procurement for given government departments in given areas is secured from sources of supply within those given areas. But I will take a look at the representations and the facts the hon. member brought to my attention, and report to him.

IMMIGRATION

LACK OF EDUCATION AND HEALTH SERVICES FOR CHILDREN OF ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the fact that Toronto Board of Education officials have been saying for years that thousands of children of illegal immigrant parents are forced to live a life of fear in hiding and that these same children are unable to receive any education or health care services for fear of the families being identified and deported, would the minister clarify to the House what steps he is taking to remedy this undesirable situation? What steps does he intend to take to stop the increase of this illegal population in Canada?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, that is a very extensive question. I am not sure I can supply a full answer in this time period. But I indicate to the hon. member that the responsibility for children first resides with the parents of those children. We have established a very open and very compassionate immigration law which sets out proper procedures by which people can come to Canada. Our record is second to none in the world in providing a very open invitation and welcome. However, many people come here illegally and we provide some response to them in a compassionate way. We cannot in any way break the standards of those laws, because it would be unfair to those in other countries who are abiding by the law. It is my responsibility to ensure that the law is respected.

We have established a task force to look at improvements in the procedures of that law to ensure that it works properly, but at the same time the responsibility for the children really resides with the parents themselves. The best we can do is to ensure that they make application in a legal manner and do not come here in an illegal fashion.

INDUSTRY

CONTRACT FOR SUPPLYING PRE-FABRICATED HOUSES TO EARTHQUAKE VICTIMS IN ITALY

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Trade.

Mr. Clark: Who is he?

Mr. Murta: He is the Minister of State for Trade.

An hon. Member: This must be his maiden question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murta: I trust his answer will be as good as his reception on that side of the House. Back in December the Canadian Manufacturers Housing Institute, which represents manufactured home builders across the country, made application to supply some 10,000 manufactured homes to earthquake victims in Italy. The cost of the contract is about $100 million, and 99 per cent of it—virtually all of it—is Canadian-owned. They are a little upset because they have not received what they considered to be the proper backing of the federal government with respect to the making of the contract itself. Can the minister inform the House whether or not the government is, in fact, working with these people to ascertain whether this kind of very vital contract could be secured by the manufacturers of manufactured homes?

• (1200)

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (Trade)): Madam Speaker, I am very well aware of this particular situation. Our officials here in Ottawa, as well as those at our post in Italy, made representation to the Italian government at the time of the request of the Canadian industry. Unfortunately, at the time, the Italian authorities indicated that they wanted to manufacture many of the homes in Italy. They indicated that they were not specifically interested in buying pre-fab, manufactured units here in Canada. However, representations are still being made along this line.

Mr. Murta: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. In view of his answer, which seems pretty pessimistic, and also in view of the fact that we could be talking about an amount of $100 million, if we were able to get into that particular market, is the minister optimistic that the chances are still reasonably good for manufactured Canadian housing to be sold to Italy?

Mr. Lumley: Madam Speaker, as a very positive-thinking individual I am always optimistic about Canada's chances in international markets. But I think some further discussion with respect to possible joint ventures with Italian manufacturing companies in Italy would be more appropriate than selling the finished product from Canada.

PETITION

MR. KNOWLES—INCREASED INCOME FOR SENIOR CITIZENS

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the forthy-fifth report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

Privilege

PRIVILEGE

DEFERRAL OF QUESTIONS

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I rise in the interests of saving the time of the House. As we know, negotiations are under way between the government and the New Democratic Party, although our House leader has not yet been notified of the time of the next meeting.

There are a number of questions of privilege on the order paper, notices of which have been filed with the Chair. As you are aware, Madam Speaker, I have had consultation with the Clerk and notices of questions of privilege have been filed by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman), the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor), the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes), the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby), the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt), the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) and the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay).

In the interest of giving the negotiations every possibility of succeeding, and without prejudicing them, I have approached each of these members, with the knowledge of the Clerk, and requested that they defer their questions of privilege without prejudice to their bringing the questions before the House at a later time and without further notice.

I have not yet had the opportunity to speak with the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville; he is absent from the House, as will be noted. Nor have I spoken with the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, or the hon. member for Edmonton West, both of whom are out of Ottawa. I have spoken with all other hon. members whose names were provided to me by the Clerk and they have asked that their questions of privilege be deferred, without prejudice to the questions being brought before Your Honour at a later time.

I rise to make this statement on their behalf. It would also perhaps assist the business of the day if any other hon. members who may have questions of privilege arising out of today's proceedings were to defer those questions until Monday and if they would notify the Chair of any such intentions which might exist.

Madam Speaker: I can assure the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that those hon. members who deferred their questions of privilege will be heard on Monday, or at a time when they are in the House. Their notices stand. Since negotiations did take place between the members I can accept the hon. member's representations.

With respect to those members who are not in the House, I will have to renew the notices. I am not sure what the rules say on this particular point. I can give assurances to those members who have agreed to defer their questions that they will be heard later.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): As House leader for the Conservative party, might I ask Your Honour to give the same assurance with respect to those hon. members who are not in the House today? I undertake to do the canvassing and I will report directly to you, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Yes. Those hon. members might have heard that questions of privilege were being deferred and perhaps they decided that theirs would be as well. I can accept what the hon. member asks with respect to the other three hon. members.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. KNOWLES—USE OF UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE BY MR. ELLIS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to a different matter. During the presenting of motions under Standing Order 43 earlier this morning, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis), in referring to a motion made yesterday by my colleague, the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly), used the word "scurrilous."

On Thursday, March 26, I used that word. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) both complained and said that I should not have used that word and should withdraw it. As Your Honour will recall, I was co-operative. I wasted no time and I withdrew it.

I am surprised that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta were not on their feet complaining about their colleague's use of the word. If it was unparliamentary for me to use that word, I submit it is also unparliamentary for a Tory to use it.

Madam Speaker: I want to apologize to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and to the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly). I thought I heard that word used today. I asked the clerks to ascertain whether they had heard it, and they were in doubt as well. But since the hon. member raises this issue, and since the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis) is in the House, I think he would want to put the record straight and substitute another word.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, of course I did not look at the list of unparliamentary words in moving my motion under Standing Order 43. I wanted to use the strongest word possible. I withdraw the word if it is inappropriate and substitute the word "disgusting", or some other equally strong word.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I know that he is a man of precision and that he would like the record to be accurate. I would point out to him and to Your Honour that he never did withdraw the word "scurrilous". He said that he would if Madam Speaker asked him to do so, but since, in your graciousness, you did not really compel him, he never did withdraw it.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did withdraw the word, and he replaced it with another.

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, I wish to reserve my right to raise a question of privilege on Monday with respect to the motion proposed under Standing Order 43, by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member can send me a written notice of his question of privilege, informing me of what it is about.

MR. McCAIN—RESPONSE OF MR. AXWORTHY DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Madam Speaker, my point of order is this. I do not think the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) intended to mislead anybody, but the information he gave in his answer is somewhat confusing. For instance, the ministerial advisory board can only deal with the subject matter put before it. However, I wish to discuss misleading answers—

Madam Speaker: I am sorry. The fact that an hon. member is not satisfied with an answer, thinks that it is incomplete or might be misleading in some way does not form the basis of a question of privilege. If an hon. member wants clarification of a matter, he can come back in the House and ask a question of the minister, but it certainly does not constitute the basis of a question of privilege.

Mr. McCain: Madam Speaker, hon. members have been charged by the minister with a responsibility which is not, in fact, theirs, namely the responsibility of advising everyone in the constituency who might wish to apply for assistance under a government program that such a program exists. I submit that while hon. members do their level best to advise everyone in their constituency of any program which is in existence, it is always supplemented by advertising, and it is very misleading to lay the onus—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The reason I cannot accept the hon. member's question of privilege is that I would have to make a judgment on the quality of the answer which was given by the hon. minister. When answers to questions are not satisfactory to hon. members, they do have recourse. They can seek clarification during the question period or at some other time.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Madam Speaker, if I understand correctly, your policy concerning questions of privilege applies to all hon. members and, in this case, will my question be deferred as well?

Madam Speaker: Of course. If the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier wishes to defer his question of privilege, I will give him the same opportunity to raise it at another time.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,642, 2,067, 2,091, 2,133, 2,205, 2,206, 2,207 and 2,209.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

QUEBEC IMPORTS AND EXPORTS

Question No. 1,642—Mr. Herbert:

What was the value of Quebec imports and exports with (a) the Atlantic provinces (b) Ontario (c) the prairie provinces (d) British Columbia (e) the territories (f) foreign countries, for the year 1979 or the latest year for which such information is available?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports that there is no comprehensive set of data available at this time on the value of Quebec imports and exports by region of Canada and the rest of the world. Administrative systems have not been designed to capture interprovincial trade data, nor are provinces identified in international trade statistics. The provincial economic accounts published by Statistics Canada estimates the aggregate provincial net export as a residual and sheds no light on interprovincial import/export. A project initiated in May, 1979, to estimate commodity detail of provincial trade holds promise of supplying interprovincial trade data, but results are not yet available. Some information of oblique pertinence to the question is implicit in the 1967, 1974 and 1979 surveys of origin and destination of manufacturers shipments in transportation surveys. But the analysis needed to focus this information onto the particular question is not available and would be complex.

MIRABEL AIRPORT—SALE OF ADJACENT LAND

Question No. 2,067—Mr. Cossitt:

Does the government intend to sell 78,000 acres of land adjacent to the Mirabel Airport and, if so (a) was the land originally purchased by the government along with other land for the airport (b) what was the total cost that was paid by the government for the land that it now plans to sell including all acquisition costs of any kind (c) what is the net estimated or budgeted figure expected to be recovered by the government from the sale of the land (d) on what date will the sale begin and what restrictions, if any, will be placed on the use of the land by purchasers?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): The Minister of Public Works Canada announced on February 3, 1981, that 78,000 acres of land adjacent to the Mirabel Airport would be disposed of by the federal government. Some lands will be sold, others will be leased.

(a) The 78,000 acres was acquired by expropriation on March 27, 1969, along with the other land for the airport operational area.

(b) Total cost for the 78,000 acres was approximately $120 million.

(c) There is no estimated or budgeted figure at this time.

(d) A plan of action for the disposition is being prepared which will include an analysis of the restrictions that may be required.

DND—CONTRACT WITH UNIVERSITY OF B.C.

Question No. 2,091—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence place a contract for $23,541 with the University of British Columbia to develop a life quality improvement program data bank and, if so, what exactly is the life quality improvement program and what is the purpose of the data bank?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): On December 29, 1980, the Department of Supply and Services awarded a contract to the University of British Columbia on behalf of the Department of National Defence for the investigation into the development of a Life Quality Improvement Program (LQIP) Data Bank for $23,541.00. The Life Quality Improvement Program is a preventive medicine program designed to shift emphasis from costly diagnosis and cure of disease to the hopefully more cost-effective identification and reduction of health risks for a given population. The purpose of the data bank is to integrate accumulated results from divergent sources including departmental fitness programs, smoking cessation research and lifestyle patterning research at various Canadian universities and government agencies.

CFB PERSONNEL—LAND FORCES—WESTERN CANADA AND NORTH

Question No. 2,133—Mr. Lambert:

1. In the four western provinces, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, what Canadian Forces Bases are manned by ground elements personnel and which units are located at such bases?

2. Which units are on station and which units are in service elsewhere?

3. What is the establishment strength of all ground element forces in western Canada, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories?

4. What are the actual strengths as at February 1, 1981?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Canadian Forces Bases are no longer exclusively manned by one element or another. However, there is frequently a predominance of one element or another depending on the functional command to which the base belongs (i.e. Maritime, Mobile or Air Command). In providing the following data it is to be noted that maritime, land or air elements are predominating rather than exclusive on the bases so annotated.

SECRETARY OF STATE—HANSARD TRANSLATORS

Question No. 2,205—Mr. Herbert:

How many persons are employed by the Department of the Secretary of State for the translation of Hansard, parliamentary documents and translation service for members of Parliament?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): As of March 12, 1981, 30 translators or revisers are employed by the Department of the Secretary of State for the translation of Hansard, and 34 for the translation of parliamentary documents and translation service for members.

SECRETARY OF STATE—INTERPRETERS

Question No. 2,206—Mr. Herbert:

1. How many persons are employed by the Department of the Secretary of State for interpretation work and are they divided between the House of Commons, the Senate and committee work?

2. How many are for (a) official language (b) multilingual interpretation?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): 1. As of March 12, 1981, 77 persons are employed by the Department of the Secretary of State for interpretation; of these, 12 are assigned to House of Commons and Senate work, and 29 translator-interpreters and reviser-interpreters are assigned to committee work.

2. (a) Interpreters in the official languages number 72

(b) The number of interpreters in the multilingual section is 5.

SECRETARY OF STATE—COMMITTEE TRANSLATORS

Question No. 2,207—Mr. Herbert:

How many persons are employed by the Department of the Secretary of State for the translation of Committee Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): The number of persons employed by the Department of the Secretary of State for the translation of Committee Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence is 33.

EXPENDITURE AUTHORITY—AMOUNT OF LAPSE

Question No. 2,209—Mr. Herbert:

What was the amount of the lapse in expenditure authority in each of the past five years and what is the amount estimated for the current year?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): The actual lapse of expenditure authority over the last five years and the estimate of the lapse in the current year are provided in the table below:

1975-76	1,270
1978-79	1,496
1980-81	946 (estimated)

The apparent reduction in the magnitude of the lapse in 1978-79 and 1979-80 is attributable to the fact that final authority for spending in each year was derived from Governor-General's Warrants, as Parliament was not in session. The reduced estimate of the lapse in 1980-81 is due to the anticipated impact of the introduction of the pay-at-year-end method of accounting.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1981-82

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed from Friday, March 20, consideration of Bill C-59, to provide supplementary borrowing authority, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and on the motion of Mr. Blenkarn (p. 8463).

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) take his seat. I was afraid I would be speaking in the absence of someone representing that department today. When we were last in this House, we were talking about a juggling act, and I am very impressed with the act being performed by this government.

The day this debate was cut off, the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) referred to our desire to eliminate increased expenditure on social programs. The reason increases are required is that this government's spending programs are out of control, and inflation causes increased spending.

An hon. Member: Ridiculous.

Mr. Fennell: We are not against social programs, but we are against increased government spending. This government is perpetrating a continuous fraud on the Canadian public. This fraud would not be permitted in any other part of the world. If the government was a corporation, the board of directors would be thrown out. In other democracies the government would be thrown out. That is what should be done.

This government has the nerve to come before this House and ask for $14 billion. It already has $4.8 billion in the bank. That would give it a total of $18.8 billion. It is bad enough that it anticipates a deficit of $14 billion, but now it says that it will have to borrow $18.8 billion to keep this country afloat.

I am not surprised the government was wrong about inflation. It is like shooting a gun into the sky. This government is an absolute glutton pretending to be on a diet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fennell: It has absolutely no respect for the taxpayers of this country. It is the money of the taxpayers which the government is spending, not the government's. It has not earned it.

In view of this hoard of money which is sitting in the Bank of Canada, it is my opinion that the government should reconsider its request to this Parliament and that our party should reconsider our amendment. We should not even allow it to have $8 billion; we should cut the amount down to $3.2 billion. We should make the government consider how it will spend the money before it squanders it on our behalf.

Every time the government borrows excess funds—which it is doing right now—it destroys the opportunity for industry to raise funds at reasonable rates. It destroys the housing industry. People cannot afford to pay the interest on mortgages. It eliminates the possibility for Canadians to become home owners, which is their one great dream.

Government borrowing creates inflation which is erasing the value of the savings of senior citizens. This is referred to in the pensions conference which is taking place. The government will index that next. The only reason for indexing is that this government knows how to throw its money away.

In our opinion, this government is totally inept and incompetent. This is very clearly exemplified in this bill. Its ineptness is also clearly shown in the energy program which has been presented and which it will now hopefully have to backtrack on.

The government cannot throw the blame for having to borrow this money on to us because we were only in government for nine months. It is necessitated by a series of incompetent budgets presented by the Liberal government since 1968. In those budgets and in its requests for funds, it has never requested funds to help industry. It only borrows funds to spend. What are we doing for industrial development in this country? What has the government done in 13 years? Nothing. Does the government realize that at current rates of interest, without any additional borrowing, if it stopped today and said that it would not borrow any more money, our debt would amount to $200 billion by 1986? That would be the result if we voted in this House not to permit any further borrowing; our debt would still be $200 billion. That is assuming there were no additional deficits and that the government did not require any money. That is assuming the interest rate, which is now in place because of this inflationary spiral, continues.

Furthermore, does the government realize that by 1986—is less than five years away—the interest to carry this debt will amount to $1,000 for each man, woman and child in this country? Let us assume that an average Canadian family consists of 3.5 people, a mother and father and 1.5 children. Assuming that, the amount of $3,500 has to be brought home by the wage earner just for the government to pay the bill. That is assuming we have a balanced budget and that we are not carrying on with this throw-away program with which the government has been doing so well. I plead with the government to stop coming back to the trough. We are destroying ourselves and our country. We must stop doing that and we must stop now. We have run out of goodwill overseas. Where do we go next to borrow money if we are turned down?

The government keeps borrowing additional sums to buy up private corporations. Do hon. members realize that every time a private corporation is purchased a taxpayer is eliminated? Once a company becomes a Crown corporation, it does not earn any money. That is why we are borrowing more money—to buy corporations that can become non-profit organizations. Such a procedure erodes our tax base. It erodes the chance for this country to have a balanced budget.

I maintain it is time for the government to stop borrowing money and start to encourage the private sector instead. Productivity should be increased, and this will result in increased revenue, eliminating the need to borrow money. If a corporation were to carry on in this way, it would go broke. A good example is Chrysler. The government had to bail out Chrysler. That was just another example of throwing money away. In the case of Massey-Ferguson, which kept borrowing too much money, again the government had to bail the company out. But let me ask hon. members this: Who is going to bail out the government?

Mr. Malone: The citizens.

Mr. Fennell: If the government would be reasonable with its energy program and let the price of oil go to 75 per cent of world prices, levy a logical tax on oil instead of the Mickey Mouse taxes the government keeps pushing around, we would have revenues accruing to the government. This would eliminate the necessity to borrow more money. The government has this grandiose economic idea that it does not matter how much money we borrow because we can carry on. The government has no desire to restrict expenditures. It does nothing to earn money. The government has never tried to earn money, nor has it ever tried to save money. The government just likes to spend money.

Mr. Taylor: Other people's money.

Mr. Fennell: A good example, again concerning energy, is that the government has encouraged Canadians to continue to buy gas guzzlers. As a result, Canadian manufacturers have not made small vehicles. No one wanted them. Then all of a sudden, who got caught with their pants down? The government did. I will acknowledge that. However, if the government had faced reality in 1973, the auto industry today would be healthy. Chrysler would not be in the position of having to be bailed out. If the government had allowed the logical sequence to occur, then all the gas guzzlers would have hit the scrapyards and we would be driving cars we hope we will see by 1986. The only reason small cars will be manufactured in this country is that our friends to the south of us had enough sense to realize it is the only way to eliminate excessive use of gasoline.

Mr. Smith: What kind of a car do you drive?

Mr. Fennell: I drive a very economical car. It is called an Omni. There is a plant in my constituency that produces Omnis. Because the Americans will accept world prices for gasoline by 1983-1984, this will have an impact on the cars we buy. It will help production of our cars. But what have we done for ourselves? We have done absolutely nothing.

The government keeps boasting about the employment it has created in Canada. The government has not created any additional employment. It employs many people, and every time the government employs additional people, Mr. Speaker, it simply increases our deficit. This is not productive. It does not produce cars, nor does it produce wheat. It does not produce anything except a bunch of bureaucratic servants in Ottawa.

I suggest that this government should be innovative. It should start an exchange program for civil servants. It should send those people out to the private sector, so long as the private sector can stand them. The government should send these people out to the private sector for two years. They may then learn by experience and by being exposed to the private sector how hard it is to make a buck. These people may then reconsider their free-wheeling, give-away programs. I come from the private sector and I can say I have been successful, but I had to work hard. I would love to employ a civil servant and let him know what it really means to make money and how hard it is to make it. He will then understand that he should not be quite so free in giving money away. What the government is doing is immoral. The government is taking money right out of the Canadian people's pockets. It is not taking it from welfare recipients or from people who do not want to work; it is taking it out of the guts of Canadians, those people who pay the bills.

Many times in this House I have compared the Canadian small business program with the American small business program. What have we done to face the industrial problem in this country? Why do we not plagiarize something that is beneficial? The small business program in the United States has worked well. Small industries are growing throughout small towns in the United States. Why does the government not look at what the United States has done? If the government brought forward a borrowing bill in that regard, I would support it wholeheartedly. I would be behind the government and would do everything to encourage it. I would find people who would be interested in entering the manufacturing sector of Canada. We should stop exporting our raw materials. I would be one hundred per cent behind the government if it did that, and I think hon. members can appreciate that. This is a way to get the country moving. I tell the government to stop purchasing the private sector now. Let the private sector carry on by itself. The private sector can look after itself.

Free enterprise is the right to win and the right to lose. I do not believe we should subsidize free enterprise. Although I believe we should help free enterprise, I do not necessarily agree with what this country has done in the past. Free enterprisers should either swing and be successful or they should fail. But the government must not carry on subsidizing or purchasing private industry. Whenever the government purchases private enterprise, all it is doing is putting money in other people's pockets. In a most recent case, many Belgians will become very rich from our great endeavour in broadening the base of Petro-Canada.

The government should take a good look at what has happened. The government should be directing the way in foreign affairs and equalization. It should be looking after those people who are incapable of looking after themselves. But I say to the government, do not keep treading on everybody and eroding the base on which this country is built.

I am proud when Air Canada makes a profit, but Canadian Pacific has to make a profit or it will go out of business. If a Crown corporation cannot make a profit, I maintain it should be disbanded. I am talking about Crown corporations directly in competition with the private sector, not Crown corporations established from an essential or a security point of view. I say allow the private sector to operate in the real world. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) stated, I believe in the last election campaign: "The gradual reduction of inflation and interest rates is the only viable solution to the problem." I support that statement wholeheartedly. I would ask him to read his statement again and put it into practice. This is where the problem must be attacked. The government's spending is out of control and he has not put a lid on it at this time. Do the government really know the consequences of the borrowing authority they are asking for? Do they really care, or is their only purpose to get through the next election?

Miss Nicholson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fennell: When I am finished, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I just remind the hon. member it is his choice whether to accept or not accept the question. If he completes his time, I cannot allow a question after that.

Mr. Fennell: Mr. Speaker, I planned to speak for 20 minutes. If I finish before that I will accept a question. I am trying to follow a theme. I spent time putting this together. If I do not have time, I will speak to the hon. member later.

How long will it be before the government come back again? Are they going to come back and ask for $18 billion? Are the government going to say they need more money because the foreign banks want their interest and they do not have the money to pay it? The only benefactors of this bill will be the foreign banks. This money will be exported out of the country in the same way that we export money to purchase oil, a resource we have in this country which could be developed today.

How many small Canadian businesses and factories will be able to get loans at reasonable interest rates when the government is sopping up the entire capital markets of this country? How many more factories will have to postpone retooling? All we hear is criticism about the productivity of our work force. The criticism should be directed toward this government, because factories cannot raise the money required to retool and thereby make the workers more productive. Tools are required as well as human beings.

How many more tax dollars will the Unemployment Insurance Commission have to pay out because of this government's greed? Instead of holding their nose, they should look past the end of it. When will Canadians get the long-term, economic planning they deserve?

I have used more than my nineteen and three quarters minutes. I appreciate it very much.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in this debate, not because I am happy we are dealing with the bill but because I am happy to express some concerns I have about the way the government spends taxpayers' dollars.

To begin, I think it is fair to say that even including the constitutional debate, more people have raised with me the expenditure of tax dollars by the government and the heavy borrowing the government has now undertaken as a matter of course than any other single topic we have had before us in the last year and two months.

I know from canvassing my constituency, travelling around this province and across the country that a great deal of concern is being expressed, and rightly so, by the people of Canada about the future of this country, its economy and the way in which it is being managed or not managed, and the problems of an ever-increasing tax burden on average wage earners. The majority of people have put the case very well. You cannot expect the average wage earner to assume an ever-larger share of the indebtedness caused by government expenditure if his wages consistently fall behind the increasing cost of living.

That has been the case over the course of the last few years. People are earning less in comparison to the impact of inflation and the increasing cost of living. The government is contributing to the decline in disposable income of the average family in Canada as a result of the policy pursued through this bill and the policies it pursues in terms of its over-all economic strategy.

It is important that we give serious thought to the over-all effect of continuing this kind of carte blanche borrowing authority, given without any consideration being placed before the House of Commons as to the purpose and without any careful analysis having been made of the impact on the money markets and the economic growth of this country. I want to say categorically that economic growth cannot be maintained or enhanced by an ever-increasing debt load.

The government cannot and must not encourage unnecessary borrowing in the money markets. As government borrows ever-increasing larger sums of money from what is considered by most analysts a finite market, the end result is that the cost of money is driven up. It influences the availability of funds for small and not so small enterprises. It detrimentally affects the capacity of wage earners to borrow for necessary purchases because the cost of borrowing goes beyond the ability of the average family to repay. No matter what your philosophy or ideology, there are some things that are true and irrefutable and therefore have to be given a great deal of consideration by the House of Commons.

In looking at this bill and the amendment before us we have to recognize, as I said last night, that this bill should not be dealt with in haste. It is far too important to be dealt with in isolation from all other economic considerations and in haste.

I personally believe that the government ought not to be given the amount of money it is asking for. That does not mean I do not understand the necessity to be able to borrow. However, I do not think the government needs, nor should it ask for, a full year's borrowing allowance from the House of Commons. The government should be prepared to come back to the House of Commons, at the bare minimum, every six months to justify both the expenditure levels and the amount of borrowing that must take place. The government must be prepared to come back and allow a more careful analysis of the economic conditions which exist at the time the borrowing is required in order that we can understand the way in which that money is to be used and the way in which we will budget over the course of time for its repayment.

I hate to argue this again as I argued it in another House at another time, but the government should not ask for 12 months' borrowing authority. Neither should it request that it be allowed to carry over unused borrowing powers. We should insist, as Members of Parliament charged with the responsibility of challenging the expenditures of government, that before any approval is given at any time the government should justify its request, not only in terms of use but also in terms of the way in which it will ultimately repay it.

I can see no fundamental justification for moving from $14 billion to $8 billion, so for that reason I am prepared to support the amendment. We should allow the government less latitude rather than more in the amount of indebtedness it incurs on behalf of the people of the country.

I also think it is a flagrant disregard of the obligations of parliamentarians to expect that we will at the early part of a fiscal year give the government the unfettered right to go out and borrow for whatever purpose it sees fit. I cannot support that as a principle which withstands the test of the process for which Parliament was intended to serve.

I have looked at the problems of borrowing. I have believed for years that we have unnecessarily encouraged indebtedness. Let us consider credit cards. My God, who does not have them? We have credit cards without any checks and balances which have permitted people to extend their borrowing far in excess of their ability to pay.

An hon. Member: Even in Scotland.

Mr. Deans: Even in Scotland? That was a very intelligent interjection. I thought the hon. member was saying something important.

The interesting thing about this is that because it is possible for an individual in the country to carry far more than one credit card with limits on each, and to borrow without any cross-reference, we have allowed and encouraged individual citizens to incur debts they frankly cannot afford. The end result of that we can see in every bankruptcy court across the country. We can see people being put into the position of declaring bankruptcy when up until a few years ago they would never have considered the possibility of being forced to do that.

For a long time I have felt that a person in this country requires but one credit card, if one is required at all. The spending limit, calculated on the basis of their indebtedness and obligations, should appear on the face of the credit card. With one phone call it would be possible to check whether a person had exceeded or was almost at the limit of his credit in order that he does not fall into the trap of borrowing beyond his means.

You cannot impose that on the public, even if it is decided that that is in their best interests, unless you are prepared to exercise the same kind of control, caution and care when the government borrows and commits the public of Canada to an ever-increasing tax burden to meet whatever the government decides are the expenditure priorities which fit its particular political mood at the time.

The end result of this kind of bill, which comes before the House of Commons and every legislative assembly almost every year—certainly I cannot think of a situation in which it does not occur—with the pressure this exerts on the money market and money markets of the world, is that others must pay ever higher interest rates. Those higher interest rates are reflected in higher prices and in higher domestic interest rates. Those higher prices and higher domestic interest rates reduce the amount of expendable capital. That reduction in the amount of expendable capital means a reduction in the manufacturing sector because of the reduction in the amount of purchasing which takes place. The end result of that, of course, is that fewer people are required to work. Manufacturers for a while carry a larger inventory, but the cost of carrying that inventory pushes prices up even further. The end result of all that is that there is less available capital in the country. What we see then is the government, because it cannot raise the money it believes it requires through the tax structure, going back to the market place to borrow even more, and the process starts all over again.

Therefore, what I am suggesting to the government, through you, Mr. Speaker, is that we desperately need an opportunity to take a look at the over-all fiscal and monetary policies of the government, and not only of this government. I might say that this is probably true of almost every jurisdiction in this country. I think it is necessary when dumping on the government, as it is the opposition's bent to do, to recognize that the government is allowed to get into these sloppy habits by a House of Commons which does not demand that it respond properly and adequately to the needs, desires, wishes and requirements, if you will, of the electorate, the people who must ultimately pay the bills.

We will not support the bill. We will support the amendment and I suggest the amendment should carry. I hope the government will pay heed to my plea that we not be required to give a full year's approval, but rather that we restrict it to six months at a time. I would respectfully ask the government to consider whether or not it will abandon its request to carry over the billions of dollars into the next fiscal year in the borrowing authority for which it is asking, and which its majority will undoubtedly get for it. I would ask the government to be more cautious and more prudent, to spend money as though it was its own rather than as though it was somebody else's, like the proverbial drunken sailor who never knows when to stop. That is what appears to be happening now and we cannot afford it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, talking about borrowing legislation is an all too frequent duty we perform in this House. It would now seem that almost every six months we are called upon as Members of Parliament to talk about the government borrowing more money.

While I will in the time at my disposal try to criticize this particular borrowing legislation, I want to make it clear it is not my opinion that the government should take the view that it necessarily would have to cut down its social and other programs which are of service to Canadians. It is fair to say, I think, that all the programs the government has today are not necessarily of service to Canadians and there is some trimming that can take place.

More importantly, this government has taken the view that it is able to pay for what is required only by taxation and by borrowing, without taking a look at the more important aspect, the generation of wealth in Canada. The very nature of the way the government borrows increases the tax burden on all Canadians.

In this legislation the government is requesting some $14 billion in borrowing authority, but its main estimates show legitimate requirements of only $11 billion. In other words, the government is setting aside an additional $3 billion for movie money, spillage or loose change, and that is not accounted for. That is something which this opposition, combined with members of the New Democratic Party, ought to be opposing. No one should be granting any government authority to go to the market to borrow money when it has not accounted for the need for it.

This government is asking that we as the Parliament of Canada authorize it to borrow money for which it has not indicated any requirement. Why should we be asked to do that? Why should we be asked to give this government money when the people of Canada do not know whether it will be used to promote the agricultural industry, industrial sales or Lord knows what? This money might be used to promote what might be, in the eyes of some, wasteful programs. The prime purpose behind the establishment of Parliament was control of the King's purse. The purpose of Parliament today is to control government expenditures, and I submit that this government has not really accounted for its expenditures in a justifiable way.

A review of the recent history of this government shows that we should be concerned about more than just today's bill, which may appear legitimate in isolation but is not. I believe in Hamlet a situation like this is described as mirrors facing mirrors—borrowing upon borrowing upon borrowing. In the last four years this government has borrowed some $40.1 billion. The projected deficits for the next four years, not counting this one, amount to an additional $51.8 billion. In other words, in the eight-year period beginning four years ago and projected four years into the future we will have borrowed some $100 billion. Canada has a population of 24 million people. A debt of $100 billion will be an albatross around the neck of Canadian society.

Today the government is asking for the authority to borrow $14 billion. It has indicated a need for only $11 billion. The government is asking for more than it requires, and it has not shown why it needs that extra money. For that reason alone the government ought not to be granted permission to borrow in the international market, because by its very nature that borrowing is a detriment to the Canadian citizen.

The truth of the matter is that of every $4 the Canadian taxpayer pays in tax, one of those dollars goes to pay interest on accumulated foreign debt. By adding another $3 billion to the required $11 billion in the main estimates as a spillage allowance just for unforeseen, unknown contingencies, the government is asking Canadian taxpayers to accept a greater tax burden. That militates against our balance of payments because it is an outflow of money. That outflow will increase taxes in our country but, more significantly, it reduces the rate of growth of wealth in the private sector of our nation. We could have all we have in this country plus more, but we must generate wealth by giving incentives to those people who use their imaginations to create.

This country is being run by a group of men and women who simply do not understand the scope and potential of the land. They do not have any understanding of money. They have the piggy-bank philosophy of people much younger than most of the people here.

During the past year the government chose to bail out Chrysler Corporation and Massey-Ferguson because they were unsuccessful, but the strongest and most successful industry in Canada at the time was the oil industry, which the government chose to nationalize. Through disincentives, the potential for some of the greatest employment and wealth opportunities not only for Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia but also Ontario, Quebec and the rest of Canada has been driven away. Two tar sands plants have been closed down because of the inability of this government to recognize that oil is not found, as it were, in a lake underneath the ground.

Hon. members opposite do not understand the concept of a tertiary formation. They believe, falsely, that the only reason for requested oil price increases is the existence of OPEC. That is false and wrong. There are new capital costs involved in the production of oil in this country. We now have to wash rock with solvents in order to bring oil from under the ground to the surface. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has been unable to come to an agreement on price, and that inability has stopped two tar sands projects.

I want to put on the record just what projects have been stopped. Many in this country think this government has hurt only Alberta, which it has. I come from that province and I know. However, I want hon. members opposite to know that they have also hurt very seriously the province of Ontario. The people of that province need jobs. In its 25-year lifetime one tar sands plant would put $108 billion into the Ontario economy through direct expenditure. This expenditure is on iron, steel, financing, trades and services. This expenditure is on the fabrication of machinery. The list goes on and on and adds up to direct expenditures of $108 billion in the province of Ontario.

This country is one of the few which has the luxury of being able to talk about energy self-sufficiency. We have that potential. To realize it we need eight tar sands plants. Something in excess of $800 billion could have been poured into Ontario in the next 25 years, but this government has embarked on a program to stop such progress and has let the citizens of central Canada blame the province of Alberta. According to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the people of Alberta will be rich beyond our wildest imagination.

Even if there were not direct expenditures in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec as a result of the development of the potential we have, indirect spending would put more money into the pockets of people in the Atlantic region, the north, the west and other regions, and they would do with that money what anyone would do. They would spend it. People would buy automobiles made in central Canada. They would buy clothing made in Quebec or Ontario. They would buy refrigerators, toasters and other appliances made in central Canada. Eighty per cent of newly generated wealth in any region circulates through the industrial basin within six months. There is no truth to the suggestion that if the regions get richer, the centre becomes poorer. That is false thinking. This government does not need to go to the international trough to borrow money because this land has the potential to create wealth to a degree which would be unimaginable to any other nation in the world. Fish and tin are the only resources Japan has, yet it has one of the best economies in the world.

We in this country want for nothing. We have agricultural lands, mineral wealth, forests, fresh waters and oceans. With all this we can create wealth. We do not need to go to the international market.

I see, sir, that it is one o'clock. You are probably hungry, so I will continue at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being one o'clock, and the occupant of the chair being hungry, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. At one o'clock when the House rose the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) had the floor.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, the first thing I want to do on one of the loveliest days that Ottawa has experienced in some time is to thank you, sir, for coming back. Spring is here in Ottawa.

Before one o'clock we were speaking on a most serious matter, the borrowing bill, in which the government is asking Parliament for authority to enter the international markets and borrow $14 billion to maintain its programs. As outlined, and I will not dwell on it, they indicate they need some $11 billion, yet there is a request for $14 billion. In short, they are asking Parliament to underwrite $3 billion for which they have not accounted. And that, sir, as I indicated before lunch, is wrong in principle.

Equally wrong is a country like Canada having to borrow in the first place, when we have the potential for tremendous generation of wealth. If we bear in mind that our gross national debt is now $120 billion, our biggest budgetary expense is the servicing of this debt. The greatest outflow of capital from Canada is not the multinational corporations, as some would have this Parliament believe; it is not somebody coming in from outside and taking our money away. The greatest outflow of capital from Canada is the money paid to service our foreign debt. And that debt hamstrings Canadians in their attempt to achieve the standard of living they deserve.

I believe, sir, it is somewhat difficult for the public to comprehend the magnitude of these numbers. We talk about borrowing $14 billion, and in this amendment we ask that that amount be reduced to some $8 billion, thereby giving the government a portion of what they ask for but also making them more accountable to us for their borrowing requirements. To put this in perspective, I remind those Canadians who have never seen $1 billion that a $1 bill is exactly six inches long, and if you place one billion of them end to end you will have a line stretching from Vancouver to Halifax two and half times. The amount this government seeks under closure is 35 ribbons of $1 bills stretching from Vancouver to Halifax, and this after only two days of debate and analysis. That, I submit, is the second thing that is wrong.

As I was saying before, what we in this nation ought to do is look to the wealth we can create. If we look at a country such as Japan with 110 million people, its only resources are fish and tin yet it has one of the strongest economies in the world. The Japanese are outstripping us in the automotive and electronic markets. Now they are outstripping us in the steel industry; they are producing as much steel as North America and almost as much as the European Common Market. On this little island of Japan, people have been given the incentive to work and have been encouraged to put their industries in place. It is a land with little resource; here we are with virtually everything.

The Japanese import their uranium, coal and oil for energy; they import their wood for whatever they might build. They do this at world prices, yet they are competitive in the automotive industry. We in Canada try to guard against natural increases in the prices of world commodities. Our automotive industry bought that line. Since 1971 the government has tried to pad the cushion. Now we are paying $240 million in guaranteed loans to the Chrysler Corporation because it is not adjusting to world conditions.

Our country needs to get back to a sound basis of economics which will allow us to go forward and make changes that adjust to the new conditions of our time, instead of having government interference. Instead of promoting the entrepreneurial minds of the nation, the government becomes the stumbling block which trips up the private sector.

Our country should not have to borrow. We should be making more than we are at the present time from tax revenues. We should have a much wealthier private sector because there is no nation in the world with resources as rich as ours.

I see Mr. Speaker giving me a victory signal. I appreciate that, but I want to indicate that the philosophy of this nation is doing an untold injustice to Canadians. As a citizen of this country and as a resident of Alberta, I want to share with all that it does not make sense to pour out of our nation nearly $4 billion every year for the purchase of offshore petroleum. This gives Canadians a terrible deal.

We are buying oil from Mexico. Some people think we are purchasing it at world price, but I submit that we are not. We are purchasing it at a price which is much higher than world price. Oil is not just oil. For example, Albertan oil is some of the highest quality oil in the world. Mexican oil is a Maya oil; it is heavy oil; it is sludge oil. In truth it is junk oil. It takes 1.5 barrels to 1.6 barrels of Mexican oil to make the equivalent amount of gasoline which would come from an Alberta barrel. We are not paying $38, $40 or $42 per barrel for Mexican oil because we are only getting a portion of the amount in gasoline. It could be argued that we are paying as high as $54 per barrel because of that conversion factor.

When we get the Mexican oil here, it cannot be refined as cheaply. The federal government tries to make the citizens of Canada believe that somehow it is looking after the centre, when the fact of the matter is that it is holding Canadians back and discriminating against them in many ways.

Before the luncheon break I mentioned the two tar sands plants which have been slowed down in Alberta. They would have generated wealth not only in Alberta but in Ontario as well. I should like to put on the record what one of those plants would have meant to the province of Ontario in terms of generating wealth. Out of the $108 billion in direct spending in the province of Ontario, $800 million would have been spent in iron and steel; $370 million would have been spent for metal fabrication and machinery; $325 million would have been spent for transportation equipment. I see Mr. Speaker is indicating that my time is up, but I would like to finish by saying that another $740 million would be spent in Ontario for manufacturing and processing and another $370 million for financing.

In conclusion, the country needs money, but borrowing is not the only way to get money. There are other methods; we can generate wealth within the country by encouraging our citizens. This is one of the greatest nations in the world. It has the potential, and we must excite our citizens to it. This is one of the lucky countries which has such potential.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Trade)): Mr. Speaker, I had not planned on taking part in this debate, but what has happened in the House in recent weeks and the repeated delays responsible for the fact that we are only now studying a bill which should normally have been passed several days ago, have perhaps made me more aware of the issue concerning the borrowing authority of the government and the related question of successive budgetary deficits of the Canadian government.

No one likes deficits, Mr. Speaker. I am convinced that the Minister of Finance, or rather the Minister of State responsible for Finance (Mr. Bussières) dislikes deficits as much as the financial manager of a big company or even the couple who, on going over its budget at the end of the month, realizes that it is in the red for a few dollars and will have to borrow money from the bank or another source.

However, Mr. Speaker, the fact is that this estimated deficit of $11 billion, which does not take into account any contingencies, has to be financed. This is necessary if we do not want or are not able to eliminate it completely. And when I speak of eliminating it completely, I mean immediately since the cash requirements of the government aim at meeting commitments that the House accepted in the past and has asked the government to see to it by administering certain programs. Unless we cut back drastically on these programs, the government needs sufficient funds to pay for them. The dilemna which we must therefore face, and this is the reason for today's debate, is that either we have the necessary amount in the treasury or else we do not have it. For the moment, we do not have it!

The second dilemma would be as follows: Either we administer the programs approved by the House itself in the past, or else we cut back on these programs. That is the second dilemma.

What are the facts finally? The facts are as follows: Considering the estimated revenue for the current fiscal year, we have additional cash requirements of $11 billion. Second, because of a certain number of contingencies in the Canadian economy, it might be possible and even desirable that these cash requirements be increased, and the government has provided for this purpose an additional borrowing authority of $3 billion. The government hopes that it will need less, but it could eventually need more. Let us suppose, for instance, that the world oil prices increase and that the compensation offered by the Canadian government increases proportionately. The reserve would melt away like snow in the sun.

These are the facts. The only thing that the government wants to do with this bill is not to approve or reapprove the programs already approved by this House, it is not to obtain a blank cheque to do as it pleases without taking into account any need to reassess some of the existing programs. Not at all! The only thing that the government is doing is to ask the House to provide the necessary funds to administer these programs.

If we, the members of this House, believe that some of these programs should be re-evaluated, that is fine. We only have to make suggestions. The opposition has during every session a number of allotted days during which it can suggest cutbacks to certain programs or any other action that it would like the government to take, and these issues are discussed and eventually voted on. This is the proper way to proceed.

Although some people say it is not enough, in its budget tabled last November the government itself set up a contingency plan in an effort to curb rising government expenditures. That is another possible and regular avenue since the government presents its budget and the House deals with it through the votes taken after the budget debate. But that is not what we are doing today, Mr. Speaker. The only thing we are doing today through this bill is simply to authorize the government to administer its programs and to have the funds to do so.

In the present conditions I find it somewhat difficult to understand why the opposition should be so dead set against this provision. I can see why a certain number of members would rise on both sides of the House to deplore the deficit and increasing government expenditures; that is normal and it is our duty; it is normal as well in the end that distress signals be flashed to spur the government into doing more to put the lid on its expenses, and I accept that. But when they resort to a filibuster to prevent the adoption of a measure which in the end will do nothing more than release funds or authorize borrowing so that the government will be able to administer the programs which we ourselves have adopted, I fail to see there anything so improper that they would force the government to invoke closure. I know that members opposite screamed themselves hoarse, as they are wont to do, when they heard we would bring in closure or time allocation for this measure. It is normal that the opposition should criticize when a time allocation is slapped on a legislative measure. Indeed, I for one must admit that as a member I am always a bit reluctant every time I have to vote on such a motion. That is normal, I am a parliamentarian. On the other hand I sit on the government benches and I must always weigh the interests involved.

But in this case, Mr. Speaker, we are not dealing at all with a legislative measure which forces new programs upon the people, nor is it a legislative measure which will give the government a mandate to spend more than expected. It is nothing more than a piece of legislation which will enable the government—and I am saying this for the nth time—to administer programs that we have been approved in the House. Under the circumstances, once the distress signals have been sent out, once the deficit has been deplored and the government has been urged to get a handle on the deficit, we have no choice but to take the necessary steps to fulfil those wishes ourselves in the House. Earlier I suggested two ways to go about it, but in the meantime the government must have a free hand to administer those programs. It cannot administer without money.

Our financial requirements for 1981-82 amount to $11 billion. Members across the aisle have complained because the bill under study provides an additional $3 billion as a reserve. A number of speakers have explained why the government is seeking the approval of the House to borrow an additional $3 billion. Personally, I think that it is very wise on the part of the government to make sure in advance that it will be able to cope with unforeseen contingencies which might crop up, and experience has shown that year in and year out there are urgent situations in which we must act.

Besides, I remind my hon. colleagues that the bill in question also provides that, should the amounts required by the government to finance its programs by any chance not reach the $3 billion involved here, the carryover to the next year would be reduced or limited to the $3 billion requested as a reserve. So, there is no danger, as far as the House is concerned, that the government be given a blank cheque to spend as much as it wants, whether it be four, five or six billion dollars in the following year that would not have been approved here. The maximum amount is set at $3 million regardless of what amounts the government might need.

Under the circumstances, I find even more difficult to understand that some hon. members should have suggested that the government be given an amount of only four or five billion dollars, some even spoke of eight billion dollars, to face estimated expenditures of some $11 billion. I fail to understand the rationale behind that proposal. That the hon. members should suggest the use of parliamentary or administrative procedures to eliminate our deficit, I could understand, but the debate in progress in the House at this point has nothing to do with that. The bill before us only provides the government with the amounts requested.

May I be allowed to digress for a moment, Mr. Speaker: when there is a deficit as large as it is now—and under our Constitution the Canadian government is responsible, in the final analysis, for fiscal and monetary policies—and when we see that provincial entities, our provincial partners and their administrations, including municipal administrations, represent over 60 per cent of all government expenditures in Canada, I wonder whether it might not be timely to re-examine seriously the traditional mechanisms for formulating both fiscal and monetary policies.

I know that, traditionally, the Minister of Finance plans his policies together with his advisers on the basis of economic requirements at a given time, and that nothing is supposed to transpire from those discussions, deliberations, cogitations, until eight o'clock on the night when he brings down his budget. I also remember that a minister of finance, the present Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) innovated when time came for him to bring down his budget; I believe it was in 1977, and he consulted his provincial counterparts.

Unfortunately, the results were not exactly what had been hoped for: some wrangling followed those consultations, but that is another story. The fact remains that, to my mind, it would be advisable to give serious thought to the process by which the fiscal and monetary policies are implemented with a view to having greater input from the provinces as partners, who represent, if only as far as budgetary matters are concerned, an element of prime importance in government spending in Canada, and whose impact on the economy and interprovincial trade is such that they cannot be ignored when government policies are formulated.

How should we go about it? I think that at the institutional level, we may not have at present the necessary machinery to set up that kind of consultations. Several proposals have been made by various groups to the effect that the Canadian Parliament make of an institution of either House, probably the Upper House or an altered Upper House, a forum where provincial governments could be heard on fiscal and monetary matters.

Such a huge deficit makes you ponder, and I suggest to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of State for Finance that they make overtures to their provincial counterparts, urging them to take a more active part at the consultation and concentration levels, and even perhaps at the decision-making level eventually, in drawing up the fiscal and monetary policies. My comments are perhaps somewhat irrelevant, but since you have allowed other members to stray from the subject, I think you will allow me a last digression.

The last point I should like to emphasize about this measure relates to the so-called draining of funds—that is the allegation made by some hon. members of the opposition—from the capital market in Canada. On March 20 last, the Minister of State for Finance gave some figures which clearly showed—and I think one had to be blind to ignore them—that the capital market is healthy, thank you, Mr. Speaker, that in spite of such borrowings by the Government of Canada and of provincial and municipal governments, and even by all three levels of government, private financing in Canada has increased considerably in the last few years, on the bond market and on the stock market. I am not concerned about that so-called draining of funds. For the next 20 years, until the year 2000, investments of $500 million have been mentioned in the energy industry alone to develop our energy potential.

I am simply trying to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that the additional $3 billion requested by the Government of Canada are not going to change the general picture very much. And as for the distress signals sent by the Progressive Conservative members regarding this so-called draining of funds, I am still waiting to hear them from the main economic agents which should normally be the first to complain about this borrowing authority given to the Government of Canada.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, if there are problems of a philosophical, methodological or organizational nature with governmental programs, let us discuss them. Let there be proposals to abolish a number of them, to reduce, amend or review some others, But such is not the purpose of this bill. The purpose of this bill is to provide the government with the tools it needs to administer the country. So let us allow it to run the country, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments on this borrowing authority bill. First, we should take a look at why we are in this mess. Why do we have such a debt? Why are we borrowing so much money? Actually, it is the direct responsibility of successive Liberal governments. This goes back to 1968 when it rammed through the House under closure a measure to remove proper control and examination of government expenditures. Since then we have lost all control. Its only solution to any problem is either to print and spend more money, or to borrow more money. This has nothing to do with the Conservative Party; we opposed that measure in 1968.

I have listened to these Liberal members say that we should simply rubber stamp this measure, but I cannot accept that because I have not received any mail or communication from any of my constituents or anyone in the Greater Winnipeg area or Manitoba area which shows support for anything that this government is doing. Therefore, we are fully justified in criticizing the government, and it is legitimate criticism. The actions of the government over the years have put us into this mess. It is not something which it inherited or which simply happened.

I suggest that more of government members should read the Auditor General's report and the Lambert Commission report, and then they would understand what I am talking about. The previous Liberal speaker said that some of the provinces are in debt too, that they are borrowing, and perhaps we should meet with them to discuss mutual problems. We had that in mind, and the Conservative government had an item on the agenda of the first ministers' conference on December 15, 1979—that is, two days after it was defeated—to discuss duplication between the provincial and federal governments. That would have been a real and genuine start to eliminate duplication between the two levels of government. I am sure that would have saved untold millions. However, I do not see any suggestions from this government about getting together with the provinces or anyone else to discuss reducing expenditures or finding ways of eliminating duplication and waste.

Another reason we are borrowing, that so much money is going out of the country and we are in such a mess with our energy policy, is that another program which was introduced by the Diefenbaker government in the early 1960s, a road to resources program to develop all our resources in the north, was discontinued. At that time the Liberal opposition laughed at it, and when the Liberal government took office again in 1963 it dropped the road to resources program to develop the north. We could very well have been self-sufficient today if that program had been continued, and the Liberal Party would have received most of the credit. However, the program was dropped. That is why we are in such a mess. Billions of dollars are going out of Canada, to OPEC countries to buy imported oil, and this is another reason we are in debt and borrowing more money.

We are quite justified in our criticism if we read the statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other hon. members of the government since 1968 to the effect that they would bring expenditures under control, that if they did not bring them under control we would have inflation. Those have been meaningless, empty words. They have done nothing to bring anything under control at all. UIC payments are increasing, which will be another burden on taxpayers. Perhaps many taxpayers do not fully understand what is meant when we talk of expenditures and estimates. Perhaps they believe such expenditure do not affect them, but they certainly do. We are talking about the money of these taxpayers, and they are the ones who must pay all the interest charges and pay for all the reckless spending.

Another example of spending is the metric conversion program which is now going through and will hit the retail food industry so hard. Scales will have to be purchased from outside of this country at a cost of $50 million, and that will be another burden on the Canadian taxpayer and will drive food costs way up. The government is simply ramming that program through, also by order in council, as another example of its contempt for the Canadian people.

I would like to run through the 1981-82 main estimates. This is an overview of overspending. I would like to point out that Conservative Members of Parliament were banned from the briefing on these estimates, and we did not appreciate that. When one examines the government's spending plans for the next year, it is not hard to see why it wanted to minimize the ability of the opposition to respond quickly in the House.

The total spending forecast for next year is $67.6 billion. That is an increase of 12.8 per cent. So where is the control? Where is the restraint which is always talked about during election times? This is breaking the Liberal commitment to hold spending increases to less than the GNP growth, which is forecast to be 11.3 per cent in the coming year. The forecast of $67.6 billion is achieved only through some juggling of accounts. For example, $2.4 billion of petroleum compensation fund expenditures no longer appears as an expense, as it is now being netted out against the petroleum products levy.

The Liberals will spend $3.8 billion more next year than the Conservative government had planned to spend. That is a legitimate complaint from our side. We do not believe that that is necessary at all. It is a question of philosophy. The socialists love to spend and they love uncontrolled growth in government. I will go into that in a little more detail in a moment.

Government spending next year is equal to the sum of money needed to purchase a $75,000 home for every household in the province of British Columbia. In spite of reports by the Auditor General that the public service is operating at only 60 per cent efficiency, and in spite of commitments made last April by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) that he would take steps to reduce the size of the public service, there will be a net increase of 3,085 person-years next year. We hear repeated statements that we must control growth of the civil service. They are just meaningless, empty and hollow words.

Things could be worse than that, Mr. Speaker. However, the net figure is based on the assumption that the post office will have a net reduction of 461 person-years as a result of expected efficiency gains in postal operations. The public debt charges constitute the fastest growing envelope, rising by $2.1 billion as a consequence of higher debt and higher interest rates.

My colleague, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone), illustrated what a billion dollars means. Many Canadians think that the expenditure of billions of dollars does not concern them. I want to assure the people of Canada that what is contained in those billions of dollars is their hard-earned tax dollars. It is not someone else's money. No one else is giving us money. Canadians are paying for these billions of dollars being borrowed, billions of dollars of uncontrolled spending and debt charges.

The estimates show that while planned spending for this year has not changed since last fall's budget, there has been a change in the composition of the expenditure envelopes. Significantly, instead of spending $7,155 million on economic development as projected, the government will only spend $6,873 million. At least half of the cut will go to pay for the increase in the cost of services to the government.

The estimated cost of services to government was $4 billion in 1980-1981. The fall budget projected the cost at $4.5 billion. This figure has again been revised upward to $4.7 billion; in other words, a 17 per cent increase. Only a Liberal government would consider a significant increase in the cost of its overheads when faced with near bankruptcy. That is why so many hon. members are debating this bill and exposing these people.

In spite of a 50 per cent increase in UIC premiums this year, the government's contribution to the unemployment insurance account is up by $219 million.

The federal government treats national unity the way most people treat the weather; they like to talk about it. The cost of talking about it will rise by $11 million next year, all for increased information by way of advertising. The government might as well cancel the advertising because it is having absolutely no effect on the Canadian public, either in regard to the constitutional package or anything else. It is just a waste of money.

Another area we discuss time and time again, an area that we took some efforts to bring under control when we formed the government, is that of cost overruns. If this government were bringing cost overruns under control, perhaps we would not have so many speakers being so critical. But cost overruns are continuing and the figures are astronomical. There were 497 projects with cost overruns of over $1 billion. This information was released by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). The average overrun was about $10 million. One of the worst departments for cost overruns is the Department of the Environment. Of 223 projects, 153 experienced cost overruns, at a total cost of $283 million. Another example of a cost overrun is the Lachine canal in the amount of $45.9 million. What kind of management do we have from these people if we have overruns to this extent?

One of the largest overruns in dollar terms was in the Department of National Defence, with $98.7 million for the Aurora patrol aircraft. This was almost a 900 per cent cost overrun compared to the original budget. What is going on in national defence to cause a 900 per cent cost overrun? I asked the minister the same question in the House. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) could give no explanation for this. He did not even seem to be concerned when asked. When we formed the government we set up a committee to investigate cost overruns, but since the Liberals now form the government they feel this work is best done in the public accounts committee.

Another measure we took when we were the government to try to control overruns was to introduce a measure called "double jeopardy." This measure of double jeopardy penalized departments $2 for every $1 overrun. I imagine that measure has been dropped by this government.

Another area where there does not seem to be any control is the number of Crown corporations we have in Canada today. We have approximately 436 Crown corporations. Why on earth does Canada need 436 Crown corporations? In 1962 there were 35 Crown corporations. That figure is up to 400 plus today.

Prior to the Conservatives taking over as the government, we tried to find out in committee how many Crown corporations there were. The government could not even tell us how many Crown corporations there were, but we ferreted the information out in the committee. It took us a few weeks and I see some of the members who were involved in that process are here today. The officials told us that the figure was around 100 Crown corporations. Then we were told there were 125 Crown corporations. The number of Crown corporations then increased to 200 and now there are 436 Crown corporations. We do not even know if that is the correct figure. And the Liberals criticize us for speaking out against the government borrowing more money when conditions like this exist under Liberal governments!

By contrast, when we formed the government one of our priorities was to rationalize the functions and purposes of these corporations as well as to bring them under a scheme of financial accountability. Using the recommendations of the Lambert commission as a basis, the Conservative government introduced Bill C-27 to increase the accountability of and control over Crown corporations. The bill also made provisions to privatize a number of Crown corporations.

I received a document in my office this week on accountable management. It is a progress report to Parliament from the President of the Treasury Board. I see Crown corporations are included in this document. Let us hope that this is a genuine report and that the government is making a genuine effort to control the growth of Crown corporations and make them more accountable.

One example brought to my attention recently concerned the CBC. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is talking about establishing CBC-2. The CBC has been before the CRTC with an application, but it did not get very far. Questions have been raised in the House as to whether the government supports CBC-2. The government has not said too much as to whether or not it is committed to the formation of CBC-2. I have information that the CBC is spending money developing logos and new tapes for CBC-2. The government should be questioning the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to find out why that money is being spent on CBC-2 when the CBC does not even have the permission of the CRTC, the cabinet or of anybody else to develop that channel. I hope the government will be making a statement about this matter very soon or I shall continue my own investigation.

One wonders about the finance minister—

Mr. Regan: He is the best we have ever had.

Mr. McKenzie: The Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) says he is the best minister we have ever had. I shall quote from the Toronto Star for March 23. An article appeared in that edition on our finance minister. Bob Hepburn of the Toronto Star in his article wrote that there were very many funny, strange things going on in the finance department and there seems to be utter confusion among the senior officials and everyone else. Mr. Hepburn certainly has the Liberal party pegged.

I will read some of the statements made by Mr. Hepburn, particularly as they refer to the finance minister who, in my opinion, is a brilliant political manipulator. That is how I would describe him. He has been in the cabinet longer than the Prime Minister. He is probably one of the senior members of the cabinet. He is more responsible than anyone for removing control over expenditures and getting us into these massive borrowing positions. He has made no contribution in cabinet to keep expenditures, Crown corporations or anything else under control. Mr. Hepburn writes:

> In addition, leaders in Canada's business and financial circles are becoming increasingly unhappy about their communication—or rather lack of it—
> Finance department officials are unsure whether their ideas and policy options are being actively considered by the minister. "He keeps everything close to his vest, then acts himself," one official said.

I have observed this finance minister for many years. I know his priorities. It is the Liberal Party first and the country second. His main concern is to do all the manipulating he can to keep the Liberal Party in power. That is his top priority. The article goes on to point out that the finance minister has injected more politics into the department than any of his predecessors. That comes as no surprise.

I am getting the signal, Mr. Speaker, to wrap up my remarks, but first I will give one or two other quotations from this article. It states the finance minister appears more interested in his role as Deputy Prime Minister than as finance minister and that he has failed to hire an established tax lawyer to head the critical tax policy after a 13-month search. Maybe nobody wants to work with this finance minister. He has not been able to implement his plan to initiate sweeping tax reforms. He had better find a tax lawyer in the very near future.

These are some of the disturbing facts about the minister. That is why we are not going to rubber stamp this borrowing authority bill. We will speak as often as we can in order to expose the government. I am dedicated to that on behalf of my constituents and the Canadian people for as long as I am in this chamber.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have always participated in some stage of a borrowing authority debate, and this is the second opportunity I have had with regard to this bill. I would like to go over some of the problems this borrowing bill creates and the reasons for those problems. The borrowing bill does not present a totally bad picture; some parts of it are quite favourable.

When we talk about debt and how much we have to borrow because of the national debt, we must do so in terms of assets and income. I wish to cite an example which I have cited before. If I owed $10,000 and my income was $100,000 a year, there would be a relationship between my income and that debt. If I owed $10,000 and my income was $20,000 a year I would be talking about a different ratio. The amount of debt would be the same, but my ability to pay would be very different. The same is true with assets. If my assets were ten or 20 times the amount of debt I owe, I would be in good shape. However, if my assets were very small compared to the amount I owe, I would be in bad shape, even though the amount owed would be the same.

The same is true at the federal level. We cannot speak of a $10 billion debt 20 years ago and a $70 billion or $80 billion debt today and say it is a terrible situation, that we are much worse off now. That is not quite true. In 1951 the net national debt as a portion of the gross national product was approximately 51 per cent. In other words, the federal debt that year was 50 per cent of the gross national product. After the Korean war, that figure came down. By 1962 it was something like 32 or 33 per cent. Last year, without getting into a lot of detail, it was in the order of 30 per cent.

One can say that we are better off today in terms of the relationship of debt to revenue than in 1951. When talking about these figures, one must talk in terms of revenues and GNP. It is foolish to talk about them in any other fashion.

If we look at government expenditures, we see that 68 per cent of the total is by way of transfers to provinces and municipalities through various and sundry subsidies. Of the remaining 32 per cent, 27.7 per cent is for the operation of the government and 4 per cent is used for subsidies to Crown corporations. Added together, the total operation of the government is something in the area of 32 per cent of all expenditures.

The opposition keeps talking about cutting expenditures and reducing the deficit. What bothers me most is that they want all of that reduction from the 32 per cent. They say it is absolutely essential to cut back on government expenditures, the number of civil servants, salaries of civil servants and government waste. That will not solve the problem. There may be some fat, there probably is, and we may be able to cut that back by 10 or 15 per cent; but to really do something about a $16 billion deficit, you have to do something very significant in the area of transfer payments.

If we are going to cut back, it must from the 68 per cent. It is fine to argue that we must cut back and reduce the deficit, but where are we to make the cutbacks? Is it to be in transfer payments to provinces, most of which is spent on medical and hospital care or those on welfare? Should we cut back on unemployment insurance payments?

I had some discussions yesterday regarding a significant cut by provincial and federal governments in educational grants to young adults who do not have a decent education. Are we going to cut back in that area? That may make sense to some people, but if we cut back in that area, I can assure you that for the next 40 years those people who are not going to have this educational opportunity will be the ones on the welfare, UIC rolls, and so on. If we cut back in that area, will we really be doing something?

I can remember talk about cutting back in the province of Ontario, particularly in medical expenses, and cutbacks in areas like halfway houses for people with mental health problems. We may save $30 a day in this way, but then we have to pay $200 a day to keep the same person in an institution later on in life.

When we talk about cutting, we also have to talk about which cuts make sense and which do not. I would make a wager that every one of us in this House has half a dozen things we would never want to see cut back. I do not want to see cutbacks in those educational grants for young adults who have, for some reason or other, not acquired an adequate education to function properly. Other members have other special interest areas such as medicare. Some suggest we need more police, more prisons and we have to tighten up our laws. Where do we cut? If we cut what you want maintained, it may have something to do with the law, and if we cut what I want maintained, it may have something to do with the future of young people.

It is very easy for the opposition to say we have to cut back, but it is not easy when you have to sit down and decide what are the cuts you want. Let the opposition tell us the things they want cut, those things that are significant.

Do not tell me we are going to solve the deficit problem by making cuts in the public service. I can tell you this represents only 32 per cent of total government expenditure. It is a good portion, but if there are to be cuts, they will have to be made in that other 68 per cent or we will have to increase our revenues to make up the difference.

I know we all come to the cutting stage as members of this House, and we come to that stage every day. Someone thinks something should be cut and some of us say: My God, that cannot happen because it is important that this money be supplied. All I ever hear from the other side is that we have to cut back, but I have yet to hear what they want us to cut back. It seems to me we all face the same problem. We have good programs. For one reason or another I think a specific program is good. For example, I think housing programs for native people are good programs, and I can think of all kinds of other things we have to do which are important. Either we do these intelligent things or we ignore all kinds of segments of our society which are weaker or for some reason cannot manage.

Either we cut back, or we start talking about how we raise revenues. When the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) talks about tax expenditures, I think this is an approach which has to be looked at. Whether or not that is the approach we will take, or the approach you would take, is immaterial, but in some way we have to begin considering revenues.

There is another notion I would like to deal with in the next few minutes which has to do with this whole business of big government, government revenues and expenditures. Let me give you some idea of what has happened since World War II in terms of government revenue. These figures again relate to gross national product. There is no point in saying we had a certain revenue in 1951 and today it is five times that much. That does not mean anything. What is important is how much is our gross national product and how that figure relates to revenues. That is what is important.

I should like to look at provincial and federal revenues, and, if we want, we could add municipal revenues. For the moment let us just consider federal and provincial revenue.

In 1943, and this was in wartime, 22.3 per cent of the gross national product of the country went in revenue to the federal government. In the same year, 3.3 per cent of the gross national product of the country went to all the provinces. By 1955, the percentage of the gross national product in these terms had dropped to 17.6 per cent, while the provincial share had gone up to 4.8 per cent. I am referring to the percentage of the gross national product.

These figures are taken for every five years, so I am not picking out odd years. In 1960, the federal portion of the gross national product in terms of revenue was 17.0 per cent and the provinces' share was 6.1 per cent. In 1965, the federal share had dropped to 16.4 per cent and the provincial share had gone up to 8.9 per cent. In 1970, the federal share was 16.1 per cent and the provincial share was 12.3 per cent. In 1975, the federal share was 19.2 per cent and the provincial share was 13.5 per cent.

The last year for which I have figures is 1979, so there is only a four-year gap there. The federal share had slipped back to 16 per cent of gross national product and the provincial share was 15 per cent. The provincial percentage had increased by about 500 per cent, from between 3 per cent and 4 per cent to about 15 per cent of gross national product, while the federal share had gone from 22.3 per cent to 16 per cent.

Everyone always talks about the federal government as being the cause of inflation and of everything else, but is it this government that is to blame? If it is to be blamed, then we on this side have to accept that blame because for all but about six or seven years of that period we were in power.

Let us get away from war years and not even consider those. Let us move to 1955 when we were out of both wars, nicely away from them. In that year, the percentage was 17.6 per cent federal versus 4.8 per cent provincial, or about four times as much. Let us go back to 1979, 24 years later, when we find that the federal share was down to 16 per cent from 17.6 per cent, whereas the provinces' share had one up to 15.0 per cent.

When we are talking about the borrowings of the government, government debt, and so on, we have to look at the areas of government spending. We are now talking about 1980-82. In this period of time the federal government will transfer in terms of tax transfers and direct transfers something like $18.8 billion to provincial revenues. That is something in the order of 23 per cent or 24 per cent of all government spending. Let me have a look at those transfers because I think they are tremendously important.

I must say something about the nonsense that has been said in this House, particularly by the Tory party, about the Constitution. The real constitutional story relates to how we are to face this tremendous transfer to the provinces; how we are to deal with it in the next few years.

I will talk about that a little more a little later on, but I would like to talk first about the kinds of things on which we actually do transfer funds to the provinces. I said the amount was $18.88 billion, but basically it is $18.9 billion out of $67 billion. That money goes to things like hospital insurance, which amounts to $2.9 billion. These are rounded-off figures. Medicare gets $1 billion; post-secondary education, close to $2 billion; extended health care, another $700 million; and so forth. The Canada Assistance Plan gets $2 billion to assist the provinces to pay welfare. Federal money is transferred to a whole series of these kinds of things. The amount transferred for bilingualism comes to something less than $200 million. It is not the major factor many Canadians think it is. The amounts spent on all these things total a very substantial transfer from the federal government to the provinces and other levels of government. I think this is a fundamental matter we must consider.

In its latest issue, the Economic Council of Canada dealt in detail with the amount of revenue the provinces have and the amount of revenue transferred by the federal government to the provinces. The council produced an interesting chart on page 60 of "A Climate of Uncertainty," the seventeenth annual review in 1980. The chart deals with surpluses and deficits going back to 1967. The chart shows that all governments in Canada were in surplus positions from about 1967 to about 1974. Then, in the period from 1974 to about 1980—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Continue, Paul.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to hear applause from the other side when I stood to speak. It seldom occurs in this House.

Mr. Cullen: You just haven't been listening, Harvie.

Mr. Andre: I want to open my remarks with just a few comments on the remarks of the previous speaker, the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae), who uses figures in an attempt to establish the position that somehow the federal government in this country is not large enough yet and that it must become much, much larger because the provinces have, relatively speaking, closed the gap in terms of the difference—at least as measured on an expenditure scale—in power between the federal government and the provinces. What the hon. member has neglected to do is to examine the data he has put forward. Instead, he has taken the figures which have been produced by the propagandists in the federal-provincial office in an attempt to justify this constitutional coup d'état.

If the hon. member examined the figures put out, he would realize that the description of what constitutes the federal government's proportion of the gross national product omits a considerable amount of federal government activity. For example, those figures are based on the spending estimates as defined in our estimates, which are not the federal government's spending in total by any stretch of the imagination. The blue book estimates describe only those expenditures which go through the consolidated revenue fund and, as I intend to show in a few minutes, that is not the total government spending by any stretch of the imagination. The numbers the hon. member talked about do not account for expenditures by the some 436 Crown corporations which are wholly owned by the federal government. They do not account for the separate government operations which do not go through the consolidated revenue fund, such as UIC, the Canada Pension Plan or the oil import compensation plan, all of which amount to another $7 billion or $8 billion which should be added to the figures about which the hon. member spoke.

If the hon. member looked at the real figures, and not those figures cooked up by Dr. Goebbels' workers over the unity information office, he would find that, in fact, there is not a case to be made that somehow this federal government has had its power reduced to such an insignificant level in this country that it should beat off those terrible, voracious provinces which are trying to usurp the power which rightfully belongs to the federal government. The facts simply do not substantiate that argument, if we look at the real facts and not just those produced by those propagandists the federal government employs as part of its campaign on the Constitution.

Bill C-59, and the amendment thereto which we are discussing at the report stage, is one of those bills which can be defined very simply. It contains just a few clauses. It is one of those simple bills with just a few clauses which, as usual, are the most profound in terms of their impact. What the government is asking for is authority to borrow $14 billion. That is a colossal amount of money. A billion is beyond my capability to imagine. My colleague, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone), mentioned that a billion minutes ago Jesus Christ was walking on the earth. We are talking about $14 billion which the government wants to borrow. The government needs this money, we are told, because it has run out of authority. We are already into debt to the tune of $140 billion. Hon. members opposite need more money with which to operate the government because spending is simply out of control. The borrowing of this $14 billion will just cover, with a little extra, the interest on the debt which has been accumulated by this government over the last few years. This $14 billion will not be used for all those nice programs about which the previous speaker spoke. This $14 billion will not be used to assist old age pensioners, to assist native Canadians or to assist other people in this country with their problems. The $14 billion we will be authorizing the government to borrow will be used to pay the interest on previous borrowing. We will be borrowing $14 billion to pay the interest on the accumulated debt of previous years. Next year we will have to borrow that much more to pay the ongoing interest plus the interest on this $14 billion, which will be another couple billion at least. And on and on we go on this upside down pyramid. It is an atrocious situation.

As citizens, Mr. Speaker, you or I cannot operate our own personal finances that way. No one would lend us the money if we attempted to operate our finances that way. If we tried to borrow more money simply to cover the carrying costs of what we had borrowed before, no one would lend it to us. No company can do that. No family can do that. No provincial government can do that, as a matter of fact. The only institution which can do that is the federal government because it has something no one else has. It has a printing press which can print money. The government owns the money presses. It has the central bank. The federal government is the only one which can get away with this, and even the federal government can get away with it only for a while because even central governments in large, rich countries like Canada at some point in time are faced with the same kinds of realities faced by individuals, institutions, corporations or anyone else in the world.

The previous speaker talked about the marvellous ways in which government can spend money, and there is no denying that. He says it is easier to spend than to cut or save. Well, that is hardly an argument. Everybody recognizes that, of course, it is easier to spend than to cut, and there are all kinds of worth-while things the government should be doing. There is not a member in this House who could not dream up 10, 20, 30 or 100 new spending programs which would have a very beneficial impact. So there is no question that there is a demand, very worth-while in many instances, on government for new programs. There is no question that a civilized government and Parliament, consisting of people genuinely concerned about their country and fellow citizens, must look at the possibility of coming to the assistance of those in our society who need it. We have to be concerned about health care, about education and about our senior citizens. We have to look after them; there is no argument on that.

So, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member arguing that point was arguing with a strawman. However, on the other side, there must be recognition by government that these programs have to be financed from taxes. There is no such thing as a free lunch; somebody has to pay, and I humbly submit that the people of Canada are more than ready to pay the taxes to look after our senior citizens. I have no doubt that Canadians are more than willing to pay for adequate health services and adequate education, and to pay those taxes necessary to fund programs which they approve of. Where we get into trouble, Mr. Speaker—and this government has habitually been in this phase since 1968—is where the government wants to undertake programs of benefit to Canadians but does not want to take the responsibility for saying: you will have to pay for it. They do not want to admit that taxes have to be raised, so they pretend that is a separate function and they do it in a number of ways.

One of the ways of doing that is running up deficits, because while they have to be paid off eventually, they are paid off by the next generation five, ten, 20 years from now. And in ten years, when some members are standing up here complaining about the accumulated debt, we could stand up and say: a lot of this is the fault of Mr. Pearson; and it is his fault, but who cares? He is gone, there is no political fault.

So members of this government recognize they can introduce programs today, get the political benefit and then let future generations pay for them because by then they will be gone to their just rewards as directors, or as presidents, or chairmen of Crown corporations, and they do not have to worry about it. So there is the irresponsibility of their approach.

The other way they do it, Mr. Speaker, and this offends me perhaps more than anything else, is by disguising the actual level of spending. They are not honest about what they are spending. They do this in a lot of ways. To begin with, the government, this one in particular in the last few years, has never told the Canadian public honestly what it is spending in its estimates. For example, when the main estimates were brought down this year, there was a press lock up. No experts were allowed, no members of the opposition, only working members of the press gallery were allowed in. They were given prepared press releases by the government which carried this message. They were kept locked up until the House opened for business, and then they ran off and announced to the Canadian public that government spending was 12.8 per cent.

An hon. Member: While you ran a filibuster.

Mr. Andre: Well, Mr. Speaker, the next day, when the experts had a chance to look at the figures, when people not quite as gullible perhaps as members of the media—and I should not fault them because they are under pressure of time and have to produce their stories—they found that spending had gone up 16 per cent, not 12.8 per cent. But the story had gone out; the public had been told by the government it was 12.8 per cent. The real figure of 16 per cent went out in a few columns. Don McGillivray of Southam's brought it to the attention of those who read the business pages of which are not many. There were a few Canadians who saw the truth and pointed it out, but the vast majority of Canadians still believe the original figure put out by the government. They were able to get that figure before the public because of blatant manipulation of the media, by having that lock up and not allowing in there members of the opposition and experts to examine and cross-examine the Treasury Board officials who were there.

Another way they disguise the spending, Mr. Speaker, is through the supplementary estimates. Again, across this country the figure went out that spending this year is 12.8 per cent above last year. That is a false figure. The correct figure is 16 per cent. But in addition, that is a comparison of the main estimates with the total spending of last year as shown in the main and supplementary estimates A, B and C. We know there will be at least three more sets of supplementary estimates this year and we know that the year to year comparison, even using the cooked books, is going to be in excess of the 12.8 per cent for sure, and well in excess of 16 per cent. In fact, spending year over year, based on past experience, will likely be of the order of an 18 per cent increase. All the while, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will say: we are keeping our campaign promises of keeping government spending within the trend line of the growth in the economy. That is the kind of chicanery and downright dishonesty that goes on in terms of disguising spending.

Another way they disguise spending, Mr. Speaker, is through Crown corporations. If the government borrows money directly to undertake a program, that shows up in spending. So what they do instead is to create a Crown corporation, guarantee its loans, which is the same as if the government had borrowed the money. It never shows up in government spending and they can claim: gee, look, we are keeping spending under control. In the process, you end up with another Crown corporation, a lot more government spending and a minister who can say with a straight face, "we are under restraint; we are keeping spending under control", which is a blatant falsehood.

Another way in which they disguise the true spending is the creation of revolving funds which operate outside of the consolidated revenue fund and therefore do not show up in the blue book estimates as government spending. For example, the petroleum compensation fund whereby they subsidize some imports, is a fund separate from the blue book procedure and that money does not show up in government spending. There is also the UIC revolving fund, the airport revolving fund, and I do not know how many others. This is money being collected and spent by the government, but it never shows up in government spending so that they can continue to claim: we are holding expenditures under control, we are operating under constraint. A blatant falsehood.

Even more offensive than that, Mr. Speaker, is the use in the estimates of negative expenditures, if you can imagine that. A couple of years ago, when they had a desire, for political reasons, to claim that they were holding government spending under control, they had CMHC sell some mortgages. In other words, they sold some capital. They did not list the receipts of those sales as an income item; they listed them as a negative expenditure to keep the expenditures down. It was the kind of book-cooking for which individuals in the private sector would end up in court.

In this year's main estimates of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, there is a negative expenditure, under the petroleum compensation fund, of $2,665,400,000. It was a negative expenditure, because they raised more money than they spent in that revolving fund. Rather than taking the honest approach and listing it on the revenue side of the ledger, they have taken the dishonest approach and described it as a negative expenditure.

There is another manner in which government spending is hidden. Who knows what dollars are involved? It is very difficult to identify. I am referring to the government's increasing propensity to push expenditures onto the private sector. If they want a certain task undertaken, if they want a certain program or some particular action which may have some social benefit implemented, rather than paying for it directly through the government consolidated revenue fund, which would show up in their expenditure plan, they pass a law requiring the private sector to undertake that expenditure. It never shows up as a government expenditure item, but in fact it is spending for a government cause. Therefore, it is in exactly the same category as any other type of spending.

One estimate of the consulting group in Ottawa showed that the spending under this item alone could be in the order of $15 billion. If we are to bring spending and deficits under control, first and foremost, honesty is necessary. First and foremost, the government must stop disguising what it is doing. It must stop trying to fool the people. It must draw a direct relationship between spending and raising funds. It must be honest and open about the process. Then perhaps we would have a better selection of programs which should be funded. Certainly we would have better control over the government spending process, and we would not be called upon year after year to authorize untold billions of dollars of new debt.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to follow the colourful hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre). Certainly I would like to pick up where he left off and raise some of the problematic sides of Bill C-59 which is before us. It is a request to borrow $14 billion. This immediately poses some very, very interesting questions.

First, when we look at the estimates, we find that $11 billion is all that is actually required. So this raises the following questions: how will the $3 billion be spent; is it a slush fund; is it simply there in case it is required somewhere down the road?

When we look at the account of the government, we find that it has $4.8 billion in the bank. This really raises the question: is it necessary at this point for the government to receive authority to borrow $14 billion? The amendment of the Tory party which recognizes the more reasonable figure of $8 billion is something we feel encouraged to support. Perhaps it is somewhat simplistic in approaching this very serious and problematic situation but, nevertheless, it is a step in the right direction.

In the short time remaining, I want to focus on four problems in terms of this request to borrow $14 billion. My concern is primarily with small businessmen, the small entrepreneurs in Canada, and what this request means to those individuals who are out there in the corner stores, the service stations, the small pharmacies, the small plants and manufacturing centres. What does this mean to these people?

First, we must recognize that the government will have to go to the domestic capital markets in order to borrow $14 billion. This will have an immediate effect of increasing interest rates. It is the type of thing which jacks up interest rates and encourages higher rates than ever. Of course, higher interest rates for small businessmen mean increased carrying charges. Certainly this reduces the ability of small businessmen to compete effectively with larger corporations and companies of regional, national or even multinational spheres of influence. For example, it reduces the amount of inventory small businessmen can maintain. Therefore, it reduces the level of service they are able to provide. It adds prices to his products which makes competition very, very difficult. Needless to say, it reduces the ability of small entrepreneurs to expand their operations, to develop new product lines, or to develop new entrepreneurial activities. In a sense, it makes it very difficult for small businessmen or women to operate in a competitive fashion with larger companies, particularly those with larger spheres of influence.

When the government goes out to borrow $14 billion from the domestic capital markets, we must recognize that this in turn has a negative impact upon the medium and small business community. If the Canadian government is borrowing $14 billion from the domestic capital markets, it is $14 billion which is not being used by investors in the private sector to expand its operations. It hinders productivity, development and expansion of our economic, industrial and manufacturing sectors.

Another problem is that the government cannot borrow $14 billion from the domestic capital markets because it will jack up interest rates beyond an acceptable level. Thus, the government is forced to sell bonds and treasury bills to the Bank of Canada which increases the money supply. As the hon. member for Calgary Centre indicated, the government has the ability to print money. The printing presses come out, and the money is printed; it leads into an inflationary spiral. If there is one fear of the small businessman today, it is the fear of inflation, the inability to plan accurately for the future, and the further erosion of his small profit margin.

If the government goes beyond domestic capital markets to borrow money abroad, the possibility of very serious problems develops. For example, if there is a reduction in the value of the Canadian dollar, it is forced to repay those loans at inflated levels. In my own experience as an alderman in a western municipality, I felt that we could make a better deal if we borrowed in Swiss francs, only to see a reduction in the value of the Canadian dollar and those borrowings being paid back in deflated dollars. This is the type of situation with which the government will be faced, if it continues to borrow money abroad or from foreign markets.

The government is running headlong and borrowing $14 billion unnecessarily, but nevertheless it is being borrowed. It indicates a real insensitivity to the small business community. In fact, this insensitivity was demonstrated in the last few weeks when we were looking at the marginal manufacturing tax in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

This is an opportunity for the federal government to obtain revenues, but the confusion which exists in the business community over the marginal manufacturing tax is quite unbelievable. The fine tuning is not being done before the fact, it is being done after. There are a great many people who did not recognize that they were marginal manufacturers. They now find themselves in a situation where they must revise their plans for the future, they must revise their inventory development plans. Yet they still do not know the fine points within that legislation. They phone the Department of Revenue and the Department of Finance for clarification, and even then grey areas exist. These areas are being fine-tuned, now, when in fact this legislation will be effective as of January 1, 1981.

We would be much better off if we gave the business community a clear indication about this new method of obtaining revenue for the federal government and told the community that the measure will be in effect as of January 1, 1982. This would give them an opportunity to adjust to this tax which will be coming their way. This is the kind of sensitivity that many of us would like to see from the federal government, particularly as it relates to the small business community.

One can say, "Oh well, not all is lost. The government did provide some assistance to the small business community; they brought in the Small Business Development Bond." Unfortunately, when you look at the small print and the restrictions associated with that bill, you see that 95 per cent of all small businesses in Canada are prevented from taking advantage of the Small Business Development Bond. When you look very closely at the mechanics of that particular bond, you will find that the real beneficiaries are not the small entrepreneurs of Canada or the small businesses across the country but the chartered banks. The lending institutions are the ones which really benefit from the Small Business Development Bond, not the small entrepreneur.

When considering the $14 billion that we are being asked to authorize today, we recognize that none of this money will be used for new programs, new projects or new opportunities for Canadians. It will be used simply to service the existing debt. One must ask the question: What is this money being used for?

Contrary to the opinion of many of us in this House, and those of us who read the front pages of the newspapers, particularly here in central Canada, who get the impression that the main problem today is the Constitution, that that is the subject on everyone's mind, it is not the case. When you get out into the community and talk to the men and women in your constituency, you find that patriation, amending formulas, and so on, are not the topic of priority. In fact, the priority is how mortgage payments will be met, how living costs and food costs will be met. Inflation is seen to be in the 11 per cent plus range and wage increases in the last round of contracts have been 11 per cent, 8 per cent—which is less than the cost of living. The people know the effect that these figures will have on their lives and the lives of their children. They are concerned about this. They are also concerned about government expenditures. They look at this kind of bill, a bill to borrow $14 billion, and they ask what the money is being spent on. They ask what the new plans of this government are, and how it will get the economy back on track.

If there is one thing that all the best economists in this country agree upon, it is industrialization. They look at the countries in the western world and see that they are all industrializing, even the underdeveloped and developing countries.There is one country in the world which is de-industrializing, and that country is Canada. We are de-industrializing at a time when all the good economists of the world see other countries industrializing. What on earth is our plan? What is our economic blueprint for the next decade? The simple answer is that we have none. We do not have an industrial strategy. We do not have a manufacturing or transportation strategy. What we need is a revision of our spending to include a measure such as the one the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) brought forward a number of months ago in the House. We must clearly distinguish between those items termed government spending and those termed government investment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 3.45 p.m., pursuant to the order made Thursday, April 2, 1981, it is my duty to interrupt proceedings and put forth every question necessary to dispose of the motion in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). The question is as follows:

That Bill C-59, an act to provide supplementary borrowing authority, be amended in Clause 2

(a) by striking out line 18 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"eight billion dollars, as may be required"

(b) by striking out lines 25 to 27 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"expire on March 31, 1982."

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to order made Thursday, April 2, 1981, a recorded division stands deferred until Monday next at 3 p.m.

Is there unanimous consent to proceed to private members' hour at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If it is so agreed, the next 60 minutes will be—

Mr. Andre: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was under the impression, and perhaps the government House leader can correct me if I am wrong, that at this time there would be a vote on the report stage of the motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The amendment before the House has not been voted on. It is clearly not possible to vote on the report stage without having first voted on the amendment.

Mr. Andre: I agree.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, that is absolutely right. We will have to wait until three o'clock on Monday to vote on the amendment. The way I understand the House order, and I agree with the hon. member, it is that next Monday at 3 p.m., once the division has been taken on the amendment, the question will be put on the report stage and we will then proceed with third reading on Monday.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement to proceed now to private members' hour for the next 60 minutes?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Private members' hour will conclude at 4.48 p.m.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall all notices of motions preceding No. 44 stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

FREE VOTE ON REINSTATEMENT

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of allowing a free vote in the House of Commons on the reinstatement of capital punishment for first degree murder.

He said: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It was a pleasant surprise for me, not only to speak twice in this House in one day but also to finally see my motion come before the House for debate.

I am called a guillotine man. I think you will find, as I go through my debate, that I am really not. The motion I put forward is an extremely important concern, more so to my constituents than to myself. We are continually accused of being sheep, of being herded and of only voting the party line. What I am proposing in this motion is that capital punishment should be put on the floor of the House as a free vote, totally free, no party affiliation, no party controls. Usually we are frightened of the criticism of our leader and the repercussions therefrom. I believe that this should be a free vote and not a contrived or controlled vote. It is a situation which is of great concern to many of our citizens, both those who are opposed to capital punishment and those who are in favour of it.

Since I have been a member of this House, there have actually been two cold blooded murders in one part of my riding. The first one occurred shortly after I was elected in May, 1979. I received a phone call concerning it. A very young policeman was murdered. His young wife was left with two very young children; one was yet a baby in her arms. This hit home with me, as I had met this man during the election. He had run up to me in the street and said, "Please, Mr. Fennell, what is your stand on capital punishment?" I listened to him, and he explained the fears of the members of the police department. I said, "That is important to me. I will definitely go to my constituency to find out how all my constituents feel." I did this, and the results were that 87 per cent were in favour of capital punishment. This young man was killed at short range while performing his duties as a policeman protecting the innocent citizens of this country. It was hard to go to his funeral, as I realized that only a few weeks before I had talked with this man on the street.

The second murder happened only last fall. It was rather tragic because a young lady, 21 years of age, was not only molested but was also murdered. Her body was thrown behind a sign board alongside a main street in one of the towns in my riding. Nobody knew what had happened to her until the next morning when children who were going to school found this body and reported it to the police. These were young children of public school age who were shocked by this.

This act was committed by an accused man about whom I have already written to the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan). This man was out on bail. In checking with the Durham Regional Police Department, I found it had never been notified that he had been allowed out on bail. In checking with his parole office, I found it had never been notified that he was out on interim bail. It was while this man was out on bail that he committed this crime upon one of my constituents.

What will stop these crimes? What is the deterrent? I have heard all the "goodie" side, which suggests it is not a deterrent. Yet between the years 1961 and 1978, the rates of crime have doubled. We have tried this route, and found it not to have been effective. That is why I brought this motion forward.

I do not believe in capital punishment. I do not believe in the way it is carried out. However, we must deter these terrible criminals who are a threat to our society. One keeps hearing that it is not a deterrent, that it is, it is not. I am convinced by statistics.

The hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Gilchrist) spoke to me this afternoon. He said, "I am glad you are up. I am sorry I will not be here because in my riding alone the crime has increased 23 per cent this year." It is increasing everywhere. Crime is on an upswing and the tragedy is that we have lost our morality.

Minor offenders realize that there is really no penalty for breaking a window and stealing out of a store, sticking a toy gun in a shopkeeper's stomach. We are not dealing with the most serious crimes of the land: cold-blooded murder and molesting. Those must be dealt with. We must do something. We are doing nothing. We are sitting on our buttocks and acting like a bunch of sheep. We will not stand on our own feet and do something.

It is important to bring a bill before this House quickly before it is too late. If you look at Section 12 of the resolution on the Constitution, it clearly states there that capital punishment would be removed forever from our law books. Believe me, we will never change that Constitution. Equal rights amendment people in the United States have tried for years but have not been able to change it. So we had better do something quickly because it is our last shot and our last chance.

I am sure that all of you received—some of you may not have read it—a letter from the attorney general for the province of Ontario. He has given a prime example of what we are doing to the people of this country. It concerned a case in the United States where certain information was not admissible. I am not a lawyer so I cannot give the technical explanation. This was a case where a young girl went to a basketball tournament with her family. She subsequently went to the washroom and did not return. The only clue as to what had happened was that a young man saw a man carry something in a garbage bag out of the door. The man was subsequently identified and caught. After the police picked him up, his rights were read to him, and he was told that he was believed to be at fault. He told them, "If you are that convinced, I'll take you to the body." So he took them to the body of this child whom he had molested and killed. Hon. members have all read about this and know that it had happened in the United States. The courts would not accept that as admissible evidence because he did not have a lawyer with him at the time, even though he had voluntarily admitted to the crime.

Those are the kinds of people we are allowing to walk the streets of this land. I hope we do not entrench that section in our ill-conceived Constitution. At the beginning I mentioned that I did a survey in my riding. Actually I had a response from 87 per cent of the population. I had a large return. I believe 2,200 people answered my query. Some of them expressed their view against capital punishment. Many of them expressed their view for it. They are concerned with putting some teeth back in the law. That was really the message which came through: "Please, will you get morality back in this country? We have lost it. We let those terrible people away with anything they want to do. They walk the streets." That was their feeling and those are the people on whose behalf I am speaking. They are scared, they are frightened. Do not let our cities turn into cities like Detroit, Cleveland or the northeastern cities where thousands of murders occur each year. We are lucky in this country. We are fortunate that our people are much more passive. However, we could change. Crowded conditions in cities create a dangerous situation.

I would like to ask the hon. members of this House how they would have felt if we, as Canadians, had had to endure and witness what happened to the Americans in October of 1963 in Dallas or on Monday of this week in Washington. Do we want one of those murderers to go to prison for a short term or do we want to attempt to deter him from doing it again? Would we want him out walking the streets again? Possibly the next time it could be one of the leaders of our country. I do not think we want that. We must stop it, and we must stop it now. How would hon. members feel if it was the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)? I do not believe that this would appeal to anyone in this House. This epitomizes the danger of allowing these people to run free. I am sure all hon. members would stand on their feet and speak out if anything like that were to happen. In our hearts we would look at what we are doing. We would look beyond our prejudices and we would listen to our constituents. I believe if that kind of a situation happened here, and pray to God it never does, we would be reconsidering our stand. We all have consciences. Hon. members know that, I know that, and if something like that did happen here, it would really touch my heart and my conscience.

We cannot let these people go free. We cannot keep them in jail. It is an injustice to a person to incarcerate him for 25 or 50 years. What are we going to do? Many of these murderers are in jail. The man in Utah who recently went to the gas chamber is a perfect example. Before going to the gas chamber, he said, "Please, I do not want a reprieve. My life is over".

In my motion I am referring only to premeditated, cold-blooded murder and high treason. We must do something about these crimes.

I have heard the argument that we should put the matter to a referendum. In my opinion this is a chicken-hearted way for this House of Commons to deal with it. It is passing the buck to the people who have elected us. I, for one, am not in favour of a referendum. I say we are the people who represent our constituents and we must stand up with our feet firmly on the ground and make our own statements. We should not be chicken-hearted and go back to the people asking them to do it for us. It is the same thing as using a referendum for the Constitution. I am against that. It is our responsibility. People want to enjoy their lives, people want to work. They do not have time to do all the reading and studying that we do. It is our responsibility to make decisions here in a democratic way.

Earlier on I mentioned the guillotine man. Let me say, in response to that age old accusation of being a hangman, that I would propose, in conjunction with this bill, that the reintro-duction of capital punishment be subject to the use of a more humane method. I believe there are humane ways. I believe there are easy ways. I was a farmer. I had sick cattle that I could not cure. I had crazy bulls I could not cure. They were dangerous. There was a very simple procedure, but I hated to use it because I have a hard time hurting anything, even an ant, but I used it. There is a humane method, and everyone knows there is.

People who commit crimes are sick, incurable souls who go out and perpetrate the same act again and are a danger to our society.

I plead with the members of this House today to consider my motion if we have an opportunity to vote on it. It is very clearly stated as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of allowing a free vote in the House of Commons on the reinstatement of capital punishment for first degree murder.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell). I am somewhat surprised at the attack he made on his colleague, the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) who has a motion on the Order Paper which specifically provides:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of holding a national referendum on the issue of capital punishment and, following such referendum, should amend the appropriate sections of the Criminal Code to conform with the majority views of the people of Canada.

I would say to the hon. member for Ontario that he had better check with his colleague about this matter. When motion No. 4 comes up, I expect the hon. member will give the somewhat strident argument he gave today against the idea of a referendum. Frankly, I happen to agree with him. I do not think that is the way to resolve a problem of this nature. There has been a lot of talk about surveys. I often wonder about the days of Wilberforce. He wanted to abolish slavery. If he had taken a survey in his riding, or for that matter anywhere in England, at the time the odds probably would have been that slavery was okay, and it probably would have been approved by 90 per cent of the population. It was only through showing leadership that people of his stature were able to bring to the attention of the public they were serving that abolition of slavery was a step forward. Any referendum or survey taken at that time would certainly have been against what Wilberforce was endeavouring to do.

I agree with the hon. member, as this House has agreed on several occasions, that votes on such subjects should be free votes. In the time that I have been here since 1968, give or take the hiatus from 1979 to 1980, we have heard some splendid arguments. Some of the better debates in the House of Commons have come about as a result of free votes in the House. The last free vote I participated in was at the initiative of the then solicitor general. We had not only a good debate and heard forceful arguments on both sides, because there are cases to be made for both sides, but in the final analysis, this Parliament, this House of Commons to its credit saw fit to vote against and abolish capital punishment, we hoped and thought at that time, for all time.

It is of some interest to me that it was a Progressive Conservative who probably did more to convince me on this subject that abolition was right for the twentieth century. I had the pleasure on more than one occasion to listen to a very eminent Canadian, the Hon. Arthur Maloney, who spoke with feeling about this subject, about the need for this country to finally move into the twentieth century. Never again would the state be put in the position of taking the life of one of its citizens, whether we do it humanely by hanging, by electrocution, by the use of a guillotine, or by whatever other method.

The hon. member made the point that some of these people are sick and incurable. Surely they are not the ones we should be putting to death. Those, of all people, are the ones we should be helping. Let us find out why they are sick and why they are incurable. By doing that, perhaps we can prevent other murders from taking place in the future. The hon. member, if he is fair, will recognize that no jury or court in this land will convict an individual who is sick and incurable and tell him he has to face the death penalty. This is not the way the system works.

I support a free vote totally. But it seems to me that those of us who believe in abolition, who believe the last vote taken was the correct one, find that the onus, if there is to be a change, should be on those who want a change.

I have been waiting for a motion to be put, but not in the general terms we have here: let us bring back the death penalty. We find though that those who are for capital punishment cannot get their act together. Some of them would have capital punishment for the murders of police officers, prison guards and political leaders. Others have different choices. We hear that anyone who carries a gun in the commission of a crime should be subject to capital punishment. Many of us argued as strenuously as we could, sometimes knowingly putting our own political careers on the line, because we take what seems to be an unpopular position in our riding, taken because we feel and we know in our hearts that it is right. Leadership does not come about by taking a survey and finding out what all of the people want, and then running around ahead of them, saying "follow me". Leadership, and that is what we should be giving, calls for more than a survey and an indication about the way a member will vote because the people or the crowd are telling him to vote.

If we are going to have another debate on this subject, it is not up to those of us who believe in abolition to bring it forward. It is up to those who believe in capital punishment to see if they can get their act together, bring in a motion and try to have it carry in the House of Commons. That is not our responsibility. We fought our fight and are prepared to fight it again if need be. I do not intend to take the initiative to move away from what the House has already decided in a free vote.

On this particular subject, a tremendous amount of research has been done by those on both sides of the issue. It is interesting to note that in the last debate in the House in which I took part, approximately half the members of the House participated. After a while the arguments on both sides took on a certain similarity. It was time to put the matter to a vote, which we did. I will concede that the vote was very close, but the majority of the members of the House of Commons, to their credit, voted. I said at the time that I hoped capital punishment would be abolished for all time. I think the vote was 130 to 124.

I know this subject interests many members of the House. For that reason I will not pursue it any further other than to say I cannot agree with the hon. member that this is something we should be doing, moving us back toward the nineteenth century rather toward the twenty-first century. It is a retrograde step. It is saying to what is now an enlightened society: let us move back a little into the shadows. This is what Canada wants in the twentieth and twenty-first century. We want to say to our children that we were involved and participated in that debate.

The hon. member says now we should hang the sick and the incurable. If we do that, we will start with all kinds of nonsense in this country. We made the decision in the last vote. I hope that vote will have the effect of abolishing capital punishment for all time.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in hearing the last speaker degrade the matter of a referendum. It is going to be very interesting to see how he votes on referenda—

Mr. Cullen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know the hon. member does not want to mislead the House. I was indicating that the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell) was the one denigrating it. I said I hoped he would speak in as strident a voice about the motion put forward by his colleague from Erie who wants a referendum. I do not think a referendum is the right way to handle it.

Mr. Taylor: I accept the statement of the hon. member. I hope I will be given an extra minute. I am sure he would not want to deprive me of that.

There are two sides to this question. As Sir Roger de Coverley said in the primary readers, much can be said on both sides. I support capital punishment. In my view, a large percentage of the people of Canada support it. In fact, well over 70 per cent do.

There are two philosophies. One was put forward by the last speaker who said we should provide leadership. That is said in many countries when government wants to tell the people what is good for them. I do not believe in that type of philosophy. I believe in providing leadership, but I also believe in reflecting the thinking of the people.

I was elected by a large majority of my constituents to support capital punishment. In a democracy, there is a responsibility on members to reflect the thinking of those who sent them here. One does not suddenly become knowledgeable because one happens to be elected. The origin of democracy was that since all the people could not go to Parliament, a few were sent to represent the thinking of the majority.

We are getting too far away from that today. We are telling the people what is good for them once we have been elected. When a person is elected, he does not have any more wisdom than he had before. The primary purpose of being elected is to reflect the thinking of the people. That is democracy, and that is what I am going to talk about now.

If I did not believe in capital punishment, I would have made it a point to tell that to my constituents at my nominating convention and throughout the election campaign. However, I do believe in capital punishment. I made a point of telling the people that if I was elected, I did not want them to ask me to oppose capital punishment because that is something I cannot do. I was elected on the basis of my conviction.

I want to deal with some of the reasons why I believe in capital punishment. This is a House of debate. The idea of debate is to endeavour to carry the judgment of other people, not to tell them what is good for them. I respect the view of the last speaker. I do not agree with it, but I respect it.

