by A. A. Murphy and Sons Limited, to operate as a satellite of station CFQC-TV, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan. The board gave the following reasons for the approval:

> The board is satisfied that the proposed satellite station will extend a satisfactory service into a substantial area of southwestern Saskatchewan. The board makes this recommendation subject to the condition that the applicant submits to the Department of Transport a satisfactory revised technical brief providing for a suitably designed directional antenna which will reduce the radiation in the southern sector of the coverage area of the proposed station in the direction of station CJFB-TV, Swift Current.

In response to the board's recommendation, the department has now received a technical brief which is considered to be technically acceptable and is being referred to the board of broadcast governors in accordance with section 12 of the Broadcasting Act. There have been no irregularities in the procedures followed by the Department of Transport.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can give the house any information regarding reports of the successful efforts to arrive at a cease fire in the Laotian situation; and in that event can the minister say what will be the attitude of the international supervisory commission in connection therewith?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, orders to cease all military operations from eight o'clock this morning, May 3, local time, have been issued to the Pathet-Lao and Kong Lae forces in Laos. The forces under the command of the government in Vientiane had earlier indicated their readiness to give a similar order to their troops.

The appeal for a cease fire, which was made by the United Kingdom and Soviet governments on April 24 as co-chairmen of the Geneva conference of 1954, thus appears to have been answered. The difficult task of restoring order and ensuring that the cease fire is observed should now begin.

The international commission for Laos, on which, as the hon. member knows, India, Poland and Canada are serving, agreed on April 30 on the report which it was requested to make to the co-chairmen, the United Kingdom and the Soviet union, and this report was immediately dispatched through Indian diplomatic channels to London and Moscow. The commission is now ready to proceed to Laos, with the concurrence of the co-chairmen, in order to undertake its tasks of verification and supervision. I have as yet had no indication that the two co-chairmen have instructed the commission to proceed to Laos, but I should think such instructions would be given within a matter of hours. If a cease fire is established and is shown to be effective, I see no reason why the conference should not open as planned at Geneva on May 12.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Has the minister any comment to make about the statement by the king of Laos that it was not in the interests of his country that the conference should take place, and that it might play into the hands of the Chinese communists?

Mr. Green: There is some uncertainty whether the report of the statement by the king was accurate. We have as yet had no definite word that that position actually was taken by him.

CUBA—REPORTED CLOSING OF RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether his attention has been directed to the statement by Premier Castro and the government of Cuba that they are going to close all religious institutions in that country, including some that are owned by and under the control of clergymen and congregations from this country.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the statement made by Premier Castro did not go so far as to indicate that this new rule would apply to any Canadians. We think it is intended to apply to the Spanish born clergy in Cuba. I do not believe it would be appropriate to speculate on the manner in which Canadian missionaries in Cuba may be affected by this contemplated legislation until more is known about its provisions. As I have said, however, I believe that the intention was to apply the new policy to the Spanish born clergy.

There are at the moment 46 Canadian Catholic priests and 64 Canadian nuns in Cuba, and we are endeavouring to get this whole question cleared up as quickly as possible.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the numerous and varying conjectures since the minister replied to the hon. member for Winnipeg South the other day as to the probable date of the presentation of the budget, can the minister now be more specific as to the likely date of presentation?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

ROUYN, QUE.—APPEARANCE OF NEW POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Levis yesterday as to complaints about the Rouyn, Quebec, post office, may I say that complaints have been received by the department. The appearance of the building will be improved by the removal of a construction shack and the contractor's signs. Also, efflorescence on the brickwork will be removed, and a general cleaning up around the building will be carried out.

SASKATCHEWAN

RESERVATION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING MINING CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that he informed the house last week that he intends to make a statement as to the government's position with respect to the reservation of certain legislation by the lieutenant governor of Saskatchewan, would the Prime Minister tell the house when he will relieve us of the suspense from which we now suffer?

[Mr. Green.]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can understand the suspense of the hon. gentleman, representing a British Columbia constituency, and I hope his suspense will be relieved shortly because I do not want to leave him in such a position of uncertainty.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

394. Departmental administration, including fees for membership in the international organizations listed in the details of the estimates (also includes the national industrial design council transferred from the national gallery), $3,275,445.

The Chairman: This item will be found at page 74 of the blue book, the details at page 507.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, when we reached five o'clock on Friday the hon. member for Athabasca was speaking. He has very kindly agreed to let me speak now in order to answer questions that were put to me by the hon. members who spoke that afternoon.

Before doing so, however, I should first like to clear up a misunderstanding which my opening remarks seem to have left in the minds of some of the hon. members who followed me in the debate, namely that I seem to believe that the economic picture is a rosy one and that all we have to do is continue in our present way of doing things and everything will work out for the best.

If I left that impression, Mr. Chairman, I am glad to be able to correct it now. In the speeches I have been making across the country since I became the minister of this department I have been stressing the fact that this country is up against the toughest competition for markets that we have faced since before the last war, and that we must do things a great deal differently than we are doing them at the present time if we are to successfully meet and overcome that competition.

This situation was brought about by the recovery of the countries of western Europe and Japan which were until recently customers of our products, and are now our toughest competitors. They have rebuilt their economies with the most modern plants and machinery, and are manufacturing products of good quality and design and selling at competitive prices. These products are displacing Canadian products, both in Canada and in the export market, in increasing quantities.

We have learned that there is no sentiment in the buying habits of the average Canadian or of the citizen of any other country, for that matter. He or she will buy the best product at the lowest price, no matter where the goods are produced. If we want to make sales and thereby create jobs replacing the products that move off the retailers' shelves, we can do so only by producing products that people prefer to those offered by our competitors. They must be comparable in price, quality and design with what our competitors are offering for sale. If they are comparable, they will be sold in the markets of the world and in Canada, and Canadians will have jobs replacing them. If they are not comparable, they will be passed over and Canadians will not have jobs producing more of them.

Our trade commissioners told the businessmen who came to our trade promotion conference last fall that if they would come to their territories with samples of good quality and design, and willing to quote competitive prices, they would guarantee them sales. Surely you cannot get a better offer than that. Those who have made such selling trips and have taken good samples and quoted competitive prices, have made sales, and good sales; their plants have been kept busy and they have taken on extra staff to handle the extra business.

Sales have not materialized where quality, price and design were not competitive. There have also been many instances where the selling effort was not carried through by the company concerned. I am writing a personal letter of inquiry to the heads of all companies that have not followed through after prospective sales were initiated at the sales promotion conference, to ask why this has happened and urge that the selling effort be carried through.

Our trade commissioners will do everything humanly possible to promote sales, and they made that very clear to the businessmen who attended the conference. But the company must either send its salesman to the territory or, at the very least, send the samples and price lists that are needed for our trade commissioners to make the initial approach. As I have said, in all too many cases neither has been done.

In addition to putting forward a first class selling effort, it is up to our producers to turn out products that our salesmen can sell. The greatest salesman in the world cannot sell a product that is demonstrably inferior in design or quality, or obviously not worth the money that is asked for it. We must match what our competitors are offering the customers. I believe that the best way to make our products competitive is to follow the example of our toughest competitors, who brought themselves from the ashes of war to peak prosperity and employment in just 15 short years. They did it by co-operation among management, labour and government, to bring costs down and improve quality and design.

It was to help bring about this kind of co-operation here in Canada that we recently called together the heads of the top 15 labour unions and the heads of the 15 largest management organizations. This group can have a great influence on those they represent, to bring about this desired result; but it will be up to the great mass of our people to decide that in their own best interests they should co-operate with their fellow Canadians to make our products competitive, and thus able to sell in the export and home market and provide jobs for our people. If they so decide, and get to work on the big job that lies ahead and give our salesmen products which will meet with customer acceptance around the world, then both our domestic and export sales will greatly increase.

The result can be full employment, and not the second highest but the highest standard of living in the world. But it is up to us, the people of Canada, to decide what we are willing to work for and whether we are willing to co-operate with each other to bring about the desired result. Surely we are willing to work as hard, and surely we are just as smart, as the people of western Europe who pulled themselves up by their own bootstraps in such spectacular fashion. I am confident that our people are more industrious, and are smarter, than the people of western Europe or any other part of the world, for that matter. The government has indicated clearly to our salesmen and our producers that we will work with them and help them in every possible and practical way in the big and very tough job that lies ahead. The time to start working together is now.

Some hon. members who spoke on Friday and in the debate last Monday and Tuesday expressed concern about the effects that the European economic community and the European free trade association would have on our trade with those countries. I share the concern of hon. members regarding the dangers to Canadian trade which could be inherent in the development of the European regional trading blocs, the Six and the Seven. Should the ultimate shape of these regional trading blocs eventually evolve in an inward-looking or protectionist trading form, then a backward step will have been taken in the progress of international trade. It is too soon yet to arrive at firm conclusions, although the final shape of our trading arrangements with western Europe is gradually taking recognizable form in the current negotiations at Geneva. Nor do we yet know for certain what ultimate decision will be taken by the government of the United Kingdom concerning its future relationship with the European common market. This, too, is receiving and will continue to receive our closest attention in the weeks and months ahead.

These problems are under close and continuous study both in my department and interdepartmentally. Until our judgment dictates otherwise, this government will continue to follow a trading policy designed to expand trade with all countries to the greatest possible degree, and in so doing create the greatest possible employment for all Canadians.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I am glad to once again assure the committee that if at any time my department and I consider that it is in the best interests not only of those engaged in export trade but of the Canadian economy as a whole for Canada to join a trading bloc or association, I will recommend such a course of action to my colleagues.

I should now like to answer the questions which were asked of me last Friday. First of all, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo referred to our trade with the West Indies. I may say that the department is very conscious of the importance of our long standing ties with these territories whose economies are so complementary to our own. The newly emerging West Indian federation is our nearest neighbour in the commonwealth. In recent years it has taken about $40 million of Canadian goods annually, making it our fourth or fifth largest commonwealth market. The West Indies buy from us such staple commodities as flour, salt, cod and lumber, and a wide range of manufactured goods. Our main purchase from them is of course sugar, but we buy also such products as bauxite, petroleum, spices, cocoa and rum.

The department has given a great deal of attention to the West Indies in its trade promotion efforts. In January and February, 1959 we sponsored two highly successful trade fairs at Kingston, Jamaica, and Port-of-Spain, Trinidad. About 150 Canadian firms participated in one or other of these fairs, and it is estimated that they resulted in the creation of over $2 million of new export business. During our trade promotion conference last December the West Indies was one of the areas in which businessmen showed most interest. Of the 1,133 firms represented at the conference, 340 or almost one third expressed an interest in the West Indies. Our four trade officers in the area are now following up these interviews, and we hope there will be a significant increase in our export activity in that market.

[Mr. Hees.]

We have been watching very closely the progress which is being made in the West Indies toward a customs union of the ten territories making up the federation. These territories have now reached broad agreement on plans for a customs union and will be submitting them soon to an intergovernmental conference for approval. When the West Indies have advanced sufficiently far with their own preparations for a customs union it will be necessary to revise the existing Canada-West Indies trade agreement of 1926, which provides for different margins of preference in the various territories. Meanwhile the department is proceeding with its own preparatory work so that it will be ready for this negotiation when the appropriate time arrives.

I was asked a question by the hon. member for Vancouver East regarding exports of sawn lumber to Japan. It may be that the figures he quoted apply to the individual exporter in British Columbia to whom he refers. However, export statistics show that Canadian shipments of sawn lumber to Japan have never reached 10 per cent of our total lumber exports over the past 35 years.

The chief reason for this is the fact that Japan has emerged as a leading world producer of lumber, ranking third only to the United States and Russia in total lumber output. Since the war Japanese lumber imports from all sources have been largely displaced by imports of logs and other round materials, principally from the Philippines. The total Japanese market for lumber has shown a marked decline in the post-war period and is currently running at some 40 million to 50 million board feet. By contrast, in the late 1920's Canadian lumber shipments alone to that market averaged nearly 200 million board feet.

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm reviewed in detail the changing scene in regard to measurement throughout the world. Some countries which are large world traders have moved to the metric system and, additionally, others which are reaching increasing stature as traders have made the same decision. Any decision by Canada in this connection must, however, be governed by the situation as it exists. As Minister of Trade and Commerce I regret, as does the hon. member, those instances where Canadian manufacturers have lost specific orders by reason of the factor of measurement entering into design. We must face the facts of life, however. If precipitate action were taken to change to the metric system our losses in our major markets, the United Kingdom and the United States, would create far greater hardships. I believe that the hon. member recognized this in his remarks.

While it does not appear, I think all will appreciate that the metric system is, and for many years has been, a legal system in Canada. There is therefore no reason why manufacturers and exporters should not use that system should it meet particular needs. To go further at this time and legislate or encourage a change would have so many ramifications that it would be extremely difficult to recommend a course of action without a formal review.