When he was referring to the sick, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell) was not asking that those who are insane be subjected to capital punishment. That is not what he intended. No court will convict someone who is sick.

When I talk about capital punishment, I want to define it right from the beginning. I am talking about the death penalty for the murderer of another human being who has deliberately planned and killed a person and has been found guilty in the courts beyond the shadow of a doubt. That is the type of person who should suffer the death penalty. Let me tell you why.

When I was a child, I was punished if I did something wrong. If I did something worse, I was punished more severely. We accept punishment in our homes. It is a necessary part of upbringing.

One time a minister of the gospel came to me to tell me that he did not believe in bringing death to another individual. I asked him if he would punish his child if he stole something. He said yes, absolutely. When I asked him whether he would punish his child more severely if he stole to a greater degree, he said yes. When I asked if the degree of punishment would continue based on the wrong that was done, he said yes. I asked why he would stop when a person commits the ultimate crime and the ultimate sin of taking the life of another human being. He stopped and reflected, but he did not give me an answer.

I believe that capital punishment is the ultimate punishment for the ultimate crime. When a person in his right mind deliberately plans and kills another human being and is found guilty in the courts beyond the shadow of a doubt, he too should be executed. I will not deal with the method of execution. That may vary. However, he should be executed.

Let me go into this a little further and discuss whether it is a deterrent. I believe it is a deterrent because we all love life. We do not want to die. Very seldom do you come across someone who wants to die. We all want to live because we love life. Why should we assume that someone who takes the life of another does not want to live? Love of life is a fact of life, and that is why some do not want the death penalty. I believe capital punishment is a definite deterrent to murder. The fear of death is instinctive.

Many people today will say they are ready to die. A very fine Christian woman spoke to me a short time ago saying she was prepared and ready to die. I asked her whether she wanted to die, and she replied, "No, no, I do not want to die but I am ready whenever the good Lord calls me." She loved life even though she was old and suffering from disease. We all regard life as a precious possession. People love to live.

Whether or not capital punishment is a deterrent is really irrelevant. It is utterly impossible to determine how many people were not killed because of the fear of the death penalty. We know how many people have been murdered, but we do not know how many were not killed for this reason. The argument, either way, therefore, is inconclusive. My idea is that the fact that people fear death and love life makes capital punishment a realistic deterrent.

Let me deal with this point a little further. In our society today, many people are becoming concerned with the extent of unlawfulness, and unruliness. Some have come to the conclusion that the only possible deterrent to the brutality committed in this country and throughout the world is the reinstatement of capital punishment in those countries where it does not now exist.

A few weeks ago, the world was shocked by the senseless and brutal murder of John Lennon. I was not a particular fan of John Lennon's but I was horrified that he had been shot. He actually did not sing the kinds of songs or play the kind of music I like best, but I was sorry that this artist had been brutally killed. I immediately asked why this had been so, and came to the conclusion it was senseless. What do we say to a person who deliberately commits that kind of murder? I think the answer to that question is that the death penalty will be applied in respect of those who plan that type of thing.

The hon. member for Ontario mentioned the senseless shooting in Washington the other day. If the man is insane, that is one consideration, but, on the evidence so far, the indication is that he was completely sane, knew what he was doing, planned the event and carried it out deliberately. He had the gun and he was ready for the event.

I have a number of nephews who are police officers. When I go back to Alberta or visit British Columbia I am never sure whether they are still alive. Every day police officers take chances with their lives in order to preserve order for you and me. Hundreds of young men and young women in the RCMP and in our city and village police forces take their lives in their hands when they put on their uniforms. They become the targets of those who deliberately want to break the law.

I know of one police officer who spent several weeks tracking down a murderer. He was finally successful; the man was charged and brought to court. The judge said to him, "You" know, this was bad; this was not good. Do not do that again. The court let him off on probation. Recently a policeman in Calgary was killed by someone who was let go free.

On one occasion I asked a convicted murderer whether the fact that he had taken a human life bothered him. His reply was: "No, and I would do it again." The man was guilty of a crime of passion, but he said he would do it again. I wondered, as I looked at that man, whether I would want him living next door to my house after he was released from his short term behind bars. Would I want him living in an area where there are innocent boys and girls? My answer is, of course, that I would not, and I do not think any members in this place would want him living near them.

These convicted people do not stay in prison for very long, and that creates a problem. Today we have between 100 and 200 murderers in our prisons. I sympathize with the difficulties facing our Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan). The penitentiary in Drumheller in my constituency is supposed to be a medium security prison, but for some time now officials have been putting individuals who belong in a very strongly guarded environment along with those who should be in a medium security prison. Exactly what happens when you put bad apples with good apples? I have never heard of bad apples turning good but I have often seen good apples turn bad.

A young man in the penitentiary I just mentioned said to me on one occasion when I visited him, "I hate it here. I am learning more about how to commit crime than I ever thought there was to know." It is for this reason I recommended to the Solicitor General that we should not put those who should be in tight security in medium security prisons.

What are we to do with these 100 or 200 murderers? They have killed once. They spend 12 years, 15 years or 20 years in prison if they go the full term. Some of them are fairly young and have quite a bit of life left. They know the death penalty has been abolished in Canada so there is no deterrent to them not to kill.

Let me return to the consideration of capital punishment as a deterrent. The individual who deliberately takes the life of another human being, is found guilty beyond a reasonable doubt and meets the death penalty, will never murder anybody else. Fathers and mothers do not have to worry about that man harming their sons and daughters. People in Toronto, Calgary or any of our large city centres are concerned for the safety of their children. Senior citizens in most of our urban centres are afraid to go out in the streets at night.

The death penalty is symbolic. It is a warning to those who break the law that they will be punished; if they commit the ultimate crime they will face the ultimate punishment. Do not tell me that anyone in his right mind cannot understand that. Capital punishment is a deterrent. It would not be much of a deterrent in the case of a killing as a result of an argument in a bedroom or a bar room. These killings occur without any planning or deliberation, so perhaps there is not much of a deterrent there. Those things just come up. No one is saying there would be a deterrent in such cases. Such crimes of passion are beyond reason. However, in my view, capital punishment is a deterrent to those who would deliberately plan the death of other persons. Canadian statistics indicate that if a robber, burglar or rapist knew with reasonable certainty that killing his victim would result in his own execution, he would think twice about it. I know that is not a very good example, but newspaper stories I have read with respect to the yellow dogs who killed the shoeshine boy in Toronto have told about what they said in court about discussing the matter before they killed that little boy. One of them gave evidence in court and said that they discussed the fact that there was no death penalty, and that was one of the reasons they killed that little boy. Today the taxpayers of this country are keeping them in prison. I suppose the taxpayers are keeping them pretty well because the bleeding hearts of this country make sure they have their televisions, radios, entertainment and their good times.

Mr. McKenzie: Colour television.

Mr. Taylor: Colour television, yes, which many people cannot afford.

I believe in rehabilitating people, but let us make sure we have a chance to rehabilitate someone who has committed the ultimate crime before we attempt rehabilitation. In this country today many Canadians are digusted because we are concerned more about those who kill than we are about their victims. We sometimes forget about the little boy, the little girl, the police officer, the guard or the man or woman. I do not care who it is; if he or she is deliberately killed by someone who thinks it out, plans it and schedules it, in my view that person is ready for the death penalty, and he should face it.

To come back to the motion, what we want is a free vote because this is not a matter for parties to decide. It is a matter on which members should reflect the thinking of the people who sent them here. It is a moral matter. I do not know of any party which has taken a definite stand one way or the other. There are probably people in all the parties of this country who take one side or the other, but a free vote would reflect the thinking of the people, and we would be carrying out real democracy.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell) ought to be congratulated for having brought forward this motion. Today is a good day because it is really the first day on which Parliament has started working normally again. It is very refreshing to be back to normal business after seven or eight days of having to listen to some 60 phony, empty and meaningless questions of privilege—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member, this is not the item before the House at this time.

Mr. Caccia: —most of which were rejected by Madam Speaker. I am happy to see something of substance and concern to Canadians at large being brought forward. It is in this sense that I offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Ontario. It is very reassuring that we are back again to normal business. Let us hope that we will not be distracted in the days and weeks to come by the intentions expressed only a few days ago by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) when he said in this very House—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member, the item before us is a private member's bill dealing with capital punishment.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on this bill; the hon. member can speak on that at another time.

Mr. Caccia: I am coming to the point. I am trying to establish the importance and the constructive nature of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Ontario, in contrast to what his colleagues have done for the past seven days. It seems to me to be a very legitimate point that we are not today wasting parliamentary time as advocated on March 27 by the hon. member for—

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I very, very seldom intervene in a debate such as this, but the hon. member has been called to order two or three times by Your Honour, and he ought at least to have the courtesy to recognize Your Honour's challenge and stick to the point.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, having made that point, I would like to say to the hon. member for Ontario that we in this House have done exactly what he has advocated. We did have a free vote. The hon. member is shaking his head, probably because he was not present. I remember that the galleries were packed that day. The atmosphere was tense. Everyone knew that it was a very historic moment. Mr. Speaker, you were also in this House. We knew it was quite an important moment. We voted. It was a free vote, so much so that there were hon. members opposite who voted for abolition and hon. members on the government side who voted against abolition. It was a truly free vote. In a sense, every party broke up because every member voted according to his or her conscience. It was quite an historic day. As the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) mentioned a few moments ago, it was a very close vote. The motion passed by only some six or seven votes.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if I may ask the hon. member if he would keep the record straight. He said that every party broke up. Our party members voted each as he chose, but it just so happened that we were unanimous in our opposition to capital punishment.

Mr. Caccia: I thank the hon. member for having produced that additional element of historic precision. I am very grateful for that. I suppose he is very proud of that, and quite rightly so.

The speakers on the side of the hon. member for Ontario seem to live under the impression and notion that capital punishment would once and for all eliminate, or at least reduce, murder. That is an erroneous notion. It is disproved by the fact that in countries where there is a capital punishment there is a high murder rate. In countries where there is no capital punishment there tends to be a lower murder rate. In other words, the two are not related, as proved by the fact that even last Monday when we witnessed on television with horror what happened in Washington, we know that in most of the states south of the border there is capital punishment, yet that did not prevent that man from shooting and attempting to kill. It did not prevent another man in 1968 from shooting and killing Robert Kennedy. It did not prevent another one from shooting and killing President Kennedy. It did not prevent another person, in 1975, from attempting to murder President Ford. Yet in most of the states south of the border there is capital punishment. So I ask, what does it do? Is it a deterrent? Hon. members opposite have not discharged the onus of proving to us that it is. They have just said—as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) says he believes—that it is a deterrent. The hon. member for Bow River has not produced any evidence or any proof.

South of the border is the classic example. There is capital punishment in most of the states, and yet there is a high rate of attempted murder and murder. Is there a deterrent? If we knew there was, we would look at the matter in an attempt to solve the problem for society and to eliminate the constant occurrence of tragic events, as described so well by the hon. member for Ontario and the hon. member for Bow River. We do not want that to happen and we have to find the answers. But those who believe capital punishment is a deterrent have the responsibility to prove it with facts, not with sensation, feelings or belief, as desirable and moving that approach may be. It needs more proof because the history of mankind is filled with instances, some cases in the United States, where it turned out that an innocent person had been executed.

We hear the hon. member for Ontario telling us about humane methods, the way he applies it to his bull and his cow. Perhaps he fails to realize that there is a distinction between an animal and a human being, or perhaps, in his opinion, there is no distinction, in which case that is where we part ways. Those of us who participated in the free vote he advocates, believe in and prefer by far a humanistic approach until it can be demonstrated that there is a deterrent, which has not been proven, otherwise this House, when we had the vote last time, would have arrived by means of reasoning at the inevitable conclusion that there should be capital punishment. But those who wanted capital punishment failed to prove this is a deterrent and that is why they lost.

On the eve of the twenty-first century, in trying to solve this problem that has been with us since the very beginning, we have to come to the conclusion that prevention is the route to follow. Preventive measures such as gun control have their limitations because we all know that they are not that effective. Prevention should be attempted by way of social measures at the neighbourhood level, in the schools and in family life, so that harmonious and healthy family situations from birth enable youngsters to grow up in a healthy environment. These and other measures on the preventive side should be undertaken, rather than trying to cure a situation after the problem has occurred and a life has been lost.

What the member for Bow River is asking in essence is that the state cold-bloodedly execute one of its citizen, as the member for Sarnia put it so well. The hon. member says: you kill, I kill, and we all kill in the name of the collectivity because that is the best way we can come to grips with this dramatic, tragic and difficult situation that not only affects Canada but affects every society in the world.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that in those nations where capital punishment has been eliminated, the crime rate has not been affected. Abolition of capital punishment is an important recognition that capital punishment is not a deterrent, and I challenge the hon. members who have spoken before me to prove with facts that it is. I would be most interested in hearing this evidence, which has to be a result of thorough study and analysis of whether or not there is a relationship between capital punishment and murder rates. The onus of proving that is on the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Ontario, if they really believe that human beings should be treated like the bull and the cow because that is the way he does it on his farm when he has sick animals in the field.

An hon. Member: That is not what he said.

Mr. Caccia: That is the essence of the message, Mr. Speaker. The point really is whether capital punishment also brings in its wake a serious element of injustice, if one looks at what has happened in other jurisdictions over the years. At the time of debate in this House when we had a free vote, as advocated by the hon. member for Ontario—

An hon. Member: Why the smile?

Mr. Caccia: —there were no whips on, everybody was free to vote according to his or her conscience. Many Conservative members voted for abolition and, if they were free to vote, the same thing applied to Liberals who voted for the retention of capital punishment, because there were some on this side who voted that way. So a free vote has taken place.

However, the question that comes to mind is the element of injustice, which has been raised by other speakers. What we are going through here today, Mr. Speaker, is really an echo of a debate that took place in this chamber many years ago. In a way we are convering the same ground because, unfortunately, and this perhaps is a sad conclusion, in the years that have gone by since 1976 we have discovered nothing new about this phenomenon. At that time, the majority of members voted freely in this chamber, and I repeat the word "freely" because it does not seem to get through to the hon. member for Ontario. But the only difference between him and me was that he was not in this House whereas I was.

The measure as such brings in its wake an element of injustice because there have been a number of cases in history, as I mentioned earlier, as in the case of people who have been executed in Sing-Sing, when years later, it turned out that the wrong person had been executed. Of course, the inevitable question that no one can answer is: how do you bring back to life someone who has been wrongly executed? How do you apply a law that will inevitably fall more heavily on those who are uneducated, on those who are probably mentally sick, on those—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should like to raise another matter at this time. On February 19, the Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker) in his capacity as Assistant Deputy Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, brought to the attention of the House that there is a number of private members' bills for which a title existed but the text had not been printed. Madam Speaker subsequently indicated to hon. members that those bills which had not been printed prior to today, April 3, would lose their position on the Order Paper.

With the exception of Bill C-527, which I believe stands in the name of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie), where a technical problem has delayed the printing but which will be available at the beginning of the week, is there agreement that these bills lose their place on the Order Paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Agreed. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being 4.49 p.m., this House now stands adjourned until Monday next at two o'clock p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 4.49 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

INCOME TAX

RETROACTIVE APPLICATION TO TRAPPERS' EARNINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I would like to introduce the following motion. Whereas the Department of National Revenue has commenced a crackdown against northern trappers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That the Minister of National Revenue call to mind the attitude in the Northwest Territories toward Ottawa fur taxes ever since the days of Louis Riel, and that he think twice before levying retroactive taxes on trappers' income when these trappers do not share in the benefits of the northern remission order designed to assist public servants and employees of large corporations.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCE OF ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. Whereas the Canadian taxpayer is taking a beating through the action of the Canadian government in buying foreign oil at double the price of oil which could be purchased from Alberta which if bought here would, in addition, keep the money and the jobs in Canada, therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Thomson):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources start negotiating for a change with the government of Alberta or, alternatively, accept the offer made by Premier Lougheed last year which would bring benefits to all Canadians.

PLAN TO CURB JAPANESE CAR IMPORTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, as we all know, there are serious problems within the North American auto industry operating here in Canada. The solution to these problems has been compounded by the degree to which export vehicles are entering Canada, particularly from Japan. At the moment the United States and Japan are in the final stages of an agreement to limit Japanese auto imports to the United States. Most experts are of the opinion that this could and will cause severe problems in Canada. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government, being aware of the likelihood of economic damage caused by Japanese autos being dumped in our market, be required to produce within thirty days its plan to deal with this urgent matter, and further, that the government consider the initiatives being taken by other countries in defence of their own workers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

PUBLIC SERVICE

MOBILITY RIGHTS OF CANADIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that secretaries who live outside of Ontario and Quebec, in places like Cardigan, Cape Breton, Bathurst, Halifax, Newfoundland, and the west, were today not eligible to work as secretaries in External Affairs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That this House condemns the Grit cabinet for its numerous gross violations of the mobility rights of Canadians and, in particular, its failure to allow any secretary, living anywhere in Canada, the opportunity to compete for a job in one of our diplomatic missions, to serve Canada in other countries.

CALL FOR NEW POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the national energy policy is in complete chaos and has proven a national disaster; and whereas it is essential a policy be devised which will provide Canadians with a secure supply of energy and the rapid development of Canadian oil and gas to provide jobs and incomes for Canadians across this land, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

First, that the government move immediately to rescind its national energy policy. Second, that an all-party special committee of Parliament be formed with power to hold hearings in the maritimes, in central and northern Canada and in the west, with the oil industry and other interested and involved Canadians, in order to establish a rational and reasonable national energy policy which will work.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

APPLICATION OF LANGUAGE CRITERIA TO EMPLOYMENT OF SCIENTISTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of some urgency. In light of the fact that Treasury Board is pressuring several government departments and agencies to increase the number of scientists on staff on the basis of artificial language criteria, and because the Department of Agriculture, in response to that pressure, has indicated it plans to pay francophones to return to school until they can qualify for research jobs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

THE CONSTITUTION

DETAILS OF PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the failure to agree on constitutional reform in the past 54 years; in view of repeated efforts by the Prime Minister and the premiers to achieve a national consensus; and in view of the divisive actions being taken by the "gang of eight" premiers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson):

That this House reject the blackmailing tactics of the provincial cabal and urges Premier Lyon to state immediately if there is agreement by all ten provinces on an alternative to the constitutional resolution now before the House, and to state the terms of such an agreement.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF TAXATION ON COMMUNITY NEWSPAPERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity especially to the small independent community newspapers across Canada. Unlike other countries which use their taxes to encourage the growth and development of independent newspapers, the government's Bill C-57 will have an adverse effect on those small newspapers which best reflect the views and personality of Canadian communities. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this House request the Minister of Finance to amend those sections of Bill C-57 which place serious financial burdens on Canada's small independently owned newspapers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND

LEVEL OF MEDICAL RESEARCH GRANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In the past two elections the Grits have supposedly been very concerned with the amount of medical research grants being allotted and the manner in which they were being distributed by the provinces. Now the Liberal government is decreasing these grants by over 10 per cent, which will result in a 33 per cent drop in the number of research projects carried out in Manitoba. In light of this hypocritical stance taken by Liberal members, both in Manitoba and throughout the country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the Liberal government immediately restore the health research grants to the level which had been promised earlier in the year and show themselves, at least in this regard, not to be worthy of the label "hypogrit".

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCES

SUGGESTED INITIATIVE BY PRIME MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Prime Minister, together with the government House leader, had an extensive meeting with the House leader of the New Democratic Party after the vote on Thursday night. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling):

That the Prime Minister show the same initiative and aggressiveness and desire in meeting with the provincial premiers as he does with the House leader of the New Democratic Party.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CALL FOR FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In his book "Federalism and the French Canadians", the Prime Minister quoted Jefferson as follows: "Nothing then is unchangeable but the inherent and inalienable rights of man." Then, in his own words, he wrote: "Nevertheless, I have always wished to assure myself that the changes would be for the best and not for the worst." Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That we have seen the worst and it would be for the best if the Prime Minister would accept the invitation of the premiers to sit down with them on April 16 and reason out the impasse which separates Ottawa and the provinces and, in the interim, adjourn the debate on the Constitution.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MARINE TRANSPORT

REPORTED REMOVAL OF WEST COAST ENVIRONMENTAL MORATORIUM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) is preparing to lift the environmental moratorium on the B.C. coast, and in view of the fact that this will jeopardize both Canada's international position on west coast tanker traffic and open the coast to oil and gas drilling prior to appropriate consultation with British Columbians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly):

That the Thompson inquiry be immediately reactivated with a mandate to hold a public inquiry into tanker traffic, oil and gas ports, and the proposed drilling activity under Bill C-48.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TELEX MESSAGE FROM PREMIER LYON OF MANITOBA—QUERY RESPECTING RESPONSE BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister, who on Friday received a telex from Premier Lyon, the chairman of the provincial premiers conference, indicating that eight of the provinces have negotiated and come to an agreement on what Premier Lyon describes as a new Canadian patriation plan, including an amending formula. The premier went on to ask that the Prime Minister suspend parliamentary consideration of the resolution and agree to join the provincial premiers at the conference table to achieve the goal of a made-in-Canada Constitution.

My question to the Prime Minister is whether he will respond positively to that very positive initiative taken by eight provinces, adjourn the debate on the matter in the House of Commons, and meet the premiers to discuss a made-in-Canada Constitution.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the short answer is no. The longer answer is that I still continue to entertain very grave doubts about the veracity of the statement that they have reached agreement. We have been told that many times before. The agreement has never been forthcoming.

In this particular case we know from Mr. Ryan that he would not attend such a meeting. I presume he has not been consulted on the formula. Mr. Ryan is the leader of the party which, just last week, the Leader of the Opposition was saying would presumably win the election.

We know from Mr. Lévesque that he has seen some vague draft, but I am convinced that if he had seen anything which is near to an agreement he would be making it public, as would be his duty during a provincial election campaign, so that the people would know if it is good for them and the people of Canada, or if it is just another bluff on the part of the premiers.

REQUEST FOR ADJOURNMENT OF DEBATE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RESOLUTION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I must express not only regret at the Prime Minister's response but at the tone of that response, in which he calls into question the veracity of the eight provincial premiers of the country who have worked through the summer, worked through the winter, and sent a telex to him. I think that indicates Canada has reached a new low in federal-provincial relations caused by the unreasonable position taken by the Prime Minister of Canada.

The question I have for the Prime Minister is this. Will he at least consider delaying and adjourning debate in this House on the constitutional resolution until the people of Quebec have the opportunity to elect a government on April 13, and then be prepared to discuss with the seven other premiers and whatever party forms the government of the province of Quebec the possibility of meeting, so that we can discuss and resolve here in Canada this Canadian question in a Canadian way of agreement, rather than aggravating and deepening the differences in Canada by the Prime Minister pursuing his own path and standing up in the House of Commons to insult the integrity of eight provincial premiers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, once again we have the key strategy of the Tory party in this question. Once again the Leader of the Opposition wants delay. First it was delay because of the substance, then it was delay because of the process, then it was delay because of the courts, and now it is delay because of the premiers. It has been quite clear that that is the only capacity of the Tory party for decision. It is not to make up its mind, it is to seek delay.

If anything characterizes this Parliament and this House of Commons, it is that it must take its responsibility for its actions. When a former leader of that party used to call this the supreme court—Parliament—he was following a valid doctrine in political theory and in parliamentary terms, Certainly he would not have suggested that this House not take its responsibility when faced with a serious question like that and wait for the premiers or for the courts to give us their blessing.

POSITION TAKEN BY PRIME MINISTER ON TIMING OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL MEETINGS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the purpose of this party, and I would hope of this Parliament, is to keep this country Canada together and not to drive it apart through unilateral, stubborn action on the part of the Prime Minister.

• (1420)

May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is his position that the Government of Canada will under no circumstances meet with provincial premiers to discuss a Canadian way to bring our Constitution home and to amend it here, until his personal resolution has been rammed through the House of Commons by whatever means?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Is that the position of the Government of Canada, that there will be no discussion until he has had his way with his resolution?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the expression "rammed through the House" seems a little bit hyperbolic when one realizes we have been debating this very subject for six months; that is hardly a ramming procedure. It has given six months to the premiers in order to come up with a resolution or some kind of a suggestion. Now they are telling us to wait again, and the Tory leader is supporting them.

The question was: would I meet with the premiers? I have pointed out that the resolution before the House provides for two years of meetings to find an amending formula which would be the result of a consensus between the premiers and the Government of Canada; two years to do that. If the premiers have indeed made some progress, which I continue to think unlikely or implausible, they could tell us now. We could, within days of having our own Constitution in Canada, convene that meeting. We could use the formula provided in the resolution to have whatever amending formula we could all agree upon. Failing agreement, we could have the people decide on the differences of opinion between some premiers and the federal government and some other premiers. So the meeting, if indeed it is fruitful, will not be lost, because we will meet with them as soon as we have our Constitution, and get this magic amending formula which they say will be good for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, let me be clear about this question which goes to the heart of our ability to exist and to prevail as a nation. Has the Prime Minister of Canada ruled out absolutely the possibility of any meeting with the premiers of the country to discuss a patriation package and an amending formula before his own personal resolution is passed by the House of Commons?

Some hon. Members: Personal?

Some hon. Members: Yes or no?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I do not know why the Leader of the Opposition persists in caricaturing this resolution. It is the result of months of deliberation by a joint committee of both Houses.

An hon. Member: Organized by you.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member's own members sat on that committee. Hon. members opposite brought various amendments to the charter. That charter is the product of many months of deliberation. Most parties and members of the House supported those amendments. How can the Leader of the Opposition say that it is my own privilege?

Mr. Clark: Answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: What I am saying is that it is something the people of Canada want; the spokesman of the Tory party in the joint committee said the people of Canada want a charter. It is something the premiers say they do not want.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Trudeau: I see the Leader of the Opposition indicates skepticism.

Mr. Clark: I am wondering whether you will answer my question.

Mr. Trudeau: It is quite clear that Premier Lyon does not want a charter of rights. It is quite clear that Premier Peckford does not want a charter of rights if it includes mobility rights. It is quite clear that Mr. Ryan—Mr. Lévesque does not—

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: I have answered the question. I have said that we would meet with them after we had our Constitution in Canada.

Mr. Clark: And not before?

Mr. Trudeau: And not before.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEDURE RELATING TO CONDUCT OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. No matter what are the differences in the House or in the country, I think there is a certain manner in which all of us expect federal-provincial relations to be conducted; not by raising the veracity of the other partners in confederation, nor having them described as a cabal or a gang of eight by one of the members of the government back row.

● (1425)

In view of the fact that the Prime Minister has now rejected meeting with the premiers, despite the formal request by the chairman of the premiers, has the Prime Minister replied formally to the premiers that he will not meet with them? Has he given them the reasons why he will not meet with them, or are federal-provincial relations now to be conducted by press comment, media assessment or, for that matter, by comments made from abroad?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the opposition seems to make much of the statement that I doubted the veracity of the premiers in saying they had reached agreement. If they had reached agreement, can the hon. member opposite tell me why they would not make it public now? Or are they too only seeking delay in order to make up their minds, which is the position of the party opposite?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, obviously the Prime Minister does not intend to answer the question I asked him.

Mr. Lalonde: Why not make it public?

Mr. Epp: The message was sent to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. He can reply. He should.

DETAILS OF PROVINCIAL PREMIERS' PROPOSAL

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice is charged with the responsibility of federal-provincial relations, in the cabinet. In view of the fact that he made the statement at the weekend that he would be surprised that this party would welcome the initiative of the premiers and "We did not know the details of the proposal," why would he then reject the proposal if he himself does not know the details?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, we are dealing with a purely hypothetical situation. I suspect that some of the premiers have no interest in making the formula—if they have one—public at this time because of upcoming elections. I do not want to deal with a hypothetical question. I dealt with ministers three months on this question, and I have no reason to believe now that there will be agreement among the eight premiers. They could not agree in the summer. We explored all avenues. The checkerboard proposition they made was not even accepted by the hon. member in the committee because he proposed another type of amending formula which was completely different from the Vancouver formula. I am quite sure there will be no such thing.

What disappoints me most in the statement of Premier Lyon is that he did not refer at all to the charter of rights. That is something which a great majority of members of this House believe we should have. They believe we should have a charter of rights which will give exactly the same rights to all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADA LABOUR CODE

APPLICATION TO FEDERAL CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. In some ways it follows the statement of the Minister of Justice about a charter of rights for all Canadians.

Earlier today the Canadian Labour Congress in a paper entitled "A Strategy for Workplace Health and Safety in the 1980s" called for changes to Part IV of the Canada Labour Code. On page 7 of that report it says:

> The proposed new legislation must apply equally and without any reservations to all workplaces and undertakings in the federal jurisdiction. Activities such as uranium mining and processing, the entire transportation sector, or the federal civil service are examples of undertakings which must be included without exception under the coverage of the new law.

With that and the recent statement of the Minister of Justice in mind, is the President of the Treasury Board willing to guarantee that federal civil servants will come under any new legislation under Part IV of the Canada Labour Code?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): No, Madam Speaker, I would not give such a guarantee, but I would guarantee that the protection enjoyed by federal civil servants will be at least equal to, if not exceed, that provided by Part IV of the Canada Labour Code.

ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION FOR PUBLIC SERVANTS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, the problem is that the present system does not provide protection. Protective clothing is not required for meat inspectors in Agriculture Canada. There are three lab technicians who have liver damage. They are being told to be careful. There is the infamous example of Les Terrasses de la Chaudière, where asbestos and formaldehyde have been found in the atmosphere but, because of overlap and lack of guidelines, the workers there are calling it "Les Terrasses of Shoddy Air." That is what is happening. We cannot trust directives.

I ask the minister to consider putting public servants under Part IV of the Canada Labour Code in the same way that government workers come under Canadian human rights legislation at the present time, because it is only through legislation that they will have the real guarantee of protection. I ask the minister to consider that very seriously.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am obviously prepared to consider anything which will provide better protection for federal public servants, but the statistical data I have seen—unless the hon. member has something contrary to what I have seen—indicate that the accidents and hazards suffered by federal public servants are considerably fewer than those suffered in other sectors covered by Part IV of the Canada Labour Code. In any event, of course, I am prepared to consider it, if it would provide better protection for federal public servants.

HEALTH AND SAFETY

ASSIGNMENT OF JURISDICTION

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): My question, Madam Speaker, is a supplementary one but I will direct it to the Prime Minister, if I can get his attention. Given the fact that the Minister of Labour has been trying unsuccessfully since August of 1980 to reach a consensus with his cabinet colleagues over the consolidation of federal occupational health and safety jurisdiction, will the Prime Minister undertake to guarantee that all aspects of occupational health and safety, after Part IV of the Labour Code is amended, will be under the sole jurisdiction of Labour Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will be happy to consider this suggestion.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLAND—BUILD-UP OF SOVIET FORCES IN ADJOINING AREAS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The entire western world is concerned with the mounting threat of a Soviet invasion of Poland. East German news sources have reported on a continuing build-up of Soviet forces in and around Poland, and at the meeting of the Warsaw Pact countries this morning mention was made and the prospect was raised of a Soviet invasion. Given this tense situation, I should like to ask the minister how he intends to carry out his undertaking made in this House on December 15 when he said:

> The government's policy is clearly one that there will be a strong and appropriate reaction to any intensification of the crisis with respect to Poland.

Does the minister consider that there has been an intensification of the crisis since he made that statement and, if so, what is the strong and appropriate reaction which he said in December would be the government's response and the government's policy in the face of this intensification?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the situation around Poland is indeed a serious one and we are most concerned about it. We are in very close touch with our allies with respect to the situation. As the hon. member well knows, in my comments in December the word "intensification" was used in that context to refer to an actual interference by the Soviet Union, or by other countries, in the affairs of Poland. We are consulting with our allies on all the situations which may occur, but we do believe and trust that all countries will allow Poland to settle her own problems in peace.

EXTENSION OF SOVIET TROOP MANOEUVRES

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I had asked the minister if he had considered whether there was any intensification of the crisis, as has been stated by his counterpart, the foreign minister of West Germany, in his statements of last week to the Soviet Union, and as has been stated by other members of the NATO alliance. However, the minister has not answered whether or not the government believes there is any intensification of the crisis at present.

I would like to ask him another question with regard to the statement he made last week on March 23, when he said:

> Soviet troops are not present at this time because of any disposition relating to the present problem, but because of their normal manoeuvres at this time of the year.

Since then, the manoeuvres have been extended indefinitely and there has been a very real increase in the number of Soviet troops along the border. I would like to ask the minister if he has been personally in touch with any Soviet officials to convey Canada's concern about this problem, a threat not only to Poland but to world peace, as his counterpart, the foreign minister of West Germany has done, or does he still believe that these manoeuvres taking place within Poland are really the ordinary and normal manoeuvres that are carried out at this time of the year?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the continuation of the manoeuvres, as the hon. member's question would suggest, is indeed a new factor, and that is one of the factors, of course, that has given us cause, along with our allies, for considerable concern. But I must say that I do not think the interests of world peace would be served by any tub thumping or brinkmanship by Canada at this time.

Oral Questions

PUBLIC ARCHIVES

REPORTED WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS AND DOCUMENTS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, since last Tuesday I have been attempting to ask some questions of the minister responsible for the national archives, namely, the Secretary of State, who seems to have the bad habit of coming into the House for a few minutes at question period and then leaving, which effectively blocks our questions. In the interest of ministerial accountability, however, I will ask the Acting Secretary of State my question in the hope that, if nothing else, I can eventually obtain an answer from the minister responsible.

Over the last month several responsible individuals, and the week before last the Canadian Historical Association, made the allegation that a large number of papers and documents have been withdrawn from the Public Archives by bureaucrats and civil servants. My question to the acting minister is whether this is true, whether actually a large number of documents have been withdrawn from the archives, and is it really possible for civil servants on their own to withdraw government documentation placed in the Public Archives for safekeeping?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I should like to inform the hon. member that only a week ago the Association of Archivists appeared before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to give evidence on the access to information bill, but that subject was not brought to the attention of the committee. However, I will look into it and report back to the hon. member.

TASCHEREAU ROYAL COMMISSION PAPERS AND MACKENZIE KING DIARIES

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): I hope the eventual answers will be given in the House by a minister who is responsible.

I will ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question, in the absence of the minister. Apparently major portions of the same chronological period are coincidentally missing from the Taschereau royal commission papers and the diaries of Mackenzie King. They both happen to cover exactly the same period. We were led to believe that both of them had been placed in the archives for safekeeping. My question to the Prime Minister is whether there has been a determined search within the government and within Public Archives for those papers; is there not a record of what was deposited and what was there, and is there any record that any of these papers have been withdrawn from the archives and, if so, by whom?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have been informed that there has been a search and that it has been fruitless thus far. As to the other aspects of the question, I will have to take notice of them; I do not know the answer.

Oral Questions

PENSIONS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN OAS AND GIS BENEFITS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister recognizes that hundreds of thousands of Canadians are spending their retirement years in poverty, particularly single women, and this simply cannot wait until the pension system is reformed, as everyone agrees it should be. Will the minister agree to increase OAS and GIS pension payments immediately by appropriate amounts, to correct what everyone knows and what the Prime Minister has said is not tolerable in a nation which believes in social justice?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have already indicated, both at the pensions conference last week and in the House on Friday, that the government recognizes that more needs to be done in certain areas, particularly with respect to single pensioners who at present are not living at the same standard of living as, say, married pensioners. That is high priority, and it will be dealt with as soon as fiscal and economic circumstances will permit the government to do so.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING EXPENDITURES

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): I have a supplementary question for the same minister. The minister has said that pension reforms can only be made if the economic health of the nation permits such changes. It is estimated that it will cost $100 million to bring those pensioners above the poverty line. I want to ask the minister if he will consider shifting his spending priorities so that pension increases can be made now, for example by cancelling the government's advertising budget of $60 million a year, which is to be increased by a further amount this year.

• (1440)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in the budget we clearly indicated our priorities. We have increased the outlays of the government in the general field of economic development, which I believe is very relevant in the present circumstances. I assure the hon. member that unless we do experience a strong economy it will not be possible to do all the things that we might wish to do in the field of social development.

FISHERIES

DROP IN PRICE OF HADDOCK—REQUEST FOR STUDY

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In view of the fact that the price of haddock to the fishermen in South West Nova has dropped from 35 cents a pound to 22 cents a pound, at a time when the grounds are closed and, supposedly, fish are scarce, will the minister immediately appoint a board composed of fishermen from the southern part of Nova Scotia, industry representatives from the small fishing companies, as well as the large ones, and an economist, to do a one-month study into this distressing situation?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, the suggestion is an interesting one. If the forces which have driven the prices down were within our control, I would be a little more relaxed about this matter. The fact is that haddock are scarce at this time in Canada but are very plentiful in another part of the world, particularly in the American fishery. The prices have been beaten down for this reason. But I will certainly look at the suggestion made by the hon. member.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PROVISION OF SERVICE TO PROVINCES

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In a statement last Friday he confirmed that he had asked the RCMP Commissioner to look into ways in which his department could save dollars with respect to policing in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and New Brunswick. Would the minister explain his position and his actions with respect to this particular issue, and tell the House the criteria that he selected to determine that Saskatchewan, Manitoba and New Brunswick would be the recipients of the supposed cutbacks?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, that is certainly not an accurate characterization of the direction I gave to the RCMP last week. If it was reported in that way, then I am glad to have this opportunity to set the matter straight.

The Government of Canada is anxious to continue providing RCMP services to those provinces which have been using them in the past. We have been negotiating for seven months to try to reach new agreements to take effect as of last Tuesday. The negotiations have gone slower than I would have liked. Thus, the contracts expired without a new agreement.

I indicated to the provinces that we would be prepared to continue providing the services without a new cost-sharing agreement, while we try to reach a new cost-sharing agreement. British Columbia understood this and there has been an exchange of letters which has led the RCMP services to continue there while bona fide negotiations are being carried on. But when I went to work on Friday morning I received a bombshell from the Attorney General of Saskatchewan. Mr. Romanow indicated that he will only accept continued RCMP services on the basis of the cost-sharing agreement which expired. For seven months I have been saying that those terms would not be renewed, that we wanted new terms and we were willing to negotiate them.

We are willing to provide the services without an agreement, but we are not willing to continue providing services on a price unilaterally imposed by the provinces.

Some four or five other provinces have joined with Saskatchewan in insisting that services will only be accepted on the basis of the old price. At law, if you continue to provide services when the other party imposes a price, you are stuck with that price. That is not acceptable to Canada. In the next few hours I am hoping to talk to the attorneys general.

When I phoned Mr. Romanow on Friday his executive assistant told me that Mr. Romanow's schedule did not permit him to come to the telephone to speak to me about his telegram. I hope that I will meet with him in the next little while.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TERMS GOVERNING CONTINUATION OF SERVICE

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Can he confirm or deny that he has asked the RCMP Commissioner to look into ways in which money could be saved, specifically in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and New Brunswick? Can the minister also advise the House whether or not he will live up to the commitment he made to the province of New Brunswick in a telegram he sent last Monday to the attorney general of that province in which he said that his department will continue to perform normal policing functions as in the past, until a new agreement is reached?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, indeed that is the proposal I sent to New Brunswick and to all other contract provinces. The reply I received from the Attorney General of New Brunswick was that he would not accept to continue negotiating to try to reach a new agreement, but that he would accept the services of the RCMP under the old cost-sharing agreement. That is unacceptable to the Government of Canada. We want to negotiate a new agreement which, when settled, will come into effect as off last Tuesday. We will not continue to provide services on the basis of a unilaterally imposed cost-sharing agreement.

METRIC CONVERSION

REQUEST FOR RESCINDING OF ORDER

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the announcement in The Canada Gazette of February 28 that the federal government intends to amend the Weights and Measures Act within 60 days, and since the retail food sector in the Hamilton-Wentworth region, at least, and presumably this applies all across the country, has only until April 28 to respond to the metric conversion deadlines, which have very severe penalties attached for non-compliance—this is not as the minister said in the House on March 24, that those who want to express their views have ample time to do so before 1982—will the minister consider rescinding or postponing the order if I dump on his desk a great number of negative replies from Canadians to this latest push toward forced implementation of metric before April 28?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the deadline for sending comments on that draft regulation is the twenty-ninth of this month. I repeat, this regulation will not come into force before 1982. Between now and the end of the month I am prepared to entertain the comments and opinions of the hon. member. Since he still has a few weeks to do so I would urge him to send me his comments. I would suggest three weeks is enough time for him or the Canadian public to make all the comments they may have to make on this regulation.

[English]

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. There is a suspicion on the part of Canadians—and I would ask the minister to confirm this—that the only reason these latest deadlines were published in The Canada Gazette was because the minister had to publish them, that it was a mere formality, and that it does not matter how many retailers, small businessmen and Canadian consumers respond before April 28, the Metric Commission and the minister's colleagues in the government intend to implement this unilateral decision? Will the government listen to the people of Canada and reconsider this order in council? Will he rescind it if the feeling of the people of Canada is negative toward the imposition of metric?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: In that field as in many others, Madam Speaker, the Progressive Conservative Party has adopted a negative approach. That party looks to the past rather than to the future. My answer to the hon. member is that in that field as in many others, the approach of the Liberal Party is to look to the future, not to the past as the Progressive Conservatives do. We will move forward in that field as in others.

HUMAN RIGHTS

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO END DISCRIMINATION AGAINST INDIAN WOMEN

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In November, 1980, Canada replied to questions from the United Nations Human Rights Committee regarding the case of Sandra Lovelace. Canada indicated that legislation will be introduced in the House by mid-1981. Such legislation would end the discrimination against Indian women which now exists under the Indian Act. Last month, when I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development about consultation relating to this proposed legislation, he replied—he hemmed and he hawed, and he talked about the Constitution, but he did not give any indication—

● (1450)

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member please ask his question?

Mr. Manly: Will the Canadian government honour its commitment to the United States Human Rights Committee and introduce this legislation and, if so, when will it be introduced?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, of course my colleague is much more informed about this than I am. However, I believe he would be able to inform the member that he is negotiating with the provinces, and when that process is completed we will be able to proceed with the legislation.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN BAND RESOURCES

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): I do not know what negotiations with the provinces have to do with this jurisdiction which comes under the federal government. My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The problems that Indian people have with discrimination under the Indian Act have been caused by federal government policies, and the federal government should help to solve these problems. Considering that many bands feel an increase in poverty will result from the readmission of Indian women and their children to band membership, will the minister introduce a program of land and financial entitlement so that band resources will be increased to the extent of their membership increase when these women and their children are reintroduced into band membership?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member some time ago, we have already adopted a policy where a chief and a band council, by band council resolution, can ask me to exercise those rather extraordinary powers under the Indian Act to set aside these provisions which discriminate against status women who marry white men and lose their status. We have received some of these resolutions now, and I am acting on them. That is during a bridge period because, under the constitutional proposals before the House, within a three-year period all discrimination of this kind will automatically cease in any event.

Miss MacDonald: I would do it now!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): This would permit us to work matters out with the provinces, where questions of enforcement and administration will give us an opportunity to explore that problem.

Also, to answer the latter part of the question of the hon. member, with respect to the number of new people who will come on the reserves when this takes place, yes, my department and officials are looking into the implications, in terms of costs and land base, and are studying the question very thoroughly in anticipation of this eventuality.

POSSIBILITY OF COMPENSATORY PAYMENTS TO ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): My question is directed to the Solicitor General, and it also deals with the problem in reaching an agreement on the use of the RCMP forces in eight provinces. Would the Solicitor General consider concluding an agreement with all ten provinces so that the two largest provinces, Ontario and Quebec, which use their own police forces, could receive compensatory payments in lieu of the benefits which are received by the other provinces?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I think there are great benefits derived for Canada when the RCMP are used by provinces as provincial police, and by the municipalities as municipal police. But it is not intended to be a cost-sharing agreement, and never has been. There is no realistic prospect of the RCMP being accepted as provincial police in either of those two provinces.

CAPITAL REQUIREMENTS OF ENERGY INDUSTRY FOR TEN-YEAR PERIOD

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The National Energy Program has several aspects to it which will impact substantively upon several sectors of the Canadian economy, indeed, particularly on the financial community. Can the minister advise whether the government has done an analysis or an investigation? If so, can he inform this House how much capital will be required by the energy industry in the next decade, how much of such needed capital will be Canadian capital, and how much of that capital will be public capital, that is, capital required for input by the federal government?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the government has carried on a number of internal studies in this regard. However, the type of information requested by the hon. member should more properly be sought in the form of a question on the Order Paper, or I would be very happy to put it in the form of a letter, because it is very elaborate and, second, it is subject to many assumptions. It is of a speculative nature by necessity, since we are trying to foresee at least ten years down the line.

IMPACT ON OTHER SEGMENTS OF ECONOMY

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): The National Energy Program forecasts prices over a ten-year period, and that is why I use the ten-year time-frame. It also indicates self-sufficiency by 1990. I would like to ask the minister if he can give the House any assurances that the capital which will be raised will not mean a deficiency of capital in other segments of the Canadian economy, particularly mining, forestry, real estate, and the food growing industries. If there is not sufficient capital for these other industries, at the same time as we are involved in Canadianization and nationalization of the energy industry we will be involved in massive Americanization and internationalization of some of these other very key industries because of the shortage of capital in Canada.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I am advised that I can say yes to the question of the hon. member.

PROCEDURE FOR CONVENING FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCES

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and arises out of his response to earlier questions, when he indicated that he did not intend to meet with the provincial premiers although they apparently requested a meeting with him. At the same time, he indicated there would be ample opportunity over the next two years, or two years after his constitutional proposal became effective. In that regard he is referring to Clause 37, which provides that the Prime Minister shall indeed convene a conference of himself and the first ministers of the provinces.

In the event that the Prime Minister will not attend a meeting requested by the provincial premiers, how does he propose to get the provincial premiers to a meeting which he, under his constitutional proposal, is obliged to call? By bringing them in chains?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I believe that the hon. member, when he referred to Section 37, meant to refer to Section 35. It came over here as 37.

Mr. Nielsen: Two digits in crossing the floor.

Mr. Trudeau: There is no way of obliging the premiers to attend such a federal-provincial conference, any more than there is any way to oblige me to attend one that they would convene. They are welcome not to come if they do not want to come.

Mr. Gamble: The lack of availability to attend meetings or even answer telephones has been made obvious by the response of the Solicitor General, who cannot even speak to the attorney general of the province of Saskatchewan, any more. I think if that type of thing develops, it is very destructive of the system. What the Prime Minister has just indicated is that Section 35, although it is in the resolution, may in fact be useless like so many other provisions of the resolution.

The Prime Minister has indicated that other leaders of this party have said in the past that Parliament is indeed the supreme court and that this House is the supreme court of Parliament. Will the Prime Minister acknowledge that after his constitutional resolution is adopted, that state of the law will cease to exist when the Supreme Court of Canada alone will legislate, as a consequence of its interpretation judgments, in dealing with an interpretation of the resolution which he has before this House?

Mr. Trudeau: On the preamble, the hon. member argues that Section 35 is useless. The reason Section 35 is in the resolution is so that premiers, if they wish, and if they can find a better formula than the Victoria formula, can put it to us at a federal provincial conference. That is why in an earlier answer I said we would be happy to meet with them if indeed they can find and have found a better formula. Well, an hon. member says "Why not before?" Before we must have our Constitution. If what they are worried about is an amending formula, then they have a guarantee that they can reach agreement on the amending formula and put it to us. That is what the resolution says.

What the opposition seems to be saying is that they do not want to have our Constitution until there is a national consensus. We are saying that we have tried a national consensus for 54 years and it did not work. Let us have our Constitution and then we can bring in the amending formula, if indeed it is accepted by everybody.

As to the question itself regarding the role of the courts and Parliament, it seems to me that the hon. member is under a misapprehension. What I have said is that both branches of government should be autonomous and should operate autonomously. It is our job to legislate. It is the court's job to judge whether the legislation is intra vires or ultra vires. That is the law of the land and that is the basis of Parliament. That is true in a federal system and it is even true in a unitary system, where it is obvious that parliamentarians do not go around asking themselves if the courts are going to give an okay to what they do.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They don't?

Mr. Trudeau: They don't; no.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): In a federal system, they do.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I have several interruptions—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. In order to facilitate matters, the Prime Minister might simply answer the question posed to him.

Mr. Clark: You have insulted the premiers.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it is basic to our system that three judges, five judges, or nine judges, cannot tell us what is right. We are elected by the people. We are answerable to the people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What about premiers?

Mr. Trudeau: It is our job to pass laws.

Mr. McGrath: What about the premiers?

Mr. Trudeau: It is the job of the courts to judge whether these laws are intra vires or ultra vires. What the opposition has been doing is saying "We are timid fellows—"

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —"because three non-elected officials have told us that such a thing could not be done."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: And these some 90 elected members are saying "We will wait until we get permission from the courts."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You should belong to Actors' Equity.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

CIVIL RIGHTS

EXERCISE OF FRANCHISE BY PENITENTIARY INMATES

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General, supported not surprisingly by Quebec Liberal leader Claude Ryan, has refused to implement the legislation of the province of Quebec extending the right to vote to prisoners in federal institutions in the upcoming Quebec election.

I have before me a copy of the confidential minutes of the February ministerial conference on human rights at which the Solicitor General promised:

> But for those provinces that decide to extend the right to vote in their elections to inmates over whom we have custody—I wanted to indicate that we are prepared to do everything we can to see that your law is given effect in the institutions—

Why is the Solicitor General now changing his mind and reneging on this commitment made to the province of Quebec and denying some 2,000 prisoners their fundamental democratic right to vote, as passed by the legislature of Quebec?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I stand by what I said, as quoted by the hon. member. But I am not satisfied that the system which was put forward by the province of Quebec will work within the institutions in the province of Quebec. I have indicated that I will watch with interest during the provincial election to see whether fair elections can be held with due respect to order and security without violating the privacy of particular inmates. I am not certain that it can be done. If it can be done, then I stand by my undertaking that we would be prepared in the future to accommodate any provincial legislation within federal institutions.

I indicated at the same time that the Parliament of Canada has not extended the right to vote to prisoners. That is a matter for each legislature or for Parliament to decide within the limits of its own franchise. The strong view was expressed by all but a very few of the attorneys general who were present, that inmates did not deserve the right to vote while they were incarcerated, and I agree with that.

RIGHTS OF PERSONS HELD ON REMAND

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, the minister should be aware that in the 1979 B.C. provincial election prisoners were granted the right to vote and there was no threat to security, order or whatever. The Solicitor General should also know that a study for his own department concluded "on an operational level, the problems associated with the enfranchisement of inmates are straightforward."

My supplementary question relates to another group of inmates who were denied voting rights, namely, those who were held on remand in provincial institutions during federal elections. The Solicitor General also knows these inmates are presumed to be innocent. Therefore, why does the federal government deny these inmates, presumed to be innocent, the right to vote in federal elections in violation of the Canada Elections Act?

An hon. Member: They won't vote Liberal; that's why.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, the problem of voting during remand, when individuals are being held in provincial institutions, would be largely a problem for their custodians, the provincial governments. I will certainly look into the problem about inmates voting in provincial or federal elections when they are under remand. But the problem there is clearly not one that would be my responsibility to account for as Solicitor General.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, as a result of an order of the House, we have settled the business of the House until tonight at ten o'clock. Therefore, is the government House leader in a position to tell us what his intentions are with respect to government business for tomorrow?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I will be glad to discuss this with my colleagues, the House leaders, later on this afternoon.

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I rise concerning several notices of questions of privilege of which the Chair is now seized. There was no House leaders' meeting last Friday, but from the response of the government House leader just a minute ago it appears likely there will be one this afternoon. I ask, therefore, on behalf of all those members who have questions of privilege standing in their names, with the same exceptions I noted last Friday, that those questions also be deferred today in order to give the upcoming House leaders' meeting every possibility of success.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member gave me the assurance that he had been speaking to all hon. members who had sent me notices of questions of privilege. Usually I do not accept the statement of an hon. member speaking on behalf of all other hon. members, but if he gives me that assurance and no member in this House rises to tell me anything to the contrary, then in turn, I will say the questions of privilege can be deferred. Therefore, I will take them in order when we return to the normal procedure.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I did note three exceptions last Friday morning.

MR. MANLY—TYENDINAGA INDIAN RESERVE—S.O. 43 MOTION OF MR. ELLIS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege relating to a motion moved last Friday under the provisions of Standing Order 43 by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis). The hon. member claimed statements regarding the Mohawk Inn on the Tyendinaga reserve that I had made earlier, also under the provisions of Standing Order 43, were false. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings has good reason to be extremely sensitive about his relationship with the Tyendinaga reserve, but that sensitivity has nothing to do with the truth or the falsehood of my statements. The hon. member's statements were unfair and untrue and they affect my privilege as a member of this House. They affect my right and my responsibility to speak for my party on questions regarding Indian affairs. They reflect on the right of every member of my party to speak on issues of national importance.

If I have misled the House in any way, then I believe I have reason to apologize. If I have not misled the House, then I believe the hon. member should be called on to answer my question of privilege.

Since Friday I have checked the facts regarding the Mohawk Inn situation on the Tyendinaga reserve. Andrew Clifford Maracle, Jr., the proprietor of the Mohawk Inn, has been charged under Section 97A of the Indian Act and under the liquor licensing act of Ontario with having intoxicants in his possession on the reserve. Mr. Maracle had already been acquitted on a similar charge on similar grounds by the Supreme Court of Ontario—

• (1510)

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have a good idea to what the hon. member is referring. I must say to him that it seems he is trying to correct some facts. There is a difference of opinion between two members as to what are the exact facts, and I am afraid I must interrupt the hon. member because this does not constitute a question of privilege. He might feel very strongly about the way another hon. member is representng some of those facts, but that is a grievance, a difference of opinion, or something other than a question of privilege. I cannot hear the hon. member further. There is no question of privilege so I must ask him not to comment further.

[English]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C-59, to provide supplementary borrowing authority, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? Is the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) rising on a point of order? Of course, the hon. member knows that this is not a debatable motion. The motion is simply to concur in the bill. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

PETITION

MR. JELINEK—UNBORN CHILD'S RIGHT TO LIFE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions before me from my constituents in Halton. One is from the Holy Rosary parish in Milton, while the other is from Saint Andrew's parish in Oakville. I wish to present these two petitions on behalf of 671 persons as one petition, since both deal with exactly the same subject matter. May I read just part of that petition, Madam Speaker. It reads as follows:

We, the undersigned, members of Saint Andrew's parish, Oakville, Ontario, and Holy Rosary parish, Milton, Ontario, do demand at this crucial time in our Canadian history, that our Canadian Constitution be based on the first and primary principle, the supremacy of God. Because it is God, our creator, who bestows on all mankind the gift of life, we demand that this inalienable right to life be clearly defined in our Constitution granting legal protection to all Canadians, especially the weakest and most defenceless members of Canadian society, the unborn child, and that this legal protection be granted to all from the moment of conception (fertilization) to natural death—

I believe, Madam Speaker, this petition is timely, particularly in view of the threat of closure before us. May I add my compliments to the two parishes in question for being able to collect 671 names over just one or two weekends without any apparent advertising or solicitation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TELIDON

Question No. 1,907—Mr. Beatty:

1. Did the government exhibit Telidon at INTELCOM 80 in Los Angeles and, if not, for what reason?

2. Was the government aware that the French videotex system, Antiope, would be exhibited at the show?

3. Has the government any estimates of promotional budgets for competitive systems produced in other countries and, if so, what are such estimates?

4. Since the development of Telidon, by year, what amount was budgeted for its development and promotion and what is the anticipated budget for 1981-82?

5. What experience exists within the Department of Communications in the promotion of technological developments, of the importance of Telidon?

6. Did the government consider transferring the responsibility for promoting Telidon to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce or to another branch of the government with the experience and budget to engage in promotional programs comparable to those of Telidon's competitors and, if so, for what reason was such a course rejected?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the answer to the above question is as follows: 1. The Department of Communications did not exhibit Telidon at INTELCOM 80 because of funding and human resource limitations which restricted the department's attendance to a limited number of important trade expositions and conferences. However, much has been accomplished within the previous promotional budget. For example, there have been approximately 75 distinct promotional activities since June, 1980, including attendance at several international expositions and conferences. In addition, there have been publicity tours in the U.S.A. and West Germany and one recently completed in Australia. The department's Telidon program strategy, in conjunction with the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce and External Affairs, is to assist Canadian industry wherever possible within approved budgets to acquire contracts for field trials and operational Telidon systems in the U.S.A., Europe, Latin America and Australia.

2. The department was indeed aware that the French Antiope system would be exhibited. The French government is supporting Antiope with a large promotion budget which permits the exhibition of Antiope in virtually all important trade shows and conferences.

3. It is difficult to obtain authenticated figures for the exact promotional budgets of the competing British (Prestel) and French (Antiope) systems. However, both countries have specific marketing branches in the U.S.A. called Aregon and Sofratev respectively. The science counsellor of the Canadian embassy in Washington, D.C. has estimated that the British are spending approximately $10 million to $15 million per year for the promotional activities in the U.S.A. alone and the French some $20 million per year. The respected British Organization Communications Systems and Planning Ltd. has stated that British government expenditures to date are in excess of $84 million and annual expenditures are currently running at $42 million. Equal or greater investments are being made by the British industry.

4. At the time of the INTELCOM 80 exhibition, the department's total Telidon budget from FY 79/80 to the end of the Telidon program in FY 82/83 was $13.241 million. Since recent cabinet approval of the augmented Telidon funding, this figure will rise to $40.341 million. This amount and the portion allotted for promotion (including standards and industrial strategy) is broken down by fiscal year as follows:

FY	Total Program Budget (000's)	Promotional Budget (000's)
82/83	11,050	1,500

The promotion budget has thus been increased by some $2.35 million for FYs 81/82 and 82/83, thereby ensuring a more vigorous DOC marketing strategy. The above figures have been approved for commitment by the economic development envelope and are subject to Treasury Board approval.

5. Within the research sector's Telidon program the promotional activities are primarily carried out by the directorate of applications development containing three permanent staff and four term employees. Its functions are to develop and implement promotional activities, to contribute to international standardization activities, to work with other groups for the development and implementation of industrial and marketing strategies, to facilitate technology transfer to industry and to identify new research and development work. Other sectors within the department contribute much to promotion as well. The international telecommunications branch of the policy sector has provided assistance in both international marketing and legal matters. The information services section of the deputy minister's office gives continuous aid in the execution of promotional exhibits. Outside the department, of course, External Affairs and Industry, Trade and Commerce provide continuing assistance. Recently a marketing-promotion committee has been established with representation from all three departments.

6. The government has not considered transferring primary responsibility for promoting Telidon to other departments although considerable assistance is being given by the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce and External Affairs. The reasons relate to both experience and budget. First, the department considers its group of technical experts which invented and developed Telidon in the first place essential for the promotion of what is still a fledgling technology which though recognized as the world's superior videotex and teletext technology is still threatened by the financially massive marketing efforts of its competitors. The contribution of these experts to promotional activities would be hampered were such activities primarily controlled by another department. Secondly, other departments do not have promotional budgets substantially greater than those of the Telidon program. Steps are being taken, however, to set up an organizational structure which will focus both government and private-industry investment in Telidon to a coherent promotional and marketing thrust internationally.

STUDY ON CONDITIONS OF FOREIGN SERVICE

Was a special study commissioned on the terms and conditions of foreign service from the point of view of foreign service officers and their families and, if so, has it been completed and who was responsible for the study?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The royal commission on conditions of foreign service was appointed by order in council of August 27, 1980, PC 1980-2336, but its work has not been completed.

SEASAT U.S.—SURVEILLANCE SATELLITE

Question No. 2,128—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Did Canada, in 1978, participate in the SEASAT U.S. surveillance satellite experiment?

2. What were the effects of the ionosphere in Canada's auroral zone and the radar properties of the sea surface on the performance of the synthetic aperture radar being tested in the experiment?

3. Did the experiment identify any problems which would prevent Canada from using a synthetic aperture radar for surveillance of Canadian territory?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes.

2. Auroral activity did not produce detectable effects on the performance of the SEASAT synthetic aperture radar (SAR). However, experiments indicated that the SAR images would be degraded during severe magnetic storms. The radar was optimized to image ocean waves and validation experiments showed the wavelengths between 100 and 500 metres and significant wave heights between 1 and 3.5 metres could be measured. Ships 100 metres long could be detected when moving slowly on a calm sea but even large ships were concealed by the sea clutter from waves during the storm. Often a ship moving at high speed could be detected only by its wake. The radar proved capable of producing usable imagery through rain and snow.

3. The U.S. SEASAT A experiment and the Canadian surveillance satellite (SURSAT) program have demonstrated the technical feasibility of a spaceborne synthetic aperture radar system for environmental surveillance, particularly of sea ice. However, small land targets such as those associated with human activity in the Arctic require much higher spatial resolution than that provided by the SEASAT SAR. Also, it is unlikely that rapidly moving or manoeuvring targets such as aircraft would be imaged by the SEASAT radar.

DND—CONTRACT WITH E.A.C. AMY AND SONS LTD.

Question No. 2,243—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence place a $29,440 contract with E.A.C. Amy and Sons Limited for the preparation and carrying out of a seminar on effects of an earthquake in British Columbia and, if so (a) on what date and for what reason is the seminar to be held (b) who will be invited (c) will the results be made public?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The Department of Supply and Services placed a $29,440 contract on behalf of Emergency Planning Canada for preparation and carrying out of a seminar on effects of an earthquake in British Columbia.

(a) The date of the seminar is yet to be determined. The reason for the seminar is to study the appropriate method of responding to the emergency caused by an earthquake in Canada, using British Columbia as the case study.

(b) The list of people will include federal and provincial emergency planners from across Canada.

(c) The results of the seminar will be made public.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1981-82

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

Hon. Yvon Pinard (for the Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C-59, to provide supplementary borrowing authority, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to address this body today on the borrowing authority bill. I would particularly like to address myself to the imposition of closure. A rose by any other name is still a rose and closure is still closure, which we know is taking place on this measure.

I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that, while this House is considering a bill authorizing the borrowing of $14 billion to run government business, there exists a situation in northeastern Alberta which I can only describe as deplorable. The Bigstone band, in company with their chief, William Beaver, are on a trek from Wabasca in northeastern Alberta to Edmonton to draw attention to their plight. They are asking for financial assistance for their community so that poverty can be alleviated as well as unemployment, which reaches beyond 75 per cent.

I draw this set of circumstances to your attention, Mr. Speaker, because we have a government which has exercised no restraint whatsoever with respect to the economy. It is prepared to borrow $14 billion just to keep operating. A very small fraction of that sum of money could be used in a permanent way to aid in the alleviation of the conditions in many Indian communities, but, more particularly, the Bigstone band in Wabasca. The chief and council, indeed the people of the Bigstone band, decided on this action to draw attention to their plight after a 14-year-old girl, who looked around the community on her birthday and felt that life was no longer worth living, committed suicide. She committed suicide because of the lack of funding, lack of opportunity, lack of jobs and abject poverty that all people in the Wabasca reserve face. I find it difficult to comprehend a government which has set priorities in the way that this government has. It is borrowing $14 billion to run a government when a very small portion of that sum could begin to alleviate the suffering, inequality and lack of jobs which exist on the Bigstone Reserve.

Consider the mortality rates on the Indian reserves in comparison with the national deaths per thousand figures for each age group during the period 1973-76. In the age group one to four years, we find the mortality rate of Indian populations on reserves to be 3.1 deaths per thousand as compared to the national average of 0.8 deaths per thousand. This is over three times the national average. In the age group five to 19 years, the rate is 1.9 per thousand as compared with the national average of 0.7 deaths per thousand. Some of these deaths on Indian reserves are the result of suicide. The figures are very alarming when one looks at the age group 20 to 44 years. The mortality rate for the non-Indian population in this age group is 1.5 per thousand, while the rate for the Indian population is six per thousand. I would like to point out that this is the age group in which men and women marry and have families.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, the total worthlessness a man must feel, day after day, going home to face his family and children knowing that he cannot provide for them? Can you imagine how devastating this can be to a man's or woman's ego? I find it deplorable that we are forcing our native people into this position. The government should take a minute portion of that $14 billion and aim it at alleviating poverty and creating jobs in native communities, a situation where men and women can hold up their heads and where Indian parents are able to provide for their families as every member of this House can and, indeed, as every Canadian across our nation wants to do. There is absolutely no future for young Indian people growing up on a reserve.

I would like to outline the events of the last six months. Chief William Beaver, a very honourable man who wants to create a situation on his reserve where men can be employed and the children have an equal opportunity to that experienced elsewhere in Canada, says that he wants to reduce welfare and create jobs. The budget on the reserve was cut to a point where they had to lay off 17 workers at the sawmill. This was a project they had initiated themselves. Seventeen men had to be laid off and were forced to go on welfare. More importantly, logs were left in the bush. In northern Alberta you cannot leave logs in the bush over the winter because they rot in the muskeg. Their whole work for the winter is down the tube because there is no way those logs will survive until the summer; they will be rotted.

The doors of the band office had to be closed because there was no money to pay the workers who were all laid off. There is now one girl at the Bigstone band office who is answering the phone. All the economic programs they had designed and were working on to create employment and give a sense of pride to the Indian people of the Bigstone band have been stopped. The Bigstone band members are forced to walk 400 kilometres from their band office in northeastern Alberta to Edmonton to draw attention to their plight. For the past ten days they have been attempting to negotiate with the minister of manpower because he is responsible for such negotiations. He has been appointed as negotiator with the band but he has failed to meet with them.

On Friday the minister indicated that he was prepared to speak and negotiate with the Bigstone band. One half hour after that statement in the House of Commons, the chief got a telephone call from the regional office in Edmonton informing him that the minister was grounded in Ottawa and could not leave. Therefore, he could not sit down with them and negotiate.

I ask, where are the priorities here? The government is prepared to spend $60 million on an advertising campaign, yet a very small percentage of that amount can save lives. This march from the Wabasca area by the Bigstone band was precipitated by the death of a young girl, 14 years old, who decided on her birthday that she did not see it worth while to live in that community under conditions of abject poverty and with no future.

Not one cabinet minister from this government has said that he would be prepared to sit down with the Bigstone band chief and his council. It is a deplorable situation in Canada when elderly people, young people—I am talking particularly about them—people with arthritis, have marched 400 kilometres to bring attention to their plight. However, the very sad thing is that although they are getting some attention from the media, the attention of the government is not being focused on the problem. The government is ignoring them completely. It is warning them: "Do not occupy offices, do not do that sort of thing, or we will not be able to deal with you". I find that to be a very sad situation indeed.

If one looks at the social support expenditures of all federal programs for native people, one finds that they are increasing dramatically in some areas. But support for economic development programs is decreasing dramatically. The Indian people in Canada do not want handouts. They do not want to be on welfare. They do not want to go home at night to face their children, knowing every day that they cannot provide for those children in the same manner as you and I, Mr. Speaker, can provide for our children. Can one imagine the very devastating effect this must have on these people who face their families every day knowing they do not have proper nourishment and that they cannot supply the basic needs of their children because they are on welfare? They want jobs. They are marching for economic equality.

Mr. Speaker, $14 billion, if we say it fast enough, looks pretty good. It is very difficult to equate what $14 billion means and what it will buy. The Wabasca band, the Bigstone band, is asking less than 1 per cent of that amount of money—0.2 per cent. This would launch an economic development program on this reserve which is completely surrounded by the tar sands and oil companies doing exploration work. They want to be trained so they can take jobs which are now available around their area. They sit on the bridge in the summertime and watch the trucks go by day after day, through the reserve, to the in situ plants, the experimental plants which are working in the area.

They see neighbouring their reserve ranchers who are raising cattle and producing feed for their cattle, and yet they are systematically dropping further and further behind because they do not have the necessary expertise. They need training, and money is needed to provide this training. Some of the men I talked to are still surviving on trap lines and have not used welfare. However, they are now finding that their trap lines are being destroyed by the encroachment of civilization on to the reserve. There is no compensation for that. You cannot compensate a man for the loss of his business and life's work with a settlement of $10,000.

The government is doing absolutely nothing for these people. The Department of Indian Affairs is responsible for them under the treaties. In fact, all governments at the federal level have that distinct responsibility to the native people, who were the first citizens of Canada.

We must examine economic conditions surrounding reserves in Canada. I particularly ask that the government sit down and negotiate with the Bigstone band at Wabasca, the chief, and his council, so that they can do a survey on economic conditions, prepare a minerals inventory, examine job opportunities and draw up a general plan so that the people of the Bigstone band can participate in the economic development which is taking place around them.

Can anyone imagine a 14-year-old girl taking her life on her birthday because she sees absolutely no future for herself? We must address ourselves to this problem. We must develop the reserves in exactly the same way as we are prepared to support the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to help the have-not areas of the provinces.

On Saturday of last week I met with the chief and council of the Bigstone band. They were amazed that Canadians would allow some of their elderly people to walk 400 kilometers. One arthritic lady, 65 years old, walked with her grandchildren. They were amazed that there is a need in Canada to do this kind of thing before anyone will pay attention to their plight. I say that is a shame on every one of us in this House. We must do something to assist the Bigstone band gain economic equality in northeastern Alberta.

The borrowing authority bill will be passed, Mr. Speaker, and the money will be spent on a number of frivolous programs, such as the advertising program to sell the centralist view on the Constitution and on the energy program to the rest of Canada. It will be used to sell a number of ideas that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) might have. I ask that we, as the representatives of our areas, as legislators, urge the government and the cabinet to consult with the Bigstone band. I ask that the government take just a small portion of the funds being borrowed and redirect them to the Bigstone band. This would allow the band to continue its economic development so that its people can take their place in society, walk straight, be proud of their heritage and so their children can see a future for themselves.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by congratulating the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) for reminding all of us in this House of the importance of the fact that there are in Canada today, and not only in his constituency, millions of Canadians living in conditions of poverty, ignored by their government and by their fellow citizens.

Since we are discussing today the fact that the government is asking for authority to borrow some $14 billion, it is very important to remember the purposes for which the money is intended and the people who are affected by the programs that have been established. In the last six months that we have been debating the Constitution, we have heard a great deal about the alienation of groups of Canadians from their government and particularly western alienation; in fact, we have heard a great deal from the hon. member for Athabasca about western alienation.

I should like to suggest that there is a deeper kind of alienation in all of Canada, and that is the very real problem that most Canadians do not have a voice in Parliament. When they see what we do here, they cannot recognize this House as a forum in which their views and concerns are being expressed. The government is so preoccupied with one question, that is, the formal arrangements under which we govern ourselves—and that is all a constitution is, the formalities of constitutional life—that it has forgotten about the fundamentals of a society. The questions are, how does a society feed itself and what do people pay for food? How does a society clothe itself and what do people pay for clothing? How does a society house itself and what do people pay for housing? Do people have jobs or not? Do we have an economic policy? When people hear us talk about monetarism and all the other subjects we talk about, they feel very remote from us. The real question is, do we have a government which is as concerned about and determined to deal with the economy and the human problems that face the average Canadian as it is with all the other matters that so obviously preoccupy it?

I say to my western friends in the House, as I have said in my own caucus, that of course there is western alienation, and for very good reason. There is a variety of reasons which go back into our history. Central Canadian financial institutions have played a dominant role and a national policy has been created which has meant that the hinterlands in the east and the west of the country were used as metropolitan centres; and, of course, that has created resentment.

I suggest there is a deeper kind of alienation at work in the country today. It applies not only to people living in Alberta or in the constituency of Athabasca, about whom the hon. member spoke so eloquently this afternoon, but even to those in my riding, which is in the very shadow of Bay Street. From my home I can look across the Don Valley and see the towers lit up at night, yet the people in my constituency are just as alienated from the large economic forces that control them and from their government. When they look to their government or to their Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), do they see a government or a Prime Minister who knows the cost of a loaf of bread? Do they see a government or a Prime Minister who responds to inflation, which is 20 per cent higher than predicted in the budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen)? Do they see a government that is prepared to act with a degree of fairness when it comes to treating the most powerful economic figures and the most vulnerable people on the same terms? Do they see a government or a Prime Minister that can respond to the broader, abstract, structural problems in our economy about which I and many members of my caucus have spoken on the few occasions when we have had the opportunity to speak on the economy in the last few months? Do we have a government which understands what it means to be unemployed, to be living in poverty, to have 60 per cent of our senior citizens living below the poverty line?

Many hon. members speak about Ontario as if it were some vast, wealthy, opulent province—as if no one in Ontario is poor, or knows what it means to be out of work. I have taken the opportunity to travel to and speak in every province, Mr. Speaker. I have talked to people all across the country. I would invite people to look behind the billboards and the so-called image of affluence which is projected from central Canada and see some of the hard realities that face every Canadian, whether they live in Ontario, Quebec, the maritimes, Newfoundland or the west.

The reality is that we have a government which does not understand the basic social and economic problems which face the average Canadian. That was the problem with the Crosbie budget. It was the budget which dealt with abstractions and not with the problems which face the average Canadian. That is the problem with the MacEachen budget and it is the problem that we face now with the government saying, "Give us another $14 billion so we can borrow and get our house in order."

I should like to deal briefly with some of the basic problems that face the country. The request in this borrowing authority bill for $14 billion is a strange one. As consumers, we frequently face the prospect of going into a bank, a credit union or a trust company to ask whether we can borrow a lot of money, or even a small amount of money. The first question which the bank manager will ask is, "What are you doing with the money you are borrowing?" I have always compared the granting of borrowing authority with that basic question. Of course, the sums are much larger. The amount of $14 billion is almost inconceivable to the average person. It is about 20 per cent of what the government spends in a year. It is a very substantial sum of money.

Let me come back to the basic question, "What are you using this money for?" Instead of borrowing money to invest or to ensure that eventually we will be out of debt, this government's budgetary policy is to borrow money to pay for groceries.

Mr. Mayer: Yesterday's groceries.

Mr. Rae: That is the critical problem facing the government.

There are two kinds of debt. There is the budgetary deficit, money that we borrow, money which the government is asking for now, in order to pay for its own expenditures. Then because of increased imports, our balance of payments with the rest of the world is in a deficit position. That is the second kind of debt that we have.

One would have thought that the intelligent way to run the budget of Canada would be to say, "We have these two kinds of debt, and in order to get out of debt we will borrow money and invest it." That would seem to me the basic thrust of the position, taking for granted, as we do in this party, that there are occasions when it is perfectly appropriate for the government to borrow money and go into debt.

I would remind hon. members that there are times when it is perfectly appropriate for the average citizen to go into debt. For example, it is perfectly appropriate for the average citizen to go into debt to buy a house. I do not know anyone in my party who is in a position to buy a house outright. For example, I do not know anyone in my party who could go to Vancouver, where the average price of a house is $171,000, and pay for it in cash. I see the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) is smiling. Maybe he is in a position to do that.

Mr. Paproski: No way.

Mr. Rae: He says no way.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was enjoying the speech of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), but he has raised a delicate, personal matter. I have the same problem as any member of this House who is not wealthy. I am wealthy in one way, and that is because I have a wonderful wife and family and I can look after their needs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member has made his point very effectively.

Mr. Paproski: I was just getting to my point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member about his wife and family. They are wonderful. The best part of his family is his wife and children.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: Might I say to the hon. member that my reference was made only in fun.

There are economic decisions which we as individuals make requiring us to go into debt. When we go to the bank, the credit union or the trust company and ask to borrow, say, $5,000 for a $55,000 mortgage on a house, the lending institution will want to look at the reasonableness of the investment being made and of the request to borrow. A mortgage is probably the biggest debt most of us will ever take on, but we are taking on this debt because we want to own something and think that our investment and our equity share in it will grow.

Let us look at what the government is doing in the energy sector. The government's general economic policy does not make any kind of sense. What this government has said, and what the Conservative Party said when it was in government, is that the question of who owns our economy is not an important one. I say the real problem facing our country is that we are in a position of being, as it were, tenants in our own land. We are industrial tenants. Look at how little research and development takes place in Canada, Mr. Speaker. In the automobile industry, for example, we find we are simply tenants. We are trying to get a better deal for our automobile workers, but they work in an industry that is entirely foreign controlled. We are trying to get a better deal for people in other industries, also entirely foreign controlled. But let us not be under any illusions that we are really in an ownership position in those industries.

In the oil and gas industry, Imperial Oil is 70 per cent controlled by Exxon. That company will be totally unaffected by the government's energy policy. In fact, Imperial Oil will probably grow, for a reason which I will come to in a moment. Shell Oil is 70 per cent controlled by the international company. If we go right down the list, we can see that all of the largest actors in the oil and gas sector, with one exception, Petro-Canada, are owned and controlled by outside economic interests and we have become tenants.

The oil and gas sector will grow in value and importance. This sector will be vitally important over the next five or ten years. The price of the resource will increase because of scarcity. All parties agree the price must go up. The only question is how far and how fast, and who will get the revenue. Everyone is agreed that prices are going to rise.

There are various ways, which I can detail, to take over ownership of that industry as Canadians, as provinces, as the federal government, as credit unions, as co-operative institutions and as small businesses. Everyone in a mixed economy will move in this area. The government could have come to us and said it wants to borrow so it can invest in human capital and resources, that it has decided we can no longer survive economically by automatically condemning 10 per cent or 15 per cent of our young people coming out of secondary schools across Canada to unemployment. In some parts of my constituency, the unemployment rate among young people 16 and 17 years old is upwards of 35 per cent and 40 per cent.

This is not the problem the government is going to tackle. It is not going to invest capital in order to reduce and solve basic economic problems, either in the field of human resources or energy. The government has no strategy, plan or organized intention to deal with fundamental problems. It says, along with many members of the Conservative Party, that we cannot afford greater Canadian ownership at the present time, that we cannot afford to take on the multinationals in the oil and gas industry. That is the position of the Conservative Party: we cannot afford it because it will be detrimental to self-sufficiency. Just this past weekend there was a takeover of MacMillan Bloedel by Noranda. I did not hear any member of the Conservative party saying Noranda could not afford to do that. I did not hear them say that takeovers and acquisitions like that are a waste of money.

There is a very simple reason why it is not a waste of money. In fact, the whole logic of the capitalist system is that takeovers and mergers mean a greater concentration in the system. That is one of the problems or diseases of the system. The reason is that you are acquiring an asset of which the value can only increase. Noranda made a decision to acquire the assets of MacMillan Bloedel. Those assets will grow with inflation, and their value will accrue to them.

Two hundred years ago a movement was born in western Europe. It started with the trade unions and co-ops and in the last century grew to a political movement which has spread throughout the world. And it is a movement that says, "If the logic of capitalism is corporate acquisition and there is no longer any competition, and if the only effect of these acquisitions is that a few absentee landlords and absentee shareholders receive the benefit of these assets without having laboured other than staying home and opening the envelopes which had the coupons in them, then why shouldn't the assets, and the dividends that flow from the assets, accrue to the people?"

Mr. Mayer: How many dividends has Petro-Canada paid?

Mr. Rae: The hon. member asks how many dividends Petro-Can has paid. My answer is "not enough". In the province of Saskatchewan this year, the potash corporation paid a dividend to the people of Saskatchewan.

There is no reason that we should be suffering under a government with no over-all economic strategy and no general purpose and understanding of the structural problems of the economy. The government says it is in favour of Canadianization. If you look ahead ten years at the oil and gas sector, its policies will leave us with less control and less access to the assets and dividends which should flow these valuable resources to the provinces and to the Canadian people than is the case at present. In 1980 we were in a poorer position to take control of those assets than we were in 1970.

Mr. Murphy: We will own the empty wells.

Mr. Rae: I agree with the hon. member. The policy of saying, " we cannot afford it" is a most shortsighted one. This can be put in very simple terms. What this government is asking the Canadian people to do is to build a house on a lot they do not own. It suggests we continue to pay rent, taxes and everything else for a house on a lot we will never own.

The Liberal and Tory parties have the nerve to say to the New Democratic Party that we cannot afford Canadianization, that we cannot afford any element of public ownership. They say that is communism. It makes the most eminent, economic and basic good common sense for the Canadian people to say we can own, that we cannot afford not to own.

We are being asked to approve the borrowing of $14 billion to pay for a government policy which, in the long run, will bring virtually no benefits to the Canadian people. That is the thrust of Liberal economic policy. Let us look at the problems the Prime Minister took on in 1968 and at those which exist in 1981. The only difference is that the basic, fundamental structural problems in the economy are now worse. Nothing has been done with regard to pensions. The economic relationship between poorer Canadians and other Canadians is worse now than it was in 1968. The problem of foreign ownership is more important now. Control of the oil and gas industry is more difficult now because the value of the resource has increased. We are spending less on research and development in 1981 than we spent in 1968.

Let us examine each and every one of the fundamental problems outlined by members of the Prime Minister's party in the 1960s. Unemployment is worse now than it was in 1968. Inflation has also increased. There is not a single social and economic problem which this Prime Minister took on in 1968 that is not worse in 1981. That is the record. Now the government has the gall to come back in 1981 and ask for another $14 billion.

Mr. Blenkarn: You moved the motion.

Mr. Rae: The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) says I moved the motion. I moved the motion, of which I am extremely proud, for the simple reason that the policies being put forward by the Conservative government were exactly the same; I am not going to say they were any worse or any better.

With regard to the problems of inflation, unemployment, distribution of wealth in Canada, research and development, tell me how anything the Crosbie budget was going to do would have done anything to solve the problems we are facing.

There was also a little thing called an election which dealt with the Conservative government. That party has gone back to the couch and is determined to relive this period over and over again. I call it the pause that did not refresh, the brief interregnum of Conservative power. It was the hiccup in history. But the basic point is that neither party has been able to focus attention on the basic economic problem facing the country. Neither party has been able to speak to Canadians about the economy in a language they understand.

Economic leadership is to be able to deal compassionately with the deepest anxieties and hopes of the Canadian people. I am sorry to say that in the last 13 years we have had governments of both stripes which have demonstrated that they do not comprehend the meaning and importance of economic leadership; they do not understand the importance of the issues involved.

In order for the government to get the approval it wants from the House to borrow $14 billion, which as I said is an extremely substantial sum of money, the government must demonstrate a modicum of purpose, a modicum of intelligence, a modicum of a sense of direction, compassion and caring.

When we look not only at the structural problems facing the country, with which I have dealt to some extent, but at the human situation in which Canadians find themselves, we find that many Canadians are economically disenfranchised, are turned off and have been so abused by the political and economic processes that they do not care. They have stopped participating or believing that there is any solution to or leadership in the hopelessness of their situation.

I do not think the government deserves the approval or support of the House of Commons. One of the most fundamental, deep-seated and deep-rooted problems facing the country today is basically that we have a government which does not give a damn about jobs, inflation, food, housing or people. The fundamental malaise of Liberalism and Conservatism is that both have failed to respond to the deepest anxieties of the people. When people look to a government, whether it be provincial or federal, for an element of understanding, leadership and an ability to deal with their concerns, or when they look to Ottawa, I am sorry to say they do not find a government of which they can in any sense be proud. They do not find a government in which they have a sense that the government understands their problems and wants Canadians to take hold of their economy. They do not find a government that wants Canadians to share with one another. They do not find a government that wants Canadians to create a humane, civilized, compassionate society.

Canadians are ready, willing and able to participate in such a society. I think Canadians want to regain control of their economy. I think Canadians feel they have been cheated because the government has failed the basic test of leadership. For those reasons we will be opposing this bill on third reading.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the comments of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). I must say that I am more than a bit dismayed by what he said; I think he put forward a series of ideas which were not connected in any logical way. He asked for an increase in investment in Canada by the federal government or by the provincial governments. At the same time he called for major increases in government spending to enhance the social welfare of our citizens, the level of education—

Mr. Miller: Economic welfare.

Mr. Evans: I am talking about general social welfare; I think that is what the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood talked about. He talked about increases in spending on education, with which I agree; but as an aside, we must recognize that every time any member of the federal government or any Member of Parliament says one word about education in the presence or within shouting distance of the provincial person, he is immediately told: "Hands off; stay out. We do not want, we do not need, federal presence in education". Yet we are told by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood that the federal government should massively increase its support.

Mr. Miller: In research and development.

Mr. Evans: Hon. members opposite should know that right now we are looking at federal-provincial fiscal transfers and associated arrangements. Hon. members opposite say that the federal government does not do anything for education.

Mr. Miller: You just said that; we did not say it.

Mr. Evans: In the majority of provinces, the federal government is paying 100 per cent, if not more, of the cost of all post-secondary education.

It was very disillusioning to listen to the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood talk about two totally inconsistent concepts in his speech. He said that we were borrowing $14 billion and that it would be spent on things on which we should not be spending money. He said that we should be diverting that money from the expenditures we are now making to a different area of expenditure. I think he mentioned two areas: increasing the well-being of individuals through the social welfare system, as well as increasing the well-being of individuals by investing heavily for the benefit of all Canadians in the wealth base of society.

In passing, I should note that it is very nice to have the Deputy Chairman of the Committee of the Whole (Mr. Ethier) back. It has been some time since I was able to look up and see a friendly, familiar face from a riding so close to my own. In all sincerity, welcome back and good health.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Evans: The massive increase in investment called for by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood is desirable. We on this side of the House would say that the investment should be a joint one by the people of Canada through certain Crown corporations and by the private sector in the spirit of the mixed economy which has been developed over many years. I think the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood would rather see much heavier public investment and much less private investment. But if we make this massive investment and do not increase the deficit of the federal government beyond where it is already—certainly hon. members on both sides agree that we want to see the deficit reduced—the only way to do it is by reallocating and reordering our priorities. If we reorder our priorities toward greater investment, it means that the non-investment or consumption aspects of the federal budget must be the areas in which cuts are made.

• (1650)

That flies in the face of the other half of what the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood was saying. He was saying we have to make sure that a basic social cushion is underneath Canadians so that they are not living in poverty, that senior citizens can have golden years in the true sense of the word, and that that is the area which has to be cut. There was total inconsistency in the comments made by the hon. member. I know he made them from the heart and with great emotion, but I am afraid he did not make them with great intellectual honesty, because what he is promising the people is pie in the sky, which is not possible.

The hon. member spoke only in generalities. Specifics are what we need from hon. members opposite, and there were no specifics as to how our priorities should be reordered and how funds should be made available to increase investment massively while at the same time increasing massively the social welfare system, which is a basic safety net under all Canadians. I think this House could use a lot less of that kind of speech and a lot more analytical, informed and progressive speaking on some positive examples of how these great goals can be achieved.

I was also dismayed by the cry that Canadians today are worse off than they were in 1968. An honest appraisal of the situation indicates that that is just not true in any way, shape or form. Canadians are among the best-off people on the face of the earth. I think the average Canadian understands that and is grateful. I am not saying it is the government which has brought this about, but we live in a great country which has the resources and the people to enable it to put together a society which to my mind is second to none.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood said that we have higher unemployment now than we had in 1968. During the period from 1968 to today, Canada created jobs faster than any other country on the face of the earth. That is a statistic which is readily available to hon. members. We now have massive participation by women who have come into the labour force. Jobs have been created. More women work in the labour force now than ever in the history of Canada. More men work in the labour force now than ever in the history of the country. Our participation rate is extraordinary. It is one of the highest in the world, and we have created jobs faster than anyone else.

I agree that our inflation rate now is higher than it was in 1968. It is much higher than any of us in this House would like to see it. The government and the minister are committed to bringing that inflation down to realistic levels in the foreseeable future. That is a commitment.

The real disposable income of Canadians is higher than it has ever been. With respect to the social welfare system, the hon. member certainly chose his statistics carefully. He said that there has not been a narrowing of the gap between the rich and the poor in Canada, but on a real income basis the poor are far better off today than they were in 1968. The economic level of our whole society has been raised. The gap has not been narrowed to the extent to which perhaps some would like to see it narrowed, but certainly the well-being of Canadians is better today than it has ever been. Perhaps our expectations have not been fully realized. Perhaps we were led to expect more than our society was able to deliver in a short period of time, but certainly as a society we have achieved great things over the last 12, 15 or 20 years.

Miss Jewett: Not true.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member opposite says it is not true.

Miss Jewett: What about people over 60 and below the poverty line?

Mr. Murphy: He doesn't care.

Mr. Evans: The fact is that we live in a country which has offered us much and asked very little.

Miss Jewett: Stick to the facts.

Mr. Evans: Hon. members in the New Democratic Party, and especially the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett), indicate that seniors are worse off. We have just completed a pension conference to try to find ways to improve the very good public system we have now.

Miss Jewett: Don't say they are better off than they were in 1968. It is not true.

Mr. Evans: They are much better off than they were in 1968.

Mr. Kaplan: There was no senior citizens' housing in 1968.

Mr. Evans: There are many programs which governments across the board have provided, are providing and will improve upon.

With that said, I would like to deal with the nature of the bill with which we are dealing now, Bill C-59. It deals with the request of the Government of Canada for authority from Parliament to borrow a maximum of $14 billion. This derives from the budget in which the financial requirements of the government for this coming fiscal year were forecast to be $11 billion. I certainly hope, and I am sure all of us hope, that the government is able to do even better than that and that the financial requirements will be less, but the best estimate we have is the forecast of financial requirements of $11 billion. The other $3 billion is being asked for, as I mentioned before, to provide a reserve for possible contingencies in case some unexpected shock hits the system; for example, if world oil prices were to double again, the oil import compensation payments would rise dramatically and the government would have to be in a position to cushion the shock through that program.

The second and, I think, most important aspect of that $3 billion—$3 billion added to $11 billion to make $14 billion—is a non-lapsing portion which can be carried on from fiscal year to fiscal year.

Mr. Blenkarn: It will all be spent this year.

Mr. Evans: On Thursday night when I spoke, I demonstrated—quite well, I think—why that flexibility is important and should be provided to the government. Contrary to what was said by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) on that same night, this is not an unprecedented move. In fact, this was a typical situation in previous borrowing authority bills, except for the one in 1979 introduced by the hon. member for St. John's West and the one last summer which did not have a non-lapsing feature. However, prior to that, non-lapsing features were commonplace and did provide very important flexibility for the government, as Conservative members should remember, because they ran their government for a period of seven months, without calling Parliament, on the non-lapsing authority that was available to them from previous Liberal budgets. That kind of flexibility is important. When hon. members opposite speak, I think they will agree with me that that is important.

I mentioned on Thursday night that I would try to respond to the concern which has been raised by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) and others with regard to the current cash balances of the government and why those cash balances appear to be large. When added to the borrowing authority, they give the government a great deal of financial flexibility. I would like to say a few words about that. As the hon. member indicated, the cash balance of the government as of March 25 was $6.4 billion. Subsequently, in the last week of the month of March that sum was diminished by $1.6 billion—

Mr. Blenkarn: You got rid of a lot of money awfully fast.

Mr. Evans: —leaving $4.8 billion. There are several reasons for the current cash balance position of the government. First, there are still outstanding liabilities from the 1980-81 fiscal year which are yet to be paid. In other words, there are cheques which are in the system which have to clear. The amounts of many of these cheques are substantial.

Mr. Blenkarn: That was the situation a year ago when you got along with $1.9 billion.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member says we had $1.9 billion at the end of last year, that now it is $4.8 billion and that that is a big difference. The second reason, of course, is that the cash balances of the government in the second quarter of the year will tend to be high because of the anticipated rebates of income tax; in other words, the income tax refunds which come in the first and second quarter of the calendar year, part of which lie in the previous fiscal year and part of which will lie in 1981-82 fiscal year. Those rebates come in at this time of the year and, as a result, cash balances have to be maintained at above normal levels.

• (1700)

Also, over the last six to nine months we have been faced with a rather precarious foreign exchange market because foreign exchange values have changed very rapidly. The Bank of Canada has been known to intervene on both sides of that market from time to time to provide some stability in that market, not trying to maintain any given level of the dollar but simply to stabilize the fluctuations in that market. That has at times required rather substantial sums. For that reason as well, the government's cash balances right now are relatively high.

Given these facts, we would expect that in the very near future the cash balances of the government will return to a more normal level and, therefore, this is a temporary aberration. The moneys that will be in the cash balance position shortly will tend to be of average size, as the hon. member opposite seems to think should be the case at this moment.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary, in explaining the unrealistically high cash balances, could explain why this government has been borrowing money in the marketplace at up to 17 per cent?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, if it is appropriate for me to respond to the hon. member's question, I will certainly be glad to do so. The borrowing was to build up those cash balances for exactly the reasons I have just given. If the government has a need for higher cash balances at this time of the year, then it should have them at such a level that it will not run into difficulties. That is precisely why the cash balances have been raised, and to do that the government has had to borrow under the borrowing authority which expired as of March 31. We would expect that our borrowing in the next few months will be far below the average level of borrowing we have had in the past—

Mr. Blenkarn: So that when the interest rates are lower, you borrow less, and when they are higher, you borrow more.

Mr. Evans: —because we do have these cash balances. The hon. member seems to be carrying on a debate with me. I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, which one of us has the floor. The hon. member for Mississauga South and I engage in these exchanges quite often on a friendly basis, but when one of us has the floor, I am not sure it is appropriate for the other to decide he will make more comments. I will try to restrain myself when he has the floor, if he will kindly restrain himself now that I have the floor.

I think the hon. member will see that the explanation for the cash balances which will be in the weekly statements will be that the cash balances of the government will drop down to normal levels in relatively quick order and this is not a matter which should be of significant concern to hon. members opposite. We realize that they are abnormally high at this time for the three reasons I mentioned. I assure hon. members that this is not a situation which will last and it is one that was anticipated.

In this debate on borrowing authority we have heard hon. members opposite contend that the federal government is asking for too much borrowing authority and imply at the same time that because the government has this borrowing authority it can go on a spending spree. Hon. members have contended that after Parliament has approved this borrowing authority there will be no checks on government spending, that the government can simply borrow all of that $14 billion and spend and spend. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that is doing a disservice to the Canadian public and it is certainly doing a disservice to the people who are watching us on television.

Also, it is being somewhat dishonest or ignorant, and I am not sure exactly which, because the Canadian federal financial system is such that that simply is not possible, and hon. members opposite know that. The government, of whatever political stripe it may be, brings forward during the year its estimates which lay out a spending program reflecting the fiscal statement of the minister in his budget. The estimates reflect the expenditure plans of each and every department, and supplementary estimates are brought down when they are needed. The main point is that in every case the main estimates and the supplementary estimates which constrain the spending of government and of every department and agency in government are approved by Parliament. Parliamentarians in this House and in committee scrutinize and approve every dime that is spent by the government. So if those estimates do not show spending above $11 billion or $12 billion in the next year—in this case, the total budget is in the range of $65 billion, if that is the spending level that is approved by Parliament in the estimates—then that is what the government is constrained to spend. It cannot spend any more unless it comes back to Parliament to get further approval.

We have admitted, and hon. members have noted, that the borrowing authority for which we are asking is $14 billion, even though our financial forecasts show that the shortfall between our revenues and our expenditures will be only $11 billion. There is no way that that extra $3 billion—if we are successful in holding down expenditures even further, there will be an excess of $4 billion or $5 billion—will be used frivolously by the government without coming back to Parliament and laying before Parliament its plans for that expenditure. There are controls and constraints on the level of government spending, on what those moneys are spent, and of course there are constraints on the amount that the government can borrow. What we are talking about in this bill is parliamentary approval for the borrowing that will be necessary to meet the approved expenditures which the government has put forward to Parliament.

I suggest that when the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood and others say that the government's spending priorities are out of line, that is a charge that should be raised and carefully scrutinized when we start looking at the estimates of the department and in what areas hon. members would like to see expenditures reduced, so that perhaps some of the lofty goals to which the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood referred could, in fact, be realized.

I think it must be made clear to the people that there are constraints on the government's expenditures and borrowing, and that those constraints are imposed by Parliament, so there is no way the government can exceed the limit without further parliamentary approval. The government is not, as some hon. members opposite have indicated, asking for a blank cheque, since in the Canadian parliamentary system there is no such thing as a blank cheque. If the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood was here, I would say that there is no such thing as a free lunch either; but that would only make him feel good.

To summarize, I would like to say that the minister started his tenure with a financial statement as to what he believed the future held for the economy. He followed that up with a budget, which for the first time laid out in an envelope the expenditures of the government, the expected revenues, the financial requirements, what will have to be borrowed to make up the difference, a planned gradual reduction in the deficit and an improvement in the spending priorities of the government under the envelope system which was brought down. We examined, debated and voted on that budget.

After that we had the estimates which take our expenditure plans down to the most minute detail. I might say in passing that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) has just brought down a plan which will make the estimates even more useful to hon. members in scrutinizing government expenditures. I think this is a great step forward and I congratulate the President of the Treasury Board for bringing down these measures. I have just seen a report which has been tabled by the President of the Treasury Board with respect to the Lambert commission, which report will improve the operations of the government even more.

The government is working very diligently on improving the efficiency and effectiveness of its operations. It is helping the Canadian people get far more value for the money which is made available to the government to spend on the public's behalf. We now have a complete description of where the money will be spent and a request in Bill C-59 for the additional funds which will be necessary to finance those expenditures. Given that we now have this measure before us, we would all very much like to see a lesser amount being requested in the borrowing authority, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) have indicated. We would like to have a lower deficit and more growth in the economy. Those are common goals which we all share.

A realistic assessment of the situation indicates that the sum requested is what will be required to do the job. I realize that we would all like to have something better, but when you face the facts, which is what the Minister of Finance must do, then you must ask yourself, "What is my realistic assessment of what I will have to borrow in the marketplace to meet the expenditures which have been approved by Parliament?" That is the amount we are asking for in the borrowing authority bill, with the addition of the amount I have indicated for flexibility, which will not be used unless the government returns to Parliament to ask for additional spending authority.

All rhetoric aside, the bill before us asks for what is realistically required. Yes, we want to reduce that requirement in the future. Yes, the minister has put forward a plan for reducing those financial requirements, reducing the deficit and enhancing the over-all accountability, efficiency and effectiveness of government over the next few years. I think this is a realistic plan. It is one which hon. members on both sides of the House should accept and approve, given that they have already approved the expenditure plan that is to be financed by this particular piece of legislation.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-59 is a very important bill. It asks the Parliament of Canada to approve $14 billion in borrowing—

Mr. McDermid: All in one paragraph.

Mr. Mayer: As I was just about to say, all on one page and a bit. The amount of $14 billion is approximately five times the total budget of the province in which I live.

This bill is also important because borrowing has come to be a larger part of the government's expenditure. This can be looked at in several ways. In the past it has been pointed out that present government borrowing amounts to more than the total budget of the Government of Canada some 12 years ago. It has also been pointed out that in those 12 years our national deficit has amounted to a sum so large that the interest charged against it each year exceeds the total amount of money spent by the government some 12 years ago. It is an extremely large amount of money. As has been said previously, it accounts for something in the range of 19 per cent of total government expenditure.

I like to look at it in another way. It means that out of each dollar of taxes collected on behalf of the Government of Canada, some 25 cents is used to pay interest on past government debt. I am sorry that the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) did not stay to listen to the debate. I think too many times this is what the NDP does. They do not really care what goes on in the House; they make speeches and run out to make the best possible use of the press that they can.

Miss Jewett: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has just made a comment about my colleague the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) not being in the House. He suggests that my hon. friend has gone out to take part in some kind of press conference. The fact is he went out to make a speech in the community.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I do not think that constitutes a point of order.

Mr. Mayer: It seems to me, for whatever reason, members of the NDP use the House as little as possible. The critic for the New Democratic Party, once he makes his speech, could at least stay in the House and listen to what goes on. The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) is our spokesman on this bill. He has been in the House, participated in the debate—

Miss Jewett: He does not get invited to make speeches outside.

Mr. Mayer: It is amazing to me that anyone would want to listen to them, but I guess it takes all kinds.

One of the points that the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood made—and I will refer to him again, if I may, without upsetting my friends to my left, which is where they should be, to my left—was that he found it unfortunate that the government was borrowing money simply to pay for groceries. I think he should have gone further. I think what disturbs many of us on this side of the House is that the government is borrowing money to pay for yesterday's groceries, which is even worse.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood wondered why it was all right for Noranda to be involved in takeovers and why we were being critical of the Government of Canada with respect to takeovers. There is a very simple explanation. We are here as elected representatives and we are voicing our concerns on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada who, in a very real sense, are the shareholders on behalf of the Government of Canada. If we do not have an opportunity to stand up and question some of the expenditures that the Government of Canada makes on behalf of its citizens, then no one else will. It seems to me that if the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood wanted to be consistent, he would have gone further in his analogy and said that none of the shareholders in Noranda should have been concerned about any of the things that Noranda does on their behalf. I am sure that that would not be the case. The next time there is an annual meeting of the shareholders of Noranda, they will be questioning the takeover procedures and the money that was spent on behalf of the shareholders. At that meeting there will have to be some accountability given for the actions of the directors in the past. That is precisely what should happen in the House of Commons.

To pursue the matter further, if the people who have bought shares in Noranda are unhappy or if, for some reason, they think the directors have done things which are wrong and the shares of Noranda fall in value, the shareholders are in a position where they can sell the shares of that particular company. However, the taxpayers of Canada cannot do that, unfortunately; when the government makes bad commitments on behalf of its citizens, the taxpayers cannot get out and sell their shares in the country. It is incumbent on all of us who are elected to represent our constituents that we question the spending practices of this government. It is then an entirely understandable concept; and I find it unfortunate that the spokesman for the NDP, on behalf of the finance department, cannot see and make that very simple distinction.

There are many things that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) said and to which I would like to make reference. However, I will just mention a few. He mentioned that we should somehow reorder our specifics. He pointed to the fact that the NDP has been inconsistent too often, and that, by implication, we in this party have been inconsistent in that, while asking for increased government expenditure, we also wail away and complain that the government deficit increases. While that does happen I, for one, have not made those kinds of suggestions. I think that many of us who are interested in the financial affairs of this country on behalf of our party have tried to be consistent and have not asked for increased government involvement in government programs while complaining about increasing deficits.

That brings me to some of the concerns that I have with the bill. I do not see anything wrong at all with the government's coming to Parliament and asking for the authority to borrow more money. I think it is an entirely legitimate activity to be engaged in. However, what I do object to—and I think it is a legitimate objection—is the fact that we are being asked to give authority to the government to borrow $3 billion as a contingency.

The parliamentary secretary said, rightly so, that the Parliament of Canada scrutinizes the estimates. If it wants to spend an additional $3 billion, the Government of Canada must come back with supplementary estimates to ask for authority to spend this $3 billion.

Given that fact, I see nothing wrong with the intent of the amendment of my colleague the hon. member for Mississauga South that we not give the government this contingency borrowing authority. If it is necessary to come back with supplementary estimates to spend the $3 billion, I see nothing wrong with the government's coming back to Parliament for additional borrowing authority at the same time. In that way we who take ourselves seriously as legislators and try to do the best we can on behalf of our constituents would then be in a position at the same time to examine supplementary estimates, vote, and give the government authority for the additional $3 billion that it claims it needs for contingencies.

The parliamentary secretary said that one of the reasons the government may require the additional $3 billion is that world oil prices could double. Heaven forbid that we should get ourselves into that kind of a scenario. However, I think that points out some of the problems that the government has gotten itself into, because it has not developed secure Canadian supplies which would be more predictable in their price.

We can see the folly of the National Energy Program as it is presently being used by the government. In fact, it is not encouraging increases in domestic supply. If anything, it is discouraging Canadians from developing their own sources of supply, and not only conventional crude. We have seen the cutbacks in production from the province of Alberta. We have seen that heavy oil and tar sands plants have not gone ahead, and in some cases are as much as two years behind schedule. If the government was serious about making the country self-sufficient in energy, it would have gone ahead and reached a price agreement so that we could be in a position to be more self-reliant with our own supplies of oil. If that is one of the contingencies for which the government needs to borrow the $3 billion, I submit that if it would spend more attention and time on developing our own sources of supply it would probably not need that kind of money for that kind of contingency. I find it unfortunate that this type of contingency is considered in additional government spending.

One of the other interesting phrases that the parliamentary secretary used was to call a surplus of money—I think, $4 billion or $5 billion—a "temporary aberration". I would think that that is exactly what it is, based on the spending habits of this government. It is unfortunate that because of past spending habits, and because we have been in the hole, we look at a surplus position as being a temporary aberration. That gives us an idea of the attitude of the government to spending the dollars of taxpayers.

The parliamentary secretary referred to "putting all rhetoric aside", and then he went on to say that the government should be accountable, it should be efficient, and it should be—another four or five-syllable word; I cannot make out my own writing here. However, it seems to me that if we are going to put all rhetoric aside, we should talk in simple, straightforward and honest terms and not get into these long four or five-syllable words. I would be very happy to see the government put rhetoric aside and get down to brass tacks in considering government spending.

My hon. colleague the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) talks about bread and butter issues. That is what we understand in this country, and that is what has made this country great. Bread and butter issues will make this country great again if those issues are allowed to make gain of some importance in the future.

I would like to talk about how I believe the massive borrowing that the government has been engaged in for the past number of years has affected the farming communities in the country. We all know that, by and large, the farmers in this country serve the citizens as well as any country in the world, because we spend on food a smaller proportion of our take home pay—our gross national product, for that matter, too—as individual citizens who feed ourselves, than any other country in the world with the exception of the United States, and we run a very close second to the Americans. We spend something like 18 per cent of our disposable income on food. This also takes into account the fact that we eat something like 40 per cent of our meals away from home. That tells me that the agricultural industry in this country has served the people of Canada very well.

To give an example, there is now a saying that it will not be very long before the potato will not go into a modern kitchen unless it has somehow been prepared, is already peeled and baked for the consumer, for the homemaker, because we have come a long way from the time when we simply bought potatoes in stores, brought them home and cooked them. A very large percentage of potatoes eaten in Canadian homes are now prepared or pre-processed in some way.

What has happened is that, in order for the farmers to be this productive, they have had to make use of very large amounts of capital so that the amount of capital required to create a job in the agricultural industry in this country is larger than in any other industry. What happens when the government gets involved, the way it is, in borrowing large amounts of money is that there are strains on individual farming operations in terms of their ability to borrow at reasonable interest rates, and this drives up the interest rate.

I can give some examples, and I have three ways of looking at it. I took the figures from the Bank of Canada Review. The total borrowing—this is non-equity security borrowings in Canada—for the calendar year 1980 was $21.8 billion. Of that amount, $11.4 billion was borrowed by the federal government, and it accounts for 52.2 per cent. Over half the non-equitable securities issued in Canada were taken up by the federal government. The provinces accounted for $7.7 billion, and the municipalities accounted for $.6 billion. Out of the figure I have quoted of $21.8 billion, approximately 90 per cent was borrowed by three levels of government.

It is no wonder that we see interest rates on loans to farmers increase. The three levels of government have become such large borrowers that there is a limited amount of money available for the private sector, and when the private sector goes to the market, it finds interest rates have been driven up by the activities of the three levels of government.

I have an article from The Globe and Mail, dated November 18 which points out that:

> Federal financing of $8.19 billion accounted for 41 per cent of the nine-month total. Provincial and agency borrowing amounted to $3.73 billion (19 per cent of the total). Municipalities raised $1.06 billion (5 per cent).

This set of statistics includes borrowings made out of the country. Previously when we looked at borrowings within the country only, the three levels of government accounted for something like 90 per cent of the total. If we include borrowings from outside the country, then the three levels of governments account for 65 per cent of the total. It seems to me when the government is involved as heavily as it is in the capital market, that leaves precious little money with which private industry can operate.

Another way of looking at the federal government deficit is in terms of percentage of the gross national product. I have in front of me a recent issue of the pamphlet Business Review issued by the Bank of Montreal, for February, 1981. It contains a graph which shows that in 1978 the federal government deficit, shown as a percentage of the gross national product, came to almost 5 per cent. In 1979, when this party formed the government, so we can take some of the credit or blame, the figure dropped to about 3.4 per cent of the gross national product. Last year, with the Liberals back in power, it reached 4.2 per cent. It is evident that when this government is involved, the borrowing, as a percentage of the gross national product, becomes too large and this does not leave enough money to enable the private sector to borrow at reasonable rates.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood pointed out that there are different types of borrowings in which we may become involved. Whether we are farmers, whether we run a household or a small business, I think we all know it is possible to borrow money for investment so that the investment will return the initial amount of money borrowed. If the borrowing is for capital projects, it would not make any difference whether we borrow the money outside Canada, from individuals, or from banks; as long as the money regenerates itself, we would be in a position to pay it back. Once the money was paid back, then the facility or whatever was established would be there, creating jobs and wealth in the country.

In too many instances, that has not been the case where this government is concerned, however, and that is why we ask that they give some indication of the purpose of the borrowing. The parliamentary secretary objected to the use of the words "blank cheque" but, in effect, the request for $3 billion is a request for a blank cheque because we have not seen the supplementary estimates to establish that the government needs to spend that money. If we were sure the money was to be spent on capital projects which would make the country more productive, then I am sure we would agree that the money should be borrowed. We have not been given that indication, however. The examination of estimates in committee is often a very frustrating, time-consuming and non-productive exercise. I think we would all agree that this examination is not adequate in view of the amount of money we are being asked to approve on behalf of our constituents.

If the money borrowed were spent on capital projects which would finance themselves, then it would not make a great deal of difference who it was borrowed from because we would be in a position to repay it from the earnings. That is not the kind of borrowing this government is asking the Parliament of Canada to approve, however.

It is interesting to note that amount of interest on past government debt, which is to be paid this year, is about the same as the amount we are being asked to approve in this borrowing bill. This reminds me of a statement by John Stuart Mill, the famous economist, who said something to the effect that you cannot make a storekeeper rich by stealing from him and then using the money to buy goods from his store. It seems to me this is the kind of situation the government is in now; it borrows money to pay for yesterday's groceries and then, in returning the interest payment to the taxpayer, it turns around and taxes the taxpayer on the interest it is paying back to him and recovers the money in that way.

I do not think we can speak about generating wealth in the country unless we are planning to spend some of the borrowings we are being asked to approve on some legitimate capital projects.

I would go further, Mr. Speaker. Three or four weeks ago the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) tabled his estimates in this House. We all know the procedural hassle we got into then. I had the opportunity to ask him if there was any provision in the estimates for the western development fund. He pointed out that there was a provision in the estimates for spending $350 million of the $4 billion which had been promised in the throne speech. He did not indicate where the money would be spent. Several members from western Canada suggested it should be spent on capital projects which would make that part of the country more productive. At that time, however, there was no indication how the $350 million was to be spent.

Questions put to the minister when he tabled the estimates and further questions put to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) in committee brought forth no indication that guidelines had been set for spending the money. That belies some of the points made by the parliamentary secretary about the necessity of having the estimates approved in the House before the money is spent. When we on this side of the House attempt to find out in committee what the government's spending plans are, we do not receive adequate answers.

I do not think farmers and operators of small businesses are very different, Mr. Speaker; they operate on six, eight, or nine-month production periods. This is particularly so in the cattle business. A farmer has to commit himself to buying feeder cattle which will be fed over a period of six or eight months. In that time-span, interest rates may go through the roof to a point where it would cost in the neighbourhood of 20 cents per pound to put a finished animal in position to be slaughtered and show up as meat on a supermarket counter. At today's prices, that 20 cents per pound is 25 per cent or 30 per cent of the total market value of the animal. Faced with that kind of arithmetic when deciding whether to produce additional beef, buy additional cattle or put the grain through livestock as a marketing tool, a lot of producers have already decided against it, and in fact have cut back on the number of animals available for slaughter. This has a negative effect on the supply of beef.

High interest rates discourage cattle producers from making additional supplies available to the consumer. We all know that as supplies contract, prices go up. That hurts the very process which the government is trying to make work in this time of inflation. It holds down the money supply and drives up interest rates. As I pointed out, as interest rates go up in the beef business, that hurts the supply of cattle. The whole exercise has exactly the opposite effect to that which the government and the Bank of Canada would like.

Last week the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) announced an increase in the Farm Credit Corporation interest rates from 12.75 per cent to 14 per cent, an all-time high. I fail to see how an increase in the interest rate will help inflation. Instead, it will drive producers out of business and the supply of products to the consumer will decrease. In turn, this will drive up the price.

One of the things that disturbs many people in western Canada is the way our transportation system for grain is being taxed to the limit. This will have an adverse effect on the movement of all the products we are capable of producing in western Canada to an export position. It applies to bulk commodities which are in demand around the world; sulphur, potash, grain and coal. In the past year we have heard a lot in this House and in the country about the Crow rate. This is a very emotional issue because it is an historical rate in western Canada. Some people claim it should not be touched, while others say it should be abolished.

I think everyone agrees that the railways are not deriving enough revenue from the movement of grain to cover the actual moving costs. There is a separate argument as to how much loss of revenue the railways are suffering. Some people say the actual charge is only covering one fifth of the cost of moving grain; some say it is more like one third. Others argue that the railways are being compensated adequately, but most people agree the railways are not receiving enough revenue from the movement of grain to cover the actual costs incurred.

Unless some solution is reached quite quickly on this impasse, then the railways will not be in a position to move all the bulk commodities we will have for export in western Canada two or three years hence. I think most people would feel comfortable if the Government of Canada were borrowing money for capital improvements to the railways.

I know the railways would much rather see an increase in the rates they charge in order to generate their own revenues to spend on their capital projects. I think it is incumbent on the government to show some leadership in this important issue. If it does not, we will find ourselves unable to earn the kind of foreign exchange of which we are capable. We know that the more we export, the more foreign exchange we earn. This results in less pressure on the Canadian dollar. As well, the Bank of Canada would be able to lower interest rates, benefiting everyone. The government of the day would not have to come to Parliament to ask for as much money as it is now, because Canada would be earning more money on foreign exchange and that money would find its way into the economy through what is called a multiplier effect. More taxes would be generated and the whole country would benefit. On behalf of the people in my region I want to say that this is an area in which I would like to see some leadership and emphasis. We will then be in a position to contribute, not only for our own region but for the whole country.

I have one more concern. It deals with the way the Bank of Canada operates in this country. As we all know, the Bank of Canada has become a very large part of our financial lives. In the annual report of the Governor of the Bank of Canada to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), we find this statement:

> The responsibility of the bank is to discharge its Parliamentary mandate "to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation".

The phrase in quotes is from the act. The responsibility for the bank is a very large responsibility and one which I am sure everyone involved with the Bank of Canada takes very seriously. I think one can make the argument that the Bank of Canada today has in some instances much more to do with our economic life than the Minister of Finance. I find this unfortunate in some ways because the Minister of Finance is accountable to the House of Commons and, therefore, to those of us who are elected to represent our constituents. Yet the Bank of Canada, through its board of directors, makes some very important decisions on our behalf almost every day of every week. I suspect very few Canadians know who serves on their board of directors. These people determine at what level the money supply will be increased. They determine, in effect, by regulating the amount of negotiable securities put on the market each Thursday of every week by the Bank of Canada at the treasury bill auction, the interest rate that chartered banks charge.

As a matter of interest, I would like to read into the record the names of those who serve on the board of directors of the Bank of Canada. I think it is important that all Canadians know who these people are. The Governor of the Bank of Canada is Mr. Gerald K. Bouey; the deputy governor is Mr. R. William Lawson. The governor and the deputy governor are both full-time directors. They spend all of their time on issues relating to the Bank of Canada. There are 12 directors who work on a part-time basis. They are as follows: Robert W. Campbell, Calgary, Alberta; William Dodge, Ottawa, Ontario; D. Michael M. Goldie, Vancouver, British Columbia; Sol Kanee, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Spencer G. Lake, Ramea, Newfoudland; Alie A. LeBouthillier, Caraquet, New Brunswick; J. William E. Mingo, Halifax, Nova Scotia; Mrs. Yseult Lefebvre-Richard, Montréal, P.Q.; Joseph H. Potts, Toronto, Ontario; Donald Smith, Charlottetown, P.E.I.; John A. Stack, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, and Jacques Taschereau, Québec, P.Q.

I am sure few Canadians know very much about the fourteen people, I have just listed or know much about their business backgrounds. Yet a very good case could be made that they have as much to do with the monetary and fiscal policy of this government as the Minister of Finance. In my opinion, I do not think this composition should be allowed to continue. I would be in favour of seeing the addition of two Members of Parliament to the board of directors of the Bank of Canada, not necessarily because they should have a lot of input and should make drastic changes, but simply so they could have a better understanding and could have some input when the occasion arises in terms of the way the Bank of Canada is administering the monetary policy in this country. As I have said, monetary policy is very important. Anyone who thinks otherwise has only to look at the level of interest rates we have experienced for the last year to realize that it is extremely important.

I hope the day comes when we do have Members of Parliament on the board of directors of the Bank of Canada. I do not believe it would make the board unduly political. On the contrary, I think it would make it much more responsive and accountable to the people of Canada for whom it is set up to serve. In addition, it would go a long way to seeing that the Bank of Canada does in fact regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of this nation.

I find it unfortunate that the government is asking for so much money in the form of the borrowing authority. I see nothing wrong with the government accepting the amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga South to the effect that if the government does need supplementary borrowing authority it can come back to the House. We should not be in the position of voting to give the government blanket authority for an additional $3 billion after the beginning of its next fiscal year in April, 1982. I will have no trouble at all, in fact, my conscience will not allow me to do anything different than to vote against this bill.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the suggestions made from the other side that the government should come back more often, and that we should have smaller borrowing bills is perhaps desirable. The problem is that we have a lot of business to deal with in the course of a year in this House of Commons. If the government came back twice as often, we would have a lot less time to do a lot of other things. What has been going on in this House during the last few weeks is a good example of how House time is used up, in what I term a disreputable sort of way, and how we are unable to get on with the business of the House.

It seems to me that members opposite always want to spend more time doing this and more time doing that. If we did not bring in such things as closure, we would not be able to manage the country, nor could we get the business of the House done. If there were some evidence that we could have a smaller borrowing bill and get it through in one or two sessions of the House, it might be possible, but the constant necessity of bringing in closure is caused basically by the fact that we cannot seem to move things in the House.

On Friday last, I spoke on the borrowing bill at report stage. I had only 20 minutes and I did not finish everything I wanted to say. Today I would like to go somewhat further, but first I want to review some of the comments I made earlier. I will then approach the fiscal powers of the federal and provincial governments which I think are the keys to the whole surplus-deficit situation.

First, the reason for borrowing, that is the debt, can only be expressed in an intelligent manner when related to the gross national product. It does not make sense to talk about personal debt as an absolute number. For example, I may owe $10,000. That does not mean anything unless I relate it to my income. If my income is $100,000, the $10,000 is manageable. If my income is $10,000, it is a lot less manageable.

The same can be said about the net national debt as a function of the gross national product. Most of these matters have to be measured in that fashion. Whether the gross national product is a relatively small amount or is, as it is today, close to $300 billion, that has a very definite effect on the amount of money that can be borrowed.

In 1951, we talked about the net national debt being 50 per cent of the gross national product. That was very meaningful. It was not expressed in absolute terms. In 1981 the national debt as a function of the GNP is around 30 per cent. I will not go into that in detail, but it is important. We should relate these things, and the GNP is a simple way of doing it.

I looked at government expenditures on which this borrowing is based. Transfers to the provinces, to people and to corporations in terms of subsidies amounted to 48.9 per cent, almost 50 per cent of all federal government spending. Payments of the public debt came to 19 per cent. Transfers to people and provinces, including those who hold government bonds or have loaned money to the federal government, such as banks, totalled 68 per cent of all government spending. The cost of operating the government is 32 per cent; basically the cost of subsidies to Crown corporations, running the RCMP, the military, post office and so on. The 68 per cent is the transfer portion.

A lot has been said about cutting the fat from government expenditures. That must come out of the 31 per cent. There is obviously some fat, but it cannot be cut in any significant way. If we want to seriously cut back, it must be from the 68 per cent.

What concerns me today is the transfers to the provinces. Straight dollar transfers and tax point transfers are in the order of $18.9 billion, or 28 per cent of the $67.5 billion government expenditure. In other words, 28 per cent of federal government expenditures is transferred to the provinces and municipalities. The sum is transferred directly to the provinces and then to the municipalities, and a relatively small amount direct to the municipalities. It is that very large transfer that is getting us into trouble.

When we talk about the borrowing bill, we get to the heart of what the whole Constitution business is all about. We have to face up to the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. On Friday I referred to the way governments have grown. I stated that in 1943, in the height of World War II, the federal government revenues were 22.3 per cent of the GNP and 3.3 per cent for the provinces. If we include municipalities, it would probably raise the figure to 5 per cent or 6 per cent. By 1960, the federal portion of the GNP in revenue terms was 17 per cent and 6.1 per cent for the provinces. In 1970 the federal portion was 16.1 per cent and the provinces 12.3 per cent. In 1979, the last year for which I have figures, the federal portion was down to 16.6 per cent and the provincial portion up to 15 per cent.

Since World War II, there has been a decline from 22.3 per cent to 16.6 per cent. Since 1970 there has been a decline from 17 per cent to 16.6 per cent. In that same period, provincial revenues increased from 6.1 per cent to 15 per cent of the GNP, a tremendous growth in the provincial share.

I think it is worth making a comparison with the United States. I will do this on an expenditure basis because I only have approximations for revenue. Federal government expenditures in the United States represent 60 per cent of all government expenditures in that federal union. State and municipal expenditures represent 40 per cent.

Some on this side are very strong proponents of provincial rights and others of federal rights. I am a strong proponent of the federal government having more power. In Canada, federal government expenditures represent 45 per cent of all government expenditures, and the provinces and municipalities represent 55 per cent. We have a very interesting concept. Which is the more powerful? In the United States it is 60-40 federal, state and municipal, and in Canada it is 45-55.

May I call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, before I launch into the basis of my speech on third reading of the borrowing authority bill, I should like to make one last point. It concerns government expenditures on goods and services. Many economists would look at government expenditures in two ways. One way would be to look at goods and services and then the balance, which would basically be transfers.

Looking at the goods and services side and speaking in relation to the gross national product—and this is information taken from a book entitled "Unemployment and Inflation" by Barber and McCallum—in 1953 we find that the total federal expenditure in fixed dollars declined from 10 per cent of the gross national product to about 6 per cent in 1978. This is really what the federal government absorbs; it is not the transfers, which would be the balance. This includes federal defence and non-defence spending. So, there was an actual decline in what the government takes out of the economy.

Basically we find the opposite situation in the provinces. The provinces absorbed something like 6 per cent in 1953. This rose to about 10 per cent or 11 per cent in 1979. When one adds in the local governments and hospitals, it rises from approximately 10 per cent to 15 per cent, 16 per cent or 17 per cent.

This business about government spending being the main cause of inflation is highly distorted, when one considers that the federal government's share of goods and services has declined significantly since 1953; there has been a steady decline.

I should like to go back to the real crunch of the constitutional debate, that is, the second phase; where we are going and why we are doing it. It has a great deal to do with the fiscal arrangements between the provinces and the federal government. Previously I indicated there was a very large growth in provincial revenues relative to federal revenues. In 1960 the federal government revenue was 17 per cent of the gross national product and the revenue of the provincial governments was approximately 6.1 per cent. In 1979, the latest year for which I have figures, it was roughly 16.6 per cent to 15.5 per cent. Then I indicated that 60 per cent of all government expenditures in the United States was by the federal government and that 40 per cent was by the states and municipalities. In Canada it was 45 per cent federal and 55 per cent provincial and municipal. If fiscal power is what counts, then the American federal government is much stronger than we are. If we turn to the revenue side, the federal government's revenue is about 40 per cent and the provinces' and municipalities' is about 60 per cent. We have this particular problem.

I should like to go back and deal with the fiscal history of the country very briefly. I heard some speakers on the other side who did not realize that the Fathers of Confederation looked at the American system when they were setting up this country. At the time they indicated that the American system was not working and that they wanted a much stronger federal government. This is what Macdonald and Brown were concerned about. They set up a fiscal system which gave the federal government a lot of power. In those days indirect taxation, customs duties and so on were the major sources of government revenue. They considered this to be a prime system.

Actually, from 1867 to around 1914, and even later, there was a great decline in the fiscal power of the federal government. It was not what Macdonald and others had expected. Then World War I increased federal government power. There was a much greater increase in provincial power between 1919 and 1930. Then the provinces almost collapsed. They reached their heights and then collapsed; bankruptcy was avoided by federal government assistance. Then there was a growing increase of federal government power during the 1930s and the period of World War II. Afterwards there was a recession in federal power and a growth in the power of the provinces and the municipalities in terms of fiscal arrangements.

Now we have a situation which is extremely acute. I should like to talk about surpluses and deficits. Today the federal deficit is approximately $15 billion. I should like to refer to the annual review entitled "a climate of uncertainty" of the Economic Council of Canada.

Looking at this chart we see a deficit which continues right through the eighties and into 1990, perhaps slightly less in terms of gross national product, but we see the opposite situation with the provinces and municipalities which move well into a surplus situation. This is particularly so with respect to the province of Alberta, but also to some extent in the other two western resource-rich provinces. However, there is a basic surplus at that stage of the game. If we put all levels of government together, as the Economic Council of Canada has done, we see that by about 1984 all governments have a zero surplus and a zero deficit, and then as we go on for another year or two we find that all governments have surpluses, except the federal government, which has a very large deficit. This will create some very serious problems in this country. The problems will become greater as the resource revenues, particularly of Alberta, increase.

I was appalled this past weekend to hear the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) say that Alberta need only hang tough to win the energy pricing fight. To Alberta he said, "Stand firm". Alberta is trying to raise the price of energy from $17 or $18 a barrel to about $32 a barrel. I calculate that the hon. member who was responsible for that 18-cent budget would like another 43 cents added to the cost of each gallon of gasoline. I suppose that is what he was talking about. Do hon. members know what that means in terms of inflation? It means about a 4 per cent or 5 per cent increase in inflation. That is not just an increase for a short period; it is an increase forever. When hon. members are talking about these things, they should remember that our constituents back home are not particularly happy about that. My constituents in Thunder Bay would not be very happy to see another 45 cents added to the cost of a gallon of gasoline. They are not anxious to see a 4 per cent to 5 per cent increase in inflation. That is what the hon. member was talking about, but he was also talking about a massive transfer to one province, which basically means that the wealth of that province—or other provinces; perhaps one, two or three—will increase while at the same time we continue with this very large federal deficit.

I think the real issues this nation will face in the next five or ten years will be energy and inflation, but at the heart of them will be the very basic problem of the fiscal arrangements between the provinces and the federal government. I think we as a federal government must maintain a firm hand in this matter.

Let us examine some of the arrangements we have with the provinces. Let us examine medicare, for instance. Six years ago the federal government put up 44 per cent or 45 per cent of all of the medical costs in the province of Ontario, and the province and the individuals who paid premiums were putting up the balance. Something is happening to that arrangement. Something has happened over the years. The federal government is now paying 50 per cent of this, and Ontario is supposed to be a "have" province. The share of the province of Ontario is down to about 30 per cent, and the individual users of the service pay the premiums, which make up another 20 per cent.

There is a special task force on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, but if in the next few years we decide that the federal government has to cut back then can we be sure the services this country has come to expect—medicare and so forth—will continue to be provided and can we be assured that the provinces will keep their part up if we cut back our share to perhaps where it was? I do not think we can because many of the provinces have not shown themselves to be honest or forthright in maintaining these services.

When we come to deciding whether we should increase federal revenues or cut back federal expenditures in terms of cutting off some of these services, I think we must look to see whether these services can be continued by the provinces. If we feel, as I think I would, given the evidence before me today, that these provinces will not maintain these services, then I think I would have to opt for an increase in federal revenues in some way so we can be sure someone is maintaining the services that we believe all Canadians should have, and some of the areas where we will find those revenues happen to be in resource areas where there is this tremendous transfer.

I am not anticipating what all our reactions will be, but I am saying these are the issues which must be put before this House. These are the issues which are really germane to the constitutional issue. It seems to me there has been a growing increase in the fiscal power of the provinces. It seems to me that as a nation, we have come to the point where we have to start turning that around so the federal government has sufficient power and sufficient fiscal resources to do the job Canadians expect to be done.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to listen to the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae). This is the second time he has given the same speech in two business days in this House. I enjoyed listening to it last Friday. It was not too bad today. I hope he will not give the same speech again the next time he stands up.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan is a gentleman who proclaims that hon. members opposite should rule with a firm hand. I do not know whether they have a firm hand, but I can say they surely have sticky fingers.

The whole proposition the hon. member put before us can be torn to pieces in just a few short sentences. The hon. member pointed out that at the time of the Second World War a certain percentage of the gross national product represented federal government expenditures. It seems strange to me that at that time Canada was able to fight a major world war with probably a smaller proportion of the gross national product of the country than what is used now just to keep the normal functions of government going.

The hon. member made a comparison of the national debt of this country in terms of the percentage of the gross national product. It is quite right to point out that since the end of the last world war this has consistently gone down. That is right, it went down in fact until about 1968 when the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office and then, instead of continuing to go down or levelling off as one might expect—because it is quite natural that it should be very, very high, in wartime, and one would expect that 20 or 25 years after it would reach a steady levelling off—this has not happened in the last 12 years or so. It dipped, and now it is climbing up again. We are not fighting a war. We are not engaged in any major capital expenditures or any major public works projects in this country. All we are doing is running faster and faster on the same treadmill.

The hon. member says, and it is true, that provincial expenditures have increased considerably compared with federal government expenditures. But at the same time we must look into the nature of provincial type expenditures. We must remember that prior to the Second World War, expenditures on health services, education and social services by federal or provincial governments were pretty limited. They were normally the responsibility of a parish or of a local school district, and it was not required of any provincial or federal government to expend money on that type of activity. What has happened over the last 30 years or so? In the last 30 years or so, government expenditures for health, welfare and education grew so much that now it is probably the biggest area of total government spending. Because that is primarily an area of provincial authority, the provincial share of total government expenditures has had to rise during that period. I do not think it is a nefarious plot on the part of the provinces. Rather, it has occurred naturally. The people of Canada have wanted government at one level or another to engage in this type of social expenditures.

I would now like to get back to the bill before us, namely, Bill C-59, which would authorize the borrowing of $14 billion. It is a pleasure for me to be able to speak on this subject tonight instead of continuing the debate on the Constitution. I am pleased that a truce, as the newspapers have called it, took place a couple of days ago. I am glad hon. members opposite have dropped their obsession with this matter for a limited period of time, and I would like to urge them to drop the constitutional issue for another couple of weeks or so to allow us to take a breather. We could then come back and take another look at the issue after some things have a chance to happen in the next couple of days. There is the Quebec provincial election, for instance, which is to take place in a few days. It seems that the premiers at long last have been able to get their act together. It would be my idea to let the constitutional issue lie for a few weeks so that we could come back to it with fresh minds.

An hon. Member: Don't hold your breath.

Mr. Nickerson: It is because of the government's obsession with the constitutional issue that we have to look at bills such as Bill C-59. That is why the government is in so much financial difficulty and why the economy of the country is nowhere near as healthy as it could or should be. I suspect the Prime Minister thinks that dealing with the economic issues of the country is rather below his dignity. He wants to be way up there someplace talking about the Constitution, rather than here in the House talking about interest rates, unemployment and all the other issues of such great concern to ordinary Canadians. We can see this reflected in his choice of ministers to conduct the financial affairs of the nation. We see, for instance, the rather weak President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). The present incumbent in that office is nowhere near like the strong personage we had in the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) some months ago.

An hon. Member: The slasher?

Mr. Nickerson: Let us get back now to the borrowing authority for $14 billion requested of us by the government. In my estimation, this comes to about $700 from every man, woman and child in Canada. If I take my family comprised of six people and multiply that number by $700, it comes out that the gentlemen opposite are contracting a debt on my behalf of some $4,200. Quite frankly, I think that is excessive and I wish they would not do it.

If we looked at it in another way, it would appear the government is contracting debts on behalf of each taxpayer in the region of $1,500 to $2,000, and I think it should stop that, especially when we consider that the interest payable on that $14 billion amounts to some $2 billion a year. Surely this is excessive. I had no difficulty at all in voting this afternoon in favour of the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) who suggested that the borrowing authority should be for only $8 billion. As a matter of fact, some government members themselves stated that in all probability that is all they would really require. The additional $3 billion or $4 billion was just in case they needed it. They could not present a case for why they might need it and they themselves said that $8 billion is something which would be much more reasonable if they could get their act together and stop mismanaging the financial affairs of the nation. Borrowing $15 billion a year surely guarantees that inflation will continue and that interest rates will have to be maintained at the present high level.

I find it hard to understand when the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on the one hand and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) on the other rise in their places and talk about the plight of the old age pensioner, for instance. It is the old age pensioner, the person on a fixed income, who is suffering as a result of the government's inflationary programs, and its inflationary policies, and the type of bill we have before us today makes it quite apparent that the government has no real interest in preventing inflation or in allowing those people who have saved up for their old age to look after themselves. What the government is doing to the elderly people of Canada is drive them to government welfare schemes, the taps of which they turn on and off at will.

With the ever-increasing debt loads on this nation, there will be no incentive to cease borrowing and to prevent inflation because, quite frankly, if I were the deputy minister of finance or the Governor of the Bank of Canada, with the knowledge that inflation is of benefit to the debtor and that the government is the biggest debtor in the land, it would be hard for me to advise a policy of rapidly decreasing inflation. I would not be able to do it and perhaps I would have to suggest a policy of bringing down inflation at a fairly slow rate. But I would not say: No, we are tired of inflation, we have to turn it off because of this accumulated debt. In fact, what we have here with this continuing borrowing and continuing deficit financing, is a self-perpetuating inflationary engine.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I want to delve into history for a little while. I want to go back to the time before the eighteenth century when governments borrowed mainly for the purpose of financing their wars. That was the usual reason the sovereign of the day would go to Parliament or to whatever body had the legislative or taxing authority in the country. Before that period, borrowing was done mainly through private lenders. The idea was always there, although it was not always carried out in fact, that at some point in time the sovereign should pay that money back. In the period from 1700 to 1750, mainly in the most developed countries of that day, England and France, the concept of a permanent debt was born.

At the time this happened there was the development of national banking institutions, the forerunners of the central banks, most of which, if not all in the world, are now nationalized banks. There was the establishment of a system of national credit. It was found that the establishment of these institutions and the establishment of a system of permanent debt did much to facilitate trade and the savings of citizens in those countries. It is quite possible that the establishment of this financial system was a prerequisite to the coming of the industrial revolution some 25 to 50 years thereafter.

This permanent debt concept is not seriously questioned today. Once in a while there are members of this House who get up and say they would like to eliminate government debt altogether; but I do not think those of us who have really considered the matter would propose such a course of action. The question is not whether national debt should exist but what is the desirable level of that debt? What is equally important is how that debt is to be managed.

We see public debt managed in several ways. For instance, foreign borrowings are used not only in the normal course of our borrowing activities but also as a means of controlling the value of our currency. Occasions not too far in the past can be cited to illustrate where this device has been misused by the government of the day. However, it can be agreed that it is a useful mechanism for keeping steady the level of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis other world currencies.

Most of our debt in this country is domestic, as I guess it is in most developed countries. There are three ways in which domestic borrowing can be accomplished. It can be done through the general public by way of Canada Savings Bonds and other such instruments. It can be done by borrowing from the chartered banks. It can be done by borrowing from the central bank, the Bank of Canada. These three methods are usually used; one in conjunction with the other, and each has certain good points and certain dangers associated with it.

The least inflationary method of borrowing is probably that from the general public, which will not unduly increase the money supply, although it can have the effect of taking so much of the savings out of the citizens' pockets that there is not enough left for private investment in worth-while activities, as was pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko). For instance, sufficient funds are not left in the economy to finance energy projects in this day and age. Undoubtedly, the form of borrowing which will cause the most excessive inflation is borrowing from the Bank of Canada, which is tantamount to the printing of money. I would urge the government to be a little more careful in the future when it comes to the way in which it manages the debt of this country and the sources from which it borrows.

I would like to address the question of what is the desirable level of debt in Canada. As the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan Pointed out, it has fluctuated over the years. It has generally been very high during and immediately after time of war. It has been high at other times in the history of Canada, a good example of which is the time at which the construction of the Canadian Pacfic Railway took place. At the time of the construction of that great project the debt of the Government of Canada rose considerably in terms of the gross national product.

I have pointed out before that over the last few years, since the present Prime Minister took office, the national debt in terms of gross national product has been creeping upward. It seems to me that a prudent government might have a target for the national debt, not in terms of the gross national product of the country, but in relation to the income of the government, roughly in the order of $50 billion a year.

In peacetime, and at a time when there are no Canadian Pacific railways being built, it seems to me a total debt of about twice the income of the government would be a reasonable figure to aim at. That would give us a level of debt of about $100 billion in total. I understand that presently our total debt is somewhat in excess of that. What we see here is a situation which today has been reasonably manageable in total terms but which is now sliding out of control, that is, in terms of the debt we have built up over a period of years.

What should be the additional debt in any one year in terms of the income of the government? It seems to me a reasonable figure a prudent government would try to achieve would be no more than 10 per cent of the public income for any one given year, assuming that there were no national emergencies to deal with. This indicates that a reasonable figure for today is in the region of $5 billion for total annual borrowing. With that figure in mind, $14 billion is clearly out of line.

I stress what I said before—up to now the situation has been reasonably manageable, it has been handled sensibly. But what happened this year, last year and what will happen, presumably, next year and in the years to come with the gentlemen over there forming the government is that what has been manageable in the past will not longer be so. The financial affairs of this nation are swiftly becoming unmanageable through the incompetence of a government which is more concerned with ramming through its constitutional ideas rather than addressing the fundamental financial and economic issues which need to be addressed.

I would now like to look at the use to which these borrowed funds might be put. If we examine the use of these funds the ineptitude of the present gouvernment becomes even more apparent. To my way of thinking, the peacetime use of borrowed funds should be limited to those things which will benefit future generations, primarily benefit the people who will eventually have to pay those debts. As an example of what could be described as good borrowing, I pointed out the funds borrowed by the Government of Canada to assist in the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. As another example, one could cite the St. Lawrence Seaway. We can cite uses of what we might be described as social capital, building of hospitals—

Mr. Nielsen: The Pine Point railway.

Mr. Nickerson: The Pine Point railway. I do not know if one would call that social capital, but the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) thinks it is a very good example of the good use of public funds, borrowed funds, and I certainly agree with him on that. However, schools and other things will be there in the years to come and will benefit people over the long term, and will benefit those who will eventually be called upon to repay those debts.

Is the present government using money, borrowed funds, for that type of purpose? I suggest it is not. The main uses to which the government is putting the money borrowed today is for the payment of our interest on existing debt. With the high interest rates today, we will find ourselves caught in a trap where we will have to borrow more money each year to pay the interest to amortize previous debts. We are on a treadmill, as has been pointed out by many speakers on this side of the House during the course of this debate.

Let us look at some other uses to which the government is putting borrowed funds. It is subsidizing the price of gasoline in much of Quebec and eastern Canada. Can hon. members think of a more wasteful use of borrowed funds? One puts it in a gas tank, drives down the road and burns it up, and it is gone right now. We are not building anything for the future with that type of borrowing and expenditure. This is politically motivated spending, and it is detrimental to the long-term national good.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nickerson: Another use to which these funds are being put is in the takeover of private corporations, particularly in the energy field. I do not know what good this will do. It will not result in one additional barrel of oil being produced. It is again a politically motivated expenditure which, in my opinion, will not prove to be in the national interests in the long run.

I am trying to find something here to say about fisheries. Unfortunately, I did not bring any notes on fisheries tonight, but we will get back to that on another occasion.

In conclusion, I think all hon. members of this House should vote against this measure. I certainly will, and my colleagues on this side of the House certainly will for the following reasons. It is undeniably excessive; the government is asking for too much; there is no need to borrow that amount of money and it can get by quite well without that amount. It is excessive, and nobody can deny that. The funds will not be used for legitimate and long-term purposes. They will be squandered, thrown to the four winds, and we will go back next year and borrow another $14 billion—it will probably be $20 billion next year.

The government is not making any real effort to put its affairs in order. Had it followed the lead given by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) a little over a year ago, one would have seen that there was a real effort to address the financial needs of the country. However, the government has reversed that, and nothing is really being done. There is a lot of lip service about putting the financial affairs in orders, but in fact nothing has really been done.

The fundamental policy of the government is wrong. We know it is faced with hard times occasioned by years and years—decades of Liberal mismanagement. We know that even if we on this side had still been in office, we would probably have had to come to the House and ask for $7 billion or $8 billion. However, we certainly would not have come and asked for a $14 billion borrowing authority. In my opinion, the request for $14 billion is simply an indication of the policy of wanton profligacy on the part of the government, and it is completely unsupported.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (London-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to take part in this debate on Bill C-59. Fiscal matters have always intrigued me. Back in my earlier days when I was involved in municipal politics, I certainly enjoyed the piecing together of the annual budget. I realize that we in this House are dealing with much greater sums of money, but the decisions are still basically the same; who gets what, how much do they get and who pays for it?

What the federal government is asking for is $14 billion, $11 billion of which is provided for in the budget and in the estimates as expenditures and financial requirements to cover that expenditure. The other $3 billion will be set aside for contingency purposes. Since, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has already explained, it is not always possible to predict whether or not Parliament will be sitting at the time this money may be needed, this provision will allow the federal government some flexibility in the future. It is very possible that this $3 billion will not be spent. I certainly hope it is not. But if, for example, there is another drought in western Canada like the one experienced last year, or some other such national emergency, we will have the funds available to provide the necessary emergency assistance.

As with any legislation that deals with government financing, the opposition parties want to know what the money will be used for. That is their right, as it is the right of every Canadian to know where their tax dollars are being spent. It will allow all the people in Canada to understand that the federal government turns over a large part of its revenues to the provincial governments. Of the total federal budget for 1981-82, roughly 20 per cent will be turned over to the provincial governments in transfer payments. Established program financing, which includes medicare as well as other cash payments such as equalization payments, and the Canada Assistance Program, are but a few of the many programs under which the federal government transfers expenditures in payments to the provinces. This is, in my view, quite a sizeable sum, and I do not see it getting any smaller in the coming years.

Many times I have heard various people across this country calling on the federal government to curb its spending habits. I would like to take this opportunity to set the record straight, Mr. Speaker, in terms of federal spending.

Over the past five years, total federal expenditures have increased at an average annual rate of 13 per cent, compared with 15 per cent for the provinces as a whole. Serious efforts by the federal government to limit spending on goods and services have borne fruit over the last few years. However, the cost of the public debt has risen sharply and the transfers to the provinces have continued to increase dramatically. Generally speaking, the sudden increase in the federal deficit cannot be attributed to a surge in spending. Spending has increased at a more or less normal rate. What has happened is that federal sources of income and revenue have dropped substantially over the past five years. This type of spending is extremely difficult to reduce, especially in the case of transfers, since they are indexed to inflation.

How do we in the federal government rectify this deteriorating situation? At present, we are locked into a number of federal-provincial cost-sharing programs which are draining our coffers. We have been repeatedly warned by the provinces that we cannot increase our take of revenues from the petroleum industry, even though the multinationals recorded an average after tax profit increase of 54 per cent in 1979.

Newfoundland has continuously argued that offshore mineral rights in the Hibernia belong to them, not to the federal government. There is no question that the federal government's revenue sources are decreasing more rapidly than the provinces' but no one has any clues as to where we can go to obtain more revenues.

I believe the time has come to take a good long look at what our priorities are. If we want to bring down the deficit, then let us see what we are spending our money on. As I stated earlier, $13.4 billion is going to be paid to the provinces this year. Now we are told we cannot look for any revenues in their areas of jurisdiction. But if we do not maintain our provincial transfer payments, which are always going to rise because they are indexed to inflation, again we get slammed by the provinces. How do we ever get ahead?

After doing a bit of background research into this matter, I learned that two out of every three federal dollars go toward non-federal programs of one type or another. Many Canadians are not aware of this. Many federal-provincial cost-sharing programs are up for renewal next year under the established programs financing cash payment system. I suggest we look at them very closely to see if some money could be saved there.

I want to see that deficit reduced just as much as any other member of this House. If the provinces want us to continue to spend 20 per cent of our revenues in transfer payments, then they had better get together with us and help to come up with a more rational formula of cost-sharing. It is time to separate our wants from our needs.

In our attempts to keep up with our payments to the provinces and to other levels of government, other important areas of federal concern have had to take a back seat. Twenty-five years ago, the federal government received the equivalent of 17.6 per cent of Canada's total gross national product in revenues, compared to 4.8 per cent for the provinces. As of 1979, the federal share had slipped to 16 per cent, with the provinces jumping up to 25 per cent. I ask, Mr. Speaker, where has that money gone?

When talking about fiscal responsibility, let us call a spade a spade. The federal government has seen its revenue sources increase marginally, while its expenditures continue to grow, especially in terms of its payments to the provinces. On the other hand, the provinces have increased their percentage of the GNP by about 300 per cent while allowing services in many areas to decline. That is partly why there is a federal deficit. That is where we should look for answers to our economic problems.

If the provinces want more power and recognition, then they must be prepared to shoulder more fiscal responsibilities. They cannot have it both ways. This is evident in the housing sector, for example. The federal government builds senior citizens' homes in co-operation with the provincial governments. The federal government funds 90 per cent of the construction costs, with the provincial government paying the other 10 per cent. When it comes time for the official opening of the facility, though, the provincial government is always the first to take the credit. If the provinces want all the glory, let them take it, but they should be prepared to pick up most of the cost of the projects too.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state categorically that a large amount of federal expenditures is in the form of transfer payments to the provinces. If we want to substantially reduce the federal deficit, as everyone knows we should, let us start by getting the provinces to pay their way. In doing so, we will ease inflation, bring down the deficit and get Canada on a more solid footing for the future.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PINARD—NOTICE OF MOTION UNDER S.O. 33

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, concerning motion No. 36 in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), I give you notice that tomorrow I will move a motion that the debate on the amendment of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) not be further adjourned. Therefore, notice having been given, I should now like to elaborate on this.

I should like to advise you that at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the order of the day for resuming debate on motion No. 36 in the name of the Minister of Justice related to the proposed Address to Her Majesty the Queen concerning the Constitution of Canada and on the amendment thereto introduced by the hon. member for Provencher, I will move a motion that the debate shall not be further adjourned, pursuant to Standing Order 33.

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I arrived half way through the reading of the proposal by the government House leader. I wonder if either he or the Chair would repeat it in English for my benefit?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): For the convenience of hon. members, perhaps the Chairman might read the order. I shall alter the personal pronouns where it seems suitable.

The notice of motion put by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) is that, pursuant to Standing Order 33, he indicated that he wished to give notice that at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the reading of the order of the day for resuming debate on the motion in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), Government Orders, Government Business No. 36, regarding a proposed Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada and the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), he, that is to say the President of the Privy Council, shall propose a motion that the debate on the said amendment shall not be further adjourned.

Mr. Knowles: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I had earlier recognized the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). Perhaps I should see him in case he wants to continue on the point of order, then I will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to place immediately before the Chair for its consideration, the propriety of the acceptability of the purported motion by the government House leader being moved at this time when there is still a motion standing in his name—I believe it is No. 41—which is in itself a form of closure.

My submission is that it may very well be that the Chair might come to the conclusion that before a motion under Standing Order 33, a motion of guillotine closure, is moved, of which he is giving notice now, there must first be removed from the Order Paper the motion now standing in his name which purports the slow strangulation method of closure. That is what is proposed in motion No. 41.

The government House leader has already put motion No. 41 on the Order Paper, proposing limited time for speeches, and limited time, four days, for debate. The matter is then concluded. It is a radically new procedure which he was developing by that motion but there it is on the Order Paper, moved by himself. Now he comes along and moves a second closure motion. I believe it is his right to do this under our Standing Orders, although I will reserve on that point in order to make argument at some subsequent time while Your Honour is considering this point of order. I am sorry, he has given notice to move a second closure motion.

He might clarify that by rising in his place and telling us what his intention is with respect to the motion now standing in his name on the Order Paper. It would be illogical to think that he would be proceeding with the motion standing in his name if he is serious about his intention to proceed with the Standing Order 33 closure motion of which he has given notice now.

Before I proceed further in developing my point of order, perhaps he might express his intention with respect to the motion standing in his name. Is it the government's intention to withdraw that motion, leaving us only with the notice he is now giving of his intention to place on the Order Paper a Standing Order 33 closure motion tomorrow?

We are interested in the fate of the closure by strangulation motion now on the Order Paper in his name, motion No. 41.

Mr. Pinard: There are two things here, Mr. Speaker. The first is that the notice which has been given tonight is closure on the Epp motion only, and not on the whole resolution. Perhaps that is why my hon. colleague is not too happy tonight. Second, the motion that he referred to, motion 41, has never been moved.

• (2100)

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, now that we have that clarification, it is my submission it is not within the competence of any member under our practices, procedures and Standing Orders to move Standing Order 33 closure on an amendment only. It has to be either the whole motion or nothing at all. There is no competence in the House to debate a Standing Order 33 motion of closure on an amendment only.

I am not admitting the legitimacy of the notice which the government House leader has given tonight. There will be an opportunity when he comes to tabling his motion under Standing Order 33 to debate the propriety of it. However, I am giving notice now that I intend to very vigorously debate the propriety of the position of the government in its capacity to move Standing Order 33 on an amendment only. It is my submission that it cannot be done. I will be developing that point further at the appropriate time.

In any event, I give the Chair and the government House leader notice of that intention now. The government House leader obviously thinks he is well within the rules in doing that. I do not believe he is, In my opinion, this is a rather startling and shocking action on the part of the government House leader during a debate I might add, on a bill which in itself is being debated now under the guillotine of closure. I do not know how many variations of closure the government can dream up, but it is certainly—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I respect the point of order which the hon. member has sought to make. I also note that he has indicated he wants to develop the point further at an appropriate time. The Chair is not unfamiliar with the argument in any event. I want to thank the hon. member for bringing it forward. However, I think he has now reached the point where he is entering into other discussion.

I ask the hon. member to take the opportunity to complete his remarks with respect to this point of order, perhaps briefly. As I understand the rules, points of order ought to be brief and there are other hon. members who want to be recognized.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly be brief because I know there are other hon. members who wish to participate on this matter. As I was saying, I do not know how many variations of closure this government can dream up; I suppose as many as their twisted little minds will permit them to do. I see the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) nodding assent while chewing on his life saver.

Mr. Trudeau: There is a great spirit in this House.

Mr. Nielsen: I knew it was a life saver.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Great spirit.

Mr. Nielsen: It will take more than that to save his hide; as fast as he has been back-pedalling in the past few days.

Mr. Trudeau: That is great spirit.

Mr. Nielsen: Nevertheless, I will develop my point at the appropriate time. I will develop my formal objections to the motion which I anticipate the government House leader will be tabling tomorrow.

Mr. Trudeau: We will throw you a life saver.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: In my position, Sir, I do not need a life saver. A life saver is certainly needed over there, though.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the point of order on which I rose a few moments ago has been answered. Some hon. members might say: well then, why do you not stay in your seat?

Mr. Jarvis: Some might.

Mr. Knowles: In the meantime, another issue has arisen. I simply want to be clear that the motion of which notice has been given tonight referred only to the amendment by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp).

Mr. Nielsen: That is what he said.

Mr. Knowles: After that the discussion on the main motion would still be open. Since the government House leader made the original announcement, he has made it clear that that is the case. As I said, I might have accepted that as the answer and held my peace, but I suppose I have had more experience with closure than any other member of this House, just from being around here for a long time.

Miss MacDonald: The Grits do too.

Mr. Knowles: Never before have I heard an opposition member raise a point of order against the use of closure where the government was using it to a lesser extent than it could go.

My experience with closure, especially in 1956, is that every time the government has used it, the government has abused it, and the government went further than the rules permitted. I can say to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) that if he had brought in a notice tonight closing off the whole debate, I would have argued the very reverse—

Mr. Nielsen: You are agreeing with this closure, are you?

Mr. Knowles: —to what the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) said, namely, that what is before us is a debate on the amendment put by the hon. member for Provencher, and that is all that can be closed off by one motion. However, if there are any points of order on this, they will have to come later. As the hon. member knows, the rules do not permit any debate on it.

Miss MacDonald: We were just putting you straight.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Let me understand where we are going. Notice of motion has been given. The hon. member for Yukon rose on a point of order. He indicated he had some remarks he wanted to bring to the attention of the Chair as to whether that notice of motion is in order.

The second point he made during his observation was the question as to whether such a notice of motion is divisible as between the amendment and the main motion and the amendment together. That is what the current procedural debate is on. I do not think it is necessary to hear the same points again and again. I will recognize the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) if it is on that same point of order. If it is on a new point of order, I will ask him to wait while I determine whether the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) wishes to address the same point of order as that raised by the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I have had some discussions. I would move that the debate speech time from now until the appropriate time for a vote under Standing Order 75C be limited to ten minutes per speaker.

Mr. Knowles: We are on third reading. We are not under Standing Order 75C.

Mr. Blenkarn: Sorry, third reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I understood that the hon. member is not making a motion under a point of order but rather he was advising the House that there may be some agreement to shorten the debate to ten minutes per speech per member who would now be recognized. Do I understand the hon. member correctly?

Mr. Blenkarn: That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The House has heard the suggestion made by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). Is there unanimous agreement to that proposal?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): From now on, the Chair will recognize members for a duration of ten minutes within the same proportion and ratio.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1981-82

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pinard (for the Minister of State for Finance) (Mr. Bussières) that Bill C-59, to provide supplementary borrowing authority, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I was discussing the subject of Bill C-59, and trying to relate to $14 billion, with my son this morning before I left Peterborough to come to the House of Commons. He asked me exactly how much $14 billion is. My son is 14 years old. I do not suppose there are very many people in this House who have had the opportunity either in their personal lives or in their businesses to relate to $14 billion in today's terms. I want to relate a couple of things which came to mind this morning.

My son and I tried to discuss the seriousness of the necessity by the government to borrow $14 billion today. I wonder how many people in this House realize that during World War I and World War II, we borrowed less to finance those wars than we are borrowing annually now to finance the deficit spending of this government. This government continues to spend 25 per cent more each year than it takes in.

In order to get an idea of what $14 billion is, perhaps hon. members could picture $10 bills. If we put $10 bills end to end, do hon. members know how far those ten-dollar bills, which we all use in every day trading, would extend? It is 24,000 miles around the world. If you were to put $10 bills end to end, they would travel around the world five and one half times. This government is proposing to borrow 132,000 miles of $10 bills in order to finance its deficit budgeting.

I would like to refer back to the last federal election. In the release that came from the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) substantiating the need for Bill C-59 and the borrowing of this excessive amount of money, it reads:

> As honourable members will recall, the budget of last October clearly set out this government's strategy of reducing the deficit through restraint in the rate of growth of expenditures.

During the election one short year ago, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told Canadians what they could expect if they returned him to power. He made five basic commitments during that campaign which he said made up the Liberal party's economic strategy.

This is a good time to look back at that five-point program to see how it relates to today and the need to borrow $14 billion in order to finance this government's spending. When you are running for office it is easy to say you are going to turn things around as soon as you get into power. However, the reality is that things do not change rapidly in government and the economy and the promises of yesterday become the embarrassments of today. The Prime Minister said a year ago, and I quote his words:

> The Conservatives have failed miserably in managing the economy, in creating jobs, in controlling inflation, and heading us toward energy security.

These failures would be reversed, he said, by the five-point plan.

The first item in that plan of the last federal election was that the Liberals would "manage more rigorously the nation's finances in order to make more effective use of the taxpayers' money". The Prime Minister made that pledge and he made it very specific. He said "We will hold the line on government expenditure growth under the rate of GNP".

That was the promise in 1979. What is the performance today? The finance minister's budget for the coming fiscal year calls for an increase of 12.8 per cent in total federal spending. It forecasts an increase of 11.1 per cent in the gross national product, including inflation. Therefore, government spending is definitely not being held in line with the GNP.

I wish to quote from an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen, written by Charles Lynch:

> It's unparliamentary to call people liars, so let's just say that when it comes to talking about spending, it's a wonder the skies don't open to admit a bolt of lightning that would strike the Liberals dead—
> Thus we have those wonderful people who brought us the record-breaking deficits and interest payments that have the country reeling, telling us in Johnston's words that "our objective has been, and continues to be, to ensure that taxpayers' dollars spent by the federal government are well spent, and that taxpayers do indeed receive value for money."

I would like to refer to the present government's record of spending in years gone by. Mirabel airport had a cost overrun of $201.7 million; Place du Portage a cost overrun of $92.7 million; the CN Tower in Toronto, $40.5 million; the Pickering airport, $69.3 million; the C.D. Howe building in Ottawa, $45 million; the Paris chancery, $4.4 million; and the discovery train $14.5 million.

In 1976 the Auditor General charged that the government had lost effective control of the public purse. The Lambert royal commission report was released on April 3, 1979. The Liberals responded by announcing a task force to study the report of the task force that had studied the Auditor General's report. The Lambert report observed that:

> —the serious malaise pervading the management of government stems fundamentally from a grave weakening, and in some cases an almost total breakdown, in the chain of accountability, first within government, and second in the accountability of government in Parliament and ultimately to the Canadian people.

In conclusion, I will try to complete my 20-minute speech in ten minutes. Overruns in certain departments are very serious problems. The worst department is environment where 153 out of 223 projects were experiencing cost overruns, to a total cost of $283 million. Overruns in the department are equal to 35 per cent of original budgets with 66 per cent experiencing cost overruns. Indian and northern affairs experienced cost overruns on 42 of 76 projects, or 55 per cent of their endeavours.

No government, no family, no business can continue to spend 25 per cent more than it takes in year after year. The taxpayers of Canada are the ones who will lose, the people who put this government in office. I maintain that as soon as we hold government accountable for the money it spends in relation to the money it takes in, the sooner our economy will become sound.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, we heard rather a lot of dramatic statements this evening and on Friday about the borrowing authority bill. It may be useful to reiterate, as a number of members on this side of the House have done, that the money for which authority is sought to borrow is all money that will be well accounted for. The budget passed by this House last fall was for approximately $11 billion. Borrowing authority is being sought for that amount plus approximately $3 billion in contingency funds which will be non-lapsing.

One member of the official opposition said earlier that the introduction of the non-lapsing amount was new. However, this has been done often in this House before. It was the existence of those non-lapsing funds which allowed the Conservative government to carry on the business of the country during a period last year when Parliament did not meet. Therefore, it is not a new invention but an established way of proceeding.

The moneys expended by the Government of Canada are based on the estimates which are passed by this House. After the event, there is the Auditor General's report which is increasingly becoming an in-depth report. The public accounts committee of this House examines expenditures after the event to ensure that they conform with what was proposed and approved by Parliament in the estimates.

Increasingly the largest portion of moneys spent by the Government are in fact spent in transfers to the provinces or to people. At least 68 per cent of the expenditures of the Government of Canada are transfer payments to the provinces, to the territories, to the municipalities and to people.

Transfer support programs take several forms including grants to support provincial legislatures, hospitals, hospital insurance, medicare and post-secondary education. Transfers to individuals include old age pensions, family allowances, payments under the Canada Pension disability fund and so on.

An earlier criticism was made that the three levels of government borrowing and going into capital markets so extensively was reducing the amounts of money available to the private sector. But I wonder why members of the opposition concentrate only on expenditures of the federal government, when in fact expenditures of provincial and municipal governments have grown at a tremendous rate in recent years, at a rate in excess of the expenditures of the Government of Canada.

About 68 per cent of the total expenditures of the Government of Canada are transfer payments to the provinces or to individuals. The payments which can be controlled directly by the Government of Canada are by far the smallest of the budget. We care very much about having an orderly approach to bond markets but, perhaps even more, we care about transfer payments which are a big part of our social policies directed at assuring that the young who cannot take care of themselves are protected; that children can be educated; that children have access to good medical care; that the old who have small pensions are protected; that by education and programs such as rehabilitation for the disabled and manpower training, we increase the opportunity for Canadians; that Canadians as far as possible have equality of opportunity. These are important programs.

It is important to remember, in the course of complaining about government expenditure, that the government is not spending money for the most part on anything except services to people. Equally, our social policy has been part of the policy on which we were elected. Probably the most important social program which exists is related to unemployment and to job creation. Most healthy people, given reasonable jobs, can provide for their own social security to a large extent. For this reason, managing the economy efficiently and fairly is a very big part of the Liberal program, as is our commitment to help those who are unable to help themselves—the young, the old, the sick.

Furthermore, we have heard a lot of talk in the last few days about government intrusion into the private sector. Nobody wants to see the government intruding into the private sector unnecessarily. The private sector should be allowed the freedom to do well what it can do well. But we must face the fact that the record of the private sector in matters such as occupational health and safety and care for the environment has not always been such as to inspire confidence. There is a point where the government must intervene in order to provide fairness, decency and a reasonable quality of life for citizens. It is in this sense that expenditures by government must always be looked at as expenditures on the individual, expenditures concerning which those individuals have a voice and a vote.

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to draw a parallel between Liberal spending leading up to the federal election of May, 1979, when the main issues during that campaign were a matter of fiscal irresponsibility on the part of the government of the day, wrestling inflation to the ground, a commission finding truth in the statements that spending was out of control and that there was a lack of accountability, and the introduction of Bill C-59. Within a year of the election of the government in February, 1980, the deficit jumped from $12 billion to $14 billion. Now the government talks of tackling inflation. It is completely obsessed with a program of legislation which has no relativity to the persons on the street looking for jobs, seeking homes and social legislation, and finding some outlet to which they can relate.

In my remaining time I would like to deal with two simple matters which affect southern Ontario. A number of times I have spoken in the House about the budget introduced in October, 1980, and the regressive discriminatory tax application of excise tax on grape growers and the wine industry. I have indicated that the excise tax, related to the consumer price index, is not in the interests of the Canadian wine industry, the primary grape producers on the Canadian economy. Such automatic quarterly adjustments indicate the defeatist attitude of the government. It also indicates that the government is completely helpless to do anything about the situation. Now taxes are growing and the rate of inflation is out of control.

The consumer price index for the 12-month period ending September 30, 1980, was the base figure for the calculations on which indexing would take place. Thus, we have watched the CPI climb to record levels, as well as the excise tax. Already primary grape growers and wine producers are called upon to make contributions to the revenue departments of both the province and the federal government, far in excess of the normal relationship to their take home pay and the profit margin of the wine industry.

Out of some sympathy and concern for the industry, the government reviewed this tax imposition and made some changes. In the interests of continuing a viable wine and brandy-producing industry, the government should review its program once more as part of its Canadianization program.

Another area of the Canadian economy, that is the marine industry, is being prejudiced by the rigidness of the government's energy policy. As was stated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the real reason for the imposition of a marine and aviation charge was that foreign fleets and foreign aircraft were purchasing our fuel products. As a result, they were being subsidized by Canadians. Instead of making a practical assessment of its energy policy, the government chose to penalize Canadian flagships engaged in international trade. This government and Canadians should be proud of the record established by the Canadian Great Lakes merchant fleet. Through the efficiency and productivity of its operations that fleet has captured over 93 per cent of the across the border movement.

It is not difficult to understand the importance to our national economy of bulk cargo shipments between Canada and the United States in the heavily undustrialized regions bordering on the Great Lakes. In 1980 the Canadian merchant fleet carried 95 million tonnes of cargo of which over 50 per cent was made up of U.S.-Canada trade generating over $300 million of revenue to this country.

This Canadian industry which provides jobs for Canadians and revenue for Canada should receive treatment equal to that accorded other Canadian industries involved in manufacturing, supplying and the exporting of goods from Canada. To impose the export charges as proposed by forcing Canadian flag ships to pay world prices for fuel oil used in deliveries of iron ore from Labrador to Lake Michigan ports and to pay world prices for fuel oil or coal brought from the United States to Ontario Hydro or the steel mills of Hamilton goes much further than preventing foreign vessels from purchasing bunker fuel at Canadian domestic prices. It imposes a burden on Canadians generally. The proposal as made will add a further $30 million to the operating costs of the Canadian merchant fleet, costs which must be passed on to the consumer. We are those consumers; we will be paying that excess cost. In many instances the imposition of this export charge will likely result in the transfer of shipments to other routes and a diversion of routes which would be less direct and less efficient.

Any federal policy should support and encourage the competitiveness of Canadian industry and promote the exports of this country, but this export charge has just the opposite effect. It will mean a disruption of efficient fleet fuelling and trading patterns. It is difficult to rationalize why the government should provide yet another advantage to railroads and the trucking industry, forms of transport not subject to this fuel cost penalty and less fuel efficient than the Canadian merchant fleet.

If it is neither practical nor possible to introduce a two-price fuel policy. If the government has any concern for the marine industry, then it should introduce a rebate system similar to that which is already in effect in other parts of our economy so that Canadian flag carriers will be in a position to maintain the levels of service and the degree of competitiveness they have attained on the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence waterway.

I suggest consideration be given to further delay in the implementation of this export charge so that consideration can be given to a review of the allocation of the moneys.

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to my colleagues for their support. I am very glad to have the opportunity to speak to this bill concerning the borrowing authority requested by the government. Whenever the borrowing authority issue comes before us, we always hear the same old and yet surprising refrain from members opposite. They claim that a $14 billion borrowing authority is much too much, that a borrowing authority of just $8 billion would be enough. They say there is enough money in the coffers of the state. As a matter of fact, they say all sorts of things, so that after a while we cannot help wondering whether the official opposition is really serious. Everybody is aware that under our federal system, the Government of Canada is called upon to transfer huge amounts of money to the provinces. It is a fact that this year $17 billion will actually be transferred to the provinces by the central government.

The money we want to borrow is always urgently needed, especially at a time when the central government has not yet collected its main revenues. Indeed, when we ask for $14 billion, some people will normally ask for what purpose. Suffice it to say that the federal government assumes half of the medical costs throughout the country by subsidizing hospitals, the purchase of medicine and physicians' fees. Need I add that the Government of Canada also pays old age security pensions and guaranteed income supplements to senior citizens. Need I add that the Government of Canada is even involved in the provincial educational systems through its assistance program for second language instruction, technical training and university research? Need I point out that the Government of Canada helps to build some of our highways? Need I say that, through a public body, the Government of Canada finances the construction of low rental housing? Need I say that the government of Canada pays half the deficit of all low rental housing projects throughout the country? This is where the billions of dollars that we need today are going! They are going to Canadians! No one here is asking billions of dollars to send them outside the country.

Why should a party mess about taking up our time and lead the Canadian people to believe that we are asking for money just to waste it? And what is even worse is that this money goes to the most underprivileged, as anyone can see by looking at the main requirements and the major expenditures of the government. These requirements are those of the Department of National Health and Welfare, which looks after senior citizens, social affairs, health matters. Where else does all this money go?

Unemployment insurance represents a major part of our budget. Why do we have unemployment insurance at a reasonable price? To allow Canadians, and especially our young people, to at least keep their dignity in spite of current economic problems. But why, Mr. Speaker, and I am asking this of the opposition parties, why would the official opposition have Canadians believe that we want additional funds?

According to the official opposition, we are asking for $6 billion too much, when $8 billion would be enough. Is there anyone here who can imagine that the average government expenditures are $5 billion a month, and even more in certain months, especially during winter, when the economy is slower? Why is the opposition playing this game which is not worthy of Canadian parliamentarians? I sometimes ask myself very serious questions concerning the role of the members of this House. Are we here to represent the provincial governments? Not to my knowledge, as no provincial government has ever elected federal Members of Parliament. Our role here is not to bring the good news as suggested by a provincial premier, any more than to defend the positions of a province; our role here as members is to meet the needs of our people.

As member for the beautiful riding of Lac-Saint-Jean I represent 80,000 people here. My duty is to speak on their behalf, to represent them, and to see to it that the government of Canada meets its commitments as set forth in legislation adopted by previous governments, and if that means I have to force the government to borrow money or authorize it to do that, then I give my authorization. But my role is not to come here and claim that perhaps it would be better if the provinces had their say either in this debate or in the constitutional debate. It is extremely easy to adopt the position of a provincial premier and defend it here, even if it is a question of borrowing money. Some premiers take the Government of Canada to task for spending too much, of course, they blame us for spending in the wrong places, of course, and they also say that we are not doing a good job, constitutionally or otherwise. There are others who congratulate us. I agree, I am not here to make representations for those people, I am here to do my duty as a citizen on behalf of other citizens who freed me from my work and told me: You will represent us in the House of Commons, you will have to make sure that the Government of Canada fulfils its obligations toward me because I pay taxes, I live in this country where I was born and where I will likely die some day. That is my work, and that is what the members of the opposition party ought to understand.

When the Government of Canada year after year requests the authority to borrow money in order to manage the affairs of the state, its request should be granted automatically. I wonder how long we will have to consider year in year out the same stupid arguments about blank cheques, the same stupid arguments about the government borrowing too much, the same stupid arguments which are always brought up at the same time by the same people and which contain nothing new. It is always the same story.

After wasting three, four, five and up to six days, at a cost of $300,000 a day to the taxpayers, discussing the matter, the authority is finally granted. Why not simply say: you tabled the estimates, they were approved, now the government has to borrow money, so let us give it the required authority. That is all, let us stop wasting time on the issue. The expenditures to be made with the amounts borrowed are all contained in the estimates. My colleagues opposite need only refer to the estimates, where they will find all they want to know. The borrowing authority bill contains nothing new. It is but one way to make money available to Canadians, each in his own home, and what income is earned, one pays back what one can. Some hon. members opposite seem surprised. There is no surprise there. Clearly at some point in the year, if receipts came regularly, month after month, there would be no problem.

There are times when I wonder how constipated the official opposition party will get. We had an example when questions of privilege and points of order on the constitutional debate followed one another for 15 days. I was quite simply discouraged with the role played by hon. members for certain constituencies. I heard for 15 days hon. members raise questions of privilege and points of order. Members opposite are making gestures I will not emulate, Mr. Speaker. Gestures cannot be unparliamentary, whereas words can be. Unfortunately, those people often make gestures instead of speaking their minds.

[English]

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, and I say this with satisfaction, I sometimes ask myself if the party opposite, instead of being called Progressive Conservative, should not really be called Permanently Constipated Party.

[Translation]

It is unthinkable that in 1981 Members of Parliament supposedly elected by a majority of their constituents come here to abuse the government, and on top of that, they obstruct the whole proceedings in this chamber for a while. As I said last week, Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that the official opposition in particular will see the light—

[English]

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if you could rule on whether the remarks of the hon. member are relevant to the borrowing authority bill before us at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The problem for the Chair is that if I were to rule specifically on those remarks, I would also have to do so in respect of the remarks of other hon. members, and this would be difficult. Perhaps I could say that the hon. member's time has run out, and I will now recognize the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling).

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I believe I have two or three minutes left.

An hon. Member: One minute.

Mr. Darling: I have two or three minutes left in which to speak on this very important bill.

An hon. Member: Four minutes.

Mr. Darling: As we are all aware, we are debating this bill—

Mr. Lalonde: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Darling: The minister wants to cut me off again.

Mr. Lalonde: My hon. friend has just indicated he has four minutes left, but I believe the order was that the bells should start ringing at 9.45 p.m.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Lalonde: If I were to look at the precedent established about time—and I am now referring to a debate in which my colleagues on the other side took part in the last two days, only about ten seconds are left to them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Your time is up.

Mr. Darling: I appreciate the comments of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). When he is here, he is usually speaking a good deal of the time. The last time I spoke here, he interrupted me, and let me repeat what I said then. I said he would do a hell of a lot better for the good of the country if, instead of sitting here, he were in Alberta making a deal on energy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I thought the hon. member might appreciate being interrupted only at the end of the point he was making.

It being 9.45 p.m., pursuant to an order made on Thursday, April 2, 1981, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the bill now before us.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Pinard) for the Minister of State (Finance) which was agreed to on the following division:

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

FISHERIES

CATCH OF FRASER RIVER CHINOOK SALMON BY UNITED STATES FISHERMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) earlier this year announced a complete closure of the Fraser River chinook salmon fishery, thereby jeopardizing the livelihood of the Fraser River gillnet fishermen, and bearing in mind that these fishermen take less than 20,000 chinook salmon in a season, and whereas the minister has taken no steps to limit the United States interception of Fraser River-bound chinook, which is estimated at some 200,000 chinook per year, or at least ten times the amount taken by the Fraser River gillnet fleet, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman):

That the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans be instructed by this House to demand a limitation by United States fishermen of the effort they place on Fraser River chinook salmon stocks and, at the very least, to permit the gillnet fleet on the Fraser River to operate one day per week in area 29(D), in the interest of fairness and equity.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

INVITATIONS TO CABINET MINISTERS TO SPEAK DURING QUEBEC ELECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise under provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the voters in Quebec are confused by Liberal cabinet ministers who are unilaterally determined to use the Constitution to separate Canadians from their governmental, legal and economic traditions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour):

That, between now and April 13, all cabinet ministers who are actively engaged in electioneering in Quebec be required to table their invitations in this House so that all Canadians can know whether those cabinet ministers have been invited by the Parti Québécois or the Liberal Party.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED TELEPHONE CAMPAIGN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas all political parties in this House have publicly supported constitutional amendments to strengthen native and women's rights in the charter; and whereas this House has been debating a single Conservative amendment for the last seven weeks, thereby preventing other business from being considered, at a cost of some $300,000 a day, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House calls upon women and native leaders, as well as other concerned Canadians, to urge the Leader of the Opposition to abandon his strategy of wasting the time of the House, and to agree to restore order so that other amendments may be debated and voted upon, by calling him collect in Ottawa at 996-5084; that is, area code 613-996-5084.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

TRANSMISSION OF JOINT ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas the Premier of Alberta declared yesterday that he would disregard a ruling made by the Supreme Court on the constitutional resolution, and whereas the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) also appears to be moving in this same direction after initially advocating a Supreme Court reference, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau):

● (1410)

That this House condemns the Leader of the Opposition and the Premier of Alberta for their blatant disregard for the traditions of the British parliamentary and legal systems and urges the Leader of the Opposition to have the courage to agree that, following a Supreme Court decision on the legality of the constitutional resolution, the resulting Address to Her Majesty be remitted to London forthwith without debate.

Mr. Clark: Go back to Ohio.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

CALL FOR MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PROVINCIAL PREMIERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a very urgent and timely matter. Given the fact of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) decision to abandon the federal system by refusing to meet with the first premiers of the provinces of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House calls on the Prime Minister, in the interest of unity and the welfare of Canada, to reconsider his unCanadian-like position and meet with the first premiers of the provinces.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the National Energy Program has been responsible for losing thousands of jobs in all parts of Canada; for driving scores of skilled workers, entrepreneurs and drilling equipment out of the country; for scoring an almost complete shut down of exploration for conventional oil; for decreasing agricultural production because of the increased cost of fertilizer caused by the excise tax on gas, and for causing frustration and agony in the hearts of thousands of investors and would-be investors; therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House urges the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to withdraw the National Energy Program at once before it spreads disaster to the breaking point, that is if the Prime Minister is not deliberately trying to break up the country.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RELEASE OF PROVINCIAL PROPOSALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of Mr. Lougheed's press conference held yesterday, and in view of the fact that the Premier of Alberta and Premier Lyon of Manitoba on the CBC program "As It Happens" last night admitted that these provinces' hidden proposal on the Constitution does not include aboriginal and women's rights, or any charter of rights whatsoever, or equalization payments, and since the secretive manoeuvring by all sides has created bad feelings throughout the nation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James (Mr. Keeper):

That this House urge the provinces to release their proposals now in order that the Canadian people may know the facts and be able to discuss the issue openly.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUPPORT FOR INDEPENDENCE OF POLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I seek the attention of all hon. members of this House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43. Given the fact that Warsaw pact manœuvres are continuing on the Polish border, and in light of the fact that the Communist Party Congress in Prague is discussing the Polish situation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and the hon. Member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That this House express its belief that Poland must be allowed to resolve its current problems by itself without interference by any outside forces, and further, that the House commend the private sector, especially the Canadian Polish Congress, other Polish Canadian organizations and individuals, for their efforts to provide food and medical supplies to the Polish people.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MARINE TRANSPORT

IMPOSITION OF EXPORT CHARGE ON FUEL USED BY CANADIAN VESSELS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The Premier of Ontario has indicated to the Prime Minister, by telex, how Canadians in general will be adversely affected by the government's proposed export charge on fuel used by Canadian vessels in international trade. If that export charge is imposed in its present form it gives other modes of transport an advantage over the Canadian merchant fleet and is thereby discriminatory. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member from the Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That the Minister of Finance further delay the imposition of the proposed export charge as it applies against the Canadian merchant fleet and put in place either a two-price fuel policy or a rebate system.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

REQUEST FROM PROVINCIAL PREMIERS FOR MEETING WITH PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister who told this House and the Canadian public yesterday that, until his own resolution is passed through Parliament by closure, he refuses absolutely to discuss Canada's Constitution with Premier Blakeney, Premier Buchanan, Premier Bennett, and five other elected leaders of some 14 million Canadian citizens. He told us that he refuses to meet his partners in Canadian government, whatever they might propose, until he has had his own way in this House of Commons. Will the Prime Minister now tell this House how he can possibly justify this refusal to respect Canadian tradition and this refusal to meet Canadian premiers who have requested the opportunity to work with him in helping to bring home Canada's Constitution?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, yesterday I indicated that I had serious doubt about the premiers agreeing on anything, let alone an amending formula.

Mr. Nielsen: You doubted their veracity.

Mr. Trudeau: I doubted the veracity of the statement that they had agreed on a formula. I was given a transcript of the CBC program "As It Happens" last night, which featured the Premier of Manitoba, Mr. Sterling Lyon. I read Premier Lyon is stating that there is a basis for an amending formula and I quote:

—albeit one must require further refinement.

A little later he says:

The refinement process will be completed hopefully when the premiers meet on the sixteenth of April.

In another answer to a question he stated:

—until the final negotiations have been approved by all of the provinces . . . we cannot talk about it in detail.

This shows that the premiers have not yet agreed on anything, that they are moving in the direction of an agreement but have not even got a proposal to make. I repeat, if they do have one, why hide it until the sixteenth? If they want me to meet with them and they have something that is good for the Canadian people, surely it is their duty to make it public now. It is their duty not to try to hoodwink the voters of Quebec who are in the middle of an election and pretend there is some agreement when, in fact, we are told by Premier Lyon there still has to be negotiation. That should be the answer as to why I do not want to meet with them.

They should meet among themselves, decide what they want and, when they know what they want, then perhaps they should talk to the two other premiers who have long since given up on the hope that they would agree, and then perhaps we can have a discussion. Until then, I still say that the premiers are obviously not in agreement. They have used the courts in order to gain time, just as the Leader of the Opposition has used the courts in order to gain time.

We have Premier Lougheed stating again yesterday that if the courts go his way, well, that would be nice, that would kill our measure, but if the courts go against them, that does not end the matter. We have the Leader of the Opposition agreeing with them. Surely this proves they are using the courts for political purposes.

Mr. Clark: It may be what we have seen here, quite apart from the Prime Minister's confusion about enumerating his enemies who, in his mind, seem to be almost numberless in this country, because he will not meet with any of them and will not talk with any of them. Was the Prime Minister indicating that his source of information on the premier's proposal is a CBC radio program. I understand his great respect for CBC radio programs.

Why will the Prime Minister of Canada not give the eight premiers of this country who have indicated that nine short days from now, on April 16, they will be meeting to finalize a proposal on a Canadian way to bring our Constitution home, the assurance that when they meet and, if they are able to finalize the agreement which they claim they can finalize, that he will meet with them? Why will he not wait nine short days to see their proposal? Why does he reject it out of hand? How can he justify his statement of yesterday that under no circumstances, whatever they propose, however many their number, will he meet with them? How can he justify doing that to our federal system?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition said he wondered where I got my information. I told him it was from the words of Premier Lyon speaking last night on the CBC program "As It Happens". That is where I got my information to the effect that they have not yet agreed.

If further certitude is needed, I have the telegram dated April 3 which Premier Lyon of Manitoba sent to me. In it are the following words with respect to the new Canadian patriation. He said it "could be discussed with you as soon as the Government of Quebec has had an opportunity to ascertain its final position after the current election."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I think we are being hoodwinked by someone.

An hon. Member: We are being hoodwinked by Pierre.

Mr. Trudeau: We have every evidence from the mouth of the premier who has convened this conference—

Mr. Shields: Pierre speaks with forked tongue!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: We have every evidence that the premiers have not agreed on a formula.

The Leader of the Opposition asks me why I will not meet with them. The right hon. gentleman wants me to repeat myself. I have been meeting with the premiers since 1968 trying to find agreement on an amending formula on patriation, if nothing else. Among themselves they have been trying to meet since the beginning of last October to find agreement. Right now we are told that they have not yet found it. I think the call on me to meet with them is somewhat premature. Let them state what their position is. Let them convince the Leader of the Opposition and the provinces of Ontario and New Brunswick that they have suddenly found something which is acceptable. Then I will say, "Thank God, we will not have to wait two years to have this amending formula which is hypothetically so good. We will be able to put it into our law as early as next summer, within weeks after we have had our own patriation."

I can only say, though I doubt they have reached agreement, I hope they will very soon, so that we can get on with having a permanent amending formula and not have to wait for the two years which are provided in the resolution to find that ideal formula. Let them keep meeting. Let them find something which is presentable to the Canadian people.

But in the meantime we say—and I believe this was the purport of the Standing Order 43 moved earlier—what is their position on the charter of rights? What is their position on an equalization formula? What is their position on the equality of women?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR ADJOURNMENT OF DEBATE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RESOLUTION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of Opposition): Madam Speaker, it is ironic to hear this Prime Minister, who used to accuse the premiers of attaching conditions before they would come to any agreement, standing here and attaching the longest list of conditions he can dream up before he would even sit down and meet with the premiers of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister has talked about premature action. Surely what is premature, and what offends the whole federal system and the whole idea of working reasonably together as a Canadian family, is the Prime Minister's categoric statement yesterday that he will not meet with any premiers to discuss any proposal any time before his personal resolution is passed through this House of Commons.

● (1425)

Why will the Prime Minister not give the eight premiers representing 14 million Canadians—Premier Blakeney, Premier Bennett and all the rest—a chance? Why will he not adjourn debate in this House until April 15, nine short days away, let us get on with other business, and give the premiers a chance to come forward with a proposal which might allow us to resolve this question in Canada? What does the Prime Minister of Canada have to lose by acting in that reasonable way? Why will he not respect the Canadian tradition? How does he justify his refusal in advance to meet with the premiers of Canada?

Madam Speaker: Order.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I suppose the main answer is because I suspect the premiers of doing exactly what the Leader of the Opposition has been doing for months, just seeking delay, not seeking solutions, seeking delay.

If I were to tell the Leader of the Opposition now that I will meet them on Thursday of next week, and if we reach agreement which is agreeable to everyone, would the Leader of the Opposition then support our amending the resolution as it is with the charter of rights, and putting that agreed upon formula in, or will he then get up and ask for further delay?

The Leader of the Opposition talks about offending the federal system. What is more offensive to the federal system than premiers and the Leader of the Opposition who for months have been saying, "Let's get a judgment of the courts"? Now we hear one or two premiers and the Leader of the Opposition hinting that, if the courts go against them, they will still fight the fight politically. If they want to fight the fight politically, they are saying what we have been saying for the past 12 months, it is a political issue, and that they have only used the courts to subvert the courts to their own political means.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I will let the Chief Justice and the court of Newfoundland reply for themselves to that slur upon their reputation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: In his habit of avoiding answering questions by posing questions, the Prime Minister has asked me whether we would accept amendment of the resolution to incorporate an amending formula agreed to by the premiers and the Prime Minister. Of course we would.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REASONS FOR REFUSAL TO ADJOURN DEBATE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, why will the Prime Minister not give the premiers a chance to have that influence on our common Constitution? Why is he in such a rush? What does he have to lose by adjourning debate for nine short days? What is he in such a hurry about? Why will he not let the Canadian process have a chance to work? Why is he trying to shut off the premiers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition asks, "Why such a rush?" Nine days is not of the essence; I agree with that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: That is why I put it to the Leader of the Opposition: let us wait until the tenth day; let us deal with other business; let us wait until the tenth day; let us then agree to closure so that the parties in this House can vote on the tenth day. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition does not want nine days. Perhaps he wants nine months and nine years and ninety years, which was exactly the tactic used by the Tory party when we were discussing in this House how to bring Newfoundland into confederation. The Hon. George Drew said, "Why now; why not wait?" That is the tactic—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

• (1430)

NUMERICAL GROUPING OF PREMIERS

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): My supplementary question, Madam Speaker, is for the Prime Minister. If the Prime Minister is now saying again that he is willing to negotiate, I think that the negotiation procedure is always acceptable. Yesterday the Prime Minister dismissed the Newfoundland Supreme Court judges as being three non-elected officials; today he talks about the provinces subverting the courts. I think those are pretty serious charges. In view of the position the Prime Minister has taken now about the courts—and he has given his judgment there and he has given his judgment about the premiers—how many premiers does he feel would be necessary before he would meet with them? Would he meet three premiers, five premiers, seven or eight premiers? Would they have to include a Liberal premier? How many premiers would there have to be before he would meet with them?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member asks me that question. The answer is right in the resolution which has been before us for six months, and the hon. member, I am told, has been on the committee and has played an important role. The answer is there quite clearly. If seven premiers representing 80 per cent of the population agree on a formula, the formula will either be accepted by the rest of us, or submitted to the—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —submitted to the people for a decision.

An hon. Member: Built in veto.

Mr. Trudeau: What is unfair about that, Madam Speaker? Why does the hon. member ask a question which already has its answer in the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Order. We do need to have a question period, and I would like to recognize as many questioners as possible. The hon. member for Provencher on a short supplementary.

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE GROUNDS FOR FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL MEETING

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. I mentioned to him yesterday that there was a certain way to handle federal-provincial relations, the Canadian manner in which generally we have been operating. In view of the fact that federal-provincial conferences, meetings, and negotiations take place every day, over 300 in any given year, in his experience has he ever rejected the earnest desire of a premier to meet with him or with his officials on any matter which affected federal-provincial relations? Has he ever rejected that request and, if so, why, on this fundamental question of the Constitution, where there might be a possibility of bringing together people to bring about unity in this country, does he continue to refuse that simple request, namely, to meet once again?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I gave the answer to that question. It is because I am convinced that the premiers are seeking delay and nothing else. I ask the hon. member: why does he suppose that they invited me and not the Premier of Ontario or the Premier of New Brunswick?

An hon. Member: Are you sure they have not?

Mr. Trudeau: I keep hearing there will be a meeting of eight premiers, Madam Speaker. I am just telling the hon. member. They talk about meeting me and about meeting eight premiers. Presumably the two other premiers are not invited or do not want to go.

An hon. Member: If they go, will you go?

Mr. Trudeau: I put it to the House earlier: if you are not seeking delay, if you are seeking one more chance at agreement, and if this House will agree to pass the bill in all stages once that effort has taken place, and if it is successful, we will then introduce that new form of amendment into the Constitution. And if it is unsuccessful, I will let the members of this House be the judge, and if they do not want to be the judge we can always have the provision called for in the resolution, which is a referendum. That is my proposal.

If they are not seeking delay I will meet with them, provided the House agrees to bring this matter to a final vote within one or two days after I have met with them. If that is a fair proposal, I will make it in all earnestness and I will tell the premiers I will meet with them, whether they be eight or ten.

OPPORTUNITY FOR HOUSE TO DEAL WITH AMENDMENTS RELATING TO EQUALITY OF WOMEN AND ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, there seems to be another effort to reach agreement which could bring us beyond the impasse on this constitutional resolution. Let us hope that this fifty-ninth effort might be successful. But in the interim, considering that the government has announced its intention to bring to an early vote a Conservative amendment which has been before the House for several weeks, I should like to ask the Prime Minister an important question. Will he give the House his absolute assurance that there will be no request for a final vote on the resolution until there has been a vote on an NDP proposed amendment—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: —affecting the equality of women and the entrenchment of aboriginal rights?

An hon. Member: This is a caucus matter. Handle it in caucus.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is not an assurance I can give. It is an assurance that the NDP wants to obtain for itself. If they can get the floor to move their amendment, of course we would be very happy. That is what the allocation of time resolution put forward two weeks ago House was for—it was to permit us to deal with an amendment which has been before us for seven weeks and to go on to deal with an amendment which improves the situation of women and improves the amending process for the aboriginal peoples. That is why we have closure before the House now, so that we can move on to that. But I cannot give the Leader of the NDP the guarantee that that will happen. He might seek it from his colleagues on that side of the House, he might seek it from Madam Speaker, but he cannot seek it from me.

TIMETABLE FOR TRANSMISSION OF RESOLUTION TO BRITISH PARLIAMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister is quite wrong on that. He knows that the timetable of the House is ultimately determined by the government, and if the government is interested in obtaining an amendment affecting the equality of women and the entrenchment of aboriginal rights, it is in the power of the government to wait until that is done. The Prime Minister knows that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: My next question to the Prime Minister goes back to the statements he made last week pertaining to the conflicting decisions that have been reached by the superior court in the province of Newfoundland and that in the province of Manitoba. I should like to ask him whether he will offer assurances to the House that no form of request will be made to the Parliament of Westminster to deal with the constitutional resolution until a decision has been reached as to whether it is intra vires in whole or in part by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in prefacing his question the Leader of the NDP said that it was within the power of the government to wait until it is done, until the amendments are moved. It is within the power of everybody to wait until it is done, but that does not seem to be very much power, Madam Speaker. The Leader of the NDP knows that we have been waiting for seven weeks to have a vote on one amendment so that we could then go on to improving the resolution for women and aboriginals.

The question remains whether the government, any government of the day, should have to wait forever. Is that all that is in its power, or has the Leader of the NDP some other way in which I can guarantee to him that we will go on to the amendments which his party and our party want? I repeat, there is one way of doing it, it is to have co-operation among our parties on allocation of time. As the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party knows, we have not been able to do that.

● (1440)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: You have not tried.

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition says that we have not tried to get agreement on an allocation of time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: He says that we have not tried to get agreement on an allocation of time! We are trying to get the floor on that—

Mr. Clark: You rejected our proposals.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: There is a meeting a day of House leaders.

Mr. Trudeau: The government House leader had endless meetings with the House leader of the Conservative Party trying to find some way in which there could be a three way agreement in order to allocate time.

Mr. Clark: And you rejected each of our proposals.

Mr. Trudeau: The House leader of the Conservative Party knows that there has been those meetings. They have been substantiated by both the Leader of the New Democratic Party and by others.

Mr. Clark: I am saying that you have not really tried.

Mr. Trudeau: Now the hon. Leader of the Opposition is saying that we have not really tried.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: We sure know what happens when he really tries.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I have a final supplementary question. The Prime Minister has not always shown such a great interest in the rules affecting Parliament, but would he not agree, just as we had a timetabling motion before which the government proposed, that it is entirely within the power of the government to bring in a timetabling motion that would cover the points to which I have just referred, the amendments he said the government is interested in passing, as well as including a commitment not to transmit the resolution in any form until the Supreme Court of Canada has passed judgment? The Prime Minister knows that just as well as all members of the House.

Mr. Trudeau: So what, Madam Speaker? The Leader of the New Democratic Party said that it is within our power to bring in a motion setting a timetable which would cover his amendments. We did that; we gave notive of a motion to that effect 15 days ago.

Mr. Broadbent: Stick with it.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You are consenting adults.

Mr. Trudeau: Now we are told to stick with it, and I guess we are told by the New Democratic Party that passage of time will somehow solve everything. It seems to me they are slipping slightly toward the position of the Tory party, which is to seek a delay.

Mr. Broadbent: We are asking you to live up to your agreement.

REQUEST FOR CHANGES IN PROVISIONS COVERING PRICES AND TAX RATES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Next week the minister will be meeting with his counterpart from Alberta on the question of the energy program. Today four different groups appeared before two committees of the House and described the very adverse elements of the National Energy Program. For the situation to be changed, clearly the government must take its responsibility and propose some changes in this program if we are to free ourselves from the deadlock we are in today.

Is the minister proposing any changes in the price levels, the tax rates or the royalty rates? Is he prepared to consider more fundamental changes in the energy program in order to break the deadlock we are in today?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the representations of the hon. member. I assure him that when an announcement has to be made I will be very happy to make it in the House, or following the discussions with my colleague from Alberta. I think we should let those discussions start before making statements right and left about those negotiations at the present time.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, in view of the response of the minister it is very clear that he is not considering the fundamental changes which would be required to break the deadlock.

In view of the very strong jurisdictional as well as the legal concerns of the producing provinces, it appears that we will be in this deadlock for some period of time, unless the minister is able to free his own thinking and reach some conclusions on the changes that are needed. Why is the minister not prepared to consider fundamental changes in the area of taxation in order to free the deadlock we are in today?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I fail to see how the hon. member could have reached in any way the conclusions he has reached from anything I have said.

PRICE FOR OIL RECOVERED FROM TAR SANDS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources a question about the April 13 meeting as well. It may surprise him that some Canadians consider it perhaps just as important as the Constitution. Yesterday the Alberta energy minister said:

—the tar sands . . . couldn't proceed because the projects are not economic—

This was even if Alberta permitted them to proceed. The minister knows that existing tar sands projects such as Syncrude are not getting the National Energy Program prices but indeed are getting the world prices.

Is the minister considering giving the tar sands projects more than world prices, which puts us into a rather ludicrous position of having to subsidize once again the foreign multinational oil companies?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have not seen the declaration by Mr. Leitch, but I suspect he referred to the fact that if we add the cost of Alberta royalties and the various provincial taxes to the federal taxes, in his view there is not enough left to make these new projects economic. This is the only thing I can assume from what he said. I will have it at that and check what my colleague said exactly in this regard. I have nothing to add to the statement of the hon. member.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, the fact of the matter is that the minister is giving world prices to some tar sands plants; I see him nodding.

According to the annual report of Imperial Oil, "the highlight of the year was Syncrude's record production" which contributed $60 million to Imperial's net earnings. Will the minister confirm that on April 13 he is prepared to depart from the National Energy Program and indeed plans to offer the tar sands projects higher prices than those set out in the National Energy Program?

Mr. Lalonde: No, Madam Speaker, I am not prepared to confirm that.

NATIONAL GALLERY

LACK OF SPACE—NECESSITY FOR NEW BUILDING

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications. It concerns the future of the National Art Gallery of Canada. In view of the fact that less than 4 per cent of the gallery's collection can be displayed to the public at any one time because of lack of space, and in view of the fact that the collection is in danger of being damaged because of humidity, moving and shifting caused by space shortage, would the minister inform the House when he intends to build the proposed new gallery so as to display our valuable collections and to give present and future generations of Canadians a national gallery in which they can take pride?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his very important question and of course for his very strong personal interest in the future of the National Gallery of Canada. I am not in a position to give him a definitive answer today, but indeed we are looking at a variety of possible options to meet the accommodation needs of the National Gallery and other museums in the National Capital area.

I should point out that under one part of our special initiatives program we have already allocated funds to help various museums and art centres across the country to improve their accommodation. I would point out that a $4.5 million contribution was made to the Vancouver art gallery and very recently $3 million was given to the Thunder Bay art centre.

MEASURES TO ASSURE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The service industry and the supply industry in western Canada have suffered very, very severely. A long-term employee at the weigh scales in Williston, North Dakota, said that in a 16-hour period, just under 1,000 truckloads of oil drilling equipment moved into the United States.

• (1450)

One of the major planks in the Liberal platform on the energy policy has been to Canadianize. It would seem to me that we are Canadianizing North Dakota and Montana in the Williston oil basin.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gustafson: Just under 120 oil rigs have crossed—

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is really making a speech rather than asking a question. He should ask his question immediately.

Mr. Gustafson: Madam Speaker, through you I would like to ask the minister what measures he is prepared to take at this time to assure the Canadian worker and the small Canadian company that there will be jobs in this country of ours, Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the National Energy Program features a whole series of measures to help businesses, particularly small Canadian businesses, and I would invite my colleague to become familiar with it as quickly as possible.

[English]

PURCHASE OF CANADIAN OIL

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): I would like to ask a supplementary question of the same minister. Why does the minister continue to buy expensive oil from Mexico and offshore sources at $40 a barrel or more while he refuses to buy Canadian oil which would give Canadian people work and small Canadian companies jobs in this country of ours?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has it all wrong.

An hon. Member: Oh no, you've got it all wrong.

Mr. Lalonde: The Government of Canada does not refuse to buy Canadian oil. I remind the hon. member that it is the Edmonton government which has cut 180,000 barrels from the Canadians, not the Government of Canada. As far as the price is concerned, I remind the hon. member that we are buying oil from Syncrude, for instance, at world price at the present time. In the National Energy Program we have offered very significant increases in the price of oil paid for Canadian production. So far as the 15 per cent net imports that we need from abroad is concerned, we must unfortunately pay the international price which those countries are charging. However, we want to eliminate those imports during the course of this decade so that we can buy, in Canada, all the oil which will be consumed in Canada. We do not believe that 23 million Canadian consumers should be obliged to pay whatever price is decided by OPEC.

FINANCE

PAYMENT OF SUBSIDY ON IMPORTED OIL

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. As a result of the so-called energy policy brought out in his budget on October 28, at the present time it is costing the federal government $500,000 an hour, 24 hours every day, 365 days a year, just to pay the subsidy on imported oil. At the same time rigs leaving the country must have an appointment three weeks ahead of time before they can be processed through customs. It just shows how many are leaving the country. How long is the minister going to allow this nonsensical situation to exist?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, we are bringing to an end the practice where the treasury pays oil compensation charges. These are being, not gradually, but rather rapidly, transferred to the consumers of Canada.

Mr. Crosbie: Far more than 18 cents!

CANCELLATION OF TRUCK AND AUTOMOBILE ORDERS IN WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): I wish to direct my supplementary to the same minister, in view of the fact that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has now left the Chamber. I would like to ask a question relating to the cancellation of trucks and automobile orders in western Canada as a result of all these service industries leaving our country. What sense does it actually make to force Canadians to cancel these orders while the federal government is trying to bolster up Chrysler Corporation with tax dollars at the same time? It simply does not make sense.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I want to assure the hon. member that his gloomy outlook is not really based on any factual assessment.

An hon. Member: You have already changed yours twice.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member ought to know that the rate of growth in western Canada for 1981 will be very strong indeed, stronger than most parts of the country.

An hon. Member: That's false!

PUBLIC WORKS

HEALTH AND SAFETY OF PUBLIC SERVANTS WORKING AT LES TERRASSES DE LA CHAUDIÈRE, HULL, QUE.

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): My question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Employees working at Les Terrasses de la Chaudière are suffering from respiratory problems, frequent and severe headaches, eye irritation, skin ailments and fatigue. Mary Lou McPhedron, upon the advice of her doctor, stopped working at Les Terrasses after suffering from loss of energy, headaches, bleeding gums and losing her voice.

A health and welfare study has shown the presence of two toxic chemicals at the work place, formaldehyde and trichlorethylene, chemicals associated with the symptoms which the workers have displayed. Has the minister identified the source of the chemicals, and what is he doing to eliminate it?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, in response to the hon. gentleman, the Department of Public Works is aware of the complaints of a number of civil servants employed in the building. We have been attempting to identify the source. I must admit that we are not quite so confident that the sources detailed by the hon. member are factual. It is my hope that with the improved tests which we are using at this time, we should have an answer to it. However, I might point out that in the resolve of the Ministry of Public Works to provide a more efficient building with relation to energy-saving, energy conservation and the like, it does create other problems such as the movement of air, and I think that that, by and large, is one of the problems giving rise to this difficulty.

REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF STUDIES

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): My supplementary question is directed to the same minister. My source of information with regard to the chemicals was a National Health and Welfare study. When will the minister make available all of the studies which have been done with regard to work place and safety at Les Terrasses de la Chaudière so that the workers can know the facts which he is aware of, relating to their working conditions, and so that the public can know the conditions under which they are working?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): In response to the first question, I have indicated to the hon. member that I do not yet have confirmation of the facts which he used in his introduction, presumably from newspaper reports which I saw for the first time today. I do not have the information which he purports to have. When those tests are complete, when I do have the tests, and if the hon. member has information from National Health and Welfare, I would be happy to have that information. I do not have it yet.