I am impressed with the joint report of the British association for the advancement of science and the association of British chambers of commerce, which suggested that this question should be reviewed periodically by the board of trade in conjunction with industry and commerce and in conjunction with the commonwealth and the United States of America. The stated object of the review would be "to study jointly significant world developments in the usage of metric and non-metric standards...". I shall be glad to examine the situation to determine whether the time is now opportune to institute a similar review for Canada.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont asked me to explain what he thought was a conflict between the figures for the number of persons receiving unemployment benefits and the figures for the number of unemployed as given by the dominion bureau of statistics. The decision to use the figures we are now using was made after very careful study by the committee on unemployment statistics. I am sending across to the hon. member a copy of the report of that committee in the event that he may not be familiar with it. If, after he has had an opportunity to study it, he has any further questions, I shall be glad to speak to him about them and do anything I can to keep him informed.

During the discussion of my estimates on Friday the hon. member for Kootenay West asked several questions. He indicated that he was rather intrigued by the title of my department, namely trade and commerce, and suggested that he would like to have some explanation. I have looked up these words in dictionaries and find little difference in the definitions of the words "trade" and "commerce". As the department received its name many years before I was born, I am not sure just what was in the minds of those who named it originally.

The second question which the hon. member for Kootenay West asked was what is being done to develop co-operation among the various sectors of the economy to work toward improving our competitive position. In March the Minister of Labour and I called together 15 leaders of business organizations and associations and 15 leaders of organized labour to discuss ways in which greater co-operation could be developed to increase the competitiveness of Canadian industry in both domestic and export markets. A very successful meeting was held, and the decision was made to establish a continuing tripartite committee in order to achieve greater co-operation.

Through the national productivity council, representatives of industry, labour, the general public and the government are also working together to develop programs to increase the competitiveness of Canadian industry. Similarly, the national design council will be made up of representatives of the various sectors of the economy. These steps have been taken so that all the various groups in the economy can unite their efforts and work together in improving the position of Canadian industry in markets both at home and abroad. I am sure that working together in this way we can achieve the same successful results as have the countries of Europe.

The hon. member for Kootenay West asked what efforts would be made by my department to achieve success in the export of various commodities to China and other Asiatic countries, apart from wheat. Our trade commissioner in Hong Kong has been very active in extending assistance to Canadian businessmen seeking contacts with the national trading corporations of the government of communist China which might be concerned with imports from Canada. As a result of his efforts, coupled with those of energetic Canadian businessmen, there has been quite a satisfactory improvement in the sale to communist China of our staple commodities. Exports to communist China for 1960 reached $8,700,000 as compared with $1,700,000 in the previous year.

As far as the other Asiatic countries are concerned, we have very active trade commissioner offices in Tokyo, Manila, Singapore, New Delhi, Bombay and Karachi. Our trade commissioners at these offices cover not only the country in which the office is located. Their territories also include contiguous countries and territories to which they travel and on which they report regularly. In this way our trade promotion efforts cover the whole of Asia.

The hon. member for Kootenay West also asked whether there had been any incidents involving Canadian subsidiaries refusing to accept orders from China or other Soviet bloc countries on instructions from the United States parent company, or because this was against the policy of the United States government. I can only say that there have been no such incidents brought to my attention.

The hon. gentleman's fifth question was, has the minister read of the proposals by Dr. Keenleyside and has he given them his careful study and attention? If so, will he inform the committee as to his opinion of their practical nature and of the possibility, as a result of the application of Dr. Keenleyside's proposals, of improving somewhat our position with respect to trade and commerce in Canada and consequently the unemployment situation.

Mr. Speaker, the proposals to which the hon. member refers have been drawn to my attention, and you may be assured that these, as well as other proposals, have been given consideration. Our policy is to have maximum trade in every commodity in every possible market to provide maximum employment for Canadians. The hon. member may be assured that any practical proposals which achieve these ends will appear in our trade policy program.

The hon. member also asked for some explanation of the work of the small business branch and for information about the type of inquiries received and the publicity material it has available. Two projects of some significance presently under way in the small business branch are: (1) the compilation of the results of a survey of Canadian universities which was made to determine what management educational courses are now available, the dates and duration of these courses, and the fees charged. When this compilation is completed the results will be forwarded to the universities for checking and, eventually, more widespread distribution. This is part of a plan for stimulating interest in work now being done in this field and for helping in the further promotion of such work where the demand exists. (2) "Taxation Statistics", published by the Department of National Revenue, is being examined in cooperation with that department with a view to producing a supplement which will provide financial statistics in greater industry and size detail for the benefit of small businesses.

Apart from the publication "Selling to the Canadian Government", recently published by the small business branch, and the other two publications just mentioned which, incidentally, are available to hon. members, the small business branch has been able to cover requests for general information on other subjects from existing publications of the Department of Trade and Commerce, including the dominion bureau of statistics, other federal and provincial departments and outside sources.

Requests for information through interviews, telephone calls and correspondence have numbered in the thousands. These queries are for all types of information on government legislation and regulations as well as for sources of information on markets, financing, starting a new business, etc. There is little pattern to these requests, and there are no so-called typical examples. Many are answered by the small business branch; others are referred to appropriate sources in other departments and agencies. The branch performs a useful clearing house function in this respect.

Numerous business associations contact the small business branch about more general problems, particularly in the field of financing. The branch plays an important part in co-operation with other departments of government in the preparation of background information for the framing of legislation in the whole area of the financing of small business.

In reply to a request from the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador that I should take a sympathetic look at the fish industry in Canada, and particularly at the salt codfish industry, my department, through our fisheries division, has been very active in the field of trade promotion of Canadian fisheries products. Our trade commissioners around the globe report regularly on conditions in their respective areas for the information of the fishing industry. These market analyses are also followed up by on the spot appraisals by head office personnel who, in turn, maintain very close liaison with individual members of the trade. In addition, an interdepartmental fisheries trade committee, which includes senior officials in all government departments concerned with fisheries, meets at regular intervals to consider ways and means of assisting the fishing industry. When necessary, the manager of the Fisheries Council of Canada is invited to attend these meetings.

With respect to the salt cod industry, may I say that this matter is presently receiving very careful attention, particularly in view of the difficulties which the trade is encountering in marketing salt cod in Cuba. A fisheries expert of the department has visited different European markets twice in the past year, and a report of his findings was made recently to the Fisheries Council of Canada. I should add that the findings are very much more encouraging for the fresh frozen trade than for the salt trade. The position of the latter industry has been impaired by the difficulties which the industry is encountering in the Cuban market for salt cod. The situation is being kept under continuing scrutiny.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, at five o'clock on Friday afternoon I was speaking about the development of our great oil reserves in the Athabasca tar sands and their significance in the planning of Canada's future, and perhaps to the security of the western world. One of the essential steps in the development of this area would be the construction of a road between Fort McMurray and Edmonton.

You may wonder why I bring up the question of a road in respect to the Department of Trade and Commerce, but I do so because the provision of transportation facilities is very essential in keeping the cost of our materials down. If we cannot move them from the point of production to the markets we cannot compete in world trade. Today in our very complicated economy the various departments of government must have full co-operation. It is not good enough for the Department of Trade and Commerce to bring forward a plan to extend our trade unless it is done with the co-operation of the Department of Transport in order to develop roads, railways, air transportation facilities and shipping facilities. Therefore I do not hesitate today in bringing to the attention of the minister and the officials of his department, the suggestion that there must be co-operation in the provision of transportation facilities. The officials of the one department must co-operate with those of another. There must be co-operation between the Department of Transport and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, in order to provide a road of some kind in this tremendous industrial field.

I was heartened to hear the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources say this morning that his department was ready to broaden the scope of the roads to resources program. The bottleneck seems to be that the provinces are either unable or unwilling to expend the money necessary to build roads across vast districts such as mine where populations are very small, and where there is no industrial development at the present time. Perhaps this is because the funds are not available at this time, but I am afraid if we wait for the Alberta provincial government to take this step we will be waiting a long time. I think we should stop being shy, and that the federal government should take the initiative in some of these fields. The north country cannot be developed unless we can get into it from the south. In the area from which I come there is a stretch of about 300 miles where there are no roads, railways or other facilities for transportation.

Our vision of the north certainly will not come to fruition unless we take positive steps. The people there are not afraid to take a chance on the future and they have not lost time. There is very little unemployment there. Everyone is working hard and there is room for literally hundreds of thousands of people. If we accept the challenge and take the initiative, showing them we are really behind them in developing this country, I am certain the people will act accordingly.

Assuming we have a road we will then need capital to develop the area. I would suggest that capital should be made available perhaps through the industrial bank to what I refer to as the "in between" businesses. We now have the power of assisting small businesses to the extent of $25,000 for the improvement of their capital program. It is perhaps possible for very large companies to look after their own financial needs. The government has also made it possible for quite large companies to get loans from the industrial bank in some cases to the extent of $500,000. That is a lot of money, but presumably the security behind such a company, in stocks, is such that our government is willing to make this money available. However, there are a vast number of Canadian businessmen in the in between range who need money to set up local industries throughout our local areas, and I would make a plea on their behalf, that this government seriously consider widening the powers of the industrial bank in order to assist these businessmen in the medium category by making available loans between $25,000 and $100,000.

I would further suggest that we should get behind the local automotive repair shops and the larger garages throughout eastern and western Canada, enabling them to expand and hire local labour to repair automobiles and farm machinery in the small towns and villages where the breakdowns occur. I would like to see loans made available—

The Chairman: Order. I must inform the hon. member that I do not see how he can relate his present remarks to the Department of Trade and Commerce. The hon. member has been dealing with the development of national resources; with roads to resources which are a matter under the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources; and he has mentioned the industrial bank, which is a matter under the Department of Finance. I doubt that his remarks can be related to the items under discussion.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, I have had personal experience in attempting to raise loans through the industrial bank for trade purposes, as a result of which I would suggest close co-operation is required with the Department of Trade and Commerce. I would go so far as to suggest that the industrial bank should either be controlled by the Department of Trade and Commerce or that at least there should be high ranking liaison officers operating between that bank and the Department of Trade and Commerce so that when an individual makes an application to the bank for a loan for trade purposes he does not meet with the blank statement that it is a matter to be directed to the Department of Finance. There must be co-operation between the senior officials of the various departments so that, during the hearing of an application for a loan, officials of the different departments could sit in to give advice and make a joint effort to assist these medium businessmen. We will never have liaison of the kind I am referring to, which I feel is essential, because money alone is not enough, if we do not take a step in that direction. The bottleneck in Canadian development has always been finance. It is very difficult to discuss transportation, trade or co-operation with the provinces for the development of our resources unless you concentrate upon and discuss the sacred cow of finance.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask the minister to comment on the foreign service personnel. As I mentioned the other day, I understand that some of his best and most highly trained men are leaving the service to take over managerial posts in private industry. In view of what the minister said only today with respect to the problems facing Canada in the competitive field, and in view of what I read in the press a couple of days ago and the statement of the Minister of Agriculture that he thinks we have been missing great opportunities to trade with Asia, it should be easily understood and recognized at this time that perhaps more than ever we need trained foreign service officers.

I believe we have been losing some because of their wages. I admit I was rather amazed, on looking over the details on page 509 of the estimates book, to find that we have 30 foreign service officers whose annual wages are between $4,380 and $5,880; 23 between $5,940 and $7,140; and so on. I would imagine that any civil servant in the foreign service is a relatively well trained officer. There are four classifications before you get to the salary range of $9,800. If this is the range of salaries, I can well understand why we are losing these experienced men. It is of the utmost importance that they be retained in the service. Can the minister tell us what is the situation with respect to the retention of these trained men and whether or not it is the money factor which is driving them away?

Mr. Hees: I am glad to comment on that, Mr. Chairman. Morale among the trade commissioners is very high indeed, as I am pleased to say it is among the personnel of the department generally. It is inevitable that good men in the government service are lured away from time to time by business and industry. It is very regrettable that this is so because, as the hon. member said, in that way we lose very valuable men. We have lost two trade commissioners. I regret very much that this has happened. However, it is two out of several hundred people in that category employed by the department, all of whom are very able. Therefore the percentage of loss is not great. We would certainly prefer not to lose any. I agree with everything the hon. member says. It is to be regretted that any of these men are, as he said, lured away by business, but it always happens in the government service where we are limited in the amount of salaries that we can pay. When a man is outstanding he is often attracted away by a salary that the government cannot pay.

Once again I mention the fact that these are only two out of several hundred employees of that category. The morale in the department is very high and I think we loose relatively few of our good men.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, Canada's trouble in the matter of trade is that we buy too much abroad; we buy more than we sell. In 1959, Canada bought $369 million worth more abroad than she sold there. Besides this, there is an amount of something over $1 billion that the minister did not mention the other day that we have to meet in the balance of payments. This amount is made up of such things as the expenses of people travelling abroad and the amount that we have to pay in interest and dividends on foreign investments in Canada, and so on. Our total adverse balance last year was very close to $1.5 billion. If a merchant continues to buy more than he sells he will soon go bankrupt and out of business unless somebody lends him money, and this is precisely what has happened in Canada. The United States investors mainly have put up the difference. As Canadian money has poured forth to pay for purchases abroad investors from abroad have sent money into Canada and have made up the $1.5 billion difference in 1959.