PUBLIC ARCHIVES ACT

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT EXTENDING FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. In view of the fact the Public Archives Act has not been revised since 1912, and in view of the fact Bill C-43, the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act, is before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs at the present time, will the minister consider revising the Public Archives Act to bring it into line with the proposed provisions of Bill C-43?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I want to thank the hon. member for his question, Madam Speaker. It is quite clear that the intent of the access to information legislation is to give greater access to documents in the possession of the government. If there is inconsistency between two acts, we will try to make sure that the two acts are brought into line. I have requested my officials to discuss this matter in detail with the officials of the Public Archives of Canada so that we could reconcile both acts to make more information accessible to the public.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF ALBERTA COURT OF APPEAL DECISION ON BILL C-57

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, would the Minister of Finance advise whether he is prepared to amend Part IV of Bill C-57 so that the act will conform to the unanimous judgment of the court of appeal in the province of Alberta referring to the powers of the federal government to tax gas which is owned by the province of Alberta?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker, it is not my intention to recommend an amendment. In my view, an amendment is not necessary at this stage.

DECISION RESPECTING APPEAL BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Would the minister advise whether he has been in consultation with the Minister of Justice and whether they have agreed that the judgment should be appealed and, if so, when shall the appeal be fought?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): I apologize to the hon. member, I was having a discussion with my colleague.

[English]

Madam Speaker: Would the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) please repeat the question?

● (1500)

Mr. Lambert: Madam Speaker, I will put my question again. Can the Minister of Finance say whether he has consulted with the Minister of Justice about whether an appeal should be filed in the Supreme Court of Canada on that particular judgment and, if so, when will the appeal be filed?

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, a decision will be made soon on that, and if there is an appeal it will be announced publicly very quickly.

PETITIONS

MR. JELINEK—UNBORN CHILD'S RIGHT TO LIFE

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the forty-sixth and forty-seventh reports of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the two petitions presented by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) and finds that they meet the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order flowing from the question period and having to do with the treatment of the constitutional resolution and, indeed, the resolution of the constitutional question generally. It is really a matter concerning House business.

Yesterday the Prime Minister refused absolutely to meet under any circumstances with the Premiers prior to the passage by this House and the other place of his resolution. Today he seemed to back away from that position. What I am interested in—

Miss Bégin: Is that a point of order?

Mr. Clark: The Minister of National Health and Welfare asks if this is a point of order. It is designed to advance the business of the House. I am trying to determine from the Prime Minister and the government House leader whether in fact they were intending in the question period to put forward a proposal that might be the basis for negotiation. I thought that the Prime Minister, at least in one of his answers, was indicating an interest in some negotiation. I want to have that either confirmed or denied.

We know that on April 2 the Prime Minister said he would be prepared, as a matter of principle, to have the constitutional resolution kept in this House, not passed beyond this House, until after the Supreme Court of Canada had decided its legality. I presume that position, which he stated clearly on April 2, remains his position.

What he seemed to be indicating today was interest in a proposal which would have at least the following elements, and I just want to recite them for the Prime Minister's memory.

First, it would involve the Prime Minister meeting with the Premiers in the kind of good faith that would yield agreement on an amending formula and a patriation package. Second, there would be some reasonable limitation on time for debate in this House. Third, there would be, presumably, the adjournment of debate in this House on the resolution until such time as it was profitable to resume debate on a new resolution. Those were the proposals that I thought I heard the Prime Minister making or alluding to.

My question on this point of order is whether or not the government now has some new proposal that it wants seriously to negotiate. If it does, if it has a proposal that follows those general outlines and retains the commitment the Prime Minister made on April 2, we naturally, in the interests of having this House get on with the business of the country, would be prepared to have any proposal the government might make considered by House leaders. I want to know whether the Prime Minister was in fact making a proposal or is in a position where he is prepared to make one that would allow the House to get on with its business.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Inasmuch as this has to do with House business and that the persons concerned feel they can answer in the light of what the House business would be if a certain number of things happen, I think I can allow this question. These negotiations usually take place outside the House, and I would urge hon. members to continue discussions outside the House if that is at all possible. However, I will allow the question if it facilitates things. My only interest is to facilitate proceedings in the House and inasmuch as it concerns the business of this House, I will allow the answer.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, just so that my interest in this is made absolutely clear, although I believe it would not be profitable to negotiate matters on the floor of the House, I am interested in knowing whether the government has something that it wants to propose—

Mr. Lalonde: Read Hansard.

Mr. Clark: —that can be negotiated among House leaders.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I, of course, agree with you that these things should be negotiated by the House leaders. I will merely give an answer which is intended, hopefully, to result in a meeting of House leaders.

There are two proposals which have been made on the floor of this House and to which we responded positively, an attitude which could be returned.

The first is the one that we made, that we would not press passage of this resolution in Great Britain until hearing from the Supreme Court. If legality was of importance and concern over legality was the driving factor, we would wait until the Supreme Court had judged our resolution to be legal before asking Westminster to pass it. That proposal is still open, Madam Speaker.

The second is a proposal made by the leader of the New Democratic Party. It was made one day when it was the subject of meetings between House leaders. It was examined in some detail and then the question was asked the next day in the House. The proposal was to the effect that we would vote on two amendments proposed by the NDP, one dealing with women and the other with aboriginal rights. For that matter, I am not objecting if they want to have a vote on property rights or on anything else. I am not enlarging the proposal; I am just saying that we on this side are seeking agreement. Whatever the proposal made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party was, there would be a vote on two amendments in this House so that the Supreme Court would be in the position of dealing with certainty with the resolution which emanates from the House.

A very essential part of that proposal, as I understood it, was that after the Supreme Court had—hypothetically—judged the resolution favourably, there would be a very short debate here without any further substantive amendments. In other words, the Supreme Court would be dealing with it in a fair way.

My answer to that—although for me it did go against the grain—was that if there was agreement among all parties to that proposal, and if it were clearly understood that these were exceptional times, as one hon. member said, and that we were not bowing to the doctrine that we can only act when the Supreme Court says we can act, then we would agree to the proposal. That matter, I take it, as far as we are concerned, is still open if the House leaders want to discuss it.

Today, with some insistence, I was asked why I did not want to meet with the Premiers on Thursday of next week. I indicated that I thought it was just a delaying tactic. Having been shown that this was perhaps not respectful of the Premiers, I made another suggestion. I repeat it now and if the House leaders want to meet and agree on it I would be happy to seek confirmation from my own caucus.

The suggestion is that we take the resolution as it is, with the charter, with the equalization formula, with the protection it gives against discrimination among Canadians and so on—and use it as the basis for some agreement with the premiers whereby they would come up with a new amending formula. In other words, it is the amending formula, I understand, that they are proposing to discuss on Thursday of next week.

If we can agree to an amending formula—and by "we" I mean those who have not have been invited to the meeting but who have been part of the negotiations up to now, namely, at least two provinces and the federal government—then of course we will seek an amendment to put that new amending formula in the resolution that is before the House. If the New Democratic Party can convince the Tory party that it is important to increase protection for women and for aboriginals, we can add that too. Then, Madam Speaker, having achieved this package, which hypothetically would have the approval of all premiers and the Government of Canada, we would vote on it within, say, 48 hours and put it through all stages in this House.

If that could be agreed to—

Mr. Lalonde: And if not?

Mr. Trudeau: If that can be agreed to we would know how the debate would end.

It is possible, of course, that the premiers would either not agree among themselves. If, as we hope, Mr. Ryan becomes Premier of Quebec, he has said he would not attend that meeting. It is possible the proposal would come unstuck because Premier Lyon has said it is not completely stuck yet. It is also possible that there would not be agreement among all Canadian elected representatives. If that happens, then I think we should still have the vote within 48 hours but we could undertake to hold a referendum, giving the people the chance to choose between the premiers' preference—hypothetically the preference of seven premiers representing 80 per cent of the population—and the federal government's preference. Then the people would choose. In that way, Madam Speaker, we would be ending the debate two days after next Thursday. We would be ending it with complete agreement, or we would be ending it with an agreement to let the people decide between the disagreeing premiers and the Government of Canada.

I suggest that the House leaders meet on any of these proposals so that we can get on with the business of governing Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, we are in the process of negotiating an important question on the floor, just as we were last week when we did not reach a settlement. I listened to the Leader of the Opposition and to the Prime Minister with care. I think the Prime Minister was saying that from the government's point of view he is prepared to have a meeting with the premiers to discuss an amending formula that would be compatible with a charter of rights for Canadians from coast to coast, including, as part of the package, aboriginal rights. I see the Minister of Justice nodding to that. Also included as part of the package would be more equality for women. I see him nodding to that, too. I understand that the Conservative Party is in agreement with those two principles.

I can say on behalf of my colleagues, without finalizing the deal, that the principle involved here, namely achieving these elements of a package and having a time limit for debate of 48 hours after the meeting takes place, will allow us, if there is no agreement, finally to face the damned issue, to put it bluntly, in this House with a vote. In principle, I am sure that I can commit my caucus to that kind of process for negotiation.

I conclude by saying that if the Prime Minister is making a serious proposal, then I take it for granted that the closure motion in the name of the House leader would certainly not be acted upon today if the Prime Minister is proposing that the House leaders sit down and talk about this alternative proposal.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, in the course of his remarks the Prime Minister indicated that he felt he should consult his caucus about this proposal. That is the position in which I find myself. I am sure that for the purpose of facilitating an agreement it would not be an unreasonable proposal, and I agree with the suggestion of the Prime Minister.

However, would it be possible in the circumstances for the government, for today in any event, to designate some other business so that we can examine in detail the proposals which have been made? If we could do that on the understanding that the meetings we have discussed would be held, this might very well facilitate parliamentary business. I put that to the government House leader.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, if I understand correctly the suggestion made by the House leader of the Progressive Conservative party he wants us to change the orders of the day to make it possible to hold negotiations on the three propositions summed up by the right hon. the Prime Minister. Another line of thought would be that perhaps as evidence of its good faith after seven weeks the Progressive Conservative Party might agree that we set the closure motion aside and dispose of the amendment of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), thus enabling us to continue the constitutional debate in which many members are still anxious to participate. That is another way of looking at the problem, or what might ultimately be agreed to would be to suspend the sitting of the House for one hour, if need be so, we may hold a caucus meeting, something which can be done right now, before returning here with a definitive answer.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I like the latter suggestion, if we are negotiating in good faith in this matter. I have no objection to our adjourning the House for a period of time to allow two things to happen. First, I would like to have a chance to examine in detail the discussions which took place here. In the interim, it would be very helpful if the Prime Minister could provide the detail I would like to examine. Then it would be possible as well for the consultations to continue. If he were advancing that second alternative as a serious one, I think it is a productive suggestion and I would be prepared to agree with it.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, as I understand the proposal so far, it may not be so productive. We do not have a precise idea to take to each of the caucuses. To give it effectiveness and to add to the suggestion that was made, I think suspending the sitting of the House for a couple of hours might be very useful. However, during that time the first hour the Prime Minister and the government House leader, the Leader of the Opposition and the House leader of the Conservative Party, myself and our House leader, should meet together to work on a concrete proposal to take back to our respective caucuses for discussion.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Under the circumstances, Madam Speaker, what I am suggesting is that the House adjourn for one hour, at which time we will be able to set forth a clear cut position without changing the order of the day as it had been planned.

Madam Speaker: Therefore, is it the pleasure of the House that we suspend the sitting and that we reconvene at the call of the bells?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House is agreed, therefore the sitting is suspended.

The House took recess at 3.17 p.m.

[English]

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 5.18 p.m.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, because we are making what I would qualify as reasonable progress at our meeting, and since the House leaders will meet again tonight to try and reach final agreement, I think you will find there is agreement that we suspend business that was to be considered today and carry on with Bill C-42 orders of the day. It is a very important bill to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

I understand the Postmaster General is ready to proceed with report stage of that bill and continue for the rest of the day. We will be having another House leaders' meeting this evening. Pending the results of that meeting, the House will deal with Bill C-42.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the proposal with respect to orders of the day is quite in order. I want publicly to express my thanks to the hon. member for Vancouver South, who has indicated a readiness to proceed with the post office bill on very short notice indeed. We are all grateful to him that we can continue with that bill and at the same time have our House leaders' meeting.

In the same spirit, I ask that the matters that were brought to Your Honour's attention today by the hon. member for Yukon, be deferred for the moment.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I am happy to underline the words of the other two House leaders to the effect that we are making what I believe we can call reasonable progress in our discussions of the way to deal with the constitutional resolution. As has been said, we shall be meeting again tonight.

• (1720)

Part of the agreement that we arrived at just a short while ago was that we would suspend the debate on the Constitution for today and deal with the report stage of Bill C-42. The hon. member from Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) will be ready when his turn comes.

Madam Speaker: I take note, then, that the House does now unanimously agree that we should proceed with the report stage of Bill C-42.

Mr. Knowles: After routine proceedings.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. CROSBIE—REFERENCE BY MR. TRUDEAU TO NEWFOUNDLAND SUPREME COURT JUSTICES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker, which is based on more than ample precedent. As an officer of the courts of Newfoundland and as a barrister and solicitor of the Law Society of Newfoundland, my point of order has to do with the question period today in which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that the provinces had subverted the courts for their own political ends, implying that the Supreme Court of Newfoundland has been subverted by the province.

I also refer to a statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday in which he referred to the Chief Justice and two of the judges of the appeal division of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, as appears at page 8988 of Hansard, and said that "three non-elected officials have told us that such a thing could not be done."

The Prime Minister is not in the House, Madam Speaker, so I am giving notice of my point of order now, which is not frivolous, not light and which is most serious. It is not only a serious accusation against the courts in Newfoundland but a contemptuous style of reference to the Chief Justice of Newfoundland and two of his brother judges.

Mr. Lalonde: Nonsense!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister is not here to clarify his words, so I am quite willing—

An hon. Member: It is a waste of time.

Mr. Crosbie: The hon. member may think it is a waste of time, but I do not. The judges of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland have been denigrated and insulted—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is giving notice that he wants to raise a point of order. I understand he does not want to argue it now. I take his notice and we will hear his point of order in due course.

PETITION

MISS MACDONALD—REVISION OF NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition to the House. When I was in Calgary not long ago I had the honour to be presented with a petition signed by some 2,500 women from western Canada, and I would like to take this opportunity to present it to the House.

The petitioners are concerned with the adverse effects that the National Energy Program is having on the Canadian economy, and particularly on the petroleum industry. The petitioners feel that the National Energy Program and the measures flowing from the budget are not in the national interest, and they therefore ask this House to press for revision of the National Energy Program so that employment opportunities and social needs will not suffer in the future.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 23, 1,545, 1,571 and 1,829.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

FEATHERBED FILE

Question No. 23—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer given to a question by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville on Friday, November 23, 1979, at page 1638 of Hansard, which stated in part that another purpose of the Featherbed File was to investigate "high-ranking government officials of the day who, in their younger days, may have had connections with the Communist Party of Canada or other groups such as that" (a) how many such high ranking officials are included under the word "many" used in the answer (b) how did such persons reach high-ranking positions in the government if they had been working or had connections with foreign powers opposed to the Canadian government?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): The number of "high-ranking government officials" and how they reached their positions in government is kept confidential for reasons of national security, pursuant to the government's policy on access to information. It is not in the public interest to provide additional information on the Featherbed File.

RCMP HEADQUARTERS—CIVILIAN STAFF

Question No. 1,545—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the civilian staff at RCMP headquarters who are involved in all security clearances for the government comprised of 66 persons and, if not, what is the number?

2. Is the section to be computerized and, if so, were all employees told originally that none on their jobs would be affected and were they subsequently told to get lateral transfers because the positions would be deemed surplus that are not vacant by December, 1980, and that those involved would be laid off?

3. Were any of the employees laid off and replaced by casual employees and (a) if so, for what reason (b) if not, is such a thing planned?

4. Has it been estimated that the computer will be only 60 per cent efficient and has it been estimated that the present staff without the computer was 90 per cent efficient?

5. Will the government take immediate steps to provide for the guaranteed job security of persons involved in this situation and (a) if so, in what way (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. It is not the policy of the RCMP to publicly identify how many personnel work in any area of the security service.

2. The records section of the security service is being computerized. Employees were initially told that there would be no lay-offs; normal attrition (promotions, resignations and lateral transfers) would be allowed to take care of the 35 positions declared surplus. In late May of 1980 this position was changed to a target date of December 31, 1980. As employees were hesitant to apply for lateral transfers, it was pointed out that in order to meet the required reduction some would have to apply or if they did not some may find themselves subject to being declared surplus. This was a general direction given to those in the 35 positions and not addressed to any specific position or positions.

3. There have been no lay-offs, however, there has been hiring of casual employees to complete the job requirements vacated by permanent staff.

4. No such estimates exist.

5. The government has taken steps to provide for job security of persons involved in this situation.

(a) By allowing a reasonable time period in order that those in the 35 positions can accept other government positions and ensuring that other opportunities in the public service are brought to the attention of those concerned.

(b) Not applicable.

PROPOSED PRISON AT RENOUS, N.B.

Question No. 1,571—Mr. Howie:

1. What plans, if any, are there for the development of a minimum security prison at Renous, New Brunswick, and in what time-frame?

2. Has the project received Treasury Board approval and, if so, on what date is it intended to call for tenders?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): In so far as The Correctional Service of Canada is concerned: 1. The Correctional Service of Canada's long range accommodation program for 1980-1990 does not call for the construction of a minimum security institution in Renous, New Brunswick. However, a protective custody unit/special handling unit maximum security institution is being proposed but has not yet received Treasury Board approval.

2. Not applicable.

SELECTION OF LAWYERS BY GOVERNMENT

Question No. 1,829—Mr. Cossitt:

What are the names of all lawyers presently doing business for the government or on the government list of those to be used for government business, when required, in the constituency of Leeds-Grenville and (a) how are they selected (b) what are the names of all persons recommending them to the government?

Adjournment Motion

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): (a) and (b): When considering counsel for appointment as agents of the Attorney General of Canada, the type of case, a counsel's specialization in that area of the law and experience in dealing with the class of subject are taken into account. The Minister of Justice, under statute, has always been charged with the responsibility of appointing competent legal agents to handle on behalf of the government civil and criminal cases that are not handled directly by legal staff of the department. All governments in the past have observed the unchallenged principle that the choice of agents to act on behalf of the minister rests with him, and that the criterion for appointment is one of competence. While advice on appointment of agents is taken from numerous sources including, at times, local Bar societies, there is no single set procedure for receiving recommendations and the final choice is simply a matter of judgment. The object of receiving recommendations from various sources is to ensure that the best available counsel are known to the department should their services be required. The recommendation of counsel does not signify approval or authority "to act on behalf of the government" at that point of time, as a lawyer only becomes an agent of the Attorney General after a case has arisen and instructions have been issued by the Department of Justice or the client department. Regardless from what quarter a recommendation is received, the test of competence is the basis for appointment.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CROWN CORPORATION

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, be amended in clause 2, by adding immediately after line 12 at page 1, the following:

" 'letter' means any item of mailable matter that weighs no more than 500 grams and has an address, code or other identification sufficient to enable delivery of the item to a specific addressee or destination but does not include

(a) any item consisting solely of a newspaper, magazine, book or catalogue or of goods;

(b) any item having no further address than 'householder', 'boxholder', 'occupant', 'resident' or other similar expression;

(c) any item consisting solely of advertising matter, or a greeting card, or an invoice for goods or services; and

(d) any item that is specified by the regulations;"—

He said: Mr. Speaker, on short notice we will try to explain to the House the purpose of this amendment. Unfortunately, with the notice being so short I do not have all my material in front of me.

A problem in this bill arises with respect to the definition of "letter". Earlier in the discussion of this bill in committee, the minister produced a definition of the word "letter" and it was our understanding that this definition would form part of the act. The minister proceeded to talk about the definition and he then withdrew his definition, relying on Sections 14 and 15 of the act, if my memory serves me correctly, to try to define "letter" as almost an exclusionary provision.

What I have attempted to do is to place an amendment before the House with respect to the definitions section of the bill to define a letter to include mailable matter which weighs no more than 500 grams and which has an address or identification sufficient for it to be delivered by a postman on his walk. That definition specifically excludes certain items. I am following to a larger extent what the minister tentatively proposed before the committee but which he never did complete, namely that the definition of "letter" would exclude newspapers, magazines, books or a catalogue of goods.

With respect to a catalogue of goods, for example, this would mean that the Post Office would not have a monopoly on delivering the Simpsons-Sears or Canadian Tire catalogue, or something of that nature. I do not think it was ever really intended that the Post Office should have that monopoly. I think the minister would agree with me that that kind of item should not be regarded as a letter and that the whole purpose of the particular exclusion is to ensure that newspapers, magazines and catalogues are not within the definition of "letter" and therefore are not part of the Post Office monopoly.

The definition goes on further to exclude items which are simply addressed "Householder", "Boxholder", "Occupant", or something of that nature. These are items often delivered by delivery services. They have no specific address or addressee. While they may be in an envelope or in a package, in common parlance they are really not letters. In order to make sure where we are headed in this country, it is essential that the monopoly not be interpreted to include these kinds of items. The consequence is that anything which has no address other than "householder" on the outside of the envelope is really not a letter at all. I see a member opposite is shaking his head. The question is: What is the monopoly for the Post Office? The purpose of this amendment is to provide that items addressed to "Householder" or "Boxholder," are not included in the monopoly.

The next matter—and this was very much in the minister's mind when it was brought forward in the committee—is that the legislation should exclude from the definition anything like a greetings card or an invoice for goods and services. Can my daughter take a greetings card around to her friend? Can she deliver a birthday card or something like that? Is she to be prosecuted for delivering a letter, or is she entitled to do that? I suggest there should be no question that a greetings card which someone might want to deliver is not within the absolute monopoly of the Post Office. We should not have to put stamps on such items. Surely we can walk around and deliver such items.

I want to bring the matter of the word "invoice" to the attention of the House. I do so because a great number of public utilities in this country are involved. Meter readers for The Consumers' Gas Company in Peel region presently deliver gas bills. The hydro electric power commission in the city of Mississauga wants to be able to have its meter readers deliver hydro bills when they go around checking the quantum of usage for the previous month or period. It strikes me that it is ridiculous to say that a public utility or, indeed, a private utility should not be able to deliver its invoices for its services or for power, gas or water consumed on a door-to-door basis to the consumer. Indeed, there is no reason why, if I sell goods or perform services, I should not be able to go around and deliver bills myself or have one of my employees do so. Surely to goodness it is not the intention of the minister to broaden the monopoly of the Post Office to include every single envelope or letter these interests wish to deliver to their own consumers. Surely the minister does not suggest that the Post Office monopoly should prevent public utilities—which are there to serve the public in the same way as the Post Office—from reducing their overhead costs by delivering their own invoices, particularly in times of postal disputes or disruptions. It is in the interest of all of us that we look throughout our economy at ways by which government and business organizations can cut down overhead and keep prices low. After all, one of the major concerns of Canadians is inflation. If we insist that everything must be done by an organization like the Post Office, then we prevent innovation on the part of utility companies and companies generally which have invoices to deliver.

I think it is essential, in terms of where we are going with respect to the Post Office Act, that we restrict the definition and make it as clear as possible, although it should not be too restrictive because I think it is essential that the Post Office have a monopoly. However, the definition of "letter" should be as clear as possible so that the Post Office has ample control. On the other hand, we should make sure that the Post Office monopoly is not so broad as to prevent a public utility from delivering an invoice or one of our daughters from delivering a birthday card or a greeting by hand. In my community the Lorne Park Estates Association always delivers notices of meetings by having some of the kids in the neighbourhood go around and stuff them in doors. Surely it is not the intention of this bill to bring that kind of delivery into the exclusivity the act would create. Surely that type of thing must be permitted in our society. It seems totally unreasonable that the act would not provide that protection.

Consideration of this particular amendment and the definition of "letter" took place in final form on the last day of the committee hearing. That was before Christmas. It was the evening of the long 23-hour debate on inflation that we had here in this House. The committee met all day and all evening. It met right through, as the minister will remember, until after eleven o'clock that night. We co-operated with the minister in every way. It just so happened that in the rush to get the bill through the committee we never really did get down to a debate on the necessity of protecting the right of people to participate in the activities to which I have referred. People presently do deliver communications which we really did not intend to be letters in the first place.

I say that it is essential that this bill contain the type of definition I propose because we sincerely want to ensure that the postal corporation knows what its limits are in terms of its monopoly and is able to say clearly that a certain type of communication is its exclusive responsibility. We want it to be clear what people can and cannot do so that we can be prepared to prosecute if necessary. On the other hand, we want to make sure that people continue to do those things which have normally been done.

At the present time certain public utility companies deliver their own bills. Surely it is not our intention to say to a public utility company such as the Mississauga hydro or the Port Colborne hydro that it cannot continue to deliver its own bills. Surely it is not our intention to say to ratepayers' associations that they cannot deliver "householders" to "ratepayers" in their district. If it is not our intention, we should spell that out in the bill. Surely we do not intend to tell people who want to deliver catalogues advertising their goods, wares and merchandise door-to-door—or specific consignees—that they cannot hire people to deliver those catalogues. It was never necessarily intended that those catalogues be delivered by the Post Office. In most cases they are not delivered by the Post Office. In all probability the Post Office is not organized to deliver such catalogues, so why not exempt them specifically? Why leave doubt in anyone's mind that perhaps catalogues are letters and subject to the postal monopoly? I say to this House that motion No. 1 should be accepted by the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I want to be clear whether the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) seeks the floor on the proposed amendment or whether other hon. members seek the floor to speak on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). If they do, I will recognize them. If they do not, my understanding of the procedure is that the vote on the amendment will be deferred until votes can be taken on all amendments. Does the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) seek the floor to speak on the same amendment?

Mr. Gamble: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for York North.

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to deal with this significant amendment. One may well ask of what significance is the definition of "letter" in this bill as opposed to the provisions of the bill which require the definition to be incorporated in a regulation passed by the corporation with the approval of the governor in council.

• (1740)

I had an opportunity as a member of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates to study this bill clause by clause, and one of the matters that chiefly concerned me was the way in which regulations which are to have the force and effect of law are to be passed by the corporation itself extending its monopoly, in the fashion that this bill provides, to letters. Accordingly, it is very significant that we should determine what the monopoly parameters are and define them clearly for the benefit of those who use the services of the Canada Post Office and presumably will continue to use the services of the new corporation to be established as a consequence of the passage of this legislation.

One of the difficulties here is that under paragraph 17(1)(a) the corporation may, with the approval of the governor in council, make regulations:

prescribing, for the purposes of this act and the regulations, what is a letter—

If one examines the provisions of Subclause (7) of that clause one finds that:

every regulation made pursuant to Subsection (1)—

From which I have just quoted in part.

—is deemed to have been approved by the governor in council sixty days after the day it is received by the Clerk of the Privy Council for submission to the governor in council for consideration, unless the governor in council has previously approved or refused to approve the regulation.

What that means in essence is that inaction by cabinet will result in the passage of a law by a Crown corporation dealing with this very essential issue of what are the limits of the monopoly enjoyed or to be enjoyed by this Crown corporation to be estalished.

The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) had an opportunity to deal with the exceptions to that monopoly as they apply to letters that must, in fact, under this bill become the exclusive property for delivery of the new corporation. Those exceptions relate in a very limited fashion to letters of an urgent nature that are delivered by messenger for a fee at least equal to the amount that is three times the regular rate of postage; letters concerning goods for delivery carried by a common carrier; letters concerning the affairs of an organization that are transmitted between offices of that organization or by an employee thereof; and letters in the course of transmission by any electronic or optical means. Those exceptions, which I suspect apply to the majority of those areas about which the public may be concerned, are not broad enough, in my submission, and specific representations have been made to me by constituents concerned about the application of the exclusive monopoly to be granted to this corporation, which itself will define what a letter is and, accordingly, the limits of that monopoly.

I have in front of me a letter dated March 25, 1981, which I received on April 1, 1981 from Smith and Associates Insurance Agencies Limited, insurance brokers, expressing their concern about the impact on the insurance industry, particularly during the time of a postal interruption, when they and insurance agents like themselves will not be in a position to cause others or their own agents to deliver the necessary insurance policies without demanding excessive fees.

If we were to take a look at the provisions of the insurance act in the province of Ontario, we would find that a life insurance policy does not become effective until it is physically in the hands of the insured. Companies relied upon the Post Office until it became apparent that that reliance was somewhat misplaced, and accordingly they have taken it upon themselves to see that their representatives deliver these policies, which include covering letters. I submit that even on the narrowest of interpretations which we may anticipate finding in the regulations, this would be an illegal act of which this House should be aware because of the impact it will have on this industry.

I should like to take some time of the House to read a couple of paragraphs which appear in that correspondence. Mr. Smith writes:

> I am concerned that these exceptions do not go far enough—

He is referring to the exceptions to the necessity for the Post Office to deliver the mail. He continues:

> —and that the wordings do not include insurance documents. It is inevitable that there will be another strike, and what would our clients do if they were unable to take delivery of their policy and furthermore, they are unlikely to pay for it. As a broker, we would not be able to live up to our obligation to our insurers and the whole fabric of the insurance business would be in jeopardy as maintenance of an effective communication system is urgent.
> In the U.S., legislation exempts delivery of stocks, bonds, insurance documents, etc., as does legislation in the United Kingdom.

He then urges me, when I speak in the House, to draw the attention of members to these significant matters.

I cast my mind back to the representations which were made to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates with respect to this specific issue. We had presented to us, particularly by people in the messenger and courier business, specific words which were extracted from the U.S. regulations dealing with time-sensitive materials. We were given not only specific illustrations of the words but examples in a concrete form of some time-sensitive, life-giving materials which were delivered by courier and with respect to which there might have been a covering letter concerning the method to be applied by a medical institution in the use of that medical device.

I know the argument that will be made by the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) is that, under those circumstances, we are confronted with a cost at least three times the regular rate of postage applicable to those materials, but that argument does not cover the situation where, as in the case confronting us here, the cost might indeed not exceed three times the regular cost, or where an organization takes it upon itself to deliver the letters and enclosure in the letters of insurance policies.

I have also received a letter from the Markham Hydro Commission drawing to my attention the fact that that commission is, or has been until now, in the regular habit of having its bills delivered by those who read hydro meters. That practice, in the event that this legislation is passed in unamended form, will have to come to an end. They were concerned, of course, as are most people carrying on an active business practice, about the effect upon their operation of a mail stoppage, a strike, as referred to by Mr. Smith. Very clearly, the business community in Canada cannot come to a grinding halt because the Post Office corporation, as intended by this legislation, is unable to come to some agreement with its employees. I cannot for the life of me see how the passage of this legislation will end all labour-management disputes which have existed in the past and plagued the Post Office. It is unrealistic to expect that all those troubles will suddenly come to an end.

As a result of other provisions of the bill which place employees under the protection of the Canada Labour Code, the basis for potential disagreement between management and labour in fact will be extended. Under the circumstances, how can we realistically expect to find no disputes between the parties which will give rise to a strike and the non-delivery of mail?

It is incumbent upon the House to have regard for those circumstances. It is absolutely essential for taxpayers generally and for individuals who correspond with other segments of the business community or their customers to have at their disposal a way to carry on their business activities without being hamstrung by the present bill.

The hon. member for Mississauga South reflected the conduct of the affairs of the committee when he indicated that the minister had presented to the committee his definition of what a letter was. The intention was that the definition would be incorporated into the provisions of the bill and not made the subject matter of the regulations. I consider that to be absolutely essential, not only from the point of view of making hon. members of the House aware of the extent of the monopoly they are granting, but at the same time thwarting an effort, as a consequence of the passage of this bill, to transpose to a Crown corporation the authority, unobstructed not only by the House but by the governor in council, to interfere and determine what the law shall be.

It is absolutely fundamental, not only with respect to the definition of the word "letter" but with respect to the way in which all regulations under the bill are drafted, that the House and at least the governor in council pass the regulations. This is not the case which presently confronts us.

Accordingly, I urge members of the House to have some regard for what most assuredly has been a well-recognized practice in the passage of laws. If Parliament does not pass the law, at least the governor in council must pass it. This is not the case, having regard to the provisions in Clause 17(7).

Certainly in my experience I have not encountered a move of this nature by a government since the demise of the East India Company. I have not seen such an illustration since the Hudson's Bay Company, a commercial organization, ruled Rupert's Land.

It is incredible that in this simple piece of intended legislation we have a complete abdication of the responsibilities not only of elected members to pass the laws of Canada but of the governor in council. It is reprehensible enough that this should happen when the governor in council, without reference to Parliament, passes a law. We have seen ample illustration of the growing tendency to avoid reference to Parliament and an inclination to rely upon the governor in council to pass regulations. We have simply gone a step beyond. I submit this is dangerous to the system of representative democracy.

I recognize that the government has taken almost a whole page in the draft bill, that is page 11, to explain the potential need to publish, for the benefit of the public, the intended regulations. I understand that they are there for the purpose, hopefully, of permitting the public to express views with respect to the very items to be covered by the new laws which will be passed by the Crown corporation. But that whole purpose is defeated by the provisions of clause 17(7) which provide that if the governor in council does not take action within 60 days, what will very clearly happen is that the people of Canada will bask in the glory of new laws passed by a Crown corporation.

In my view, under the circumstances we have a most legitimate request with respect to an amendment to clarify the extent of the monopoly, which is the chief purpose of this whole piece of legislation. All other provisions, while interesting from the standpoint of watching the establishment of a Crown corporation, its board of directors and so on, are superfluous to the real purpose, which is to grant a monopoly for the transmission of letters in Canada. That monopoly is not to be handed over to a government department, which is subject to scrutiny by the House, but to a Crown corporation and, accordingly, a minister who will answer questions in the House. The Crown corporation alone can determine what a letter is and will be in a position to determine the nature of the competition it may enjoy.

In case I should be met with the argument that there is provision within the bill to cover the work stoppage situation of which Mr. Smith and I have complained, a situation about which the Markham Hydro Commission and most of the business community in Canada are concerned, I would like to refer to clause 36(1) which was referred to briefly in committee. It reads as follows:

> The Corporation may, with the approval of the Minister, make such arrangements for transmitting mail in emergencies as in its opinion are necessary in the interests of the public.

Clause 36(2) goes on to provide:

> Every common carrier in Canada when required by the Corporation shall carry mail and duly accredited employees of the Corporation on such terms and conditions as the regulations prescribe.

From an examination of that particular clause, it is very clear it does not cover the concern of the public and the business community in Canada with respect to what happens to their business activities in the event of mail stoppage.

The clause provides that the corporation "may", not "must", in its determination decide whether the steps are necessary and in the interest of the public.

I urged the minister to split the provisions in Subclauses (1) and (2) so that it would be very clear that the operative part of the clause was not designed to permit the corporation to insist upon an intervention in the affairs of common carriers to seize up the assets of common carriers and use them at their pleasure. I submit the arguments I advanced have not been met by the provisions of this clause.

May I call it six o'clock?

• (1800)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): No, I do not want to recognize the hon. member calling it six o'clock because his time for intervention has ceased. I have been trying to indicate that to him by giving various little signals. I do want to recognize the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid), who may be attempting to make sure that he has the floor at eight o'clock. That is a courtesy which I can extend to him, if he asks to be recognized.

Mr. John McDermid (Brompton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, I will now call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown will be recognized at eight o'clock provided, of course, that he is in the House at that time.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, if I may. Two Conservative members have already spoken.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The remark made by the hon. member is quite correct. I had not seen the hon. member previously rise, and for that reason I was recognizing hon. gentlemen in that order. Perhaps during the dinner hour the two hon. gentlemen can sort things out to their own satisfaction. If not, the Chair will clear the matter up.

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the debate was interrupted at six o'clock the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) had the floor.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, being an old broadcaster, I should like to bring our television audience and the audience in the galleries today up-to-date on what we are debating, namely; the following motion:

That Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related Acts and to make related amendments to other Acts,—

We are discussing motion No. 1 which is the amendment to Bill C-42 introduced by my colleague for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn).

My concern about Bill C-42 and the motion my colleague has introduced stems from the monopoly the post office seems to want to obtain through Bill C-42. This bill, as probably one of the solutions to the problems we have experienced in the post office, has been held up for a very long time by the post office, its unions, the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) and the government of the day. It has been said that once a Crown corporation has been established a lot of the labour problems, a lot of the mail delivery problems will disappear. The minister assured me when we met a week or so ago, that mail delivery will be available to new areas.

The hopes of the Canadian people are very high for this bill. They hope that once it is passed and a Crown corporation is established to run the post office, things will improve. I, for one, hope those desires come true. I must say that in the last year or so the complaints I have received from my constituents in Brampton-Georgetown regarding the post office have been very significant, and they have increased. The minister gave me an appointment and we discussed this problem. He is hopeful, I am hopeful and we are all hopeful in this House that once the post office becomes a Crown corporation, many of these difficulties will disappear.

If the problems persist, then I think it is fair to say to the Canadian people that they should have an option, and that the post office should not have a monopoly. People should have the freedom of choice about how they want their catalogues and their bills delivered. In my area, Consumers' Gas and the hydroelectric service hand deliver their bills as was touched upon by my colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga South, in the region of Peel the people want to be assured that this can be done if the post office fails them.

I promised to be brief tonight, Mr. Speaker. Since my friend from the New Democratic Party was a little aggravated that he was not recognized before me, and because there were some Tory speakers ahead of him, I promised to be brief. I will be, but there are two points I want to make.

First, I am concerned about small groups such as air cadets, boy scouts and girl guides who, for a small fee, in order to raise funds, will drop off a notice of a meeting of a community or political association in a community. I am concerned that they might get into a lot of trouble with the post office if we do not adopt motion No. 1, which is an amendment to define a "letter". This would allow groups such as these, and public utilities, to deliver their own material. I know in my area the youth groups participate in this service for community organizations which are then assured that delivery is made on time. I would hate to see young people deprived of that privilege.

I would ask the minister tonight to give an explanation to the House why, in good sense, he would not accept this amendment introduced by the hon. member for Mississauga South. I think it makes great sense. Surely the remarks of the hon. member for Yorth North (Mr. Gamble), the hon. member for Mississauga South and myself have convinced the minister that this amendment should be incorporated in the bill. It does not take anything away from the bill and it would assure those groups of a privilege they have enjoyed in Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Wright).

Mr. Parker: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) on a point of order.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, it was identified that I would be the next speaker. I did step aside for the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member for Calgary North agrees, I will recognize the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to speak on behalf of the New Democratic Party on this amendment introduced by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). The committee sat long and tedious hours. Sometimes there were three committee meetings in a day to discuss the matters put forward in this bill. As a member of that committee, I resent the fact that we have to go through all this again tonight in order to discuss this amendment.

I should like to comment on the definition of postal mail. The fact of the matter is that we were lobbied by large groups, some of which sat through every committee meeting. For example, courier service delegations sat through those committee meetings hour after hour. We had Bell Telephone, CP Telecommunications; some 20 groups bringing in a joint resolution requesting that certain things be done. The right wing element of the Conservative Party fought for the courier services and the telecommunications groups, trying to make it wide open so they could get in and take the cream off the top; the profitable parts of the post office.

● (2010)

Mr. Parker: The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), the former postmaster general, had to fight off his own party members on some of the things he knew must be included in this bill. He knew we must bring this bill forward.

The Tories do not want the Post Office to have a monopoly on the mail. The Tories agree with the president Mr. R. M. MacIntosh of The Canadian Bankers' Association who came to the committee meetings. In the committee hearing on December 4, the president said:

We still need the post office for the really remote locations, but the rest we can service ourselves.

Is it not wonderful to cream off the top and say the Post Office and the taxpayers can serve other areas? They want the people of Canada to pay the cost of servicing their own locations which are unprofitable, while big businesses from the United States, our huge banks and telecommunications carriers skim off the rest of the market for themselves.

An hon. Member: That's free enterprise.

Mr. Parker: We reject this idea 100 per cent. We favour the legislation as it presently stands. If somebody wants to use a courier, then we will insist they pay a price greater than that charged by the Post Office. This will ensure that the truly urgent mail is sent by courier, if need be, but that these large U.S. firms do not steal money from taxpayers' pockets by skimming the market in our big cities, leaving the Post Office with the dregs.

I should point out that this amendment is not supported by all the Tories. The critic for that party, the member from Vancouver South, understands that we cannot kill the Post Office. Unfortunately, he has no control over the extreme right wing of his party. Men such as the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) and the hon. member for Mississauga South fought constantly with the official critic in committee. In fact, they spent more time fighting between themselves than they did speaking on the bill. Now the hon. member for Vancouver South has lost control of this right wing element and the right wingers are having a field day in the House.

We completely and totally disagree with this amendment. We urge quick and speedy defeat of it. If the Post Office is to continue to exist in Canada, it must be given the resources to do the job. Clearly, the members proposing this amendment would prefer to see a Post Office controlled by the U.S. dominated courier industry operating in Toronto and Montreal while the rest of the country goes without postal service altogether. We reject that kind of amendment. Therefore, we will not be supporting it.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in following the member for CUPW, I would like to speak briefly about the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn).

When the minister was before the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, he indicated to the committee he would be proposing this exact amendment now proposed by my colleague. As you will remember, concern was expressed by many members of various industries about the fact that the bill, as it is presently worded, gave the government great discretionary power to move into areas, to extend its monopoly in those areas without the agreement of Parliament.

The concern which members of the industry had was not that expressed by the hon. member who spoke a few moments ago. Rather, their concern was that the government would have the ability to move in, overnight in the dark, by regulation, acting alone, to extend its monopoly to take over elements of the telecommunication industry, which previously had been operating independently.

This is why representatives of various industries came before the standing joint committee to make recommendations that changes must be made to ensure that the monopolistic power of the Post Office could not be extended simply by regulation. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments expressed concern even about the proposal made by the minister with regard to defining what is a letter. We felt the government's proposal should go further. We felt it was essential the industry and Canadians know that the government would not take that power to extend the Post Office monopoly, simply acting by regulation.

When hon. members recognize that other portions of the bill gave the government the power to move into areas where the Post Office currently is not at all involved, for example, in the electronic or optical transmission of mail, it was very clear then that what we would have with a postal Crown corporation, under the bill as initially worded, was a situation in which the monopoly would be extended further and further, beyond the delivery of the traditional forms of mail, into the newly developing technology on which Canadians will increasingly be relying to deliver messages from one place to another in this country.

What my colleague from Mississauga was trying to do in proposing this amendment was fill a gap left by the minister. When the minister left our committee, he left it with the impression that he would be moving this amendment himself. Yet when he got to the other committee, I believe it is the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, to which the bill had been referred, he dropped his intention to propose this amendment. He felt that it would be better for the bill to be mute in this area.

The concern of our committee was that the industry and Canadians would both be better served if there was greater certainty as to what exactly were the intentions of the Post Office. This is why we felt that first it was essential the legislation be much more specific in terms of what the powers of the government would be; and, second, that it curb the ability of the government to act simply by regulation to extend the Post Office monopoly. What members on this side of the House are asking tonight is that the government give assurance to Canadians that it will put its cards on the table, that it will make it clear what the plans are it has for the Post Office and that the government will insure that if there are to be major changes in the way in which the Post Office is to function in the future, the government will come back to Parliament to ask for authorization for those changes. The government should make it very explicit to Parliament at such time that this is what the government intends to do, rather than simply asking for carte blanche to change the operations of the Post Office in future as it sees fit.

As hon. members can imagine, the ability in the bill as it was originally worded, for the post office simply to sweep in under its monopoly the whole of the telecommunications industry in Canada was a matter of great concern, not just within the industry, but to any Canadian who believes the whole function of Parliament is to defend the rights of Canadians, and the responsibility of Parliamentarians is to know what they are voting for at the time they pass enabling legislation. It is simply not good enough for Parliament to pass broad enabling powers for the government, allowing it to do things, by regulation, which have never been discussed in Parliament at the time the legislation was first considered. This is why our committee felt the government should have gone further than in fact it did.

I would like to refer hon. members of the House tonight to the sixth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Statutory Instruments. Unfortunately, there has been very little discussion of the report in the House of Commons. It will be useful as we discuss the amendment moved by my colleague from Mississauga to recognize what the standing committee recommended. On the first page of the sixth report, in paragraph 4, we read:

> The Postmaster General has tabled amendments before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee which would provide a statutory definition of "letter" and a specific exclusion from the Corporation's monopoly of "letters in the course of transmission by electronic or optical means".

Then the committee quoted what the amendment stated. Incidentally, it is identical to what has been moved tonight by the hon. member for Mississauga South.

The committee report goes on as follows:

> These amendments have allayed many, but not all, of the fears of the telecommunications carriers. By reference to the definition of "transmit" in clause 2 of the Bill, the exclusion proposed by the Postmaster General in the new clause 15(1)(h) amounts to an exclusion for letters in the course of their sending from one place to another by electronic or optical means. The Postmaster General was clear in his evidence before your Committee that he wished to maintain the postal monopoly over what are commonly called hard copies before and after transmission of any information or messages by electronic or optical means. However, he spoke in terms of letters as traditionally understood and not in terms of "letters" as they will now be defined.

By that, the committee was referring to the definition which is proposed by my colleague tonight.

The report also reads in part:

> It appears that the actual electronic transmission of information cannot be a letter at all because it has no mass. However, it must be assumed to be included within the new definition of "letter" because it will be specifically excluded from the monopoly over letters by the proposed Clause 15(1)(h). Your Committee notes that there are misgivings amongst telecommunications carriers about the precise effect of Clause 15(1)(h) on their ability to provide a fast and efficient service, including messenger delivery of hard copy, to those who wish to transmit messages by what is popularly known as electronic mail. Just when electronic or optical transmission begins and ends seems to be uncertain. However, as Clause 15 stands outside your Committee's terms of reference, it cannot deal further with this issue.
> 5. The proposed definition of "letter" to be inserted in Clause 2 of the Bill is governed by a test of mass. It is cast in terms of "mailable matter" having a mass of no more than five hundred grams. Such a mass limit will catch many time-critical items commonly sent by courier service or other speedy means, including vaccines; pharmaceutical and optical prescriptions; medical tests, including radioactive isotopes for cancer tests; mini-cassettes and so on. The definition will encompass all manner of legal, accounting, financial and data processing material and negotiable instruments and a great variety of small packets, unless they can be classified as "goods", a term which is not defined in the Bill although it appears in paragraph (a) of the definition of "letter".
> Until regulations appear defining "mailable matter", it will not be known what precisely will be included within the statutory definition of "letter". This lack of clarity will produce uncertainty and apprehension in the courier and parcel delivery industries. The position of courier services under the Bill is a question of significance. It lies beyond your Committee's terms of reference but is deserving of study by the Committee properly charged with the carriage of the Bill. The term "goods" could be defined in such a way as to include many items now carried by couriers. Perhaps Clause 15(1)(e) could be redrafted to provide a certain basis for courier services dealing with urgent or time-critical matters having a mass of five hundred grams or less. The regulation-making power to be conferred by paragraph (e) of the proposed definition of "letter" could be used to solve many problems and to alleviate many concerns. In its Fourth Report for this Session (Statutory Instruments No. 10) your Committee recommended that regulations should be tabled and studied by the appropriate Standing Committees at the same time as they are studying the Bills which provide for their making. Without the regulations to be made under paragraph (e) of the definition of "letter" the definition of "letter" and the proposed exclusions in clause 15(1) are not sufficiently specific.

What the committee was talking about was the definition then proposed by the Postmaster General, then dropped by the Postmaster General and subsequently proposed by my colleague from Mississauga. Essentially our concern was this. We felt that the government had a responsibility to justify any request it was making to Parliament for regulation-making authority which could broaden the scope of the government's monopoly.

The issue is not whether there is going to be cream skimming by competitors of the Post Office. We on this side of the House believe that the Post Office can be an efficient corporation, can compete and can provide a service for Canadians second to none in the world.

Each of us, particularly those with rural constituencies, have people working in their Post Offices who are tremendously dedicated, who want nothing more than to see Canadians with first-class service, one that is second to none anywhere in the world. Our position has not been that there should be cream skimming by others, but rather that the Post Office should be efficient in its operations and that it should not be able to extend its traditional monopoly into areas where traditionally it has not operated and where it has not justified to Parliament the need for extending that monopoly.

Members on this side of the House support the decision made by the Post Office to move into electronic mail. It is a positive decision, one which will obviously improve the services provided to Canadians in the future. There is no reason the Post Office should not modernize, and update its methods of delivery and transmitting messages from one Canadian to another.

Where we break with the members to our left is on the question of monopoly and whether Canadians should be coerced into using a postal service if they choose to use another service which in their judgment gives them better value for the money, or which provides a service which is not available from the Post Office. We on this side of the House say the Post Office should compete. We say go ahead, move into those new areas where traditionally the Post Office has not been but where it is necessary to be involved with a modern delivery service if we are to meet the needs of Canadians. However, at the same time the Post Office moves into those areas, let us not use the definition section of the bill or the regulation-making authority within the bill to extend the traditional Post Office monopoly to new areas never justified to Parliament. That is the fight members on this side have been making on this bill. Indeed, it is the concern expressed within the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments.

There are a number of motions to amend the bill before the House tonight. I do not want to protract my remarks this evening and prevent us from getting to other motions that have been made, and which are equally important, but I want to indicate that I support the motion by my colleague. I feel it would be in the interest of Canada and the Post Office if the motion proposed by my colleague was adopted by this House.

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise this evening to support Motion No. 1 relating to the Post Office in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). I want to comment briefly on the remarks by the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) who suggested that many members of the Conservative Party are against the Post Office becoming a Crown corporation. Nothing could be further from the truth. I am at odds with the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke when we consider the types of things he wants the Post Office to do.

It is fair to say that most of us recognize the change in service of the Post Office over the last 15 to 20 years. We think this will be a tremendous improvement in the Post Office. Perhaps a little later I can relate directly to that.

On May 16 of last year, I presented a motion under Standing Order 43:

> That the Postmaster General and this government direct the Post Office to immediately commence regular mail service in all areas of Calgary North where delivery has been lacking for a period longer than 60 days.

As is usual, the Liberals all voted against that motion, even though there are many members on all sides of the House who are aware of the deplorable conditions within the Post Office. In my riding the situation is even more desperate than in others.

On June 5 I asked the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) when service would be improved in Calgary North. I pointed out that there are 4,000 homes in Calgary North without any type of postal service. There are very few ridings with 4,000 homes without any type of postal service.

During the adjournment debate on June 26, I discussed some of the intricate problems in the postal system in Calgary North. I pointed out to the Postmaster General some of the ridiculous situations that were evident. To briefly review those situations, there are four areas in Calgary North: Beddington Heights, Ranchlands, Edgemont and Hawkesworth. They are all without any type of postal service. Those people have to travel up to five miles a day to get their mail. I did not receive a satisfactory reply in the adjournment debate.

The situation is briefly this, and this was related to the Postmaster General, the Deputy Postmaster General, the regional postmaster, all individuals within the Post Office in a position of authority. It has to do with the high costs. We prepared an analysis and we convinced them, at least I think we did, that it would cost a quarter million dollars to correct the situation in Calgary North. It was costing more than that for the gas which the residents of Calgary North were using just to go to and from the Post Office.

Unfortunately, the Postmaster General has done little. I think we have been very generous with him in that we have not burdened him during this time when he was trying to convert the Post Office with numerous problems creeping up from day to day. When the Post Office becomes a Crown corporation we will not be prepared to stand aside and watch these problems continue. We expect to see some improvement. This relates very well to the area covered by motion No. 1 put forward by the hon. member for Mississauga South. We are very concerned that the community clubs, the department stores and the various community associations which wish to deliver their magazines, bulletins and invoices will still be allowed to do so. This motion is dedicated to that end and we support it very strongly.

There are two main unions involved in the Post Office, the Letter Carriers' Union and CUPW. There is no question that these two unions are at odds with each other, as many of us have related to the Postmaster General. This is something our friends to the left, the NDP, are not prepared to discuss. They are embarrassed by the fact that these two unions are not getting along. There is no question in Calgary North that this is very evident, and the Postmaster General continues to ignore the problem. If we do not include this motion within the parameters of the bill we will be enlarging on the situation since many of these community associations and other volunteer groups will be left high and dry. They will have to rely on the Post Office and they will not have the funds to pay for its services.

I would like to mention briefly the Liberal record with respect to the Post Office. To say that it is sad is an understatement. There have been 14 strikes in the Post Office since 1918. All but three of these have taken place under the Liberal government of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Hopefully, by converting the Post Office into a Crown corporation we will alleviate some of these problems. Certainly, some of these problems relate to the fact that the Post Office labours under three federal departments, the Public Service Commission, the Treasury Board and the Department of Public Works. There is no question in the mind of most people who understand the Post Office that this creates a serious problem. The situation is certainly not made easier by the difficulties which exist between managements and union within the Post Office system.

During the presentation of the budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) left out the figures covering the losses for the Post Office this year. It is estimated that the Post Office will lose between $400 million and $500 million. Somewhere along the line we would like to know how this will be paid for. I believe I am correct when I say that during the committee meetings it was mentioned that the price of mailing a letter will have to rise to as high as 34 cents. We received little response from the Postmaster General with respect to this subject. He seems to think that the costs will all be covered. Will the Post Office be forgiven its debts? Is this how this Crown corporation will be created? The Postmaster General is silent with respect to these questions, and was for most of the discussions in committee. The costs to run the Post Office have been climbing at an astronomical rate.

In the motion before us we are not suggesting that any of the services or revenues of the Post Office be replaced at the present time. I support the motion which is before us tonight. I hope all members of the House will support it. When the bill is voted upon I think all of us will give it due consideration, but we will not consider it in isolation. We need to consider the bill in conjunction with the excellent motions which will be coming before the House in the next couple of weeks.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening very closely to the comments which hon. members have made so far on motion No. 1 aimed at amending the act to establish the Canada Post Corporation by adding the definition of a letter in clause 2. I think it is important to remind hon. members at this time that the question of whether the act ought to include a definition of the word "letter" was debated at length and very seriously when the bill was before the committee.

I must say that the type of intervention just made by the previous speaker does make me a little bit sad because, in fact, he jumped on that opportunity to dwell on several topics which are altogether alien to motion No. 1. I respectfully suggest to him that a general debate on the Post Office has been held on many occasions and that, as recently as this morning, I appeared before a standing committee of the House of Commons where I answered a number of questions having to do with both over-all and specific postal operations in many ridings. Had the hon. member been able to be in attendance this morning, I would have been glad to answer his questions and dead directly with his concerns in his riding. In any event, this amendment introduced by my colleague opposite prompts me to make the following comments.

[English]

The suggestion that "letter" be defined in the bill came from several interests groups which were concerned that by allowing the corporation to define "letter", the Post Office could, in effect, by regulation, define its own monopoly. If such were to occur, these groups argue that such things as telex messages and intra-company letters could be trapped by the monopoly. This is why the solution advanced by many of these concerned parties was to have the term "letter" defined in the bill. I responded in committee by tabling a draft definition which, while being acceptable to many, was not perfect and was not wholly satisfactory for a number of reasons. First, time did not permit the adequate refinement of the definition. Even so, the difficulties in having an appropriate definition of the term "letter" are almost insurmountable. I challenge any member of the committee to come forward with an appropriate definition.

• (2040)

The hon. member who introduced this motion copied the definition I tabled in the committee, indicating it was not a perfect definition.

Mr. Blenkarn: Your definition.

Mr. Ouellet: I have to say that although the hon. member has more or less copied my definition, it is not better today than it was when I first tabled it.

The second reason it was not satisfactory was because, if the definition were in the act, it would be virtually immutable and could not be adjusted to take into account actual operating experience, changes in technology or changes in the marketplace. My draft definition was still under consideration when the committee proceeded to address the immediate legitimate concerns of parties who made representations to our committee by including additional exemptions to the exclusive privilege under clause 15(1) of our legislation. It was decided that as a further measure to protect the public from the corporation expanding its monopoly through regulation it would be a requirement that all regulations be pre-Gazetted. Such a requirement would serve to guarantee that notice be given of any regulation amendment and that there would be mechanisms for the public to express its views to any draft regulations.

I have to point out to hon. members of this House that it was unanimously accepted by the committee that a definition of "letter" in the bill was neither necessary nor desirable. I repeat that it was unanimously accepted in the committee.

Mr. Blenkarn: No, no.

Mr. Ouellet: I invite my colleagues to refer to the minutes of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, Issue No. 41 at page 70.

It therefore follows that by also including in the bill a definition of "letter" at this time there would be two solutions to the same problem, a situation which, I submit, would cast serious doubt on both ideas.

I believe the work of the committee in expanding the exceptions to the exclusive privilege and in building in the mechanism of pre-Gazetting of any regulation dealing with this aspect is the right way to move. The committee accepted the proposal when we dealt with it quite extensively in the committee, and I see no reason at this time to undo what we did so well there.

I appreciate that the hon. member who moved this motion had particularly in mind what would happen to private organizations' using their own people to deliver some messages. I believe we said in the committee, and I repeat this in the House, that any private organization which wants to use its own people to deliver its own messages or its own documentation is free to do so. That has never been forbidden. It is not forbidden by Bill C-42, and we do not contemplate forbidding it in the future.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would permit a question or two with respect to his statement concerning the amendment.

The minister indicated that in Clause 15 of the bill the exemption for permitting people to use their own forces to deliver memos or messages would allow utility companies to use their own forces to deliver invoices and, presumably, allow organizations to use their own members to deliver notices to their members. Is it the minister's suggestion that Clause 15(1)(g) gives that absolute permission?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, if I understand the question of the hon. member correctly, he wants to know if, rather than doing municipal work, employees of municipalities are asked by such municipalities to deliver letters, messages, or—

Mr. Ellis: Hydro bills.

Mr. Ouellet: —bills on their time. I see nothing in this legislation which prevents a private organization from using its own employees to make whatever deliveries it wants. What is at issue is using a private courier or an outside organization to deliver mail instead of using the Post Office.

We say that if a sender believes there is an urgency in the message he wants delivered, he has the option, quite legally, to use a messenger or a private courier to do it, as long as he pays an appropriate fee which we have defined as being a fee for an urgent delivery.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I gather from what the minister says there would be nothing to prevent a hydroelectric power commission in a municipality from having designated people whose total job would be to deliver the invoices of the hydroelectric power commission to consumers. In committee I asked the minister whether a lawyer could deliver his bills, and I do not think I received quite that answer, but can the minister confirm right now that a public utility commission could have people employed to deliver its invoices, that being their job, and that that would not be considered an infringement of the monopoly of the Post Office?

Mr. Ouellet: I recall very well that in the committee we answered the question of the hon. member with respect to a lawyer using his own secretary to deliver his documents. We said if he wants to pay that price, that is his privilege, and he could do it. If a private utility wants to have its employees deliver messages rather than do other work, I think it would be paying a much higher price than the Post Office would be charging.

What I am concerned about is, as I have stated many times, that we are, in one way or another, trying to cream off the good business of the Post Office. If we are consistent in giving this new Crown corporation a chance to perform well, do a good job and provide Canadians with a good service, we should not find ways of depriving this corporation of its normal and natural clientele.

To answer the hon. member's question specifically, let me say that I believe we do not want to see municipalities, gas companies or electrical companies using courier services rather than the Post Office. As regards their use of their own employees, we have stated repeatedly that in carrying out its own business an organization may use its own employees.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I should caution the hon. member that there is a limit to the number of questions which can be accepted in this way.

Mr. Blenkarn: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker, but I think we should try to straighten out this particular issue. Is it the intention of the minister to allow a utility company to employ its own employees to deliver its invoices?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I am not here to tell the utility companies what to do, nor am I in a position to tell them how to deliver their invoices. They could follow a number of routes. We have allowed them three specific routes under this legislation. The simplest route for them to take is to use the Post Office, and it is the cheapest and best way. If they want to use private couriers to do their deliveries they will have to pay a price for doing it this way. If they want to use their own employees, that is another way of doing it. I am not here to tell them which way they should take. I am just here to say that the easiest way is obviously to use the Post Office.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have just one very short question to put to the minister, if he will accept it. The minister has not answered the question I put to him earlier. What about the special interest groups, such as boy scouts, girl guides or air cadets, who deliver messages for, let us say, a ratepayers' group in a certain area or a politician who is calling a meeting in his constituency; what happens to those individuals who in this way can earn a little extra dough so they can carry on their good works in the community? Are they automatically outlawed by this bill, or will they be allowed to carry on as they have in the past?

Mr. Ouellet: I am glad the hon. member is asking this question because it was put to me in committee where I said quite categorically that this will no longer be permitted. If we want to help charitable organizations, there are many ways of doing so, and it should not be done by subsidizing such groups to the detriment of the Post Office.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has recognized a large number of questions and points of order. I would prefer now to recognize the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) because this is not committee of the whole.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, one of the difficulties the minister is encountering is that monopoly and efficiency are not coterminous. Giving the corporation a monopoly will not guarantee good service. As a matter of fact, when I wrote the minister on this point he wrote back saying that a monopoly has provided an assured source of basic revenue which, in turn, achieves economies of a scale that permits affordable rates. It provides a source of basic revenue, but does it provide basic service as required by the people? That is the question which I think thousands, and perhaps millions, of Canadians would like answered. Will they get the Post Office service they deserve and want through this type of monopoly? In his letter, the minister went on to say that it follows, therefore, that without the letter monopoly, higher rates, higher subsidies, lower quality of service, or all of these in some combination, would result. What I fear is that when there is a monopoly, unless there is a definite chain of command and some definite changes made in the structure of the Post Office, we will not get better service than we have today. Simply to change the name and retain the same personnel will not provide better service to the people of Canada.

Today, one of the major difficulties is that the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet), or the head of the Post Office in the civil service, cannot put his finger on the man or woman who is causing the delay. Consequently, they have gradually taken the authority away from regional post offices, until today almost everything is referred to Ottawa. Sometimes it takes months to get an answer.

One person in charge of a regional Post Office told me he had a very inefficient employee whom he wanted to fire, and he should have done so if that employee had done what he had which was alleged. However, he could not fire him because he had to ask permission of Ottawa. The answer came from Ottawa, probably by mail, three months later giving him permission to fire the man. Of course, by that time everybody had forgotten what the man had done. You cannot run a business that way. To simply give a monopoly to a group and to say to them, "You do not have to meet certain standards" is to ask for trouble because if this fails, the people of Canada will certainly not be very happy. They are not happy now with the Post Office service.

I want to make one or two other points which I think should be made. A member of the NDP, the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker), decried the fact that we want to discuss these matters. I tell him that we want to discuss them because our constituents want us to discuss them. People are concerned about the inefficiencies in our Post Office and they want some assurance that these are going to be eradicated. I want assurance that that will be done.

For instance, people who are on workers' compensation—surely members of the NDP will understand this—deserve to receive their cheques on time, and they too have obligations to meet. I checked with the Alberta Compensation Board because several pensioners were not receiving their cheques, and their grocers, their butchers and their milkmen were getting angry. They do not have extra revenue; they do not have bank accounts. They are on partial or total disability pensions. They require their cheques to meet their obligations.

Recently the compensation board indicated that on the fifteenth of every month in the province of Alberta—and I think this is so in other provinces—they mail out cheques. If the fifteenth happens to be a Saturday or Sunday, the cheques are mailed out on the thirteenth or fourteenth.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) has referred twice to my speech. I think I am entitled to a point of order to rectify the situation. We are supposed to be dealing with an amendment with respect to definition. At the time of my comments I stated we were speaking about the definition of "mail". Also the minister stated in the House that it was a unanimous decision of committee to include this wording. I wish the member would stay on the amendment.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. member would not make the same speech twice. This is not a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) raised a point of order concerning relevance to the amendment before us. I listened to the hon. member's point of order, and I invite the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) to note that the item before us is the definition of a letter.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, surely I must have an opportunity to make some illustrations so the hon. member of the NDP will understand. There is no sense in raising points of order; he talked about these matters himself.

The entire Post Office bill is designed to provide people with a mail service. I am dealing with the definition, but I cannot do so by saying definition, definition, definition, as the hon. member of the NDP wants. I am referring to illustrations to show the definition.

As I said before, these cheques are mailed out on the thirteenth and fourteenth of the month if the fifteenth happens to be a Saturday or Sunday. For many years pensioners have been receiving their cheques before the end of the month. Now they are receiving them on the fifth and the sixth of the following month. In fact one chap in Canmore told me that he did not receive his cheque until the eleventh of the following month. Surely the mail service should be better than that.

My point is that there must be a chain of command in order to find out who is responsible. I know it is not the Postmaster General, but somewhere between Edmonton and Canmore there is a hold-up. Certainly this is not doing the Post Office any good.

The old age pension department mails out its cheques on the twenty-first of every month. These cheques are arriving later, later and later. Sometimes it is the fifteenth of the following month before pensioners receive their cheques.

Certainly what the minister was saying about a monopoly and so on was fine, but when the service is inefficient it is time for the monopoly to end. I impress this upon the hon. minister.

I should like to refer to one or two other examples. A letter was mailed in Montreal on February 16. It arrived at its point of destination in Calgary on March 12. Where was it? I travel from Ottawa to Calgary every weekend; it takes me 3.5 hours. If there happens to be some airplane trouble, it can take as much as seven hours, but never 24 days. I could go by bicycle faster than that. It is not efficient.

I would like to refer to another matter which bothers many people. One postmaster in southern Alberta said he was losing half his business because it takes so long to send a letter to Edmonton, to Regina, or any place in the east. It is getting stalled some place. I think the place where it is getting stalled is in the Calgary regional Post Office.

Clause 14(1) of the bill reads as follows:

> Subject to Section 15, the Corporation has the sole and exclusive privilege of collecting, transmitting and delivering letters to the addressee thereof within Canada.

The Post Office should cut the mustard. If it cuts the mustard, no sensible Canadian will pay three times as much to send a letter. Business people do not spend money in that way, unless there is something wrong somewhere. They want the best possible service for every dime they spend.

I should like to refer to one or two other points in connection with this matter. Insurance agents depend upon their letters getting to their clients and receiving their cheques on time. Otherwise, clients do not know whether they are covered by insurance, or the agent will cancel the policy if the premium does not arrive. It is a serious matter. An insurance agent in Turner Valley indicated that half her business disappeared. She had to resort to other means at additional cost in order to stay in business. This is the point I am trying to emphasize. We do not want this exclusive privilege eliminated simply for the fun of it. It is because the Post Office is not cutting the mustard; that is the story. What about the inability to serve one's client? If I am in business, I have a responsibility to my client whether I am in insurance or whatever. If I am an insurance agent who must notify a client that his house or furniture is insured, it is sometimes necessary to convey this message over several miles. It is not always a case of walking down the street, because agents cover large territories. If they cannot notify their clients, their businesses go to rack and ruin because of a third party which makes it impossible for them to do their jobs. If that is the case, why should there not be an alternative? Why should there be an exclusive monopoly? I suggest that is simply to get the cream.

One or two members said that they were not trying to take money away from the Post Office. If the Post Office can do the job, anyone will spend 17 cents or even 30 cents on a letter, rather than $4 for a courier. People must have their letters delivered. If we want an efficient postal service, the chain of command must guarantee that these letters will reach their destinations within reasonable lengths of time.

The sad thing is that small businessmen are affected by the service, not the larger organizations such as Calgary power or Canadian utilities. They can afford other methods, but small independent businessmen can least afford to ride out prolonged mail disruption to the orderly cash flow of their businesses.

England and the United States have made provision for this type of thing. For example, in the United States legislation exempts the delivery of stocks, bonds, insurance documents and similar instruments. This can be done in the United States where the mail service is not undergoing the pains of agony suffered in Canada. Why would it be so wrong to do it here, if it means better service?

If the Post Office can deliver the goods, no one in his right mind would pay extra money for courier service. In the United Kingdom, proposed amendments to the legislation provide exemption for "time sensitive" documents which could include such matters as insurance policies.

The bill will not give satisfaction. There will be continual difficulty and trouble in this country unless we provide an alternative, when the Post Office does not or cannot cut the mustard and deliver the mail within a reasonable time. I think that is the important point we must emphasize today. All we are asking is that the Post Office do its job to move the mail and get it to the place where it is supposed to be within a reasonable time. An assured source of basic revenue does not guarantee better service. The monopoly the hon. minister mentioned will not guarantee better service. As a matter of fact, I am afraid that giving an exclusive monopoly would tend to make some types of employees very careless. They might say, "We have got the monopoly. Why should we care? We do not have to compete. We do not have to cut the mustard any more. We have got the monopoly as it is." That attitude is found too frequently in the Post Office today. If it was not for couriers, there would have been a lot more bankruptcies in this country. The point I am making is that an amendment to this section is required. All we are asking the hon. minister to do is to provide an alternative if and when the Post Office does not cut the mustard.

Another point is that during prolonged strikes, such as we have had, we must have some other alternative. There is simply no way of carrying on, or to even ensure that pensioners or people on compensation receive their cheques. The Alberta government, when I happened to be there, had to set up its own courier service in order to get the cheques out. I suppose the Canadian government did the same thing.

Again, what we are asking is that we should give the Post Office every opportunity to cut the mustard, but, if it does not, let us not make this act so exclusively monopolistic that we will then not be able to do anything about it.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the amendment to Bill C-42 we are addressing tonight is of particular interest to me. My father started working for the Post Office in 1951. Of course, when I came along in 1952 I had many a nap on a sack of mail or on a number of bags of mail. One could say that I have grown up with the Post Office business as we know it. I am familiar with a lot of the work which the postal people and staff do. I am familiar with the fact that many of them work hard and seriously do attempt to deliver our mail in an efficient manner and to ensure that all of us get the service we require. They demonstrate a lot of care for people, particularly when we consider places like my riding up in the north country where a lot of people are very dependent on the mail. Some of them, up until recently, have not had TV or radio. Items such as catalogues which arrive on their doorstep are important, significant and mean a great deal in their lives.

I think all of us look forward to the mail. It brings us good news; of course, it brings us bad news as well. We are always familiar with the many problems faced by the department. I am familiar with them, having grown up so close to it: problems with budget, problems with adequate staff, and certainly problems with adequate facilities. All of those problems affect the service, and affect the ability of the staffs in these small Post Offices to carry on their jobs.

There are a number of problems facing the Post Office today. I do not think this is a particularly new situation. In fact, looking back in history, one of the things I have heard is that if it had not been for the Post Office, the Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker's second wife would have been his first wife. So, the Post Office has had these problems for a long period of time. As I have mentioned, they do affect our lives to a great extent.

One of the problems we are certainly faced with today, and one of the reasons this bill must be explored and looked at which has been mentioned tonight, is that the Post Office has to deal with so many different departments of government in order to run efficiently. These include the Public Service Commission, the Treasury Board and public works. We have all heard the expression that there are too many chiefs and not enough Indians. We are familiar with that and the problems it creates. We know the difficulties we are faced with when we must deal with so many different departments. It is impossible to have efficient planning, it is impossible to make efficient decisions, and it is virtually impossible to provide efficient service. Therefore, this is one of the significance and important matters to which this bill addresses itself. We certainly should be looking at it.

Another problem the Post Office has been faced with and I refer to the annual report of the Post Office for 1980, is that if we look at the charts, we will notice that there is a large gap between revenue and the expenditures. The Post Office has been losing money. I understand that one of the goals of Bill C-42 is to face that problem and attempt to make the Post Office financially self-sufficient. At that point we must immediately ask ourselves a number of questions.

In my area, as I have mentioned before, the Post Office is not only a very important part of our business lives, but also our social lives. When one starts talking about financial efficiency, what comes to mind are some of the problems we have been facing in the past that have given us difficulty. We then begin to wonder, when this efficiency comes in, whether the things we have been promised today, the things we have been looking at and working on so hard, will be threatened with cut-offs.

Let me just refer to a few communities in my riding. In the small town of Wembley, a lease has expired. New facilities are needed there. What will happen there? Will that lease not be fulfilled? Will that lease cease to exist? Will those people have to drive 30 miles to the next town to get their mail? Already it has been an on and off situation like a child with a flashlight. One day we might have a lease and the next day we might not.

One could look at the city of Grande Prairie which has been experiencing a tremendous amount of growth. As a result, postal services and facilities have fallen far behind what is needed. There are facilities for a population of maybe 10,000 to 12,000 when, in fact, facilities are needed to service a city population of over 20,000 and a large surrounding area. This is another problem we must consider. In other communities, Grimshaw, McLennan and so on, the problem is always the same. There is a serious shortage of space and facilities. As a result, their service is suffering.

We must consider whether Bill C-42, which would change the Post Office to a Crown corporation would, in effect, or in fact contribute to efficiency, whether it would provide better service and a situation which is greatly improved over the present. The key, of course, is the word "service". We have not been satisfied in the past. Certainly we hope this will work, but we expect to have a number of continuing problems.

In dealing specifically with the motion we are discussing tonight, I want to first refer to the clause which says: "—any item consisting solely of a newspaper, magazine, book or catalogue of goods"—. In our area of the country, we have a number of small newspapers. This seemingly insignificant little clause has a lot of impact on people up there. We have many newspaper people who are greatly affected by the definition of "mail", and the definition of a "letter". In fact, it will determine to a great extent whether they can remain in business, whether their operations will remain viable or they will perhaps be forced to go into bankruptcy or to cease publishing the papers. That is an important industry in our area where three or four small newspapers are faced with serious problems. The motion introduced by my colleague would be a significant factor in helping us address the situation. Even though it may not be significant in the larger sense, in terms of my riding and the smaller newspapers it is a very important facet of the motion.

Subclause (b) is also very significant. We do not have to look very far in any community to see that boy scouts, girl guides, church groups, community groups all depend to a large extent on their ability to deliver flyers of various types and mailings that allow them some sort of revenue for their organizations. The minister has indicated that perhaps that is not so important, but something we tend to forget when we get involved in debating a bill and considering the efficiency and the mechanics of the matter is that people are involved. When we consider the bill in its entirety, one of the matters we must address is service and how it will affect the people in all of Canada.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say I support this motion. I think it has a very significant impact on the bill and certainly will have a significant impact on the future and the public perception of the Post Office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the motion presented by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) let me first pay him tribute. In the time I have had the opportunity to serve with him in the House of Commons, I have found him to be a very active paliamentary and an individual who truly represents the views of his constituents with deep concern for them. I am pleased to support motion No. 1 which is one of twelve before us at report stage of Bill C-42, a bill to transfer the Post Office to a Crown corporation.

Tonight is a night of tributes, Mr. Speaker. I should like to pay tribute to the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) and convey to him my thanks on behalf of the residents of my constituency for allowing us to have additional mail carriers in the various growing areas of the constituency that so badly need them.

Mr. McDermid: What! Why can't I get that in my riding?

Mr. Elzinga: I should like to extend to the minister the gratitude of all those residents who have received additional mail carrier service.

We all hear horror stories about the Post Office. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) have given illustrations of the many difficulties individual constituents face when dealing with the Post Office. I hope that Bill C-42 will alleviate some of these difficulties.

Many sectors of our society rely on the Post Office in the conduct of their business. The small business sector, for instance, relies very heavily on the Post Office in order to develop cash flow. It is important that confidence in the Post Office be restored.

Although I am going to be critical of some aspects of the Post Office, I think it is important that we pay tribute to those individuals who make the Post Office what it is. I should like to pay special tribute to the regional manager in Alberta. On many occasions I have contacted him and he has been most helpful in dealing with the problems of individual constituents or the problems of district post offices. Our many mail carriers perform a very vital function, as the hon. member for Peace River pointed out. I should also like to pay tribute to the local postmasters.

Prior to making the Post Office a Crown corporation I hope the government will lift the freeze on mail carrier service. This drastically effects areas that have experienced high growth rates. In my constituency there are a good many high growth areas outside the city of Edmonton. According to Treasury Board regulations the Post Office is an essential service. Individuals who pay taxes to the Government of Canada deserve this essential service and I hope the government will see to it that taxpayers receive the mail carrier service they are paying for.

Some hon. members have indicated they think we in this party oppose this legislation. The record will show that when we formed the government and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) was postmaster general we introduced legislation similar to this, and today we are more than happy to endorse a bill to turn the Post Office into a Crown corporation.

If I were the head of a Canadian government and wanted by one single act to win back public confidence in Parliament and government, I would take every step necessary to restore the postal system to its former efficiency. Complaints about inefficiency in the Post Office are too numerous to be dismissed. Each of us has an obligation to represent constituents in the House of Commons and I am sure each of us has a list of examples of mismanagement in the postal service.

This is not an attack on the efficiency and dedication of smaller Post Offices and rural carriers in Canada. All of us can testify to many acts of kindness and neighbourliness performed without fanfare by numerous rural mail drivers and couriers. What bothers me is that despite increased mechanization and rates of all classes of mail, the delays are getting longer. The hon. member for Bow River gave illustrations of individuals who receive their pension cheques late and my constituency secretary has often complained that her cheque for carrying out such a vital service arrives days late.

In addition to public frustration, many business people are taking drastic action; they have stopped using the Post Office facilities, transferring their patronage to the new private courier service which has sprung up to fill the vacuum. A front page story in The Financial Post says that "millions of dollars of potential Post Office revenue is being diverted to private parcel and letter carriers because these companies can offer the one thing the Post Office apparently cannot; reliability." What a sad abdication of responsibility by a once proud service which 50 years ago inaugurated air mail service down the mighty MacKenzie River delta because the horses and dog sleds took too long.

The Post Office used to rank with the armed forces and the Department of Transport as a basic function of government, a visible and tangible return for our taxes. Although breaking even was a goal of the Post Office, it was never a primary obligation. As citizens we expected service, paid for in part when we bought postage stamps, the balance coming from general revenues of the government. I cannot believe there are not thousands of dedicated postal employees who have a sense of duty and want to get the mail to its destination. Unhappily, their ethic is not shared by all their colleagues. It is both sad and paradoxical that in an age when almost anything seems possible, a basic right of citizenship, an efficient postal system, is beyond the competence of our government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on motion No. 1 in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn).

All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11) the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

• (2130)

It is at this point that perhaps the Chair should bring to the attention of hon. members a procedural difficulty with the bill as amended and reported by the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

The bill was reported by the committee with an amendment to Clause 6, increasing the board of directors from seven to nine.

It is obvious that one of our most basic and fundamental procedures is that only a minister of the Crown may originate legislation which proposes a charge upon the revenue and this can be done only when accompanied by a recommendation from the governor general. Indeed, amendments made in committee cannot go beyond the terms of the original recommendation. The amendment which was adopted by the committee offends the financial initiative of the Crown and, therefor, I must rule it unacceptable.

Motion No. 2 standing in the name of the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) to all intents and purposes has the same effect as the amendment I have just ruled unacceptable and this motion is accompanied by the appropriate Royal recommendation. I will now propose motion No. 2 to the House which is as follows:

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-42, to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related Acts and to make related amendments to other Acts, be amended in Clause 6 by striking out line 45 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"man, the President and nine other directors".

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise only to comment. I know that my friend will agree with me that what your Honour has said is, of course, appropriate and proper, because that is the rule. However, I would like to advise the House, as my friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) knows, this particular motion was moved by myself at committee with the consent and concurrence of the Postmaster General.

I want to record my appreciation to the House and to the Postmaster General for having introduced this motion and for now having it in a position which complies with the rules.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, we supported the amendment set forth by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) in committee and we also recommend that it be supported here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

Motion agreed to.

If hon. members will permit me a moment, I would like to give them the benefit of the Chair's grouping for the remaining motions. Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5, 8, 9, 10 and 11 seem to be procedurally acceptable and could be debated and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 6 and 7 are similar in part and should be debated together with a vote on motion No. 6 disposing of motion No. 7.

Motion No. 12, standing in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), the effect of which is to dissolve the corporation, based on Parliament sitting or not sitting in a particular year on a specific number of days, seems to be out of order on the ground that it goes beyond the scope of the bill.

The long title of the bill reads:

An act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related Acts and to make related amendments to other acts.

I refer the hon. member to Citation 773(1) of Beauchesne's fifth edition which reads as follows:

An amendment is out of order if it is irrelevant to the bill, beyond its scope—

For that reason, regrettably I cannot accept the hon. member's motion.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. You are suggesting that the motion is out of order because under Beauchesne it goes beyond the scope of the act. But we have to take a look at what the act says. The title of the act is "Bill C-42, An act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts."

This act establishes a Post Office corporation. All this particular amendment does it to provide that the Post Office corporation's life terminates in five years.

This is vital. This is precisely what the act is all about. How this amendment can be out of order on the basis of your Beauchesne's citation is certainly beyond me and beyond—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call to the attention of the hon. member that this is a decision of the Chair, and the decision cannot be appealed.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-42, to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, be amended in Clause 10,

(a) by striking out lines 26 and 27 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) The board may appoint and fix the"

(b) by adding immediately after line 29 at page 6 the following new subsection:

"(3) The salaries fixed by the Board pursuant to Subsection (2) shall not exceed such amount as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council for the Corporation."

He said: Mr. Speaker, you read the wording of the amendment which I proposed concerning this motion. Perhaps it might be useful to bring to the attention of the House, in explaining the need for this particular amendment, how Clause 10(2) reads at the present time. It is brief, and is as follows:

The board may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, appoint and fix the salary of such number of vice-presidents as it considers necessary.

The effect of the motion which I am moving tonight, if we are to amend the Post Office Act, would be first of all to strike out that particular subsection; in other words, the provision which says that the governor in council should be required to approve the appointment and the salaries of various vice-presidents. The reference to the governor in council should be taken out. Then we would include a new clause which would specify that the governor in council would have the right to fix a maximum remuneration to be paid to vice-presidents of the Crown corporation.

It is probably a matter of some concern to members of the House to ask why is it necessary that we make this amendment. As hon. members will remember, under the Clark government we proposed a Crown corporation omnibus bill which was designed to bring into place a regime for accountability in financial management for Crown not just for the Post Office, but for all Crown corporations for which the federal government has responsibility. We had counted over 400 Crown corporations and there were a number more we believed existed but had not been able to locate at that time. We felt it essential to bring in an omnibus bill which would come to grips with the problems of management of Crown corporations and to try to bring into place some generalized rule by which all Crown corporations would be expected to abide.

That particular bill was introduced because of the fact there were numerous incidents which had taken place in the management of Crown corporations. They burst into the attention of the public because of decisions which had been made or actions taken which were embarrassing to the government, costly to the taxpayer and of great concern to Canadians. Consequently the Lambert commission, the public accounts committee and the Auditor General all expressed concern about the way in which Crown corporations were being run and the fact that the regime for accountability of Crown corporations was not adequate.

This is why within six months of assuming office the Clark government introduced in Parliament a bill which was designed to regularize the proceedings for Crown corporations. It was to ensure that Crown corporations, be they the Post Office or other Crown corporations, would have a regime of accountability and a regime of management which was standardized, available to all Canadians to see and which could be justified to the Canadian people.

We felt it was important that Crown corporations conduct their activities in a way which would win the confidence of Canadians, which would satisfy Canadians that their money was being well used and that the Crown corporations which were operating on a business basis were also being operated on a businesslike basis. This is why Bill C-27 was introduced on November 26, 1979.

When it came to the responsibilities of boards of directors, what we did was to spell out once and for all; first, the regime of accountability for these boards of directors in running their Crown corporations and coming back to justify their activities to Parliament and the executive; and second, we said that having built that regime and created a system of accountability and a system of management for Crown corporations which was acceptable to Canadians and would meet the concerns of the Auditor General, the Public Accounts Committee and the Lambert report, it was the responsibility of the boards of Crown corporations to manage the day-to-day affairs of those corporations. It was not desirable to have interference by the politicians in the day-to-day management of Crown corporations if they were to be run on a businesslike basis.

The reason the government has proposed this Crown corporation legislation to turn the Post Office, which is currently a department of government, into a Crown corporation is they believe it is necessary that the Post Office be run on a much more businesslike basis. The form for a Crown corporation and form of organization is one which would allow a much better system of management within the Post Office. It would allow the managers within the Post Office to do their job free of interference, free of a regime of accountability which at the present time is so fractured as to make it difficult to have any sense of coherence or orderliness about the running of the day-to-day activities of the Crown corporation.

We on this side have indicated that while we have concerns about various elements of this bill, the concept of a Crown corporation for the Post Office is one we have long supported. Having accepted that principle, we believe it is essential that the board of the new Crown corporation should be charged with the responsibility of the day-to-day management of the corporation. The board should have the right and the responsibility to run the corporation and to make business decisions. Otherwise they have no function.

If we were to take that away from the board and say that the governor in council, the cabinet or the postmaster general is to make the day-to-day decisions for the board of the Crown corporation, then it is logical to ask what in fact is the function of the board if it is going to have that sort of interference on a day-to-day basis.

As the bill is worded at the present time, the board would in theory have the right to appoint vice-presidents of the Crown corporation. In theory, it would have the right to set the salaries of its vice-presidents at a level which was acceptable. However, that decision to appoint and to set the salary for a vice-president at a particular level would have to be justified. They would have to win the approval of the Governor in Council, namely the cabinet.

What is of concern is how this would operate on a day-to-day basis. What concerned the Crown corporation's task force, which laboured over this whole issue of the structure of a Crown corporation, has been labouring over it for several years and brought recommendations to government, which were accepted by the Clark cabinet and led us to introducing the legislation, was the practical application of the wording found in the Crown corporation bill here.

What will happen is the board of directors of the Crown corporation will find themselves hamstrung. They could not make business decisions about the management and the Crown corporation without the approval of the governor in council. The authority to hire and set salaries on a defacto basis would reside with the politicians, the governor in council and the cabinet. Appointments would be made nominally by the board of the Crown corporation but in fact would be made by the cabinet.

This is of concern to Canadians and was of concern to those members of the Crown corporation's task force and the Clark government. We believe it is important that Canadians have confidence in the management of Crown corporations. It is essential that the board be charged with the responsibility for choosing people who could run the corporation on a business-like basis and receive salaries commensurate with the responsibilities they are asked to undertake.

If we have the governor in council, which is the cabinet, making these appointments through the back door, we will find the government patronage machinery going into effect. Instead of having people appointed as vice-presidents who are of a calibre we would expect in the private business world, after the approval of the board of directors, we would have defeated candidates or friends of the government appointed to what could be fairly lucrative jobs as vice-presidents of Crown corporations.

That is no basis for starting off this new Crown corporation if we want Canadians to have confidence in the activities of Crown corporations and if we want peace within the Crown corporation. If I were working in the Post Office today and interested in having a senior job within the new Post Office Crown corporation, I would be very concerned about the provision in this bill, as it stands today, which would allow the government to make patronage appointments to vice-president positions.

Either the board will be charged with the responsibility of running the Post Office on a business-like basis or we will go back to the bad old days of patronage within the Post Office where the party in power does the hiring and rewards its friends. We do not want to see that happen. We want to see the Post Office run on an efficient and business-like basis.

Quite properly members could suggest that the governor in council have a right to look at the remuneration being given the individual to ensure it is not excessive. It could make sure it does not create a situation where the government is leading all other sectors, with a difference that is ridiculous. When we introduced the Crown corporation legislation and what we propose in the motion before the House to amend the bill, is that the governor in council should be allowed the right to set a ceiling beyond which the pay for vice-presidents will not be allowed to go.

That is entirely appropriate. It should be done publicly and in a way which does not interfere with the day-to-day operations of the Post Office. If they want to set a ceiling, the amendment would propose to allow that to happen. However, if they want to get in and tinker and appoint a particular individual at a particular salary, we believe that is wrong. It should be the right of the board of the Crown corporation to make that management decision.

I do not want to protract discussion on this amendment. It is straightforward and is consistent with the Crown corporation bill introduced by the Clark government. On a number of occasions I have asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) whether the government has the intention of introducing a Crown corporations bill which would be an omnibus bill similar to the one introduced by the Clark government.

On several occasions he promised that would be done. However, well over a year after having been sworn in as minister, we have yet to see any tangible evidence whatsoever of seriousness on the part of the government or an interest in bringing in the omnibus Crown corporation legislation.

When we put questions to the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) in committee and at other times with regard to odious provisions in the Crown corporation bill for the Post Office which fly in the face and are directly contrary to the policy adopted in the Crown corporations omnibus bill proposed by the Clark government, the answer was that he does not know. He does not want to pre-judge what is going to be an omnibus Crown corporations bill.

If ever an omnibus Crown corporation bill is brought back to Parliament, and the minister is arguing he would prefer to have things remain the way they are now, and if the omnibus bill is to be brought in later, then we can amend this Post Office Act at that time and change the provisions then.

If we are concerned about getting the Post Office off to a good start we should begin properly. We should commence by following principles which are sound business principles, which will instil confidence in the public in the Crown corporation; principles which will make it easier for members of the Post Office today to have confidence in the way in which the Crown corporation will be managed and principles which will assure the people who will be asked to sit on the board of directors of the Crown corporation that they will have a job to do and be able to do it. If we are not to start on that proper footing then how can we expect Canadians, the employees of the Post Office and the board of directors of the Post Office to have confidence in the work we have done here?

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Clark government had introduced legislation which was an omnibus bill, the broad principles of which members of the government have stated they support. The government says it has made no decision to overturn those principles. The onus then is on the Postmaster General, if he wishes to depart from those principles, to justify why it is desirable that the cabinet, the politicians, be able to interfere in these day-to-day business decisions of Crown corporations. Why is it desirable to undercut the board of directors? Why is it desirable to have the cabinet, in essence, hire the vice-presidents of the corporation and, in essence, set their salaries? That is what this provision would allow. If none of these decisions could be made without the approval of the governor in council it would mean this power devolves back to the cabinet instead of residing with the board of directors.

I have heard no justification from the government, certainly not from the Postmater General, that public interest requires that provision, which was put into the Crown corporations omnibus bill after considerable thought, after trying to respond to the concerns of the Public Accounts Committee, the Lambert Commission and the Auditor General, be struck down, and no justification for the suggestion that instead we should have a provision which would allow political patronage tinkering in the management of the Post Office.

In the absence of any such justification I think it is incumbent upon the House and the government to accept the motion I am proposing tonight. It is designed to do nothing more than ensure that the Crown corporation functions on a businesslike basis, and to ensure that the public and the employees of the Post Office have confidence in the decisions which are made in the appointment of senior executives of that corporation. The employees and the public are entitled to no less. I think the government, if it is concerned about building that kind of confidence, should be prepared to accept the motion I am proposing tonight.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. At one time in this country the Post Office, Her Majesty's mail service, was one of the finest institutions in this country. Everyone was proud of their Post Office and of the service it provided to Canadians. Unfortunately, today, it bears the brunt of jokes across this land.

If the government is serious about developing the Post Office into a Crown corporation so that it provides reliable service for Canadians, of which they can once again be proud, then the question of accountability is very important. In the amendment, motion No. 3, presented by my colleague, this concept is most important. It is one at which we would take a long, hard look.

Rumours are flying around that a certain gentleman from the city of Toronto who ran the transit commission there for many years, a former deputy minister in the provincial government, will be taking over the Post Office. Speaking on my own behalf, and not as a spokesman for any party, I hope that is true because I know of this man's ability. I know he would do an excellent job. I also know he would want to run the Post Office, the Crown corporation, as a legitimate business. He would not want the political interference which could very well take place if this amendment is not accepted.

For heaven's sake, if the Post Office is to be turned into a Crown corporation then let it operate as an independent business. If the government wishes to set guidelines, that is fine. But do not ask someone of the quality of this man to come to the government in order to ask permission to hire this individual and pay him that amount of money. Let him work within the guidelines set out by the government. Let him run the corporation as a business.

The presentation made by my colleague who introduced this motion was very well stated. I want to make this point most emphatically. Accountability is probably the most important aspect of this legislation—accountability to the people. If the aspect of political appointments to senior positions within the Post Office is brought in then that accountability is completely shot. Let the new president run this corporation within certain guidelines. I ask hon. members to accept this very well thought out proposal as introduced by my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty).

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I would say very briefly in reply to the comments made by the two hon. members who have just spoken on the amendment that the Canada Post Corporation will be included in Schedule C of the Financial Administration Act, which means that the government and Parliament will clearly be interested for a while longer in seeing how the new corporation can operate, at least during the first few years.

In particular, it is to be expected that the government will have to make up for the operating deficit of the corporation, at least for a while. It is only after a certain time that we can hope to see the corporation become self-sufficient. Therefore, it is not improper, as such, that appointments should be made by the governor in council, at least for a while after the corporation starts its operation. In fact, the directors of several corporations included in Schedule C of the Financial Administration Act are appointed by the governor in council.

Moreover, the member who introduced motion No. 3 seemed to suggest that we should prevent the board of directors of the corporation from being one day able to manage the affairs of the corporation. For his information, I shall read very quickly paragraph 10(1) of the bill which states the following: The board of directors of the Post Corporation shall direct and manage the affairs of the corporation and may for such purposes exercise all the powers and perform all duties of the corporation. The board therefore has all the powers which the hon. member wanted the board and the corporation to have. The government is in fact giving to the board of directors full power to manage the new corporation.

I believe that the outline law on Crown corporations which will be introduced later on by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), will alleviate to a large extent the concerns expressed by the hon. member. I do not think that there is anything else for me to add, and I believe that this motion should not be retained. I suggest that it be defeated.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

THE CONSTITUTION—EFFECT OF CHARTER OF RIGHTS ON ABORTION PROVISIONS IN CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, on March 23, 1981 my question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) was phrased as follows:

It is my understanding that the government interprets the charter of rights in the proposed constitutional resolution as it pertains to the question of abortion as being natural.

What assurance can the minister give that Section 7 of the charter of rights will not be construed so as to make abortion, in the early phase of pregnancy, essentially a matter of privacy and thus protected from the sanction of the Criminal Code?

The Minister of Justice answered:

—the question has been debated at length in the committee. I have stated the position of the government in this matter, that the question of abortion is dealt with in the Criminal Code and in no way can the charter be used to interfere with the actions of this Parliament in relation to the Criminal Code and abortion.

My purpose in bringing this question to the attention of the Minister again is twofold. Incidentally, I want to correct the misspelling in Hansard of the key word in the question, changing it from "natural" to "neutral". This error cannot be corrected in the copies of Hansard.

However, the real question is this: has a woman, in early pregnancy, the right to seek abortion under the provisions of Section 7 of the proposed constitutional resolution, claiming invasion of her liberty so as to bypass the Criminal Code of Canada? Under the present Criminal Code abortion is illegal unless certain statutory conditions are fulfilled. The following question must be answered: Does Section 7 of the constitutional resolution in essence pave the way for abortion on demand as did the decision of the supreme court of the United States in Roe et al vs. Wade in 1973? In that historic supreme court of the United States decision, with two out of seven judges dissenting, the abortion laws of Texas and other states were struck down.

The reasoning of the court was as follows: under the constitution of the United States individual liberty was guaranteed. The court ruled that the concept of liberty included the concept of privacy and that the concept of privacy makes abortion in the early phase of pregnancy essentially a private matter and not a matter on which the state would enact a penal sanction. The court reached this decision only after making an arbitrary ruling that an unborn child has never been recognized in law as a person in the whole sense. In other words, the unborn child was not a human being and had no rights.

In drawing a comparison between possible decisions of the supreme courts of Canada and those of United States courts one must keep in mind the following considerations: First, there is a similarity between the fourteenth amendment of the United States constitution and Section 7 of the proposed constitutional resolution; second, that in the United States courts the unborn child is not considered a human or a person until born; and third, that the Supreme Court of Canada has a tendency to follow the line of reasoning adopted by United States courts in many of their adjudications—for example, Dehler v. Ottawa Civic Hospital.

Once these facts are recognized, then the fear exists that if the Supreme Court of Canada in its wisdom follows the somewhat unrealistic reasoning of the United States court, Section 7 of the proposed constitutional resolution could be interpreted as interfering with the right of liberty of the mother, and on constitutional grounds the remedy of abortion could be upheld by the court and abortion on demand constitutionally authorized.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki) for bringing this question to the attention of the House. We have answered it several times, but that does not take away from its importance.

On March 5 this point was raised by the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche). I answered at that time, and I refer the hon. member for Hamilton West to the proceedings of that day. I extensively quoted various people who came before the joint committee.

• (2205)

On March 23, the hon. member for Hamilton West asked a question in the House, to which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) said:

—the question of abortion is dealt with in the Criminal Code and in no way can the charter be used to interfere with the actions of this Parliament in relation to the Criminal Code and abortion.

That is still the position of the government. The charter of rights will remain neutral on the position of abortion.

What is very important is that just last week, His Excellency Cardinal Carter put out a release in which he indicated he had received a long and courteous hearing from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). He looked at the opinions of the senior counsel of the Department of Justice and he looked also at another reputable legal source. In conclusion he said:

—while I am not satisfied with the protection accorded the unborn, I do not consider the proposed charter as worsening the position and because of its many positive values I do not oppose its passage on moral or religious grounds.

I am sure this statement from His Excellency will go a long way in assuring the hon. member for Hamilton West that the opinion of the government is well founded and consistent.

HEALTH CARE—EXTRA BILLING BY DOCTORS—CO-OPERATION OF ONTARIO IN BANNING PRACTICE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Begin) on March 20, 1981 referred to the minister's indication that she planned to negotiate an end to extra billing under the medicare program. It has been indicated recently that the cost of extra billing runs to some $56 million a year and that at least $43 million of this is paid by people in the province of Ontario. I asked the minister at that time if she had any indication that the province of Ontario would be willing to co-operate in restoring medicare to its original concept of universality without extra billing. The minister stated she was hoping a consensus would develop and she felt that Ontario could take a positive lead in this regard. But, of course, at that time the provincial election had just taken place and she did not say what the response had been from the province of Ontario since the announcement that she planned to negotiate toward this.

It is important to remember that the federal government contributes through medicare and other transfer payments some $8 billion a year, so obviously the federal government has a big stake in ensuring that the health programs are run in an effective and equitable way.

It is interesting to note in the report of the Hall Commission, which was prepared in the past year, that Mr. Justice Hall indicated that extra billing denies access to many of the poorer elements of society and violates the principle of accessibility to all. He stated in the report that extra billing would create a two-tier system of health care, casting the poor, the aged and the unemployed into a category apart from those who can afford the extra charges. He also indicated that if extra billing is permitted, it would destroy the program over the years. He went on to say:

A solution must be found to solve the conflict, otherwise medicare as Canada has known it since 1970-71 can fail in time.

I think it is terribly important that the position of Ontario, because of its strategic nature, because of the large number of physicians in the province, be clarified, because if other provinces were to opt out, doctors would cross over the provincial boundaries and perhaps settle in the province of Ontario. With the large population of physicians in Ontario, this is not likely to happen.

It is interesting that the province of Quebec has not experienced opting out; it has an excellent service. British Columbia and Saskatchewan have indicated that they want to move toward the position of no extra billing. I hope the minister will receive a positive response from the province of Ontario.

Mr. Justice Hall indicated in his report that there must be a fair and equitable way for doctors to be paid. We all recognize this, and that mechanisms must be put in place in that regard which are fair to Canadians.

It seems to me we have had the best medicare system in the world in the past decade. Approximately 20 or 30 years ago many of us only dreamed of having a complete, comprehensive medicare program which was portable, accessible and covered the costs of doctors and hospitals. This is something of which people in the United States only dream of even today; the United States is the strongest, richest and most powerful nation in the world.

We should be moving to restore the medicare program to its previous greatness. We should protect the health of our rich and poor equally. We should give the poor, the young, the weak and the old equal opportunity to one of life's greatest blessings, good health.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), I am glad he began his remarks with some of the recommendations of the Hall report.

On March 20, the minister indicated to the House that she agreed with the position taken by Mr. Hall in his report in which he said that extra billing was totally unacceptable. Extra billing is unacceptable to the minister. Justice Emmett Hall reported that there must be a reasonable compensation mechanism for payment to physicians. The minister also supports that viewpoint of Mr. Hall.

The minister would like to point out to the hon. member that when the renegotiations take place in 1982 for extra program funding, one recommendation she will make to her cabinet colleagues will be to take steps or conditionalities to ban extra billing, as well as to recommend that some mechanism be found to properly compensate physicians.