Over the last number of years our imports have gone up relatively more than our exports, and we have a deficit balance of trade. Certainly in the last three or four years there has been a relative slow-down in our trade. However, I will say that in 1960 there was some improvement in our exports. They were up, as the minister said, some 5 per cent. Our deficit on merchandise account amounted to something under $100 million, I think about $97 million. This improvement was brought about by two things, by some decrease in the amount of our imports and also by an increase in exports mainly to Great Britain, to countries of the European common market and to Japan. This is largely offset by the decrease in our exports to the United States of 4.6 per cent.

For the last three months, the minister said, there has been a decrease of 17 per cent, compared with a year ago, in our total exports to the United States and 3 per cent in the total exports over all. According to the Globe and Mail of April 29, Canada's February trade deficit was $24.3 million. Our exports were down 13.5 per cent over all and to the United States by 19 per cent. It would seem to me that probably the Prime Minister has his proposal of the 15 per cent switch of trade almost within his grasp, except that our exports to the United Kingdom would need to go up 50 per cent from here in order to compensate for the 15 per cent cut-back in our exports to the United States.

During the course of last year I read several articles in the press, and I read some in the British press as well, complaining that Canada was not buying as much from Britain as we were selling there. I do not think we should try to switch any trade. We should not try to cut down our exports to any country. I was glad to hear the minister say today that he would try to sell in all parts of the world. At the time that the 15 per cent proposal appeared in the press we certainly got a bad press in the United States.

In 1957 when the Americans cut back the importation of crude oil into that country by exactly 15 per cent our oil exporters certainly were hurt, particularly those exporting oil to the northwestern United States. I have often wondered whether the Americans did not accommodate the Prime Minister by cutting back oil importations by 15 per cent.

A few years ago Canada was the third trading nation in the world and on a per capita basis the highest. Today we are the fifth trading nation in the world. In spite of the increases the minister told us about the other day, Canada is losing out relatively in world trade. According to the international financial statistics on world trade for April 1, 1961, Canada in the first nine months of 1960 had an increase of exports of 2.3 per cent compared with an increase in world exports of 9.3 per cent so that, relatively speaking, Canada is slipping in world trade.

The minister himself has said that 25 per cent of all Canadians depend on world trade for their jobs. Therefore there is a direct relationship between world trade and employment in this country. Unemployment at the present time stands at something over 11.1 per cent of our working force and in this respect we are worse off than any other country in the western free world. There is only one other country that comes anywhere near us in that regard and that is Italy with unemployment amounting to 9 per cent of its working force.

An hon. Member: Where did you get your figures?

Mr. McMillan: After all, our production costs are the deciding factor in the selling of our products in foreign markets. Anything that increases our costs will tend to keep us out of foreign markets. The fiscal policy of the government has contributed to higher production costs because we tax industry more than we did before. Our fiscal policy has also pushed up interest rates and money costs our producers more than it did before 1957. Industries also pay local and provincial taxes and we know that local and provincial taxes have gone up because of the increase in interest rates.

I want to commend the minister for his efforts in trying to sell our products on foreign markets. I wish him well but I think he as a member of the cabinet could do something about keeping down governmental costs in this country and certainly he could see that they do not rise more because of further financial manoeuvring. I should like him to remember that we have the highest unemployment in the western world and that we have lost our position in world trade, having slipped back at least one position from the time of the last administration. The minister should also remember that our per capita production is down nearly 1 per cent. We hear much about the European trading blocs such as the European common market or inner six and the European free trade area or outer seven. In the case of the inner six where free or freer trade is in operation between these countries, there has been a great increase in trade. According to the last figures I saw there had been an increase of 28 to 30 per cent in trade between them.

The United Kingdom is most likely to join one or other of these free trade areas, and I hope our ministers will cease issuing threats to the United Kingdom and the members of the European common market with regard to any steps they may take in this respect. I know that the Minister of Finance has denied these threats, but I have here a clipping from the Toronto Telegram of September 29, 1960, a newspaper which is never unfavourable to the government. The heading of the article is, "Keep Out or Else, Fleming Warns United Kingdom". It is a dispatch from London, England, and the first paragraph reads as follows:

> Canadian finance minister, Donald Fleming, today warned that any discrimination against Canadian goods resulting from Britain's entry into the European common market might be answered in kind by Canada.

If that is not a threat, I do not know what a threat is. I have several more clippings here concerning threats to Great Britain and to members of the European common market, even one or two by the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself. I do not think these threats do any good. They only tend to alienate our friends abroad. There was an article in the Financial Post of December 10 last by Mr. Clive Baxter headed, "In Europe They Say That Canada Overrates Her Own Importance". He quotes Mr. Hugo de Grood, head of the North American division in the directorate general for external relations at European common market headquarters, and also quotes others. Among the quotations was the following:

> You are going to have to live with us in the future, and to withdraw into an angry protective shell can only mean worse and worse trouble for your economy.

All I can say about that is that the author of those words must have heard one of the angry tirades of the Minister of Finance such as we often hear in the house and have long since learned to discount. With reference to the speech of the Minister of Finance the writer said:

> It is not encouraging to report, but impossible to ignore, that the speech seemed to worry nobody in Brussels.

He has reference to the headquarters of the European common market. Finally, in an interview Mr. de Grood had this to say:

> It seems to us that Canada overrates its own importance these days. We want to trade with you, but you must understand that if necessary we can get along without you.

The European countries are going to enter these trading blocs anyway so I do not think our ministers should be making public statements that only alienate them. Mr. George de Young, chairman of the productivity council, speaking in Toronto on Tuesday said in effect that all nations and blocs of nations are putting forth a highly organized effort to increase the economic status of their people. He also said that we are suffering as a result of this and that in Canada and the United States we have to get over the idea that we have a technological and economic superiority because in fact we do not possess it. I think there is an awakening among all groups in our population to the fact that we must become more competitive in world markets if we are to survive. We must have the co-operation of all groups in the community. Above all, we must have the co-operation of the government to keep costs down.

I remember that, a year or so ago when we had before us a bill increasing our subscription to the monetary fund and to the international bank, at that time I called the attention of the house to the fact that this bank would be lending money to develop industries in some of these countries at a rate lower than that at which our industries could borrow money in this country, and I said I thought that was unfair competition. That situation has come about. I have inquired about the interest rate that has been charged by the international monetary fund. I find that some of the industrialists in some of these countries have been able to build plants and to get new machinery and that they have been able to do that with money obtained at a cheaper rate than that at which our industrialists have been able to borrow money in Canada. They make products that come here to Canada in competition with our own domestic products.

I just want to refer briefly to agricultural exports. I was interested in reading lately that in the fiscal year 1959-60 our agricultural exports to the United States stood at $184 million, down 24 per cent from 1959 and 30 per cent below the 1952-54 average. Many fruit and vegetable growers in my part of the country are greatly interested in the marketing of their products. According to the November, 1960 issue of The Grower reference is made to our dealing with the United States in respect to fruits and vegetables under the heading "Imports are Up, Exports are Down". In the first six months of 1960 our imports of fruits and vegetables were up by $9 million to $76.3 million, indicating a figure of $150 million for the full year. At the same time our exports to the United States in fruit and vegetables were down by $500,000 in six months or by $1 million for a full year to about $13 million in fruits and vegetables alone. Therefore there is a net cost to Canada of at least $135 million in balance of payments. This is enough to wipe out our whole trade merchandise deficit and to have a surplus left over.

The hon. member for Vancouver East some time ago was referring to the deterioration of the fruit and vegetable production in British Columbia. At that time he said that a number of United States interests have come over and bought up certain of their processing plants and have cut down the opportunity for their producers in that part of the country to market their fruit as well as they did previously. That same thing happened in the Niagara district some two or three years ago. I heard about some United States interests coming over and buying some of the canning factories with the result that thereafter the fruit and vegetable growers had some difficulty in getting rid of their products. I think that the two senior governments—I refer to the federal government and the provincial governments—should co-operate in helping these producers to provide facilities for the processing of their fruits and vegetables in Canada. If Canadians could use more of these fruits and vegetables and could import less, it would help the Minister of Finance in his balance of payments.

I have here a list of imports of small fruits for the last four years. I find, for instance, that imports of apples hold about the same; strawberry imports are down somewhat but in respect of most of the other fruits imports have gone up markedly. That statement applies to apricots, peaches, plums, cherries and so on. Let us consider the situation with regard to peaches alone. Imports of peaches in 1957 amounted to 423,000 bushels while in 1960 the figure stood at 945,000 bushels or over double. No doubt in some years there is a poor crop but, generally speaking, if you look over this list of fruit imports, you will find that they are all going up year after year.

Our farmers must be able to sell their fruit and vegetables when they produce them. They have high local taxes. Their costs of production are high and their cost of living is high. The people of Canada should endeavour to help them because we shall at the same time be helping ourselves in that we shall be cutting down the balance of payments.

I often see in the press some reference to United States companies moving to Canada, taking as much as possible out of Canada and giving as little as possible in return. This is not true in my part of the country. One United States company I have in mind is the Atlas Steel Company. The Atlas Steel Company came to Welland some years ago. It was brought there by Mr. Davis who moved to Canada and made Canada his home. Several of the chief executives have taken an active part in local affairs and they contribute much to the industrial and cultural life of their adopted country and community.

Two men in this respect are outstanding in my district, and they are two among others. I will mention their names. One is Mr. Arthur Schmon, president of the Ontario Paper Company at Thorold and Baie Comeau. The other is Mr. George de Young, president of Atlas Steel Company in Welland. Both these men were born in the United States and they chose to make Canada their home. They have given leadership in some aspects of community and national life as well as being leaders in their particular industries.

I am sure the hon. member for Lincoln would agree with me that Mr. Schmon, among other things, has been instrumental in providing the most modern hospitalization in our area. We all know that Mr. George de Young was lately selected to be chairman of the productivity council. I am sure he will devote to this activity the same zeal and determination to make a success of it as he has devoted to the production of stainless steel and other products in Welland.

Mr. Stinson: In this debate on trade and commerce I wish to advocate increased trade on the part of Canadian businessmen with businessmen in the republic of China in Taiwan or Formosa as it is commonly called in the west. Before I get into that subject I wish to commend my old friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the initiative, drive and enthusiasm which he has displayed in the discharge of his extremely important duties. The reason that I think we should promote greater trade between our country and this country in the Pacific is that, in my opinion, such trade would be beneficial in a material way to both countries and would lead to a greater understanding between Canadians and the Chinese in that island.

There seems to be a lot of excitement in the House of Commons and elsewhere in this country about the recently completed wheat and barley deal with the communist administration of mainland China. I should point out to the committee that in my opinion the communist government in Peking has no interest in long term trading with this country, which would be of benefit to both countries, and certainly very little interest in building an understanding between Chinese people and Canadians.

In fact, and there is evidence of this out of the mouths of spokesmen of the government of Peking, they are determined to destroy capitalist countries by military or economic means. The only understanding they wish to achieve is an acceptance by us of the communist philosophy.

Therefore I say that I for one cannot share in the jubilation of those who think that this grain deal, which will bring in a few dollars to this country over the next several years, is a big thing for Canada.

The people of the republic of China in Taiwan—a country which I had the privilege of visiting recently—are working very hard with relatively few resources to build up their country. As is the case in India, government has a greater role in the economy than in many western countries, but the economy in Taiwan is essentially a free enterprise one.

The rapid growth of population in this country, about 3.5 per cent per year, makes it very difficult to increase per capita consumption of food each year. Only a quarter of this rocky and mountainous island is suitable for farming. Therefore increased food production can be brought about only through the institution of irrigation projects, improving the seeds that are used and fertilizers.

I think hon. members may be interested in hearing something about the recent achievements of the people in this country. I shall be brief in this respect. In a few minutes I should like to show that the economy of that island is steadily growing, and it could become an important trading partner of Canada. This is no small country. Some 11 million people live in Taiwan and, as I have said, it is becoming one of the important free enterprise economies in the Pacific area.

I agree with the assistant trade commissioner for Canada in Manila, who writing in the April 22 issue of "Foreign Trade" had this to say:

> Many Canadian exporters who have focused their sales efforts on Asia continue to ignore the expanding sales opportunities in Taiwan.

When the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke this morning about the efforts of trade commissioners in the Asian countries, I was sorry that he omitted to refer to this country as an area in which Canadian business could be developed.

In the Asian countries one of the best indications of economic growth is the production of food. Through a co-operative effort on the part of land owners, tenants and agencies of government the Chinese in Taiwan have been so successful in this field that the consumption of food per capita in the rural areas is greater than in any other Asian country.

In 1959 livestock production was four times the level attained in 1946. The volume of production in other farm products was over two and a half times greater in 1959 than in 1946. These increases have been brought about through the land reform program initiated by the present vice president of the republic of China, which program has proceeded through three steps, a reduction of farm rent, the sale of public farm lands and the abolition of the tenancy system.

Since the land reform program was undertaken some 200,000 families who were formerly tenant farmers have become owners of plots of land. Land owners whose land has been expropriated have been compensated with bonds which are redeemed in rice and sweet potatoes, and stocks in government-owned industries. Thus in a period of 11 years a quiet revolution has taken place in agriculture in that country.

I ask hon. members to compare this with the so-called land reform program on the mainland of China which, as everyone here must know, has been marked by violence, terror, loss of freedom, slave labour and starvation.

Agriculture is the main occupation in Taiwan, but industrial production is growing in food processing, chemicals, machinery, ceramics, textiles and other fields.

A good indication of the growth of industry is the expansion in the use of electric power. In this country eight times as much electricity was used in 1960 as was used in 1955. The great changes which have taken place in this country have occurred because of the hard work and the enthusiasm of the men and women associated with the government, and the response of businessmen, farmers and workers to the leadership which the government has given; and, of course, aid from the United States which has been given at the rate of something like $100 million a year.

I wish to express my admiration for the men and women to whom I have just referred, many of whom I had the privilege of meeting in Taiwan in January of this year. What they are doing for their country is not only of value to the Chinese people in that country but it is also of great value in maintaining the morale of political leaders in southeast Asia who are resisting the influence of the Soviet union and communist China.

In 1960 Canada sold to the Chinese in Taiwan goods of a value of $2,885,642, and imports to Canada from Taiwan came to $1,150,222. The Chinese in that country—and I know this from speaking to many of them—are anxious to increase trade with this country and become less dependent on the United States for machinery, electrical equipment and other things.

Therefore I recommend to the minister that at a very early date the trade commissioner now stationed in Manila should go to Taipei and meet government and business leaders of that country with a view to finding out what Canadians can sell there and informing the Canadian business community of the opportunities that are available.

I wish to advocate the establishment of a Canadian consulate in Taipei as a first step toward bringing about closer business relationships between Canadians and the Chinese of this country. I am sure these improved relationships would be of commercial benefit to both countries. They would build friendships between Chinese and Canadians which would lead to a greater understanding by the people of this country of the culture and traditions of the Chinese people.

I hope that on the next occasion a minister of the crown makes a trip to the Far East—and I hope that minister will be the Minister of Trade and Commerce—he will be going to celebrate the opening of a Canadian consulate in Taipei, and that he will come back to this house and announce a trade agreement which will be to the benefit both of the people of Taiwan and ourselves. It seems to me this would help to reach the objective of the trade policy described by the minister on April 28 when he said it was to foster the development among trading nations of policies conducive to the development, growth and expansion of mutually beneficial trade.

Mr. McIlraith: I regret that on Friday afternoon when the minister made a speech introducing his estimates and submitting them to this committee for approval I was unfortunately absent. I want to assure the hon. gentleman that my absence was not due to lack of interest either in the speech or in the subject matter. It arose merely through some misunderstanding which had arisen the previous day about the business of the house and the impression which had been created that the debate on external affairs would continue on Friday.

However, there is one advantage in not having been here on Friday. I had the opportunity of reading the hon. gentleman's speech and perhaps that gives a better opportunity for analysing it. I shall try in my few remarks today to avoid traversing the ground which was covered in the want of confidence motion moved on Monday of last week and debated on Monday and Tuesday. I regard that debate as one of the most important we have had on the subject of trade for some considerable time. I think that today on the estimates of the department itself it would not be appropriate to repeat the arguments raised then, but if I do not repeat them I do not want to indicate any lack of opinion as to the importance of that discussion in the whole field of foreign trade. It seems to me that that debate did deal directly with the situation as it affects our foreign trade today.

The amendment to the supply motion was, it will be recalled, a motion expressing want of confidence in the government. I might remind the committee of its terms. It read as follows:

> That this house regrets the protectionist and inconsistent trade policies of the government and its failure to develop a long term foreign economic policy to enable Canada to participate fully in the challenging new opportunities in the field of international trade by implementing a vigorous program to promote the expansion of our secondary manufacturing industries and by encouraging the development of an Atlantic economic community.

It seems to me that this amendment came squarely to grips with the issue and that the debate was, as indicated, the best debate on the subject we have had for some considerable time.

My remarks today, to the extent that they are critical, are critical of the government for its failure to place this situation in its proper perspective and its failure to develop long term policies which will be appropriate to meet the challenges that exist today in the field of international trade. The inconsistencies of the government's approach are already beginning to have a very damaging effect and very damaging implications for the future. The speech of the Minister of Finance at Ste. Adele on November 17 of last year, seemed to me to be the kind of speech that is destructive of the development of proper trading relationships with the other trading countries with which we are chiefly concerned. I was critical of it last Tuesday, as appears from the record in Hansard, and I may say I was somewhat amazed that the minister, rather than trying to deal with the criticisms of his speech and of the attitude taken in it, seemed to repeat it and to support it. Indeed, he even added to it. I think that was completely wrong.

It seems to me that the situation confronting Canada today has two or three main aspects. First of all, there is the Sino-Soviet bloc with its trade policies and all their implications for us. The implications of those trade policies are two-pronged. One has to do with upsetting the trade of particular segments of the western trade area, by one process or another, and the other prong, the other danger, lies in its implications to the underdeveloped countries by upsetting their economies. It is an unfortunate fact that a very large number of the underdeveloped countries in the world today possess economies which are largely dependent on the export of one or two basic commodities and that if anything happens in the trading world which leads to a sharp drop in the prices of those particular commodities then the economy of that country is seriously and immediately damaged. As a result of that damage we see a political development, and there is also, of course, an economic set back which makes the country less effective as a potential trading market and trading area. As I view the Russian development, it lies in those two fields.

Anything which can be done to assist these underdeveloped countries to develop their economies on a wider basis is to our benefit and is to the benefit of the free world as a whole since it enables those countries to develop as free nations, with all the desirable implications contained in that statement, and also to form improved trade relationships with our own country. Thus, on two grounds it is very much in our interest to see these underdeveloped countries improve their conditions and improve them quickly. I have spoken now, about the development of the Russian-Chinese bloc in that sphere of world activity as I see it today.

There is another condition which holds some implications for Canada, a condition which if not handled carefully could be adverse to us. Our agricultural exports would be particularly affected, but it could also affect our exports across the board. I refer to the European trade blocs, the European free trade area and the European common market. These two trade blocs have been discussed a great deal in the house by hon. members on both sides. There seems to be a substantial difference of opinion about the implications attached to the development of the trade blocs.

The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have, in my opinion, a wrong appreciation of this subject and have failed to see what should be done about it. I wish to be sharply critical in this regard. I have read some of the minister's speeches two or three times, because the Minister of Finance, in particular, is always quick to accuse hon. members of misquoting him.

There is no doubt at all that the propositions contained in the speeches of the two ministers relating to that subject have been interpreted as threats of retaliation. Certainly I have interpreted them in this way, and this interpretation is reflected by articles appearing in the newspapers I have read. One article described these speeches as angry little retaliation speeches. Other similar adjectives have been used to describe them. It has been suggested that they contained negative approaches to the problem, and perhaps even destructive approaches.

I do not see how we can appropriately and efficiently develop an economic policy by angry little retaliatory speeches of this kind. These problems arise because of the Sino-Russian bloc and similar organizations in Europe. The implications of those blocs create the atmosphere in which we must develop our trade policy today.

I felt that the Minister of Finance, in seeking to accuse the Leader of the Opposition of dispensing with GATT, did less than justice to my leader's speech. I thought the Leader of the Opposition made a very able speech and that it was quite unworthy of the Minister of Finance to reply the way he did.

The historical fact is that in 1947, when GATT was developed, the Liberal government of that day played a very important and active part in its development. If one relates the development of GATT to the conditions which existed at the time—at the conclusion of the last war—one will realize that this development was a farsighted arrangement which did much to meet the problems confronting the western world at that time. It provided the machinery through which world trade could be supported and started moving again and, as I have said, the government of that day played a very prominent part, which appears on the record, and speaks well, in my opinion, for that government.

The situation in which we find ourselves today is that the Minister of Finance is attempting to rely on the same machinery, in the form it was at that time, without developing it to meet the new conditions with which we are confronted today. GATT is of course a splendid concept, it embodies a consistent policy, but it is unlikely to fully provide the kind of farsighted development we require today.

In summing up the situation I would say that I felt there was a very apt speech made by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres on Monday, April 24. I would like to read his statement as it is recorded at page 3951 of Hansard for April 24, 1961:

> On the contrary, in the light of Canada's trade deficits and her increased difficulty in competing in her home markets as well as in foreign markets, because of the disruption of traditional trade relationships, because of the possibility of increased economic competition from the Soviet union and her satellites and because of the paramount necessity of aiding the underdeveloped nations of the world, Canada cannot afford to be without a definite, well-thought-out, long range foreign economic policy. The stakes are too high and the situation too tense for Canada to continue to indulge, as she is now doing, in off the cuff, hit-or-miss trade policies, in apologetic but none the less restrictive trade measures with all her hopes of solving her problems pinned on the loud-talking high pressure salesmanship of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

It seems to me that this statement puts the issues, with which we are confronted in trade fields, very squarely, and perhaps in better language than I could use. This is the type of long term, carefully thought out foreign economic policy that is required today, and that is exactly what we are not now receiving from the minister.

That long term foreign economic policy must be developed on two fronts. The first is the taking of active, positive steps—not just sitting back watching and criticizing—to better integrate ourselves with Great Britain and ultimately the United States and the two European trade blocs. We must play an active role in integrating these two blocs into a larger Atlantic trade community which will not be restrictive or inward looking, but will be outward looking. This is a step that will require active participation on the part of the government and the minister. We are not receiving this participation now.

Second, proper steps must be taken to assist our secondary industries, which have been dealt cruel blows in the last two years particularly. Those blows have resulted from two or three different causes. First, because of the increased ability of foreign competitors to produce efficiently and cheaply with the resulting natural competition. The second is because our government has not adapted itself to the changed conditions which secondary industry must meet, by assisting secondary industry in meeting the problems, but has, instead, retained certain tax measures that were developed at a time when conditions were completely different, with the result that increased burdens have been placed upon these secondary industries.

There has been no apparent appreciation by the government of these problems. I have been very critical of the Minister of Trade and Commerce for his failure to understand that secondary industry plays a part in our foreign trade policy as well as our domestic trade policy, and that it must be re-established to full, effective participation, because this is a field which provides a great portion of our employment.

I would like to read from the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce as reported at page 3945 of Hansard for April 24, 1961 where he was referring to the amendment to the supply motion, moved by the opposition. He is reported as follows:

> It purports to speak on the one hand of a free or freer trade area within the Atlantic economic community and in the same breath it expresses regret because, it says, the government has failed to promote the expansion of secondary manufacturing industries in Canada. These two portions are contradictory and represent opposite ends of the economic pole.

They are not inconsistent; they are wholly consistent. One cannot effectively be done without the other. What requires to be done, as well as the things I have spoken about now, international trade, diplomacy, negotiations, and so on, is to take the appropriate steps to rehabilitate secondary industry in the light of today's circumstances.

Incidentally, if you analyse all these things that have happened since 1958 when world exports have gone up by some 16 per cent you will see that our exports have risen by 7 per cent—I think that is the correct figure—or a little less than half. We are stagnating and losing our relative position. I do not wish to take the minister's individual statistics for two and three months periods, as he did in his speech the other day, and say they are wrong. I do not think they are wrong. Probably they are all correct. I have no quarrel with them, but I do want to point out to him that they must be put in proper perspective and it is this other matter that is really of significance to Canada. His attempt at trying to draw conclusions from trading statistics for two and three months periods is not the appropriate way of dealing with this subject at all. He could take any set of trade figures for any two or three months period and do a great many things with them, depending on what he wants to prove. I do not see that that solves any problem at all, nor is it of any assistance toward setting the country on the right course and, so far as I am concerned, it is important that the country be set on the right course and quickly because we have been losing our trading position and we have been losing our position in maintaining the rate of our development in our own economy internally.

I suppose I could reinforce my argument with quotations. I do not know that that is necessary but there is a particularly good editorial in the April 29 issue of the Financial Post, headed "Pearson's Plea Justifies Study". The editorial quoted part of the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition as follows:

> The process of Atlantic integration must take place for political as well as for commercial reasons. It is necessary for the prosperity and growth of the Atlantic democracies. But it may soon be necessary also for their survival.

The editorial continues:

> Pearson does not advocate any sudden, dramatic or immediate consideration of the Atlantic economies any more than does Prime Minister Macmillan who also believes such an integration is the west's only road to survival. This, like any other international combination, is a very long term proposition and should be regarded as such. President Kennedy has been talking in similar vein.