The minister would also like to point out that when the new Ontario government was elected on March 19, she was hopeful that through negotiations we would be able to attain some way in which to ban extra billings but at the same time find a mechanism to properly compensate physicians. The minister also agrees with the recommendation of the Hall report that if we were to take unilateral action on the banning of funds to provinces to stop extra billing, it would simply result in the disruption of services. In September 1980, she promised provincial ministers that we would tend to do it by consensus. We plan to meet with provincial ministers of health sometime over the next two or three months. Hopefully by consensus we will reach a method by which to ban extra billing but at the same time to find some mechanism which properly compensates physicians.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I first directed my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) on February 3. It related to his visit with General Haig which took place just a few days previous. Also it related to the credibility of such a meeting and how they discussed the North-South question at that time.

Since that time, two months have passed and many events have taken place in relation to the situation in El Salvador and to the development of the north-south question. In that time, too, we found out much more about the credibility of certain matters which had been used as a basis for making judgments, but which put Canada into an unfavourable light, not only within Canada, but also within many other countries in the world, in our relationship to central America and, in particular, El Salvador.

Last Monday, when we watched in horror as President Reagan was shot down in Washington, I was struck by another factor of the whole story which was unveiling itself at that time. It was the inaccuracy of the news we were receiving about what was taking place with the president. This was an event being witnessed right there with television and radio people and commentators. Yet during the course of those first three or four hours we were told the President of the United States had not been hit, that the President of the United States was fine, and that the President of the United States was joking when he went into the hospital. We then found out that the President was hit, and then that the President was hit severely and was in a dangerous situation. At the same time, from the same news sources, we were finding out that James Brady, the press secretary, had been hit seriously, that he had died, then that he had not died, that he was getting better, and then that he was going to recover.

The reason I make this point—and that was a very recent experience with so many people in this country who watched that happening—is that right there, in that very limited space, they had difficulty finding out what was going on. These people who were involved very closely in that whole incident, as the power structure changed in Washington, and everything else occurring after the incident, could be the people who might cause our next atomic war. That kind of inability to be on top of the truth of the situation really made me afraid.

Canada's jumping-in almost immediately in El Salvador in order to follow the pattern of the United States in that country or at least give it a kind of moral dimension that it was not wrong, is based on what I feel has been very inaccurate information. Our government must be very careful about checking out its information as a situation like this proceeds, particularly if we are to have any credibility whatsoever in the North-South matter. The North-South matter, which I believe our country and our government wants to enter into seriously has a great deal to do with credibility. Are we really serious about the poor of the world, or are we just sufficiently serious that we will follow what the United States decides to do in a particular part of the world on a policy which may be founded on very poor information?

A publication printed in Toronto, gives good information about Latin America in general. It is called "Central America Update", and it is published jointly by the Latin American Working Group and the Jesuit Centre for Social Faith and Justice. They followed this El Salvador question and reported that:

> In late February, the U.S. State Department released a special "white paper" titled "Communist Interference in El Salvador". This white paper is the first major foreign policy statement by the Reagan administration, and reflects its determination to "draw the line" against "international communism" in Central America.
> While President Reagan proclaims that El Salvador will not be another Vietnam, this white paper paints a picture of the world that is almost identical to the one that lead us into the Vietnam War. The white paper itself is similar to another white paper put out by the State Department over a decade and a half ago to justify U.S. intervention in the Vietnam conflict. In 1965, the State Department released "Aggression from the North: the Record of North Vietnam's Campaign to Conquer South Vietnam". This document on Vietnam, like the Salvadorean white paper, blamed the war raging in the south on external forces and was used to argue for a massive buildup of U.S. forces in South Vietnam.

American people are afraid of what is now happening. Mr. Brady, before he was wounded during the attempt on the President, had just released a report which stated that of the letters and mail being received by the State Department, over 25 to one were against what the Americans were doing in El Salvador. Our Secretary of State for External Affairs received this information from General Haig.

There have been inquiries about Haig's understanding of the situation in El Salvador. One such was published in the Globe and Mail on March 31 last. It is a report from the New York Times Service written by Anthony Lewis. General Haig was questioned about the death of four American nuns, one of the key factors causing interest among the American people in this little Latin American country. I shall quote from the article to some extent as follows:

> The Secretary of State was testifying before the House Foreign Affairs Committee. He said: "I'd like to suggest to you that some of the investigations would lead one to believe that perhaps the vehicle that the nuns were riding in may have tried to run a roadblock, or may accidentally have been perceived to have been doing so, and there'd been an exchange of fire and then perhaps those who inflicted the casualties sought to cover it up. And this could have been at a very low level of both competence and motivation in the context of the issue itself. But the facts on this are not clear enough for anyone to draw a definitive conclusion."

That testimony would very clearly go against what the former U.S. ambassador to El Salvador, Robert White, said. He blamed right wing ideologues in the Reagan admistration for forcing him out of the foreign service. White claims his troubles began when he criticized the Salvadorean investigation of the rape and murder of the four U.S. missionaries. He said that if the price of keeping a job is to participate in the continuing cover-up of those responsible for this barbaric act, that price was too high for him to pay.

Salvadorean human rights workers report that just days before the murders, two of the American women had met privately with White to provide photographic evidence of the security force's complicity in the rampant violence.

My point, Mr. Speaker, is that to my mind, when speaking about that incident General Haig, completely misinterpreted it. I am very much concerned that our government has accepted the word of this person when deciding how to direct our policy in that part of the world.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, through you I should like to ask the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) for clarification. I realize that he read a lot of statements. I recognize the point you made but is there a specific question you want to have—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect, will the hon. parliamentary secretary please address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Frith: Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member for Saskatoon East if he could clarify the question. In all the points he made in the last seven or eight minutes I think I missed the gist of his question.

Mr. Ogle: Mr. Speaker, my question is this. Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs going to continue to accept this kind of information without what I would call a credible base for events in Central America, or is he going to find other information which would be more relevant to what is actually taking place?

My point is that unless we establish credibility about our own government and not just fall in behind the United States in this particular situation, we will lose our standing in the eyes of the poor in developing countries all over the world. The poor in Latin America realize that what happened there—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has extended a certain amount of latitude, but the hon. member has exceeded his time. The parliamentary secretary has a brief period in which to reply.

Mr. Frith: Mr. Speaker, with respect to questions about Canada's policies toward El Salvador, I have been instructed to remind hon. members that the Secretary of State for External Affairs gave a definitive statement on Canadian policies toward El Salvador on March 9, 1981. No substantive change has occurred in Canadian policy since that time and I would refer hon. members to that statement for specific information.

Other than that, the rest of the comments prepared by the department have absolutely no relevance to the question put by the hon. member for Saskatoon East.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

At 10.25 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

DISARMAMENT

ARMS LIMITATION TALKS BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND RUSSIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, I rise today on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Considering that Canada is playing a greater role in the present U.S. space shuttle program than ever before, notably in terms of hardware, experimental devices and scientific personnel; and considering that the strongest impetus toward an increased U.S. presence in space is the escalating strategic arms race, including the planned deployment of high-energy killer lasers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the Canadian government urge the U.S. Senate and the Reagan administration to press for further arms limitation talks with the Soviets so that the space program is not dominated by military planning which threatens to plunge the U.S. into a strategic space war with the Soviet Union.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EL SALVADOR—OUTRAGE AT SENSELESS KILLINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under Standing Order 43.

In light of the tragic and brutal massacre of 30 Salvadorans on April 7 by right wing forces, and in light of Canada's support of the United Nations' resolution of December 15 last condemning El Salvador's human rights record and requesting the United Nations Commission on Human Rights to examine the situation in El Salvador, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House convey to the El Salvadoran representatives in Ottawa our deep shock and outrage over the senseless killings of April 7, and urge the United Nations Human Rights Commission to commence its investigation into human rights violations in El Salvador forthwith so that further tragedies of this sort may be deterred through international pressure.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

IMPACT ON BUSINESS AND EMPLOYMENT IN ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): The Nisku, Alberta, businessmen's association has just completed an alarming study assessing the impact of the National Energy Program on 41 companies in the area and the study concludes that in this small part of Alberta alone close to $40 million and over 400 jobs were lost by January, 1981, because of the National Energy Program. It is projected that another $100 million worth of contracts and business will be lost this year. Therefore, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields), I move:

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources explain immediately to those Canadian companies his philosophy as to why they must suffer this tragedy as he attacks the western oil industry.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

YUKON TERRITORY

CALL FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF YUKON CAPITAL TRUST FUND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has stated publicly the government's anticipation that the Yukon may be given provincial status by 1985. The need for revenues from non-renewable resources by a province for the installation of needed infrastructure is vital. Therefore, to accumulate such capital, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the government immediately establish a Yukon capital trust fund and direct into it all royalties from current oil, natural gas and mineral production in the Yukon. And furthermore, that the fund be used exclusively for capital works and infrastructure construction in the Yukon, and that, pending provincial status, the fund be administered jointly by the national and Yukon territorial governments.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

TRIBUTE TO LIFE-SAVING EFFORT BY AIRCRAFT CREW—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne):

That this House recognize the daring search and rescue effort by the crew of a Greenwood, Nova Scotia-based Aurora aircraft, who, under adverse flying conditions, 300-foot ceiling and one half mile visibility, on their own initiative during a two-hour search on Monday played a key role in saving the lives of four people on a raft adrift on the North Atlantic.

CONDEMNATION OF CAMPAIGN TO ENCOURAGE INVESTMENT IN SOUTH AFRICA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise today on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Considering that on December 16, 1980, the General Assembly of the United Nations voted in favour of economic sanctions against the racist regime in South Africa, and considering the worldwide campaign against investment in South Africa being carried out by churches, non-governmental organizations, trade unions and humanitarian groups, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

That this House condemn Bache Corporation for holding free seminars across Canada, including one in Ottawa this afternoon, to encourage investment in South African gold stocks, and that this House urge Canadian individuals and companies to comply with the United Nations resolution calling for disinvestment in South Africa.

MARCH BY BIGSTONE INDIAN BAND, ALTA.—LACK OF GOVERNMENT RESPONSE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing order 43. Whereas the Bigstone Indian Band in northeast Alberta is nearing the completion of its protest march for economic equality in which both young and old band members are demonstrating their desperate need for economic assistance by walking 400 kilometres to gain the attention of the government, and whereas the band has received no indication from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), or the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. de Bané) that the government intends to address the very serious poverty and unemployment that plague these people, despite the fact that the government's western development fund was supposed to have placed the needs of native people in the west at the top of its priority list, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That this House condemn the government for its lack of response and compassion in this case, and demand that the government act immediately by meeting with the band so that a comprehensive plan may be developed to assist the band members to begin the arduous task of raising their standard of living and attaining economic independence.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

SUGGESTION SYRIA BE ASKED TO END MILITARY OPERATIONS AGAINST LEBANESE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an urgent matter of pressing necessity. I also ask the approval of my colleagues on humanitarian grounds. In view of the critical conditions prevailing in Lebanon at the moment, and since it is increasingly evident that civilians are the target of military operations in that country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras):

That the House asks the Secretary of State for External Affairs to send his Syrian counterpart a note asking the Syrian government to order its deterrent forces posted in Lebanon to stop any operation against Lebanese civilians or those of any other nationality, as evidence of their respect for life and basic freedom principles.

SUPPORT FOR FOOD PROCESSING SECTOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas Canada's trade deficit in manufactured foods and beverages is increasing rapidly, and whereas even the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has admitted that of the $4.7 billion in food products imported into this country some $2.5 billion in manufactured foods, semi-processed meat and fish products could have been processed in Canada, and whereas the food processing industry is the largest employer in seven of the ten provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That this House censure the government for its lack of support and encouragement to the Canadian food processors and Canadian agriculture, and further that this House direct the government to devise immediately and put into effect a Canadian food policy designed to increase Canadian self-sufficiency in the production and processing of food.

METRIC CONVERSION

ERRONEOUS IMPRESSION OF F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT MEASUREMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43 and the Department of National Defence informed me "This CF-18A is built entirely to imperial specifications", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

MEASURES TO COMBAT INFLATION AND STIMULATE GROWTH

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who, for a few weeks now, has been hiding behind the constitutional skirts of the Prime Minister. The minister will know that mortgage rates have just gone up again to 16.5 per cent, U.S. interest rates are tending upwards again, inflation is running over 12 per cent, and the Canadian dollar is still vulnerable.

The Conference Board of Canada, in its first quarterly report, has concluded that the inflation rate, high interest rates, and the investment outlook plagued by the energy conflict between the federal government and the provinces, will prevent any sustained economic recovery in 1981. Would the minister now tell us what concrete steps he is taking to stop the increased interest rates or to dampen down inflation or to stimulate real economic recovery in 1981, in view of these forecasts?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, first of all the hon. member should not complain about how the question period has been going during the last several weeks. If it has been devoted to the Constitution, it is because the Leader of the Opposition and the other front benchers have totally ignored the economy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —and concentrated on the Constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I welcome the return of the Tory party to the economy, which is evident today by the question of the hon. member. However, the hon. member has asked a whole series of questions with respect to interest rates, economic growth, inflation—

Miss MacDonald: And you can't do anything about any of them!

Mr. MacEachen: —the answers to which would require a very long time.

Mr. Clark: You are Minister of Finance.

Mr. MacEachen: I would refer him to the budget which outlines the economic strategy which is being employed by the government. When any changes are made to that, I would be happy to tell the hon. member for St. John's West. In fact I will try to make sure that he will be the first to know.

Mr. Crosbie: It is 13 months now, and the government has not returned to the economy yet. It has not even turned to the economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POLICY RESPECTING FISCAL AND MONETARY RESTRAINT

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): I might quote Don McGillivray in yesterday's paper which said the minister's "first budget, according to non-government economists, increased inflation and reduced economic growth." I hope he will do better on his second.

My supplementary question will be much simpler for the minister. He has a job to understand anything over one syllable. Is it the policy of the minister and the government to exercise fiscal and monetary restraint? It is a very simple question. Is it the policy to exercise fiscal and monetary restraint?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, on the question of monetary policy which is being carried out under the direction of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, as my hon. friend knows, the governor of the bank, not so long ago, adjusted the target range for the growth of the money supply indicating a renewed effort at restraint on the monetary side. The Government of Canada fully supports the Governor of the Bank of Canada in that particular effort. That is the situation on the monetary side.

Has my hon. friend understood that, before I go to the fiscal side and tell him that it is the intention of the government to exercise restraint through a gradual reduction in the deficit, financial requirements, and maintaining restraint on government expenditures? That is on the fiscal side. Does my hon. friend understand that?

POSSIBLE CREATION OF ECONOMIC SLACK

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): It has taken 13 months, but the minister is now telling us what his policy is. The minister is the Rip Van Winkle of finance ministers. He has been asleep for 13 months.

• (1420)

If the minister's policy is fiscal and monetary restraint, to create some slack in the economy—he has that policy, I assume—I want to ask the minister this: on January 9 his department said that public support was not yet present for a full program of wage and price controls because there was not enough general or severe slack in the economy, but the department suggested that with a policy of fiscal and monetary restraint the minister could create that slack. Is the minister now attempting to create that slack so that he can come in later in the year and announce a full program of wage and price controls as his department advocated in its paper of January 9?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the answer, clearly, to the question as put is no.

GOVERNMENT PLANS TO DEAL WITH IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN AUTOMOBILES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, if I may, I would like to put a question to the emperor himself, the Prime Minister. On this economic theme I would like to mention to the Prime Minister that there still appears to be a lack of industrial strategy on the part of his government or, if there is an industrial strategy, it seems to be founded on the exportation of resources on one hand and jobs on the other. Would the Prime Minister indicate what, if anything, the government plans to do with respect to the importation of foreign cars, especially Japanese cars, into this country, and does the government see fit only to have the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce go to Washington to talk about the Japanese problem?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The emperor is not wearing any clothes.

Mr. MacEachen: —I believe the hon. member should be pleased that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is holding consultations with his counterparts in Washington because obviously, in looking at the impact of Japanese exports, one has to look at in terms of the North American market, and it is in that context that I invite the hon. member to judge the minister's visit to Washington.

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON FOREIGN INVESTMENT

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister would care to familiarize the House with the government's policy concerning one related matter, that is, the question of foreign investment. Last September a trade mission of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce told the Japanese, "Canada welcomes foreign investment". Is that in fact government policy, bearing in mind that many assumed when they read the National Energy Program that certainly some foreign investment is not too welcome?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the assertion that some foreign investment is not too welcome is a policy followed by many governments, including the government which preceded mine, mine and probably the one which will follow mine.

For instance, in the area of banking we want to make sure that financial institutions remain under Canadian control and that they are not dominated by foreign investment. The same applies, for instance, to communications. There are areas where I believe even the very conservative Conservatives believe we should have control over our domestic environment. That is the policy we follow, and that is compatible with the desire to welcome foreign investment generally in Canada.

EL SALVADOR—MURDER OF TWENTY-THREE CIVILIANS—REQUEST FOR ACTION BY UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. On Monday night in El Salvador there was another in a series of tragic acts of violence perpetrated by the national guard under the control of the junta in that country. This time it was the vicious murder of 23 civilians in their own homes. Considering that the Government of Canada voted for a UN resolution last fall condeming the junta for its violation of human rights, is the Government of Canada now prepared to request the UN to take some direct action to put an end to the systematic murder in that country?

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, during these last few months we have repeatedly expressed the horror we feel at the many violations of human rights in El Salvador. We have done so at the General Assembly of the United Nations, as the hon. member has indicated, we have done so at the Human Rights Commission of the United Nations, we have also continued our efforts through the Organization of American States, and bilaterally we have expressed to the representatives of El Salvador in Ottawa our profound disagreement with what is happening in their country, and we shall do so again at the next opportunity, either bilaterally or multilaterally.

• (1425)

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, in recent weeks all that the Government of Canada has done on this subject is to accept the highly biased reports coming from the United States on what is occurring in that country. I should like to ask the Prime Minister, since we are, we hope, in the final stages of debating a resolution affecting human rights in Canada, if he would demonstrate some concern on the same subject for people who live elsewhere by having the Canadian ambassador at the United Nations request the UN Commission on Human Rights to investigate these murders that are taking place in El Salvador.

[Translation]

Mr. Duclos: Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know that the situation in El Salvador cannot be described in black and white. The government in place led by President Duarte has announced its intention to undertake negotiations with the leftist forces. Unfortunately, whether these negotiations take place at the instigation of the Catholic Church in El Salvador or the Socialist International, up to now the revolutionary forces have been the ones to indicate that they did not want to take part in these negotiations.

REQUEST THAT UNITED STATES STOP ARMS SHIPMENTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I will try another question, but I will not even go to the Prime Minister in this case because obviously he is not going to concern himself with what happens in that part of the world. But I will put my question to the gentleman who is doing the answering today. Considering that the United States is presently increasing its arms supply to the junta, and considering that the junta is dependent upon the use of these arms to perpetuate itself in power, will the Government of Canada at the very least use this most recent act of terrorism as a legitimate reason for requesting the United States to stop shipping arms to that country?

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know like everyone else that our position as a government concerning shipments of arms to this unfortunate country is extremely clear and precise. We condemn any shipment of arms from whatever source.

AIR CANADA

CLAIM TO ROUTES LINKING CANADA AND ORIENT

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. Speaking in Vancouver last week the president of Air Canada, Mr. Claude Taylor, made strong representations that Air Canada should be given an exclusive right to fly the Vancouver to Tokyo and Hong Kong international routes. In view of the fact that Canadian Pacific Airlines pioneered these routes, took the losses to get them established, and now the president of the state owned airline is giving press interviews in which he states he wants these routes, I would ask the minister whether the president of Air Canada is expressing official government policy, is he testing the wind of public opinion, or he is whistling in the wind and on a frolic of his own with no government sanction for such horrendous statements?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, obviously the president of Air Canada was expressing his own views.

An hon. Member: They should be your views.

Mr. Pepin: The reaction to those views is a clear indication that there is no consensus on the subject. But we are going to come out in a very few weeks with an adjusted domestic air carrier policy, and in the coming months we will review the international air carrier policy. In the meantime Mr. Taylor was expressing what he would like to see come about. By the way, we all rejoice in the financial and operational success of Air Canada in recent years.

Mr. Cook: Madam Speaker, I have a very brief supplementary for the minister. Will he make a flat statement that Canadian Pacific airlines and other private carriers will be protected in their present routes from the grabbing tactics of Air Canada?

An hon. Member: Yes or no.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, this is the policy of the government at this time. The competition internationally between Air Canada and Canadian Pacific airlines is looked upon by the Minister of Transport as being desirable at this time.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

EFFECT OF RELAXATION OF UNITED STATES POLLUTION AND SAFETY REGULATIONS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce I should like to direct my question to the Minister of the Environment. The Reagan administration in the United States announced plans this week to relax automobile pollution and safety regulations in order to aid the ailing automobile industry. This will be to the tune of $1.4 billion in savings to that industry.

In view of the fact that the industries in Canada and the United States are so closely related, can the minister tell us what effect these changes—and 18 of them affect the environment alone—will have on our environmental regulations?

Further, what has the minister done, perhaps in conjunction with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to ensure that the Canadian automobile industry does not receive another setback as a result of these changes?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, my department and the Department of Transport are assessing the significance of these potential changes. I will confer with my colleague, if there is any necessary response on my part.

REQUEST FOR RESTRICTION ON IMPORTATION OF JAPANESE CARS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, again in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. As the minister knows, last week the Canadian Automotive Parts Manufacturers Association, among others, which is comprised mainly of small Canadian businesses, appealed to the government for restrictions on automotive imports, especially those from Japan. I do not have to quote the statistics in that regard.

Since these ailing manufacturers fall under the jurisdiction of the minister, could he tell us what is his position in regard to these requests for import quotas? Has he made any representations to either the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or, better still, has he made any representations to cabinet in this regard?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, when spokesmen for the automobile industry met last week with the Minister of Supply and Services, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and other ministers of this government, it was clearly indicated that the entire question of automotive imports, particularly from Japan, ought to be assessed in the North American context. Since the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will be holding talks this week with his Washington counterpart, I believe it would be premature to comment further on this topic.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION TO MEET WITH BIGSTONE INDIAN BAND

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister knows that for two and a half weeks 80 members of the Bigstone Cree Band has been making a 250-mile trek from northern Alberta to Edmonton. This walk is their desperate way of asking Canadian people for a new deal which will include decent housing, with sewage and running water, better education, and, above all, economic development. The minister promised to meet with the Bigstone Cree. Will he meet with them when they arrive in Edmonton this weekend? Will he commit moneys from the Western Initiatives Development Fund to help the Bigstone Cree with their economic development?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I share the concern of the hon. member about the general conditions which native people face, particularly the large number in western Canada who have a real need for economic development. But I remind him that there have been meetings. In fact there was just one yesterday between the regional director of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the chief of the Bigstone Band. They are having these discussions.

We have indicated that we are very sympathetic to their suggestions. As soon as we can sit down and discuss with them and with other native leaders across Canada to develop a comprehensive approach to economic development, we are prepared to do so and hopefully work out what will be solutions for their future.

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, the people who are marching for 250 miles have the right to meet with the minister.

PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The minister knows, as the previous minister admitted, that the situation of the Bigstone Cree is typical of that of Indian bands from one end of Canada to the other. Indian people are tired of being told that if money is given to them it will have to be taken from another band somewhere else.

Will the minister go back to cabinet and secure sufficient funds in supplementary estimates so that the Indian people can put an end to this vicious cycle of poverty, disease, bad housing, and no economic development? Will the minister go back to cabinet to get these funds?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, the hon. member must be aware that the role of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is always to endeavour, within the government, to get the maximum amounts of money possible for his programs. This is what I am doing. Having said that, I tell the hon. member that as far as the Bigstone Band is concerned there was an unfortunate incident with regard to the audit of their books and the manner in which the funds were handled prior to Chief Beaver becoming chief. Since that time we have endeavoured to be of assistance, as I think the hon. member for Athabasca is aware. We have done the maximum we can in terms of picking up the deficits and putting them on a sound financial basis.

I might say that all the items respecting what we are prepared to do have been communicated both to the Member of Parliament for the area and to the chief of the band.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

RESULT OF MINISTER'S DISCUSSIONS ON ACID RAIN WITH UNITED STATES SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the continuing concern in Canada with acid rain and press reports that the United States administration is planning to reduce its powers under the clean air act to control acid rain, can the minister assure the House that, as a result of his meeting with Secretary of the Interior James Watt last week, the U.S. will not reduce its power to control acid rain under the clean air act and that it will be concluding an international agreement to control this problem?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. As he noted, I met with Secretary of the Interior James Watt. He confirmed the word which the President of the United States gave us, that the United States expects to begin, as was originally forecast, negotiations leading to an air quality agreement early this summer.

Also I brought to his attention our concerns about possible changes to the American clean air act which might undermine the ability of the American government to respond to the international obligations it has to our country.

I must say that I received some considerable reassurance from the Secretary of the Interior. Our discussions were somewhat disrupted since it was the day of the attempted assassination of the President. Our meeting was cut short to some extent, but he gave a very positive indication that the administration is not intending to act in a way which would undermine its present ability to respond to our interests.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MARCH BY BIGSTONE INDIAN BAND—REQUEST FOR ATTENDANCE AT MEETING IN EDMONTON

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It is supplementary to an earlier one regarding the Bigstone Band. As the minister knows, the band is not satisfied with meeting with regional officials. It has asked specifically, as outlined in a telegram to the minister two days ago, if the minister cannot be there that a senior official of the PMO or PCO attend Edmonton to meet with the band. Will the minister do this?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I cannot speak for other departments of the government, but I indicated to both the hon. member and the chief of the band that we are very open to the representations of that band, as well as those of other native organizations in the west. We have been meeting on a very frequent basis with a number of native leaders over the past two or three months. We are certainly quite willing and open to any discussions which will take place. This is why senior officials are meeting with them at the present time to work out those details. But we must respect the fact that there are various kinds of native organizations—not just those that are marching but many others—that would like to make their cases known.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister who received a telegram from Chief William Beaver of the Bigstone Band last Friday. He indicated at that time that he had not read it. In the telegram the Prime Minister is being asked to intercede and send someone from the PMO or PCO to Edmonton to meet with the Bigstone Band. Obviously I am not getting anywhere with the minister responsible for the western development fund. Would the Prime Minister consent to sending someone to meet with the band this weekend? The band arrives in Edmonton on Friday.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development answered that question earlier in the question period. He gave a perfectly satisfactory explanation. If the leader of the band wants to meet with the Minister of Indian Affairs, the minister has never closed his door with regard to such meetings.

IMPACT ON SERVICE INDUSTRY IN WESTERN CANADA

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I was somewhat taken aback yesterday by an answer the minister gave to the hon. member for Assiniboia with respect to the plight of the service companies in the oil industry in western Canada. In his reply the minister seemed to indicate that there were special programs for these companies, bail-outs if you will, which is not what the industry is seeking. The industry is looking for changes in the National Energy Program which will restore the level of business to the level which prevailed on October 28. Does the minister realize that these companies do have a problem? If so, what is the minister proposing to do to change the National Energy Program? I would appreciate it if he would be specific.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I met with representatives of the service industry in Alberta a couple of months ago at which time I had an opportunity to discuss with them their particular problems. I again met with their representatives yesterday in Ottawa. I am fully aware of the difficult circumstances these companies and individuals are facing at the present time due, in part, to the reduction in exploration for natural gas because of a surplus of natural gas at the present time on domestic and international markets. This is also due to the combination of our fiscal measures together with the very high royalties and tax rates imposed by the government of Alberta on the oil and gas industry.

The combination of all these factors makes it extremely difficult at the present time for all these people. I hope that in the weeks to come we will be able to arrive at a satisfactory arrangement with the government of Alberta on the issue of oil and gas pricing and revenue sharing. We have indicated that we have approached these negotiations in good faith and have shown flexibility. I am still waiting for a similar indication from the government of Alberta.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Assiniboia is in Saskatchewan.

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN PRICING POLICY

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, the minister has put his finger on it. The problem is caused by a combination of the National Energy Program, fiscal measures, as well as some of the measures which are outside his control. I am looking for some indication from the minister as to those areas which he feels are within his control and on which he feels he is able to move. Last night in committee we heard that one of those areas was with regard to price. The companies, and members from the government side were there. They heard the representation that price is a very important factor. Is the minister considering a change in the pricing policy to allow for a different treatment of those low productivity wells in Alberta and Saskatchewan which generate a tremendous amount of drilling activity but which are not economical now because of the combination of factors, particularly price and the production taxes which were introduced in the National Energy Program on October 28?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, we indicated in the past that we were approaching the discussions with flexibility and some room for adjustments and further modifications. I hope that the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan will approach these negotiations in the same spirit. Unfortunately, I have had no indication whatever that they are ready to move at all on any of these issues. I hope they will be willing to show the same degree of flexibility that we will be showing.

PETRO-CANADA

CANCELLATION BY BRITISH PETROLEUM OF CREDIT CARD EXCHANGE AGREEMENT

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the National Energy Program deals with Petro-Canada as a key element of it and that the minister hopes that wide use and acceptance of Petro-Canada will be a desirable thing, I wonder if the minister is aware of a bulletin issued by British Petroleum to all their lessees and dealers, effective April 30, 1981, which states that the credit card exchange agreement with Pacific Petroleum, now Petro-Canada, will be cancelled. Is this a restriction with which the government agrees, or will the government enter into negotiations to ensure that the Petro-Canada credit cards can be used as widely as possible?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I will certainly not enter into negotiations on behalf of Petro-Canada with their various competitors as far as commercial arrangements between those various companies are concerned. I suggest the hon. member phone Petro-Canada, or write to it, asking for an explanation. I will be quite happy to inquire on his behalf and inform him later on, if he wishes. I am not aware of this particular situation, which is obviously a matter of commercial decision left quite clearly to Petro-Canada and British Petroleum.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION

RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING SEXUAL HARASSMENT OF WOMEN

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. The Canadian Human Rights Commission in its 1980 annual report, which was tabled yesterday, recommended that "it has now become urgent for Parliament to make it clear that sexual harassment constitutes discrimination on the grounds of sex and will not be tolerated", pointing out that public perception of sexual harassment as a major barrier to equality in employment for women has greatly increased. In view of the fact that the Canadian Human Rights Commission recommended last year, and is again recommending this year as a top priority, the elimination of discrimination against women on the grounds of sexual harassment, what action does the government intend to take to implement this important recommendation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, we are in the process of reviewing the recommendation of the commission which was tabled Monday. If need be we will introduce a bill in Parliament dealing with this matter after the cabinet has made a decision.

I fail to see the need to proceed very rapidly at this time because, unfortunately, the House has had very little time in recent months to look after such problems because the business of the House was taken up by something else.

[English]

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, the minister should know very well that it has been over a year since this recommendation was tabled. The report of the Human Rights Commission makes a number of other important recommendations, including a prohibition of discrimination on the grounds of political belief, sexual orientation, the abolition of mandatory retirement at an arbitrary age, and an end to discrimination against women based on pregnancy and childbirth. The minister has spoken many times about the importance of human rights. I suggest that if he is serious about these recommendations he take the advice of the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): —and put up or shut up on human rights questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I have spoken a great deal in the last year with respect to human rights. This is why we are about to have a charter of rights in the Canadian Constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PENITENTIARIES

CONSTRUCTION OF MAXIMUM SECURITY INSTITUTION AT RENOUS, N.B.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, my question, of which I have given notice, is for the Solicitor General.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Did he put you up to it?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I do not need any prompting, Madam Speaker. As the minister knows—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, if hon. members opposite will keep quiet I will put my question.

As the minister knows, two of his predecessors gave commitments to me and, more important, to the people of the Miramichi, that a maximum security institution would be built at Renous.

An hon. Member: No one else wants it.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The minister also knows that the commitment was rejected by the previous government. Can the minister tell the House if, and when, this commitment will be fulfilled, what the capital investment will be, and what the level of employment will be?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kaplan: I am very pleased to inform the hon. member that this project, which was cancelled by the Conservative government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NUCLEAR DEVELOPMENT

SALES OF CANDU REACTORS ABROAD

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I have a question to put to the Prime Minister and I do so in view of his role as Canada's No. 1 salesman for the Candu reactor to countries around the world. Could he advise the House why it is, in view of the fact that the Candu reactor is generally considered throughout the world as the finest piece of machinery ever produced to do the job it is called upon to do, that Canada is losing out regularly all over the world, particularly to France, on sales of this very important piece of machinery that Canada produces so well?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I can think of a couple of examples of sales that we have lost because members of the hon. member's party either criticized the government that was going to buy the equipment, or complained about the lack of security arrangements for those sales.

Mr. Hees: Madam Speaker, it appears that the only way that this disastrous sales record can be set right is by far superior salesmanship than has been available so far. In view of this great need, would the Prime Minister consider taking a short course in salesmanship? If he would, I would be very glad to arrange one for him.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I want to remind the hon. member that some sales were lost to the Argentine precisely because the then secretary of state for external affairs, a member of his party, undisposed the government of the Argentine toward the buying of this.

Miss MacDonald: You have lowered standards.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

POSSIBILITY OF SAVINGS THROUGH CHANGES IN TELEPHONE LEASING POLICIES

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I have a short question for either the Minister of Supply and Services or the Minister of Communications which may result in saving enough money to help the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi pay for his new prison. I want to ask either or both of those ministers whether they have considered any changes in the policies that they employ in their departments with respect to the government telephone agency and the supply and procurement policies for government services. If they changed their policies and did not continue to use perpetual leasing policies with Bell Telephone, but instead dealt with some competitive Canadian companies, they could probably save millions of dollars. Will the ministers look into this and respond on whether they recognize the potential for saving millions of dollars in this regard?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, we are always willing to look at suggestions made by hon. members on the other side of the House. We will be pleased to examine the matter and see if any improvement can be made.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PREPARATIONS FOR LAUNCHING OF CBC-2

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Minister of Communications. Is the minister aware that the CBC staff at one regional centre is currently engaged in transferring programming to one-inch tapes for CBC-2 on equipment with the CBC-2 logo, even though CBC-2 has not yet been authorized by the CRTC? Does this indicate that the government has given assurance to the CBC that CBC-2 will proceed, regardless of the CRTC decision?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the answer to all the questions put by the hon. member is no.

Miss Carney: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also addressed to the Minister of Communications. Would the minister undertake to look into this matter, and would he please tell us his views on whether he considers it proper for the CBC to be spending public money on a system which has not yet been authorized?

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, I will be pleased to look into the matter that the hon. member has raised. If the CBC is interested in CBC-2, and if its application is in front of the CRTC, it goes without saying that it has undoubtedly spent some funds to prepare its application for the CRTC and is undoubtedly thinking in terms of a positive decision being given. I shall be pleased to look into the matter in a more general way.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

REPORTED ACQUISITION OF LAKER TO TRANSPORT GRAIN

Mr. Douglas Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport who answers in this House for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board who sits in the other place. I wonder if the minister could advise whether the Canadian Wheat Board has purchased, or is negotiating the purchase, or is considering building a lake ship to transport grain.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): No, Madam Speaker, I cannot, but I will find out. I am aware, however, that the Canadian Wheat Board is aware of its responsibilities and of the need of adequate transportation for exports. It is trying to negotiate longer-term contracts on the Great Lakes but I do not know if the Board intends to purchase ships. I will find out immediately and report to my hon. friend in the next 20 minutes.

Mr. Neil: As a supplementary question, Madam Speaker, when the minister is reporting could he determine whether it is either purchasing or arranging to build a ship? Would he also determine whether it will be paid for out of producers' funds? At the same time, would he consider having the legal department look into the regulations or the act to determine whether such activities on the part of the Canadian Wheat Board are, in effect, legal?

Mr. Pepin: Yes, Madam Speaker, I will do that.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

APPLICATION OF PROTECTION TO WORKERS UNDER FEDERAL JURISDICTION

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Labour. It relates to the CLC proposals that were announced on Monday of this week. Can the minister tell the House exactly what is happening with respect to the revision of Part IV of the Labour Code. When will he and his department get their act together and introduce their recommendations for the complete revision of Part IV, thereby guaranteeing the over 600,000 workers who are under federal jurisdiction, without exception, the right to refuse to perform dangerous work without fear of disciplinary action, and the right of designated worker representatives to shut down dangerous and unhealthy operations until they are corrected?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, if I were to attempt to deal with the several parts of the question I am sure I would be transgressing on the rules of brevity that apply in the House. That is the last thing I would want to do.

I do want to say that the question of the hon. member deals with a serious matter. We believe that our department, under a succession of governments and ministers, has provided as good a level of protection as any jurisdiction in Canada to the working people, despite the efforts of some people to play politics in that regard. I want to say to the hon. member that we have had a comprehensive review of the provisions of Part IV under way for a considerable number of months. We are moving toward the point when legislation of a comprehensive nature will be brought into the House.

I just want to make one other point, and that is with reference to the position taken by the CLC calling for particular reforms. It must be remembered by the hon. member that the CLC was consulted by our department about our ideas for reform and that a large part of the package which it is now talking about is based on ideas that originated in our department.

Mr. Blackburn: Madam Speaker, I should like to point out to the minister that the protection given to federal workers is about as bad as that given to workers provincially in Nova Scotia.

Given the fact that the minister and his department are aware of the urgent need to consolidate the 15 departments and agencies which have jurisdiction over occupational health and safety in the federal work place, what progress can the minister report to the House with respect to his efforts at the ministerial and departmental levels to ensure that this consolidation will take place, resulting in a rational administrative structure so that federal occupational health and safety measures can finally be enforced under Labour Canada and not under any other government department?

● (1500)

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, consultations with various departments affected have been under way for some period of time and similar contact has been made with the Treasury Board. When new policy is determined, it will be announced in due course.

Finally, I might point out to the hon. member that traditionally the labour laws of the province of Nova Scotia, not only in relation to safety but in other provisions as well, have been well ahead of those of the province from which he comes.

YUKON TERRITORY

ESTABLISHMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE OF OFFICE IN WHITEHORSE

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Has the Secretary of State established a ministerial office in Whitehorse, with the manager of that office being one Joanne Linzey who is one of the directors of the Canadian Status of Women group?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of the names of the people who would be employed in the Whitehorse office. I will check into that and report back to the hon. member.

ESTABLISHMENT BY MINISTER OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES OF OFFICE IN WHITEHORSE

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources established a brand new office in Whitehorse intended to be staffed by eight? If so, for what purpose?

Mr. Laniel: To compensate for your absence.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that the office has not been set up to compensate for the hon. member's absence from his riding in the last few weeks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is going to open a number of offices across the country, including the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, in order to manage and operate the conversion grant program designed to help citizens convert from oil to other forms of energy. Those offices will be operated by officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. The staff there will serve the public of those particular provinces and regions.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to confirm that after a series of meetings between parliamentary leaders and consultations with our respective caucuses it would appear that the House may now be informed of a special order which is likely to get unanimous agreement. parties who have been patient and who, in spite of the climate in the House, have always shown willingness to attend the meetings which were necessary to reach this agreement. Therefore, Madam Speaker, I will read the full text which in a few minutes might prove to be the solution and the way to end the constitutional debate, should the House agree unanimously.

[English]

That the motion of the Minister of Justice for an Address to Her Majesty concerning the Constitution of Canada, Government Orders, Government Business, No. 36, shall be disposed of as follows:

1. The motion and any amendments proposed thereto shall be the business considered on Tuesday, April 21, 1981, Wednesday, April 22, 1981, and Thursday, April 23, 1981, and on those days no member shall speak for more than thirty minutes.
2. No later than 6:00 p.m. on April 21, 1981 the House leader of the Progressive Conservative Party and the House leader of the New Democratic Party, and no later than 10:00 p.m., on April 21, 1981, the government House leader may give notice of one amendment to the said motion affecting one or more provisions of the motion and any such amendments shall be printed on the notice paper until disposed of.
3. No amendments or subamendments may be proposed to the said motion except as provided in the preceding paragraph.
4. At 9.45 p.m. on April 23, 1981, the Speaker shall put without further debate or amendment every question necessary to dispose of any proposed amendment and any amendment put on notice pursuant to paragraph No. 2 of this order which shall be deemed to have been proposed for the purpose of this order. No member shall rise to speak after this hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to comply with this order shall be decided forthwith before the House adjourns.
5. The government shall not designate any days on which the said motion shall be dealt with until the first sitting day following the rendering of the decision by the Supreme Court of Canada on the appeals concerning the opinions of the Manitoba Court of Appeal rendered on February 3, 1981, and the Newfoundland Court of Appeal rendered on March 31, 1981 on the questions put to the said courts concerning the amendment of the Constitution of Canada.
6. On any day that is designated for dealing with the said motion as may have been amended, the hours of sitting shall be as follows:

   On Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays: From 10.00 a.m. to 1.00 p.m. and from 2.00 p.m. to 11.59 p.m.

   On Wednesdays: From 2.00 p.m. to 11.59 p.m.

   On Fridays: From 11.00 a.m. to 1.00 p.m. and from 2.00 p.m. to 7.00 p.m.

   Provided that on any such day no private members' business or proceeding pursuant to Standing Order 40 shall be taken up.

6(a) A designated day for the purposes of this order is a day appointed by a minister of the Crown by written notice to the Clerk at least twenty-four hours in advance and, if necessary, such notice shall be published in a special notice paper. A day shall be deemed a designated day for the purpose of this order regardless of whatever proceedings are before the House at any time during that day.

7. On any day designated by the government pursuant to the preceding paragraph no member shall speak for more than twenty minutes and no amendments shall be proposed.
8. At fifteen minutes before the time of adjournment on the second day designated by the government pursuant to the paragraph numbered 6 and 6(a) of this order the Speaker shall at that hour put the motion as may have been amended. No member shall rise to speak for any purpose after that time and all questions necessary to dispose of the said motion of the Minister of Justice shall be put forthwith without further debate.

   Provided that nothing in this order shall be considered to affect in any manner or to any degree the separation of the legislative and judicial powers, a fundamental principle of our Constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to join the government House leader in this matter. I think what we have accomplished by the negotiations which he described embodies four things. We have provided an opportunity for the federal-provincial process to work in the traditional way. The proposal really says this is nothing more than a special order of the House to govern its conduct of the debate which will follow. It permits all parties a reasonable opportunity for access to the amendment process. It permits the House to have the benefit of the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada and to take it into account in the debate which will ensue thereafter.

We are agreed with the proposition put by the government House leader, and we are prepared to consent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, it gives me particular pleasure to join with the other two House leaders in submitting to this House of Commons this historic agreement. The time that it has taken to arrive at this document has been very lengthy. We have had many meetings. I am sure there is not any aspect of the whole matter that we have not discussed, but it has been worth it because, as I say, we have achieved an agreement which I believe will prove to be historic.

• (1510)

As should happen in all bargaining sessions, each of us gave something, each of us won something. We are particularly pleased that we now have the guarantee that our amendments concerning aboriginal rights and equal status between men and women will come before the House for a vote. One other thing that we are pleased about, of course, will be shared by all members of the House. That is that we will be permitted to enjoy life without the trauma of closure.

When this debate is over after five more days of debate, however it comes out, whatever the vote is on the final motion, it will be the people of Canada who will have scored the greatest gain, for our Parliament will have acted in a civilized manner. That is the way we should act. I dread the thought of what the scene would have been had we not reached an agreement. We should act in a civilized manner and we shall now do so. In that way Parliament will have the right to be proud of what it will have done. We give our unanimous support to this agreement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I think it might be advisable to have the House approve this agreement which seems to be unanimous, but for the record I suggest we should ask for unanimous consent.

Point of Order—Mr. Crosbie

[English]

Madam Speaker: Does the House give its unanimous consent to the order which has been read by the President of the Privy Council?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: It is agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Benjamin: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. In light of the success of the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi, I wonder if the government House leader or the Minister of Transport could provide—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Benjamin: —the name of the Liberal backbencher to obtain success with Treasury Board on rail line relocation in Regina and an airport.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. CROSBIE—REFERENCE BY MR. TRUDEAU TO NEWFOUNDLAND SUPREME COURT JUSTICES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It concerns the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) so I hope he is not leaving the House. It involves the separation of legislative and judicial powers which we have just dealt with. I refer to the point of order I raised yesterday.

Mr. Lalonde: It is not a point of order.

Mr. Crosbie: It is a point of order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I can understand the exuberance of the House, but could we have a little silence.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I rose on a point of order yesterday having to do with the proper treatment of the judiciary in this honourable House by members of the House. In particular, I refer to Hansard for Monday, April 6. The Prime Minister, in replying to a question by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble), as reported at the top of page 8988, said this:

> Madam Speaker, it is basic to our system that three judges, five judges, or nine judges, cannot tell us what is right. We are elected by the people. We are answerable to the people—
> It is the job of the courts to judge whether these laws are intra vires or ultra vires.

With that I agree.

> What the opposition has been doing is saying "We are timid fellows—"
>
> SOME HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!
> MR. TRUDEAU: —"because three non-elected officials have told us that such a thing could not be done."

With those remarks the Prime Minister was referring to the Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal of Newfoundland, Chief Justice Mifflin, and to Mr. Justice Morgan and Mr. Justice Gushue of the Court of Appeal of Newfoundland. He referred to them as three non-elected officials. These are three appointed members of the judiciary, and it is so important that this House always remember that they are to be kept completely independent and treated in this House with the respect the judiciary should be accorded. I will refer to Beauchesne on that point in moment.

They are not non-elected officials; they are non-elected members of the courts of this land and, in the case of Newfoundland, of the highest court of that province. Chief Justice Mifflin was appointed in 1964 by the Pearson administration, Mr. Justice Morgan was appointed in May, 1975, by the administration of the present Prime Minister, and Mr. Justice Gushue was appointed in February, 1976, by the administration now headed by the Prime Minister.

As if that were not enough, this slighting and insulting reference to three non-elected officials who have told us that such a thing could not be done—this is the historic decision rendered March 31 by the Newfoundland Supreme Court which held that it was beyond the constitutional jurisdiction of this Parliament to pass certain resolutions—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member must recognize that a point of order has to be short. If I understand the point of order the hon. member is trying to make, and I have before me the statement made by the Prime Minister, to which the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) is objecting, he should state quite simply why he feels these words were unparliamentary. that would suffice. I would ask him not to discuss the substance of what took place in the Supreme Court of Newfoundland; that is not relevant to the point of order. We should keep this fairly short, and by that I mean a few sentences will suffice to make a point of order.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I now wish to make reference to another page of Hansard on the same subject. I intend to be very short, Madam Speaker. This is a matter of the dignity and independence of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, and there I do not intend to be too short.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: In Hansard of Tuesday, April 7—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Crosbie: Hon. members opposite are not going to bully me, the Supreme Court of Newfoundland or the Supreme Court of Canada. As reported at page 9027 of Hansard for Tuesday, April 7, the Prime Minister carried on in the same manner as the day before. In reply to a question from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), he said, referring to the opposition and the premiers:

> If they want to fight the fight politically, they are saying what we have been saying for the past 12 months, it is a political issue, and that they have only used the courts to subvert the courts to their own political means.

If that means anything, it is an allegation that the province of Newfoundland in particular—because the only appeal court that has held against the government's constitutional proposals so far is the Supreme Court of Newfoundland—has used the courts in Newfoundland, or is subverting the courts in Newfoundland, to its own political means. That is an allegation that the judiciary in Newfoundland is not independent, that it has somehow been subverted by the province to their cause, that it has not acted judicially and with independence and reason. It is an allegation that it has somehow been subverted to their own political means by the provinces, in this instance by the province of Newfoundland.

Let me give the authority from Beauchesne so that hon. members opposite will not think this point of order is entirely frivolous. I refer to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fifth edition, page 103:

> Besides the prohibitions contained in S.O. 35, it has been sanctioned by usage that a Member, while speaking, must not:—
> (h) cast reflections upon the conduct of judges of superior courts, unless such conduct is based upon a substantive motion;

These are judges of a superior court in Newfoundland, the Supreme Court of Newfoundland on appeal.

● (1520)

At page 114 in the section headed "Protected Persons", paragraph 321 of Beauchesne provides:

> (1) All references to judges and courts of justice of the nature of personal attack and censure have always been considered unparliamentary, and the Speaker has always treated them as breaches of order.

That is why I have risen on a point of order. Hon. members have been interrupted in Committee of the Whole by the chairman when they have cast an imputation upon a judicial proceeding. In this case, there have been imputations cast upon a judicial proceeding, unless the Prime Minister wants to clearly withdraw the statement which he made, or clarify it, and there have been imputations cast with respect to the three judges of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, all of whom were appointed by the government opposite and its predecessor. All of those judges are impeccable. Chief Justice Miffin has a record of 17 years of unparalleled service in Newfoundland. He is very highly regarded by the Bar and in no way should he be held up to ridicule in this House as a non-elected official. He has been a judge since 1964. He was appointed Chief Justice of the trial division in July of 1975 by the government of the Prime Minister, and in December of 1979 he was made Chief Justice of the Newfoundland Court of Appeal by the administration of the Leader of the Opposition.

This is a course of action started by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), whose job in this House is to protect the judiciary and who said on October 6 last that he was opposed to going to the Supreme Court of Canada because—and I quote from The Globe and Mail—"The Supreme Court is very unreliable and timing is very important".

I would like the Prime Minister to clarify whether he will say, once the justices of the Supreme Court of Canada have ruled, that they have been subverted in some way or other by the provinces or by the hon. members of the opposition if the decision is not in accord with the decision that he wants, or if they affirm the decision of the Newfoundland Court of Appeal. Are they to fear a public attack from the Prime Minister if they do their duty in the appeal which they will be hearing on April 28? They are not in a position to defend themselves in the political arena. It is for the hon. members of this House to see that the judges are protected and not attacked or have slurs cast on them in this House by the Prime Minister, who is the first among us. The Prime Minister is the man—or the woman—who gives us the lead, the example. He is in no way superior to me. He is the first minister, but he is not one whit better than I am in this House, nor in my view is he one whit better than I am outside of the House.

However, I would ask the Prime Minister, before the Chair rules—and I know this was said during the question period in the heat of being questioned on a matter in which he is very much interested—to withdraw any suggestion that the judges of the Newfoundland Supreme Court are simply non-elected officials, or that anyone has subverted them. Because the word "subvert" means to overturn them, to upset them, to effect their destruction or to overthrow them. That is the definition in The Concise Oxford Dictionary.

The Prime Minister has said that the judges of the Newfoundland Supreme Court have had their destruction effected by the provinces, that they have been overthrown, overturned or upset. It is the Prime Minister who is upset and overturned and overthrown by this judgment, not the other way round.

I am not going to get excited about this. I have put this matter calmly before you, Madam Speaker, and I ask the Prime Minister to clear away this very unfair attempt to denigrate the Newfoundland Supreme Court.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the short answer would be that I have never heard such nonsense from a man who pretends to be equal to other hon. members in this House. However, I will give a longer answer to that.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, you had better!

Mr. Trudeau: Now I am being threatened by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie).

Mr. Crosbie: Well, your own reputation would demand it.

Mr. Trudeau: My first point is that I referred to the judges as non-elected officials. Madam Speaker, we both agree that they are non-elected. As to whether they are officials, I looked up the definition in The Concise Oxford Dictionary and I found the word "official", when used as a noun, meant "presiding officer or judge of archbishop's, bishop's, or especially archdeacon's court; person holding public office". So we know that one can be a judge of one kind and be called an official. An official is also a person who holds office. One reads in the same dictionary that "office" is defined as "position with duties, to wit, attached to it, place of authority or trust or service, especially of a public kind".

If anyone would be insulted because one is called a public official, it seems to me one must be even more thin-skinned than the hon. member for St. John's West. It is obvious—

Mr. Crosbie: Really humorous. It is very humorous.

Mr. Trudeau: It is obvious that I was using the expression "non-elected official" as opposed to the expression of "elected official", and we in this House are elected. I do not consider it an insult to myself to be called an elected official.

Mr. Crosbie: Never been described as that.

Mr. Trudeau: I am there to serve the public of Canada. When I was making the distinction between elected and non-elected, I was really—

An hon. Member: It is not like sophism.

Mr. Trudeau: What are you wondering about over there?

Mr. Crosbie: "Sophism", he says it is.

Mr. Trudeau: Do you mean "sophistry", or "paralogism"? Which do you mean? It cannot be both. It has to be one or the other. I think the hon. member is really referring to paralogism, but it is not paralogism, if he will listen to my argument. I am sorry that the hon. member for St. John's West is wasting our time by raising such a spurious point of order or point of privilege.

Mr. Crosbie: You think so?

Mr. Trudeau: The division of powers is what I had in mind. It is accepted, in the very House order that we have all just agreed upon, that there is a fundamental distinction between the executive, the legislative and the judicial function. In this case, I was making the distinction between those who are elected officials and therefore part of the legislative power, and judicial officials who are part of the judicial power; they must be separate. So much for the suspicion that I might be accusing some people of something, debasing them by calling them non-elected officials.

The second argument was really a sophistic one, namely, that by accusing the provinces of subverting the courts, or using the courts to their political advantage, somehow—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Not "using", "subverting".

Mr. Trudeau: —that is an attack on the courts. If the hon. member is suggesting that I might be attacking the provinces, then he might have a point; but to say that I am attacking the courts because I am saying that someone else is trying to use them is obviously sophistry.

Mr. Crosbie: You are saying they allowed themselves to be used.

Mr. Trudeau: Will the hon. member stand and say where I said they allowed themselves to be used? Will he stand up and say that right away?

Mr. Crosbie: The Prime Minister said that it is a political issue and they have used the courts to subvert the courts to their own political means. That means that the courts—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: —have allowed themselves to be used and subverted. That is plain English. It is saying that the courts are not independent and have allowed themselves to be so used.

Mr. Trudeau: My case stands, Madam Speaker. The hon. member has just proved the point that he is talking nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I have the two texts of Hansard dated April 6 and 7, to which the hon. member for St. John's West has referred and about which he has raised a point of order. The first one to which he had reference is on April 6. He felt that the reference to the judges of the Supreme Court as being non-elected officials could be denigrating or insulting to these officials. That was the only direct reference that the Right Hon. Prime Minister made to the judges. The fact that the reference was to the effect that they were non-elected officials does not seem to be either denigrating or insulting.

In my understanding of the other text, the Right Hon. Prime Minister did not speak of the courts but of the premiers, and he expressed an opinion on the way in which the premiers might be conducting their political battle in the case that concerns us. In the course of describing that situation, the Right Hon. Prime Minister used the word "subvert". The hon. member for St. John's West read the Oxford Dictionary, as I did, and he has given us the definition of "subvert", which is, of course, not an unparliamentary expression. On that ground I have to say that the point of order of the hon. member for St. John's West is not well taken.

PROVISIONS IN MAIN ESTIMATES, 1981-82

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order to seek the instructions of the Chair with regard to a notice which I gave the Chair about a week ago respecting the provisions in the main estimates of the current fiscal year, 1981-82, which I believe to be out of order based on rulings by Your Honour and previous Speakers.

I seek clarification by the Chair as to when this matter might be proceeded with. It obviously would be most advantageous to the smooth conduct of business if it were proceeded with at a time when the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) could be present. Tomorrow or the next day would be satisfactory.

After looking through the history of this matter over the last ten years, I believe this is the first occasion on which this type of point has been raised with regard to the main estimates.

Heretofore it has always been with respect to the supplementary estimates, which provide a rather limited supply period, and therefore it was seen to be appropriate, near the end of the supply period but prior to the appropriations act being presented to the House, that this point of order be raised.

I suggest to the Chair that it might be beneficial to the smooth conduct of business both here in the House and in the committees which are currently hearing these main estimates if this matter might be examined now. If the Chair were able to find that the votes which I will bring to the Chair's attention are in fact out of order, then I think it would be conducive to the smooth conduct of government business and House business here and in the committees to have the matter brought to the attention of the House at an early rather than late date.

To put it simply, I suppose I am asking direction from the Chair as to whether tomorrow or the next day, if it suits the agenda of the President of the Treasury Board, I might raise the details of the points of order with respect to those items in the main estimates.

Madam Speaker: I have received notice of the hon. member's intention to raise a point of order on this particular point, and I thank him for having given me that notice.

I just want to point out to the hon. member that those estimates constitute an order of reference for the committees and they cannot be discussed in the House until they have been reported by the committees. If the hon. member is seeking some remedies, it is perhaps through the committees that he might seek them.

However, this does not preclude the hon. member from raising a point of order at the time when the estimates will be reported to the House or deemed to have been reported to the House. It has been helpful when those points of order have been raised somewhat in advance of the time when the estimates have been discussed in the House, and I think closer to the date, that is, May 31, on which the estimates are to be reported or deemed reported to the House, I would entertain the hon. member's point of order. I think I would like to delay the matter until we get closer to that date, if that is agreeable to the hon. member. I think we will then be in a better position to deal with that problem.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I do not have any particular reason for concern, other than the fact that committees are now studying the votes, many of which I humbly submit are out of order; but if there is no problem with the committees studying votes which will subsequently be deemed out of order, there is no problem as far as I am concerned.

I do not wish my remarks to be taken as criticism, but one of the characteristics of previous decisions by the Chair is that when the Chair has concurred in the fact that certain votes were out of order, your Honour's predecessors have taken the position: "In view of the fact that we have just now known about it, we will leave them here, but let this be warning that this should not happen in the future". By virtue of the Chair's leniency in the past with regard to this type of thing and leaving in appropriations bills items which the Chair had judged were out of order—but given the time were left in—we now have circumstances in which those basically illegal votes are being used again in another illegal fashion. We have a perpetuation. I would not like the matter to be left so long that we would be back into the same circumstance of saying, "Well, given the time and so forth we will leave them in this time and hope the government will bear in mind the decision of the Chair", because, as I hope to point out when discussing the main estimates, that has not turned out to be the case in some instances.

Madam Speaker: I think I understand the hon. gentleman's intervention. It seems that we are having some trouble determining which of those votes are in order and which are not. With respect to discussions which might take place between the different interested parties, it seems that those parties always agree on the principles, but when it comes down to the actual votes, there is disagreement as to which ones are in order and which ones are not. It seems that what the Chair is doing as these estimates come back to the House is determining as we go along which of the votes the Chair feels are in order.

I do not think votes have come back because of the leniency of the Chair. I think everyone is trying to define which of the votes are in order and which are not in order. That is the reason my predecessors asked if these points or order concerning this particular matter could not be brought earlier rather than later. I will entertain points of order to try to determine which of the votes are in order, but closer to the day on which the estimates will be reported back to the House. I think that is the difficulty. As we go along we have to reflect on each and every one of those votes.

I was going to suggest that at some point there be a meeting between the interested parties, but it seems they all agree when they meet. It is when the actual estimates come out that there is disagreement. So I suppose it is the responsibility of the Chair to determine by the different rulings which of the votes are in order and which are not. I will do that, and I will be more than grateful if the hon. member gives me the wisdom of his opinion.

PRIVILEGE

MR. SHIELDS—NOTICE OF INTENTION TO RAISE QUESTION

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I have given you notice of a question of privilege. Are you prepared to hear it now? It is a very short one.

Mr. Blais: Go through the orders.

Madam Speaker: I am not sure that the hon. member's statement was complete enough. I have the notice, but the statement of the hon. member is far from complete. If he refers to the Standing Orders, he will find that it is not merely a notice that I should receive but also a statement on the question of privilege. If the hon. member wants to make a statement to me in writing, I will hear his question of privilege at another time.

MR. HAWKES—NOTICE OF INTENTION TO RAISE QUESTION

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege is of the same kind. I believe I had a question of privilege stand over from several days ago by unanimous consent. I wonder what the status of that is.

Madam Speaker: May I ask the hon. member whether he had two questions or one? If he has one, the notice I have just says, "I have a question of privilege which I would like to deal with," and that is all. There is no statement which would allow me to prepare any judgment I might have on that question of privilege.

I should remind hon. members that they should send the Chair a statement to save the time of the House. When they do, the Speaker tries in advance to understand what the question of privilege deals with and comes to the House a little better prepared to make a ruling. The Standing Orders state quite definitely that the Speaker requires a statement. In the past I have held hon. members to that Standing Order, and I intend to continue to ask hon. members to be helpful by sending me complete statements of their questions of privilege.

Mr. Hawkes: Thank you, Madam Speaker. One day I did send Your Honour a brief note on a question arising out of the question period, but I think members should send a letter containing a somewhat more expanded version. The question of privilege related to the laying before the House of false documents, and if there is some confusion—

Madam Speaker: Order. I do have that. It concerns the presentation of a false document and the making of a misleading statement to this House, but I would like to know what that false document is and what the misleading statement is. This notice is too general in nature for the Speaker to prepare any judgment on that question of privilege. I would have to know what that document is and perhaps receive the document so that I could look at it in advance. What are the misleading statements to which the hon. member is referring? I have the notice here and I do find it incomplete. I will listen to the hon. member's question of privilege only when he gives me a more complete statement.

• (1540)

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, the question concerns the falsity of motion No. 41 in the name of the House leader—

Madam Speaker: Then the hon. member can put that in writing.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, I seek your indulgence for a moment. Would it be possible to make a very short statement on the question of privilege?

Madam Speaker: It has to be put in writing and sent to the Chair one hour in advance of the time at which it is heard.

STATUS OF CLAUSE IN BILL C-57

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, I hope to be commendably brief on a matter which breaches my privilege as a member of the House and of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. It arises out of the committee's present study of Bill C-57, which is the budget bill giving effect to the proposals on the Excise Tax Act, the Excise Act, and on a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas.

I am referring in particular to paragraphs 25.12 and 25.13 at page 53 of the bill. The Chair may have received judicial notice of a judgment of the Court of Appeal of the province of Alberta dated March 20, 1981, declaring that the purported attempt by Her Majesty in right of Canada to tax natural gas, the property of Her Majesty in right of the province of Alberta, was ultra vires the power of the Government of Canada. Yesterday, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) confirmed that he was not amending Bill C-57, that he had not yet made up his mind, along with his colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) to appeal this judgment, and therefore the judgment that that portion of the act is ultra vires the powers of the Government of Canada is annulled. By a House order, this bill will be reported back to the House no later than Wednesday, April 15. In the interval, there are still a few witnesses to be heard tomorrow, and then the committee will consider the bill clause by clause.

My question of privilege is that I am put under the obligation of voting yea or nay on a clause which is being ruled illegal. It is not enough, I submit to you, Madam Speaker, to say that an hon. member can vote against it. That is only a Marie Antoinette type of remedy because there is no alternative, no choice. In fact, this clause is only part of an omnibus bill. If I find it repugnant to my position as a Member of Parliament, whose responsibility it is to uphold the law, to insist on voting against this clause, I must vote not only against sections 25.12 and 25.13, but I must vote against the whole of Clause 43 of the bill, which is Part II of the bill, and, in fact, against the whole bill, even though I may approve of a great deal of it.

My question of privilege is simply that the Minister of Finance has refused to remove that particular section and therefore not only members of the committee but all of us find ourselves in this position. Ultimately, unless there is an appeal carried to the Supreme Court of Canada which would reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeal of Alberta, or unless the minister amends this bill, we will have to vote for something that is illegal, unless we vote the bill down and defeat the government.

Madam Speaker: Again the hon. member is raising a question of privilege similar to the ones which have been raised in the House on a resolution. What the hon. member has just said leads me to conclude that he would like me to confirm the judgment of the court declaring that clause in the bill ultra vires. I cannot do that. The hon. member knows that the Speaker should not make such a judgment. As a matter of fact, the rules governing the Speaker in the House of Commons enjoin the Speaker not to do that.

If the hon. member finds himself in a dilemma as to whether or not he can vote on a bill when he objects to a particular clause of the bill, I am afraid I am unable to do anything which would get him out of that dilemma. As a Member of Parliament, it is his responsibility to determine on what side of the question he wants to vote. Therefore, I do not see that he has a legitimate question of privilege, and certainly he has not established a prima facie case.

MR. WENMAN—OMISSION OF INTERJECTION FROM OFFICIAL REPORT

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which not only have I given you notice but which has been further aggravated today. I want to raise it on both counts as a question of privilege, one with notice and one without notice. It will qualify under both categories. In order to expedite proceedings in the House, I should deal with it briefly at this stage, and therefore I seek further direction as to whether you require a longer statement in order to handle this matter more expeditiously. If you would do that, Madam Speaker, I would deal with it very quickly at this stage.

Madam Speaker: I found the hon. member's notice to be sufficiently complete. It gave me an idea of the problem to which he referred and I will hear him very briefly. If, in the first three, four or five sentences, the hon. member is not able to tell me exactly what the privilege is and whether he has a legitimate point to make, I will be at liberty to say that I do not find a question of privilege.

Mr. Wenman: Perhaps with that request I will state specifically to what my question of privilege refers. It refers to statements in Hansard of October 17, 1979, at page 303 an earlier ruling by yourself, and at page 8787 and 8790 of Hansard of last Tuesday. My problem relates to interjections and how interjections in the House of Commons are handled, particularly when there might be conflict among the various levels of recording in the House as to where the priority should lie. This is a very important matter to me. This particular interjection has given rise to my question and I think in fact will make the case that it needs further consideration by Madam Speaker.

My question of privilege is twofold, and it relates in part to recorded remarks made by members in Hansard. The second part arises out of the remarks themselves. As to the first part, the remarks were made last Tuesday during an exchange in question period between the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). The Minister of Justice was just finishing his answer, and his final remarks were as follows:

> Of course, the Prime Minister said, and it is the position of the government, that we respect the decision of the courts. But we will finish our duty as Members of Parliament to finish the work that we have started in the fall, and of course we will wait for the decision of the Supreme Court before deciding to press the matter in England—yes or no.

At that point the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made an interjection which I heard or thought I heard at the time. The interjection seemed to say, in effect, "anything if we can get it out of the House".

I wanted to be absolutely certain that in fact the Prime Minister had made the remark, so I checked with the videotape at the broadcasting unit the next morning. The videotape in fact confirmed that the Prime Minister had made a remark to this effect. To be doubly sure, I checked the blues, and to my surprise the Prime Minister's remarks were not recorded. When Hansard arrived at my office at 12 noon the next day, I discovered the remarks were not recorded there either. I must confess I find the omission extremely disturbing, as I would like to show in the second part of my argument.

Apart from the omission, which was puzzling in itself, if hon. members would refer to pages 8787 and 8790 of Tuesday's Hansard, they will notice that there are a large number of interjections which were faithfully recorded. It is in fact the faithfulness and the detail to which our Hansard reporters went that make it even more amazing that this particular remark, which was possibly one of the more significant remarks of the day, was not included.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If I understand, the hon. member is telling me that Hansard has not properly recorded all the things he himself heard from his seat, and that subsequently he listened to the tapes and found those particular interjections.

I will not entertain the hon. member's arguments any longer because that, in itself, is not a question of privilege. I want to tell him that Hansard is not a verbatim report of what happens in the House, and some would say "thank God it is not". At any rate, it is not a verbatim report; it is as complete a report as possible of what has taken place in the House of Commons.

We do everything we can to make that report as complete as possible. When interjections are not heard by the reporters and are not so recorded, there is not much the Chair can do about it; possibly the Chair itself did not hear those interjections. At any rate, this does not constitute a question of privilege. The point of the hon. member is well taken, but if Hansard reporters have not reported the interjections, then they are not part of the record and that is final.

The hon. member is not seeking the floor to comment upon my decision, is he?

Mr. Wenman: Madam Speaker, perhaps—

Madam Speaker: Will the hon. member please resume his seat. If he is rising to discuss what I have just said, he is commenting upon my decision. If he has a new point of order to raise, I can hear it, but he cannot comment upon my decision.

I have explained to him that this is not a question of privilege. This is not the first time the House has been seized of a problem of this nature. The final word is that when the reporters have recorded interjections, they are in the report; if they have not heard them, they are not in the report.

Mr. Wenman: Madam Speaker, I was just getting to the specific point. I am making the suggestion that there may have been a deliberate move to delete these remarks from Hansard because of their significance. Now, I think that—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member wants to suggest that, he must give me proof of its being deliberate. Who did it, under whose instructions, for what reason? I cannot entertain a vague apprehension on the part of the member.

Mr. Wenman: That is my question of privilege, Madam Speaker, and that is what needs to be examined by the Speaker in some detail to determine whether there was any deliberate alteration or removal because of the significance this kind of a comment would have given to the debate. If so, it could destroy the good faith we expressed today. I had great reservations—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a charge to make, he can make it. The Speaker does not investigate every time a member says that an interjection has not been reported in Hansard. That would be absolutely impossible. If the hon. member has precise proof that somebody has deliberately omitted the interjection from Hansard, he can make the charge, but he must know what are the consequences of that. Then on the basis of that charge I would make an investigation.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. CROSBY—SERVICES PROVIDED TO MEMBERS

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to the question of privilege which I raised in a letter to you dated April 1, 1981. In that letter I gave you notice of a question of privilege which was quite different in kind and character from the other questions of privilege which you first considered on that day and on subsequent days. Basically the question of privilege related to what I considered and perceived to be the preferential treatment given to Members of Parliament in relation to their access to the Official Report of the House of Commons, commonly known as Hansard. I think I gave you details of the question of privilege in the letter.

I do not want to prolong the matter here; I am quite willing to submit to you, Madam Speaker, a substantial memorandum on the subject. I have done some research and have tried to determine what was the origin of this practice of giving such preferential treatment, and I want very briefly to mention three points.

First, in a memorandum dated March 27, 1981, Madam Speaker referred to the practice of granting access to Hansard and indicated that ministers, former ministers, parliamentary secretaries and others were given special and preferential treatment in relation to the examination of the transcript of the Hansard report, that other members had to obtain access to Hansard in a different way.

Second, I want to point out that on October 17, 1979, as reported at page 303 of Hansard for that day, Mr. Speaker Jerome stated that the Speaker is in charge of Hansard, exercises control over it and is responsible for the proceedings.

Third, I want to point out that the Senate and House of Commons Act and other legislation make it very clear that members of the House are Commoners; they share the privileges of this House in common. Indeed, on April 1, in response to a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), Madam Speaker underlined again the equality of members of this House.

I cite all those points in support of my question of privilege. As I say, I do not want to prolong the matter in the House. I realize there are differences of opinion, even among members on this side of the House, about the matter, but I think I can demonstrate very clearly that we, as members of the House, ought to receive the same privileges in respect of the services of the House of Commons. Outside and off Parliament Hill we may not expect to receive equality of treatment; but if we do not receive it in the House with respect to the privileges and services provided by the House under the jurisdiction of Madam Speaker, then I think the privileges not only of myself but of all those who are victimized by this preferential treatment are dishonoured.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member sent me quite a complete letter on this particular problem. I just want to remind the hon. member that the matter of distribution of the blues has to relate to practicality. I understand there would be enormous distribution problems if the blues were sent to every member of the House.

• (1600)

I remind the hon. member that originally the blues were only provided as a courtesy to the Prime Minister, and much later they were provided to all cabinet ministers. Former cabinet ministers were then added to the list of members who receive blues. The blues are now distributed to cabinet ministers, ex-ministers, parliamentary secretaries, members of the Privy Council not in the cabinet, leaders of the parties, the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker and occupants of the chair throughout the sitting.

Mr. Nielsen: And the press gallery.

Madam Speaker: And they are distributed to the press gallery.

Mr. Crosby: What about to the member for Halifax West?

Madam Speaker: Members have usually gone to the Hansard office to look at their blues. I am in the hands of the House. If this service should be extended to all members, I can look into the practicality of providing this service. But the system has worked well up until now and this is the first complaint I have ever received with respect to it. If the hon. member will bear with us and does not find it too cumbersome to go to the Hansard office to check his own blues, perhaps we could leave the situation as it is.

Mr. Crosby: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I will certainly not comment on your decision since I am not exactly sure whether it was a decision on a matter of principle.

I would like to say this very clearly: I rose simply on a matter of principle. I did not want particularly to raise this issue because I knew of the difficulties it would cause. But in this House I thought we stood on principle and not on difficulties.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member has a valid point. I like to think of all hon. members as being equal in this House. I guess equality must refer to the fact that a member has spoken in the House. That seems entirely logical. I agree with the hon. member that if we are all equal we should all receive this service. But, again, I am in the hands of the House. I am somewhat new to this practice, but I think it was established by the House itself. I will look into the question and determine how practical it will be to proceed, and whether we are sufficiently staffed at the present time to carry it through.

STUDY OF WAGE RATES IN PUBLIC AND PRIVATE SECTORS

Question No. 2,240—Mr. Herbert:

Has the government considered the creation of a neutral body which would examine the comparability of wage rates in the private and public sectors and, if so, would such a body have the responsibility for suggesting rate changes prior to the negotiation of new collective agreements?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): There exists presently an agency within the Public Service Staff Relations Board, the pay research bureau, whose role is to obtain information on rates of pay, employee earnings, conditions of employment and related practices prevailing both inside and outside the public service to meet the needs of the parties to bargaining.

The needs of the employer and the bargaining units are established, by the pay research bureau, under the aegis of an advisory committee on pay research, comprising representatives of Public Service of Canada employers and certified bargaining agents, in order that the bureau's programs reflect their needs as closely as possible.

No action is being considered by the government in terms of changing the role of the pay research bureau or of creating another agency which would be involved in examining the comparability of wage rates in the private and public sectors.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if question No. 1,612 (revised) could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 1,612 (revised) be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOSTAGES—PRISON GUARDS OR STAFF

Question No. 1,612 (Revised)—Mr. Skelly:

1. Since 1960, how many prison guards/staff were taken hostage and what were their names, the dates and the locations of the incidents?

2. Since 1960, how many died in a hostage-taking incident and how many were killed by (a) inmates (b) penitentiary staff and, in each case, what was his/her name, the date and the location of the incident?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Elzinga: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to question No. 1,637. It has been on the Order Paper since October 21. I realize that is not a lengthy period of time when compared with the length of time it takes to answer some questions on the Order Paper, but I find it somewhat disturbing that this question was not answered prior to the National Pension Conference, since this question directly relates to the Canada Pension Plan and the action the government is taking to ensure that there will be pension funds available for individuals in future generations.

I would ask the parliamentary secretary to see what he can do with respect to answering this question in a forthright manner.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, as I have indicated many times in the past, I do my best to have answers as quickly as possible. I shall undertake to get that particular answer for the hon. member.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask about questions Nos. 1,007 and 2,003. Unless these questions have been answered in the last couple of days and I have missed them in the mail, they have not been answered. Question No. 1,007 was submitted last May 28, ten months ago. I think that the department has had some time to deal with that question. It is a very important question for small businesses and the use of form B32 to restrict international trade.

The second question, No. 2,003, was submitted on January 21. It deals with wheat sales and credit loans related to wheat sales to the Soviet Union and eastern bloc countries. It is not a very long or difficult question to answer. I would certainly appreciate some dispatch in the answering of these questions, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, it is a little difficult for me to answer the hon. member since, by his own admission, he does not know whether these questions have been answered. I am sorry, but I do not keep a running tally of the questions which have been answered. They are printed in Hansard each day. I would ask the hon. member to check copies of Hansard for the past week, and if the questions have not been answered then he can bring it to my attention in private and I will do my best to get them answered quickly.

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, I also have a point of order with respect to a question which has been on the Order Paper for six months. It is question No. 1,541. The answer is rather important to me and to the province of Manitoba in light of the difficulties with the Liberal caucus calling for the opening up of the new fighter aircraft contract—to get more work for the province of Quebec. The government is not satisfied with 48 per cent, even with only 12 per cent for the rest of Canada.

My question asks what percentage of the new fighter aircraft contract will come to Manitoba, if any. It would certainly allay a lot of our fears if I could obtain as soon as possible an answer with respect to what percentage the government will give to the five aerospace firms in Manitoba.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I will give the same undertaking to the hon. member that I gave to the others.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. 48?

Madam Speaker, Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers Nos. 50 and 52 are acceptable to the government.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that notices of motion Nos. 50 and 52 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I ask that the other notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

COPIES OF ALL CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING MRS. PAT JORDAN ON HER RETURN FROM THE ORIENT

Motion No. 48—Mr. Riis:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House, copies of all correspondence between the government and the government of British Columbia, between the customs offices in Ottawa and in British Columbia and between any cabinet minister and the Ottawa customs office in relation to a custom declaration filed by the British Columbia tourist minister, Mrs. Pat Jordan, upon her return from a trip to the Orient in the summer of 1980.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), I should inform him that there has been no exchange of correspondence between the Department of National Revenue and the government of British Columbia, nor with any other government offices mentioned in this motion, in relation to a customs declaration filed by Mrs. Pat Jordan. I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Madam Speaker: Shall the motion be withdrawn?

Mr. Knowles: Transfer for debate.

Madam Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I would question the propriety of another member transferring for debate a motion not standing in his own name.

Mr. Friesen: And he was not in his place.

Mr. Collenette: And he was not in his place either. Since it was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who said it, I am sure that he knows the rules better than I do.

The House resumed from Tuesday, April 7, consideration of Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, and motion No. 3—Mr. Beatty (p. 9053).

Mr. Fraser: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. When the debate concluded at ten o'clock last night we were on motion No. 3 and the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) was speaking. I took it that he had concluded, but we had not called a vote nor made a referral of the motion. According to the record, it has not been dealt with. I just wanted to bring that to the attention of the Chair.

Madam Speaker: Since I was not in the chair at the time, I will leave this matter to one of the assistants in the chair and I am sure he will be able to deal with it.

• (1610)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I think we should deal with the point of order raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) immediately. Do I understand that the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) had completed his remarks on motion No. 3? If so, I will simply note that the normal course would be to defer the vote on that matter if no other members wish to speak. Could the Postmaster General contribute to the situation? If there are other hon. members who seek to be recognized on the motion, I will hear them.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that indeed I had completed my intervention last night and that in fact the Chair should have recognized another member who had risen and was seeking the floor. Motion No. 3 was not voted on last night, so we are still on motion No. 3.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, we offered amendments to this Post Office bill in committee, some of which were accepted and others refused. The clause by clause consideration of the bill in committee was speeded up so that it could be reported to the House prior to the Christmas adjournment. As a result, some of the matters before the committee were not given proper consideration, even though it sat till eleven o'clock one night. Some of the amendments which were not considered in committee are now before us.

After the Christmas adjournment, the House returned in early January. At that time we were given the assurance that we would deal immediately with this urgent legislation, but presumably between then and now it lost some of its urgency and is now treated by the government as filler legislation. Nevertheless, we take this bill very seriously. That is the reason the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) brought forward this motion, which specifically directs the publication of the salaries of people appointed as vice-presidents. Under clause 10 of the bill the board has the right to fix the salary of such number of vice-presidents as it considers necessary.

The object of this motion is to ensure that those salaries shall not exceed the scale fixed by the governor in council. In other words, we would not approve the appointment of a number of vice-presidents whose salary is determined without public knowledge. The bill provides that directors of the corporation are to be appointed by the minister of the Crown and the governor in council responsible for the corporation. It is only proper and right that the salary of that appointment should be fixed. There is no reason for the remark made by the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) last evening that the salaries of these officers would be hidden.

Motions Nos. 6 and 7 which stand in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) and myself, which are grouped for voting purposes, are similar in that they call for the direction of the governor in council to be published in The Canada Gazette. The point of these motions is to ensure that the public can see what is happening. We think that is important.

I do not have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian public is very unhappy with the way in which the Post Office is operating at the present time under the direction of this minister. Indeed, the same is true of the situation under previous ministers. The minister has claimed that the Post Office works to 95 per cent efficiency. A letter sent by the Inspector General of Banks from Place Bell Canada to my office in the Centre Block took only seven days! I sent that information to the Postmaster General. This morning I received a letter from the Minister of health in the province of Ontario asking me to get together with him about the task force committee on inter-provincial financial relations. That letter took eight days to come from Toronto. If the minister regards that as good delivery, then he is quite right, because that is 95 per cent of the type of delivery we get and expect.

Mr. Speaker, we are not going to accept the appointment of vice-presidents without knowing the types of persons being hired and their salaries. Considering the experience we have had with this organization in the past, why should we allow the salaries of the chief executive officers to be kept from the public?

Last night the minister claimed that the corporation should have an element of independence. That is a laudable idea but it should not be entirely an independent organization. The minister does not claim that the organization is in competition with any other. Indeed, the whole tenor of the bill is to give the Post Office a monopoly on the delivery of letters. It is not a question of trying to protect the post office against competitors or of not allowing those competitors to know the internal workings and salaries of the executive officers of the Post Office. If it is not in competition with other companies or organizations, what is wrong with disclosure? Where is the competitive disadvantage that disclosure, or lack of it, would give the Post Office?

This bill is an attempt to establish a new corporation which will restore public confidence in the Post Office. The minister will not accept my colleague's amendment because he wants to hide something. This is not the way to build confidence in or a new sense of direction for this corporation. Surely the minister must go to the public and the House of Commons openly and say that all the cards will be laid on the table, disclosing who will be appointed vice-president and what salary will be paid. That is the kind of openness we want and we think that is necessary if this corporation is to be a success.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed that the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) did not take the opportunity to come to the committee to put forward this amendment. I think he has some concerns that he worries about.

However, I would like to respond to some of the comments made by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). We are not talking about whether salaries will be hidden; the amendment provides that we fix the salaries. Members of this party want to see the best representatives possible sitting on the board of directors.

We have some serious problems in the Post Office. We want that board to be able to select individuals who will represent the people of Canada. When that is done, the board will be presented to the governor in council for approval. We accept that. That kind of process was referred to in the committee. We accept the wording of the bill and, therefore, we oppose the amendment.

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a few pertinent remarks specifically to the proposed amendment before the House. I listened with some interest to the comments made by the last speaker. Believe me, it would certainly be my intention, and I am sure the intention of all hon. members, that we have vice-presidents and other officers of this intended Crown corporation who are competent and efficient and can inject some semblance of business judgment into the functioning of what otherwise has been a lacklustre and incompetent government department. However, that is an entirely different story, one which would take a great deal more time than the 20 minutes accorded me with respect to this matter. As I have indicated, I do not intend to take that long.

Let me deal with the provisions of the bill presented to us and the suggested amendments which have been made by our party. Clause 10(2) as it presently stands reads:

> The board may, with the approval of the governor in council, appoint and fix the salary of such number of vice-presidents as it considers necessary.

On first reading one might come to the conclusion that it was intended that not only should the governor in council fix the number, but it should also fix the salary. I submit that on a strict legal interpretation of the words as they appear, that requirement of governor in council approval would be satisfied in the event that the corporation through its board, approached the governor in council and asked: "Will you grant to us the right to fix the salary and appoint the number of vice-presidents that we choose?" The governor in council would reply "Yes". Thereby the requirements of the subclause would have been met.

What we are concerned about is not whether we have efficient service—that is an entirely different matter—but whether at any time anyone but this corporation shall determine how many vice-presidents it has and how much they are paid.

In this bill we will be embarking upon a system foreign to Parliament, I submit. Yesterday I mentioned my views with respect to the laws, specifically regulations, affecting the public in Canada which this corporation may pass, and which, if breached, could result in fines or imprisonment of Canadian citizens.

We now have the board of this corporation entitled as of right to appoint 10,000 vice-presidents and pay them $1 million each, should the board so choose, without so much as the right to determine the number of vice-presidents or their salaries, I am not saying by Parliament, but at least by the governor in council. Surely the government at this stage is not fearful of the fact that it should exercise rights which a government is normally prepared to undertake and discharge.

If we examine the amendment, it simply has the effect of dividing up and removing any interpretation difficulty which currently exists, so that clause 10(2) would read:

> The board may appoint and fix the salary of such number of vice-presidents as it considers necessary.

The board would have that authority, subject to what we propose by way of the addition of subclause (3) to clause 10, which provides:

> The salaries fixed by the board pursuant to subsection (2) shall not exceed such amount as may be prescribed by the governor in council for the Corporation.

That necessary amendment, I submit, is both logical and reasonable. I recommend it to the Postmaster General in the event that he can direct some attention to this matter. I recommend it also to our colleagues on the other side of the House. I hope all members of this House would take seriously the recommendations made by other members of this House who desire to serve the public and whose interest it is to see that taxpayers' dollars currently spent on this project, or postage revenue generated by this corporation, will be astutely administered. It is only prudent and reasonable that we should have some regard for the scrutiny that the government should give to determining the maximum salaries paid to vice-presidents of this intended corporation.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I wish to participate for a few minutes in the debate on this amendment. I listened last night to the remarks made by the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker). What we are debating is the formation of a monopoly. The hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke suggested that if the monopoly were to face a situation where it was no longer a monopoly but would have competition, the competition would then skim off the cream. In other words, all the profitable parts of the service would be skimmed off, and the Crown corporation would be left to deliver the unprofitable parts. I suppose that is a natural tendency.

I could agree with his proposal if the Post Office today would at least deliver the cream, but it does not. When it takes three weeks to deliver a letter from Toronto to Vancouver—or as someone has said, a penny a day is not bad—one wonders whether the Post Office is willing to deliver the cream.

One of the most important features we should incorporate into the operation of a monopoly is the process of scrutiny, to make sure that the monopoly is operating in the best interests of the public it is supposed to serve. I think the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke would agree with that. We must ensure that the public is protected from the callousness which is an inherent trait of human nature and is part of a monopolistic enterprise. I suggest we need an arm's length relationship to government by way of a commission to control this kind of monopoly. We have it in the telephone systems of Canada whereby the government by legislation creates a monopoly because it is the best way to deliver service to the Canadian people. If the cable systems of Canada are going to be a monopoly and the subscribers are going to be either the recipients or the victims of that monopoly, they deserve some protection from government by the creation of a commission to protect the subscribers.

Today a citizen goes to the post office and buys a stamp for 17 cents. The only assurance he has when buying that 17-cent stamp is that it will cost another 17 cents to deliver the letter. It actually costs 34 cents to deliver a letter. We have no guarantee of service.

Is the Crown corporation now being formed going to ensure that service is important? Will we have the same system of priorizing the delivery of mail that we now have in the Vancouver post office, the distribution centre for British Columbia? First-class local mail receives first treatment, followed by provincial or national mail and then by international mail. During rush periods the international mail is piled up. It is set aside until such time as the rush is over. Then it is delivered. People wonder why it takes three, four or five weeks for a letter from the U.K. to be delivered to a household in British Columbia. They do not realize that most of that time has been spent in storage in the post office in B.C.

Will there be a provision in the legislation that there be a regulatory commission which will ensure that the subscriber will receive maximum service from this Crown corporation?

The second trait that is inherent in human nature as it applies to a monopoly is that a monopoly tends to grow. With growth it tends to become inefficient. That is why I submit the amendment we are now debating is very intelligent and apropos to this Crown corporation.

I suggest the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke look at the experience of B.C. Hydro and see what has happened to that octopus over the past 20 years since it became a Crown corporation. He will see how much it has grown with seemingly very little checks against the kind of growth it has had. Would it not be circumspect in protecting the consumer that there be a built-in mechanism to ensure there are checks against unrestrained growth of this corporation? The board of directors should be limited as to the number of directors they can appoint. There should be no nepotism, no inflating of salaries. Limits should be set on salaries.

As the hon. member's party is so often willing to expound, people should go into the service in order to serve, not for what they can earn. If they want to serve on a Crown corporation which is serving the public, they should do so because they want to serve and not for the salary they are going to earn. Rest assured the vice-president and members of the board of directors of this Crown corporation will not be walking around with a tin cup. They will be adequately paid. However, there ought to be a limit and a check on growth in order to protect the consumer who would be forced into the monopolistic situation and, I submit, its inherent growth. I commend this amendment to the House and urge that members support it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11) the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

We will now proceed to motion No. 4.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General) moved:

Motion No. 4

That Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, be amended in Clause 15 by striking out lines 45 and 46 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"addressed letters weighing fifty grams;".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I must remind hon. members that when we studied this bill, and my hon. colleague opposite mentioned it in his remarks a while ago, we worked very quickly and very late into the night a few times and, unfortunately, an error was made. We forgot to delete the words "or less" in Clause 15(1)(e). I say simply to the hon. members that the purpose of motion No. 4 is to delete the words "or less" on page 8 of Bill C-42. This is a technical amendment; it is unimportant and of no consequence.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would permit a question or two.

Mr. Ouellet: Yes.

Mr. Blenkarn: The minister is removing the words "or less". The concern has been expressed to me that we will end up with a postage system which does not have a charge for 50-grams exactly. That is unrealistic. As the minister knows, this charge was worked out in order to accommodate a charge for courier service delivery. It was intended that there be in effect an escalation, that as postal rates went up the minimum charge a courier could make would go up at the same rate as a 50-gram letter. Can the minister clarify that and give us an undertaking that at the 50-gram rate now, a courier could in effect deliver a piece of correspondence for around $1.20.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): By removing the words "au plus" in French and "or less" in English, the weight is specifically mentioned. The paragraph then reads as follows:

letters of an urgent nature that are transmitted by a messenger for a fee at least equal to an amount that is three times the regular rate of postage payable for delivery in Canada of similarly addressed letters weighing fifty grams;

The specific weight must be indicated. If we say "or less" it could be interpreted as meaning that a certain discretion can be used. Our purpose is precisely to set a fixed weight, that is, 50 grams in this case. Our schedule will set the cost for a 50-gram letter at so much, and those who want to use private couriers can do so despite the fact they will be charged three times the amount asked by the Post Office Department for a 50-gram letter.

In this instance, to answer the question of the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), it would cost about 80 cents.

• (1640)

[English]

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, we argued this point out in committee. The courier service portions were areas of deep concern when we were in the committee. We lost our concerns there. This is a part of a housekeeping portion of the bill which we fought for very strongly in committee. We lost, in the committee, on the courier portions of it, and we accept this housekeeping change.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe) moved:

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, be amended in Clause 17, by striking out lines 19 and 20 at page 10 and substituting the following therefor: 'sender or addressee thereof or at the request of the government of any country or any independent postal authority, or in the event of an industrial dispute, insurrection or war';

He said: Mr. Speaker, I indicated last night while speaking in support of motion No. 1 of my colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), the particular bill with which we are dealing this afternoon and which would create a Crown corporation of the Post Office was referred to the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments at the same time as the subject matter of the bill was sent to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

The Chair will remember that back in July the standing joint committee tabled report number four to the House of Commons in which we requested that as a matter of procedure in the future all bills at second reading stage should have their regulation-making authority referred to our committee for expert study and for recommendation to the House, and to the policy committee which would study the bills with a view to making amendments.

I think the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) will concur that the hon. members of the standing joint committee proceeded with great expedition to consider the regulation-making authority in the bill and make recommendations in our report to the House as quickly as possible, and that the exercise was useful and helped us to get a grip on the whole issue as to what was involved in the regulation-making authority the government was requesting.

What would be the implications of giving the government that authority? As the Chair is aware, and as the Postmaster General will be aware, the committee, in many instances, has brought to the attention of Parliament the fact that often bills are passed by Parliament which give the government regulation-making authority beyond that which is needed, and beyond that which has ever been justified to Parliament. We recognize it is a role for regulations to play, that the government must ask Parliament for authority to operate by regulation from time to time. However, we should recognize that whenever the government asks for that authority, it is asking for discretion to change law on the basis of delegated legislation, to change the law in a way which may affect the rights and privileges and incomes of Canadians.

What we find here is yet another clause where the Postmaster General is asking that the government be given the right to pass regulations. In this instance it would affect the ability of the Post Office to delay mail. The members of the standing joint committee recognize the fact that in some instances there is justification for withholding mail and not allowing it to go through. The Postmaster General was kind enough, when he was before the committee, to give explanations as to why he felt it was necessary that power be given to the Post Office to hold and not deliver mail in some instances. The committee considered the arguments of the Postmaster General and found them persuasive. It found that there was justification for holding and not delivering mail in some instances. However, it felt that the regulation-making authorities being asked for by the Postmaster General were far too broad, that he was asking for regulation-making authority which was not sufficiently justified to Parliament, and that all of the purposes for which he was asking authority to hold mail and not to deliver it could be accomplished by being more specific in the bill itself. Consequently, when the committee made its report to Parliament, paragraph 11 of that report dealt with this particular issue. It is a brief paragraph, and I think it would be useful to put it into the record. It reads as follows:

> Paragraph (m) of Clause 17(1) contains a very large and vague grant of enabling power permitting the making of regulations 'providing for the holding of mail by the Corporation at the request of the sender or addressee thereof—
> The following words are in italics in our report:
> —or in any other circumstances specified in the regulations'. The underlined words (the italicized words) carry with them the potential for the holding of mail for purposes not now envisaged. The reason for this inclusion was explained to your committee as being, first, to accommodate bulk mailers who mail in advance, which would seem to be a matter covered by the first part of the paragraph and, secondly, to cope with situations in which, because of strikes, insurrection or war, overseas mail is 'embargoed'. Your committee recommends that the underlined words be deleted and that some such words as the following be added:
> 'or at the request of the government of any country, or any independent postal authority in the event of industrial disputes, insurrection or war.'

If the minister agrees with the amendment our committee has proposed, it would cover all of those instances where the Postmaster General has indicated he has given any justification to Parliament or to our committee for a decision by the Post Office to not deliver mail.

As I indicated previously, the committee felt that in some instances, if, indeed, there was a war or insurrection or postal disruption in another country, and if that country would prefer, because of the chaos, that mail be held until order be restored, that it is appropriate. If bulk mailers were to deliver large quantities of mail to the post office and ask that it be held and not delivered until a certain day, that would be absolutely appropriate also. That is simply a matter of providing service to a customer and ensuring that the needs of customers are met.

The committee had no complaints about that whatsoever. Our concern came from the fact that the government was asking for the authority to make regulations which went well beyond the scope of any justification ever given to Parliament. What we have stressed in report after report is that where the government asks for the authority to make regulations and where Parliament is delegating that authority to the executive and to the government, the government has the responsibility to first justify to Parliament the need for that regulation-making authority. If it can justify it, so be it. If it can justify only a portion of that authority, and if it is possible to spell out, in the wording of an amendment or specific clause or paragraph of a bill, exactly what it is that the government needs the authority for, so be it.

We believe the regulation-making authority held by the government, which is given by Parliament and which is out of the hands of Parliament, by and large, after it is given to the government, should be as constrained as possible. It should have been first justified and explained to Parliament and the Canadian people. Only that power and that regulation-making authority which has previously been justified to Parliament should be granted to the government.

As the committee report pointed out, the amendment which we have proposed here today would cover all of those instances which the Postmaster General proposed to our committee as justification for the withholding of mail.

If the government had other concerns as well, and if the Postmaster General had raised other concerns which could have been justified, we would have been prepared to see them also written into the bill in an explicit way, but we have tried to cover all those areas mentioned by the Postmaster General as being appropriate areas for the government to have the authority not to deliver mail which has been put into the system.

As joint chairman of the standing joint committee I should mention the fact that it is very uncommon in our committee for votes to be taken. To the best of my knowledge only once during my tenure as joint chairman has a vote been taken, and over the course of the past six or seven years I have been able to check only on a handful of occasions have any votes been taken. The committee functions by consensus and by all-party agreement. As a result it functions well. It is not a partisan committee. It is one which functions on the basis of co-operation, consensus and agreement.

The recommendation which is being made here today is the verbatim recommendation which was made by the committee when it made its report to Parliament after its scrutiny. It is the unanimous recommendation of our committee, without dissent on either side of the House. I think, therefore, it would be appropriate for members on all sides of the House to accept the recommendation made by the standing joint committee.

The motion I have on the Order Paper today does not go beyond that. It attempts to address every one of the concerns which were expressed by the Postmaster General when he appeared before our committee. We believe the amendment proposed is reasonable, and I hope it will receive the support of the Postmaster General and hon. members from all sides of the House.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the comments of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) who was co-chairman of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, I would like to remind him that the members of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates which was considering Bill C-42 had on hand the report of the joint committee and were fully aware of its recommendations about Bill C-42. In fact, the committee accepted a number of recommendations from the joint committee. However, the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates did not accept that specific recommendation concerning section 17(1)(m) of Bill C-42.

The committee did not accept that recommendation for some very simple reasons and in trying to make that clause more specific, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe himself reveals the basic flaw in his argument against the general power to hold back the mail. There are circumstances other than those he points out where the mail must be kept back, especially when the identity of the owner of the mail is doubtful, when the recipient has just died or in the case of a litigation, when a letter is sent to a couple that is separated or divorced. Therefore we can see that it is impossible to anticipate all the cases in the regulations. Which fully demonstrates, in my opinion, that these words are absolutely necessary.

There is another reason why I cannot accept the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe, and it is that there is no need to delete the words in question, for they provide in fact the necessary flexibility in the regulations, for these regulations will appear in advance in The Canada Gazette and will be there for the public to examine. Is this advance publication procedure not an adequate protection for this kind of situation? As a matter of fact, it is because of the usefulness of this procedure that it became one of the recommendations which the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe had presented himself, to be among those recommendations of the Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments which have been accepted by the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates and which we included in Bill C-42 when we amended it in the parliamentary committee.

I think this procedure is a guarantee and a protection, and that the text in its present form represents the ideal solution. Accordingly, I urge the House not to accept the motion of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe and I recommend that it be negatived.

[English]

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, we have before us another amendment moved by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty). It also was not presented to the committee for its consideration. I would like to discuss the amendment for a moment. It says the following should be substituted:

"sender or addressee thereof or at the request of the government of any country or any independent postal authority, or in the event of—"

I want to emphasize this.

"—an industrial dispute, insurrection or war;"

Surely to goodness the Conservative party and the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe do not want to lump the working people of the Post Office in with war or the possibility of war. Surely they do not want to lump an industrial dispute in with a war. Is that the kind of working relationship we want to bring about with postal workers? We are trying to bring about a change. We are trying to bring about a new Crown corporation in the desire that management and the workers will work together. Now hon. members bring in an amendment which refers to postal workers at the same time as it refers to these other eventualities. Surely to goodness that is not the intent of this amendment.

Mr. Beatty: Have you read it?

Mr. Parker: Yes, I have read it. The hon. member is asking that in the event there is an industrial dispute or war there will be certain changes. Surely to goodness we cannot put an industrial dispute in the same category as the possibility of war with another country.

There is legislation under which there can be mediation, negotiation, conciliation and so forth. This new Crown corporation will come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour, and the workers will be governed by the various provisions of the Canada Labour Code. I resent very much the possibility of an amendment which deals with postal workers in that type of atmosphere.

Mr. Blenkarn: It doesn't.

Mr. Parker: We are talking about working relationships in the Post Office. We are trying to bring about co-operation among the various groups working within a framework which would give them the same protection under the Canada Labour Code as that enjoyed by any other worker in Canada. We cannot support this amendment as it presently stands.

I wish the hon. member had brought this amendment in during the committee stage so it could have been discussed openly in the committee. If some of these amendments had been brought forward at the committee stage, we could have used the mechanism of the committee stage to discuss them and finalize them in order to get the good service in the Post Office we are looking for. If that had been done, when the bill returned to the House we would have been able to deal with it, complete our deliberations and pass the bill instead of having to deal with these amendments at this time.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if my hysterical friend would permit a question so that his comments can be clarified.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Would the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) permit a question?

Mr. Parker: Yes.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask my friend whether, first of all, he is aware of the fact that the procedure which was followed was that the standing and joint committee made its report while the matter was still before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates with a view to ensuring that the miscellaneous estimates committee study the report. Second, could he indicate to the House whether he is aware of the fact that the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), a member of his party, was one of the members of our committee which unanimously made the recommendation he has just announced? Third, when he is complaining about lumping in postal workers with the matter of a civil war, is he aware of the fact that all the amendment said is that the Post Office would have the right not to deliver mail to another country if there was a civil war or an insurrection in that country or if there was a breakdown in the Post Office which would make it impossible for them to deliver mail, and that they would simply request Canada to hold the mail in Canada until they were able to get that straightened out? How does the hon. member feel that that is an affront to Canadian postal workers, and what does that conceivably have to do with the Canada Labour Code?