I could quote the whole editorial which is a particularly good one, but I do not think I should take the time of the committee to do so. There is another sentence that perhaps I should quote. It reads as follows:

> If the European trade blocs merge, and all indications suggest they will, and if we on this continent fail to work out a new entente with western Europe, Canada will not for long retain any semblance of independence.

This is the view that the editor who wrote the article took of the importance of this subject. As I say, I could quote at great length. In another article in the same issue of this particular paper they go on and show how the economy of this country has been stagnating. The editorial is entitled "The Spectre of Stagnation". It reads, in part:

> The dollar totals suggest that our recent recessions are only trifling aberrations and that our certain course is progress to a life where everybody makes over $10,000 a year, and where three-car garages are a natural right for every Canadian.
> Despite the 1960 recession, GNP—the total value of everything produced, including services and goods—advanced 3 per cent. Personal incomes were up 6 per cent. Consumer spending rose by 4 per cent. This new accounting of how the economy is making out shows GNP is now up fully one third in just five years.
>
> What is important about GNP, however, is not the sometimes stunning dollar totals and their frequently quoted advances.
>
> What matters to practical business planners and to responsible government officials should be real rates of growth. And here the GNP story reveals the spectre of stagnation.
>
> Consider these comfortless figures:
> Since 1947, GNP's average annual rate of increase has been almost 8 per cent. This, on the surface, is a remarkable performance. But the average hides the fact that between 1947 and 1956 the annual average was 9 per cent, while in the last four years the rate of increase has been only half as fast—4 per cent per year.
> To see how small the real volume gains are, take out the effect of price increases. Then the annual 9 per cent gain from 1947 to 1956 turns into a 5.5 per cent advance and the 4 per cent increase 1956-60 slows to a 1.7 annual rise.

The editorial goes on to develop that theme. In attempting to deal with this subject, in answer to some questions, the minister today did not come up with a long term, well developed statement of policy. I could deal with the answer he gave this morning and puncture many holes in it. He talked about West Indies trade. He did not tell us that we are losing a relative portion of the total there. He did not tell us it was the inconsistent policy of the government of putting one more difficulty in the way that has helped to create more difficulties in this group of islands that are trying to work out a federation which will have full control of these things, a customs union, and so on. He did not tell us he was the very minister who in his other capacity of minister of transport was the one who in one of those short term, quick actions, taken on the spur of the moment, dispensed with the shipping facilities between Canada and the West Indies. He did not tell us that it was that short term policy that did a great deal to damage that trade.

In any event, the point I wish to make is that the minister has been looking at this whole thing under short term, day to day policies, rather than developing a long term policy. Today, in answer to another question, he exhorted management and labour to get together. He spoke about the necessity of management, labour and government getting together to develop productivity. That is very true, and I am in accord with that statement. Then, he went on to make another typical, enthusiastic speech, exhorting management and labour to do the job. You could hear the speech being repeated so many times. He does this exhortation so well. Indeed, he did it in his football days. He is still at it; without the same characteristic effectiveness.

That exhortation to management and labour is all right. I have no quarrel with it. But he has failed completely to deal with that part requiring to be dealt with which falls under federal jurisdiction, that is what the government can do to assist the economy of the country to assist secondary industry to develop itself. He was completely silent on that subject. He did not give the kind of treatment to that aspect of the matter that would make his exhortations to management and labour effective in that they would know that the third party in this triumvirate was pulling its weight. Instead, we have resentment on the part of management and labour and a feeling that government has failed completely in the area with which it should concern itself.

The government can do and should be doing a great deal. It is the area having to do with the activities of government that should receive the attention of the minister. There should be action on the part of the government, action that so far has not been taken. We have the spectre of the government with its shortsighted policies placing added burdens on productive capacity and on productivity. It has done so in many ways. One way in which it did so was by failing to recognize the need to adapt the taxes that apply to production directly to meet the changed conditions that secondary industries mainly but production industries in general were faced with in the developing world situation. Not only did the government fail to do this but it also in fact increased the burdens that bear directly on production.

The minister did not explain the impact on secondary industries of the added cost brought about by the sharp increase in unemployment insurance charges imposed on both management and labour. One can argue about whether the increase was 35 per cent or what the amount was on each side. It seems to me that, depending on which category is being dealt with, it varied from 20 to 50 per cent. But if you take such an increase in the case of both management and labour, there is an increase in respect of that charge on production alone of somewhere between 40 and 100 per cent.

The minister has not explained at any time since the government took office the impact of the 50 per cent increase in the old age security tax which was applied directly on production.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. I am obliged to interrupt the hon. member to inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Hees: Let the hon. member go on.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Will the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Ottawa West continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to thank hon. members and I will try not to abuse the privilege unduly. I wish to complete my remarks and I hope they will be of a constructive nature, however destructive of the government they may appear at the moment. The sales tax, which is a direct charge on most production, was increased 10 per cent by the government. The corporation tax has been increased. Other taxes have been increased by way of changes in their application. In the legislation most of these changes appear to be administrative changes and they are somewhat more difficult to describe.

In any event, we must examine immediately the whole field of the applicability of taxation as it applies directly to production with a view to providing the changes and incentives that will enable our productive industries, particularly our secondary industries, to become wholly competitive against imports into this country. That can be done best by making changes in the kind of taxes I have talked about and through the appropriate application of incentives rather than through the minor restrictive tariff measures that the government seems to have applied regularly from time to time since it came into office and which have seemed to do nothing but destroy our trade relations while at the same time rendering no help to those they are intended to help.

The type of tax incentive that has to be applied is a correct use of accelerated depreciation in the proper areas. In the baby budget the government brought forward a measure to provide accelerated depreciation for industries establishing in depressed areas. I have heard the word "phony" used with reference to that measure and while that is not my word it is an apt way to describe it. It is not an atempt to grapple with the problem at all. It does not deal with what is required. It is too restrictive and narrow and the additional allowance on depreciation account for one year is not nearly sufficient. It is simply a useless little measure in terms of what is needed.

What we need is the use of the weapon of special depreciation on a broad front, first of all in meeting the depressed area problem we have in Canada and then in meeting our export problem. It has to be applied in a carefully planned way. There is quite a reservoir of experience in the application of special depreciation, and I am at a loss to understand why, when the government was dealing with one phase of the matter involving depressed areas, the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not take advantage of governmental experience in using this instrument to bring forward a policy that would be helpful. I suggest to him now that this matter must be examined immediately by the government and a provision for special depreciation brought forward and made applicable in a much wider field and in a wholly different way from what was done in the baby budget. I suggest to him that he will find there is a great deal of experience in the use of such a measure. It was very successful when used in the post-war years in another connection to bring industry into peacetime production. A remarkable job was done on that occasion and I am at a loss to understand why the same kind of job cannot be done now in relation to the problems that confront us today.

Then, of course, there are the problems of straight tax reduction and government waste generally. I think these matters could be more properly discussed either on the finance estimates or on the budget. I do not propose to develop them here other than to suggest that they have a direct applicability to this subject and that care must be used in the kind of policies that are brought forward so that they will not place needless burdens on productivity. I could be very critical of the Minister of Finance and the unemployment insurance fund so far as investments and so on are concerned. These matters must be examined. They are not only a responsibility of the Minister of Finance but, because of their implication, of the whole ministry and of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in particular.

Then there are adaptations of the sales tax. There are certain aspects of the applicability of the sales tax that must be examined again in the light of the problems confronting us today. It is a somewhat difficult tax to speak about because one has to deal with so many regulations and its applicability is not an easy thing to define in a few sentences. I am suggesting that it must be examined in relation to its applicability to all aspects of production. It is not just good enough to say that it does not apply to certain manufacturers and so on. A whole detailed examination is required.

Then we have all the other taxes and their applicability. There is this whole problem of the development of the very latest and best facilities that are available for secondary industry and for productive capacity. We must examine this field at once in order to see what measures—mainly tax measures—we can take in order to see to it that instead of plants engaged in production for export and for use in Canada being obliged to carry on with what I can call roughly now, for the purpose of this point, second rate production machinery or machinery that is not quite the latest and best for its purpose, we must make it economically possible for them to replace that machinery and equipment with the very best that is available in the world. We must examine our tax applicable to that problem with a view to providing the incentive that would enable industry to take the steps I am sure we all desire them to take.

Then there is the question of our general corporation tax which is very high. When we are talking about a corporation tax rate of 50 per cent or 49 and three it will be seen that we have placed a very heavy direct burden on these corporations. If they are to provide the jobs required, we must examine this tax structure in order to see that we are not placing on them a burden that negates the development of their productive capacity for the production of goods and the provision of the jobs that our economy requires.

As to the rate of taxes, it is extremely hard to make a comparison. I for one have not been able to get in a precise way the comparable figures for other western trading nations because the taxes are not exactly comparable. For that reason I have avoided using specific rates. However, in trying to check into this subject I get the impression that in the great western trading nations there is probably no other country in which the implication of taxation in this field is so heavy. As I say, that is not something that I can support with precise statistics because I just have not been able to get them in a form in which I thought it was fair to put them forward having regard to the slightly different applicability. But as I tried to find out about taxation and the German production, the Netherlands production and British production I formed the impression, at least in my own mind, that ours is much heavier in its implication and that, if we are to enable our secondary industry and our other production industry to compete successfully, we must make the adjustments necessary to meet that situation.

The committee has been very kind to me in allowing me to complete these remarks about this aspect of the matter. I feel very strongly that this aspect of the matter must be dealt with as part of our plan, that it is useless to talk about trade in today's circumstances without talking about that aspect of it as well as the other matter of duties and volume of merchandise exports and imports.

I hold the view that the kind of thinking that is required now is bold and imaginative thinking if we are to retain our position among the foremost trading nations of the world. As far as I am concerned nothing less will do. To me it is shocking that we have the extent of unemployment we have in this country. To me there are direct reasons for it. I know that there is some easing of the situation in the United States but to me a great part of it exists by reason of policies within our own country that we could control. I am not content to have that condition exist and to have the short term, hit-or-miss policies that the present government has applied to trade. It seems to me that any narrow, isolationist or increasingly protectionist policy is completely out of step with history or developments today in the world.

I have been sharp in my criticism of the present government under the present Prime Minister for adopting confusing and contradictory trade policies. I have made that matter clear every session. I could recount the starting from 1957. There was Mont Tremblant and the 15 per cent trade diversion speeches. They are just a series of short-sighted contradictory little statements. That thing is taking this country into a period of economic stagnation. We are receding in our world position in trade and there is no need for it. As the minister correctly said this morning, our industrial management and our Canadian people have the capacity for something much better than that. The government must provide the atmosphere in which they can do what they have the capacity to do.

We debated another subject here for some eight days this year and it seemed to me that none of the lessons of this country in the first half of the 1930's were learned by the present government.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member interjects but I can recall to him that I am perhaps one of the few members here who saw the government of that day in operation. I am not going to go back and traverse that ground again but I could not help but think in the customs tariff legislation the concept of trade of the present government had too much of the concept of trade of the government of that day and trade policies which were proved to be wrong and which history and our own experience repudiate. That government brought us into a blind alley. I hope this government will not do that. I want to make my remarks today a warning to the government and a request that they look at these things and examine them closely.

In those days the unemployment figures were not mere statistics to most of the older members although they may be that to some of the very young. However, to most of the older ones they are not that. They represented very real suffering in that era. They are shockingly high in this era again. It is true that we have social security that prevents the hardships from showing up and becoming apparent as they were in those days. Nevertheless, the problem is there just the same. The destructive value to individual human life is there just the same and we must deal with it. We must not allow blundering policies of this kind to be carried on through default in our criticism here to impel the government to change. We must bring forward these criticisms, as I see it, in order to impel the government to examine the problems and to make changes. We must, of course, try to be constructive in doing it.

The ways in which we can be constructive in it are, as I say, among many others by the government developing a carefully thought out, long term foreign economic policy for this country; by the government taking positive steps at the ministerial level to build up a good working relationship with the trading countries of western Europe which are in the two European trading blocs, with a view to bringing those countries in a larger and better relationship with the whole Atlantic community, in which we will take our full and active part. This will involve the United States, of course, and many of the other related countries.

When that is done, we must see that this long term objective keeps that Atlantic trading area an outward looking area, because if it succeeds in that it will solve this problem about which I spoke very briefly. I refer to the problem of the underdeveloped countries. It will provide the kind of trading area in which those underdeveloped countries can get stable markets for their commodities. It will remove that fluctuation of price of their commodities which is so destructive of them. It will do more to assist those underdeveloped countries than these very good, but direct contributions which the western world makes to them.

It seems to me that this kind of policy would be more helpful to these underdeveloped countries than the direct contributions which they are receiving. This direct aid is necessary, and I am not criticizing it; but it is this kind of positive policy that will meet this problem.