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the fact that this was discussed in committee. The committee reported and, as the minister stated, it was taken into consideration at the committee meeting. I want to say also that that is not the intent of the hon. member's amendment. The amendment says "in the event of an industrial dispute". The corporation comes under the Canada Labour Code in such cases. That is the question with regard to the comment made by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) who is not here to defend himself, and I cannot answer that question.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I was very amused by my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker). I am afraid he does not realize that this is a debate with respect to an amendment concerning the power of the governor in council to make regulations as set out in Clause 17 of the bill. We are dealing with paragraph (h) which, the way it is written now, would give the governor in council the right to make any damn regulation it felt like making, such as refusing to deliver mail for any reason. All it has to do is to promulgate a regulation as a result of which mail would not be delivered.

I am amazed that a party which pretends to look after the freedom of the individual would countenance a clause in a bill allowing the governor in council, or the government, to decide at any moment that the Post Office could refuse to deliver somebody's mail. That is what he is arguing. It is not a question of an industrial dispute. The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) wants to restrict the right of the governor in council to prevent the delivery of mail to the recipients, and he says that the regulations could apply only to a situation where a government of any country or an independent postal authority, in the event of an industrial dispute, an insurrection or a war, requests that mail be withheld. Those are the only grounds on which the governor in council will be able to direct that the Post Office not deliver mail. Surely the hon. member would not want the Post Office to have the right, under any circumstances whatsoever and at any time, to decide to prevent the delivery of mail to anybody through one of these regulations. That is what he says. The hon. member is in favour of that kind of provision. I am literally amazed to hear that from the Post Office critic for the NDP. Clearly he does not understand the bill. He hurled criticism at my friend, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe who, together with the colleague of the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke, the hon. member for Burnaby, and other members, was involved in the regulatory process of studying this very clause and made the recommendation in a unanimous report to ensure that the government's regulatory powers are restricted to what it actually needs.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) spoke on this matter. I am sure he meant to acknowledge that he was before the committee and that the only conceivable reasons he would ever have as Postmaster General to restrict the delivery of mail were those set out in the amendment of my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe. The Postmaster General now comes to the House and says there might be a marital dispute, that somebody might be separated or divorced. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, will the Post Office be running around the country checking whether people are separated or divorced, checking on the addressees and making regulations with respect to whether any member here is married, separated or divorced and whether the Postmaster General should have a specific regulation preventing delivery of mail to a divorced person or persons?

The Postmaster General must blush at the suggestion he made in the House that he should have the right to make regulations preventing the delivery of mail to people because they may be divorced or separated. Every time someone is divorced or separated and advises the Post Office of it, mail will be withheld. The governor in council will have to inquire into family relationships and promulgate special regulations respecting the stoppage of delivery of mail to such people. Surely the Postmaster General has come to the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments and has advised the committee of all the conceivable reasons he might want to have the right not to deliver mail. The members of that committee said, yes, they would accept that, but they want the Postmaster General's regulatory power limited to what he says he needs. The Postmaster General said to that: "Oh, but I cannot remember all the powers I might want. I might want the right to make regulations in any circumstance specified in the regulation". That is a carte blanche right to make regulations to refuse to deliver mail. What could be more improper? The Postmaster General went to the committee and explained why he wanted the right. So the committee gave him everything he wanted. But he wanted more, and he cannot tell us why he wants more except that there may be some divorced or separated person somewhere to which this could apply. That is his only reason.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I just want to raise one point because I am becoming somewhat aggravated over the suggestion or insinuation of the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) that we should not bring out in the House what was discussed in the committee. Through the evolution of parliamentary procedures it has been recognized that relatively few members of the House are members of committees. There is provision for those who were not on the committee and those who were on the committee to make amendments, suggestions and changes in the proper order. If the hon. member refers to Standing Order 75(8), he will see that any amendment should be open to debate and amendment.

Let us not have any more of these suggestions that because it went through committee we are not supposed to discuss it or change it here. This is entirely different from Committee of the Whole. That provision is not provided for Committee of the Whole because all members are members of Committee of the Whole so, there is no report stage.

At report stage the hon. members who are presenting these amendments have every right to do so, and we have every right to debate them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is on motion No. 5 in the name of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty).

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

If hon. members will permit me a moment, I would like to give them the benefit of the Chair's grouping for the remaining motions. Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5, 8, 9, 10 and 11 seem to be procedurally acceptable and could be debated and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 6 and 7 are similar in part and should be debated together, with a vote on motion No. 6 disposing of motion No. 7.

Motion No. 12, standing in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), the effect of which is to dissolve the corporation, based on Parliament sitting or not sitting in a particular year on a specific number of days, seems to be out of order on the ground that it goes beyond the scope of the bill.

The long title of the bill reads:

An act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other Acts.

I refer the hon. member to Citation 773(1) of Beauchesne's fifth edition which reads as follows:

An amendment is out of order if it is irrelevant to the bill, beyond its scope—

For that reason, regrettably I cannot accept the hon. member's motion.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There has been some discussion with the Chair with respect to the order Your Honour made a moment ago. To a large extent, that grouping and ruling was given last evening.

In the interests of the proceeding of the House, I was wondering whether your order could deal with motions Nos. 6 and 7 and leave the question with respect to motion No. 12 outstanding for the time being.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It was in error that I delivered this ruling at this time as it was delivered last night. I ask hon. members to excuse me for making this ruling a second time. This matter has been dealt with, and the House will now consider motion No. 6.

Canada Post Corporation Act

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South) moved:

Motion No. 6

That Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, be amended in Clause 20.

(a) by striking out line 42 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor:

"governor in council may"

(b) by adding immediately after line 18 at page 13 the following new subsection:

"(4) The minister shall cause every direction given to the corporation and an estimate of any increased costs or losses likely to be incurred by the corporation as a result of complying therewith to be laid before Parliament on any of the first fifteen days that either House of Parliament is sitting after the day the direction was so given."

He said: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could say a word or two about the purpose of this amendment. Clause 20 (1) of the bill reads as follows:

In the exercise of its powers and the performance of its duties, the corporation shall comply with such directions as the governor in council or the minister may from time to time give to it.

The effect of Clause 20 is to allow the minister, the governor in council or the cabinet to give directions to the new Crown corporation in certain circumstances where, in the public interest, it is deemed by the minister or cabinet that a specific direction would be appropriate. However, there is nothing in the clause, as it now stands, which requires that the direction, once having been given, must be made public.

When Clause 20 was in front of the committee before Christmas, I argued strenuously that directions were legitimate but that they ought not to be kept secret. On the basis of that I moved an amendment in committee which would have required, after a direction is given, that it be then properly laid before Parliament where it could be examined by members of Parliament and the public.

At the time the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) was not disposed to accept that amendment and, as a consequence, it was defeated. Since then I have made it clear on a number of occasions in public statements that my party viewed the secret aspect of these directions very seriously and that we hoped, as soon as the government realized the degree of seriousness with which we view this particular problem, there might be some disposition on the part of the government to rethink its position taken in committee.

The Postmaster General knows I pointed out that the problem with secret directions is that management, as a consequence of a direction, may very well have to make a management decision which might be quite inexplicable, unless it was made clear that the decision was being made as a consequence of the direct intervention of the Government of Canada.

Those members of the House who concern themselves with the labour relations aspect of the Post Office ought to be very aware that unions negotiating with the management of the Post Office ought not to feel that somewhere behind the curtain secret directions are being given to management by government which could affect negotiations.

I want to emphasize that in no way am I opposed, or is my party opposed, to the government having the power to give a direction to the Post Office. I will not take the time of the House now to go into the ramifications of that or the need for that power to be in there in the event it has to be used in the public interest. But the point which I have made in the past, a point which the Postmaster General fully appreciates, is that if there are to be directions given, and if those directions are presumably in the public interest, as they ought to be, then there is nothing wrong with being sure they are made public subsequent to the direction being given so that everyone can tell exactly on what matters Post Office management or Post Office affairs are being directly influenced by the action of the government itself. When the matter was in committee I made it clear to the Postmaster General that I did not oppose the right of the Postmaster General, that is the minister in Section 20, or the governor in council from giving these directions.

I now want to turn to a procedural matter. I will raise it now and then wait for the Postmaster General to speak. In motion No. 6, Mr. Speaker, you will notice that paragraph (a) says:

(a) by striking out line 42 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor:

"governor in council may"

The effect of that would be to change Clause 20 so that only the governor in council could give a direction and not the minister. I had not noticed this before and it was only brought to my attention by the Postmaster General earlier today. That was not the intent of what I raised in committee, and it is not my intent now that a motion go forward which would mean that the direction could only come from the governor in council and not from the minister. I make the suggestion through you, Mr. Speaker, that this can be corrected. Motion No. 7 in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga South is identical to my motion No. 6, except for the fact that the hon. member for Mississauga South does not have the part in his motion referring to the elimination of the minister as having the power to make a direction.

I would therefore suggest that when this matter is considered perhaps I could be allowed to withdraw, by consent, motion No. 6 and that motion No. 7 proposed in the name of my hon. friend, the hon. member for Mississauga South, go forward. I suggest the House could dispose of this matter on that basis.

I now refer to the order of the Chair of last night, which Mr. Speaker just repeated in error. The order of the Chair last night said that motions Nos. 6 and 7 should be debated together and that motion No. 6 would be dealt with, thus disposing of motion No. 7 because the substance was the same. What I am suggesting now is that with the consent of the House I withdraw motion No. 6 and that motion No. 7 be the motion we now address ourselves to.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, when these amendments were proposed my friend was tied up with another committee. We discussed these motions and you will notice they are identical. I respect my hon. friend's suggestion with respect to making sure that the directives could come from the minister and not just the governor in council. I therefore accept the suggestion that motion No. 6 be withdrawn and we debate motion No. 7. The essence of the motion is to make sure—

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: In reply to the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) and the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), I should like now to inform hon. members that if there is the unanimous consent of the House to dispose forthwith of motion No. 6 and to proceed with consideration of motion No. 7, I should be quite willing to accept motion No. 7 as moved by the hon. member for Mississauga South.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I will, of course, accede to the request by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser). At this point I think it would be useful to bring to the attention of the House the provisions in the Crown corporations bill which was introduced by the Clark government, Bill C-27. It contained two essential elements, one of which is covered in my colleague's motion No. 7, which the House will be proceeding with.

The other element would have restricted the government to directives issued by the governor in council and not by a single cabinet minister. The reason for that was that the Crown corporations task force and the government of the day felt that the concept of interfering in the day to day operations of a Crown corporation, by the issuance of a directive, was sufficiently serious as to warrant a decision being made by the cabinet as a whole and not by a single minister. Consequently, the decision was made at that time to require that it be the governor in council and not a single minister who would issue a directive. However, it was the motion in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver South, and is part of the agreement with the minister that motion No. 7, which would at least eliminate the secret nature of directives, go forward and that his be withdrawn. Consequently, I would give my consent to the withdrawal of my colleague's motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The House has heard the request of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) that motion No. 6 be withdrawn and that motion No. 7 be debated.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved:

Motion No. 7

That Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, be amended in Clause 20 by adding immediately after line 18 at page 13, the following new subsection:

"(4) The minister shall cause every directive given to the corporation and an estimate of any increased costs or losses likely to be incurred by the corporation as a result of complying therewith to be laid before Parliament on any of the first fifteen days that either House of Parliament is sitting after the day the directive was so given."

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, and motion No. 7 (Mr. Blenkarn).

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, if I heard the minister correctly he indicated that he is prepared to accept this motion. I see he is nodding his head so there is no point in spending the time of the House to speak in favour of the motion. I think we have had enough discussion and, if the minister is prepared to accept the motion, we could perhaps put the question.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak in favour of this motion also. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) and the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) fought hard for it in committee. We supported them there and we support them here tonight.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General) moved:

Motion No. 8

That Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, be amended in clause 29 by striking out line 45 at page 15 and substituting the following therefor:

"the next estimates laid before Par-".

He said: Mr. Speaker, again this is a small technical amendment which was suggested to us by the legal adviser of the House of Commons. If we read Bill C-42, at page 15, we can see the words "in the next Appropriation Act laid before Parliament". The legal adviser of the House of Commons has suggested that we use instead the words "the next estimates laid before Parliament", and that is the amendment I propose.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved:

Motion No. 9

That Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, be amended by deleting clause 31 and substituting the following therefor:

"31. The accounts and financial transactions of the Corporation shall be audited annually by the Auditor General."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a long clause which provides that the corporation will have two auditors. A number of other clauses provide how they shall work. It is the position of this party that the Auditor General of Canada, who is developing a comprehensive system of auditing Crown corporations in order to protect the public interest and to make the disclosure that parliamentarians and the whole country require, should audit the corporation. We do not need companies such as Touche Ross or Coopers & Lybrand and the like to audit the postal corporation at government expense. This corporation is not in real competition with other private corporations. Its purpose, presumably is to facilitate the government's mandate to deliver the mail. This department of government is to become a corporation but it will not be a corporation like Air Canada or Canadian National Railways. By its very nature it is subject to directive by governor in council, to ministerial directive; indeed, almost everything it does, including setting postal rates, is subject to direction by the governor in council. That being the case it is essential that Parliament's auditor conduct the audit of the corporation. I could say a great deal about the cost of private auditing. Parliament's auditor should do the work in accordance with the kind of report required by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. This corporation will be something like Statistics Canada or Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and it should be audited in the same fashion. To suggest that the Auditor General is not capable is to cast a slur on him; that just is not so.

This corporation must report to Parliament in the manner in which Parliament is accustomed to receiving reports. A comprehensive audit should be carried out and the auditing practices of the Auditor General of Canada should be followed year after year. The audit should not be farmed out to one auditing company or another. The way that the corporation operates, its profitability and the use of money Parliament from time to time may need to vote in the estimates to support its activities, should be part of Parliament's auditing practice. Indeed, the Comptroller General should be involved and the report of the Auditor General should come before the committees of Parliament.

We are not happy with the way the post office has operated in the past and so we are about to experiment with a new postal corporation. There are many ways of going about this and of doing audit. The hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) pointed out an instance where an auditing company put a great qualification on the balance sheet of de Havilland aircraft. That was a private audit. But where a qualification is required we think that Auditor General of Canada should explain the matter. Members of Parliament cannot ask a private auditing company to explain the details of the financial requirements of the corporation if they are not empowered to do so by a committee of the House. How are they to find out where the money is being spent and how effective and efficient the corporation is? It is our position that the Auditor General of Canada should audit this corporation and that motion No. 9 should be adopted.

● (1740)

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak against the amendment and point out to the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) that actually where the major Crown corporations in Canada are concerned, the Auditor General is not responsible for the auditing of their accounts. Corporations such as Air Canada, the Bank of Canada, the Federal Business Development Bank, the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Wheat Board, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and even the Cape Breton Development Corporation use the services of private firms of auditors.

It would therefore seem quite normal that a large organization such as the Canada Post Corporation be authorized to hire auditors from the private sector. In any event, I believe this question will be settled not as if it were a separate issue but in a general way since it will be covered in the omnibus bill soon to be introduced by my colleague the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). Therefore I would much rather leave Bill C-42 as it is and settle that question later in the omnibus bill.

[English]

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on this amendment. It came up in committee and it was discussed quite thoroughly. The minister said the same thing today he said in committee. I am pleased to see the Conservative Party recommending that the private sector not do the audit and the Auditor General do it instead. We agree with that procedure. We said so in committee and we say it here. We support this amendment.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I want to comment on this amendment. I share the concern of the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) that present Clause 31 will lead to some very undesirable situations. This is not only my opinion; I share the concern of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. I know this group has written to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) expressing its concerns, and I imagine the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) has received a copy also. I will deal with those objections in a moment.

The amendment of my colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga South does a number of things. First, it eliminates a very long section and replaces it with a short and clear section. Any time we can shorten up legislation and get rid of any questions which might arise through wordiness is a good thing. We have a servant of Parliament here, the Auditor General, who reports annually to Parliament. Because his report is tabled in Parliament, the information therein is accessible to all Members of Parliament through the proper channels. For example, there is an automatic reference to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

If we leave the clause as it is, we find in Subsection 7 that we will have a report made by the auditors to the corporation under this section transmitted to the minister by the auditors at the same time as such report is transmitted to the corporation. That does not give access to parliamentarians or to Parliament itself, except when the minister decides that such a report should come before Parliament. We have seen examples over the years of ministers sitting on reports like this because there is something in them which the minister happens to think should not come before Parliament. Parliament relies heavily on the advice of the Auditor General, as does the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. If we have our servant of Parliament reporting to Parliament, then there will be no secrets. In other words, no information will be lost. If we have outside auditors reporting to the minister, then we have no idea what information will filter down to Parliament.

To be fair, in Section 33, which is the reporting section, we find that the corporation shall submit to the minister an annual report in such form as he may prescribe relating to the activities of the corporation. Further on in Section 33(1) we read:

—the minister shall lay the report before Parliament on any of the first fifteen days that either House of Parliament is sitting after the day he receives it.

We have also seen that annual reports of corporations, such as this, do not necessarily include the report of the auditor of that corporation. Therefore, if the Auditor General does not perform the audit of this corporation, Parliament will be laying itself wide open.

The minister has told us, and he has told me as well, that he wants to keep Section 31 as it is because he is going to rely on the proposed changes in the Crown Corporations Act, which the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) indicates he is ready to introduce in the House as soon as he gets the approval required from other places.

The House has not seen that act. I do not know what it is going to say, of course. If it is going to say something other than what the amendment my colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga South, proposes, then I still think it will be a loss for Parliament in that we will not have that information available to us.

I think I should share with the House some of the concerns of the Institute of Chartered Accountants. As I said, the president of that body has written the Prime Minister. Having reviewed the bill, the institute found Section 30, the only section dealing with auditors and the audit report, deficient in several areas. The institute has outlined those areas, such as follows:

An audit committee: the duties of an audit committee; the auditor's right to attend the audit committee's meetings, or to call a meeting; and the duty of directors and officers to inform the audit committee of errors or misstatements in the financial statements.

Most Crown corporations have audit committees; whether it is the Auditor General or private auditors, it does not matter. Apparently, the post office corporation would not be required to have an audit committee. The situation when an auditor ceases to hold office, whether it be through death, resignation or the appointment of a successor, is not adequately covered. The bill does not provide for the right of an auditor to submit to a board of directors or the appropriate minister the reasons for his resignation or why he opposes the proposed actions. In the profession, a replacement auditor is required to seek out reasons from the previous auditor, but the retiring auditor should be required to give his reasons for resignation or, if he has been disposed of, before his expiry time. There are no provisions for the removal of an auditor or the right of an auditor to provide essential information. That is one of the things this Parliament has provided the Auditor General, that is, the right of access to essential information. The bill does not provide for the qualified privilege of an auditor's report and statements.

Nor does it provide the use by the corporation of generally accepted accounting principles as set forth by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. For those of us who have been looking at Post Office reports over the years, I think we would like to be assured that the corporation will use generally accepted accounting principles. Furthermore, there is no provision for the annual attest audit of the corporation's financial statements or the auditors' report on them. The bill should contain provisions similar to the Canada Business Corporations Act, which calls for both the audit and the audit report.

The provisions in Clauses 30(1) and (2) for the governor in council to appoint joint auditors, each for a two-year term, is regarded by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants as "an expensive and awkward procedure that offers few significant benefits." It is one which the CICA thinks should not be included.

The minister made a reference to a list of Crown corporations that have private auditors. I do not have the list with me, but there are dozens, if not hundreds of Crown corporations audited by the Auditor General. I think at the last count we found 436 Crown corporations. If some of them are audited by private corporations, then the rest obviously are done by the Auditor General. I believe the minister mentioned the Canadian National Railways and other Crown corporations which have private auditors.

As I said earlier, the access to information by Parliament from those corporations is not as good as it is from corporations which have the Auditor General as their auditor. We are now going through an experience of another Crown corporation which no longer wants the Auditor General as its auditor. It has taken steps which I have questioned in the House with the energy minister. That corporation is Eldorado Nuclear. It is in the process of getting rid of the Auditor General in order to turn its auditing over to the private sector. This will remove that corporation from the purview of Parliament. It may go some way toward destroying the right of parliamentarians to see that comprehensive audits are carried out where necessary.

I think I have covered all of my points. I hope the minister will see fit to reconsider the very sensible amendment of my friend from Mississauga South.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INVESTIGATION OF PLANS TO PURCHASE GULF CANADA LTD.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of very urgent necessity. It appears now that the rumours projecting a takeover of Gulf Canada by the Canadian National Railways Pension Trust Fund are closer to the truth than ever thought before. To ensure that Canadian taxpayers are not ripped off, as they were in the Petrofina takeover, and to guarantee CNR pensioners get fair treatment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges):

That this House instructs the Minister of Transport to launch an immediate investigation into CNR's plans to purchase Gulf Canada Ltd. and also that he investigate the financial relationship between the CNR pension trust fund and CN's investment practices.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

TIMETABLE FOR PREPARATION OF BRIEFS FOR SUBMISSION TO PARLIAMENTARY TASK FORCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that this closure-crazy, artificial-deadline-setting government is now giving the groups who represent disadvantaged people, health care, and post secondary education in this country 11 days, at most, of public notice to prepare and call the meetings necessary to decide whether they want to present a brief to the parliamentary task force on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House direct the task force to have an early meeting with the chairmen of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, so that they can learn first hand of the difficulties which short, artificial deadlines pose for concerned and committed Canadians who have a contribution to make to our legislative process.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the government's failure to live up to the promise that the Herd Maintenance Program's appeal board would be given the authority to amend the rainfall and production criteria of the program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That the government extend the appropriate authority to the appeal board so that the inequities caused by the government's arbitrary rainfall and production criteria can be cleared up and so that the many western livestock producers who have not qualified for the assistance payments because of these unfair criteria can be treated with compassion and consideration by board members familiar with the problems caused by last year's drought.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROGRESS OF IMPLEMENTATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity under Standing Order 43. Whereas I issued a first term report card last June which showed that the minister of energy had failed to keep the Liberal 1980 election promises, whereas the minister has introduced his National Energy Program which is clearly unworkable, and whereas it is now report card time in the country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo), a teacher:

S.O. 43

That this House endorse the marks I have given the minister today in his second term report card, that is, incomplete for public ownership, a D for Canadianization, and F's in taxation, prices and co-operation.

I trust this will, of course, get unanimous consent of the House.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE PRIME MINISTER

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, a shock wave rolled across Canada today when Jim Munson, president of the Parliamentary Press Gallery, announced that the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) refused to speak to the annual press gallery dinner. This breaks a tradition that has been in place since the first dinner which began just after the First World War. Since the Prime Minister enjoys breaking traditions and establishing new ones, and since the Leader of the NDP will now be reading the Prime Minister's speech, which has been the tradition of the past year, under Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish):

That this House express its concern that the Prime Minister is constantly breaking with tradition but understands that he cannot speak at the press gallery dinner on Saturday night because he doesn't have the constitution for it.

Madam Speaker: I know the importance we all accord to the press gallery dinner, but I fail to see that as urgent and pressing.

SUPPORT FOR INDEPENDENCE OF POLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of critical importance to world peace and security. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this House go on record as being in support of a peaceful resolution to the crisis in Poland and in opposition to outside military intervention and interference, and further, that this House go on record as commending the initiatives of individual Canadians sending food aid to Poland as a humanitarian gesture in a time of difficulty.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AUTOMOBILE SEAT BELT EDUCATION PROGRAMS FOR CHILDREN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I rise under provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In 1980 the task force on regulations under the Hazardous Product Act required that the road motor vehicle safety branch of Transport Canada develop standards in safety for vehicle child restraint systems and infant carrier restraints. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That on the basis of this report this branch of Transport Canada should undertake public education programs to promote child passenger safety in vehicles and urge strongly the rest of the provinces to follow the example of Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, in enacting seat belt legislation, and that all provinces take the initiative of Saskatchewan and include children under the age of five in this legislation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

FLIN FLON MINING PROJECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, in light of the fact that the Manitoba government has rescinded the Tory-appointed Clean Environment Commission's order which stipulated that the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company should restrict ground level concentrations of sulphur dioxide at its Flin Flon mine; and since the Flin Flon installation emits 650 tons of sulphur dioxide into the atmosphere every day, to the extent that vegetation in the area is showing serious deterioration; and due to the mounting concern about the matter of acid rain, or, as is often the situation in this case, acid snow, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That since the Flin Flon mining district comes under federal jurisdiction for most matters due to the fact that the mine crosses the Manitoba-Saskatchewan border, this House calls on the federal government to investigate this dangerous abdication of responsibility by the Manitoba minister of the environment.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

CANCELLATION OF SPRING HERRING SEASON IN SOUTHERN GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) has abruptly announced the cancellation of the spring herring season in the southern Gulf of St. Lawrence just days before its opening. Weeks of work have been wasted on preparation for the season by fishermen, which now only compounds the financial hardships that they will experience due to the ineptness and the callous attitude of the minister toward the east coast fishery. I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House instruct the minister to develop a comprehensive program that will identify potential problems such as shortages in fish stocks in time, so that fishermen may realistically plan their future for something more tangible and rewarding than unemployment insurance.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The increased interest rates announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) affecting the Farm Credit Act as of March 31, 1981, will place the farmers under additional financial pressure, considering the very high cost of production and the high interest rates, bringing many of them to the point of bankruptcy. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That the government reconsider its actions and call on the Bank of Canada to roll back the interest rates which have been announced and are having such a devastating effect on the farm economy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

LEGISLATIVE PROTECTION FOR CONSUMERS IN BANKRUPTCY CASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Twenty-seven Saskatchewan farmers are being forced to pay twice for farm implements—the amount involved is approximately $240,000—because they made their cheques payable to a dealer who recently declared bankruptcy and not to the trust company which held a lien on the implements being sold by the dealer. Because the dealer declared bankruptcy without turning over the payments for the equipment to the trust company, the trust company is now able to demand payment in full from the farmers who have already paid for their equipment through the dealer.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse):

That the government move to introduce retroactive legislation this session designed to protect consumers in financial matters resulting from bankruptcies.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ENERGY

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter which is extremely important at this time. The forthcoming meeting between the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and the Alberta minister of energy on April 13 is vital to the well-being of the nation. As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has cancelled his appearances before the Standing Committee on Natural Resources and Public Works today and tomorrow, and therefore will not be available for questioning on a new oil and gas pricing regime, in order to assist the minister to succeed in these negotiations I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That these energy negotiations represent all parties in this House and that the minister invite one member from each party in this House as witnesses to the negotiations on April 13 between Ottawa and Alberta.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FISHERIES

WEST COAST CHINOOK SALMON STOCKS—NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, if he can take his place promptly.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is well aware of the seriously devastated state of chinook salmon stocks on the west coast, and he is also aware that in the last year or two the United States commercial and native fishery have taken an increasing toll of Canadian waters-bound chinook salmon by interception at Point Roberts in the Puget Sound area. It is estimated that the U.S. fishermen are taking almost 20 per cent of the total returning chinook stocks and that they are intercepting some 200,000 chinook salmon, while the Fraser River gillnet fishermen last year caught only 20,000 chinook salmon.

I want to ask the minister what progress he has made, either privately or publicly, in obtaining some concessions from the Americans, and from his counterparts in Washington state in particular, to ensure that the U.S. fishery will back off from the Canadian chinook salmon resource.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I am quite happy to inform the House that the U.S. authorities have responded positively to our request. They have recognized our efforts to conserve chinook and have given a positive answer to our request.

CLOSURE OF UPPER PART OF FRASER RIVER

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has not addressed the basic discrepancy that the Fraser River gillnetters are taking less than one tenth of those Canadian stocks compared with what the U.S. fleet is taking. He has not told us what specific initiatives the Americans have consented to apply to conserve those chinook salmon.

Is the minister prepared to rescind the closure of the upper part of the Fraser River known as area 29 D and to allow the Fraser River gillnet fishermen, who have been making strong representations to him this week, at least one day's opening a week, bearing in mind that last year the Canadian fishermen had only nine days' fishing while their U.S. counterparts had at least 63 days' fishing on the same Canadian salmon stocks?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I fail to understand the hon. member. He asks me a first question, and I answer saying to him that the American authorities have responded positively to our approach to them. They will limit the effort of their seiner fleet off Point Roberts.

As to the second issue, there is a further meeting planned with the fishermen and representatives of my department. I believe it will be either on April 20 or April 22. Proposals have been made by both sides, and I am quite sure we can find an agreement. That is our intention, and that is our approach to this problem.

REQUEST FOR EARLY ACTION

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in the past several weeks the minister has failed to produce the breakdown of who is catching what share of that rapidly depleting Canadian resource known as the chinook salmon stock. He has failed to tell us again today what degree of concessions the Americans are prepared to make, bearing in mind that they are taking almost 20 per cent of that resource. The minister has failed once again to commit himself to allowing the Fraser River gillnet fishermen to continue to enjoy the livelihood they have enjoyed for many, many years by granting them at least a one-day per week opening in the area known as 29 D on the Fraser River. Is the minister not prepared to recognize that he will bankrupt and destroy the livelihood of many Canadian fishermen if he does not act, not later this month, but here today?

● (1420)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member had three questions lined up and it did not matter what the answer was, he had to ask those three questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: How about one answer?

Mr. LeBlanc: The difficulty is that I gave him the answer he wanted to the first question, but he has insisted on continuing with two more.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Obviously you have the one answer.

Mr. LeBlanc: I have been lobbied by exactly the same group with whom the hon. member has met. I had a session of an hour and 45 minutes, a useful, productive session with them yesterday. In fact they did not ask for a breakdown. I told them, as I told the hon. member, that the U.S. authorities have responded very positively. They have gone a long way to meet our objectives. I do not think I should make a decision here before consulting the group. We have agreed to meet on April 22. Surely if I did that, the hon. member would be the first to complain.

RESPONSE BY UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES TO REQUEST SEEKING REDUCED CATCHES—MINISTER'S RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is for the same minister. It is obvious the minister had three answers lined up and it did not matter what the questions were.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: The minister says he has received a positive response from the United States. I should like to know if that response was in writing, and to what extent will the United States correct the present imbalance?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I suspect we would need cue cards to tell the hon. member when his turn comes up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. LeBlanc: This may be weak, but it was the suggestion from that side.

I said the U.S. authorities have responded very positively to our request. I do not have the exact arithmetic in front of me this afternoon. We are satisfied it goes a very long way toward meeting the objective which was to reduce the catch of Canadian chinook by American seiners. I am satisfied that this will go a long way to balance our efforts at conservation, that the sports fishermen, the commercial fishermen of Canada and the commercial fishermen of the United States make serious efforts to restrict the pressure on the depleted chinook stocks.

Mr. Friesen: It is obvious that cue cards would not help.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Friesen: In the past year during which the minister has been in his portfolio he has subjected the west coast fisheries by long distance negotiation to a series of changes in policy, management and regulation. During that time, I suppose because he is from the east coast, he has been to the east coast at least once, if not twice a month, but in that same period of time he has been to the west coast only once for one day, avoiding management and advisory boards, and not meeting with them. I should like to ask the minister if he sees himself as the fisheries minister for all of Canada or for just the east coast.

Mr. LeBlanc: I really do not understand the hon. member's question because the group I met yesterday was much more generous than the hon. member. They recognized that a minister who happens to come from the east coast nevertheless put into operation the most dramatic development program, called the salmonid enhancement program—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. LeBlanc: —that this minister—as my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture sometimes refers to himself—put into effect the toughest habitat protection legislation, with the approval of all sides of the House, at the request of the west coast fishery. I might say to the hon. member that I had planned a fairly lengthy session on the west coast in March. Unhappily, the sort of filibustering we have been having has tied all of us down to this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INCOME TAX

RECOMMENDATION MADE BY NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WELFARE—REPLACEMENT OF CHILD TAX EXEMPTION WITH CHILD TAX CREDIT

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. In a report released earlier in the week the National Council of Welfare confirmed the tragic facts that there are one million poor children in Canada and that three out of every ten single women are poor.

Is the minister now prepared to enact the chief recommendation of the National Council of Welfare report, that the child exemption contained in the income tax return be replaced by a much richer child tax credit? In asking that question I remind the minister that his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, made the same proposal but indicated that it was only her private opinion. What is the public opinion of the Minister of Finance with respect to the tragic inequality in our tax system and the need to replace it with a more progressive tax credit system?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I know the council issued a report. I asked to see the report yesterday or the day before, but up to the present time I have not had a chance to study it. Obviously the question the hon. member raised is a budgetary matter. That and other items will be considered as preparations are being made for the next budget.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, the minister may regard it as simply a budgetary matter, but I think people filling out their income tax returns this month realize that it is a fundamental fact of fairness in our system.

Miss Bégin: Yes, and they love it.

BANKS AND BANKING

INCREASE IN PROFITS OF CHARTERED BANKS—PROTECTION FOR INDIVIDUALS AGAINST HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would like to deal with another aspect of fairness in our system. It concerns the interest rates being charged by chartered banks and their effect on bank profits.

I would like to point out to the Minister of Finance that in another private opinion, in this nice-TALK tough-TALK routine in which the government is so expert, the Minister of Agriculture took a large swipe at the chartered banks and complained about the fact that they were charging such high rates.

In light of the fact that today the Bank of Canada announced another increase in the bank rate, which will have an effect upon interest rates throughout the system, and that chartered banks only pay taxation at a rate of somewhere between 15 per cent and 20 per cent, is the minister now prepared, in light of the recommendations of the Minister of Agriculture, to do something to see that average Canadians are not charged interest rates of upwards of 20 per cent and 25 per cent? Is he prepared to tax the banks on the excess profits which the Minister of Agriculture said they have been making over the past few years?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the question of the profitability of the banks was raised in the House on earlier occasions.

Mr. Epp: That is profound.

Mr. MacEachen: It is true, if one looks at the performance of the banks over the last quarter that there is an indication the profitability has improved for one quarter.

Mr. Rae: Improved? Do you call that an improvement?

Mr. MacEachen: If the hon. member looks back over the experience of quite a number of years he will find that there has been a rather firm or steady level of profitability, and in the quarters immediately preceding this good quarter I do not think even the hon. member would say that their profitability was out of line with former experience. I just do not think the experience of one quarter and a very volatile interest rate market are a good basis upon which to form long-term policy with respect to the banks. I promised the hon. member or other hon. members that, as time goes on, if this trend continues, then it will be appropriate to take a look at whether remedial action is required.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF PROGRAM WITH REASONABLE INTEREST RATES

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my final supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Public Works who is responsible for housing. The government's high interest rate policy and its "do-nothing" housing policy now mean that 70 per cent of the loggers on the British Columbia coast face lay-offs or short work weeks. When will the minister announce a housing program with mortgages at reasonable rates so Canadians will have decent places to live and so that woodworkers will be back at their jobs?

● (1430)

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, any announcement or position vis-à-vis interest rates relating to the housing sector would, of course, invite comparison or experience in other sectors of the economy, and any movement of the government would have to be in accordance with an appreciation that it would affect all sectors. However, I might say that it is my appreciation, when I compare, for example, the actions in its budget, committed by the province of British Columbia toward housing, with other provinces in Canada, bearing in mind the pressure of housing needs in the province of British Columbia, I have indicated that I think there is room for that provincial government to adopt a response on a regional basis and to bring in add-on programs, to build, for example, on the MURBs, as the province of Ontario has done.

PENSIONS

INDEXING PROVISIONS FOR SENIOR CITIZENS

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and deals with the need for a senior citizens price index to protect pensioners from the ravages of inflation. As I pointed out earlier, there are new studies which indicate there is a shortfall of about $50 million or $60 million a year between the present rate of inflation and the indexing system. The minister said that he would look into this matter further. I wonder if he has anything further to report on this matter to the House.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I promised the hon. member that I would look at the question which she has raised, which I regard as a very important one, and would refer to the study to which she referred in her question showing a discrepancy between the cost of living index and a new established pension index. I believe, on re-examination, the hon. member would agree that the discrepancy between the current system and the one to which she referred was not of the order which she mentioned, but that if one accepted the study it would be a difference between 12.2 per cent and 12.7 per cent. I do not discount that at all.

However, I would remind the hon. member that other studies, such as the one conducted by the C. D. Howe Institute, and one by Statistics Canada, show somewhat different results. I believe one case showed that there really is no difference between an index constructed specially for old age pensioners and the CPI, and another which states that maybe in the eight years between 1971 to 1978 the pension index was lower than the CPI, so that if one adopted it, the pensioners would be worse off.

Miss MacDonald: They're worse off now, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: I believe it is an important question, but the evidence is not clear that the pensioners are being materially affected by this division of opinion in any way. If it were established, then I think it would be a matter that one would want to look at and review.

REQUEST FOR SURVEY OF SENIOR CITIZENS' EXPENDITURES

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): My supplementary question is also addressed to the Minister of Finance. I think the answer of the minister has highlighted the problem, which is that there is a lack of clarity with respect to the impact of inflation on senior citizens. Since the mail received by most Members of Parliament will indicate that this group is experiencing undue hardship at the moment, and since the cost of living index is based on a typical urban family, which tends to exclude pensioners, would the minister undertake to initiate a survey of senior citizens' expenditures to incorporate into the present indexing scheme full protection of pensioners from inflation, and clear this matter up?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if I thought, and if any of the evidence showed that there was a significant disadvantage to the elderly, whom we all want to protect, then I would undertake a survey. However, at the present time there does not seem to be any evidence which would suggest that pensioners are not being fully protected.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Shame on you!

Mr. MacEachen: Whatever evidence there is is contradictory. I believe that old age pensioners are very substantially protected against changes in the cost of living.

An hon. Member: How can you say that at your age?

Mr. MacEachen: I say it because I have more wisdom than you.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

REOPENING OF CONTRACT TO CONSTRUCT F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): My question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. Over 1,000 McDonnell Douglas workers who celebrated the announcement of the F-18 contract by drinking champagne a little over a year ago, are today walking the streets, looking for work. Last summer, nearly a year ago, tenders were called, and McDonnell Douglas Canada submitted bids to construct the forward fuselage side panels and the pylons on the new aircraft. When the subcontract bids closed the first time, was the McDonnell Douglas Canada bid the only one for side panels and pylons from a Canadian source, and why did the government request McDonnell Douglas of St. Louis to reopen bids after the tender deadline?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman is under a misapprehension. There was no request by the Government of Canada to reopen the bids. There was an announced proposal relating to some of the items in the structural package which came from Canadair and was submitted to McDonnell Douglas. As a result of that unsolicited proposal, McDonnell Douglas invited the other bidders to attempt to fix their bids and the whole process is now under a revision by McDonnell Douglas. An announcement is bound to be made soon.

Mr. Nielsen: Fixing bids, eh?

Mr. McDermid: By way of a supplementary question, and for some clarification, is the minister saying that the federal government did not formally or informally request a bid from Canadair on side panels or pylons or any other components, for that matter? Was that not a commitment which was made by the government so that McDonnell Douglas would get the contract, a commitment which the Quebec Liberal caucus insisted upon?

Mr. Blais: The hon. gentleman should consult with the hon. member for Victoria relating to the nature of the contract. The contract on the purchase of the F-18 requires that the bidding process be one between McDonnell Douglas and potential subtrades. It is the responsibility of McDonnell Douglas to award the contract to the subtrades in accordance with the terms of the main contract that it has with the Government of Canada.

FISHERIES

REQUEST THAT FRASER RIVER BE OPENED ONCE A WEEK FOR GILLNET FISHERMEN

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I would like to address a further question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. He has mentioned that his officials will be meeting again with the Fraser River fishermen on April 22. I honestly want to ask the minister if he believes that the Fraser River fishermen can wait until then before hearing definitively the answer that the minister should have given earlier today, namely, that the area 29-D will be open and there will be a minimum one-day a week fishing for the gillnetters.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, it has been my impression that the fishermen of that area, including some who were present at the meeting I had with the union representatives yesterday, are not shy to express their views.

They did not discuss the date of the twenty-second at all. They all seemed to be agreed, and it was a date which was agreed at the meeting, I am told. So I do not understand why the hon. lady wants me to make a decision now before further consultation has taken place. I just do not understand her point.

Miss Jewett: The reason they had to come to Ottawa was because the minister would not go to the west coast.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Jewett: The UFAWU do not spend $25,000 easily or lightly. They expend it in order to get an answer from the minister while they are here, and they are here until Friday. Will the minister give them an answer now?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. LeBlanc: I think the hon. lady reflects rather negatively on a group of very responsible people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. LeBlanc: They have chosen to spend some four days in Ottawa. They will appear before the parliamentary committee—I believe it is tomorrow morning—yes. I had a very good and productive meeting with them. I do not understand what the hon. member means by my forcing them to spend $25,000.

AGRICULTURE

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM—EXPENDITURE OF FUNDS

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, I will direct my question to the minister who expressed his dissatisfaction with his government's policy of high interest rates last evening. My question is with respect to the herd maintenance program. Is it the government's intention to spend all of the $60 million originally allocated for that program? If so, would the minister verify whether or not some $13.6 million remains in uncommitted funds?

• (1440)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member makes certain mention of a comment that I made yesterday in Winnipeg. I said nothing condemning the government's program, I was condemning the banking institutions for not being more competitive and possibly lending money at a cheaper rate in light of the huge profits the banks are making.

With respect to the amount of money we are going to spend as far as herd maintenance is concerned, it is too early to tell whether we will have enough or whether we will have a surplus.

AUTHORITY OF APPEAL BOARD

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, I intended to ask who speaks for the government, but I know it is the Minister of Finance who speaks for the government on that question. However, the minister must recognize that the program, the way it is now, is impractical to apply and impossible to judge on fairness and equity. Would the Minister of Agriculture seriously consider granting the appeal board sufficient authority to make the final decisions? At the moment the board is simply an advisory body; it is not an appeal board. The appeal board is made up of local people on the scene, on the site, with a full understanding to make accurate judgments.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am fully aware of the makeup of the personnel on the appeal board. We appointed them. They are producers from northwestern Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. They have to follow the criteria set down by the government. They screen the applications for assistance under the herd maintenance program. Out of 31,000 applications, if I understand the figures correctly, about 25,000 or 26,000 have been approved and total payments of over $40 million have been made to date. Possibly 2,500 applications are being questioned at the present time. We have been asked to take another look at those. We will be considering those requests and I hope to settle them in a proper fashion.

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF ELIGIBLE TOWNSHIPS

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister confirm that in the last four or five days there have been some 400 additional townships made eligible for the herd maintenance program, townships which were denied because of the impractical criteria established by the minister's government? Could the minister confirm or deny that?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the prairie farm rehabilitation officials use a computer system along with all of the scientific and technological equipment available to them to measure rainfall and snowfall. The other day one of the hon. member's colleagues said that snowfall is very important for run off, etc.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Can you measure your run off?

Mr. Whelan: When the hon. member says that 470 townships were added to the group that had already been allocated under the former mapping program using rainfall as criteria, this was done by the officials of the PFRA, recognizing possibly that they had made a mistake earlier. I think it has been done in a very fair manner. Again, it is a new program which has been beneficial to thousands and thousands of farmers.

AIRPORTS

PLANS TO CONSTRUCT THIRD TERMINAL AT TORONTO INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. According to an article which appeared in The Globe and Mail this morning, CP Air of Vancouver has offered to build the third passenger terminal proposed for Toronto International Airport. Could the minister please tell this chamber whether a third terminal is being planned and, if so, who will be building it? Could he also share with this House whether, in the airport expansion plan, there is provision for a fourth runway?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, traffic at Malton is increasing steadily and the two terminals are reaching capacity. Therefore, the government had to develop a new master plan for the airport. This has been done. It will be unveiled on Tuesday next. The plan will then be submitted to public view and it will be revised according to the conclusions reached.

An hon. Member: Where, at Pickering?

Mr. Pepin: At Malton.

On the subject of the fourth runway, in order to avoid people getting overly nervous, I can advise that it is not in the master plan, which is an indirect way of saying that there is a third terminal in the master plan.

With respect to the funding of the third terminal, a decision has not yet been made but the government will be willing to contemplate the possibility of private sector funding.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

AGREEMENT WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND ON COMMUNITY SERVICE PROGRAM

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for CMHC. The communities of Bunbury and Southport in Cardigan, Prince Edward Island, went ahead with a badly needed three-phase sewage disposal system as a result of a commitment from the federal government under the community services contribution program. Phase one has been completed, but the federal government has broken its agreement with the province. Will the federal government now live up to its responsibility and its commitments to these communities? If not, where does the minister expect the money to come from?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I have already responded to an identical question posed yesterday by the PC candidate in the by-election for that riding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: The Liberal wasn't even asking.

Mr. Cosgrove: I indicated to that candidate that the government had not broken its agreement but that the municipalities were misinformed by the provincial government. In fact the recommendation for the termination of that program was first made in policy papers to the former Progressive Conservative government, together with recommendations for termination of a number of social programs upon which this government has not acted.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. When the federal government, headed by the Liberal Party, entered that agreement, it was a three-phase program. Initially it called for three phases in the sewer program. How can the federal government lead these people down the garden path and then cancel the program?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It is easy for them.

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, I invite the hon. gentleman, or anyone who is seriously interested in this subject, apart from partisan politics at this time of the year, to address the agreement by reading the actual agreement between the Government of Canada and the government of the province. They will discover for themselves that the hon. gentleman opposite who raised the question, together with those who would make political hay on it, are misinformed.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

POLICY RESPECTING OPERATION OF DUTY-FREE SHOPS

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. It relates to the government's policy of Canadianization and of "buy Canadian." About a month ago it was indicated that two American firms had the inside track on the operation of duty-free shops in Canada. Just recently the Department of Revenue's publication release indicated that duty free shops are just around the corner. Will the minister now tell this House whether or not the government's policy is one of negotiating with foreign-controlled firms in the operation of duty-free shops located in Canada?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): The short answer is no, Madam Speaker. It is true that duty free shops are just around the corner.

Mr. Nielsen: Which corner?

Mr. Rompkey: I have appointed an advisory committee, chaired by my parliamentary secretary and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to advise me on the guidelines for the issuing of licences for duty free shops. To put it simply, we want to maximize Canadian opportunity in those guidelines. However, I will have to wait for the report from the advisory committee before I answer further.

REQUEST THAT NO CONSIDERATION BE GIVEN TO UNITED STATES CORPORATIONS

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. If, as the Minister of National Revenue says, the answer is no, why does the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce not direct FIRA to say that those American corporations would not be considered as the viable operators of Canadian duty-free shops?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, decisions under the Foreign Investment Review Act are not made by FIRA, they are made by the government. FIRA does not make decisions on the award of the right to operate duty-free shops, either at land points—which is a new program my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, is instituting—or at airports, a program under the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Minister of Transport. The press report on which my hon. friend bases his question is, unfortunately, erroneous.

An hon. Member: What is the policy?

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC HEARINGS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the minister responsible for the western development fund. This concept has been dangled in front of western Canadians for well over a year. There is certainly a growing skepticism and cynicism about a government which would be collecting taxes from western Canadians, laundering those taxes in some way, and delivering them back in the form of projects. Also, they see it as a potential for probably the greatest pork-barrelling anywhere ever. In order to reduce these fears, will the minister hold public hearings throughout centres in western Canada? If not, why not? If he is going to hold meetings, when will they be held and where?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will recall that in the announcement of the program which the Minister of Finance made, there was a very clear commitment that discussions would be held with western Canadians concerning the application and use of the western development fund. I would point out to the hon. member that, contrary to the description that he provides, many westerners see this as an opportunity by which the federal government can play its rightful role in helping in the creative development of the economy in western Canada, to take advantage of the tremendous growth that is occurring in the west to the benefit of all Canadians. That is the purpose of the western fund, to ensure that the growth in that dynamic part of the country has a full share of the benefits.

PURPOSES OF FUND

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Recognizing that the government is committed to consultation, we on this side hope that consultation will occur at other than the official and bureaucratic level through the use of public hearings throughout western Canada. Will the minister explain to this House, so that there is clarification across the country, what the terms of reference of the western development fund will be?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would again refer the hon. member to the statements which have been made previously, particularly those by the Minister of Finance which indicated that the purpose of the western development fund was to provide for major investment in social and economic development in western Canada so that the benefits can be shared by everybody across the country. Those are the basic terms of reference, to take advantage of the substantial growth that is taking place in the resource areas and to make sure that there are industrial, social and economic diversifications of those benefits. The federal government has always played a major and traditional role in transportation, railway development and other major areas to make sure that the growth in western Canada is not simply confined to one province and one group of people, but is broadly shared.

HEALTH

ADOPTION OF WORLD-WIDE CODE GOVERNING BABY FOOD MARKETING

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In May, 1981, the World Health Organization is proposing for adoption a marketing code on breast milk substitutes, which prohibits improper marketing of breast milk substitutes, to protect against infant death and to promote breast feeding, particularly in poverty stricken areas of the world where over dilution and bacterial contamination of the infant formula leads to malnutrition, disease and death. Is the Canadian government prepared to support adoption of such a code and consider accepting it as a regulation in this country?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, members of my department played an active role in the technical discussions leading up to that recommendation. I will have the pleasure of speaking on behalf of Canada at the World Health Organization annual meeting in early May at which time a vote will be taken. I am not sure just now in what form it will be recommended, or if it is called a regulation. I will have to find out the exact category that will be recommended to the annual meeting, and I will give that information to the hon. member.

AIRPORTS

MASTER PLAN FOR VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC HEARING

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. It concerns the draft master plan for the Vancouver airport. The other night in committee, on behalf of the minister one of the officials said that the decision on whether to have a public hearing on the draft master plan before it is accepted or rejected by the government would be a decision made here in Ottawa by departmental officials and the minister, after hearing recommendations from the departmental officials in British Columbia. Will the minister straighten out the confusion in British Columbia and guarantee that there will in fact be a public hearing on the draft master plan, and can he indicate how soon that public hearing will commence?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the hearing has been going on for quite a period of time. As a matter of fact, the date for the end of the hearing has already passed. The situation is that a number of people claim, rightly I am sure, that they have not had time to make the full representations they wanted to make. De facto, we have extended the period of time to do that. We will wait until all contributions have been made before making the necessary adjustments to the master plan.

Mr. Fraser: I am sure the minister would not want to leave the impression that there has been a public hearing in response to the master plan which was published and turned out by the department in the autumn of 1980. There has not been any public hearing on this. There have been some discussions with some people and invitations for people to write or phone in, but there has not been a public hearing. Will the minister tell us now that there will in fact be a public hearing before this draft master plan becomes government policy?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I was in Vancouver a few days ago and consulted with those who are running this hearing. They must know what they are doing. A number of people and associations have not been fully satisfied with the hearings that have been going on. I accept that. The department has extended the duration in order to accommodate them. I want to assure my hon. friend that no decision will be made until full consultation has taken place. That is what is going on.

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA DIRECTORIES USED IN PAY TELEPHONE BOOTHS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. Does the minister intend to intercede with Bell Canada which has decided to discontinue putting the yellow pages in pay telephone booths?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I have regular conversations with Bell Canada.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): By telephone?

Mr. Fox: If it is of use to the hon. member, I will raise this during the course of my next meeting with the president of Bell Canada.

AIR TRANSPORT

PROVISION OF SERVICE TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT AND GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS—POSSIBILITY OF CONSOLIDATION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Both the Department of Transport and the Department of National Defence provide VIP air transport service for members and senior officials of government. During recent proceedings of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, the Minister of National Defence said discussion on the consolidation of the service, under the control of one or other of the departments, was under active consideration at committee level in both departments. In light of the fact this issue has been under review for a number of years, and each time it reaches cabinet level for a decision the rivalry of the two departments for control of the service prevents a cost saving solution from being made, would the minister state the reasons why his department is insisting on providing part of the domestic service, given the fact the military is assigned the role in most other nations?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I cannot easily accept that a combination of the two fleets would be totally desirable. There are a number of people who believe that having a civilian arm of the government in this matter may not be a bad idea. In view of my very friendly relationship with the Minister of National Defence, I will have a conversation with him to see whether there are more arguments in favour of the suggestion.

Mr. Darling: Madam Speaker, it is my understanding that one of the reasons, often given, as to why the minister's department seeks to retain provision of part of the service is to maintain what is termed "currency" of the air carrier inspectors. Such currency, as I understand it, is to keep the inspectors up to date on the latest procedures involving such things as the crew and flight operations, as well as pilot proficiency. Could the minister tell this House, if such is the case, why inspectors from the Department of Transport could not fulfil those requirements flying aboard Department of National Defence aircraft?

● (1500)

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I do not want to analyse here the whole series of arguments in favour of or against each of the options available. My hon. friend has mentioned one option. My department would have to keep these facilities anyway, in view of its responsibilities in the field of civil aviation; this is an argument in favour of maintaining the status quo. In any case, I will have a conversation with the Minister of National Defence.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I should like to put a question to the government House leader. Would he be able to tell us the business that he intends to bring forward today and tomorrow? Could he also look into the business for next week, if that is possible, and tell us whether he intends to allot an opposition day? If so, could he inform us when?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Madam Speaker, but first I would like to draw the attention of the House to the following agreement reached by the parliamentary leaders which has to do with the adjournment of the House after the first stage of the final debate on the constitutional resolution. We have agreed to adjourn as follows:

That, when the House adjourns on Thursday, April 23, 1981, it shall stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 12, 1981, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

Madam Speaker, I move that motion, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I think we will obtain the unanimous consent of the House for its immediate adoption.

Madam Speaker: Does the House unanimously agree to adopt the motion introduced by the hon. President of the Privy Council?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Pinard: In answer to the question of the Progressive Conservative parliamentary leader concerning the business of the House for the next few days, I would say to him that today we expect to be able to complete the report stage and third reading of Bill C-42, the Canada Post Corporation Act. I think we can expect votes this afternoon at the report stage and that, with unanimous consent, we might complete third reading later today.

Three items will be studied tomorrow. First, we will go through all three stages of the bill on the Auditor General and adopt it. This bill does not appear on the Order Paper, but we will give notice tonight and my colleagues have agreed with me to give speedy passage to this non-controversial measure. Second, we will proceed with second reading of Bill S-17 concerning tax conventions between Canada and New Zealand and Canada and Australia. Third, Bill C-46 to regulate the importation into Canada of meat, whose study on second reading is expected to be completed tomorrow afternoon.

Next Monday will be an allotted day, and finally Tuesday and in the following days we will take up the report stage of Bill C-50 on the customs tariffs, and I hope we will be able to complete third reading as well.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There has been some discussion among members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture with respect to the reference to that committee of the annual report of the Wheat Board. That is desirable and it is certainly agreeable to us. In order to expedite the business, we would be prepared to have that done now, without debate.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) moved that the annual report of the Canadian Wheat Board for the crop year ending July 31, 1980, tabled April 2, 1981, be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, with respect to the business of the House, we have noted the line-up suggested by the government House leader. The House as a whole must be impressed with the fact that for two days in a row we have reached unanimous agreement.

May I suggest another subject concerning which the minister would find unanimous agreement, and that is that we no longer delay bringing in legislation proposed by the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs having to do with widows who last July were told they would have to wait several years for their pensions. I realize that the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs is in Europe in his capacity of Minister of National Defence, but my hunch is that the legislation is ready. The department is keen on it. Would it not be possible to deal with this in short order and to pass it quickly, even before we recess next week?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I will check the hunch of my hon. colleague.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HNATYSHYN—ALLEGED INTRUSION ON RIGHTS OF MEMBERS—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: There is a matter pending before the House and that is a ruling that I should like to make concerning the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn). I heard his argument and I think I am able to rule on that question of privilege now.

The hon. member was arguing a very hypothetical situation. The will of the House certainly had not been expressed; therefore it could not have been crossed. Consequently, I do not think he has a prima facie question of privilege.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I have a very brief point of order. I believe there is a question of privilege on which the Chair reserved its ruling because the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development might want to refer to it. In view of the rapidity with which ministerial offices are being established in Yukon by the Secretary of State, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and perhaps next an embassy by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I do not want to appear to be rushing the Chair but perhaps a ruling might prevent any further proliferation of this practice.

Madam Speaker: I have some rulings ready. One is on that particular matter and there is another question which has been raised. I will rule on them tomorrow. I have several rulings for the House but I thought I would not occupy the time of the House more than need be. I will probably rule tomorrow on those questions.

SPACE RESEARCH BUDGETS

Question No. 1,936—Mr. Herbert:

Which departments, corporations or agencies maintain space research programs and what is the budget of each for the current fiscal year?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): In so far as the Ministry of State for Science and Technology is concerned:

Space Research Budgets, FY 80-81

	Space Research (millions)	Space Budget (millions)
National Research Council	$20.958	$20.958
Communications	10.50	35.415
Environment	0.85	2.30
Energy, Mines and Resources	0.50	9.608
Transport	0.23	0.23
Fisheries and Oceans	0.50	0.50
National Defence	4.70	8.49
Industry, Trade and Commerce	3.70	3.70

In arriving at the above figures, the term "research" was interpreted, in its broadest sense, to include space science, conceptual studies, research and development, whether done in-house or outside (including contracts, contributions, grants, etc).

The entire space budget of certain departments (i.e. NRC, Transport, F&O and IT&C) falls within this definition. In the case of DOC, substantial amounts are spent on non-research items such as the extension to the David Florida Lab. and its operation ($6.5 Million) or incentives for the purchase in Canada of the Anik-C and Anik-D satellites ($10.4 Million). In the case of EMR and Environment, a strong component of their space budgets goes toward the cost of operating satellite data receiving, processing and distribution facilities, for resource management and weather prediction purposes.

TRANSFER OF SASKATCHEWAN LAND TO INDIAN BANDS

Question No. 2,021—Mr. Blenkarn:

1. Did the government transfer to Indian bands in the province of Saskatchewan, the land that it promised to transfer in the original treaties in the province of Saskatchewan that were signed in 1870 and, if so, how much land (a) was transferred (b) remains to be transferred and on what date will the government complete such transfers?

2. Does the government recognize the difference between a person who is a treaty Indian (a person with a direct blood relationship to a headman who signed on behalf of an Indian band a treaty) and a person who is a status Indian as a result of being declared a status Indian under the provisions of the Indian Act?

3. Does the government consider that there is no difference between a status Indian and a treaty Indian?

4. Does the government recognize the Queen Victoria Treaty Protective Association and, if not, will it do so?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development):

1. (a) Treaties 2, 4, 5, 6, 8 and 10 were signed with Indians in Saskatchewan between the years 1871 and 1906. Under these treaties, 68 Saskatchewan bands had approximately 1.7 million acres set aside for their use and benefit.

   (b) Validated claims submitted to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development indicate that approximately 1 million acres more will be set aside as reserve land to satisfy the treaty entitlement of some 20 bands.

The completion of negotiations with Saskatchewan bands over their treaty entitlement will depend largely upon the timetable followed by the Federation of Saskatchewan Indians for the submission of any outstanding claims.

Under the 1930 transfer of natural resources agreements, Crown lands were turned over to the provinces subject to, among other things, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, making sufficient Crown land available to Canada to fulfil the land provisions of treaties. Consequently, although the treaties are with the federal government, Canada must rely on the co-operation of the provinces to make these lands available when needed. Negotiations are under way in Saskatchewan and every effort is being made to ensure that treaty obligations will be met.

2. Status Indian is a term that is used synonymously with the term registered Indian. A registered Indian is a person who is entitled to be registered as an Indian in accordance with the Indian Act and who has been recorded as an Indian in the Indian Register.

A large number of status Indians are also treaty Indians. A treaty Indian is a person who is registered as a member of a band that was a signatory to a treaty with the Government of Canada. As a treaty Indian, a person is entitled to the same rights and benefits available to status Indians as weil as to such special benefits as were conferred by the particular treaty his band signed.

3. The government does consider that there is a difference between a status Indian and a treaty Indian. A status Indian is a person who is registered as an Indian in accordance with the Indian Act. A treaty Indian is a person who is registered as an Indian in accordance with the Indian Act and who is registered as a member of a band that was a signatory to a treaty with the Government of Canada.

4. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's relationship is with individual Indians and bands as defined under the terms of the Indian Act of 1951. The department, as a matter of policy, has specific contribution arrangements with associations of Indian bands to support consultation with Indians, on issues of policy, for program development and research.

The Queen Victoria Treaty Protective Association (or the Victorian Embassy) claims to represent Indian bands who already have direct access to government or are members of existing Indian associations. Furthermore, the protective association claims an interest in the "Treaty Trust Fund" of which this department has no record. Trust funds are maintained for individual Indian bands rather than on the basis of treaties.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES

Question No. 2,023—Mr. Blenkarn:

Will the government honour its 1976 commitment to increase interest paid on annuities to at least the present rate being paid on Canada Savings Bonds?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The government acknowledges no such commitment.

When the Canadian Government Annuities Improvement Act was before Parliament in the autumn of 1975, the then minister of manpower and immigration (Mr. Andras) indicated that the rate of return would be "subject to periodic review depending on future fluctuations in interest rates", but there was no undertaking to keep such rates in line with Canada Savings Bond rates.

As indicated in this House on June 18, 1980, (Hansard at p. 2230), a review of the rate of return did take place in the early months of 1980, and it was decided that there should be no adjustments. Interest rates have fluctuated since the time of the review, but not in a manner which leads the government to believe that a further review is now required.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT FUNDS

Question No. 2,068—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to question No. 1,594 which states in part, that the Royal Canadian Mint, under the direction of Mr. Yvon Gariépy, paid Le Cercle Universitaire d'Ottawa $14,822.41 and that this was not paid from public funds (a) what funds does the Royal Canadian Mint possess that would enable it to pay this account from other than public funds (b) were public funds reimbursed for the amount involved and, if so (i) what are all the details of the amounts and persons concerned (ii) what are the dates of reimbursement?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by the Royal Canadian Mint as follows:

(a) Section 2 of the Financial Administration Act defines "public money" and "public officer". Officers of the Royal Canadian Mint, including the chief executive officer, are not "public officers" and the funds managed by the Royal Canadian Mint are not "public money." The Royal Canadian Mint is financially autonomous and accountable to its board of directors for compliance with its approved budgets which are self financed and not subjected to parliamentary approval.

CADC—PRESIDENT'S TRIPS

Question No. 2,069—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to question No. 1,252 which states in part, that "with respect to the President of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, only such expenses relating to the corporation's business have been charged", did the government establish the business portions of the trips on (a) a statement by Madame Nadeau (b) an independent investigation by the government?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows:

(a) The propriety of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation operations and the conduct of its officers are adequately assured by the supervision and direction of the board of directors and the Auditor General's audits of the corporation.

(b) Not applicable.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT—MASTER'S TRIPS

Question No. 2,070—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to question No. 1,252 which states in part, with reference to the Master of the Royal Canadian Mint, that "The president of the corporation charges only the portion of the trips that is applicable for the time he travels on business", did the government establish the business portions of the trips on (a) a statement by Mr. Gariépy (b) an independent investigation by the government?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by the Royal Canadian Mint as follows:

(a) The propriety of the Royal Canadian Mint operations and the conduct of its officers are adequately assured by the supervision and direction of the board of directors and the Auditor General's audits of the corporation.

COMMUNICATIONS RESEARCH CENTRE—SECURITY GUARDS

Question No. 2,145—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

1. Were five GS-PRC-4 security guards dismissed from the Communications Research Centre at Shirleys Bay and, if so, what were the projected dollar savings per annum?

2. In determining the extent of the savings, have the full costs of contracting out been included, including those for the pre-planning phase, the selection process and the administration and evaluation phase?

3. Was the cost of finding alternative employment for the five employees considered?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the reply to the above question is as follows:

1. Effective April 30, 1981, five GS-PRC-4 security guards were declared surplus. The projected dollar savings are $34,191 per annum.

2. Yes, costs were fully considered, including 2.5 per cent Department of Supply and Services contract fees. Pre-planning phase, selection process and the administration and evaluation phase were carried out within ongoing personnel services without additional costs.

3. Yes, costs were considered. Identifications of alternative employment were carried out within ongoing personnel services without additional costs.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT

Question No. 2,161—Mr. Murphy:

In (a) 1978 (b) 1979 (c) 1980, of the total number of cases registered under the Migratory Birds Convention Act, how many charges were against (i) treaty Indians (ii) non-status Indians or Métis (iii) non-natives?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Racial origin is not recorded in cases registered under the Migratory Birds Convention Act.

Question No. 2,241—Mr. McKinnon:

Does the Department of Supply and Services "Weekly Bulletin of Business Opportunities", Vol. 8, No. 5, indicate a contract or contracts to Canadian Media Corporation in the amount of $2,418,008 and, if so, what amount went to each listed department and for what purpose?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The amount of $2,418,008 is the total value of 13 contracts awarded as follows:

1. Did the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment recently visit Africa and, if so (a) what means of transportation was used to go and return and what was the cost to the taxpayer (b) how many persons accompanied the minister at any stage of the trip, for what purpose and at what cost?

The House resumed, from Wednesday, April 8, consideration of Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, and motion No. 9—Mr. Blenkarn (p. 9094).

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, my intervention in support of motion No. 9 to amend Bill C-42 is with respect to the changes of a rather slight nature that the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) seeks to make to Clause 31 as it presently stands in the bill. Those changes are very brief, but my reason for supporting the proposed amendment goes beyond brevity.

The present provisions of Clause 31 provide for the appointment of dual auditors to act as auditors for the new postal corporation, and the purpose of the amendment is to insert in place of that dual appointment, with the other qualifications that are placed thereon in Clause 31, the Auditor General.

I had an opportunity earlier today to attend a meeting of the steering committee of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts to discuss with the Auditor General not only this matter but also other matters related to his appointment as auditor for certain Crown corporations. The Auditor General indicated to me and other members of that steering committee of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts that he has corresponded with the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet), drawing to the attention of the Postmaster General the unfortunate consequences, as he views them, that will follow his removal as auditor for the current Canada Post Office, upon the incorporation of the Canada Post Corporation, and the replacement of himself by independent auditors.

There has been a tendency of late—a regrettable one—of replacing the Auditor General with outside auditors. The most recent illustration of this development occurred in connection with the intended replacement at the annual meeting of Eldorado Nuclear, to be held on the twenty-eighth day of this month, of the Auditor General by independent auditors.

The newly appointed Auditor General, Mr. Kenneth Dye, is carrying on in the fine tradition, well known to this House, of Mr. J. J. Macdonell, as servant of the public who departed from a general tendency of former auditors general by establishing systems to avoid the calamitous results of bad business management in government departments.

We are all well aware of the comprehensive audit system which had been established by Mr. Macdonell and which, from every indication I can obtain, is to be continued under the office of the new Auditor General. The concept of the comprehensive audit is not something to be speedily overlooked. It is an extension beyond the attest audit carried out by auditors in the private sector so that Parliament may be advised whether the actions of government departments and Crown corporations audited by the Auditor General meet the tests of economy, efficiency and effectiveness in terms of expenditures.

With respect to Eldorado Nuclear, the Standing Committee on Public Accounts recommended, in fact, that that Crown corporation be subject to just such a comprehensive audit. It would be regrettable if the post corporation, which up until now has been reaching into the consolidated revenue fund on an annual basis for hundreds of millions of dollars in funding in order that it may carry on its activities, will now be replaced by a Crown corporation which, if we pay close attention to the budget of October 28 of last year, will result in a substantial increase in postal fees.

It has been my position that it does not matter whether the public is obliged to pay, through its taxes, for the sustaining of this monolithic monster which has been created or whether as a result of the laws passed by Parliament a corporation be given a monopoly to reach into the pockets of the general public and therefrom extract, through postage rates, the fees necessary for the Crown corporation to carry on its business. I submit that this Parliament has an obligation to the public, and that obligation is to see, through the work of the Auditor General, that public funds derived either, as in the past, by way of direct taxation or, as in the future, by way of obligatory charges for monopolistic services are spent while meeting the tests of economy, efficiency and effectiveness.

The comprehensive audit concept developed by the office of the Auditor General is not extensively known in the private sector, and my great fear is that that type of audit will never be undertaken with respect to this new Crown corporation. It is accordingly, I submit, of vital importance to this House that the Auditor General be retained as auditor for the successor of the Canada Post Office.

Mr. Dye did not depart from his observations in connection with Clause 31 after dealing with the need to reappoint his office but, rather, I understand, in corresponding with the Postmaster General, pointed out that it is not cost-effective to appoint joint auditors. Having recently come from private practice, I understand Mr. Dye has indicated to the Postmaster General—I mention this because although he has spoken on this clause the Postmaster General has not indicated that he is in receipt of the letter to which I made reference—that he recognizes the dangers of joint appointments. He suggested to the steering committee of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts this morning that two things could occur which are disadvantageous. There is the possibility of an audit gap when two separate firms are dealing with the same set of books, and surely no one wants something missing at the time an audit report is presented. In addition, it is more expensive to have two auditors undertake a task than one, and yet if we examine Clause 31 we find that in fact two auditors are to be appointed.

There is another problem to which the Auditor General has directed his attention, and that is that the short term referred to in Clause 31(1) is unattractive and creates additional cost and expense. That makes good sense. How many public auditing firms have audited the Post Office Department? Very few.

An hon. Member: One.

Mr. Gamble: There has only been one, and that is the office of the Auditor General. Does it make sense to pay for the education of a private auditing firm to determine how the Post Office Department will function when converted into a Crown corporation? Does it make any sense to pay for the education of two auditing firms? Of course not. But does it make any sense to perpetuate that educational program by replacing auditors, because of the short term of appointment, every two or three years? The term of appointment, as I have said, under subclause (1) of Clause 31 is for a period of two years only. The answer is that it makes no sense at all. Why would the government wish to incur additional costs to be borne by the users of this service of a kind that is not necessary? It is surely more appropriate, as recommended by the Auditor General, if he is not to be granted the task of supervising the affairs and undertaking the audit of this new Crown corporation, to appoint one outside auditing firm, not two, and let it have a reasonable term of service.

One can only speculate as to the reasons for the determination made by the government, and that is that the government has a number of firms which it would like to reward under a pork-barrel system on a regular rotating basis. That is not in the best interest of the public, nor is in the best interest of the users of the service. It is something that, I submit, Parliament should reject out of hand.

We have heard the comments made by the Postmaster General to the effect that we should be satisfied to await the new Crown corporation legislation which will deal with all the auditing needs and the action to be taken by Auditor General. I have not seen the legislation as it is not before the House, it is not something we can examine, and it is certainly not something we passed. How can we ever say: Let us leave this proposal in its objectionable form and wait for something to happen to clear it up. There is every indication in this House that the objectional form will continue, as is apparent from the fact that today, now that we are so close to this Crown corporation legislation, we are presented with Clause 31 which indicates the very opposite road that the government should be taking. I mentioned earlier with respect to Eldorado Nuclear that under the guise of endeavouring to make changes, the minister responsible for that corporation has given his authority to remove the audit of Eldorado Nuclear from the Auditor General. Are we not in a position to determine what future action the government will probably take with respect to new Crown corporation legislation? I submit we are. The most recent indications are that they will continue a program of reducing the influence and effect of a most faithful servant of the House and of the public.

I should like to comment very briefly on some of the other observations which I understand the Auditor General has made his communiqué to the Postmaster General. He has indicated that, even as Clause 31 is drafted, it is weak when compared with the obvious requirements for audit-related processes under the Canada Business Corporations Act and under all or most provincial business corporation acts. Surely this large, publicly-owned corporation, in terms of its audit reports and the need for audit committee meetings, should at least meet the general requirements that the federal and provincial governments have insisted should be met by private enterprise, and yet that is not the case. Accordingly, I recommend to the House that motion No. 9 to amend this bill be adopted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

We will move on to motion No. 10, standing in the name of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis).

Hon. John A. Fraser (for Mr. Ellis) moved:

Motion No. 10

That Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, be amended in Clause 34 by striking out line 14 at page 18 and substituting the following therefor.

"to subsection (6), in any calendar year a".

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion is moved in the name of my colleague, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis), who unfortunately is not able to be with us this afternoon. I am not absolutely sure of the procedural situation in which that may put us, but if it is appropriate and if Your Honour rules that I may move this motion in substitution for the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings, and if that is agreed to by the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet)—I see him nodding—then I shall proceed.

I will be brief, Mr. Speaker. As all hon. members know, provision is made whereby four householders a year during the fiscal year can be sent to each of our respective ridings. Under the legislation which makes that provision, those four householders have to be sent during the fiscal year. Consequently, hon. members tend to leave the fourth one to the last minute. I see you smiling, Mr. Speaker; I am sure we have all done that. The consequence of that is to create an enormous load for the printing presses and for those officials who assist us in getting our householders to our riding. It also creates a tremendous load on the Post Office facilities all at one time.

The amendment as suggested, which I would like the Postmaster General to consider, is that Clause 34 in the bill be amended to eliminate the words "fiscal year" and replace them with the words "calendar year". The effect of that amendment, it is hoped by my colleague and by the committee which made this recommendation, will be that members will be able to put out four householders during any calendar year, thereby avoiding bottlenecks and the sudden and tremendous increase of activity at the very end of the fiscal year. I think the point is simple; it is a short one. It ought not to be a matter of extended debate. I think I have described the situation succinctly.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, with a view to saving a little bit of the time of the House I can say right now that we are prepared to accept this amendment. I have already indicated to the opposition parties that this is a very useful proposition which was discussed by the Commissioners of Internal Economy of the House of Commons, and I believe that Madam Speaker herself is in favour of this amendment. If the House agrees we might adopt it immediately.

[English]

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one comment. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) mentioned the rush on the printing establishment. At the present time, as we understand it, there are two tremendous rushes: one at Christmastime and one prior to March 31. Now the printers will only have to worry about the Christmas rush. I appreciate the fact that the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) is accepting this amendment.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, we have no objection to the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General) moved:

(8) Where, before the coming into force of this section, a conciliation board has been established under section 78 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act in respect of a dispute arising in connection with the conclusion, renewal or revision of a collective agreement that applies to any employees in the Post Office Department and the conciliation board has not made a report to the Chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, the conciliation shall be continued in accordance with that act and, on the elapse of seven days after the receipt by the Chairman of the report of the conciliation board, the requirements of subsection 180(1) of the Canada Labour Code are deemed to have been met in respect of the employees of the Corporation represented by the bargaining agent that is party to the dispute.

Canada Post Corporation Act

(11) Where any employees in the Post Office Department are not, immediately before the coming into force of this section, prohibited by the Public Service Staff Relations Act from participating in a strike, the requirements of Subsection 180(1) of the Canada Labour Code are deemed to have been met in respect of those employees.

68.2 (1) Each employee organization that immediately before the coming into force of this section was certified under the Public Service Staff Relations Act as the bargaining agent for a bargaining unit consisting of or including employees in the Post Office Department is deemed to have been certified as the bargaining agent for the employees of the Corporation in that bargaining unit under Part V of the Canada Labour Code on the day this section comes into force.

(2) Notwithstanding any provision of Part V of the Canada Labour Code,

(a) no application for certification as the bargaining agent for any employees of the Corporation represented by a bargaining agent deemed to have been certified under subsection (1) may be made by a trade union, and

(b) no bargaining unit or part thereof consisting of employees of the Corporation represented by a bargaining agent deemed to have been certified under Subsection (1) may be reviewed, rescinded, amended, altered or varied otherwise than to include in the unit any employees who are not represented by a bargaining agent, before the commencement of the last three months of the first collective agreement entered into after the coming into force of this section that applies to those employees and that has resulted from a notice to bargain collectively given by or to the Corporation after the coming into force of this section.

(3) For greater certainty, no collective agreement resulting from a notice to bargain collectively deemed to have been given under Subsection 68.1(4) and no arbitral award or collective agreement referred to in Subsection 68.1(7) is a first collective agreement within the meaning and for the purposes of Subsection (2)."

He said: Mr. Speaker, when Bill C-42 was introduced for the first time, Clause 66 was then the first step toward the quiet and orderly transition of a collective bargaining process, that is to say instead of coming under the Public Service Staff Relations Act the collective bargaining process would come under the Canada Labour Code.

While discussions with spokesmen for the Canadian Labour Congress and the major unions of postal workers were continuing, Clause 66 of this first Bill C-42 set forth the basis of the transition by establishing, among other things, the continuation of existing collective agreements, the settlement of outstanding grievances, and the maintenance of the certification of bargaining agents previously certified under the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that as a result of those discussions which went on long after second reading and the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates which involved the Department of Labour, the Treasury Board, the Public Service Staff Relations Board, the representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress and of all Canadian postal unions, it was agreed to make further changes which have now been incorporated in the revised and longer version of the new Clause 68 of Bill C-42 which is now before the House.

In fact, Clause 68 contains three quite specific parts: Clause 68, Clause 68.1 and Clause 68.2 which actually govern first, collective agreements now in force, second, collective agreements which have expired, and third, the certification of bargaining agents. I must say that the main difference between Clause 66 of the original bill and the present Clause 68 resides in Clause 68.1. That part is long and complex, and that is why you were dispensed, Mr. Speaker, from reading it all.

It should be kept in mind that postal workers belong to no fewer than eight employees' organizations and are governed by 28 different collective agreements. So at some time, some of those agreements will expire, which will raise some doubt as to the status of the parties. Consequently, we have added a special clause governing collective agreements which will have expired when this legislation will be proclaimed, and it is Clause 68.1 now before you.

These steps are taken especially in cases where the parties are involved in bargaining, arbitration or conciliation, so as to ensure that all procedures in progress are conducted in an orderly fashion. For instance, when the parties are bargaining at the time Subclauses (1)(c), (4) and (5) of Clause 68.1 come into force, the bargaining notice is deemed to have been given; then, the parties agree that Part V of our Labour Code should apply so as to allow the bargaining to proceed without interruption.

In my opinion, it is important to allow this bargaining started in good faith by the representatives of both the employees and the employer to proceed. The bargaining should not have to start all over again from the beginning. The parties should be allowed to continue, which would not have been possible under the original bill. We propose such provisions to make it possible for the arbitration or conciliation in progress to proceed under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, which would not have been possible either under Clause 66 but is now possible under Subclauses (6), (7) and (8) of Clause 68.1.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, we think we can ensure continuity and stability in the early days of the corporation. I point out to you and to all members of the House that this amendment has been discussed with union representatives, with spokesmen for the opposition parties, and especially with the official critic of the New Democratic Party for postal matters, the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker), as well as my predecessor, the former postmaster general, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser). And we all agree that this amendment which is what representatives of the unions, all the unions, want should be approved by the House.

[English]

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, the marvellous feature of this place is that, despite what the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) has just said in terms of agreement by spokesmen for all parties with respect to the Post Office, as an individual Member of Parliament I am able to expres my substantial concern about what the motion presently before the House omits to include. I am particularly concerned about the provisions of Clause, as hopefully amended by the minister, 68.1(11) which provides:

Where any employees in the Post Office Department are not, immediately before the coming into force of this section, prohibited by the Public Service Staff Relations Act from participating in a strike, the requirements of subsection 180(1) of the Canada Labour Code are deemed to have been met in respect of those employees.

The one great omission in the bill, and now perpetuated by the intended amendment, is that there is no prohibition against strikes in what has become an essential service in Canada, whether that essential service be operated by a government department or this new Crown corporation. I have gone so far, as a consequence of consulting with my constituents, to draft Bill C-251, which would have the effect of prohibiting strikes where the convenience, mobility or economic well-being of the public is affected. As I indicated, I did that as a consequence of consulting with my constituents. Of 2,676 responses to the question "Should federal civil servants in essential services be allowed to strike?", 88.15 per cent responded "No".

In the event that this bill is passed, even if it is amended as recommended now by the minister, this essential service and any potential amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act will pass out of the control of this House. Parliament will be called back to legislate an end to labour disputes.

I know that the hopes and expectations of the minister and other persons of good will are that this bill will end disputes between management and labour in what is now the Canadian postal service. I do not share their enthusiasm for a Utopia to be developed as a consequence of the passage of this legislation. Rather than restrict the areas where conflict between management and labour will exist, we have expanded them. The area of potential conflict is greater with the passage of this legislation than it is now, because under the Canada Labour Code the employees of this new corporation will be able to take issue with the conditions of their employment.

Let me give a specific illustration as it affects my riding, where that kind of complaint will exist. The town of Markham, one of the three towns in York North, received normal service from the Canada Post Office up until November of 1980. At that time a decision was made to move postal sorters from what has been regarded as a small, quasi-rural postal station serving the public to Scarborough. As a result, while it previously took three or four days to receive mail, it now takes eight or nine.

The Postmaster General, as a consequence of the receipt of communications from myself and my constituents, is well aware of this fact. However, the essential problem which resulted from the transfer of these employees to Scarborough is that they have become dissatisfied with the transfer because the Scarborough plant is too noisy. The sorting equipment makes a great racket, and it has the effect, according to personnel at the Scarborough sorting station, of driving those postal sorters who were formerly from Markham away from their jobs. They have simply not reported for work.

Now, that is the situation under the Public Service Staff Relations Act. Under the Canada Labour Code, if they do not like the roar of the machines they will go on strike. That is the kind of practical illustration which I think is essential for this House to understand before it endorses this amendment and passes this legislation. However, the public demand that the postal service—whether it be carried on by a government department or by a Crown corporation—be carried on efficiently in order to serve them. That will not result from the pasage of this recommended amendment, and it will not result from the passage of the bill itself.

The government has shirked its responsibility, in dealing with an essential element of its required service to the public, of supervising the affairs of government departments and now of supervising the introduction of this piece of legislation. It is regrettable that the Postmaster General has so closed his mind to the practical implications of what happens when a strike occurs in Canada.

I wrote to the Postmaster General on March 13 with respect to a problem referred to me by the Markham Hydro Commission, which was concerned about the delivery of utility bills during a work stoppage. It was also concerned about the general practice which it had adopted of having its employees deliver those accounts to customers. I wrote to the Postmaster General and he wrote back to me by letter dated April 6, 1981, which I received in my office yesterday. Attached to his correspondence was a general reply which he had sent to Mr. D. G. Hugill, the president of the Ontario Municipal Electric Association. On page 2 of that letter to Mr. Hugill the Postmaster General said, in response to a question as to whether a utility's staff could deliver bills during a time of strike:

Neither can I support the inclusion of a provision which would permit contracted delivery during postal strikes. A major objective of the Bill is to establish a new foundation to improve labour relations in the Post Office. Legislating this kind of exemption would clearly undermine that objective.

Earlier in his letter he had said:

You believe there should be additional amendments to either completely exempt utility bills, or at least to exempt them during postal service disruptions. While I understand the arguments you have used in support of the suggested general exemption, I cannot lend my support to it for several reasons.

To be fair to the minister, I will read the reasons:

First of all, as you noted in your letter, utility bills fall within the letter monopoly. Making an exception in the case of your utility obviously would be neither fair to other utilities nor indeed to other major users of the postal service's letter stream.

Of probably even greater importance is that making such an exemption would ignore the fact that with respect to the postal service's letter monopoly, much more than the interests of any particular group of firms or any particular group of customers is involved.

Very clearly, the minister has said that it is impossible for the utilities to deliver their utility bills using their employees.

I believe the minister owes an explanation to this House regarding the comments he made on April 7, which are found in Hansard at page 9047. I have spoken to the minister about this and I am sure he will want to clarify the confusion, if any, that has developed in the minds of those who may have read his response to the question. We were dealing with utility bills and as reported at page 9040 of Hansard, in my address to the House, I said:

I have also received a letter from the Markham Hydro Commission drawing to my attention the fact that that commission is, or has been until now, in the regular habit of having its bills delivered by those who read hydro meters. That practice, in the event that this legislation is passed in unamended form, will have to come to an end. They were concerned, of course, as are most people carrying on an active business practice, about the effect upon their operation of a mail stoppage, a strike—

I concluded from an examination of the bill that the delivery of utility bills was the exclusive monopoly of the new corporation. I have so advised my constituent.

As reported at page 9047 of Hansard, the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) said:

I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker, but I think we should try to straighten out this particular issue. Is it the intention of the minister to allow a utility company to employ its own employees to deliver its invoices?

In reply to that question, the minister said:

Mr. Speaker, I am not here to tell the utility companies what to do, nor am I in a position to tell them how to deliver their invoices. They could follow a number of routes. We have allowed them three specific routes under this legislation. The simplest route for them to take is to use the Post Office, and it is the cheapest and best way. If they want to use private couriers to do their deliveries they will have to pay a price for doing it this way. If they want to use their own employees, that is another way of doing it. I am not here to tell them which way they should take. I am just here to say that the easiest way is obviously to use the Post Office.

It is very clear to me that the minister has indicated that there are three ways authorized under Bill C-42 for the utilities to attend to the delivery of their accounts. One of them includes the delivery of those accounts by their own employees. I was about to despatch a copy of that page of Hansard to my constituent and say to him that, regardless of what my view of the law may be, after reading Bill C-42 the minister seems to have a different view. That was the case until yesterday, when I received a letter from the Postmaster General in which he says very clearly that you cannot, as a utility, have your employees deliver your bills, and you cannot do it even if there is a postal strike.

I think it is time the House paused and thought about what it is doing with this piece of legislation. Many people will wake up and discover they are breaking the law, a law that is passed, not by Parliament, but by the Crown corporation under the regulations which it is authorized to pass at its own whim. And in the event the governor in council does not, within 60 days, reject a regulation passed by the Crown corporation, that regulation will be part of the law of Canada. That regulation is the one which will define specifically the word "letter", which is left to the discretion of the Crown corporation. In this regard, I am referring to the provisions of Clause 17(1)(a) as affected by Clause 17(7) of the draft bill.

In my view, the suggested amendment of the Postmaster General does not deal with the essential issue that is faced by the public of Canada, namely, whether or not we will have dependable postal service upon which the public can rely at all times without fear of an interruption in that service by a strike. Then not only will the business of Canada be carried on, but also individuals who rely upon the postal service will be able to communicate with whomever they choose.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments that I wish to make. However, I will not respond to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble). I think he made his views very clear at committee stage and he has put them forward again here in the House. His views and mine differ very substantially but I will not comment on that.

I do want to comment on the amendment. I want to pay particular attention to the groups who came forward and helped assist in preparing this complicated amendment. There are some changes which had to be made in order to make legal changes in contracts which have already been signed and those which could possibly be coming up later on in the phasing out of programs.

Because of the co-operation of the various unions involved, of many of the Conservative members, of the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) and his department, everyone was able to sit down and talk. The postal workers came to the committee not as a split group, but as one group under the chairmanship of Shirley Carr of the CLC. They presented their problems and their ideas. Many were accepted but also many were rejected. The Postmaster General in his role as minister listened to them. He presented the ideas and problems to his various groups and returned to the committee. When we were not able to complete the work during committee stage because it was so complicated, the Postmaster General said, "We know the intent of the proposals we are working on; let us iron them out. We will come back to you, and if they are satisfactory we will try to implement these programs." The Postmaster General has done that. He has done it not only to the satisfaction of our party but I believe also to the satisfaction of the critic of the Conservative Party, the CLC and the five unions involved. Now let us get on with the job of putting the amendment into place. We support this amendment and we congratulate everyone involved in bringing this amendment forward.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I will not hold forth very long. However, I want to say that I consider it essential that some definitive legislation be in place so there is not a sudden stoppage of all bargaining and negotiation. It is essential that a number of revisions be made to the act. I have been a union member all of my working life. I believe in the united action of people, particularly when employers are arrogant and will not reason. I come from a union family. For many years my brothers were strong supporters of the United Mine Workers.

• (1600)

As a boy and since, I have gone through a lot of strikes. I do not believe anyone gains from a strike. I remember when we were on strike in the coal mining industry hoping to get a raise. Sometimes we got it, sometimes not. But after everything is over, when you consider the money that has been lost as well as the markets, it is doubtful whether anyone has gained, workers, management or country.

I have spoken to a number of people in the Post Office who feel the same way. The government missed a wonderful opportunity to provide alternatives, not by force or by eliminating the right to strike because that is a right that was gained after many years of sweat and bloodshed, but through bargaining for the workers.

Many people in the Post Office abhor strikes. They feel they gain nothing and build up a mountain of ill-will. The country certainly does not gain from a strike. Some companies go bankrupt and many people are inconvenienced.

It does not appear that any effort has been made to talk to the Post Office about alternatives to striking. Several years ago the Edmonton city police appeared before a committee of which I was a member. They did not want to go on strike. They felt it would give a tremendous advantage to every criminal in the country. However, they needed some means whereby they could get proper treatment, wages and working conditions. They suggested compulsory arbitration.

That was approximately 30 years ago. When I compare their wages and working conditions with those who have gone on strike, I see little difference. If anything, the Edmonton city police are in a superior position. That is the way it should be. The city of Edmonton, representing all the people in Edmonton, should go out of its way to be fair to its employees.

This Crown corporation should set the example for the country by being fair to its employees. The employees should not have to strike for reasonable working conditions and the corporation should not accept conditions that are not fair and reasonable.

The government missed a tremendous opportunity by not going to management and the employees to inform them that it was turning the Post Office into a corporation and would be bringing forward a new act. It could have sought agreement to settle disputes. It might have discussed compulsory arbitration or a labour court, with judges who have a background in labour, who came up the hard way and know what it means to have no bread on their table and see their children go hungry. The workers of this country may be in a mood to come to some agreement, particularly when antagonisms between labour and management are resolved. It is during that phase that it is difficult to get a settlement that will be valuable throughout the years. The Post Office is now going to become a corporation. It is unfortunate that the department has not come up with a better way to settle disputes rather than have workers go on strike. At present, striking is their only weapon. If some alternative were provided, possibly we would see an end to postal strikes which have caused so much havoc in this country.

I want to make one other point before concluding. During a postal strike there should be some mechanism to prevent companies from going broke, people from suffering because their pay cheques do not arrive, troubles that arise when people do not receive insurance policies, for example, and so on. Having gone through three or four terrible postal strikes, we know what they mean. This legislation should be framed to avoid the agony and the difficulties which arise from strikes. Workers in the Post Office do not like the hatred that builds up during a strike. They have to live with it afterwards, and it is not pleasant. There could have been a tremendous advance in labour relations had there been a will and an attempt to do so. The government has fallen down badly in not providing a means of looking after essential services if and when, God forbid, there is a strike.

There have been many cases where utility bills have been delivered by a group we call the handicapped because they happen to be subnormal. This work gives them an opportunity to earn a living. The hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) last night talked about boy scouts doing this task. The gas co-operative is a consumers' organization; there is no big money behind it. It is not a giant corporation but gets its money from the pockets of the people. During a strike it has difficulty delivering bills. It is unfortunate that provision is not made to protect essential services.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I want to make a couple of observations on the motion presented by the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet). I am in agreement with the amendment the Postmaster General has put forward. I know that this amendment is the consequence of long deliberations between the Postmaster General, management of the Post Office and union members who make up the Post Office family. As a consequence we have before us an amendment which incorporates, in as co-operative a form as possible, deliberations which commenced many months ago and which were brought to the forefront while the bill was in committee. As a consequence of further discussions, this amendment has been brought forward by the Postmaster General. It will be supported by my party.

My friend the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) has expressed a point of view which he has also expressed on other occasions. His views about the consequences to the public of work stoppages in the Post Office are legitimate in so far as he and many members of the Canadian public are concerned.

I had a short experience as postmaster general but I have also had nearly four years as opposition critic on labour matters. I do not think we should move to the outright abolition of the right to strike. As the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) said, in economic battles the right to strike is the final defence or weapon, if you like, of workers in any industrial enterprise. To a very real degree the Post Office is an industrial enterprise.

I join with others who search for a better way to settle matters than having strikes in certain areas visited upon the public. Our party had proposed the establishment of a public interest disputes commission with variations on the theme set out some years ago by the Woods Royal Commission which studied industrial disputes in Canada. This is not the time to go into that matter, however.

I want to assure the Postmaster General that he will have the support of this party. We respect the right of our colleague, the hon. member for York North, to answer the call of his conscience and vote according to his convictions in this matter. I think the Parliament of Canada is a big enough place that it can put up with differences. While I think I have always been a good party team player, I have often stated publicly, and I state again, that the rigidity of party lines in this House has often done a lot more damage than good.

We will support the amendment. My good friend the hon. member for York North will vote according to his conscience. I think he will probably be representing the opinion of a number of Canadians, but that is his right and I for one respect it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is on motion No. 11 in the name of the Postmaster General. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In accordance with Standing Order 75, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the bill.

Call in the members.

The House divided on motion No. 1 (Mr. Blenkarn), which was negatived on the following division:

THE COMMONWEALTH

PROMOTION OF CLOSER COMMERCIAL AND CULTURAL RELATIONS WITH CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of promoting closer commercial and cultural relations between Canada and the communities of the Commonwealth Caribbean and, in particular, that steps be taken to provide for (a) subsidization of sea-borne transport between this country and the Commonwealth Caribbean area;

(b) assistance in the upgrading of the sea ports of Atlantic Canada;

(c) such tariff changes as might facilitate the exchange of commodities between the two areas;

(d) greater exchange of students between the two areas; and

(e) assistance to encourage meetings of political, business and educational leaders of the two regions with a view to stimulating a North-South exchange of goods, people, services and technology in a mutually advantageous manner.

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue) moved:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to consider the advisability of taking an initiative in seeking to promote closer relations with the former British possessions in the West Indies, such as the Turks and Caicos Islands, which have not yet attained independence, and further that if the residents of any of these islands so desire it, economic and political union of these islands with Canada be negotiated at an early date at the proper constitutional levels.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I want at the outset to express my appreciation to those on the other side of the chamber who after many years have seen fit to pay that tribute to the Caribbean islands and nations which they so richly deserve.

When I first introduced a motion of this nature a few years ago, the nations of central Latin America and parts of South America were not in the turmoil they are in today. Even today few North Americans recognize the great potential the Caribbean and its people have for us in terms of trade and the value of its cultural history.

Today there are about a quarter of a million people from the Caribbean in and around the city of Toronto. Canadian investment in that part of the world is some $400 million. There is in excess of $200 million in trade with that part of the world.

It is an area which stretches from the Panama Canal northeast to the Bahamas, up to Bermuda, south to Trinidad and even further into Guyana and Belize in Latin America. We are talking about ten independent countries. Antigua within the year will become the eleventh. We are talking about the associated states of St. Kitts and Nevis. In addition there are five dependent territories.

This whole area is of tremendous importance to Canadians and to me as an Atlantic Canadian. Our history with the Commonwealth Caribbean nations predates their becoming members of the Commonwealth. Long before Canada was a confederation we traded the usual basic staples from our part of the world, such as fish and lumber, for sugar, molasses and beautiful rum, among other things. However, that was a long time ago.

I mentioned the value of trade with these nations and the value of Canadian investment. That trade and investment is rapidly developing. My concern and that of my distinguished friend and former colleague, Senator Macquarrie, is that in the midst of the turmoil that has developed in that part of the world in recent years, North Americans have, to a degree that I find not acceptable, tended to turn their backs on them. From time to time we disagree with the philosophies of their governments and, indeed, it is fitting that we should. When countries fail to consult their people in the usual way through elections, of course we should express concern, but we should not turn that into a rejection of the people themselves. It is the people for whom we must continue to show concern.

The presence of Cuba, which as we all know is under the influence of Russia, is being felt more and more each day in this troubled area. It is only when nations such as Canada demonstrate that there is another and better way that we can provide the option that the people in these islands need if they are not to fall under the influence of the eastern orbit.

My interest in this matter is somewhat historical, Mr. Speaker. Atlantic Canadians have always had an attachment to that part of the world. There are some concrete things that we should do which have been evident to people from Canada who travel to these islands. Many people go for rest and recreation and usually see only the better or nicer islands. They do not see the privation, the poverty and extreme difficulties that affect many of the people but, they do notice that there is a tangible need for trade and for the facilities to support it.

The motion that I have put before the House calls, in part, for better ports and for the creation of a Canadian merchant marine to facilitate in the further development of trade between our country and these nations. We should not only upgrade our own seaports for this purpose but also those of the receiving countries. It would not be a large undertaking and it is one that would pay enormous dividends to a nation such as ours.

We also need to do more in the areas of health and education. Barbados is one of the key, stable areas of the Commonwealth Caribbean, yet it has only two practising public psychiatrists. I learned recently that there are about 100 psychiatrists in Manitoba, yet that province feels there is a shortage. I am speaking now of a population of between one and two million people which shares two or three psychiatrists. It is an area in which with a little bit of will, Canadians could make a tremendous contribution to the mental well-being of a lot of people.

There are also other areas that we must consider. Those set forth in my motion barely scratch the surface of the work that must be done. One of the areas in which we could do much more than we are at present—and I have included it because it grows in importance year after year—is in the promotion of the exchange of business people, political leaders, doctors, lawyers, engineers and other technicians. Much could be gained from this. Seminars have been held on progress with respect to program management in the construction industry and these have been very successful. The cost is not great and there should be eight or ten such programs going on in this area.

I recently visited a new school in one of the Commonwealth Caribbean nations. It had a beautiful library but no books. There was a good home economics classroom with two good gas stoves, but there was no money to buy the tanks of gas needed to start the stoves in order to teach the students to cook. That is the kind of aid that we offer. We frequently put something in place, then say we have done all we can and leave it at that. We can find dozens of instances of our good intentions throughout the Caribbean where we have commenced projects but never really got them off the ground. There is a cocoa replantation project in Granada which was approved almost seven years ago. Not a tree has been planted yet although the program has been approved. It takes 75 years for a cocoa tree to mature, but it will be 75 years before we put the first one in the ground at the rate we are going.

Much of this is the fault of CIDA, although some of it can be overcome, Mr. Speaker. It is hoped that within the next few months, and even beyond that, through the work of the special subcommittee of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence an impetus will be provided for this work and that we will have a constant reminder that we must do more.

The Commonwealth Caribbean has always been important to us and it always will be. It is incumbent upon us to recognize the urgency of the problems that face the people in the Caribbean basin and in Latin and South America.

I appreciate the government's agreement to allow the subject matter of this and one other private motion to go to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. After taking into consideration the ideas and thoughts presented by members from all sides of this House, I hope that the subcommittee will be able to present to us a full and detailed report on the present status of the relationship between Canada and that part of the world. I hope these motions do not die on the Order Paper, like other subject matters of private members' motions, before the government takes some action on the recommendations which I know will be forthcoming.

Mr. Tousignant: Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House reads as follows:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to consider the advisability of taking an initiative in seeking to promote closer relations with the former British possessions in the West Indies, such as the Turks and Caicos Islands, which have not yet attained independence, and further that if the residents of any of these islands so desire it, economic and political union of these islands with Canada be negotiated at an early date at the proper constitutional levels.

This motion stems from a request made a number of years ago already by the authorities of those islands, according to which they apparently had the intention once of proposing that they become a Canadian protectorate or territory. In the few minutes at my disposal, Mr. Speaker, I will comment briefly on the major aspects of the motion. First, I will talk about the geographical location of those islands. The Turks and Caicos Islands are British possessions located southeast of the Bahamas. Although they are not politically affiliated with the Bahamas they are physically part of those islands. They cover about 175 square miles and have a population of roughly 7,800 inhabitants, mostly blacks.

Several motions were introduced in the House over the years by the opposition parties, mainly the New Democratic Party, with the support of the Progressive Conservatives. On every occasion those motions were rejected by the government on the grounds that they might lead to an upset of the balance in the standard of living between those islands, not to mention complications in immigration procedures, something over which Canada might find it difficult to exercise control. As well, the then external affairs secretary of state equated that possibility with some form of colonialism. I believe the situation has changed appreciably since then, and that is why I suggest there would be major advantages in making an in-depth review of the feasibility and the possibility of a rapprochement between the Turks and Caicos Islands and annexation with either a province of Canada or Canada itself.

Now as far as advantages and disadvantages are concerned, Mr. Speaker we could discuss them at length. However, I expect and hope that the motion will be referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence and we would then have the opportunity to deal with them in depth. In the few minutes left to me, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that I am convinced that those who get acquainted with that motion will realize the mutual advantages of such a rapprochement. If we solely consider the tourist industry, Mr. Speaker, our adverse trade balance, I refer now to the Economic Review, a Perspective on the Decade, April 1980, Department of Finance and on page 104 I read the following: This deficit and I quote:

—reached a high of $1.7 billion in 1978.

And the trade deficit for the tourist industry

—$0.9 billion of which was with the United States.

It means, Mr. Speaker, that in the tourism sector alone, it would be advisable for Canada to at least assess a prospective union with those islands.

From the standpoint of trade, this would lead, of course, to a fairly spectacular development, involving a considerable amount of supplies coming from Canada, a considerable work force from all areas of the building and catering industries. We know we have a lot of know-how in those areas in Canada. Now, I feel that taking into account, for instance, the number of Canadians who go south during the winter months, besides some of our retired people, if it were possible to spend winter holidays in Canada, in a Canadian province, with the same currency, there is good reason for the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence to have a close look at the very least, at the possibility of developing closer ties with those islands. I have barely touched upon some of the advantages—I am sure some will say some disadvantages could also be mentioned—but times have changed since those motions on closer ties were brought foward in the House and I think that with regard, for example, to immigration, there should be no problems of any consequence in view of the efficiency of the controls implemented today. As for the imbalance it might create with the other islands, there again I doubt that the argument is valid. As far as colonialism is concerned, which was brought up at the time, once again, if we come to an agreement that is mutually satisfactory, I fail to see how that could be interpreted as colonialism. Both sides would, I think, derive considerable advantages from such an agreement and that is why I have great hope that this House will agree, at least, to referring this motion to the standing committee.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I say—which I am sure is no news to you—that Canada is the greatest country in the world in every regard. It could actually be a true Garden of Eden but for one thing: a place we can call home, where we can visit and rest, basking in a tropical clime. For all those reasons, I hope the House will accept my motion.

[English]

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) and the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant) on the two resolutions they have placed before the House today. I should also like to congratulate the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) for making the necessary arrangements so that we can discuss both of these resolutions at the same time. I hope I am not jumping the gun if I also thank him for the motion which he will probably make a little later that the subject matter of the two resolutions be referred to the appropriate committee for study.

The subject matter of these motions has long been the interest of quite a few people in the Canadian Parliament and I think it is time we gave very close study to the possibility of developing closer relations with the peoples of the Caribbean nations.

I have mentioned the two members who have placed the motions before us today. I think we should also recall the efforts, especially regarding the Turks and Caicos Islands, which were made session after session by a former colleague of mine, Mr. Max Saltsman, who came here as the member for Waterloo South, which was later called Waterloo-Cambridge. I am also conscious of the keen interest in the Caribbean of the former member for Hillsborough, now Senator Heath Macquarrie. We do have these interests as part of the record, and I hope we will build thereon and give serious study to ways in which we might make our relations closer.

Many of us in this House have had the pleasure of visting the Caribbean. The two islands I have had the pleasure of visiting are Jamaica and Trinidad. I know the name of the country is Trinidad and Tobago but my visit was on the island of Trinidad. In mentioning that country, I think we might express in this House our regret at the recent untimely death of Dr. Eric Williams, the prime minister of Trinidad and Tobago, who did such a good job of achieving stability in a part of the world where there is a fair amount of instability.

Those of us who have been down there know that the feeling there toward Canada and Canadians is very warm, and I think it would be good for them and good for us if we had closer relations.

I have mentioned—I know it is a bit personal but it is in my mind—visiting both Jamaica and Trinidad. I can say that persons from these two islands have rendered me and my family a much appreciated service in my own home in Winnipeg, and I am happy to say that a number of these people, all black or brown, call me Grandpa which I like very much.

So I am grateful to the parliamentary secretary for the motion which I believe he will move, and I trust the House will approve it so there can be further study of this important and very human subject.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) and the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant) for bringing these two motions to the House for study, and I am particularly grateful for the co-operation I received from the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East who rushed back from his official visit to Italy and immediately after touching down before five o'clock came down here. I am sure he is quite exhausted, but certainly, with dedication such as this, I think the House would do him justice in seeing that the subject matter of the motion is referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

My colleague, the hon. member for Témiscamingue, put a particularly good motion before us, one that was the subject of comment. It is a motion which has been put before the House by the former member for Waterloo-Cambridge, Mr. Saltsman of the NDP, and which was debated for many years. I am speaking now as a private member, not in my capacity as parliamentary secretary, when I say that I could not understand why the government did not pursue the motion more fully by exploring links with the Turks and Caicos Islands. I think one of the particular problems may have been, as I discovered, having talked with representatives of the Turks and Caicos Islands at some conferences of the parliamentary association, that if there were ever to be such a union with Canada they would want some kind of special status and perhaps would not be willing to join on the same basis as did other provinces such as Newfoundland, when it came into confederation, or Alberta and Saskatchewan in 1905. Perhaps that may be the sticking point. However, it is an idea which should be pursued and I hope this is the first step in the pursuit of that idea.

The other reason I am particularly glad to be representing the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) here this evening is that in my constituency I have many people from the West Indies. Our Commonwealth Caribbean friends have made a distinct contribution, not only to my constituency but to the life of metropolitan Toronto. Indeed, some of my greatest friends are people who originally came from the West Indies. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) reminisced about his personal visits to the West Indies. I think there are very few Canadians who have not visited at least one Caribbean island.

A couple of years ago I went to the conference of the Commonwealth parliamentary association held in Port of Spain, Trinidad, and I also visited Barbados on a holiday a few years ago. I concur in the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre about the affection and closeness with which people from those islands regard Canada and the distinct and unique bond between us which makes it even more appropriate that we discuss the subject here this evening.

I should say in delivering some official remarks on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that I will be proposing a motion that the subject matter of these two motions be referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. Hon. members may ask why we are not referring the motions themselves, and perhaps I could take a minute to explain that. This is said with no disrespect to the two members proposing the motions.

There are five areas listed in the motion of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, one being subsidization of seaborne transport between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean area, another being the assistance in the upgrading of the seaports of Atlantic Canada, and three others. They are something on which the government does not necessarily wish to commit itself at this stage, and I would even venture to say that had the motion stopped after the words "Commonwealth Caribbean", we would probably be approving this motion unanimously. However, I think it bears further study, both by the government and the committee, as to whether or not the areas listed in the motion of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East are areas which should be emphasized.

Motion No. 36 in the name of the hon. member for Témiscamingue is also, I believe, a worthy one, but the reason we are only referring the subject matter to the committee is again that the motion itself goes into a few specifics on which the government is not prepared to commit itself. It may be that after discussion in committee, a report will come back on these two subjects and there may be concurrence in the House. We will then have achieved something of some substance for the two hon. members who have brought the motions before us.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has asked me to present some general remarks on the subject. In particular, he wants me to acknowledge the fact that the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence has already received a reference to examine Canada's relationship with Latin America and the Caribbean. The committee's current investigations and both of these motions reflect, in the government's view, the continuing and growing interest of the government and people of Canada in our relations with our neighbours in the western hemisphere, in particular with the Commonwealth Caribbean.

As Mr. Speaker knows from his travels with various Commonwealth Parliamentary Association delegations, the Canadian government has been an active participant in the economic development of the Commonwealth Caribbean for a quarter of a century. I see the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) is present in the House. He is the past president of the Canadian branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association; I know of his great interest and work in this particular area.

In the autumn of 1956, when the notion of a federation of English-speaking island states of the region was in the air, the then Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs, Lester Pearson, convened a conference of Caribbean leaders in Ottawa, during which the first significant pledge of Canadian official assistance was made to the then embryonic University of the West Indies. This university was to formulate the beginning of the Caribbean Broadcasting Corporation.

A decade later, in 1966, the Hon. Paul Martin, another distinguished former Secretary of State for External Affairs, a former High Commissioner and senator, chaired a second Commonwealth Caribbean conference in Ottawa, during the course of which Canada renewed its pledge to assist the states of the Commonwealth Caribbean on a continuing basis.

Over the 15 years since the second Ottawa conference on the Caribbean, the Canadian Development Assistance Program to the region—bilateral, multilateral, non-government organizational, industrial co-operation, grant and loan, direct and indirect—has been put in place to quicken economic growth in the Caribbean, leading naturally and inevitably to a redefinition of the Canada-Commonwealth Caribbean relationship.

Canada-Caribbean Relations

Two years ago in Kingston, Jamaica, the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Hon. Don Jamieson, was proud to sign for Canada the agreement with CARICOM, otherwise known as the Caribbean Community and Common Market, on trade and economic co-operation. It was the first formal meeting at ministerial level between CARICOM and Canada. Initial progress in providing substance to the trade, technical, financial and industrial co-operation provisions of the 1979 agreement has been modest, but solid and real.

Essentially our first contacts were exploratory in nature. They were followed by useful work by officials at the November, 1979, Joint Trade and Economic Committee meeting in Ottawa and in the subsequent meeting of the ad hoc committee on industrial co-operation in the Barbados.

There is commitment to a new and dynamic thrust to the CARICOM relationship. In the past year, a comprehensive review of Canada's relations with the Commonwealth Caribbean has been commissioned, completed, considered and approved by cabinet. This review included an examination of Canada-Commonwealth Caribbean trade and investment, Canada-Commonwealth Caribbean people-to-people links, Canada's development co-operation relationship with the Caribbean, and Canada's political links with the Caribbean.

The review took eight months of preparation involving extensive consultations in Ottawa and the full and active participation of the Canadian High Commissioners in the field. The review confirmed, as official policy, that the Commonwealth Caribbean is and will continue to be a region of major interest to Canada.

In fact, the government went beyond the mere provision of an assessment; cabinet approved an action plan for a regional policy approach which directed that the Commonwealth Caribbean should be accorded priority.

The review concluded that Canada should intensify and deepen its economic and political relationships with the states of the Commonwealth Caribbean. The government wants this partnership to assist those states to cope with rapid changes and economic difficulties which beset the region. The regional policy approach which the Canadian government is prepared to implement focuses primarily on economic co-operation, both bilateral and multilateral, but also calls for strengthening of political and social ties.

The present Secretary of State for External Affairs launched the policy in January when he visited the eastern Caribbean and Jamaica and met with Commonwealth Caribbean ministers to seek their views on this regional policy approach.

The second motion reflecting the idea of closer association between Canada and the Turks and Caicos Islands has been the subject of public interest and parliamentary debate for some years. The Turks and Caicos Islands are an economically underdeveloped British colony with minimal but good relations with Canada. The government's position, which was enunciated in 1974, has been that it did not favour discriminating in favour of one state in the region. It was concluded that association would result in Canadians dominating the economy of the islands, raising the possibility of social tensions and accusations of neo-colonialism. This subject remains of interest to Parliament and the people of Canada. Therefore, its examination by the committee is in the minister's view both useful and timely.

In closing, I should like to echo the sentiments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who paid tribute to the late Dr. Eric Williams, the prime minister of Trinidad and Tobago for 21 years. He was an individual who contributed to the adolescence of the Caribbean community. I am not referring to just his own island; he presided over a great surge in economic growth in his country of Trinidad and Tobago. He was a respected elder statesman in the Caribbean community. We all mourn his passing last week. We hope the Caribbean community, as a whole, will look toward the leadership he has given over the years and perhaps emulate his policies and deep commitment to the people of the Caribbean as part of the model for future action and development.

At this time just before the supper hour, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That motions Nos. 31 and 36, standing in the names of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East and the hon. member for Témiscamingue, respectively, be withdrawn and that the subject matters thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

I hope this motion will be acceptable to hon. members of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The House has heard the terms of the motion of the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Accordingly, the motions are withdrawn and the subject matters thereof are referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

Motions Nos. 31 and 36 withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): May I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CROWN CORPORATION

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General) moved that Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, be read the third time and do pass.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is third reading. If the minister speaks now he normally would close the debate. I think there are members on this—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No. I believe the hon. member should consult the rule book. This is third reading.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the unanimous consent of the House to table at this time, in accordance with an agreement entered upon when the bill was discussed in committee, the revised French version of Bill C-42, and as a result, I would also ask leave to make two small amendments to the English version so that the two texts will agree. It would involve a word change in line 33 on page 17, and also at lines 37 and 38 on page 30.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. minister to table the item?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, when I introduced this bill last October, I emphasized that it was the fruit of comprehensive studies and intensive consultations with the public, the unions and all employee associations involved. I also stated that I was looking forward to a detailed examination of the bill in committee, where it would be possible to hear the views of the groups concerned and to study carefully the various aspects of the bill so that the interests of the public, of the postal service and of the employees would be protected.

In the weeks that followed, some constructive suggestions were made and certain doubts were expressed concerning the bill. Special interest groups both from the business community and the Canadian public also made certain suggestions. Many of them made submissions to the committee. The hon. members will also recall that the House decided to ask the Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments to look at certain key clauses so that we would be able to take into account the recommendations and the conclusions of this committee during the detailed study of the bill.

The concerns expressed in connection with the original bill were related mostly to the proposed monopoly to be exercised by the corporation. Some people thought that this monopoly could be a threat for other communications enterprises, especially in the field of telecommunications. Others were concerned about the rate-fixing mechanism, mail safety, the definition of mail matter and the survival of our traditional postal service. Certain employee groups were also interested in the amendments concerning personnel transfers and the negotiating process during the change-over from a Department to a Crown corporation. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say that all these points were carefully considered during the detailed study in committee last November and December.

The same holds true with the suggestions and recommendations made by the joint committee, by Mr. Justice Marin particularly, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Public Service Commission, as well as those submitted in writing to our committee. About the Canadian Labour Congress, Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to thank Mrs. Shirley Carr and Mr. Ronald Lang who, through their advice and precious co-operation, have made of this act the best legislation possible.

In fact, when the committee meetings ended on December 19 of last year, the committee members had considered more than 60 amendments and recommended that a great many of them be added to Bill C-42. During our committee proceedings, Mr. Speaker, my predecessor, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), whom I want to thank publicly for his co-operation and understanding during consideration of this bill, talked about the need to revitalize the postal service. I must admit that I was very much impressed by this, as well as by the desire of all committee members of whatever political affiliation to achieve this objective. Our committee members have demonstrated much flexibility and willingness to co-operate. They have come up with constructive ideas and have agreed to sensible arrangements. If one compares the wording of Bill C-42 which was read the first time on July 17 of last year to the amended version of December 19, one realizes that responsible work has been done, and I acknowledge that thanks to that co-operation the original bill has been considerably improved.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend tonight to explain each and every change made to the bill, but I will confine myself to the main points. First of all, we have improved the wording in order to stress the importance of a consistent service from coast to coast, and as recommended by Mr. Justice René Marin, we have added a paragraph to insist on mail security. The number of board directors has been increased. The board of directors will consist of the chairman, the president of the corporation and nine other directors. So, the number of board directors has been increased from seven to nine at the request of the Conservative members on our committee.

This amendment will allow a broader representation without impeding in any way the operation of the board. As to the regulations, that part of the bill has been considerably amended in committee so as to include a series of recommendations submitted by the Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. Some subparagraphs have been added because it seemed in the public interest to provide that certain matters be settled by regulations in order to allow for input by the public and the cabinet. Other subparagraphs, in view of their importance and at the suggestion of some of my colleagues, have been withdrawn from the clause dealing with regulations and became separate clauses in the bill; more important still, a series of subparagraphs have been added so that the public might be made aware of what regulations are being proposed through their publication in The Canada Gazette and give their opinion before they are approved by the governor in council.

Since postal rates will be subject to that procedure, the public will know what rate hikes are planned for all classes of mail, not only for letters and, of course, being aware of what is being proposed, they can then express their views. That procedure, in my opinon, is a good solution for it will save us the great expense or a reference, as was initially proposed, to a rate review board like the Canadian Transport Commission.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, the clause dealing with the corporation's exclusive privilege with regard to letters has been substantially amended during consideration in committee. In all the discussions in committee, the members constantly agreed that the monopoly the Post Office has enjoyed over a 100 years, and which the Canada Post Corporation must retain, serves a purpose of prime importance, that of providing an income basis which makes it possible to give Canadians in all parts of this country comparable mail delivery services at a reasonable cost. The private sector, Mr. Speaker, cannot in any way meet those two criteria. Without a monopoly on letters, inevitably high rates, increased subsidies, a substandard service or a combination of all those would result. Obviously, the social impact on Canadians would be unacceptable. That is why Canada, like all large advanced countries, must continue to enjoy a monopoly on letters. However, I recognize that Canadians, in certain circumstances, should be able to resort to other mail delivery services. The present Post Office Act allows courier services to deliver all types of mail except letters. Bill C-42 as amended will also allow those businesses to deliver letters, but on certain conditions. This, I believe, meets to a large extent the concerns expressed by various groups without, however, reducing the monopoly to the extent of making it meaningless. So urgent messages will be delivered by messengers if the sender is prepared to pay extra for that service.

One of the major points of contention of the present Post Office Act is that some companies hire contractors to deliver their mail. For this reason, we have clearly indicated in this bill that companies can entrust their own employees with the task of delivering mail between different offices of their company; if, on the other hand, these companies gave contractors or their own employees the exclusive right to deliver mail to a third party, then they would go against the exclusive privilege.

For example, if an employee of an oil company delivers fuel to a home and at the same time hands the bill to the customer, we do not consider this to be an infringement of the law. But if, on the other hand, this same company give its employees or a contractor the exclusive right to deliver bills to its customers, this would be considered a breach of the law. This is the third option I mentioned on Tuesday, April 7, and to which the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) referred. It is in that context that my statement, as reported on page 9047 of Hansard for April 7, 1981, should be understood, when in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), I indicated, and I quote:

They could follow a number of routes.

In fact, there are three options. About the third option, whereby companies choose to assign their own personnel to this task, I said:

That is their privilege.

It is in that context that I mentioned the third option. So I do not want my remarks to be misunderstood and the answer I gave to the hon. member for Mississauga South on April 7 last to be misinterpreted.

● (2020)

Mr. Speaker, another important exception to the monopoly concerns electronic or optical mail. Hon. members will recall that the media and certain business groups expressed concern that the Post Office may try to take over the telecommunication industry. The exception clearly expressed in the bill should be enough to dispell that concern. The corporation is going to consider the most recent developments in the area of telecommunications.

The government want through the bill to enable that new corporation to be in the forefront of new techniques in telecommunications and to apply them to its operations if needed. However, it is obvious that the corporation does not intend to take over common carriers in telecommunications. On the contrary, the new services will follow the path of co-operation which is already open with the present firms, as we did with such services as telepost and intelpost.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is worthwhile to repeat that turning a whole department into a Crown corporation is unprecedented. It is therefore not surprising that sections concerning labour relations are complex and very detailed. There are several sections in the bill which are designed to make the transition smooth for postal workers who will come under the jurisdiction of the Canada Labour Code instead of the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Public Service Employment Act. The sections on labour relations in the original Bill C-42, as well as the amendments agreed upon in committee and the rewriting of Clause 68 are the result of an exhaustive study and successful consultation with unions. I am particularly proud of that result.

I am convinced that those sections cover everything that can be written in legislation in this area. Of course, there are some points left out that can be dealt with only through major policies. So that these points may be fully understood, I would like to explain them briefly in closing my remarks. The first concern deals with job classification. The present classification system will continue until a revised one is introduced, after consultation with the appropriate unions. New classification systems will be initiated and developed as soon as possible, and there should be no problem in maintaining the present system as long as necessary.

The present internal review system of job classification will be preserved for the time being. Any employee who disagrees with the final decision concerning his or her classification will have the opportunity to appeal, air his or her grievances and later on refer the matter to arbitration if necessary. The second point during the period of transition refers to staffing procedures. Except in two cases, appointments on the staff of the new Canada Post Corporation will be made in keeping with the procedures established in the Public Service Employment Act. However, the Crown corporation will retain decision-making authority in staffing matters. Also, corporation employees will have access to an internal appeal system in cases where they disagree with staffing decisions. There is also the issue of the grievance procedure during the transition period. As members are aware, the grievance procedure for all employees is defined in the applicable collective agreement.

At the outset, the new corporation will administer 29 such collective agreements providing various grievance procedures for one thing or another. The changes to be made in the internal grievance procedure for each collective agreement will be discussed in future negotiations. Therefore, until such time as a bargaining unit signs its first collective agreement with the new corporation, the grievance procedure applicable to the unit will remain the same with small changes resulting from the making of the Post Office into a Crown corporation. Consequently, in certain cases, the last level of appeal will no longer be the assistant deputy Postmaster General, but the president of the corporation.

Finally, there are clauses dealing with the release of employees for incompetence or incapacity during the transition period. After the proclamation of the new legislation, the release of employees for these reasons will follow the basic procedure stipulated in the Public Service Employment Act, with the following exceptions: first, the recommendations for release will be addressed to the person who occupies a position equivalent to that of a regional director general or of an assistant deputy Postmaster General, under their new titles. That person will have the authority to approve the dismissal, however, and this is very important, the employee will have the right to appeal the decision. Second, should the employee find the corporation's final decision unacceptable, he may file a grievance, and if necessary, in the last instance, refer to arbitration.

Mr. Speaker, this is a piece of legislation whose time has come. This third reading stage is the result of many years of preparation, negotiations and compromise. I urge Parliament to pass this bill in order to allow this Crown corporation to begin its mandate and provide Canadians with the revitalized postal service they need.

When the Prime Minister handed me the Postmaster General portfolio for the first time, back in 1972, I took over these responsibilities with a great deal of enthusiasm. So it was, I must say, with a certain regret that I left this post upon my transfer to another department. I was therefore particularly pleased last year when the Prime Minister entrusted me again with this department because it seldom happens in politics that you can bring a job to a successful end. I am very pleased to now be able to say, "Mission accomplished".

I would like to take this opportunity to extend my special appreciation to the DM of the Post Office Department, Mr. Jim Corkery, who helped me and supported me throughout the last few months in this process of converting this department into a Crown corporation. I am the last Postmaster-General ever to address this House. I am grateful to the Prime Minister for allowing me to experience this historic moment: with the coming into being of this corporation there will no longer be a Postmaster-General. I think one can say that this is the end of an era. The end of an era, but also the beginning of a new one. The establishment of this corporation I am absolutely convinced, Mr. Speaker, will enable its employees to function in an environment and a climate they have looked forward to for a long time. The Canadian public will be getting a better service and, above all, management will have a chance to give the full measure of their ability knowing that they are in complete control of the situation and that they do not depend on decisions made in other departments in order to provide an efficient management of the Canadian postal service. To conclude my remarks, let me say, "Long live the new Canada Post Corporation!"

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to hear the remarks of the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet). I hesitate to say that while a minister of the Crown may not be called Postmaster General in the future, there certainly will be a minister of the Crown responsible for the post office. I do not know whether the fact that he will not be called Postmaster General but minister responsible for the post office will make him feel any happier, because the way this bill is organized, it makes the government continually responsible for every single thing in the post office, including postal rates.

As the minister pointed out in his remarks, the cumbersome procedure set out in Bill C-42, as it was presented to this House, was significantly changed in committee in many ways. I appreciate the minister congratulating the Conservative Party for its efforts in committee. The minister appreciates, as do other members, that we spent a great deal of time on this bill, although perhaps not as much as we should have. I will come to that later in my remarks. Unfortunately, there was an effort to push the bill through committee quickly. I have a motion to present at the end of my remarks respecting that problem.

The Post Office as we know it is probably the most visible activity of government in our country. As I said on second reading, almost every day a member of the Post Office walks down my street representing the Government of Canada. When he delivers mail, he represents the Government of Canada. When that mail is slow, damaged or destroyed, he represents the Government of Canada. Unfortunately, the representation of the Government of Canada on the streets and byways of this country has not been too good in the past. That representation has soiled the name of Canada.

We have great hopes for this postal corporation, but I do not believe any member of this House really believes in his heart of hearts that all the problems of the post office will be solved by this Crown corporation bill creating the post office corporation. Just to be sure that some of these concerns are brought to the attention of the minister and whoever will be running the new corporation, should this bill pass this House and the Senate, I want to put on record some of the concerns which members have received from their constituents with regard to how the post office has acted and is acting today. I quote from a letter from J. V. Gordon:

> Over the past months I, like many other Canadians I'm sure, have become increasingly frustrated and angered at the deterioration in the mail delivery service—
> The letter was posted on the evening of January 17, postmarked January 18 and received January 27—10 days to travel 16 miles! I flew to England, did a week's work and was home on January 24, 3 days before the letter was delivered.

The minister replied:

> Normally, Canada Post moves its mail with a high degree of efficiency in the 95 per cent range or better . . . However, if one per cent of these items are late, this represents 250,000 delays per day.

When we talk about late and talk about average delivery, most of us are brought to the realization that seven days' delay between posting and delivering is average. I mentioned in report stage that I had approached the Postmaster General to bring to his attention a letter I received from Bill Kennett, Inspector General of Banks on March 26. I quote:

> As requested in your letter of March 12, 1981, which we received on Friday, March 20, please find enclosed a copy of the Proposed Regulations published on December 20, 1980.

This is the kind of service we are getting. Bill Kennett's address is Place Bell Canada here in Ottawa. I quote from my letter to the minister:

> Do you deem it necessary for members of various government departments communicating with Parliament and vice versa to use parliamentary messengers to make sure that mail is delivered so that it is received the next day, or will that be an abuse of the courier provisions contained in the bill.

It has not been good, it has not been satisfactory, it does not stand up. It is not as good today as it was 20, 50 or 75 years ago. That is the state of the Post Office. As I said, I intend to move a motion later tonight. That will be one of my prime reasons for doing it.

While the minister may say it is 95 per cent satisfactory, his definition of satisfactory and my definition and that of my constituents is not. My constituents expect the same kind of mail service their parents and grandparents received. They do not expect a mail delivery system which does not work, is not on time and is not efficient and dependable. The service which has been available to this country is neither on time nor dependable.

An hon. Member: Get rid of the machines.

Mr. Blenkarn: My friend says get rid of the machines. I intend to talk about that tonight.

When this bill was first presented, a number of people said to the members that a post office corporation will not work. They said it was a method by which the minister was going to try to bury the problems behind the idea of a Crown corporation. In committee we were able to insist that amendments be made. Indeed, amendments were made at report stage to make a ministry or the government more responsible for the corporation, probably as responsible as the present Postmaster General. I do not know whether that will help service because, with the Postmaster General responsible, it has not been very good.

I want to assure the Canadian public that we on this side have ensured that the Postmaster General has accepted the responsibility and that the governor in council, the cabinet, will continue to be responsible for the appointment of the people to the executive, the directors and vice-presidents of the post office. All directives, even those that are now secret, will be made public so that the post office will be above board. That is good. We expect this corporation to work. We expect an improvement in postal service so that Canadians receive the same service our parents received, the service we were receiving 10, 15 and 20 years ago.

People expect better postal service every year. Instead, it has been getting worse and worse each year. In fact, I do not believe it can get worse. It has to go back to the kind of service that people expected when statutes were passed which said you were deemed to receive something three days or seven days after it was mailed. That was a reasonable assumption and registered mail delivery was almost a certainty. Today no one can claim that if something was mailed to you that you must have received it. Indeed, a favourite excuse of anyone who has not paid a bill today is that the cheque is in the mail. How can you not accept that explanation if someone claims they put it in the mail, because in all probability it got lost? There is at least as much probability of that as there is that they were just spinning you a line about the payment.

The Post Office has been beset with a number of problems. Some of my constituents refer to these as labour problems. But I say to you, sir, they are management problems. I do not know of a single business which has strikes, lockouts, and labour disputes that are not reflective of the people who manage the organization. Most of the people who work in the Post Office in our country are good, solid, hard-working men and women. They want to do a day's work and they expect to be directed, organized and motivated by the people who are put in management positions.

Management is leadership, Mr. Speaker. The leadership in the Post Office is abominable. The corporation must hire effective leadership and good, new, management people. I mean good people right down to the lower levels of management. Some of the incumbents must be replaced with others who can get the system organized. If that is not done, then this corporation has as much chance of success as a snowball has of surviving on a hot July day in the middle of Rideau Street.

Some people have spoken about grievances. Tonight the Postmaster General, in speaking to Clause 68 of the bill, spoke of grievance procedures that are available. We should not be talking about grievances. The fact that there are 65,000 labour grievances is an indictment of incompetent, inept, incapable management. He should not be worrying about grievances, he should be worrying about motivating people to provide a service with the skills and competence that at one time distinguished the Post Office. Instead, today we have problems.

Someone mentioned machinery a moment ago. I live in Mississauga where the great white elephant called a machine that sorts parcels, is located. That machine manages to destroy almost as many parcels as it sorts. My secretary calls it an elephant. When I send stationery from my office here on Parliament Hill to my constituency office it invariably arrives crunched and destroyed. It does not matter how well it is wrapped, they manage to break it up. Indeed, we take it to the Post Office in this building and ask them to package it carefully for us. They do, and they ship it through their machine. It does a fine job—it crunches it.

Mr. Beatty: They bought the machine from Air Canada.

Mr. Blenkarn: My friend says they bought it from Air Canada. They probably did. In any event, they make sure it goes off the rollers or gets stomped on. An employee at the Gateway post office says that apparently it drops straight down nine feet and if it is marked fragile, they jump on it again.

There have also been complaints about theft in the Post Office. Again, an employee at the Gateway post office told me there is not as much theft as one would think. He says there is the odd person who is a bit of a thief. He says that most of the missing mail is not stolen but that the Post Office says it is because it cannot apologize any other way to the people whose packages are destroyed. The fact is that those Christmas presents, wedding presents or birthday presents, go through the machine and get all crunched up. They cannot tell people that they have been destroyed, so they say they must have been stolen or lost in the mail. That is what happens and they have a special crew to sweep up the mess! The machine and the system at the Gateway post office continues to operate despite complaints because the management is so inept, incompetent and incapable, and because the leadership from the government has been incompetent and incapable. It has not got down to brass tacks and dealt with the situation to make sure it is changed.

Just the other day the Post Office had the unmitigated gall to place an advertisement in the Toronto Star and The Toronto Sun claiming it would deliver a five-pound package for $1.40. I thought the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) might be annoyed because the weight was not given in metric. Maybe they are learning something. Anyway, it will send a five pound package from Toronto to Sudbury, or Sarnia or Montreal or wherever you want it to go, for $1.40.

One of my constituents, Mrs. Claire Kohlmeier sent a bunch of parcels to British Columbia for Christmas. Of course, they never got there. The Postmaster General wrote to her about the problem and the letter states, in part:

> However, we are aware of deficiencies in the service, particularly with the late delivery of mail in the Vancouver and surrounding area over the past few months.

That is the Postmaster General's excuse for the fact that Mrs. Kohlmeier's parcels were junked up. Yet the advertisement promises to deliver a five pound parcel for $1.40. It is no wonder that people use courier services. If you want your mail to get to its destination, you would use them too, or the bus service or Air Canada or someone who is prepared to take decent care of your mail.

That practice must cease under this corporation, Mr. Speaker. If it does not cease, then the corporation's existence must terminate and we must find another way of handling the mail. There is no excuse for this kind of thing and it should not be allowed to continue. There should be a time limit—I would suggest no more than five years—in which the corporation must demonstrate that it can do the job because, if it cannot, somebody else can.

I expect the minister or whoever takes over the corporation to do something about the management problems. At the moment, the payroll system is run by the Department of Supply and Services. It was designed for office help who are paid the same amount every month on a monthly basis.

However, the Post Office is not an office. The Post Office is more like a manufacturing organization where people are paid by the hour. If they work overtime, they expect to get their overtime pay.

Last fall there was a dispute in the Post Office with respect to clerks. They are not in the same union as the regular postal people, they are in the clerks' union. A number of sorters in the Post Office had to work overtime. Grievance after grievance after grievance was filed in connection with their overtime pay. It was not until February that my constituents who worked overtime in October were finally paid, notwithstanding the fact that their union officers and management people allegedly telephoned Ottawa and even the office of the Postmaster General. The red tape went on and on. They finally got their money.

How can we keep labour happy if we do not want to pay them? If we ask a person to work overtime and we do not want to pay him for it, what can we expect? I can tell this House what we can expect. We can expect the kinds of stupid grievances we find in the CUPW bulletin I have in my hand. We find people asking for entitlement to 20 weeks' paid maternity leave. They want January 2 and May Day off. They want double time for over time. If they work nights, they want a weeks' holiday for every two months' work. They want pay and employment conditions far in advance of what any private sector employee could begin to think about demanding. This is because they are so darned mad at the idiots who have been running the Post Office that finally in frustration they make union demands which they know, or ought to know, are absolutely ridiculous. Instead of organizing people, directing them and making them feel they are part of the organization and part of the team, the management does not do that. It treats them as slobs. It treats them scurrilously. It is no wonder these people get their backs up. Sure, they make demands. Sure, they file grievances. I do not blame them. If there is not a change in the operation and management of this Post Office in this new corporation, then it will not work.

The Postmaster General made some fine claims about Clause 68. I did not speak about that clause tonight because I do not know everything about labour problems other than how to keep most of the people who have ever worked for me pretty happy with me. I have never been involved in a strike, and I do not expect to be. Normally people do not strike. We work things out in Canada. We work things out in business. That is how to make a profit in business, but we must retain the right to discharge people on certain grounds. There must be management which is prepared to get tough when people are behaving absolutely wrongly. Management must be tough when there is uncontradicted evidence. When management personnel know that people sleep on the job behind piles of mail sacks, when management personnel know that people are beaten up because they do not consent to homosexual activity or when management people know that there are active dope peddlers involved in an organization, then the management people ought not to be worried about firing people and putting them out. When a group of people like that is in an establishment, then it is time management was capable of showing leadership, purpose and honesty.

It is time we had a management system prepared to give direction in the Post Office and prepared to give incentives. All people are not worth the same money per hour. Some people work harder than others. Some people show ability and initiative. Some people can produce better than others, and we have to show that in the pay packet. We could do much in this country if we gave people who walk the streets and pound the pavement for the postal corporation incentive pay packages. We could do something to improve productivity because that is where it is all at in this country. It is not what we pay a man per hour that counts; it is what he produces per hour. The management of this corporation had better organize itself to make sure it is prepared to reward people for productivity because that is what is important. We must look at productivity in everything we do, particularly in the Post Office, where in some parts productivity is as low as it ever could be. We must develop incentives so that people will produce more during the time they are at work. We must improve the productivity of the Post Office so that the Post Office can be a viable Crown corporation. Without improvements in productivity, we will have to review this corporation and find other methods by which to deliver our mail.

Indeed, technology is moving ahead, and unless the Post Office improves its productivity, the Post Office will not be necessary. People will send their cheques and pay their bills by means of electronic transfer of funds. People will communicate—me to you, Sir—electronically. We will not need people to walk the streets, drive trucks and deliver mail by hand.

I have great hope for the corporation. I hope the corporation will get its act together and do things to improve service. I hope the corporation will be an active competitor with present courier services, and I hope the corporation's reputation in terms of delivery of mail will improve.

I have with me tonight an envelope from the Department of Insurance. It says, "Département des Assurances, Ottawa, Canada K1A 0H2". I do not know why the postal code is on this envelope because this department does not use the Post Office. It uses a courier service, the insurance courier service. Indeed, everything going from the Department of Insurance to insurance agents across Canada where there are courier services does not go through the Post Office. It goes by courier. It does so because the Department of Insurance wants to get it there. The courier service is dependable. If ever there was an indictment of the way the Post Office Department has been handling mail, it is when other departments of government refuse to use its service.

I was disappointed with the minister at report stage when he did not accept two of my amendments and two amendments of my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty). I presented the minister an amendment with respect to the Auditor General. We are paying the Auditor General anyway; why should we pay two private auditing firms—not one but two—to audit this corporation? That is completely beyond me. I would have thought the Postmaster General would try to make the corporation more efficient and to cut its costs by using the present government service, but he did not.

Even more importantly, I would have thought the Postmaster General would look at the first amendment I proposed, which deals particularly with invoices or bills from public utilities. I want to read into the record of this debate a letter I received on February 25 last from A. E. Bradley, Chairman of the Mississauga hydroelectric power commission. Part of the letter reads as follows:

> We have, in the past when there has been postal interruptions, utilized private couriers to deliver our mails. This work has been done not only efficiently but economically compared to current postal rates. As a utility, therefore, we would like to have the flexibility of delivering our bills through private couriers.

What are bills but invoices? The amendment which was before this House deliberately said that invoices are not letters. The Postmaster General said that invoices are letters. I am going to suggest to my constituent that invoices are not letters, and let the Postmaster General take it to court. Nothing in the bill says invoices are letters. Mr. Bradley says he can deliver his hydro bills cheaper through private courier. He suggests there should be some discount for utility bills going through the mail.

It is a question of competition, a question of whether it can be done better. The other night my colleague, the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid), suggested that perhaps the boy scouts should be able to deliver flyers, and my colleague, the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz), made the suggestion that perhaps disabled people might deliver utility bills. I suggest these people should be allowed to deliver that kind of mail, and the Postmaster General should have allowed that amendment, but he did not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: I am disturbed about that, as are my colleagues and so is anyone who receives gas bills, hydro bills and other bills. They are not letters. Whoever thought a bill was a letter? When my wife gets a bill, she does not want to open it, she leaves it for me. Bills are not treated as letters. She treats them as bills. You can smell the things. They are not letters, they are bills, and I say to the Postmaster General that they should be completely exempt in the act. The act does not say they are letters; it does not say anything about invoices. I say to the people who send invoices in that way that they might well challenge this act in the courts. I suggest that very few people, I am sure none on this side of the House and certainly none in this party, would want to say to their wives, "I have a letter for you, dear". You know what would happen. She would say, "that's a bill, it's not a letter". I tell you, sir, our amendment would clarify the situation. The Postmaster General has not clarified it. I say to utility companies: deliver them because they are not letters.

Now let me come to our major argument with this bill in connection with the corporation itself. We rushed this bill through committee and we were hoping to make further amendments at the report stage. One thing that we as a caucus think should happen with the corporation is that, like other corporations and businesses; like the banks, for example, this corporation should be subject to a sunset law provision. It should be required to come back to Parliament every five years or ten years—we suggest five years—to justify its existence, its raison d'être. It has to be able to show that it is fulfilling its mandate, doing what the Postmaster General said it should do and doing what our constituents say it should do. It should justify its monopoly. Perhaps it should have its monopoly extended, perhaps it should have it contracted, but it should come back before the House periodically as do other Crown corporations to justify why it is there. Do we need this service today that we needed five years ago or ten years ago? Do we in justice need the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation the way we needed it 25 years ago? Do we really need the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the way we needed it 35 or 40 years, and should its mandate be changed or should it stay the same and be allowed to grow and grow?

I say to you, Sir, it is important that we as parliamentarians realize we are in a changing world where services needed today may not be needed tomorrow and where services today are obsolete tomorrow. What we think is necessary now will not be necessary tomorrow, and tomorrow we will have other things that are necessary. A new direction should be given, a change should be made. Therefore, we say, sir, all these bills should have a sunset provision incorporated into them, a provision which would provide that Parliament have the ability to review what has been going on, the ability to say, we want to look at it again as we do with the banks.

Every ten years we bring the banking legislation before us. This time we waited 13 years before doing so. We look at those organizations deliberately, we review their powers. We may change them, we may contract or expand them, but we call them to account. Similarly, this corporation should be called to account in a specified period of time.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:

"Bill C-42, an Act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, be not now read a third time but be referred back to the Standing Committee On Miscellaneous Estimates to enable the committee to consider further Clause 24 of the bill."

Mr. Lalonde: Shame on you, Stan.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to see the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) here. I was really worried earlier this evening when I did not see him in his place. I must admit he attends this House faithfully because I have had the privilege of speaking on two occasions in the last month or so, one on the Constitution and another time earlier this week, when I had two and a half minutes to speak, half of which time was taken up by the minister, usurping my time. Needless to say, I will be very disappointed if he does not intervene some time during my remarks.

Mr. Lalonde: I will try, Stan.

Mr. Darling: I welcome the opportunity to speak to the House on Bill C-42 and to present my views, those of my constituents and a great many others on the proposed creation of the Canada Post Corporation. As almost anyone old enough to lick a stamp knows, Canada's postal service is in drastic need of change. There have been continual management-labour disputes, the mail service in unrealiable, and the department is going deeper and deeper into debt. There is not one member of Parliament here who cannot tell us horror stories on delayed mail, damaged parcels, and so on. I recall Christmas time a few years ago when, I believe, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) was postmaster general. I received a cake by mail which arrived completely squashed. I brought it in here and made a present of it to him. I wanted to get it back for evidence but he would not give it back to me.

An hon. Member: He ate it.

Mr. Darling: Perhaps he ate it, but I never got it back.

There have been continual management-labour disputes, as I said, and this, in my view, has been one of the serious problems with the postal department. I do not think machinery and equipment is the reason behind it. This is a people dispute between management and labour. Until we can get both management and labour working together, the Crown corporation will not experience much of an improvement.

• (2110)

It has long been recognized that the fundamental part of the problem can be directly attributed to the fact that the post office, as a government department, is obliged to deal with many other departments. The responsibility for hiring new employees rests with the Public Service Commission; Treasury Board negotiates the contracts; The Department of Public Works is responsible for plant maintenance; purchasing is conducted through the Department of Supply and Services.

When appearing before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates recently, the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) commented in frustration by saying:

Too many people are trying to run this operation.

This is so true. Perhaps as a Crown corporation the post office may improve. I use the words "may improve" advisedly because this bill, as presented, still leaves grave doubts as to the predicted efficiency and financial stability of the operation. Certainly we are in favour of the bill. We hope it will be a step in the right direction. Hon. members on this side of the House have contributed with amendments and changes, some of which were adopted. I believe this could be stated for all sides of the House.

As I mentioned, these doubts with respect to the new postal corporation begin right at the top. I am speaking of the board of directors and senior management. It has been proposed that the board consist of a chairman, president, and nine other directors. These 11 men and women will be appointed by the governor in council, which of course means cabinet. The board, with the approval of cabinet, will also be given the right to appoint and fix the salaries of any number of vice-presidents it considers necessary.

Although the minister stated in committee that the composition of the board would include representation from all segments of Canadian society, I would feel more comfortable if such assurances were incorporated directly into the act. There will be an obvious need on the board for input from labour, business and the consumer. The Post Office services the requirements of these groups, and their views are of paramount importance.

The nebulous circumstances surrounding the appointment of the vice-presidents is also cause for some concern. The naming of these people and the ability to set their salaries provides a distinct opportunity for the government of the day to play the role of the tooth fairy. A defeated politician may wake up one morning to discover that the remuneration for his loss is a vice-presidency with the Canada Post Corporation. It sure beats a quarter stuck under his or her pillow. Such an approach has been taken in the past by the government. We must not allow the creation of such positions under circumstances which would permit the government to continue its nocturnal visits.

Moving down through the proposed new system, let us examine the problem of labour. There are now 28 different unions which represent all inside and outside postal workers. As I understand it, under the bill all unions would be guaranteed the right to negotiate the first collective agreement. Then, in the final three months of that agreement, the unions would have to approach the Canadian Labour Relations Board for new accreditation. At this time other unions would also have the right to petititon to represent the workers. Can one imagine the wrangling which would take place and the disruption this would cause? The minister said that he is almost certain this process would result in fewer than 28 unions. "Almost certain" is not good enough.

The creation of a Crown corporation would seem to be the perfect opportunity to reduce the bargaining units to one and to provide the opportunity for sector bargaining in its purest form. The delivery of mail is an essential service in the nation, the disruption of that service creates significant hardships at all levels. Surely the government recognizes this fact and would want to take steps to eliminate the potential for strike in one area which affects all others.

A few weeks ago I had occasion to speak on the private member's bill introduced by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) which recommended sector bargaining. This meant that all workers in one industry would bargain at the same time. Certainly we have been fortunate, and I touch wood, as far as strikes in the post office are concerned in recent times, but it is no guarantee as to what may happen in the future. If we have 28 different unions or even 15 different ones bargaining at different times, there will be labour turmoil. The private member's bill which I supported suggested that in the post office, whether or not there are different unions, each union would have a certain period of time in which to negotiate. For example, if the contracts ran for a three-year period, we may only be worrying about strikes every three years.

In the post office and in any essential service there should be compulsory arbitration. I have stated this, and I will state it again. I realize we are not at that stage yet, but I have suggested that the Postmaster General and the union heads, such as Mr. Parrot, should be immediately locked in a room with bread and water if they were asked to reach a settlement. I am quite sure before too many days went by, one of them would capitulate and come out with an agreement which had been hammered out, an agreement which certainly would be fair and would make the people of Canada very happy because they would not be confronted with a strike in the postal service.

Mr. Beatty: It would be a waste of good bread and water.

Mr. Darling: I do not know about that, but I hope the new postal corporation can work this out.

Another area of the proposed act which is causing a great deal of concern to Canadians is the delivery of time-sensitive mail. The bill before us gives the proposed corporation the sole and exclusive privilege of collecting, transmitting and delivering letters within Canada. I suggested in committee that the Postmaster General should consider its severe and detrimental effect upon the use of courier services which are so vital to consumers and business. The Postmaster General replied that couriers would merely be "tolerated" in the future. He drew attention to the clause 15(1) in the bill which reads as follows:

(e) letters of an urgent nature that are transmitted by a messenger for a fee at least equal to an amount that is three times the regular rate of postage payable for delivery in Canada of similarly addressed letters weighing fifty grams or less;

In effect, this means that Canadians will have to pay to other sources three times as much as the Post Office charges for a service which it cannot even provide. By including this clause in the proposed bill, the government is admitting that the new Crown corporation will be unable to provide such service. If the post office will not be able to handle time-sensitive mail, why should the consumer be punished financially?

The minister counters with the argument that the post office is being punished when people use courier services. He maintains that couriers are skimming the cream and depriving the post office of a lucrative source of income. May I remind him that the cream always rises to the top; if outside sources are obtaining the cream then there is obviously a vacancy of service at the top. By proposing to charge these exorbitant rates for the use of courier services the government is saying to Canadians: "We cannot do the job, but you will have to pay through the nose to have others do it." I certainly take exception to this attitude of the government to thousands of Canadians who depend on quick service for the delivery of sensitive documents such as insurance policies, real estate transactions, legal and financial matters, whether they be of a business or personal nature.

In committee the Postmaster General said that under the new legislation the couriers would have a place in the system. He said that such services may now be illegal. Whether they are operating illegally or not, the point is they are certainly doing a job. If they are operating illegally then why has the government not taken some action against them? I suggest it is because the government knows how vital such services are. The government knows the hue and cry which would be raised if such services were terminated.

The government is now proposing to make the couriers "street legal", to use the vernacular, and Canadians will pay heavily for such legitimacy. Couriers have been, and I feel still are, a very great necessity. I urge the government to abandon this proposed rate structure for courier usage and allow Canadians the right to such service without penalty. To merely tolerate couriers is to merely tolerate the expressed wishes of the people of this country.

I speak from experience on this matter, Mr. Speaker, because I was an insurance agent and a real estate broker for a number of years. When I started in the insurance business I can recall getting my letters ready to go to Toronto from my home village of Burks Falls and I would take them down to the train station. I would be out working all day trying to make a living and I would do my book work at night. Of course, this was when the passenger trains were running. It provided an excellent service and as there was a mail car on the train I could post my letters as late as 12.50 in the morning and I knew that those letters would be delivered some time that morning to the various companies. I also knew that if I phoned for an insurance policy which had to be in the mail that day it would arrive in my home town the next.

Today that is an absolute impossibility, or at least highly improbable. The same kind of thing applies to real estate deals. Any real estate broker knows, as do lawyers, that there are certain clauses in real estate transactions which stipulate that time is of the essence, the offer must be delivered or accepted on a certain date. If it happens that the documents are not received on that date then the contract is null and void. The real estate broker would be out a sizeable commission.

In my particular business we cannot trust the mail. The salesmen will drive to Toronto, or London, or wherever the offer must be delivered. He insures that the vendor signs it and then he comes back to his home base. If it is not convenient for him to travel that distance then time and again the buses are used. The buses have an excellent record when it comes to giving service. The new postal corporation certainly will not be able to give that kind of service. I see no reason in the world why the couriers should not be continued.

Last week I made a point of checking the letters which were to be picked up by a courier service from the family business which my sons now operate. They are picked up around five o'clock in the afternoon and each one has the price marked on it. It costs more than 17 cents for the smallest letter but a larger envelope containing five or six different policies will actually go cheaper than first class mail. I certainly feel that businesses like insurance should not be discriminated against when the new postal corporation comes into effect.

The present estimates for the year 1981-82 in the Post Office have increased by about $200 million, I believe, to a total of $1.7 billion. That is a great deal of money. Even with the increase the Post Office will still end up in the red to the tune of $557 million. This sum will be borne by the taxpayers. The government is proposing staff changes, eliminating 461 positions but adding 200 others. I understand the cutbacks will be in the areas of marketing, administration and mail processing. The additional workers will be hired for mail collection and delivery. We are well aware of certain areas where the population is booming, for example, Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton. In these cities the people are crying for mail delivery but the postal budget at present makes no provision for the mail carriers who are so necessary. I strongly suspect that the planned changes in personnel will not result in better mail service, but perhaps the contrary. Some 200 of the jobs being eliminated will be in the mail processing segment of the Post Office. These are positions held by people inside the Post Office who sort mail by hand and by machine. A great deal of this work is done by hand because the machines which were supposed to speed service cannot handle certain sizes of mail. I think Members of Parliament are well aware of this since we have all been notified that there will be a different sized envelope used by Members of Parliament in order that these letters may be sorted by machine without being rejected or damaged. If those 200 positions were designated as letter carriers the mail would still be bogged down inside buildings. These 200 people, who will be used in the entire national system, will hardly make an impact on the service. I know that I will not be holding my breath in expectation of any great improvement in service, and I am sure not too many others will be, either.

The Postmaster General has accepted the fact that there are fundamental problems with the postal service in this country. He seems to think all our problems will be solved once the Post Office is turned into a Crown corporation. In committee he predicted that the service would improve three years after this happens. I hope that there will be some improvement before that, but it could be 33 years, or even more, before we see the type of service that the Canadian people feel they deserve.

The government's proposed bill to create this corporation will not solve all the old problems. It certainly may very well create new ones. If mail service in Canada is to improve the Postmaster General has suggested that the new corporation will have to meet with its employees to establish an acceptable new strategy. "Acceptable" is the key word. Acceptable to whom and at what cost? The minister has suggested that the establishment of this Crown corporation would lead to greater advancement for workers. This is an admirable and understandable, business practice but only when based on undeniable merit and requirements. If the proposed amendments are simply for the purpose of creating more chiefs in the system, then I would suggest to the government that there are plenty of chiefs now and we could do with a whole lot more Indians.

The Postmaster General also spoke of greater productivity and mentions the possibility of bonuses and incentives for workers. This, too, is an admirable ideal, but again one wonders about reality of such thoughts. The stated goal of the proposed Crown corporation is revenue self-sufficiency. Even someone with the most rudimentary knowledge of mathematical expertise would be able to calculate the postal rate increases necessary to cover the costs involved in attaining that goal. I do not think any of us would want to have to pay what the cost of stamps would be to make the Post Office self-sustained. We are well aware that it is a service, and even with the Crown corporation it must be within the means of the great majority of Canadians. Unless postal rates are allowed to soar to unspeakable heights, the corporation will have to rely on government funding assistance for quite some time. Thus, these proposed bonuses and incentives which cannot apply under the structure of a government department will either be paid for in an indirect manner by the taxpayers or delayed, perhaps forever.

There are other equally serious deficiencies in the proposed plans to create the Canada postal corporation. I would suggest to the House that before the bill is passed we might give Canadians an opportunity for further input.

It has been my privilege to serve on a committee of our party, for the Post Office, for some six or seven years, and I have been very interested in it. I have received letters not only from my own riding, but from all over the country because people have known I have served on that committee. I can tell you there have been letters which would really curl your hair, letters which show absolute outrage because, as have been mentioned by other speakers, there is no department of government which involves more Canadians. Everyone, young, old, rich and poor, has something to do with the Post Office, even if it is only getting a birthday card or a Christmas card.

It was my privilege, along with the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), who was the critic for our party for some years, to travel to other countries and look into how the Post Office was working there and how the delivery was.

We were in Great Britain and we were informed of the fast mail service there compared to Canada. I am well aware that there is a slight difference in geography. Despite taking that into consideration, I was amazed that mail in Great Britain is delivered a great deal faster. In fact, there is a different grade of mail there. There is a first-class mail for letters, and also a second grade, which does not get delivered so quickly. We were told that quite often these letters at the cheaper rate are delivered faster. We were talking to some of the people in the union, and this one fellow, whatever his title was, I am not sure whether it was a delayer or not, but it was his job to see that not too many of these second-class letters got delivered too quickly, or it would cut down on the revenue from the first-class mail.

We were also in West Germany and were amazed. That is a fair-sized country of some 60 million people. The mail there—I forget, but high in the 90 per cent—was delivered within 24 hours. Germany has mail cars. They use the trains, and I believe this is one of the reasons for its success. When we were there, the people told us they were holding meetings continually to try to improve upon the delivery. I said to the officials in charge, "How can you improve on 24-hour delivery?" Again, they stated that this was a thing which they were going to do.

We are well aware that before too many years down the way the electronic processing will be in. The government itself may be one of the organizations or one of the institutions which will greatly cut down on mail service, and I presume the day is not too far away when cheques for old age security or veterans' pensions, and so on, cheques will just automatically go into everyone's bank account and this will cut down a great deal. I am not too sure, at the present time. I believe there are some six billion pieces of mail which are handled by the Post Office. I am well aware that some—well up in the 90 per cent is delivered within reasonable time. However, even that small percentage, four 4 or 5 per cent, is an astronomical number of pieces of mail which are not delivered in time. That is the reason that Canadian people are so unhappy with their Post Office. That is the reason that they are hoping and we are hoping that this new postal Crown corporation will be a success and will be a step towards an improved Post Office. Again, let me repeat that it will depend on the relations between managers and the employees, because they are all human beings and the idea of simply treating each other—and there is certainly fault on both sides. Employees, time and again, will probably not give the managers a break. We hear about the tens of thousands of grievances which are piling up. I happen to be well aware that three or four thousand of those grievances which are piled up and charged against the Post Office are probably one or two grievances multiplied ten thousand times. Of course, the unions will not explain that too fully, but the public on hearing this say, "Well, what is wrong with the management?" Again, let me commend the Postmaster General. Certainly, with some of its shortcomings, I will be supporting this Crown corporation bill. I will be hoping that the bill will go through, and that under the new system we can look forward to a faster and better mail delivery service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, once again it is a pleasure and an honour for me to speak in this House this evening. That does require some effort on my part however because I do have a sore throat. Nevertheless, it is important, I think, that certain things be said. I will only take a few minutes but it is with true equanimity and seriousness that I do.

We are now debating an amendment which seeks to refer again to committee this bill to establish a Crown corporation. Why refer it to committee? For the simple reason that the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) would, instead of having the Corporation established now once and for all, prefer coming back again five years from now for another try at establishing the Corporation or to confirm its mandate. I cannot respond in any positive way to such an amendment or request. To begin with, for many years now everybody in this country, the government of Canada, or rather the various governments we have had, the postal workers, and Post Office management have been in agreement over the fact that we need a Crown corporation to manage the postal service in Canada, and that we should take action as quickly as possible. So why bring in this type of amendment? What could be the actual reason? Should we be back here in five years and question whether things are or are not going well, whether the Crown Corporation should revert to the status of a department or remain a Crown corporation? Any responsible politician know that you do not invest five years in an organisation, that you do not promote it for years only to tear it down right after you get it going.

Hence I am asking myself some very serious questions, and the more I think about it, the more I have the impression that this is another trick of the Progressive Conservative Party to delay the democratic process in the House and put a spoke in our wheel. I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the Union of Postal Workers recently sent each Member of Parliament a paper asking them to create this Crown corporation as soon as possible, get to the final vote and carry out the proposed postal service of the future in Canada.

Although this bill has been before the House since last July and discussed at length, and although the hon. member for Mississauga South had the opportunity to speak on the bill on five occasions, the hon. members opposite would not co-operate and allow the bill to progress, making it very hard to understand the reasoning which could bring them to say: Well, at the last minute, before everything is finalized, we shall delay a few more weeks to anger the postal employees a bit more, to irritate Canadians once again, and then we shall refer this to the committee to have a little chat on Section 24. Once this is done, the bill will come back to the House for the final vote and we may perhaps suggest another minor amendment. This reminds me of what occurred during the constitutional debate until we were able to reach an agreement!

Frankly, I am beginning to have serious reservations about the real intentions of Progressive Conservative members. Canadians are waiting for this bill. The post office needs to be reorganized. Some contracts for postal carriers have almost exired. These contracts will have to be renewed with a Crown corporation or a department or be temporarily extended until the Crown corporation is established. We are now in the process of creating a new Crown corporation. We can't keep tripping over trivialities as those suggested in the amendment of the hon. member for Mississauga South.

Before we began this process, we knew that the post office was a department. We now know that it will no longer be a department in a short while, and while we are engaged in this process, various decisions are simply being delayed until the new structure of this Crown corporation can be determined and definitely established.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask members of the opposition to understand the wishes of Canadians. They want this country to make progress. They want our institutions to develop. They want us to work for the welfare of the population as a whole. It is certainly not by dealing with trivia that we can achieve progress.

After hearing all this debate, and seeing all the work done by the committee on this bill, I was hoping we would be ready this evening to settle the matter once and for all and to tell democratically to every Canadian exactly what is on our minds, but once again, the same party is resorting to the same old subterfuge and saying: No, no, not this evening. Tonight we will discuss the possibility of referring Section 24 to the committee. Why? I cannot tell you Mr. Speaker just how many hours the member for Mississauga-South was allotted in committee to debate this bill. If he had any goodwill, what he should have done at that time was to introduce his Section 24 before the committee. He could have discussed the matter then. Once again we are simply faced with a dilatory trick—

[English]

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Could I ask the hon. member a very brief question? I know he would not accuse me of interrupting the full flow of his address but is the hon. member aware that the point at issue in the amendment, which was moved tonight to send Section 24 back to committee, concerns the question of whether there can be a sunset provision? In other words, whether or not Parliament in five years can take a second look at the post office corporation. I wonder if the hon. member is aware that was ruled out of order at report stage. As a consequence, this is the only means by which, under the rules, it is possible for us to put the matter back into this forum. I am sure the hon. member would not want to leave other members or the viewing public in any state of confusion about that.

[Translation]

Mr. Gimaïel: Mr. Speaker, I thank you as well as the hon. member. I can confirm to the member that indeed I knew that Section 24, namely the amendment that is amended to refer Section 24 to the committee deals with the wish of the member for Mississauga South to have us deal again with that subject five years from now, so that the member may then review the matter of the actual creation of this Crown Corporation and ascertain if all is in keeping with our expressed intents and purposes and should so be maintained.

But what I was pointing out before the member took the floor earlier, is that it is in my view a delusion to think that after five years of efforts following the creation and development of such a corporation, we could honestly wonder if such a corporation should continue to exist. I suggest it would be foolish to think so; secondly if the member for Mississauga South really intends to evaluate the results in five years time let us then raise that issue at that time. There are various ways of dealing with Crown Corporations. All parliamentarians also have various means of putting forward their views, and it is quite out of the question for us to question the existence of some 400 Canadian Crown corporations every time a problem arises. It will especially be out of the question to consider whether the Post Office should be restored; it would take another five-year period. No, I think that if the member for Mississauga South had been serious, he would have moved his amendment in committee instead of delaying the proceedings of the House, and I continue to say so and to maintain it, and if the hon. member for Mississauga South disagrees, he will surely have the opportunity to speak.

I still maintain that if the member had been serious, he would have moved his amendment in committee because that is the place where we, as members, have more time to state and define our views; that is the place where we have more time to move amendments to all those bills. What I dislike most in the attitude of the Progressive Conservative Party is that they would have the Canadian people believe that any amendment to a bill should necessarily be introduced in this House. The standing committees of the House have precisely been set up to allow members to have more input in every bill. That is how we work in this House so as to allow the largest possible number of members to speak and to make a worthwhile contribution to the discussion on the various bills introduced by the government or by others.

No, I think that during the months devoted to this debate in which many members from both sides of the House have made useful contributions to the proceedings regarding the setting up of that new Crown corporation, we all had the opportunity to state or put forward our views and the ideas of our constituents. I agree that there is some risk involved in turning a department into a Crown corporation, but I must also admit that my constituents are fed up with the operation of the Post Office during the past 10 or 15 years due to numerous labour relations problems and also to the inertia of the superstructure of another department which was supposed to make investments, which caused many problems. The unions and our constituents told us about it. The employees, and even the official critic of the opposition agreed with this principle. When it was the government, the party opposite expressed its support for the creation of a new Crown corporation. Mr. Speaker, I think that all this input clearly justifies our going ahead and adopting this bill as soon as possible, so that the machinery for the creation of this Crown corporation may be set in motion. As you know, all we have before us are good wishes and papers. Those papers must be turned into concrete measures and develop into a Crown corporation, and it is our duty, as Canadians, to build it. This will be a difficult and long term endeavour. The sooner we begin, the better.

As to the point which the hon. member made earlier, it is a fact that it will not be perfect after five years, for nothing is in this world. Should changes be required, the hon. member is well aware that he will be here, together with me and the other members, to bring them about. I think that that is our job, and that is why we are here. I, for one, have my mind made up, and I wish opposition members would realize that Canadians need that Crown corporation, especially postal employees and the people involved in the postal service. They want it, they pressed us into taking steps to have it, again recently, everyone wants it, the sooner the better. In that context, I ask hon. members opposite to act like Canadians and do so seriously, without resorting to dilatory measures but by saying simply: Do we agree, yes or no? We have the right to vote; we shall use that right and tell Canadians whether or not we want that Crown corporation. But let us do so as quickly as possible.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great sense of pride and relief that I rise to speak on this bill. We have been waiting an awfully long time for this opportunity. We are delighted that it has finally arrived because the New Democratic Party was the first political party in Canada to support the idea of a Crown corporation for the post office. This is one NDP policy we are proud to share with the other groups in the House.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You borrowed it from us.

Mr. Parker: We are convinced beyond a shadow of a doubt that this is the best possible solution to the postal problems in Canada today. We are not under any illusions. We know this will not cure all the ills in the Post Office overnight. However, we know this bill will provide an atmosphere which will result in a better Post Office. It will give the Post Office management the opportunity to determine its own priorities without reference to Treasury Board policies which make no sense. The bill will provide the Post Office workers with a much better opportunity to negotiate those aspects of their working conditions which most directly affect them. If the problems in our Post Office can be solved, this is the bill that will provide the catalyst that will allow these solutions.

I want to briefly turn to a few personal comments. I congratulate and express my appreciation to the New Democratic Party and its members for allowing me to sit in on the committee stages and work on this bill. Also, I commend the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) for his efforts in the work on this bill, and also my researcher, David Gort who spent many, many hours researching and helping in the background.

Mr. Kaplan: This sounds like the Academy Awards.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): How about your official agent?

Mr. Parker: In the nine months that this bill has been before the House, a lot of nasty words have passed under the bridge from all sides. I just want to take this opportunity to say that despite all these words I have a great deal of respect for two men with whom I have worked on this bill. I want to say with respect to the Postmaster General that if all other members of cabinet were able to exhibit his qualities of patience, tolerance, and flexibility his government might not be so unpopular where I come from. The minister was willing to listen. He was willing to negotiate, and he was willing to be fair. These qualities ensure that he has quite a future ahead of him. It is only too bad he is in the wrong party.

The other member of this House to whom I would like to pay tribute is the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), the former postmaster general. The hon. member had one of the most difficult roles to play in this debate, and I was honestly astonished at how successfully he was able to play that role. While the committee was sitting the hon. member was also a member of the constitutional committee, which also had a very heavy schedule.

Within his own caucus there exists a rump group of extremely conservative men who do not support the hon.

member with respect to his position on this bill and who, quite frankly, have taken great pains to keep this bill from ever getting through the House. The hon. member for Vancouver South was able to keep these men in line most of the time. He was able to balance his activities on both committees, and he was able to develop strong friendships that cross party lines. He deserves a great deal of tribute from all sides of this House.

I want now to turn very briefly to just a few aspects of this bill in which we are particularly interested. I would like to talk about three amendments which we were able to push through the committee, and about one amendment which we were not able to. The amendments we are particularly proud of we feel will make a big difference to the operation of the corporation. Our amendment to Section 5(2) provides for a guarantee that the corporation will provide similar service to communities of a comparable size, wherever they may be located.

I cannot stress highly enough the importance of this amendment to my own region of western Canada. Over the past five years the post office has been under the hiring freeze of Treasury Board. In that period the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia have suffered tremendous growth rates, yet they have received no additional postal workers.

This has meant that cities like Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver have postal service which is leaps and bounds worse than comparable service in eastern Canada. The minister points out that service in eastern Canada is bad too, and he is right. But he cannot seriously stand up in this House and suggest to us that the city of Calgary has comparable postal service with the city of Hamilton, a city approximately the same size, if not a little smaller.

Our amendment to Section 5 will guarantee the same level of postal service across Canada. No longer will the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia have to suffer second class postal service. I only hope that those residents of Calgary who are going without postal service take note of the fact that while their own Tory MPs were taking pains to destroy the entire system, to stall this bill, and to replace Canadian letter carriers with American couriers, it was us, the NDP, who were fighting to get this clause into the bill.

The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) talked about courier service. He stated they do not use the postal system. When a representative of the courier service appeared before the committee, I asked whether it was correct that courier services in Toronto were gathering bundles, taking them to the Post Office, mailing them and having their courier service trucks in Montreal meet the Post Office truck and then make the deliveries. Do the people of Canada know that is going on in the Post Office? The hon. member said they were not using the Post Office. I say to him that they are using the postal services. It was admitted in committee.

There are other NDP amendments which I would like to dwell on just briefly. First, I would like to mention that we persuaded the minister to include a section in the bill which provides for the gazetting of any closure of a postal facility and any closure of a postal route. This amendment will give rural residents across the country some protection in the event that their postal service is threatened by cutbacks. Before these cutbacks go into effect the residents will have the option of appealing to government, and hopefully these pleas will not fall on deaf ears.

Finally, we are proud that the government accepted our strong amendment regarding mail opening. We are frankly concerned, however, that the government may reverse itself on this commitment once the McDonald commission tables its report. As the minister knows, such a change will require an amendment to this bill, and I can assure him that such an amendment will not come easily.

We do have two concerns with this bill and I would like to quickly enumerate them. We are very concerned that the government rejected our amendment respecting the rights of contract employees. We felt that small contract employees who wanted to become part of a trade union should have the right to join. The minister rejected that. This bill takes away the right of these employees to bargain collectively. We find that unfortunate, to say the least. As the minister knows, the Canada Labour Code provides for collective bargaining rights for contract employees in the private sector. For the government to provide such rights to other workers and deny them to their own workers is hypocritical and unfair.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES—WEST COAST CHINOOK SALMON STOCKS—RESPONSE BY UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES TO REQUEST SEEKING REDUCED CATCHES—MINISTER'S RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I rose in the House this afternoon to ask the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) some questions that are important to the fishermen along the Fraser River and the coast of British Columbia. I had just heard the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) try to get some kind of answer from the minister about his disposition toward the negotiations with the U.S. and the Chinook salmon run in the Fraser River. All the minister could say was that he had had a very positive answer from the U.S. officials. That is really not good enough. We have heard that from the minister and his officials for the past ten years. It did not matter what was being negotiated in terms of the fisheries agreement on the west coast, it always sounded good before it happened.

The fishermen have long memories of the negotiations that have been going on, of the promises that were made during those negotiations and what they got at the end. I asked the minister if he had that kind of positive agreement in writing and if there was going to be any kind of balance or equity in the agreement he was going to sign with the U.S.

I am afraid the minister gave me the same kind of run-around he gave the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta. I can understand why the minister is so anxious to have the fishermen use the barbless hook. He has long practice in getting off the hook. Regardless of how important a question is, he always manages to get off the hook by talking around the question.

The situation along the Fraser is catastrophic. The U.S. fishermen around Point Roberts are catching, in a ratio of nine to one, the Chinook salmon that ought to be coming into the Fraser River and that ought to be the rightful catch of the Canadian fishermen.

I cannot understand the contradictory position taken by the Canadian government when the minister's own officials go to the Law of the Sea Conference and agree to a treaty—it has not been signed yet—whereby anadromous fish like salmon belong to the country in which they originate. That is the agreement of the Law of the Sea Conference. But when it comes to the west coast fishery, then the minister wants to agree to a 50-50 package with the U.S. fishermen. That is an incredible contradiction.

Why does the minister insist on being a long-distance minister for the fishermen on the west coast? I can understand that he would go quite frequently to New Brunswick where his home is. In the past year, however, he has been in British Columbia once. He spent one day there and even then did not meet with the fishermen. I am asking him whether he is content to be the minister of east coast fisheries or whether he plans to be the minister for west coast and inland fisheries as well?

The fact is, that as far as his responsibilities are concerned, he has written off the west coast. He gave me a high-flown answer about what he and his department and his officials have done for the west coast with the salmon enhancement program. Mr. Speaker, that was funded something like seven years ago, at $150 million. That was 1975 or 1976 dollars.

That is not worth $80 million or $90 million. When the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) looks for funding for the CBC, it is always in current dollars. This minister did not have the fortitude to work for the fishermen in such a way that that salmon enhancement program would be funded with current dollars, yet he had the audacity to boast about it in the House today.

I received a letter today from the Liberal Party of Canada. I received it in my office. It was a request for funds. The only truthful thing in the letter was that the Liberal Party is hard-pressed for money. Mr. McLeod had the audacity to say that the Liberal Party is a grassroots party. If it is so grassroots, why was there a delegation of 22 fishermen here today and yesterday knocking on the doors of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans? If the Liberal Party and this Liberal government are so grassroots, why does the minister not go to British Columbia and meet the fishermen there? I challenge him to go to the next fisheries convention and spend two days at that convention. Dollars to doughnuts, he will not take the fishermen up on that. If he spends one day there, they will be happy. If he spends two days there, he would need a leave of absence from the House of Commons.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I received a letter from them too.

Mr. Friesen: The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) says he received a letter from the Liberal Party too. That is terrific. We can tell they are hard-pressed, but this minister, who wants to be part of a grassroots government, will not have the courtesy and sense of commitment and responsibility to go out and meet with the fishermen there.

Last Sunday there was an audacious situation. The fishermen were meeting in a hall with one set of government officials who were telling the fishermen one thing; another set of officials were meeting with the sports fishermen and telling them another thing; and the minister was somewhere else. The minister makes long distance regulations. He is not meeting with his advisory board; he is going among them. Officials out on the west coast apparently have no contact with the industry or the fishermen involved, and they are making regulations which are totally out of touch with the needs of the community.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as you know, Canada and the United States have had several rounds of discussions centring on interception fisheries. The next round of talks is scheduled for April 26 to May 5. In addition, we have also been discussing with the State of Washington the immediate need for co-operative Chinook conservation measures, particularly as they relate to U.S. fisheries in the Point Roberts-San Juan Islands area—Washington commercial areas 7 and 7A—where a large number of Fraser run Chinooks are taken in the U.S. seine and gillnet fisheries.

The State of Washington formally advised us in writing on April 2, 1981 that unless there are significant changes in the problem from mid-April through late October the State of Washington is prepared to close the commercial net fisheries directed at Chinook salmon and, during any commercial net fisheries for other salmon species, require purse seines and reef nets to release chinook and a 5⅞ inch maximum mesh size for gillnets.

In addition, the northwest Indian councils have agreed to the restrictions and will be formally advising the Department of Fisheries and Oceans accordingly in writing.

The above arrangement should result in savings of up to 45,000 Chinook from purse seines and 5,000 by gill nets, many of which will return to the Fraser and other river systems. As an example of previous United States catch rates, in the 1977 area 7 and 7A fishery seines took 53,000 gillnets took 23,000.

For the first time it appears that real progress has been made in obtaining co-operation from the United States on conservation measures.

IMMIGRATION—LACK OF EDUCATION AND HEALTH SERVICES FOR CHILDREN OF ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, on April 3, 1981 I posed a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) about the lack of education and health services for children of illegal immigrant parents. In the same question I asked him what steps he intends to take to stop the increase of this illegal population in Canada. Canadians have for many decades been able to take pride in the fact that in Canada we have a just society. In the best of all possible worlds, Canadians have endeavoured to develop a system of justice, well-being, and general fairness to all. However, there are times that, with all our good intentions, we still manage to overlook certain sections of our society.

• (2210)

It is on this note that I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the thousands of children across Canada, who live surrounded by anxiety and fear because they are either born in Canada to parents with illegal immigrant status, or brought into the country illegally as small youngsters. In fact, the majority of these innocent victims are not only unable to register in schools, but they are also denied the proper medical attention most of us take for granted.

As an ex-principal of several public schools in Toronto, I am fully aware of the moral dilemma that principals and school boards are often faced with when confronted with immigrants with illegal status.

On the one hand, the administrators would like to demonstrate humanitarianism and register these children in schools to ensure that they receive proper education, knowing very well that the longer these children remain in hiding, the more difficult it will be for them to ever catch up academically and socially with no education and limited exposure to our Canadian culture.

On the other hand, the policy of most boards of education is that they cannot accept any children into the school system who do not produce proof of permanent residence or proof of application being made for landed immigrant status.

Thus, these children grow up as non-persons legally, without school records, registration numbers and other identification everyone else takes for granted. When they are old enough, they are unable to secure employment and unable to receive welfare because they lack the necessary papers and official identity.

Unfortunately, only crime or illegal employment offers them a way to make a living without questions being put to them about legal status. To no one's surprise today, thousands of these immigrants without legal status are frequently exploited by unscrupulous employers who deny them medical care, pensions, and the other benefits normally available to Canadians and landed immigrants.

Although it is difficult, if not impossible, to confirm the number of such children, I have been quoted figures that range from 3,000 to 30,000. However, even if the figure were 300, the problem is critical because these children are growing up in Canada illiterate, emotionally disturbed and socially maladjusted.

I am not advocating an amnesty program, especially when one considers that the previous amnesty, for a three month period in 1973, brought out more than 20,000 illegal immigrants who were in hiding. Yes, it would be very undesirable to permit amnesties to become regular and predictable features of our immigration policy. Rather, I suggest that as a compassionate nation, we take the appropriate steps to bring in tougher regulations and systems of immigration security. To some, this may seem harsh and cruel, but we do now have a most critical situation on our hands that must be alleviated. I am sure these stricter regulations are kind and more humane in the long run.

In this context, I congratulate the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) for establishing a task force to look into improvements in the procedures of the Immigration Act and regulations, as he said in his answer on April 3. However, the minister failed to answer my question of April 3, 1981, when I asked him what he intends to do to stop future immigrants from entering Canada illegally. None of the past ministers of employment and immigration had a solution to this problem either. Therefore, I propose a solution for the government's consideration.

All visitors coming into Canada should be required to complete in duplicate a simple identification card including name, address, date of birth and destination. Such slips could be completed on the plane or ship just prior to arrival at a Canadian port of entry. One copy of the identification slip would be handed to the customs upon arrival in Canada, the other handed to the customs upon leaving Canada. With the use of computers, officials would be able to run a monthly or annual check as to which visitors remain illegally in Canada.

I should like to hear from the minister whether such a system could be considered by the government to curb the number of illegal immigrants entering Canada.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), to assure the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis) that all steps possible under the Immigration Act and regulations are being taken to control illegal immigration to Canada. In spite of these efforts, there are still those persons who knowingly enter and remain in Canada illegally; in many cases accompanied by their children. As a result of the actions of their parents or guardians, these children lack legal status in the country and, therefore, are not entitled to medical and educational services.

The hon. member need not be reminded that in Ontario, as in other provinces, medical and educational services remain under the jurisdiction of the province and are not made available to those lacking legal status. Notwithstanding this information, those parents who failed to consider their children's future health needs before bringing them to Canada illegally still have a course of action. The minister stresses that it is their responsibility, for the children's sake as well as their own, to present themselves at a Canada immigration centre. Each case will then be dealt with individually and fairly, with full consideration of all compassionate and humanitarian aspects, especially when children are concerned.

INCOME TAX

TREATMENT OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND OTHER EAST COAST FISHERMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In February the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) visited Prince Edward Island fishermen and assured them they would be dealt with fairly and reasonably with regard to a tax audit of their income. The fishermen have indicated that they do not trust the government, and they fear that their unemployment insurance cheques will be garnisheed. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House instructs the minister to assure the fishermen of Atlantic Canada that their UI cheques will not be garnisheed.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT

CALL FOR CO-ORDINATED PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Unemployment rose from 12.9 per cent to 13.4 per cent among young people in Canada in March. The young people of Canada are concerned about job prospects in the future. They want to know what their future will be. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That this House condemns the lack of action by the Minister of Employment and Immigration to produce a co-ordinated program designed to employ Canadians, especially young people.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

REGIONAL OFFICE PRACTICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Owing to the fact that the Winnipeg office dealing with the Canada community development projects for 1980 advanced moneys to a project before the zoning, bonding or building permit requirements were met by the application sponsors, and that the Winnipeg office further extended the deadlines set for funding the project, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration launch an immediate investigation into these unorthodox practices at his regional offices which undermine the work of members of Parliament and constituency advisory groups.

Until this matter is clarified and corrected, members of Parliament and their advisory groups will not be able to review these applications.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BANKS AND BANKING

INTEREST RATES CHARGED BY CHARTERED BANKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of very urgent and pressing necessity. Some of Canada's chartered banks claim they are losing money or barely breaking even on their credit card operations. I find this extraordinarily hard to believe, considering that banks receive 1.5 per cent per month from at least half of their ten million card holders. In addition, they receive up to 5 per cent per month from merchants who accept credit cards from their customers, which compounds annually to more than 85 per cent. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the government examine rates of 21 per cent and 85 per cent and that the Minister of Finance examine this practice of the banks of Canada to ensure that they are not charging Canadians rates which could only be described as usurious.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

PRICE OF GASOLINE ON PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On the eve of his election campaign visit to Prince Edward Island in February, 1980, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that the price of gasoline under a Liberal government would not rise more than 14 cents. Since then his government has allowed gasoline prices on Prince Edward Island and elsewhere in Canada to increase by more than 40 cents. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That this House censure the Prime Minister for being the only federal party leader not to visit Prince Edward Island during the federal by-election in Cardigan and, further, that the Prime Minister make a statement on motions indicating whether his refusal to come to Cardigan was because he could not face the wrath of the people of Cardigan in light of his broken promise to keep gasoline prices down.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE PRIME MINISTER

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given that consumer prices have risen unmercifully since 1976 to the point where the inflation rate is spiralling out of sight, and given that it has been several years since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) boasted he had wrestled inflation to the ground, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That this House urge the Commissioners of Internal Economy to budget for the services of a professional wrestling coach, someone like the member for St. John's West, for instance, who can show the Prime Minister the real way to wrestle inflation to the ground.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

EL SALVADOR—MASSACRE OF REFUGEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of most urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the brutal massacre of 1,500 Salvadoran refugees in a cavern near the Honduran border, a massacre initiated and carried out by the Salvadoran army with the aid of the Honduran military, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly):

That this House unanimously condemns this wanton massacre of 1,500 innocent people and urges the government to protest this outrage in the strongest possible terms to the Salvadoran and Honduran governments.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

TRIBUTE TO LIFE-SAVING EFFORT BY AIRCRAFT CREW—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I rise to repeat a motion under Standing Order 43 at the request of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), to draw attention to the heroic efforts of the search and rescue arm of the armed forces. I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East:

That this House recognize the daring search and rescue effort by the crew of a Greenwood, Nova Scotia based Aurora aircraft, who, under adverse flying conditions, 300 foot ceiling and a one and a half mile visibility, on their own initiative during a two hour search on Monday played a key role in saving the lives of four people on a raft adrift on the North Atlantic.

Madam Speaker: Motions under Standing Order 43 are not meant to be repeated in the House once they have been dealt with. This is a congratulatory motion. I am sure that the House would want to express its sentiments by applauding.

THE LATE GENERAL OMAR BRADLEY

EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of some importance under the provisions of Standing Order 43. United States General Omar Bradley, a Second World War hero and last of the American five-star generals, died Wednesday of a heart attack, at the age of 88. It has been acknowledged by those in the allied forces who either had the privilege of serving with him or who were able to witness and appreciate his leadership—and this includes thousands of Canadians—that General Bradley was an able and courageous leader and a fine gentleman. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That this House, on behalf of the people of Canada, and in particular the Canadian veterans of the Second World War, extend an expression of our deepest sympathy to General Omar Bradley's family and to the American people.

Madam Speaker: Here again, the House will note the sentiments that are expressed in the motion.

That this House go on record as being in support of a peaceful resolution to the crisis in Poland and in opposition to outside military intervention and interference, and further, that this House go on record as commending the initiatives of individual Canadians in sending food aid to Poland as a humanitarian gesture in a time of difficulty.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO STIMULATE JOBS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The March unemployment figures showed a rise in the seasonally-adjusted unemployment rate from 7.2 per cent to 7.4 per cent. Canadians are especially concerned about the future of young people in the country, since employment dropped in the 15 to 24 age group by 14,000 jobs.

What action is the government taking, on a co-ordinated basis, to stimulate jobs for young people?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in response to the hon. member I should like to point out that the unemployment rate for this March is still lower than it was for last March. Furthermore, in the first three months of this year we have created close to 140,000 new jobs in the country. It is the tenth month in a row in which we have had a rise in employment. It is the best record of any industrial country in the western world at this point in time.

However, it does not necessarily mean that we take great satisfaction from the fact that there are unemployed. It means that with all the various pressures we face in the world, particularly with the increases in pricing of oil and other energy commodities, the Canadian economy is still performing very well and is still providing good employment for Canadians.

PLANS TO COMBAT URBAN UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, despite the suggestions of the minister, unemployment is still a problem. It continues to be a problem which the government has failed to solve despite a year in office.

In typical cities such as London, Ontario, the unemployment rate has risen from 5.5 per cent in March, 1980, to 8.1 per cent in March, 1981. Does the minister have any specific plans to attack the unemployment problems in Canadians cities?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member had been in the House over the past several months he would know that a number of initiatives have already been taken. The Minister of Finance announced a $350 million industrial adjustments program, designed specifically to respond to communities which are hard hit by lay-offs, such as many of those in southwestern Ontario. The program is being implemented now in those communities. It is providing major assistance in additional industrial grants and new jobs, as well as providing a number of labour market subsidies for new retraining programs. The industrial adjustments program is a very innovative and useful tool which is being applied directly to those communities about which the hon. member talks.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, to the best of my knowledge, London, Ontario, is not included on that list of cities.

Employment in the manufacturing sector was down by 10,000 jobs in March, 1981. The minister will know that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has often claimed to be developing an industrial strategy for Canada. The government has been in office for a year, and it has not come forward. How much has the failure of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to present such a strategy hurt the minister's efforts to develop an employment strategy?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, contrary to the assumption of the hon. member, I have found that the efforts of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to respond to the needs of industry, just as those of the Minister of Finance and all economic ministers working together in an attempt to put together a co-ordinated approach to deal with the economic issue, have been extremely helpful.

It would be worth while for the hon. member and other members of the House not to focus simply on the statistics for one month, but to take a look at the last three-month period in which manufacturing and goods producing have shown a marked improvement. We cannot take only the month of March as a measurement; we must look at the entire first quarter in which goods producing, construction and manufacturing have risen substantially.

THE ECONOMY

FISCAL PLANS TO COMBAT INFLATION

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. The minister is well aware that inflation in Canada is going up faster than Space Shuttle Columbia. He should know that it now costs $211 to purchase goods which in 1971 would have cost only $100.

Does the minister have any plans for introducing policies of fiscal responsibility to deal with the complex problems of inflation, or will he remain content to fight inflation on the backs of the middle-class who are caught in a wage-price squeeze?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker.

INCREASE IN FOOD COSTS—REQUEST THAT PRODUCERS RECEIVE OIL SUBSIDY REBATES

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, the minister is also aware that the Department of Agriculture released figures which show that the cost of a nutritious diet for a family of four rose 1.2 per cent in one month. That means that the yearly increase in the cost of feeding a family of four will be 14 per cent, which is even higher than the projected rise in the consumer price index. In light of this increased burden on families, has the minister any plan to reintroduce the PC policy of allowing the producers of our food rebates on the cost of the oil necessary to produce that food so that food costs could be kept down for the consumer?

• (1120)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has referred to a release of the Department of Agriculture indicating an increase in food costs. He will be aware, as well as I am, that that increase is basically due to improved returns for producers in agriculture and it is also due to shortages of various crops throughout the world. Also, future trends will depend to some extent on access to markets abroad. The movement in the food price index is caused by a number of complex factors.

I do not believe the hon. member is very consistent in asking me in his first question to practise fiscal restraint and then, in the second question, to ask me to launch a new program of spending in order to assist the farmers. That is the kind of assistance in formulation of policy that I do not need at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF SPRING BUDGET

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In light of the figures released this morning by Statistics Canada which show that there are 9,000 fewer jobs in the economy this month than last, and that we have 60,000 more unemployed, and in light of the fact that the minister's forecast in his budget with respect to inflation has now been proved to be wrong by about 20 per cent, and in light of the fact that his earlier predictions that the interest rates we suffered last year were merely temporary and not a permanent feature of our economy—we have seen how wrong that prediction was—is the minister in a position to say that we should have a budget in the spring, since the constitutional fandango appears to be winding down, which will relate to the economic problems which we are facing now? With these economic problems even more serious than they were last year, is the minister willing to show the Canadian people that the government is prepared to deal with the problems which really concern the people right across this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member included many points in his question. With respect to the unemployment situation, he knows as well as I do that the unemployment rate we have been experiencing in 1981 is better than that forecast in the budget. The economy is stronger and the rate of growth in the economy is stronger, otherwise we would not be experiencing the kind of inflationary pressures that the hon. member is mentioning.

With respect to the question of employment, there has been a change from last month to this month, with a slight increase in the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate. But I would remind the hon. member that a year ago the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate was higher than it is today, and that in the past year we have created 321,000 new jobs. In addition to that, the performance on the unemployment side of the economy is better this quarter than it was in the immediately preceding quarter.

• (1125)

I mention some of these other elements to indicate to the hon. member that I do not think that his suggestion that I bring in a budget at this stage to counteract what he considers to be excessively high unemployment is a very good idea. If the hon. member had focused his attention on inflation and could produce some new policies in that field, then it might be interesting for the House to consider that kind of an approach.

QUERY RESPECTING INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I am glad the minister mentioned the word "focus", because it is the lack of focus of this government on the basic problems affecting the Canadian people which is the real problem facing the country right now.

When the minister talks about focus, I would like to ask him what has happened to the government's so-called industrial strategy which was promised to the Canadian people in the election and which was promised to the Canadian people in the Speech from the Throne. The word "immediate" was used in the Speech from the Throne. It said there would be an immediate industrial strategy.

What has happened to the over-all focus of the government on the basic economic problems facing the country, and why has the government taken the decision to shelve the industrial strategy just at a time when it is clearly something which the Canadian people want and expect from their government? Why is the government abdicating its economic leadership, just at a time when it is exactly what the Canadian people are expecting?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the question is obviously filled with rhetoric, and not being accustomed to dealing in rhetoric myself, I—

An hon. Member: Even the Prime Minister is laughing!

Mr. MacEachen: —I find it difficult to answer the question. But let me tell my hon. friend that in the budget the necessity of improving performance in the economy, through increased productivity and increased economic development, was recognized through the increased spending which was made available in the economic development envelope, a very substantial increased spending. It is within that envelope that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Science and Technology, the Minister of Employment and Immigration and other ministers have been developing—within that over-all framework—particular approaches to important sectors of the economy.

I disagree with the hon. member who says that we have made no progress and that we have not developed any industrial strategy. He must accept, as I do, the importance of adjustment in the country as part of an industrial strategy. We just recently announced the designation of several communities which are facing particular adjustment problems. I regard that as an important part of industrial strategy, and if I were not conscious of you, Madam Speaker, I might take some more time and talk about other components of the industrial strategy. But really one cannot deal with that rich subject on the orders of the day.

Mr. Crosbie: You can't deal with it at all, twenty-four hours a day.

GOVERNMENT PLANS TO DEAL WITH HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Well, for someone who does not know anything about rhetoric, the minister did rather well in his answer, rather well in terms of rhetoric. He failed, in terms of substance, because he did not tell us anything at all about why the government has shelved the over-all economic strategy which it promised us during the election and which it promised in the Speech from the Throne. We have had a year pass, and we have had nothing from the government in terms of a basic approach to the economy.

My final question to the minister has to do with interest rates. The minister has been on record as saying, last year in the Speech from the Throne that the interest rate phenomenon was a temporary one, that it was something which would pass, and that relief would be provided to those people who are most seriously affected. I would like to ask the minister now whether he is not pausing to reflect a little bit on the fact that we have been living with interest rates in the stratosphere for an awfully long time, that they show no signs of coming down, and that they are having a devastating effect on the construction industry, on the housing industry, on the car industry, on the forest products industry, and right through the economy.

Does the minister not think that it is time that the government should take the opportunity to say that the interest rate phenomenon is a very deep and difficult one and that the government is prepared to deal with it through the tax system or the monetary system, in order to provide the relief which is necessary, and in order to get investment up and the economy going, and to provide jobs for the Canadian people?

• (1130)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member refuses to acknowledge the fact that at present there is considerable strength in the Canadian economy, and its performance has been much better than anyone would have projected last fall, both on the employment side and on the production side.

The hon. member talked about construction. He ought to know that employment in the construction industry recorded strong growth in March, for the first quarter as a whole. Construction employment rose 5.1 per cent following five consecutive quarters of decline. That is improved strength in the construction industry, which the hon. member singled out for better attention.

He talked about high interest rates. As far as I am concerned, it is quite a mistake to talk about controlling high interest rates unless we control over-all inflation. That is the problem we face.

EMPLOYMENT

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT ON PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—ACTION TO REMEDY

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. When the government took office on March 4, 1980, the unemployment rate on Prince Edward Island was 13.4 per cent. Figures released today by Statistics Canada reveal that the unemployment rate on Prince Edward Island soared to 16 per cent for March. How does the minister account for that sharp increase in the unemployment rate on Prince Edward Island, and what specific steps does he intend to take to deal with the crisis?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I want to point out to the hon. member that one important step that we took, immediately upon becoming the government, was to reintroduce direct employment programs for Prince Edward Island that the hon. member's government had cancelled so that there was no opportunity whatsoever for any additional federal systems to provide employment on that island. We have now spent several millions of dollars on that island for the provision of direct employment assistance through the community development project. If the hon. member is looking for an answer to how the people of Prince Edward Island have been helped, they have been helped by electing a Liberal government.

AID TO REDUCE BURDEN OF HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. In the House of Commons on October 29, 1979, the minister said:

If there is a requirement to raise interest rates, there is an equal requirement to help those people hurt by those interest rate increases.

The prime bank rate when the minister made that statement in the House was 15 per cent; it is now 17.75 per cent.

To deal with the unemployment crisis on Prince Edward Island, which the policies of his government have done nothing to help but, rather, have hurt, would the minister begin by urging his colleague, the Minister of Finance, to reduce the burden of high interest rates at least on primary producers, in particular fishermen and farmers?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance, as we well know, is well able to answer these questions for himself. I would point out to the hon. member that again one of the major changes that was introduced by this government was a budget which puts together a regime of lower energy prices which helped all Canadians, particularly those on lower incomes. Furthermore, we established a major income supplement program for the elderly to cushion the effects of higher costs and inflation, again adhering to the basic commitment of this government to help those who have the greatest difficulty in our society.

Mr. Clark: You know as little about the island as you know about Manitoba.

INCOME TAX

TREATMENT OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND OTHER EAST COAST FISHERMEN

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. The minister is aware of the tax audit of the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada. While the minister was in Prince Edward Island in February he assured the fishermen that they would be dealt with fairly and reasonably in repaying money owing in back taxes. The provincial director, on the other hand, states that he personally does not see any justification for special treatment of the fishermen.

Can the minister assure the fishermen, not only in P.E.I. but in Atlantic Canada, that he will live up to his promise and that he will not take such drastic steps as garnisheeing their UI cheques?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I want to repeat that commitment made to the fishermen in Prince Edward Island that indeed they will be treated fairly and equitably, as will all fishermen and all taxpayers in the Atlantic area. There are a number of ways of collecting back taxes; garnisheeing is only one. I responded just recently to the brief presented to me by the P.E.I. fishermen setting out the way in which we intend to approach the problem. Taxpayers in all parts of Canada must pay taxes, Madam Speaker, but, on the other hand, they must be treated fairly and equitably, and I intend to see that that is done.

Mr. Gass: I wish to direct a supplementary question, Madam Speaker, to the same minister. Could the minister confirm reports that the tax audit of the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada has been halted in the federal riding of Westmorland-Kent by his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, who, by the way, is the member for Westmorland-Kent? Is the same type of investigation being carried on in Westmorland-Kent and, if not, why not?

Mr. Rompkey: Madam Speaker, the audit is being carried on all across Canada, in the Atlantic area and on the west coast, as a whole. It is an industry audit; it is an audit that we do normally every year in various types of industries.

Mr. Trudeau: Started by the Tories.

Mr. Rompkey: It was begun by the previous administration and is being carried on under this administration. It is being carried on fairly and equitably in all areas.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CHANGE IN TAX PROVISIONS TO HELP CHILDREN OF POOR FAMILIES

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and it concerns the children of the working poor in Canada. Last May the minister stated to the Commission for the International Year of the Child that the child tax credit should be increased, funds should be redirected to children who need help most, and that the current exemptions help the rich more than the poor. We know that this was substantiated by the National Council on Welfare this week. What specific changes does the minister recommend that will benefit poor children and when will these be implemented?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, one step that I suppose would help a great deal to put the message across and convince people of the importance of redirecting money that goes to middle-class families in Canada and families with good money, to lower-income families—and it is not for me to prejudge the report—would be to include that as a recommendation of the report of the special subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs of the House of Commons in which the hon. member is a participant.

Other than that I must say that, from a social policy viewpoint, we have put on our priority list work showing the benefit that an increased child tax credit, possibly financed from the child tax exemption that exists now, would be in helping the half million working poor in the country. We are proceeding with it through the normal procedures in the government system.

REQUEST THAT WORKERS ENGAGED IN COMMUNITY PROJECTS BE PAID HIGHER WAGES

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Sepaker, my second question concerns the same subject and is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. We know that the Welfare Council has documented that one million working poor in Canada include workers who are on government grants and who are performing essential community services. When will the government stop promoting national poverty through the minister's department, raise pay levels for these workers, and make these essential services permanent in communities?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member would know that the employment programs that we provide through the federal government have, as their basic minimum, the minimum wage standard set in each of the provinces. I suggest to the hon. member that if she has some concern about the level of salaries paid, the real answer resides at the provincial level where minimum wages are set.

● (1140)

That is the standard we use to ensure that we also get the largest distribution of the moneys we have available to provide direct employment for people and to provide, in those employment programs, very specific priorities that are set by the local communities regarding what is important in terms of the kinds of public works or facilities that they need. We have established the principle of the local communities setting priorities through the local advisory boards set up by Members of Parliament.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

TRANSFER PAYMENTS TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Food prices are up, inflation is up, the cost of living is up, interest rates are up, unemployment is up, the minister has given up and the public is fed up.

Mr. Nielsen: And we are all going to throw up.

Mr. Crosbie: My question to the minister is this. Is he going to add to the problems of the people of Prince Edward Island and other disadvantaged provinces by carrying out the statement in his budget of October 28, that a large element of our expenditures "especially in the social affairs envelope consists of transfers to the provincial governments and we expect significant savings here"? Is the minister going to reduce transfer payments to Prince Edward Island, for example the $193 million in transfers that they receive in equalization, hospital insurance and medicare? Will he enlighten the people there in time for Monday's election? Are they supposed to vote Campbell for more cunning cuts?

Mr. Lawrence: Now 'fess up.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member was incomplete in his preamble when he said the Canadian people were fed up. I thought they were pretty well fed up with the hon. member and his budget, and showed that quite a bit. The hon. member is asking an electorally directed question. His sudden interest in Prince Edward Island is edifying. It will probably disappear after Monday next. However, it gives me the opportunity of saying that, of all the Atlantic provinces, Prince Edward Island benefits more from, for example, the development programs of this government.

Transfers to Prince Edward Island through DREE are very much higher than Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Newfoundland for that matter. They are much higher than any of the other Atlantic provinces. There is a 15-year development plan that has been financed by the federal government to the extent of 80 per cent. It is up for renewal at the present time, and there is a request to the federal government for an additional $80 million to finance that development program. All the fears expressed by the hon. member are unfounded, electorally directed, and if he wants to get on the bandwagon and support equalization, which is proposed in the constitutional bill, why does he not support that and help Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, is the minister saying that he does not tell the truth in his budget speeches? He said in his budget speech that he is going to save money by cutting back on transfers to the provincial governments in the social affairs envelope. Will he answer the question for a change and deal straight with the public? The public loved my budget after having seen his.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Is the minister saying he is a man who does not tell the truth? Is he or is he not going to cut back on social transfers to the provinces, for example, in P.E.I., the $193 million? The minister's officials are now meeting with provincial officials. They are telling them they want to save $1.5 billion in transfer payments for post-secondary education and the like. For example, the $701 million they are paying—

Madam Speaker: Order. I ask the minister to be brief as well.

Mr. Crosbie: My question then to the minister—

Madam Speaker: Order. I have heard the question. There was a question asked. I heard it.

Mr. Crosbie: Will the minister answer the question?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Crosbie: A supplementary, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: A supplementary, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon West.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the minister did not understand the question.

Madam Speaker: Order.

CRIMINAL CODE

UPDATING OF LAW RELATING TO COMPUTER CRIME

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. We are all aware of both the extent and the importance of the computer revolution in our society. While technology has evolved swiftly, our laws have remained largely static. In July, 1980, the Supreme Court of Canada, in a case called R. v. McLaughlin, ruled that Section 287 of the Criminal Code, the section dealing with the theft of a telecommunication service, did not cover the unauthorized use of a computer facility. The law was proven to be woefully anachronistic. Can the minister advise the House when we can expect the introduction of legislation which will bring the law respecting computer crime up to date?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, this is a very important and difficult question which involves a lot of fundamental legal issues. It is being reviewed in the department at this time. We have been in communication with the Canadian Bar Association on this subject. We are studying the problem at this time with the Law Reform Commission, and have been in touch with the provinces on this matter. It is a very complex new development in law. We are working on it. I am not in a position to tell the House when we will be ready to bring forward legislation on the subject.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: As the minister will know, the Canadian Bar Association has requested speedy action in this area. Will the minister commit himself to introducing a separate bill with respect to this matter at an early date, rather than waiting until the omnibus bill on the Criminal Code amendments comes forward at the next opportunity? Will he give specific priority to this study so that we can have early legislation?

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, it would be very helpful if the hon. member were to guarantee swift passage in the House of Commons. There are many bills in front of the House at this time and they are not being sent to committees very quickly because of time being spent on other matters.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

TRANSFER PAYMENTS TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance who was asked whether he stood by his budget statement that the Government of Canada was expecting savings in payments to provincial governments. He answered that question with a yes. Can he now give us a guarantee that Prince Edward Island can continue to count on the $193.8 million it receives in transfer payments from the federal government? That is a simple question, and a direct figure. Can the Minister of Finance give us that assurance now that Prince Edward Island can continue over the next two, three, or four years to count upon that amount of transfer payment from the federal government.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, the whole question of fiscal transfers is now a matter of discussion between the Government of Canada and the provinces. It is under study by the parliamentary task force. The Leader of the Opposition talked about the figure of $193 million. It may be that, as a result of changes that take place in the transfer system, Prince Edward Island might even increase. I don't know.

Mr. Crosbie: It might decrease.

Mr. MacEachen: I said it might increase. I did mention, when I was in Prince Edward Island a week ago tonight, at Saurio where I followed the right hon. gentleman at a meeting, the whole question of fiscal transfers. I pointed out, for example, that in 1979 the per capita revenue from resources in the province of Alberta was about $1,800, while in the province of Prince Edward Island it was $3. That is not the kind of revenue distribution that we on this side of the House stand for, but it is espoused over there.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance promised in his budget that he would realize savings by cutting back on transfer payments. He has now resisted answering a straight question regarding payments to the province of Prince Edward Island. He said they might increase, which means that they might very well decrease. We on this side of the House suspect that he is planning a decrease in the amount of money which will be available to the people of Prince Edward Island, and that he is trying to avoid questions in this House by hidding behind the task force that has been established.