It is this kind of policy that will again bring us back into a position and keep us in the forefront of the world as a country offering the best opportunities for our young people who are born here, and for young people of other countries who wish to come here to join with us in the development of the best possible life for individual human beings.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I think the compliments one usually gives to the minister can be largely by-passed at this time. I should like to say that I have noticed one difference in the Department of Transport since the Minister of Trade and Commerce left that department. When he was minister it used to be that you could get a reply to a letter in two or three days. It now takes anywhere from two to three weeks for the department to reply to a letter. However, we are not dealing with the estimates of the Department of Transport and I will leave this matter until a later time.

The minister's remarks were almost nonexistent on the small business branch and its operations. When one looks at the number of people employed in the small business branch, when one tries to find out what its budget is, and when one reads the rather obscure outline in the minister's annual report of what the small business branch is trying to do, one begins to question very much certain promises of this government.

I think all hon. members of this committee, whatever their party, have been intrigued by the statements of the Prime Minister that the Kennedy administration in the United States has really looked to Canada for its example; or if not that, if a more restricted explanation is given, Canada—the Conservative party—has been in the forefront in measures to meet our present economic difficulties and the United States are following along behind. This is almost ridiculous when one looks at this particular aspect of the government's promises and its field of operation, and I refer to the small business section.

The Minister of Finance gave us an indication the other day of just how relatively small a response or opening there has been as a result of the small business loan legislation enacted this session. Certainly in the first month and a half of operation there was a most discouraging rate of interest in this legislation.

Then we look at what the small business branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce is doing. I do not know, but the minister could probably tell us just how much the branch costs. I see that they had fewer employees last year than they had two years ago. We have seen little indication that the branch has done anything other than publish these two pamphlets, which have their value but are not unduly exciting. I refer to the "Small Business" manual and "Selling to the Canadian Government".

In the annual report some claims are made, in connection with the small business branch, to the effect that it is handling a great many inquiries; that it is becoming a clearing house for business inquiries. As a former librarian who kept statistics on the number of people who came into a library and the questions they asked, I know that statistics are not going to necessarily reveal a true pattern of what the branch is doing. However, I think the minister should tell us just what these six people handled in 1960, in terms of inquiries. What kind of inquiries were they, and how much effort went into replying to them? I should like to know how much duplication there may be in what is being done by the small business branch and by other government branches in terms of providing information. I can put it most bluntly by saying this to the minister. You have a branch here with six employees, and the branch is set up to handle business inquiries from the whole of Canada. This is nonsensical. Is the minister going to tell us, or would he argue that six people can answer the business inquiries that may properly be raised by small businessmen throughout the country?

Mr. Drysdale: What about your party?

Mr. Fisher: I am quite prepared to acknowledge that perhaps these six men are handling it at the present time, but the only reason they are doing so is because the country does not know anything about the branch and the functions it is carrying out. I have yet to meet a small businessman who has really heard about this branch and the role it is playing. What liaison does it really have with the people?

The report says this branch has been working with associations, and so on; but what can six people do? We had this big hullabaloo from the minister and his department in relation to the foreign trade drive. This is excellent, I believe. I think most of us believe it has filled a role. However, when one goes through the estimates and looks at the tremendous sums required to keep offices going in Beirut, Belfast, Berne, Bogota, Bombay, Bonn, Boston, Buenos Aires, and so on, and then one looks at this little pittance here of six people working in an area where the Conservative party made a great many promises when it was not a government, when it was seeking election, one cannot help but be struck by certain paradoxes.

The minister has never really dealt with this matter. What is this government doing through this branch? Why bother to set up something as petty as this? I think we deserve some explanation in this connection. While he is at it, the minister might tell us, since according to his report this small business branch did provide the background information for the Small Business Loans Act, why loans under the act seem to be moving so slowly. Why is it that I hear complaints from small businessmen to the effect that, really, the act has not opened up much for them at all.

The next matter upon which I should like to touch relates to the census and the whole question, not so much of the operation of it but the controversial part of it.

I do not think any member of this committee need be ashamed of being a Canadian nationalist. I happen to be one, and as a Canadian nationalist I am still very much bothered about the census arrangements and about the changes that took place. I could agree with the changes and I would not quibble about the cost of them in so far as it suited one element of the population which believed it was entitled to, or needed, certain kinds of information. But I put it to the minister this way. When the census enumerator comes around I am going to tell the census enumerator, whether it is question No. 10 or the next question, that I am a Canadian and that this nonsense of ethnic origins in terms of so many of the people of this country does not mean a thing.

I hope the minister has read an article by Mr. McGeachy called "Goats, bathtubs and Christmas trees—they're all in the census". He makes one point in connection with question No. 10 which I think is important. He is talking about the census inquiry regarding ethnic origin and he says:

> For some citizens this is a realm of sheer conjecture or family legend. But even correct answers don't, as a rule, mean a thing. For instance, Mr. Diefenbaker will no doubt have to answer "German" to the question (so would Queen Elizabeth if she lived here) but is there anything noticeably Germanic about the P.M.? Does he still belong to a Germanic "cultural group"? He's rather a solemn man; but this trait may well come from his maternal Scottish ancestry.

Mr. McGeachy is having a bit of fun, but it is still a very important consideration and I should like to put this question to the minister. When are we going to have a chance in this country to be Canadians and to forget about this ethnic nonsense? I should like to read to the minister a poem which appeared on this subject in the Fort William Times Journal. I think that in terms of metre it might be better than one usually finds in newspaper columns. It is by a writer called Lloyd W. Zapfe and the title is "Reveille". It goes:

> "Breathes there a man", the poet said > and questioned if his soul were dead > enough, to care not to extol, > the virtues of his "Better Ole".
> But what of this fair land of snow?
> where self-made men may come and go > unfettered; paradoxically
> Canadians they cannot be!
> Dieppe and Vimy knew them well;
> The North Atlantic's cold grey hell > and Europe's skies, they took in stride.
> Yet they must show not native pride.
> Five generations count for nought;
> The Redman scarce deserves a plot,
> for stranger is he not? Forsooth!
> He but arrived with Sabre tooth!
> Now Nordic, Latin, Slav, take heart, > perchance someday you may be part > of this great land; so justly famed:
> A first class citizen; acclaimed!
> Countdown.
> Damn the politician's crust!
> Let's shoulder ballots if we must > and storm this Fortress Ennui; > raise up our colors. All to see > our native land attenuated, > our citizens un-hyphenated.

This particular attitude is one which I share completely. I do not want to overstate the issue. As a political issue it certainly should not be approached on partisan lines. But I should like to ask the minister again: when, in Canada, are we going to be able to declare ourselves Canadians and not in terms of citizenship? I think this is a matter about which the hon. gentleman should come out into the open. We grant the compromise which has been made. We are not critical of the compromise if a certain group in French Canada wants certain kinds of information, but I fail to see why the fact that they want this information about their ethnic group should mean taking away from a large number of the rest of us the right to identify ourselves as Canadians. Good Lord, I have not the vaguest idea of the ethnic group to which I belong, but, if we are to go far enough back into the past, Mr. McGeachy has shown that the Prime Minister and the Queen are wonderful examples of the ridiculous side of this whole question.

It seems to me that the basis of approach to a matter such as this has always been compromise. I should like to suggest to the minister that there are a tremendous number of people in English Canada who are ready to see an end of compromise in this situation. I would also like to suggest to him that if the area I represent is any criterion there is building up a very strong sentiment against the negative aspect of the census. I say it is a negative aspect when after five and six generations you are still searching through your father's line to find out what your ethnic origin might be.

One other aspect of the census has already been touched on a number of times in the house. The shorter hon. member for Halifax gave us a statement reported at page 4012 of Hansard concerning the qualifications of the census commissioners. We were all amused when he said:

> Each of these commissioners met the following qualifications: a good education with subsequent professional or business experience in a supervisory capacity—

Then the hon. member for Trinity interjected:

> Good loyal Conservatives.

After which the hon. parliamentary secretary went on:

> —intimate knowledge of the census district; proven executive and organizing ability; tact, good judgment and ability to deal with the public. The salary is $1,200.

I have brought this point to the attention of the minister before. There are smart Conservatives and there are dull Conservatives and there are stupid Conservatives. There are needy Conservatives, there are some in moderate circumstances and there are some who are affluent. Without going into the situation that all the census commissioners in the constituencies of Port Arthur and Fort William are, to my personal knowledge, good Conservatives, some of whom did attend the Conservative party rally here, I am wondering, in relation to the commissioners selected, whether they really did fill the bill in terms of being smart, or being needy, or being competent.

I am not going to single out names but I have certainly very serious doubts as to whether some of the census commissioners at the lakehead possess these qualifications and I would just like to say to the minister that if he is going to appoint Conservatives, if he sets up an organization in co-operation with Mr. Grosart using the services of his parliamentary secretary to make the arrangements across Canada, if he has a census organization based upon the Conservative party, why does he not accept a certain responsibility for seeing that he gets good and smart Conservatives for the job? I am willing to accept that there are good Conservatives and smart Conservatives. But if you want to search at the lakehead you will find Conservatives who have more ability than the ones who were picked, and Conservatives who are in greater need. I suggest to the minister that not only in his role as a minister of the crown but as an important figure in the party he has a direct responsibility in this regard.

You might say, Mr. Chairman, that to talk about Conservative party organization on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce is out of order. I insist that the minister himself and his parliamentary secretary have made it an integral part of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I was expecting that. I think the members of our party expected that. We are experienced enough to know that as long as we have this government in power we are going to have this pragmatic approach. I come back once again to the point I have made. There are smart Conservatives and there are dull Conservatives. There are affluent ones and there are needy ones. Why the tendency seems to be to give these jobs always to the affluent and to the dull is a little beyond my comprehension. I suggest this may reflect weakness in the Conservative party organization, and, with an election coming up, this might well prove very dangerous for the party. I think that when we come to the relevant part of the estimates the minister might take us into his confidence and tell us just how these people were picked. I know it has been easy in most of the constituencies because there are 207 representatives of the Conservative party here and their liaison with the shorter member for Halifax has been close. I have noticed the interchange of communication and the change in reputation of the smaller hon. member for Halifax as a result of this important role. I am thinking more of the constituencies not represented by Conservatives; the unfortunate places. I would like the minister to tell us where he received the advice as to the appointments. I am not suggesting that he should have come to me, or the hon. member for Fort William. I would not like to accept the responsibility of passing judgment on the dullness or smartness of Conservatives. However, I think it might have been better if he had turned to the national employment service for this information.

I also wonder if the minister has talked this over with the Minister of Labour. The minister may find that by by-passing the national employment service he has done an injustice to one of his colleagues. I have had many inquiries from individuals who would like these census jobs, particularly students. I always advise them to telephone Art Shewchuk, the president of the Port Arthur Conservatives constituency association. I would like to ask the minister if I am giving them the right advice. I was dealing earlier with the small business branch. Everyone likes to run an efficient operation and I want to make sure I am sending these individuals to the right horse's mouth.

I do not intend to say anything further about this but I do hope the minister can tell us more about the matter. Where should these people who are scrambling for jobs go? I think the smaller member for Halifax told the house that these individuals should apply to the census commissioners themselves but I have a hunch that they need clearance from the local constituency association, and that is why I have been sending them there. If I have been committing an error I would like to know so that I may correct it. I hope the minister will straighten out this situation for me.

The last point I wish to touch upon in connection with the minister's department relates to information about the expenditures of this department. I would suggest that one really does not get as much information from appendix F in the annual report as one might like regarding the operations of this department. Since the public accounts are always somewhat in arrears so far as presenting a pattern, and since the estimates give a very incomplete picture of the costs involved in operating the various aspects of the department, I wonder whether it might be possible for the minister to expand on that information. Perhaps I could make this clear to him by pointing out to him that under heading no. 2 "Expenditures by Main Item Only" there appear some very large figures. However, when one turns to statement No. 1, expenditures for fiscal years, where one is supposed to find the details, there is not a very adequate breakdown. If an attempt is made to understand the very complex role carried out by the standards branch, and there are a number of functions that branch performs which may be complementary but are quite distinct, one cannot really ferret out this information. I pointed out the small business branch earlier as another example which, as the minister will remember, started its first year of operation with $35,000. I do not know whether that total amount has been spent, and I would like to know how much the operation of that branch costs, and what plans there are for the expansion of its expenditures. I would like to know how much of this money is represented by salaries to staff, and how much is represented by the cost of reference work.

In conclusion I would like to say that the minister's speech in regard to the whole question of trade, which he made at the lakehead about a month ago, received good response from the businessmen there. Those businessmen accepted the remarks he made because they felt the minister intended to do something about trade policy. I have on a number of occasions since heard criticisms, and have witnessed a change in attitude, which now seems to be that the minister has a lot of pep and enthusiasm; however, what is the government doing in a practical or concrete way to carry forward this enthusiasm and exhortations to do better?

The minister came into that area of Ontario where we live and made some challenging and enthusiastic statements but I do not think he can leave the situation at that. We would like to see some follow through in this regard. When are his officials going to arrive in that area to follow up that pep rally the minister attended? The hon. member for Ottawa West in fact asked the same questions although he cast them in a more general but complicated manner relating to the department's trade policy as a whole. I would like to ask the minister now how he is going to follow up this picture of his so that something is filled in around the general hosannas and florets?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I would like to answer some of the questions put to me by the hon. member for Port Arthur. First of all he asked about the total outlay of the small business branch. The total amount is $70,000. The allocation of that $70,000 is, to staff $65,500, but the actual expenditure there at the present time is about half that. There are six individuals working in that branch and the total allocation is for 13.

The hon. member asked if I could tell him something about the activities of the small business branch itself, and I will now try to do so. The small business branch serves as a focal point for the small businessman to come to discuss his problems and to receive assistance and advice. The present rapidly changing economic conditions often pose particular problems for small businessmen. The branch was established in order that it might provide a specialized service to help small businessmen in dealing with these problems. The small businessman receives assistance and advice from the branch on such matters as the establishment of a business enterprise, capital and other financial requirements, unfair business practices, government procurement, government services generally, accounting, and other fields of business management. The branch actively studies the problems of small business and, in co-operation with other departments, advises the government on possible courses of action to alleviate such difficulties.

The branch serves as a clearing house for small businessmen, in that, if it cannot provide information from its own resources, it directs the businessman's inquiries to the appropriate government departments and agencies which have the required specialized knowledge. The branch can also provide businessmen with information on federal government procurement and, in this connection, has published a manual entitled "Selling to the Canadian Government". The business community has requested more than 10,000 copies of this document. In co-operation with manufacturers' associations, the branch prepares other types of business publications aimed at assisting small business.

I would be very interested if hon. members would tell me of any small or large businessman who has made inquiries of this branch but has not received satisfactory information or service. We in the Department of Trade and Commerce pride ourselves in doing everything that is humanly possible to give the service and information that is asked for. We may not give all that is asked or perhaps even satisfactory information, but we attempt to do so. If we do not, then we want to kno why. I would appreciate hearing information in detail from any hon. member regarding any incident as to how we have let any small businessman down in regard to information which he has asked for but has not received.

The hon. member also asked for information regarding the small loans program. I have just been handed some information in this respect. From January 19, to March 31, 1961, there were 334 loans to a value of $2,034,628. The average size of such loans was about $6,000. This emphasizes the small loan feature.

The director advises me that loan activity is expanding very rapidly. For instance, in March the loans were about three times the number of those in February, and expansion is expected to continue at a similar rapid rate. He explains that, after all, it takes some time to get these operations going, but activity is stepping up all the time.

The next thing the hon. member asked about was the census itself. He emphasized the desirability of a Canadian being able to say that he or she is a Canadian. This is one of the prime purposes of the revised census form. If the hon. member will look at question No. 9 he will see that it reads as follows:

> Country of citizenship.
> Are you a Canadian?

I do not know of any better way that a Canadian citizen can say that he is a Canadian than by being asked "Are you a Canadian?" and answering "Yes". If there is any better way of saying it, I should like to be advised of it by the hon. member.

The hon. member then said he regretted that ethnic origins are asked for. I wish to advise him that there are some 18 million-odd people in Canada and a very large proportion of those find it very important to know the ethnic origin of the people of Canada. That is the reason why the question is asked.

The hon. member asked if I could tell him how a Canadian citizen goes about becoming an enumerator for the coming census. The simple answer is that he applies to the census commissioner in his area. They are the ones who will decide who will be the census enumerator.

Mr. Winch: The minister should see how it was done in Vancouver East.

Mr. Hees: The hon. member asked if we could expand the details given in appendix F in the annual report. I am glad to be able to say that we shall be happy to look into the possibilities of doing that. We want to give all the information possible without having the document too unwieldly, and we shall do everything possible to give more information in that appendix.

The last question asked by the hon. member was what follow-up is my department giving to what he described as the pep talks that I am giving around the country. After listening to the hon. member for Port Arthur and the hon. member for Ottawa West I seem to get the impression that they think there is something bad and distasteful about being enthusiastic and trying to enthuse other people into a greater selling effort and a greater producing effort. That is what I have been trying to do across this country since I took over as minister. I have been trying to point out what the citizens of this country must do in order to help themselves. This is what I have been trying to point out and I will be doing this further at trade conferences which are being conducted in various provinces across this country at the invitation of provincial governments, chambers of commerce, and so on. I shall be indicating to the businessmen who are attending those conferences, and who have already attended them in very large numbers, exactly what services this government department has at the beck and call of businessmen who are interested in going into the export market, and to try to induce more to go into the export market, telling them how we can help them.

At least half of those conferences are going to be devoted to the problems faced by individual businessmen in the domestic commerce of this country; in other words, trying to sell their goods and services here in Canada.

I spoke in the hon. member's home town of Port Arthur a few weeks ago. He was present at the meeting. Evidently he thought of my speech as a pep talk and nothing more. Some of the businessmen who attended thought it was useful. He asked me what our department is going to do to follow up, and when my officials are going to go up there again. I can assure him that I have not enough officials in this department to go often to every city in Canada, much as we would like to do so. We operate what we think is an efficient department here in Ottawa. Our doors are always open. We try to give them all the information possible. I have tried to do so in my speeches to businessmen generally across Canada and to anybody else who would like to come here and talk to us. I have tried to tell them that we have a tremendous number of services available to businessmen right here in Ottawa. We cannot go to every city; we cannot talk to all of the businessmen in their places of business, but we have services available to them here, and if they have not the desire and the initiative, when they have problems, to ask us about them, to write to us or to come here and talk to us, then I am afraid that is their own concern.

But a great many businessmen have that kind of interest. A tremendous number come to us every day in the week and we try to give them all the services that we possibly can to help them do their job better, to make sales, to make jobs available to Canadians. If the hon. member, or any other hon. member, knows of any businessmen who have come here and found that we did not give them service, that our services were not available to them, that we were not as helpful as we should have been, I would honestly appreciate it if he would give us the information or let me know because I want to check up on those particular branches which are not giving the service. I know that all of my staff are equally interested to hear of any information of that kind. We pride ourselves on trying to do a good job. We intend to keep on trying to do it and any help the hon. member or any other hon. member can give us in assisting us in this regard will be most appreciated. I think I have answered the hon. member's questions.

Mr. Fisher: I have a couple of questions. First of all, on the citizenship matter, the minister says that the census form allows one to state very clearly that he is a Canadian, but under what framework? This is my quarrel with the form. Question No. 9 under "country of citizenship", asks "Are you a Canadian? If not of what country are you a national or a citizen?" I do not see how one can look at this question without turning to question No. 10 which reads:

To what ethnic or cultural group did you or your ancestor (on the male side) belong on coming to this continent?

I am just suggesting to the minister that one question demeans from the other, and the necessity of a question such as "Are you a Canadian" under the label "Country of citizenship" to me is unnecessary.

The comments by the minister in part of his rather fighting-back attitude were along the lines of asking did I know of any examples of people who had a poor response from the small business branch. I do not. That was the point of my argument. My point was, if you have a branch of six members dealing with problems of the whole country there must be a certain inadequacy in the kind of service they perform. If businessmen across the country are responding and asking questions, how can six men do the job? I am just suggesting to the minister that there is a certain irony in the fact that we spend $52,000 in Beirut and $65,000 in Berne, and so on, and yet in this very important aspect of our work the minister has six members in Ottawa.

Mr. Hees: Perhaps I can answer that. We could enlarge the number of people employed in that branch up to double the number and more than that any time we wish to, as soon as the pressure of business justifies it. That branch is there. As far as I know it is well known to businessmen across the country. When I go to speak in the various provinces in the weeks ahead I am going to re-emphasize the fact that the small business branch is available to give service. We want as many small businessmen in Canada as possibly can to come to us, write to us, and ask us questions. There is nothing I would sooner do than quadruple this staff and I will do so as soon as the pressure of inquiries from small businessmen asking for information justifies it. I am not going to enlarge the branch just for the sake of enlarging it. I will do so as soon as there is any justification for doing so. I would love to see the branch consist of 50 people working full time. That would make me very happy because it would show that we were able to give small businesses a great deal of help of the kind they need to enable them to do more business and employ more Canadians. If the hon. member can act as a salesman for us in any way by telling people what we have available and if all other hon. members will do likewise, I will welcome it very sincerely indeed.

With regard to the census questions, I am afraid I cannot explain that matter any better than I have. The question is asked, "Are you a Canadian", and you say "Yes". If that does not give you a chance to say you are a Canadian, I do not know what does. I cannot think of how you can put it any more clearly. The next question has nothing to do with being a Canadian citizen because it asks, "What ethnic group did you belong to before you came to our shores?" You cannot be a Canadian citizen before you come to the shores of this country. These are two completely different questions. They were thought out carefully and I hope they are satisfactory to the Canadian people. I do not know how we can make them any more satisfactory.

Mr. Fisher: As to the last rebuttal of the minister with relation to his appearance at Port Arthur, I think he misunderstood me. He said that he went to the lakehead and made his speech and he thought there was an enthusiasm that I apparently did not see. The minister is mistaken. I was glad he came to the lakehead and made his speech, and there is nothing wrong with putting on a pep rally. It was especially fortunate that it came at the time it did because, as the minister knows from the remarks he heard there, our area has suffered very severely from unemployment this winter. I give the minister credit for raising the spirits of the people who were at the meeting. I was simply suggesting to him that there needs to be a following up and building up of the kind of liaison that the minister is establishing in a very popular way. If I can do anything to advertise any of the services of his department, I will be only too glad to do so.

The last remark I would make is that there comes a point of diminishing returns in generating enthusiasm. All the generation of enthusiasm in the world will begin to taper off and the fillip will go out of it unless there is some concrete success in relation to it. Whether the minister is a success as Minister of Trade and Commerce we have no clue yet. I think there are indications that we are going to have to wait a bit longer to find out, and I would simply suggest to the minister that we will not know the measure of his success or the measure of the success of his rallying enthusiasm until we see some changes and developments both in regard to external trade and in helping small businesses. I do not think I can put it any more fairly than that.

Mr. Hees: I do not want to carry on this debate interminably but I do want to point out that in the speeches I have made since I became minister I have tried not to be simply a pep rally leader or somebody going throughout the country in that way, and I tried to point that out this morning in my opening remarks. I took it that some hon. members who heard me speak in the house on Friday got the idea that I thought everything was fine, that all we had to do was to carry on doing what we are doing and everything would work out for the best. I said that I wanted to correct that right away and I did.

I have tried to point out that all across the world, as I said once again this morning, we face the toughest competitive situation this country has faced since before the last war. It is a very serious competitive situation because countries that were formerly our markets are now our toughest competitors. I have tried to outline what the government is willing to do, can do and is doing to help business. I have tried to point out what management and labour must do in co-operation with the government, that this is a three-way operation involving government, management and labour and that we all have a big job. Nobody can turn to the other fellow and say, "It is your job; it is not mine".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what the Minister of Labour has done.

Mr. Hees: It is a job for the 18 million people in the country. I have not tried to make out that all you have to do is to hold pep rallies and everything will be fine. I have tried to point out that we are up against a very tough situation. I have tried to point out what has to be done and to urge people to do it. I hope they will do it. If they do, if we can work together in the way of the peoples of Europe and Japan did in pulling themselves up out of the slough of the war to the top of the heap in 15 years, then we, like them can have full employment. We can have our very high standard of living, the highest in the world, I believe. But I say again that it is up to us and that people cannot simply sit back and wait for some miracle that the government is going to create. Nobody is going to create any miracles.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let the government give some leadership.

Mr. Hees: We all have a job to do. The sooner we recognize it, the sooner we are going to get under way and the sooner we will be at the top of the heap where the countries of Europe now find themselves as a result of such efforts.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why does the government not give leadership?

Mr. Hees: That is exactly what the government is doing.

Mr. Chevrier: Give us an example.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I think the Department of Trade and Commerce is probably one of the most important departments for settling, not temporarily but permanently, the unemployment problem, provided the department is properly run in relation to Canada's needs.

Let me say at the outset that I think the minister has made a worthy effort; he has tried to inject some life into Canada's business and industrial community. However, I think his effort has not been enough, has not produced what we had a right to expect from the Minister of Trade and Commerce because in my view, the main cause of unemployment is the lack of outside markets in which to sell our surplus production.

We need new markets. We are told at one point that our exports have gone up, and a month later we are told that they have dropped. Perhaps it is true, but one sure thing is that Canada, with a population of 18 million, produces much more than it can consume. We must find markets outside Canada, throughout the world, for this surplus production.

Has there been a real effort made in that direction up to now? We know we are selling abroad. Just recently, we sold some wheat. That is fine, and we welcome it. However if you take a closer look at the statistics, you find that 40 per cent of our exports are agricultural products, approximately 40 per cent are raw materials, and only 20 per cent are manufactured or semi-manufactured products. When we sell raw materials abroad rather than manufactured or partly manufactured products, this works to the benefit of the workers in other countries and to the detriment of our own workers.

I was reading recently in the Financial Time for March 17, 1961 an article written by Mr. Rae, vice president and general manager of the North American Division of Atlas Steels Limited. Here is what he had to say on the particular point I was just making:

(Text):

The only effective solution to Canada's small market for most of our industries is active development of markets outside Canada.

(Translation):

That, in my view, is what the Department of Trade and Commerce should do: it should tackle this task earnestly so as to find new markets; otherwise, we can expect steady unemployment for years to come, and I do not think the Canadian people, no matter how good-natured they are, will be prepared to put up with such a situation much longer.

There are those who claim that to get a better share of the foreign market, we would have to step up production, as this would probably lower the cost of our goods. How can we step up production when we already have surpluses that cannot be sold? It does not make sense. We must find new markets, and reliable markets.

Here is another quotation from the same article:

(Text):

Because we make products used almost entirely by industry, not directly by consumers, our major export markets are the world's industrial areas such as the United States, United Kingdom and Europe.

(Translation):

This means that we are losing here the jobs we should be giving to our workers. There are plenty of markets, of course, but our prices are perhaps too high and that is a bad thing.

Indeed, the minister himself pointed this out, because the same writer said:

(Text):

On February 7th, here in Toronto, our minister of trade and commerce said it was necessary for industry to reduce its costs to be competitive overseas.

(Translation):

That is something we admit. But how can we manage to cut down the cost of our products? There might be a way, if some emergency forced us to use it, and that would be to establish some sort of controlled economy which would settle everything. But this does not seem quite in order in a democracy such as we conceive it. However, the government could, as did certain other governments, provide grants to enable our prices to meet those of other goods on the foreign market at least for the first year. This policy would enable those industries to decrease costs by increasing their production so that, after a year, or perhaps two or three, Canadian manufacturers could sell their goods on the foreign markets at a competitive price.

Has this been done? I do not think so. I hold that this is one of the first points the present minister should watch.

As a matter of fact, in his Toronto statement the author finds that our attitude is contradictory, and he says:

(Text):

Two weeks later he was reported to have said increases in taxes were inevitable in 1961. I find it impossible to justify these two statements or to believe he does not consider taxes are a cost item.

(Translation):

And this is true, as the member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) pointed out earlier. Therefore, the entire department should look carefully into our whole taxation system, because something must be done.

Canada cannot wait any longer. Even though the minister did all he could, if it is not enough, he should seek counsel from the other ministers to determine what are Canada's needs at this time, because, let us not forget it, unless we find some way of disposing of our surplus production, no matter what government is in power in a few years from now, because of the present emergency we shall have to resort to a controlled economy. I do not believe that Canadians are too anxious to see that happen. We had to do it during the war because that was an emergency; we controlled prices and production costs; we controlled everything, in order to maintain a war-time economy. That can be done in cases of emergency, and if the situation remains as it is today—as reflected by the serious unemployment—and if the government fails to increase our markets, we shall be compelled to implement a trading policy which, as I said earlier, is not considered appropriate for Canada.

In the same article, Mr. Rae had this to say also on the subject:

(Text):

In order to manufacture our products at prices that will enable us to meet competition from imports we have to have modern, high-volume, efficient equipment. In order to justify purchasing such equipment, we have to have markets much larger than Canada alone provides.

(Translation):

And that is a fact. The whole question revolves around the matter of finding ways of disposing of our surplus production.

Mr. Chairman, we find ourselves in the midst of a situation that did not exist 10, 15 or 20 years ago. We see the idea of a common market gaining ground in Europe and involving in certain parts a free trade area. This will necessarily affect Canada's foreign trade.

Now what is the government doing in the face of such a situation?

We were approached by the British at Mont Tremblant. We were invited to consider the matter of free trade among the British nations. Did the government at least take the trouble to study the suggestion, to determine whether there was anything in it that might improve our situation? I do not blame the government for not accepting it immediately, but I do blame the government for failing to give it serious consideration, for failing to set up a committee of qualified people to study the matter, so that we might have known definitely whether it was possible for Canada to join a free trade area.

We are now witnessing the development of the common market. And I will say this, Mr. Chairman. The Conservative party, which had always been considered as more empire-minded than any other party, will probably be responsible for breaking the commonwealth ties, in view of its stubborn refusal to recognize the situation facing the U.K. at the present time.

Faced with the common market, the United Kingdom has to keep in step. Last week, the United Kingdom indicated that it would necessarily join the common market, but before doing so, would have to consult with the commonwealth countries in view of the preferential tariff prevailing between those countries. Therefore, Canada will have to follow the suggestions which have been made both to the minister (Mr. Hees) and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), and try not only to develop a common market area with the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries, but try to develop a common market within the 15 NATO countries. Instead of trying, through increased tariffs—whether disguised or not—to protect a dwindling industry, the government should try to widen its perspective and find a means of selling our goods on other markets by reaching agreements not only with the United Kingdom and with the commonwealth countries, not only with the European common market, but with all 15 NATO countries which are prepared to take and accept the necessary steps to help their industry.

I do not wish to pursue the matter any further, but I hope the minister will take the trouble to study the situation so that Canada may know where it is going and what it can expect.

(Text):

Mr. Carter: When I replied on Friday to the minister's statement I chided him a bit for some omissions that occurred in his speech. After reading the Hansard record of Friday's debate I discovered that I myself made one or two serious omissions. I should like to take a few minutes now in order to repair those omissions, to avoid any misunderstanding that may arise and also to correct any wrong impression that may have been created.

Hon. members will recall that I compared the Minister of Trade and Commerce to a general who had called his troops in for a briefing to acquaint them with the facts of life of world trade. Among those facts of life in the world of trade I cited Russia's efforts to increase and accelerate her own industrial expansion while at the same time doing everything possible to hinder the industrial expansion of the free world.

I also referred to Russia's efforts to secure economic control of other countries and to integrate their economies into a trading bloc which would be complementary to her own. In addition I referred to Russia's economic aggression and penetration, and her increasing tendency to disrupt normal trading relations.

To counteract that action I made two suggestions. First I suggested that we should take action internally to protect ourselves against aggression and penetration and encourage other countries to do the same. I suggested that we should also take action externally to prevent trade disruption. In that connection I was thinking in terms of an association of free nations in the world of trade which would be somewhat similar to NATO in the realm of defence. Such an association would be able to buy up surpluses which Russia might use to disrupt world trade.

My first omission was the failure to point out that this in itself would not be enough, that what is actually needed is a dynamic, positive program, as was pointed out earlier this afternoon by my hon. friend from Ottawa West. The measures I was suggesting were by nature anti-communist, and I do not think there is any percentage in merely being anti-communist.

The military defeat of communism is something that cannot now be contemplated, and even were it possible, it would be useless because the evils that created communism would still remain. That is the real battle that has to be fought.

I think I pointed out to the minister last Friday some of the defects in our free enterprise system. I pointed out some of the weaknesses. Unfortunately these weaknesses are traceable to weaknesses in ourselves as human beings. If we are really going to do anything about this, we must come to grips with what is wrong in ourselves.

On Friday I spoke of the need for new goals. My second omission was the failure to call attention to what I consider should be our main goal at this time. That goal arises from a fact of life in the world of trade which is just as significant as the struggle for world domination in trade. This fact of life which I omitted is the gap in living standards between the industrialized countries and those countries we refer to as underdeveloped.

The people who live in the countries of Asia, India, Africa and other underdeveloped parts of the world, such as Latin America, have suddenly become increasingly aware of this gap. This has generated a wave of nationalism in an effort to try and do something about it. They have before them examples of what Russia has accomplished in the space of 40 years. Even with the interruption of two world wars, we know that the Soviet union has developed from a backward nation to one of the foremost nations in the world as far as technological progress is concerned.

The people in these underdeveloped countries of Asia have another example in red China trying to achieve in 20 years what Russia achieved in 40 years. The industrial development of China is just as significant a fact in the world today as that of Russia.

In this connection Japan plays a very significant part. We know what it is to have on our borders a large trading nation. Japan is in exactly the same position and is experiencing the same pull economically as we are experiencing from the United States. Indeed, one of the main objectives of the policy of red China is to secure control of Japan in order to harness the industrial capacity of Japan to the manpower of China and the natural resources of southeast Asia. If China can succeed in doing this, she will outstrip the progress made by any nation in the world.

This afternoon the minister referred to Japan as an example of a nation which had risen from the ashes and had become one of our toughest competitors. This is of course true. However, we must not think of Japan only as a competitor. We must realize that Japan is also an ally of the free world and a key country in the survival of western democracy. Should the economy of Japan become dependent upon that of red China, the chances of survival for the free world would be very seriously impaired. Therefore, while we acknowledge Japan as a competitor we must conduct our trading relations with her as a country whose economy is vital to our own security.

The minister spoke this afternoon about the importance of design, quality and right prices. He said that if we paid attention to these matters we could achieve not only the second highest standard of living in the world, but even the highest standard of living. That is possibly true. However, I think there is the great danger that we might be tempted to make this our goal. If we did, we would do so at great peril to our survival as free peoples.

Certainly we must try and raise the living standards of people in our own country whose standards are still far below the national average; but to increase the over-all average of our standards of living in the western world would serve only to increase the gap which exists between ourselves and these underdeveloped countries.

It is certainly in our interest that we should do everything possible to close that gap and assist the underdeveloped countries as quickly as possible. My colleague the hon. member for Ottawa West made that clear this afternoon. This is the goal at which I feel Canada and the free world should be aiming at this time and it is one of the things which I believe the minister should include in his briefing of his commissioners, businessmen, and all the contacts he makes as he attends trade conferences. It is a goal which all the people of Canada must be brought to accept. This is the kind of leadership which is required at this time. It is the kind of leadership that Canada could and should be giving in the world of trade, and I hope the minister will do everything in his power in that direction.

Mr. McGee: I do not wish to delay the passage of the first item on the minister's estimates but I have a few comments to make in connection with the conference of trade commissioners last fall and the subsequent action taken to complement that activity by the establishment of export credits.

I am wondering about the limiting factors in the operation of our trade commissioners, the obvious position being that the trade commissioners cannot in fact write an order on behalf of a particular manufacturer in Canada and in particular on behalf of the smaller secondary manufacturers. I am wondering, further, if any of the associations with which the minister has been dealing have evolved a method of sending abroad representatives of perhaps groups of industry within the same field or groups coming from a specified commercial area. I understand certain persons have given considerable thought to this and I wonder if the minister can tell us if he has encountered any efforts along these lines in his travels.

I wonder, too, if in approaching this problem of trade in the vigorous way in which the minister has approached it he has had the staff of his department examine specifically the procedures that were followed by Germany in the post-war years and in more recent years in developing the aggressive export trade pattern that they have evolved.

One other thought did occur to me, and I am wondering just how much consideration has been given to it, though perhaps it is being held in abeyance to await the impact and effect of the activities to date. I am wondering if something in the way of incentive has been considered in a broad or specific way to various industries which can develop certain important increases either in our export trade generally or in certain selective areas.

I would appeciate very much hearing from the minister about these few matters.

Mr. Hees: In answer to the hon. member's questions, may I say that the board of trade for Vancouver send a trade mission overseas every year. This year they are sending a mission to Italy. Last year one went to Japan. I am advised that the Canadian chamber of commerce in 1959 sent a trade mission to the West Indies and that in 1960 they sent a trade mission to Australia and New Zealand. The Halifax board of trade recently sent a trade mission consisting of 128 persons for a two weeks trip to the United Kingdom and they have just returned from that market.

We are very happy indeed to co-operate closely with any chamber of commerce or board of trade that wishes to send missions overseas, or with any trade association. We encourage that very strongly. We make our trade commissioners available to them everywhere they would like to go, and this link between the department and these missions is a fruitful one indeed. It leads to directly increased trade and it enables people to go abroad in a group and develop trading opportunities.

Mr. McGee: Are these people qualified to write an order? That is the question which was in my mind. Are these people simply duplicating the activities of our trade commissioners?

Mr. Hees: The businessmen themselves must write the orders. There is nothing to stop a business firm appointing as an agent for the trip another businessman who happens to be going and telling him to accept or place orders under certain conditions. That could be done very easily, but it would be up to the individual firm to designate its own appointee.

Mr. McGee: Supposing a businessman wanted to appoint a trade commissioner as an agent for a certain transaction, would he be precluded from doing that?

Mr. Hees: A trade commissioner could not enter into trade negotiations. He could do a tremendous amount of the preliminary work leading to a sale, but the actual signing of the contract must be done by the representative of the business itself.

Mr. Herridge: I have very few words to say but they are of great importance to some of my constituents, as usual. I want to thank the minister for his replies to the questions I asked last Friday and tell him I am sorry I could not be here earlier this afternoon to listen to the debate. My attendance was required at the external affairs committee to see that the affairs of the country were being run properly.