● (1150)

What we want to know now is whether the Minister of Finance will give a guarantee that the new formula which will be worked out will guarantee the people of Prince Edward Island that they will receive at least as much in the future in transfer payments as they are receiving now. Will he give us that simple guarantee, and will he give it to us now?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes or no.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is really quite unrealistic. He would probably be the first to criticize if I, at this moment, decided what will be the result of negotiations with all the provinces, and what will go into a form of agreement with the provinces. It is absolutely a fact—and I do not withdraw from the budget statement at all—that we hope to achieve savings in the transfers to the provinces. We have not decided yet where those savings will take place, or in what programs. We have not decided how a new fiscal system will operate. All of this is up for discussion. I think it is quite unfair for the Leader of the Opposition to pick a figure out of the atmosphere and say, "Yes, stand by that," even before negotiations with the provinces have commenced.

AIRPORTS

REQUEST FOR ASSIGNMENT OF PRIORITIES IN MODERNIZING MUNICIPAL AIRPORTS

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday the minister indicated that he was prepared to consider another privately financed terminal at Toronto airport. It is appropriate that most of the airports which are discussed in this House are the larger ones, the Montreal airport, the Toronto airport, the Winnipeg airport, etc., but across the country there is a series of smaller municipal airports, quite often funded by the federal government and administered by the local municipalities. Many of these now have master plans, and they are significant to the economy of those particular regions.

I wonder if the Minister of Transport is prepared to indicate today that he will take a careful look at the smaller airports and to set some priority there, because they are fast becoming out of date in terms of not serving communities and certainly in terms of not serving the air industry of Canada.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the only thing I can say rapidly on this subject this morning is that my department's budget for airports over the last years had been declining quite substantially. I made a presentation to my colleagues on this subject, and I think they will be very sympathetic. Notwithstanding the fact that the needs for local airports are almost unlimited, I now hope that in the coming months I will be in a slightly better position to do more than has been done recently for medium-sized and smaller airports.

EMPLOYMENT

JOB CREATION PROGRAMS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In answer to an earlier question he pointed out that 140,000 new jobs had been created in the last few months. I point out to the minister that, according to figures released today, there are over 450,000 young people unemployed. That is more than 45 per cent of all the people unemployed. We are going into a period when high school and university students will be coming onto the job market, and I want to ask the minister whether he has any plans to expand the job-creation programs of his department to take care of a substantial number of those young people who are now or will in the very near future be unemployed.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we have been trying to re-orient our job-creation programs to target in on those groups in the community which have the most difficult employment problems, and to concentrate our resources on giving them some opportunities and on bringing down work barriers.

As the hon. member knows, a new program beginning on May 1 is designed to create jobs for the handicapped and those who are the hard core unemployed in our communities. We will be concentrating our efforts in those areas to try to break those barriers down, in addition to maintaining broader based programs such as the student employment program, which will provide opportunities for students.

Where we are concentrating a large part of our resources is in the job centres across Canada. There will be 300 or 400. We will try to develop job opportunities in the private sector for students. Under that program there were close to 300,000 placements last summer, and we hope to have an even better record this year by making sure that the private sector provides the fullest opportunity for students and young people during the forthcoming months.

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT IN MANITOBA

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I know the minister pays particular attention to the problems of our province. I am sure he has noticed that the number of unemployed, according to Statistics Canada, has increased from 30,000 last month in Manitoba to 35,000 this month and that the real rate of unemployment is not 35,000 but 51,000. The minister will know that in some areas of our city of Winnipeg the unemployment rate is not 10 per cent or 15 per cent but 50 per cent or more.

I want to ask the minister what plans he has, and what has happened to the $4 billion western development fund. Rather than seeing an improvement in Winnipeg, we are seeing a further deterioration of a very serious situation.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, those of us who live in Manitoba must suffer because of the fact we have a provincial administration with a peculiar monetary policy. This has resulted in the fact that we do not have much of an economy or much economic development. Therefore we are doing our best to compensate for the lack of effort in that province.

I point out to the hon. member that we are negotiating at the present time a major program for the core area of Winnipeg. The objective is to provide close to 3,000 or 4,000 jobs for the hard core unemployed in that area. That program was initiated by this federal government. We are asking for a response and for the co-operation of the other levels of government. I hope my colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and I will be able to finalize that agreement within a very short period of time so that we can get down to assisting those in the downtown area of Winnipeg who have the most serious employment requirements.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP FOR KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS CENTENNIAL

Will the Postmaster General ensure that a centennial stamp will be struck in 1982 for such a worth-while fraternal organization?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, in reply to the question asked by the hon. member, I am happy to tell him that I have already received representations from members on both sides of the House on this matter, and there is every reason to believe that the committee responsible for selecting the design of stamp issues will agree to commemorate this event next year.

THE ADMINISTRATION

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF SEPARATE DEPARTMENT OF TRADE

Mr. John Thomson (Calgary South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the increasing importance of trade to Canada—trade represented some 31 per cent of our gross national product in 1980—I wonder if the Prime Minister would consider separating the trade portfolio from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce so that it might function with a greater degree of autonomy and responsibility.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, that is a suggestion which is made from time to time. The hon. member will recall that it was in the mid-1960s that the departments were united. At that time the argument was in that direction. I think this government has met the difficulty which the hon. member sees in asking his question by the fact that we not only have an excellent Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but we also have helping him an excellent minister responsible for international trade, the Minister of State for Trade, and another excellent minister, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. In this way this government explains why it has been doing so well in increasing its foreign trade balances.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thomson: Madam Speaker, I think it is clear that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has so many functions to carry out, and that the trade function will be of such vital importance to Canada in the future, that creating a separate portfolio for this function warrants the consideration of the Prime Minister.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR TRADE COMMISSIONERS IN CANADIAN EMBASSIES

Mr. John Thomson (Calgary South): Madam Speaker, does the Prime Minister believe that it is wise to proceed with the integration of the trade commissioner service under the Department of External Affairs when trade is of such national importance?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the logic of the question is difficult to follow. In one instance the hon. member wants us to separate departments, and in another he argues about the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Kempling: What?

• (1200)

Mr. Trudeau: The argument about External Affairs, as I understood it, was that we have put foreign trade officers abroad under the ambassador. The object in both cases is the same, Madam Speaker. It is to ensure integration in our policies, that we should tend in industry to produce things we can sell and that in our external relations we have one person speaking for Canada, that is the Canadian ambassador, under whose authority come the various departments which operate abroad. That is true for foreign trade, and it is also true for immigration and health services.

AGRICULTURE

FUNDING FOR FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Since the minister has castigated the banks for charging high interest rates and not assisting farmers, does he have any plans to increase the amount of money available to the Farm Credit Corporation, say in the amount of $150 million asked for by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, we have a lot of plans for the Farm Credit Corporation. The hon. member will have to wait and see.

PLIGHT OF FARMERS AFFECTED BY BANKRUPTCY OF MACHINERY DEALER

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, since the minister has a lot of plans but no money for the Farm Credit Corporation, does he have any plans to change the legislation which would make it possible for farmers to avoid having to go to banks and financial institutions in such situations as has developed in the North Battleford area where farmers have had to pay twice for machinery as a result of a bankruptcy?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member mentioned a very sad state of affairs where farmers paid a dealer who did not submit the money to a finance company, so now they are being asked to pay again. There should be some law which protects the innocent purchaser of any product when this kind of situation occurs. It is hard to understand that this can happen in our society today.

However, when the hon. member speaks about the Farm Credit Corporation I would say to him that we do have plans which we will be submitting to the House, I hope shortly, which will allow us probably to increase our lending capacity substantially. We have plans also which will enable young farmers in particular starting out, to take out beneficial types of loans, perhaps at no interest rate for the first three or four years, and with no capital payments, so they can establish themselves.

PENITENTIARIES

CUTBACK IN SECURITY STAFF AT MATSQUI, B.C., INSTITUTION

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Can the minister advise the House of the reasons for what has been termed the shocking cutback in security staff at the Matsqui institution in Abbotsford, British Columbia?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, there is a proposal to reduce the number of positions on the security staff of that institution, but I do not think it is shocking. The background of it is that the correctional service in Canada is developing national standards to try to assess the proper level of security across the system. We have learned from experience in other institutions, and these national standards indicate it, that some institutions have more security than others in the same category, and that some have less. We are trying, in a rational way, to balance the system.

Security is, in a certain sense, endless. One can always demand and justify increasing the number of guards in the system, and to a certain extent that has happened in the past. I want to resist those kinds of demands to increase security constantly or to cut back constantly the amount of freedom given to inmates within the institution. I regret incidents, but incidents do happen, and they can be prevented. However, I reject the solution of always increasing the amount of staff and limiting the freedom of inmates in the institutions. I do not think that, in the end, that is an acceptable solution.

Mr. Patterson: May I say that what has transpired recently has certainly been a shock to the people of that community because of the cutback. In view of the past security problems associated with the institution, such as escapes, violations of passes, and so on, what measures will the minister take to ensure that the public is properly protected, and will he reconsider the cutback which is being implemented at present? This is something that has been of major concern to my community, and I believe that the minister should reconsider his decision on what is actually a cutback, not just holding the line.

Mr. Kaplan: I do not disagree it is a cutback but I do disagree that serious or any additional risks are created to the surrounding community. I can assure the hon. member that it is the view of the correctional service of Canada that the level of security that will be provided will be adequate, and I justify that in terms of the performance of that level of security across our system from coast to coast.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—OFFICE OF MR. MUNRO (HAMILTON EAST) IN WHITEHORSE, YUKON—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: On Thursday, March 26, 1981, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) raised a question of privilege on which I would like to rule today. The question of privilege dealt with the illegal use of governments funds by the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), affecting his rights and responsibilities as a Member of Parliament and impairing his ability to carry out the duties expected of him.

The hon. member has invited me to search Treasury Board guidelines for the establishment of ministerial offices in order that the Chair might share the view, as stated by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), that the said guidelines had been breached and that the minister had acted illegally.

The hon. member for Yukon was kind enough to provide me with a copy of the guidelines on the terms and conditions of employment for ministerial staff, presumably issued by the Treasury Board secretariat. It has been ruled consistently that the Chair does not decide questions of law. Also, the Chair is not responsible for the interpretation of departmental guidelines or for determining whether or not it is illegal to breach such guidelines. These matters are, quite obviously, outside the ambit of the Standing Orders of this House.

The hon. member for Yukon also stated that, in establishing a ministerial office in the constituency of Yukon, the minister "is impeding my ability to perform my responsibilities as a Member of Parliament representing that constituency". In this argument, the hon. member was supported by some of his colleagues, including the House leader of the opposition, who asked that not only the Standing Orders but also the customs, traditions and precedents of the House be taken into account in this regard.

Other members also claimed that the establishment of ministerial offices in their constituencies impaired their ability to represent their constituents and infringed their privileges in ridings where ministers were not elected to represent the constituents. The inference appears to be that only the member elected in a particular constituency has the prerogative to represent the constituents of that constituency.

It might be useful at this point to quote in part Citation 17 on page 14 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which reads as follows:

> Every member as soon as he is chosen becomes a representative of the whole body of the Commons, without any distinction of the place from whence he is sent to Parliament . . . that every member is equally a representative of the whole has been the constant notion and language of Parliament. Every member, though chosen by one particular district, when elected and returned, serves for the whole realm. For the end of his coming thither is not particular, but general, not barely to advantage his constituents, but the commonwealth.

Hon. members have not claimed that there has been any physical molestation, as the hon. member for Saskatoon West admitted, to prevent them from discharging their duties in this chamber, and I must therefore rule that the rights of the hon. members have not been infringed in any manner by the establishment of ministerial offices in their regions.

Finally, the hon. member for Yukon and others have alleged that the establishment of ministerial offices in their regions was an illegal use of public funds and a violation of the equality of treatment of the members in terms of their constituency offices.

Constituency offices were established by the House for its members out of funds appropriated by Parliament. Although it has been suggested that constituency offices were created so that Members of Parliament for respective ridings in Canada could serve the people, no allegation has been advanced that any member was prevented from doing so or that such funds were used illegally by anyone.

Ministerial offices, on the other hand, are apparently established and maintained with funds appropriated by Parliament and allocated to the various departments. It is not the responsibility of the Chair as a matter of privilege to decide whether or not illegal use is made of such funds. It must be pointed out that the House has the opportunity to scrutinize such expenses before giving its approval to supply bills, and to check them after they are made through, for instance, the Office of the Auditor General or the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. The government can be challenged on the use it makes of such funds on motions of no confidence or substantive motions.

Therefore, it is apparent that the House, through its normal operations, can adequately deal with the alleged difficulties raised by the hon. member for Yukon, and I must rule that a prima facie case of privilege has not been established.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I rise simply to give you notice today that it will be the intention on Monday to raise a question of privilege which has nothing to do with Your Honour's ruling just now. The question of privilege concerns certain remarks made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The question will be raised through proper notice to the Chair, either by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the opposition House leader or myself.

Madam Speaker: I take that notice, but I remind the hon. member that I do not need a verbal notice. I need a statement of what the question of privilege consists. As long as I have such a statement, I am willing to hear the question of privilege.

MR. MICHAEL PITFIELD

Question No. 1,883—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the exact salary being paid, by the government, at the present time to Mr. Michael Pitfield, Secretary to the Cabinet and Clerk of the Privy Council?

2. What is the total of indemnities received by the Prime Minister, from the government, at the present time?

3. Is Mr. Pitfield receiving more in salary than the Prime Minister, as Prime Minister and as a Member of Parliament and, if so (a) what are all the reasons to justify such a situation (b) are Mr. Pitfield's services considered by the government to be more valuable than those of the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1. Mr. Pitfield is paid in the salary range for the DM-3 level, which is $68,900—$85,700. Salary administration at this level in the public service is based on the principle of assessed performance, with progression through the range being a function of the assessed level of performance of the individual executive.

2. The Prime Minister receives the same indemnity as all Members of Parliament, $32,700. As provided in the Salaries Act, the Prime Minister receives an additional salary of $40,400. The Official Residences Act provides the Prime Minister with two staffed residences, lodging for the Prime Minister's chauffeur, food, hospitality, and other expense allowances.

3. As a governor in council appointment, the salary range for the DM-3 level is set by the government, taking into account the advice of the advisory group on executive compensation in the public service. The salary, indemnity, and living expenses allowances of the Prime Minister are enacted in statute and as such are determined by the Parliament of Canada. There is no direct relationship between the two salary determination procedures.

DIAND—SCHOOL LUNCH SUPPLEMENT, N.B.

Question No. 2,169—Mr. Schellenberger:

1. Did the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development reclassify the hot lunch program for New Brunswick schools from a non-discretionary item to a discretionary item in the 1980-81 budget and, if so, for what reason?

2. Were the amounts initially allocated for the program transferred to other programs in the 1980-81 budget and, if so, to which programs?

3. Were New Brunswick native groups consulted prior to the department's decision to discontinue the program and, if so, which groups and on what dates were they consulted?

4. Was the program discontinued in New Brunswick schools during 1980-81 and, if so, for what reasons?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The noon lunch supplement was never identified by the department as a non-discretionary service.

2. In 1980/81, $34,200 was spent for the noon lunch supplement during the months of April, May and June. The remainder of the allocation was used to fund other elements of the education program, such as: post secondary education assistance program and the contributions to bands program.

3. Discussions concerning this program were held with the executive of the Union of New Brunswick Indians on July 16, 1980, at Fredericton, New Brunswick, and on August 20, 1980, at Oromocto, New Brunswick.

4. The program was discontinued during 1980-81. Regional allotments were insufficient to fund this discretionary program.

NATIONAL PENSIONS CONFERENCE

Question No. 2,194—Mr. Beatty:

1. Was the city of Toronto's Mayor's Task Force on Disabled and Elderly invited to the National Pensions Conference in Ottawa and, if not, for what reason?

2. What groups or individuals were invited to the conference to represent the disabled in Canada?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. No. Because of severe space limitations and the need to ensure a balanced representation from governments, the private sector, pensioners and women's groups, it has been necessary to restrict invitations to national umbrella organizations.

2. The Coalition of Provincial Organizations of the Handicapped have been invited to provide representation for the disabled in Canada.

RAIL TRANSPORTATION MOVEMENT

Question No. 2,200—Mr. Herbert:

Does the government record the annual ton/mile movement of (a) grain (b) potatoes, as a percentage of total rail transportation movement and, if so, was there a significant change in the past ten years?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission records Canadian ton-mile figures for Canadian National and Canadian Pacific. The figures below show grain and potato movements as a percentage of total domestic traffic (i.e., transborder movements excluded) for these two railways. Data for other railways are not available. According to the Statistics Canada publication "Railway Transport—Part V", the two railways combined move about 99 per cent of the potatoes and 96 per cent of grains (such as barley, oats, rye and wheat) which travel by rail. The figures for 1971 through 1977 are taken from the CTC's computer database. Figures for 1978 through 1980 were obtained by phone from the information centre of CP Rail and the marketing and sales department of CN Rail and should be considered as approximations.

SENIOR PUBLIC SERVANTS LOST TO PRIVATE SECTOR

Question No. 2,268—Mr. Herbert:

1. Did the President of the Treasury Board express concern that the government regularly lost its best administrators to the private sector?

2. What is the turnover rate for senior public servants?

3. Does the President of the Treasury Board consider that changes to relevant salary scales are essential to attract and retain senior personnel?

4. Did the President of the Treasury Board conduct an inquiry into possible shortages of senior-level personnel and were certain departments identified as not having enough competent senior management personnel to adequately carry out their mandate and, if so, which departments?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): 1. In his address to the Seventh Annual Conference on Compensation and Human Resources of the Conference Board of Canada on January 14, 1981, the president stated that, "As good managers become increasingly in demand in the private sector, we are likely to see a rapid and irreversible erosion in our management ranks".

2. In 1980, of a population of 1309 senior executives, 110 terminated their service for reasons of: resignation (45), retirement (57), layoff (5) and death (3).

3. The president also stated on January 14 that "With budgetary expenditures of 60 billion dollars, I think you will agree that we need the best managers in the country, yet all analysis clearly shows that many of our managers lag their private sector counterparts"; and, further that "(managers) who accept responsibility and who discharge it effectively and efficiently on behalf of taxpayers must be rewarded accordingly." The president elaborated on compensation for managers as follows, "Let me make it clear that compensation improvements that I advocate for public service managers need not cost Canadian taxpayers significantly more. Rather I envisage a restructuring of our manager's compensation package to provide real financial incentives for high achievers while ensuring that mediocre performance is penalized".

4. The president's statement quoted in response to question 1 is a general comment on the potential impact on the Public Service of the prospect of an increasing national demand for managers. In the opening remarks of his address on January 14 the president made it clear he will "draw heavily on input from my own bureaucracy . . . particularly where technical matters are very much the focus of the remarks" but that in this address he had elected to offer "my own views . . . untouched by bureaucratic expertise". In this context a specific inquiry regarding shortages of senior-level personnel was not conducted in relation to this address.

AUDITOR GENERAL ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING SALARY

Hon. Yvon Pinard (for President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-64, to amend the Auditor General Act, be read the second time and referred by unanimous consent to the committee of the whole.

He said: Madam Speaker, the professional's role in our society, namely the person who provides services to his clients according to the rules of professional ethics, is in many respects of major importance for the success of government institutions and society as a whole. Thus, we know that members of the medical profession are devoted to the protection of life itself. Members of the bar defend the rights of individuals according to the laws approved by this Parliament and others before it. A professional practises a profession that requires highly specialized knowledge and lengthy and intensive university studies to which must be added a high degree of technical and ethical excellence.

One of these professions is that of accountant and auditor, one of whom serves Parliament. Madam Speaker, I am speaking about the Auditor General of Canada, with whose duties all members of this House are familiar.

His office plays a role without which it would be difficult for us to assume our own responsibilities to the Canadian people. The Auditor General is one of the main protectors of public interest. The complete integrity, the technical knowledge and competence, the honesty and the devotion which has characterized this office throughout the years make this appointment one of the most important and influential in the country.

[English]

The contribution of the Office of the Auditor General of Canada to the profession, both within Canada and internationally, gives us all a right to be proud. The Office of the Auditor General plays a major role in the assurance of responsible government within a parliamentary democracy. The existence of financial and other analyses of the highest quality are essential if many of the activities of the House are to be soundly based.

The purpose of this bill is to recognize the increasing importance of the office, not just to Parliament but within the profession and, not incidentally, the increasing importance of the accounting profession within our society. Accounting professionals are guardians within our economic system, much as the medical and legal professions to which I referred earlier are guardians of our lives and rights.

The Auditor General is a servant of Parliament. It is appropriate that we take the occasion of the appointment of Mr. Kenneth Dye to recognize the importance of the office by equating it to that of a puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us today is another of those small ones on which I have often been called upon to comment. This bill has only two clauses, and the other one upon which I was called to comment had one. But like some of the small bills, it has big consequences, particularly for the new Auditor General.

The Auditor General has been in office now for ten days. If this bill is passed today, it will give him a salary increase of $5,000, the way I read the provisions of the existing act and of the bill before us.

There have been other bills which were of more consequence to the new Auditor General. Of course, one of those was the Judges Act amendment which Parliament recently passed. I will say more about that later on.

In introducing the bill, the minister said that the Auditor General is a friend of Parliament. There is no question about that. He will be the watchdog for Parliament, for the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and, indeed, for all taxpayers of Canada. The man who is in this job right now is Mr. Kenneth Dye, who comes from Vancouver. He has had an exemplary career in his profession of chartered accountancy and in the British Columbia Institute of Chartered Accountants, where a year ago he finished a term as president.

In addition to being a friend of Parliament and of taxpayers, Mr. Dye is also an old friend of my daughter. In fact, my daughter can claim to have known Mr. Dye for almost all her life. When she was six weeks old last June, she attended the annual general meeting of the British Columbia Institute of Chartered Accountants over which Mr. Dye presided as the then president. In case there is any doubt in the House, I must say that she behaved in an exemplary manner. Only at one time, when a speaker had gone on for too long a period, did she make any noise; perhaps it was a good sign because by then he had been going on for too long!

Mr. Dye will also be a friend of another young lady named Tasha, who was born six weeks ago in South America. She is the granddaughter of the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King). She will be moving with her parents to Canada in a few weeks. I am sure all new Canadians, like Tasha, will be very concerned and happy that Mr. Dye, the Auditor General, will be looking out for her welfare in the future.

I think we should examine what is proposed in this bill. The wording of the bill itself seems simple enough. It says simply that the Auditor General shall be paid a salary equal to the salary of a puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Canada. The wording in the existing Auditor General Act is that the Auditor General shall be paid a salary equal to that paid to the Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Canada.

• (1220)

By making that fairly simple change from Chief Justice of the Federal Court to puisne judge of the Supreme Court, Mr. Dye has achieved an increase in his basic salary of $5,000, from $62,000 to $67,000. But the situation is better than that for Mr. Dye because, as I remarked last week, this House has passed the Judges Act amendment. Under that act the salary of the Auditor General is tied, of course, to that of the judges of the Supreme Court. That measure gave those honourable gentlemen a retroactive increase of $7,000 effective April 1, 1979 and, another retroactive increase of $7,000 effective April 1, 1980. An additional clause provided that all judges, like Members of Parliament and perhaps other officials who are paid by the public purse, would have an automatic increase so that ad hockery would not be necessary every time an increase was needed. The judges' bill provided that all judges would receive an increase every year on April 1 to a maximum of 7 per cent. It would be less than that if certain federal indexes are less than 7 per cent. When Mr. Dye accepted this position last fall, he thought he might be receiving a salary of $62,000. He now finds himself, effective April 1 of this year, with a salary of $86,660, as I have calculated it. I am sure Mr. Dye will be very happy to be receiving roughly $24,000 a year more than he thought he would receive when he took the job.

There is another notable beneficiary of this piece of legislation whom I must just mention in passing. That beneficiary is, of course, the past Auditor General, Mr. J. J. Macdonell, who retired last year. He will be the beneficiary of the retroactive provisions of this bill. As I calculate it, Mr. Macdonell will be receiving a retroactive bonus, as soon as these measures are worked through the system, of about $10,000.

It is all very well to talk about these high salaries, but I think we must have a basis for comparison. I checked through some records which were available to me to see what this kind of salary might compare with and whether it was a reasonable salary or not, since it certainly sounds high to some people. I referred to the report of the commission to review salaries of Members of Parliament and Senators by Dr. McIsaac and the Hon. Leon Balcer. The recommendation in that report is that ministers of the Crown should be paid a salary for their position as ministers and another salary for their position as Members of Parliament, for a total as of April 1, 1980, of $80,000. To that figure of last April 1 must be added a 7 per cent escalator which is in the legislation. Of course, this is dependent on the legislation being passed, so it is hypothetical at the moment. That 7 per cent increase would bring salaries of ministers to $85,600 this month, which is almost parallel with the $86,600 this bill would provide to the Auditor General.

I also made a comparison of the amount paid to an SX-4, which is just about the deputy minister level. As near as I can calculate it, an SX-4, just below the deputy minister level, would now be earning about $77,000, possibly $78,000.

I did another comparison with respect to salaries of people who might be in the executive category, and so on, elsewhere in the country. I found that the president, the chief executive officer of Westcoast Petroleum, receives a base salary of $110,000. At the other end of the scale, the highest paid executive in Canada that anyone has been able to find so far is Mr. Sinclair, chairman of Canadian Pacific Limited, whose base salary is $568,000. So one can see that there is a fair range of opinion in industry as to what certain executive officers are worth.

Mr. Knowles: You mean, what they get paid.

Mr. Clarke: As my hon. friend to the left says, what they get paid. The shareholders or taxpayers had better think these people are worth what they are paid or else there may be some changes made.

I also thought it would be useful in establishing a base salary for our new Auditor General to make a comparison with what professionals like him might be earning if they stayed in the profession from which Mr. Dye comes. He was a senior partner in a national firm of chartered accountants stationed in Vancouver. I found that chartered accountants in British Columbia who graduated about 20 years ago, in the period from 1959 to 1965, were earning an average of $69,000. If they had left British Columbia to live elsewhere they were earning an average of $77,000. The older vintage of chartered accountants, those who graduated in the 1950 to 1958 period, were earning an average of $70,000 in British Columbia and $88,000 if they had left British Columbia. I cannot tell from the survey done by the Institute of Chartered Accountants of British Columbia whether those figures apply to members who remained in practice or to members who went outside. I know something of the profession and those who practise as partners in large firms. I think it is safe to say that our new Auditor General, Mr. Dye, is certainly making a financial sacrifice to come and be the servant of Parliament. I think that is true not only of Mr. Dye but of the judges whose salaries he is tied to. I am sure it is true of a great many, if not all, of our deputy ministers who work for the government and the taxpayers, although the taxpayers may sometimes have cause to question that.

Recently we hired a chief financial officer for the Government of Canada, the Comptroller General. He is rated as a DM-3, which is the highest ministerial salary range. The medium salary range for that post right now is $77,300, with a maximum of $85,000.

I think it can be seen that the proposal in this bill to tie the new Auditor General's salary to that of the judges' salaries is not unreasonable, although it seems that way to many people. I would now like to ask myself and the House why it seems unreasonable to have these very high salaries. If we look back in time we can see that not so many years ago very high salaries like this were not in existence at all. As recently as eight years ago, when I came here as a member, the salary was $18,000. It is now nearly double that amount. I can very easily lay the blame or the reason for all of that on the fact that government policies have made it necessary for people to get these very high salaries, that these very high salaries would not be necessary at all if it were not for inflation caused almost completely by the government's fiscal and monetary policies. Only the government has the power to overspend by the billions of dollars, something which has become a habit in recent years. Only the government has the power to increase the money supply, thus creating this terrible inflation which has caused endless problems in Canada today. This month in Ottawa there was a very important conference on pensions. That conference was a direct outflow of the inflation caused by policies of this government opposite.

• (1230)

We can look back to the days before the present administration took office in this country when inflation was almost negligible and interest rates were very much lower than they are today. People could borrow from the banks at 6 per cent or less instead of three times that rate now. Of course, one cannot expect people to invest their money with financial institutions at a rate of interest which will cause them to fall behind the rate of inflation and actually suffer permanent loss of purchasing power. That results directly in higher interest costs for individuals who want to borrow for personal or housing purchases, because investors in our society insist upon receiving a rate of interest which reflects the current rate of inflation and also compensates them for the temporary loss of spending power. Then, of course, banks and other financial institutions must have their spread in the middle to cover their operating costs, the return to their owners, shareholders, or what have you.

The amount that this government has been overspending and the extent to which it has been increasing the money supply is absolutely straggering. Any taxpayer who might be listening or who would care to read these remarks will be astounded, because the amount of borrowing which we have just recently approved, $14 billion, which is to cover the current monetary needs of the government's operations, is equal to the total amount of all personal income taxes paid by taxpayers in Canada in 1978. In 1978 there were 14 million taxpayers who filed returns in Canada. Including those who had losses and no tax payable, on average $1,000 per person was paid in income tax, for a total of $14.2 billion. This year the government has asked Parliament to approve the borrowing of $14 billion just to cover overspending in one year. Because of this continuing policy which has aggravated the economic situation and led to inflation, we have a situation where the total debt of Canada is probably unknown precisely, but is certainly over $100 billion now.

With the government having to pay the interest rates that it, like everyone else, has to pay, in the current estimates for the 1981-1982 fiscal period there is provision for over $12 billion just to pay interest on the outstanding debt. That is a figure approaching the total of all personal income taxes paid by taxpayers in 1978. That figure, because it is in the estimates, ignores the interest burden shouldered by all the Crown corporations. Unless one is a wizard or whatever, those figures are an unknown quantity. However, they would certainly put the total up to the $14 billion range. So one can see where the comparison lies.

Granted, these highly paid executives of ours, servants of Parliament, civil servants and so on, need this money; but then the average man on the street also needs raises. That is why we have a lot of labour strife, and pensions conferences to find out why people cannot afford to pay these high prices.

We once had a debate respecting the salary of a certain minister opposite who had retired to his home in Vancouver. We discussed the indexed pension he would receive as a former minister of the Crown, and we found that he would have an enormous pension if he lived to be 75. Based on projections that were made at that time—that was a few years ago—this retired minister would need all of that money because when he was 75 years old he would have to pay $60,000 to buy a Ford car and $7 for a loaf of bread. If he wanted to get the plumbing fixed or something, and if he would have to employ a plumber, it would cost him $250 to get the kitchen sink drain repaired.

We are a few years along that road now. Who would have thought a few years ago that we would now be at the age of the $10,000 Volkswagen? In fact, I think it probably costs a lot more than that, but $10,000 is about the minimum cost of a Volkswagen. If one wanted to buy a Mercedes-Benz, one would have to pay about $55,000.

Mr. Kempling: If you can't afford it, don't ask the price.

Mr. Clarke: The day of the $100,000 Rolls-Royce is gone. We are already pretty close to the $1 loaf of bread. I guess, with the rates that plumbers and other trades people need to charge these days, we are well along the road to the $250 visit from the plumber.

We have agreed to have a fairly limited debate on this bill, so I do not think I need detain the House any longer. However, it is absolutely essential when considering simple little bills like this with two clauses which have a great impact on a couple of Canadians, that we look beyond the two clauses to see why it is necessary to fix the salaries of a servant of Parliament. I suggest the whole structure of our monetary system is in jeopardy because of the policies that this government opposite has been following for at least the last 13 years, maybe longer than that. If we say that often enough in the House and outside the House, I just hope we can convince the government opposite that the policies it is pursuing are an absolute disaster and mean ruin for our pensions system, for our monetary system and probably for the whole fabric of our society. We very much want hon. members opposite to learn the consequences of their deeds before it is too late.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on behalf of the New Democratic Party. As Treasury Board critic for our party and as a member of the Public Accounts Committee, I deal fairly closely with the Auditor General and we have had several occasions to deal with the Auditor General's office over the life of this Parliament so far. I would like to take this opportunity, before saying anything about Bill C-64 itself, to congratulate Mr. Kenneth Dye, the new Auditor General, who will be acting as an officer of this Parliament to keep control over the purse strings, over the spending presented by the government, authorized by Parliament, and then disbursed in the proper manner. I think he performs an important role in our society by being the watch dog over or guardian of the purse strings of this country.

I would like to say that we favour speedy passage of this bill whereby the Auditor General of Canada would move from a classification comparable to a Chief Justice of the Federal Court to a puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Canada. As the hon. member who spoke just previously to me pointed out, the salary range for the Auditor General of Canada will now be in the range of $80,000 to $90,000 per year. I recognize this is a high salary, but I have been assured by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that we will be discussing the subject of high salaries when we review the salaries of Members of Parliament. This matter will be coming before us in the near future so I will not dwell on it now.

• (1240)

A salary range of $80,000 to $90,000 a year reflects the importance of the position of Auditor General of Canada. I am certain that Mr. Kenneth Dye and his predecessor, Mr. J. J. Macdonell, could have earned that type of salary in the private sector as professionals. I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that we favour speedy passage of Bill C-64.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I understand there is a disposition to put this matter through all stages.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

INCOME TAX

MEASURE RESPECTING AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill S-17, to implement conventions between Canada and New Zealand and Canada and Australia for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill S-17 is to implement conventions negotiated and entered into between Canada and New Zealand on the one hand, and Canada and Australia on the other hand, for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax. Hon. members will recall that we considered a similar bill to implement tax treaties with several countries a few months ago, and the bill before us today is of the same type, includes the same provisions as Bill S-2 which we considered earlier, and confirms more or less some well-known negotiations and agreements.

Hon. members will recall that at the time of tax reform, Canada had tax treaties in force with over 15 countries. Of these 15 or 16 countries, Australia has had a tax treaty with Canada since 1967, and New Zealand since 1948. As you will recall, since the tax reform, we have invited several countries to enter into negotiations with Canada in an attempt to conclude treaties designed to avoid double taxation. We have now renewed and renegotiated such conventions with 32 countries, and it is expected that other countries will be added to that list.

As in the case of similar tax treaty legislation approved by Parliament in the past, this bill contains a special provision dealing with any future changes to the conventions. Part III of the bill is designed to ensure that the tax treaties can be kept up to date as the result of changes in the tax system of Canada or of the other countries. The mechanisms provided for under this bill are similar to those agreed to previously. In addition, the bill provides that the governor in council may, subject to a resolution of Parliament, give effect to any supplementary convention.

The two tax treaties under consideration follow the general pattern of the treaties concluded with other countries after tax reform. They also follow to a large extent the format and language of the latest model double taxation convention published in 1977 by the Committee of Fiscal Affairs of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, or OECD. Hon. members will recall that, when we were considering Bill S-2, we spent a great deal of time in the standing committee reviewing this standard or model treaty prepared by the OECD and that we also compared this model treaty with the various ones contained in Bill S-2.

The treaties generally provide that dividends can be taxed in the country of source at a maximum rate of 15 per cent. A general rate of 15 per cent is also provided for in the case of interests originating in one country and paid to a resident of the other country. With respect to royalties, the treaty with Australia provides for a general rate of 10 per cent, and the one with New Zealand provides for a rate of 15 per cent. The only limitations provided for under the old agreements were 15 per cent in the case of dividends with Australia and an exemption for copyright royalties with both Australia and New Zealand. I should now like to go over briefly the provisions concerning capital gains which preserve the right of the source country to tax gains arising on the sale of real property, business assets and shares in real estate companies.

Contrary to other tax treaties concluded by Canada, the treaties with Australia and New Zealand do not contain an article on non-discrimination. It is those countries' firm policy not to include such an article in their tax treaties and, as a matter of fact, the existing agreements already reflect their position. No special concession for teachers is included in the tax treaties. The reciprocal exemption now granted teachers under both the Australian and New Zealand agreements will consequently be terminated. Under the existing agreements, pensions and annuities are taxable only in the country where the recipient resides. Under the new conventions, Canada has preserved its right to tax pensions paid to residents of the other countries; in the case of New Zealand, there is however a special provision whereby that right will be exercised only if a pension within a year exceeds $10,000. The country in which the recipient of the pension resides retains its full taxing rights.

Double taxation of foreign source income of Canadian residents is alleviated by way of a foreign tax credit. In addition, an exemption is granted for certain dividends received from a foreign affiliate of a Canadian company. In order to promote the flow of capital and investments, the tax treaties also ensure that proper relief will be granted in the other countries in respect of taxes paid in Canada. On balance, Mr. Speaker, the terms of the tax treaties provide an equitable solution to the various problems of double taxation existing between Canada and these two countries. Mr. Speaker, I therefore commend this bill to the most favourable consideration of this House, and I appeal to the usual co-operation of members on both sides of the House so that this bill may be passed very quickly.

I would have liked, Mr. Speaker, to be in a position to comply with the wishes of certain members and to provide information on or to update the status of the convention between Canada and the United States, which is extremely important, as has already been pointed out in the House. However, I have not yet received the information related to this convention, but if the House will allow me to do so, I shall be happy to give this information later in the course of this debate.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, this legislation concerns tax conventions entered into between Canada and New Zealand and Canada and Australia, as the minister explained. There is one thing about the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières); when he speaks you can understand him. He does not consider his main purpose in life to "obsfucate", as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) does. The chief duty of the Minister of Finance is to "obsfucate".

Mr. Knowles: To what?

Mr. Crosbie: o-b-s-f-u-c-a-t-e—"obsfucate".

Mr. Knowles: That's a new one for the dictionary!

Mr. Crosbie: In that way no one will understand what he is saying or doing. We had an example of that in question period today, where the Minister of Finance continued his practice of the last 13 months, which is to say nothing and say it in the vaguest way.

In his colleague, the Minister of State for Finance, we have the opposite. He is a man who knows his business. He has obviously studied his brief. He has the expertise and he is not afraid to say what he means. He has said quite plainly that this is a tax treaty between Australia and Canada and New Zealand and Canada. If the Minister of Finance was introducing this bill, we would not know that yet. We would have no idea in the world what this was or who this convention was between.

It is also noticeable that this is a tax convention between Canada and two other Commonwealth countries. I am glad to see that the relationship between these two countries and Canada appears to be going along pretty smoothly. Apparently Canada has not told Australia and New Zealand that they should hold their noses as they pass these tax conventions. Canada has been a bit more diplomatic. It is not like the poor old mother country. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has told the mother country, the United Kingdom,—it is still called the mother country in Newfoundland—from which some of us have sprung, to hold their noses while they pass the constitutional resolutions, if they ever get to the United Kingdom. That is not calculated to improve relationships between two countries of the Commonwealth. I am glad to see the Minister of State for Finance has not exacerbated our relationships with New Zealand and Australia by doing anything like that.

Mr. Knowles: We need a new dictionary today!

Mr. Crosbie: The House leader of the New Democratic Party has had a rough week. If he has not heard the word "obsfucate" before, I am deeply shocked. He has been in Parliament since 1900. I think his record is 81 years. Perhaps it is only half that. Therefore, I am dumbfounded about that.

Our party has no objection to this legislation. It is sensible with countries with which we have a lot of commerce that we have legislation designed to deal with the question of double taxation and to relieve that burden from those who do business in both places. Australia is dynamic, growing and rapidly industrializing. There is a considerable Canadian investment there and a considerable amount of business done between our two countries. New Zealand is a much smaller country and we do not have as much commerce with it, but we need this tax convention with both countries.

We on this side are not going to divide on this. We will assist in putting it through the House with all reasonable speed in view of the reasonable and clear explanation we have had from the Minister of State for Finance. I only hope his senior partner will watch how he operates, try to emulate him and be a little more forthcoming in telling us what his policy is or is not than he has been to date.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is more or less a routine bill. We have these tax convention treaties with a number of countries and they have to be updated from time to time. As far as we can ascertain, there seems to be no reason for delaying passage of this bill.

I was interested not only in the new words that the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) coined today—he has added a few to any dictionary that I know—but I was also interested in the reference he was able to make to some things that were not exactly within the pages of this bill. Maybe I can do the same, briefly, but maybe I can be a little more relevant.

Since we are talking about tax convention treaties with certain other countries, I hope that at some point when we are dealing with this bill, whether in the standing committee or in committee of the whole, the minister can bring us up to date on the tax treaty between Canada and West Germany. This is a treaty that has been around for a long time. I hope very soon now there can be an agreement which can be confirmed by the legislative bodies of both countries. There are many former citizens of West Germany living in Canada who are affected by these tax arrangements. I hope the Minister of State for Finance, (Mr. Bussières), who has been very generous in the past on updating us on the Canada-West Germany situation, will bring us further up to date.

While talking about treaties with other countries—here I stray a bit but I will be off it before Your Honour can call me to order—I hope that the discussions that are going on for reciprocal social security treaties with other countries will be pressed. Many Canadians are puzzled as to how we can have reciprocal treaties with so few countries. I believe we have them with Portugal, Italy, West Germany, and there is the possibility of one with the United States, but still none with the United Kingdom. I trust that the Minister of State for Finance will press his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Begin), to do as he has done to get her to obtain these agreements.

With those pleas to the government, we are prepared to give second reading to this bill.

Mr. Evans: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the same spirit of parliamentary progress in which we have come to agreement among the three parties on other matters, there might be agreement to put this bill through Committee of the Whole and third reading. If that is so, I would ask Your Honour not to see the clock until we can complete that business.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): If the disposition exists, we will proceed in that fashion. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (1300)

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, as the parliamentary secretary knows, I have been trying to carry on some long distance discussions with my colleagues. I would be much happier if we proceeded only with the Committee of the Whole stage and let third reading stand on the order paper until some further date. However, we are prepared to agree that, instead of sending this bill to the overworked Standing Committee of Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, we deal with it in the Committee of the Whole. As far as I and my whole party are concerned, we are prepared to do that before one o'clock.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, that is agreeable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Provided there is not too much obfuscation in the chamber at the moment!

Mr. Knowles: That is a proper word!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Over the lunch hour perhaps those who work in Hansard might appreciate instructions as to how they are to proceed on the matter of obfuscation.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Yes, Mr. Speaker, a while ago at the end of my comments, I indicated that the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and other members had shown their interest in the tax convention between the United States and Canada and wanted to know where we stood. I would like to say first that the convention has been signed and that in January we issued a press release stating the general outline of the convention as understood by the negotiators. Some papers still need to be completed. However, the government intends to act as quickly as possible as soon as everything is formally finalized. That is the information I wanted to give Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: What about Canada and West Germany?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, as for the negotiations concerning the tax convention between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany, there was one round last June. Some important questions were still in abeyance. If I remember well, there will soon be some other negotiations and meetings between the representatives of the Federal Republic of Germany and their Canadian counterparts in order to arrive at a final agreement respecting the convention.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: "When shall the bill be read the third time?"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles: At the next sitting of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): With thanks to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for his assistance.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At 1.06 p.m. the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

MEAT IMPORT ACT

MEASURE TO REGULATE IMPORTATION OF MEAT

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-46, to regulate the importation into Canada of fresh, chilled and frozen meat and to amend the Export and Import Permits Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Meat Import Act

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to speak to Bill C-46. I will take just a few minutes on this occasion to give hon. members the background of this legislation and why it is vital to the 69,000 cattle producers in Canada. At present, Canada is the only major beef importing country in the world that does not have an ongoing beef import policy. Without such an import policy, this nation is vulnerable to market fluctuations and international price swings which are beyond our control.

As hon. members know, Canadian cattle production generally follows an eight to ten-year cyclical pattern. When beef prices are as low as they were in 1976, cattlemen start to lose money. First, the feedlot operator, then the cow-calf producers are squeezed, breeding herds are reduced, and distortion takes place in the whole beef industry. For a while this leads to more beef on the market because the producers are selling off their breeding herds, and consumers enjoy for a short time bargain prices. Generally it is for a short time; sometimes it becomes quite a lengthy time.

However, over the following few years there are fewer calves and feeder cattle to be sold and slaughter cattle prices rise. Before long, consumers find themselves paying a lot more for a pound of steak and cattlemen start to make a profit again. It takes a full three years between the decision to expand the breeding herd and when beef supplies are increased at the retail level.

Some people leave the impression that a farmer or rancher can produce this biological entity called the beef animal almost overnight; that the amount of beef which will be consumed can be placed on the market at the whim and fancy of anyone in the entire industry—the packing and retail industries—as well as the consumer. It is not that easy; it takes three years to increase production.

In recent years an international cattle cycle has developed. Production in most beef exporting countries now follow very similar patterns. When our beef production is up, so is the production in the United States of America, Australia, New Zealand and generally Argentina. When beef is in short supply in North America, usually the production cycle is turning down in New Zealand, Australia and other beef exporting countries. As this international beef cycle has developed, the fluctuations in world beef supplies and prices have become wider. Most major beef importing countries have acted to protect their cattle producers from the worst effects of these fluctuations.

For example, beef and veal imports into the United States have been regulated under its meat import law since 1964. Beef exporters face restrictions when selling to the United States, but the Canadian market is open. Obviously this can lead to our market being loaded with cheap beef. Furthermore, this situation upsets our normal trade pattern in beef and cattle with our United States neighbours.

We saw this happen in 1976. Imported beef was taking the place of Canadian beef on our retail markets and in our restaurants. At the same time, our cattlemen were exporting more live cattle to the United States. Why? Because they could not ship beef cuts and carcasses, since access to our beef was limited by United States meat import law. So they shipped live cattle, and soon U.S. producer groups were calling for controls on live cattle trade as well as beef.

We well remember the road blockades which were placed at certain border crossing points where trucks were hauling live cattle. The Americans were concerned about the importation of live cattle from Canada hurting their markets. When it was pointed out to them that the sale of live Canadian cattle into their markets, even at the highest point, would not affect 1 per cent of their market, I remember that one of the leaders of the opposition to Canadian cattle going into the United States said, "If a person is standing in a pool of water and is just bearly able to breathe, that extra little water in the pool will mean that he or she drowns".

If we shipped every head of cattle we have in Canada to American markets, we would only take over about 10 per cent of their total domestic kill for a few short days. Then we would not have any more cattle in Canada and they would not have to worry.

In the last month, the Americans have substantially increased their sales of live cattle into Canada because the prices are a bit better here and they have a surplus of huge, fat cattle. Our packing firms are buying those cattle, bringing them into Canada and depressing the prices to Canadian beef producers. In many instances they are producing below the cost of production at the present time. Many people are hit by high interest rates because they borrow huge amounts of capital to buy feeder cattle and to keep them on their farms all winter to supply the market in the spring and early summer months.

I talked to one young farmer the other day. I call him young because he is three or four years younger than I, so he is still a very productive person! He owns a farm in Ontario which consists of 450 acres. Nearly 400 acres of it are tile-drained; the buildings are very modern. He and his wife fed 450 cattle over last winter. His wife works as a registered nurse. Mr. Speaker knows how hard registered nurses work. His wife has worked in order to supplement their income, but over the last three years they lost money. With her wages, etc., they worked for nothing to supply some of the highest quality beef to the Toronto market. He told me, "I am selling my farm. If you can find me some foreign buyer for my farm"—and I am sure there will be some because they look upon land in Canada as much cheaper than land in Europe—"I could sell my farm, and most investment companies, trust companies or banks would give me more income, and I would do nothing for the interest I receive". He referred to the effort that they had put into the farm over their lifetime. It is a family farm; it was owned by his father before him. He said, "I will not mortgage it; I will sell it."

He did not say what he would receive for it, but I know that his farm should probably sell on today's market for close to $1 million. He could invest that money and a reasonable return would be about $120,000 per year; he would not have to do a thing. Right now he is a very productive person, investing various amounts of money in the production of corn on his farm in order to feed the cattle, yet he does not receive enough money to make a living. This is very wrong.

This bill does not protect trade in live cattle. Last year we sold $300 million worth of cattle in the United States. In turn, the Americans shipped to us over $90 million worth. Shipping $300 million worth of cattle into a population of over 240 million, and then shipping $90 million into a population of 24 million, will have slightly different economic effects per capita on the total industry.

I can just imagine what would happen in the United States of America if we took over 10, 12 or, in some instances, 20 per cent of its slaughter market for weeks at a time. Can one imagine what form of revolt would take place in that country? We only have to remember how excited the Americans become when we take over 1 per cent of their market; they almost call it a marketing catastrophe. Yet our country is supposed to accept their exports without any concern.

As I said, Canada is both an importer and exporter of beef. I am referring to beef not on the hoof. For instance, in 1980 we imported approximately 115 million pounds of fresh, frozen and chilled beef and veal and exported approximately 100 million pounds. The United States market has been and will continue to be our best export market for beef and cattle.

I pointed out some of the disadvantages of what we call that best market and how disruptive it is, since the only time those live cattle come into our country is when our market is better. The only time our cattle go to their country is when their market is better. You can see the tremendous changes which take place when the market is that way, with some 100,000 head of cattle shipped into Canada and maybe some 7,000 to 9,000 shipped into the U.S. because of the price differential.

Our ad hoc, year-by-year policy of restricting imports up to now has led to uncertainties—uncertainties for the Canadian meat industry and for our trading partners. It is time we put permanent import controls in place. Again I must put on the record, Mr. Speaker, that these important goals are not for live cattle. I believe some time in 1974 I persuaded the government to place controls on live cattle. The United States retaliated. We allowed 100 per cent of their five-year average of imports into our country. They did not fill one third of the quota given to them yet they retaliated and placed controls on our beef, pork and veal going into their country. We had to lift those quotas after one year. So they can be very powerful. The United States is a very restrictive trading nation in many ways. We have been a much freer trading nation in foodstuffs, generally speaking, than has the United States.

What this legislation does is to set annual quotas on imports of fresh, chilled and frozen beef and veal. These quotas are based on the historical level of imports in the 1971-75 period, but adjusted each year to take into account changes in the amount of beef consumed in Canada and the number of cows and heifers being marketed. Factors such as the supply and price of other meats, and changes in any restrictions affecting our cattle or beef trade with other countries, will also be considered in determining whether import quotas should be increased, decreased or suspended.

What that means, Mr. Speaker, is that if we have tremendous amounts of poultry or turkey meat in storage, that will have an effect on what the quota will be. This is slightly different from some of the meat import acts which other nations have. We think it is to our advantage because, for instance, when we see overproduction of pork in Canada selling below cost of production, it has a depressing effect on other meat suppliers, such as poultry and beef suppliers in Canada. At the present time pork producers are selling their product at $20 to $30 below cost of production.

Consumers today, in some instances, are paying the lowest prices they have ever paid for meat, especially pork products, when you consider their earning power. It would be as if it were given to the consumers free in the depression period, the prices are that low. So when people complain about high prices, it must not be forgotten that last year we put approximately $46 million into hog support prices.

The estimates for the year 1980, because so much was produced below the cost of production, had a depressing effect on other meat production entities. Our very rough estimate now is that we will have to use about $140 million for stabilization, so they can remain in business. What we are doing is exporting the surplus product on world markets at the same price as it fetches on domestic markets. Any other country would be foolish to enter into a pork production entity when Canadians are so stupid that they are producing the product below the cost of production, thus supplementing the treasuries of such countries as Japan and the U.S.S.R. We are so efficient that we produce some of the highest quality meat products in the world, yet we have not learned how to market that product in a proper fashion. For example, if the U.S. decides to suspend meat import restrictions in a particular year, there would normally be no reason for Canada to apply import restrictions. But that would be left to our discretion.

An advisory committee made up of representatives of the beef industry and consumers would be set up under this legislation. When considering annual import levels the Minister of Agriculture would seek the advice of this committee.

Bill C-46 is broadly parallel to the U.S. meat import law which was revised by the U.S. government in 1979. Under the old U.S. law, when production declined so did import quotas. When production was on the upswing, import quotas were increased proportionately. This reinforced the swings in the international cattle cycle. With the new U.S. formula, import levels are generally increased when domestic supplies are falling, but restricted when U.S. supplies are adequate. The counter-cyclical formula in Bill C-46 works in the same way. This legislation will provide increased stability for the beef industry.

Some members examined this bill after it was given first reading some months ago. We call this our bill because it was drafted by myself and my officials when I was minister, because I took that short sabbatical. It was also looked at by my colleague, the Hon. John Wise, when he was Minister of Agriculture. So the bill was drafted several times before it was finally presented to the House. It is really amazing to me that we are at the stage of giving this bill second reading today. The committee will be studying it and they may have certain amendments to present. As long as they are responsible and constructive suggestions, we will take a very good look at them.

We think this legislation will provide increased stability for the beef industry. This legislation will not over everything that people want. They will at least know that this legislation is on the books and that they will be able to abide by it. It will give Canadian cattlemen some of the assurances they need to plan beef production in the years ahead. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, I said "some of the assurances". This legislation will help stabilize beef supplies and prices to consumers. It will let our trading partners know where we stand on beef imports.

I am sure that a matter of such importance to Canadian farmers and consumers will receive the full support of hon. members. I will be happy to supply further details and respond to questions as the debate on this legislation proceeds.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I agree with the last thought that the minister expressed. He said it is rather strange that it has taken us this long to get this very important agricultural bill to second reading stage in the House. After all, the whole idea was first started by the cattle producers back in 1970. At that time the Canadian Cattlemen's Association made a proposal to the Hon. Bud Olson when he was minister of agriculture. So that shows how long cattlemen have been interested in this worthwhile project.

I had a brief meeting with the minister yesterday. At that time I referred to this as a bill which relates to meat imports. I attach a somewhat different reference to that phrase than the minister does, since I think we began a little earlier than the minister. However, I will say this. We in the official opposition fully support the broad principles of the bill. We are in agreement that second reading should take place today, followed immediately by the appropriate reference to the Standing Committee on Agriculture for a thorough examination, with ample opportunity to call interested and concerned witnesses.

The minister will well remember our Progressive Conservative efforts on this same subject during our period of government in 1979. These efforts included a very worth-while beef import consultative committee that did the necessary background consultation with all segments of the cattle and beef production and marketing chain. This was followed by our beef import bill, as we called it at that time, which was scheduled for first reading the day after our government was defeated. We on this side of the House are pleased to note that Bill C-46 is in general agreement with the broad principles of our earlier legislative plans. There are a few details that we would like to see changed, and I will comment on these a little later.

First of all, let us look at the need for beef import legislation. Canada's beef cattle industry is desperately in need of a shot of self-confidence, especially in the long term. Our well-known ten-year commodities cycle and traditional short-term ad hoc policies simply are not enough. We must have long-term policies. The longer the commodities cycle, such as ten years with cattle, the more important that is. Our cattle industry must have long-term policies which will provide genuine incentive to cattle producers to come back into the industry, or to start for the first time; or, more importantly, to start to rebuild our breeding herds.

I suggest it is highly significant that our Canadian beef cattle industry is still at the bottom of the cow or breeding cycle and the beef supply cycle. We have been on that low cycle point for about three years with very little evidence of any upturn. This meat import bill could make a good start at providing the beginning of that long-range incentive for our cattle industry. This legislation could indicate that the government does indeed understand the problems of cattle producers and genuinely wants to listen and respond to the concerns of major food producers in Canada.

Why, after three years, has there been no significant upturn in our cow and beef supply cycles? There are several basic contributing factors to this situation. First of all, 1980 was a bad year for cattlemen, especially cattle feeders, who suffered a net loss position across Canada of $129 million. That is the worst loss position since these kinds of records were started back in 1970.

Second, beginning in 1980, we have been experiencing the highest interest rates in our history—along with every other part of our nation, of course—with no sign of relief. In addition, there are the companion factors of steadily rising feed grain and other production costs. These apply particularly to our cattle feeding sector.

Third is the whole subject of drought in western Canada. The natural and quite proper reaction to drought in the cattle industry is to reduce our numbers to fit available supplies of grass and forage feed. There has been a sequence of recent drought years. In fact, they now appear to be almost ongoing. In 1977 there was a single, one-year drought, but a very severe one. This was followed by the first six months of 1980 which impacted much more severely on western cattle producers than on their grain producing neighbours.

Today, in early spring, there is already yet another prospect of widespread prairie drought which appears to be part of a larger drought pattern across the western United States. Available forage feed supplies for next winter will be severely restricted, and we know that already because there has been a lack of snow run off so necessary for local flood irrigation feed projects. Here I am not referring to the concentrated irrigation districts in southern Alberta.

The fourth item is that the cattlemen have long and very bitter memories of 1976 when they suffered through enormous, uncontrolled offshore beef imports from Australia and New Zealand at a time when we permitted unrestricted access to Canadian markets. This single factor may very well be the most important to cattle producers in their reluctance to rebuild their breeding herds. By the same token, this factor may be the most important reason for the need for this meat import legislation.

I would like now to make some comments about the proposed meat import legislation itself. We should not be timid in formulating our first Canadian meat import legislation along the lines of somewhat similar United States legislation. After all, they have had their legislation since 1964 and have recently amended their act to recognize recent changes in meat import trading patterns.

From our point of view as Canadian cattle producers, there are possibly four principles which should be recognized in any system that regulates meat import levels. First, there is an historic basis. Obviously, any new meat import policy must take into account our previous import levels and the historic market share enjoyed by our trading partners. Essentially, only three other countries are involved: the United States, Australia and New Zealand. While there are other countries, the volume of their meat trade is not significant.

The second factor is predictability. Both exporting countries and our domestic producers should be able to plan ahead with some guarantee of import levels, under what circumstances these levels may be expected to change, and by how much.

Third is the relationship to domestic consumption. There should be some reasonable provision for import growth with an increase in our domestic market, but not to such a degree that it discourages our domestic production.

Fourth is the relationship to domestic supply. It is not widely accepted that the concept of counter-cyclical quota levels is to guarantee Canadian producers that during the peak cycle periods we will not be overwhelmed with imports as we were in 1976; and conversely, at the low cycle points, such as we have now, increased imports might be expected.

It is worth noting that presently all four countries concerned—Canada, the U.S.A., Australia and New Zealand—are experiencing the same low point in the breeding cycle and, to a slightly lesser degree, also in the beef supply cycle. Because of this, Australia and New Zealand were unable to fill their quota allocation in 1980, and very likely this will happen again in 1981. However, the North American continent is not short of meat or meat supplies in any form because of very generous supplies of pork in both Canada and the U.S.A. It is also worth noting that domestic pork production in Canada is now equal to, or slightly higher than, beef production.

Under the heading "Interpretation" in Bill C-46, since the proposed act is somewhat parallel to the United States meat import act, it is worth noting that, like the U.S. act, it does not include live cattle, pork or canned meats. We on this side agree with this interpretation. I would add, as a comment on that, that the two-way live cattle trade between Canada and the U.S.A. is of such special historic significance as to preclude live cattle from the provisions of this meat import bill. We in Canada should never forget that we are next door to the highest and most dependable cattle and beef market in the world. However, we would suggest that under "Interpretation" the term "meat" should include mutton and goat meat. After all, we have a sheep industry that is presently enjoying a modest comeback.

If the United States' approach of using voluntary quota levels for exporting countries is to be followed, then the so-called trigger level must be very carefully determined as the result of recent levels of guaranteed minimum access and the anticipated human growth factor in Canada.

In this respect, many Canadian cattle producers feel that the problems created for this proposed bill by the agreements negotiated under the last GATT are so serious as to question seriously the anticipated usefulness of this meat import law. I think the effort is worthwhile but the implications of the last GATT exist. I know the minister is well aware of this. In my opinion, what is necessary is that the government renegotiate the last GATT agreements with respect to Canada's guaranteed minimum access levels and the human population growth factor with our trading partners. Quite frankly, in my opinion, in those last GATT negotiations Canada was clearly outnegotiated, particularly on the human growth factor. It is highly significant that the United States did not agree to a similar condition.

We are concerned that unnecessary and excessive discretionary powers have been provided in the bill by the minister. We suggest there is room here for political manipulation of quotas. These discretionary powers should be very narrowly prescribed and clearly defined. Surely this is another case where the ultimate opportunity to amend the legislation and bring it back before Parliament still rests with the government.

While the bill provides for establishment of an advisory committee, we feel that there should be a direct requirement in the act that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) consult with the industry, since it might be possible under this proposal that the minister would consult his advisory committee only and not the commodity groups that are ready and able to give experienced and competent advice.

In conclusion, I want to suggest that Canadian cattlemen have always felt that some reasonable beef import legislation is an essential element in any policy designed to stabilize beef supplies in Canada. Both before and after the passage of this bill, Canada will still have the most lenient and generous beef import policy of any major beef importing country in the world. I know the minister would agree with that. But let us not forget 1976!

The Canadian Cattlemen's Association has been promoting such legislation since 1970. As I outlined in my opening remarks, it first proposed the concept to the then minister of agriculture, the Hon. H. A. Olson. After second reading today, the bill should be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture, and that committee should encourage every interested group to come before it and give it the benefit of their experience.

I hope that other related items could also be reviewed in that committee under the same referral. I am sure that it will not surprise the minister when I suggest that one of them might very well be the recent extreme market disturbance this year by the 30,000 head of live fat cattle imported into southwestern Ontario in the first five weeks of this year. That situation still remains, although it is not as extreme as it was.

I thank you for your patience, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak briefly in the debate on this bill. We agree that the bill should be referred quickly to the Standing Committee on Agriculture because the contents are relatively technical and cannot be dealt with adequately in the House.

I want to make a few brief comments about the bill. My first reaction is to say that at last we have some cognizance by this government and the immediately preceding government that there is a need to recognize the value of supply management in the Canadian beef market.

What we have before us is a very rudimentary move toward a supply management scheme. It applies only to offshore beef and to beef and veal of a fresh-killed or frozen nature. It ignores mutton, goat meat and lamb, but it is a beginning. This is the first time that any government has brought in a bill that gives some recognition to the fact that we need supply management in our beef marketing system.

The bill purports to be a supportive measure to the U.S. bill, which was revised in 1969 and is intended to be a beef import bill that would be counter-cyclical in nature. Stated simply, that means that we would allow more imports into our country when our beef cycle is low on the supply side. This is the kind of concept that no one can argue with, except that if you think about it you will realize that the major exporters of beef to this country, the New Zealanders and the Australians, see North America—in this case meaning Canada and the United States—as their major market. Once they understand that we have such a formula at work, and given the fact that they operate through single desk selling agencies, I can see that within one or two beef cycles they will be able to make adjustments so that they can manage to work the system to suit their production and price requirements as well. However, we will try it and see how it works.

Since I believe this to be a very rudimentary bill, I am, of course, distressed that it does not take into account the movement of live beef. This is very important to a country like Canada where we sit next door to a country whose beef production patterns and consuming patterns are very similar to ours. But we are only approximately one tenth the size of that country, both in terms of production capability and consumption capability, and certainly in terms of political clout when dealing with bilateral agreements.

I am a little distressed that the ministers who drew up this bill did not recognize the good work in the report of the Senate agricultural committee issued in 1977, which urged that the bilateral agreement be renegotiated to include live beef. I can readily see why the United States is not keen to renegotiate such an agreement. Their country is ten times the size of ours and when we have a short-term distress surplus of beef we can walk it across the border with little effect on their market. When they are in a similar situation, however, and have a 1 per cent or 2 per cent surplus in American terms, that translates into a 10 per cent or 20 per cent surplus when it crosses the border to our side. We feel it very much. At the beginning of this year there were weeks where imports were at the level of 3,000 or 4,000 head of fat beef coming into Canada. That had an effect on our prices and a lot of beef producers were hurt.

We insist on keeping the door open because most of us who are in agriculture have an optimistic view. We look forward to that great day when we will be surplus producers and can have a good calf crop. We will want to have access to the U.S. to sell our production.

That perhaps made sense 50 or 60 years ago, but the situation is changing. We should use a different form of analysis, a straight producer-consumer analysis. If we compare the total amount of beef produced in this country with what is consumed, we have to go back to 1967 to find a year where we produced more than we consumed. My figures only go to the end of 1979. There may have been a quarter in 1980 where that changed. However, for the 13 or 14 years previous to the end of 1979, our total production of beef was slightly less in every year than what we consumed.

Holding the door open, keeping free trade flowing and allowing meat to pass back and forth between the borders of our two great countries, only to take advantage of some time in the future when we may produce a surplus to what we consume, is no longer realistic. This situation should be looked at in today's terms. Thirteen or 14 years' experience gets us through one and a half or two beef cycles. In all that time we have not produced more than we have consumed. Therefore, holding the border open for those reasons no longer makes sense.

As I said at the beginning, the bill supplies us with a curious form of supply management patterned after a U.S. example. The formula presented in the bill leaves at least three spaces for ministerial discretion. There are three statistics we can plug into the formula which use estimates. This does not leave as much leeway as existed under the old system, where the minister and his department sat down toward the end of the year to decide whether the level should go up, down, or, as was done at the end of 1980, disappear altogether. Even though that discretion is no longer there, it is still a fair amount.

If we want to use actual figures from previous years and plug numbers into the formula, by accepting a 10 per cent increase over the previous year or a 10 per cent decrease, depending on whether you want to make those kinds of discretionary moves, the import level could come down to 158 million pounds or go as high as 172 million pounds, which is a much larger move than that which is made by using ministerial discretion. Therefore, the possibilities of ministerial discretion are still there and they are still very great.

We have made a move toward the U.S. system. I am not sure we should do much more than that. Simply tying ourselves to the U.S. situation will not do that much for the beef producers in this country. If we want to co-operate with the United States for other reasons, perhaps it is something we can consider. However, it should be raised in bilateral talks under GATT when we begin to talk about live beef travelling back and forth. That is something we should remind the Americans about when we get into that kind of discussion.

The kind of interference which occurred in the market this winter with the sudden importation of a lot of live beef did not bring about the price increases that a great many feedlot operators anticipated. In fact, it did not result in the price increases that experts from the Department of Agriculture forecast at the Outlook Conference. Finished beef prices from the west have dropped to between 70 to 72 cents, occasionally moving higher. That is roughly the kind of price we are looking at.

For the producer who raises his calf and finishes it on his farm, with production costs in this drought year he receives about 20 to 25 per cent less than his cost of production. No wonder producers are having trouble meeting their payments. No wonder they are seriously considering selling the family farm and living off the investment, rather than struggling to stay in the beef business and subsidizing producers across this country for the privilege of producing beef.

There have been increases in pork production as well. Today we are considering a bill that will affect beef producers. If it creates anything, it will result in cow-calf producers deciding whether to continue holding the herd, cut it back or get right out of the business. This will send signals to the fellow producing the primary product, the calf. I do not think the signals will make him very optimistic.

Cow-calf producers have gone through a particularly tough year. Production costs were not met with calf prices achieved last fall. Those producers who attempted to hold the calves over the winter watched their inventory use up an awful lot of feed. It cost the producer a lot of money. The inventory at the end of the winter's feeding is worth very little more than it was last fall when he put them into the feedlot. They are looking for more than just a minor adjustment to the import laws. They want more than just following an example set by the United States, an example which does not provide a lot of protection for the U.S. cattlemen. The government should offer more. They should begin to renegotiate live cattle trade between our two countries.

We are a much smaller country than the United States; therefore, equal dollar value trade is very inequitable to us. It is always inequitable when your trading partner is ten times as large as you are, and we think the United States should recognize that fact when we are bargaining back and forth in respect of the live cattle trade.

In review, we see the bill providing very little stability to the industry, with almost as much ministerial discretion as existed before. As I have said a number of times, there is no mention of control of the movement of live cattle back and forth. This bill in no way guarantees cost recovery for our producers or any order in the market. It does not assure any particular stability for consumers and, even worse, there is no stability for producers.

In short, we have to conclude that the bill will be of little real value to producers out on the land. It is of little value unless there is some political value in it for the government; it may be looking for another smokescreen or symbol which create the impression it is doing something, but achieves very little.

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to contribute a few remarks on Bill C-46, the purpose of which is to control the importation into Canada of fresh, refrigerated and frozen meat, and to amend the Export and Import Permits Act. But first, in reply to our hon. friend opposite who has just stated that this bill will not have any impact on our farmers, I should like him to know that in its last newsletter of March 3, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has indicated that this bill is of paramount importance for Canadian producers and that without this legislation to control the importation of meat, producers would have serious difficulties trying to increase their production. Besides, not only will this bill protect Canadian producers, but it will protect Canadian consumers as well.

In Canada, the cattle industry ranks in the forefront of our economy in the agricultural and manufacturing areas. During the period extending from 1975 to 1978, cattle and calf marketing accounted for approximately 22 per cent of all our national sales of farm products. Slaughtering and meat packing with sales totalling some $6 billion in 1976, ranked fourth among Canadian industries. Since 1969, Canada is no longer a net exporter of beef because of increased imports which create a major problem for producers. This problem has further increased since imported products, especially from Australia and New Zealand, have improved in quality and have cornered a larger share of our domestic market.

For lack of a consistent marketing policy and control over beef imports, Canadian producers have been exposed to the vagaries of a depressed market and have witnessed a reduction of their share of our domestic market. If the stability of the beef industries of both Canada and our trading partners is what we want, then we definitely need a consistent and long term beef import policy. Our Canadian producers and their supporters say that Canada needs legislation to control beef imports. On the other hand, there are others who claim that the current provisions of the Export and Import Permits Act could very well solve problem of excess imports. The beef industry, for one—and I refer now to Bill C-46 which is now under consideration—wants the government to come up with a solution which would neutralize the destabilizing factor which affects our industry and that of Canada's trading partners, and in the final analysis, and this is very important, consumer prices.

Canadian beef production and marketing fit into the over-all North American context. Our production cycles follow closely those of the American market although, when our prices are higher or when there are excess supplies, there is enough time lag for the Canadian industry to be vulnerable to the effects of American imports. Nevertheless, despite the considerable effect of American markets on ours, the United States remain a major outlet for our exports of feeding cattle, dressed cattle and, from time to time, surpluses of finished cattle.

Canada has often been a net exporter of beef and finished cattle in its trading with the United States. Before 1969, it was in that position with all other countries. Since 1967, the production of beef in Australia and New Zealand has increased sufficiently to meet the increasing demand on international markets and has become more than synchronized with North American production. At the time when Canadian producers started to enlarge their herds, as a result of grain surpluses which led to the building up of reserves and the growth of the beef market, the import market was also able to meet the demand for beef of lesser quality such as that used for minced beef. An increase in the quantity of beef imported from Australia and New Zealand, over six times the average volume imported in previous years, allowed us to meet the demand in 1969. Beef imports from those countries stayed at that level during the seventies while Canada had surpluses and consumption of Canadian beef increased. Since that time, Canada has become a net importer of beef.

From 1973 to 1980, beef imports in Canada reached critical levels; this led to a clamour for official and coherent control, specially in the form of laws and regulations. The problem was first felt during the last quarter of 1973. At that time, an unusual quantity of finished cattle was imported from the United States, following price controls in that country where beef supplies accumulated; as a consequence, prices deteriorated in Canada.

Beef imports from Australia were particularly high in 1973 with the result that total imports of beef made up 10.5 per cent of national consumption. The price of feeder steers went down in Canada and the price of feeder cows began to decrease. Canadian production of beef went down to 10.3 per cent below that of the previous year, as slaughter of beef decreased and stocks of feeder cows were not further reduced.

The price of feeder steers went up until June to $80 the hundredweight. For the balance of the year, the price of feeder steers went down to about $5.50 below the record prices under the pressure of competition created by a plentiful supply of pork and poultry. As the production of beef decreased in Oceanic countries and in the United States, total imports of beef went down to 183, 407 pounds, namely 8.8 per cent of Canadian consumption at the time, or a drop of about 15 per cent from the previous year. Besides imports, interest rates during 1979-80 were another source of grave concern for beef producers. Interest rates stayed at about 15 per cent or more between October 1979 and April 1980. In spite of a slackening which lasted several months, the rates went over the 15 per cent mark again in early December 1980 and at the end of the year, unfortunately, they did exceed 17 per cent. The effect of such interest rates was to boost the cost of beef production and in some cases to dampen production in feeder lots with the result that the expansion of cow-calf operators was postponed.

It was in mid-1980 that Canadian beef producers really began to build up their herds. On July 1, 1980, the stock of slaughter cows was 4.8 per cent higher than it was one year earlier. Still, low production in cow-calf operations and droughts impeded the expansion of that market. The number of heifers set aside for reproduction was 2.8 per cent below what it was in mid-1979. In Saskatchewan and Alberta, the main beef producing provinces, the number of heifers kept for reproduction was down 2.7 per cent and 11.3 per cent respectively as compared with the previous year. Heifer and calf slaughtering increased mostly at the end of the year, particularly in western Canada. The higher number of heifers and cows shipped to slaughterhouses contributed to boost beef production by about 3 per cent over 1979 when it was expected that there would be a slow down in the herd build-up process. It was therefore the pressure exerted by a healthy supply of cut rate pork during the first half of the year which deflated the price of slaughter cattle between March and July below 1979 prices.

Of course Canadian pork production went up sharply in 1979 and 1980, and the same phenomenon will certainly be observed in 1981, a year during which at worst production might stabilize. Canadians have therefore become very important pork producers, with the result, of course, that beef prices declined. As recently as this week, Mr. Speaker, I attended the annual meeting of the Quebec Federation of Poultry Producers where I was told that chicken prices had gone down because of an overproduction of pork, so I suggest that perhaps beef producers are up against the same thing.

On most markets, prices recovered in August and remained stable until October, and then they went up slightly until the end of the year. The price of feeder cattle followed a similar pattern. At the same time, owners of feed lots and other producers experienced higher costs due mostly to increases in interest rates and in the cost of feed grain. The price for feeder cattle both in Canada and in the U.S. collapsed in 1974, and the Canadian government decide at the time to set up a price stabilization program for beef which came into force on August 12, 1974, with the passage of the Agricultural Stabilization Act. This forced the government to control the import of slaughter cattle, beef and veal. Thus, livestock on the hoof weighing over 700 lbs. and intended for slaughter within 90 days after their arrival in Canada, as well as fresh or frozen beef or veal were added to the import control list, under the Export and Import Permits Act.

A total import quota of 82,835 heads of live cattle and of 125.8 million pounds of fresh or frozen beef or veal was applied for a one-year period starting August 12, 1974. This quota was equivalent to the average imports into Canada during the five previous years. The U.S. government took retaliatory measures and on November 16, 1974, imposed a quota of 17,000 heads of live cattle and of 17 million pounds of beef or veal, which was less than the normal level of exports from Canada. In August, 1975, Canada and the United States simultaneously removed their import controls on livestock on the hoof. And by the end of 1975, that phase ended with both countries removing their controls on beef and veal imports. On January 1, 1976, Canada reopened its market and at that time the only protection afforded the Canadian beef industry was limited to the minimum tariff of 1.5 cent a pound for cattle and 3 cents for beef. The impact of these measures was reduced due to the then high exchange value of the Canadian dollar. As Canada was the one and only market open to exporting countries the situation turned out to be most interesting for South Pacific exporters and Canadian importers. South Pacific beef entered the Canadian market during the second and third quarters of that year in much larger quantities and at prices often lower than those paid on the United States market.

Mr. Speaker, this bill introduced today by the minister of Agriculture is the result of many representations and has received the approval of just about all the agricultural organizations of Canada. The United Cooperatives of Ontario, the Federation of Agriculture and the Meat Packers Council of Canada have stated their support for such a legislation on beef import whereby maximum quotas would be set according to an anticyclical formula. These same organizations, Mr. Speaker, strongly support the stated principles of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association with respect to import quotas set by the act according to the following criteria. 1) any beef import program must take into account the previous import levels set by Canada and the share of the market taken previously by our trading partners; 2) domestic beef producers and exporting countries should be able to forecast import quota levels which, before being changed, should be discussed in consultation with our trading partners; 3) over the long term, imports should be increased in proportion to national consumption, and the share of the market they represent should not fluctuate; 4) any change in short-term import levels should be inversely proportional to the domestic beef production in terms of beef-type cows being slaughtered. The Ontario Cattlemen's Association proposed that beef imports, during the growth stage of the cattle cycle, should not exceed 10 per cent and should be lower than 8 per cent of the domestic consumption during the closing stage of the cycle, in order to avoid the levels reached in previous crises. Those organizations generally agreed that imports of live cattle should not be legislated. Many cattlemen's associations have insisted that the law should provide no discretionary power. It will be left to the regulations ensuring from the act to devise the most favourable and beneficial formula for Canadian producers so that all Canadian producers may be assured of a favourable production cycle.

[English]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, this bill is welcome in the House. I think the minister knows why and how long it has been requested. My remarks will deal with some general principles in the beef industry to back up what is in the bill.

I was very impressed with the analysis of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave). The minister would be well-advised to use him as his main adviser for cattle problems in a marketing sense in western Canada.

The country should know that the livestock industry in western Canada is in a very bad way. This has a bearing on the people of Canada. It will show up very shortly in the price they will have to pay for beef. It is not a subject which concerns only a few people in Alberta and Saskatchewan. Presently we are not only in a cycle of breeding in the slow-moving cattle industry, but we are in the seventh year of a drought which is affecting that part of the continental plains in North America.

Our fellow producers throughout the continent are suffering in the same way. None of us know for certain what will happen in this seventh year. We had a pretty bad taste of it in the sixth year when the accumulative water tables were down. The people in small towns suffered in the first instance. Since the drought is cumulative, we must expect it to hit very hard the dry areas of the southern parts of Alberta and Saskatchewan this year. If we are lucky and the rains come, we can get by. The minister has the support of every member in the House in getting ready to cope with the problem if it comes this spring; the spring is with us now.

The big reason the cattle industry is in a bad way in western Canada is not just the breeding cycle or the drought with which we must contend every 20 years; it is the fact that there is a new competitor for the land. That competitor is grain. Whether or not we like it, the world is hungry for grain cereals. Western Canada has the ability to produce it. The demand for grain, at least as far ahead as we can see, will keep the level of prices high for bread wheat, feed grains such as barley, and corn in other parts of the country.

This competitive rise in demand for grain products around the world, for which we are very skilled in finding markets, has an immediate effect upon the livestock industry. It takes so much grain to feed an animal in order to obtain a pound of meat that a farmer finds it more profitable to move into the growing grain activity. In the long run he knows this will be bad for him, but he can only take low prices for so many years before folding up. The question is, how can we, as parliamentarians in our limited way, do something useful?

At least on two different occasions it has been said in the House that the attack should not be against our allies, in an economic sense, such as the United States, Australia or New Zealand. The attack must be with regard to something which is missing that will provide permanent, long-term relief from the general problem or malaise of low beef prices. I am talking about how we market beef.

The great curse of the cattle industry in western Canada, every since I have known anything about it, which has been a long time, has been that livestock producers have never seriously gone outside Canada to look for any long-term markets. They have sat there, feeding grain to their cattle, sending their cattle to packing plants, and letting the packing plants do their marketing. Packing plants have a territorial area beyond which they do not go. So, the producers are faced with packing plant marketing area empires which hold them completely imprisoned.

The fault does not only lie with the government, it primarily lies with livestock producers who yell for help and do not realize that they must do the same thing grain farmers did, namely, get off their horses or jeeps for awhile and go out and do a little selling. Individuals have done it, but let me tell the House, with some feeling, that in the last number of years I have had the opportunity to talk about matters affecting meat consumption in Muslim—certainly I have not talked about them in Hindu countries—and in Buddhist countries. There is a tremendous demand for good grade meat. In hotels in Saudi Arabia, one pays $125 per night for a room into which one would not put a high quality cow. If one goes to the dining-room, one is served meat from a cow which was wandering over the hills in Turkey or Kenya for four years in a hot climate. The cattlemen of those countries have attempted to get enough meat on its bones to produce enough to sell. One is then faced with paying a high price for that beef.

We should realize that within 12 hours beef from western Canada can be put into the three main marketing areas of Saudi Arabia; in fact that meat could be on tables there in less than 24 hours. Why do we not do it? The answer is that it is a Muslim country and the church has a great deal of authority over certain matters. It is the same situation that existed when the Anglican Church used to have a great deal of authority over the matter of meat. Every Friday was fish day. This was their way of helping to stabilize the fish market over 500 years ago. The rule in Muslim countries is that one must consume meat the day it is killed. It is pretty hard to sell the notion to a mullah of the Muslim church that when we fly over the pole, we get rid of a lot of time zones and we can place live meat before him, or meat in vacuum-packed form within 24 hours. That is the state of decision making now. It should not deter us because if they want the product live we will put it there live, within 24 hours.

● (1530)

There are airlines in Iceland, Great Britain, Sri Lanka, and all over the world which fly empty half the year because of cycles in air travel. These big airlines are just as happy to carry live cattle or vacuum packed meat as they are to carry human beings because the price is right. You can take a pound of meat produced in Saskatchewan or Alberta and deliver it any place in the world for a dollar a pound. When you are paying wholesale prices of $4 to $5 a pound I suggest the transportation cost is a reasonable fraction.

Without going into all the details I am suggesting that whether you are dealing with the rich areas of Singapore, Hong Kong, Tokyo or any large population which can absorb substantial quantities of meat—and they are very anxious to receive good meat—this can be done.

I do not think this should be only the responsibility of the government. The farmers under the Canagrex proposal should take some responsibility. Frankly, I would use it as an organization with the beef industry and tell them to pick out their own people to go around to the various markets and set the system up. That would be more harmonious with the basic philosophy of the cattlemen as opposed to some completely civil service oriented group which goes around and performs this function.

I think there have to be people in this system who sell for themselves. That is what I am talking about; the nature of the beast. He does not like to be driven but I suspect he can be led by the nose if there are dollars at the end of the trail. The minister who has a great persuasive power would be better advised to take this approach with the beef farmers than to continue talking about this silly supply management.

Believe me, this philosophy came into this country from Europe about 30 years ago. It brainwashed all the economists in Canada and the United States. You will not be able to sell that type of civil service run, operated and decision-making to beef farmers. They will just not have it. It is a lynching proposal. The sooner the minister drops it the sooner the action will happen. Some 90 per cent of the beef farmers in the east and west will not accept supply management. They will take a look at their neighbouring industries, the dairy, poultry and the struggling hog producers and will decide to take their medicine their own way. If you allow them to get off their horses, or whatever it is they get off, and get into this selling operation, they will do well at it. They are born horse traders and traders.

I want to hurry on because I realize there are other members who wish to speak. In this legislation we have been wise because we have not gone in for a completely restricted market. The American market is a big asset to us. We have been wise by not barring our markets to the Australians and New Zealanders, for very good reasons. We have been wise by not being so protective that we forced up the prices to the detriment of everyone. But the prices do have to rise, and they should do so in a genuine policy of obtaining markets for the products. It should be made to compete fairly with the pork and poultry markets.

If we push this idea it will not answer all the problems, but it will at least put the livestock people on notice that instead of allowing the individual farmers to get out of the business and go into grain they have some responsibility to save their own industry. They must get out and find a 2 per cent, 3 per cent or 4 per cent market which will take the excess off at all times and keep the prices buoyant here. When they can get out and do it themselves they are in harmony and it saves the government a great deal of money.

Finally, I want to talk about droughts. This has a bearing on this bill. I think the minister knows that my area of southeastern Saskatchewan produces more cattle per acre than any other area in the west. The figures will not be as good in the 1981 census as they were when the last census was taken in 1971. I see these farmers getting out of the business for economic reasons. It is hard work and when they get to be 55 or 60 years old they slow down a bit. They do not have sons who are willing to take up the business for the returns they receive. I see all the feed lots closing down, except for those that handle a few hundred head. I want to suggest a number of little things I think might help.

First, we have a signed agreement with the province of Saskatchewan that under this contract a minimum of 50,000 acres of land must be irrigated by the damming of the Diefenbaker Lake and the Saskatchewan River, the Gardiner Dam. I do not blame the government for not carrying this measure out in the earlier stages, since the price of grain did not make it worth while for grain farming. We now have this big cattle population, two and a half times as large as it was 25 years ago with 50,000 or 100,000 acres of irrigated land producing fodder two or three times a year, 20 to 40 acres per farm, or whatever is needed, you can live 20, 30 or 100 miles away and still have access to it. I think it is time we put the finger on the Saskatchewan government and told them to get some of that land under irrigation and let the cattle farmers for 200 or 300 miles around have access on the same terms as everyone else.

Second, the Department of Agriculture over 20 years ago spent a great deal of money, along with the provinces, mapping the underground rivers running under the prairies, including the Peace River, if my memory serves me correctly. All those maps are available in the research offices of each of the three provincial governments. If they cannot be found there then they are here in Ottawa. These aquifers are less than a thousand feet under the ground. Some are salty but some are fresh, and they are huge. The best one starts in the Peace River, B.C., comes all across northern Alberta into northern Saskatchewan, right down the centre of Saskatchewan, then turns east north of Regina and goes right through into Manitoba. That is good water and the maximum depth would probably be about 500 feet. That is the Hatfield River. There must be 20 or 30 of these underground rivers.

I am not talking about the deep ones at 1400, 1700 or 2000 feet. Those are all salty down there. This one is fresh. We have enough technology, even if the water is slightly sodium based or calcium based in its salt form, to correct that to a degree which would make it potable for cattle. These wells are drilled on a grid system every 20 miles all across the prairies. You can get the figures for those wells and calculate where the water is close to your farm. But in the emergency we may be facing this year I think those maps should be in the hands of Members of Parliament. Many do not even know they exist, Mr. Speaker, but if those maps could be dug out and the members could be told what they mean, they could get them into the hands of the municipal sectors. Then when the PFRA goes out to help solve the water problem this year they will know where to look. In some places the wells are actually in place and can be piped around great distances.

I think that is my main suggestion, Mr. Speaker. I have just one more to make. I have tried it before, but I will try it again.

• (1540)

Farmers collect their cattle to feed. Perhaps they have 5,000 head or more. To my knowledge in Canada we have not recycled manure. Do not laugh; that manure is worth $200 a ton at present prices.

An hon. Member: It's gold.

Mr. Hamilton: It is in the form of pure food, one can circulate right back to the cattle, whether they are dairy cattle or any other kind. I suggest all this knowledge is available. We had a conference in Regina about five or six years ago. This knowledge is in volume form and should be guided into the hands of the people who are talking about the beef problems. If a man can get more value from the manure of his animal, than he can from its beef, he should not bother holding his nose. He should just go and make the money. I have seen this done, but we were reluctant to talk about it. Believe me, in the state in which the cattle industry is now, we had better start considering this. It has to be done by large feeders, and maybe it has to be done by governments, but it is money-making operation for anyone ventures into it.

Thank you very much for letting me ramble on. I hope the minister—I know he has been listening—will grab at some of these ideas and maybe put a little pressure on the proper people. I think we would serve our industry well if we did that.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak on Bill C-46. It is a commendable piece of legislation which will assist our farmers and ranchers. It has been spoken about in this House and, clearly in the speeches I have heard from all parties so far, hon. members have underscored that it will be of benefit to the farming and ranching communities. However, I think there has been a false impression left among the citizens of the country, that that is the limit of the benefit. I would want to underscore the tremendous benefit in this legislation for the consumers of Canada.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: The truth of the matter is that if there is a belief in Canada today that we are paying too much for our red meat or beef, then we need only look back to the period of time from 1973 to 1976 when we opened the flood gates for beef from New Zealand and Australia. The consumers of Canada then had the tremendous benefit of cheap meat without realizing the day of payment was coming. While they had the luxury of good cheap protein on their plates, the truth of the matter is they have now end up paying because the farmers have had to decrease their breeding herds to the extent we now have a shortage of breeding stock in the country.

There are a number of things I would like to say in commencing this speech. First of all, there has been some credit given to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), who is present with us today for the consideration of this bill. I want to give him credit, too, for bringing the legislation to the House; but I am sure the minister will join with me saluting the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) who took a very major part in drafting a similar piece of legislation for our party in that short period of time we were in the government through 1979. In many ways, what we have before us today is really a piece of legislation carried over from the previous government, and that has been mentioned previously.

While we endorse this piece of legislation and believe it will do a considerable amount of good in giving regulation to the inflow of red meats from the continent, the truth of the matter is that the amount of ministerial discretions, which is a change from the piece of legislation we introduced, is a change which I think has the potential for some dangerous politics in the beef industry.

I can easily foresee a period of time when we will have a situation, as we are going into an election, and recognizing that by far the majority of Canadians are housed in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver—the large consumer markets—where the government of the day, irrespective of party, may be pressured into trying about food prices, making them cheaper and having ministerial discretion within that act. I think that is an unfortunate fact, because we could have better legislation with better protection for both consumers and producers, with greater security and sense of predictability, had we had a piece of legislation not allowing for that kind of ministerial discretion working towards the short-term benefit, but against the long-term gain for all of Canadians.

I also want to say I believe this piece of legislation will auger very well for us in future years. It will probably become ever-increasingly important as we get into that period of time some 20 or 30 years from now.

In this Parliament, at this time, the great debate in the country is on the constitution and energy. I submit that those issues will not have near the significance of the issues which we will be debating when the century turns. I am convinced that the big debate—not just in this country, but in the world—will be on food production and food distribution.

We have a world situation today where every day 12,000 children under the age of five are dying from starvation, and where four-fifths of our world population suffers from malnutrition. An alarming figure of some 70 million people a year suffer from permanent and irreversible brain damage due to a lack of protein in their diets. Against those awesome figures is the fact that the world's population is increasing at a rate of some 77 million people every year. That is an alarming figure, when you stop to recognize that 77 million people is equivalent to three times the population of Canada. Every year that kind of population figure is added.

The reason I raise this at this time, in respect of a piece of legislation which deals with meat imports, is that, to a large extent meat will be a product that will gravitate back to its production from grasslands, at least to a greater degree than at the present time. I say this because of the fact that a human being can live on two pounds of cereal grain in his diet per day. He can also live on about two pounds of meat per day. However, it takes 18 pounds of grain to produce two pounds of meat. Therefore, with much of the black and good growing soils of the country in the years ahead there will be increasing pressure to move back into cereal production, human beings will be eating cereal foods, and meat will be treated more as a luxury. Because of that situation, this piece of legislation is important now. It will give stability and predictability to the industry. However, it is in the long run that this kind of legislation will have its greater sense of balance.

I noted that my good friend from the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) stated he was somewhat concerned that we live so close to the United States and felt some threat in the fact that it has ten times our population. I only want to say that for our farmers and ranchers, that should auger for nothing but good. As we produce in this country and recognize that we have a market ten times our domestic size that means a potential for holding the price in that area so our farmers and ranchers will be guaranteed some kind of an equitable income, with the provision that we are not opening the flood gates to Australia and New Zealand for the import of beef.

I want to just take a moment to disassociate myself from that. I believe if this legislation is passed, we should feel somewhat comforted that we will not again experience in the beef industry the situation we experienced in 1973 through to 1976, the results of which we are living with today, because the price of producing cattle was almost analogous to the Canadian mint production costs. Most people who have watched how to make a penny in Canada realize that it takes between two and 2.5 cents to produce a penny. That is what happened in the ranching industry from 1973 to 1976 it cost one more to produce an animal than what one was able to get when it was sold. Because of that fact, the farmers sold off large portions of their breeding stock.

Today Canadian consumers are paying a high price because the government of that time had a policy which allowed an inflow of beef to this country. That was very appealing to the consumer at the time but the price the consumer is paying now is the result of mismanagement in an earlier day.

In my constituency there was a cattleman who collected 5,000 signatures on a petition that was tabled in this House. It has taken six years for the legislation requested, in part, in that petition to be introduced. I submit that the cruel experience of those ranchers is now begining to bear fruit.

I should like to commend the legislation and to say if there is any way, now or in the future, we can do away with some of the ministerial discretion in the legislation which is so politically damaging in the long run, then the bill ought to do a great deal of good for both consumers and producers.

I will take my seat now, Mr. Speaker, knowing there are others who want to speak on the bill. I commend the minister for paying close attention to the remarks of my good friend, the hon. member for Medicine Hat, and also for bringing this legislation forward for the benefit of all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I will just speak for a few moments but I want to cover a couple of matters I think should be brought up at this time.

I was interested to hear the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse), from my neighbouring constituency, say that we do not even consume the amount of beef we produce. The question that came to my mind was, why in the world would we need supply-management if we have to import beef in order to meet our own requirements? If that is the case, then obviously we do not need government interference.

I know the minister has been a strong advocate of supply-management in the cattle industry as being the answer to the problem. I want to ask him, just on that score, why we need supply-management since we certainly do not produce enough for our own requirements? In addition to that, I think the minister knows that statistics show we are approaching the point where there will be more civil servants than farmers. Supply-management will reduce the number of producers and will lead to other problems and added production costs. Quotas will have to be bought, as is the case in milk production, so all that will be introduced is another cost. Surely that is not what we need at this time of high interest; the high cost of land, machinery and all other costs that go into cattle production. What we need is efficient producers.

Some 14 to 15 years ago when I was in Poland I heard officials in that country quote reams and reams of statistics. Today, when I heard the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Ostiguy) quote all kinds of figures to show that production is going this way, that way and in all directions, I thought of the situation in Poland now where people stand in line waiting to get maybe half a pound of meat. This is what happens with a supply-management situation. I fail to see why you need any more dramatic illustration than that.

The absolute requirement is to eradicate fluctuations such as took place in the first five weeks of this year when prices were depressed as a result of the importing of fat cattle in from the United States. Perhaps the minister should consider a freight movement policy, since he indicated in his comments he has paid out something like $46 million for hogs this year and estimates that next year he will have to pay out about $140 million. Obviously, under any kind of supply-management program, a certain amount of money is involved. If in the situation we had this year—

Mr. Whelan: There is no supply-management involved.

Mr. Korchinski: Yes, there is, in the sense that the province of Saskatchewan has a program. The minister knows that programs are in place at this particular time.

I suggest to the minister that if he wants to eliminate the effect of the price of cattle coming from the United States, he should put in place a freight assistance program. If the price is depressed by cattle moving into the Montreal or Toronto market from the United States, then certainly we should move our own cattle. We do not have to move live cattle; we could move slaughtered cattle. We should move enough supplies so that even if the price is depressed, it is with our own cattle, and is only temporary. The situation could be controlled by removing the freight assistance. American cattle certainly would not come in if the price was lower or if there was not a buck to be made. This would not interfere with any GATT arrangement and the result would be the same.

We need more people in the production cycle. At the moment, even the grain industry is gearing up for more production and it will soon be in a similar situation. If we do not produce enough for our own requirements we should not put these people out of production. Once they are out, they stay out for a long, long time and many of them will never come back.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to hold this bill from going to committee, so with these few remarks I will sit down. Thank you very much.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being four o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL RESOURCES AND PUBLIC WORKS

MORATORIUM UNTIL REFERENDUM ON DEVELOPMENT IN CANADA OF NUCLEAR POWER

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill) moved that Bill C-248, to establish a moratorium on the continued development of nuclear power in Canada for the purposes of establishing a public inquiry into nuclear power that is followed by a national referendum, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I rise today to speak on Bill C-248, an act which (1) establish a moratorium on the continued development of nuclear power in Canada; (2) set up a public inquiry into the issues raised by nuclear power and (3) require that after this inquiry a national referendum be held to determine whether Canada should proceed with a nuclear future.

● (1600)

I should mention that this is my first private members' bill. I consider it providential in a way that it was selected for debate, even though the debate will be for one hour. The government will talk out the honour so that the bill cannot be voted on or sent to the appropriate standing committee.

Mr. Knowles: Shame.

Mr. Blaikie: It is not possible in just 20 minutes to address the many issues in question which are and should be part of any discussion on nuclear power. Accordingly, I will try today to focus primarily on the process by which we are deciding, or appear to have decided already, that Canada is to proceed with the nuclear future planned for it for so long by the Liberal Party, Atomic Energy of Canada, Ontario Hydro and other long-established actors on the Canadian nuclear stage.

My basic contention is that the process by which we have come as far as we have already toward a nuclear future for Canada is undemocratic. Bureaucrats, technocrats and various other so-called experts from government and the nuclear industry have made decisions which will affect the lives of all Canadians, decisions which in my view should be made openly, politically, after ample informed public discussion of, and reflection upon the implications of various options. This is not the kind of decision making we have had up until now.

The three parts of Bill C-248 are intended to deal with this tragic and perhaps fatal flaw in our collective decision-making process as a nation.

The moratorium is the necessary first step because, without a moratorium, it is difficult to believe any ensuing public debate will be taken seriously by the government or the nuclear industry. It also ensures that time limits for the debate will be taken seriously. The nuclear industry has a vested interest in talking about the issue, as long as it can proceed with its plans while talking. Indeed, it has professional talkers, public relations people who are paid to relate to critics while the industry proceeds as ever. A moratorium would give meaning to debate and represent a significant precedent in the location of burden of proof.

It is not the critics who should have to prove they are right, as long as there is reasonable doubt, as there is in this case. The critics can only be proved right or wrong by time and tragedy. It is the nuclear industry which should have to answer for its claims. The burden of proof should be on them. The situation we are in now is analagous to one in which the blindfolded driver of a car moving down a crowded street complains of unfounded criticism because he has managed not to hit anyone yet.

The public inquiry is a necessary second step because it is only through the instrument of such an inquiry that public consciousness about this issue can be sufficiently raised. My idea of this inquiry is similar to that which actually occurred around the issue of the Mackenzie Valley Pipe Line in 1977, under the auspices of Justice Thomas Berger. His held a travelling inquiry which listened to all sorts of people, raised public consciousness about native land rights and the environmental fragility of northern Canada. He made good recommendations which, unfortunately I must add, have not been respected by this government. But the understanding and perception of the issues which that inquiry facilitated for many Canadians have not disappeared. I want to underline this as we find ourselves debating Bill C-48 in committee, the Canada Lands Act, which will make a mockery of some of the rhetoric we have heard from the government lately about aboriginal rights.

As I was saying, the understanding and perception of the issues which the Mackenzie Valley Pipe Line inquiry facilitated for many Canadians have not disappeared. It exists in the seething anger and disappointment which is building in this country about the way this government is dealing with the North and its people, in spite of its recent abstract conversion to the concept of aboriginal rights, and in its formal but actually meaningless commitment to environmental assessment.

Nothing close to what I am suggesting in the way of a public inquiry into nuclear power has ever been remotely contemplated by recent governments. The federal Progressive Conservative Party would have set up only a parliamentary inquiry, likely force fed by AECL propaganda and not likely to have come up with truly independent conclusions.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Surely the hon. member must be aware that such an inquiry would have Members of Parliament from his party, the Liberal Party and the Progressive Conservative Party, and have available all the expertise inside and outside of government. That was the intention. I thought I should clear that matter up for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I do not withdraw my contention that the decision to set up a parliamentary inquiry into nuclear power by the Progressive Conservative government in 1979 was a way of avoiding the kind of consciousness raising that the public inquiry that I am calling for would have more of a chance of creating.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blaikie: If the members of the Progressive party are feeling particularly sensitive this afternoon, I will acknowledge that at the very least they recognized that this was an issue the Canadian people wanted brought within the parameters of political discussion.

As I was saying before I was so rudely interrupted by members on both sides of the House, the Liberal Party of Canada, which is the nuclear party par excellence, is that party which has presided over the undemocratic and authoritarian imposition of nuclear power in Canada. It is the party of the technocracy, of those fascinated and captivated by the technological capacity of modern man, and who have forgotten that the goal of human life is not technological, but spiritual, in the sense that human life is to be lived in harmony with each other and with creation, first, and not in reckless, arrogant, and prideful disregard for the human future and/or nature.

Instead, all the Liberal government concedes in this matter is that there is an internal departmental inquiry which, as far as I can make out, never comes to any conclusions because it does not really exist. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in answer to a question asked of him on May 1, 1980, a public inquiry would take too long. The viability of the Canadian nuclear industry cannot withstand scrutiny.

A national referendum on the subject is a necessary third step because we have learned only too well that inquiries by themselves can be interpreted away, or just plain ignored. A well and clearly asked set of questions put to Canadians about their energy future and the various options available, nuclear or non-nuclear, after a public process such as the inquiry I have talked about, would do much to clarify not just the nuclear issue but other issues as well. At the moment the parameters of political debate, and I have spoken about this in the House before, are too confined and too narrow.

Issues such as nuclear power have been seen to be technical, managerial or crudely economic, rather than political in the full sense of what it means to be political. This must change for two reasons.

It must change, of course, in order to improve the quality of the decisions made about these issues so they might become decisions taken in the total context. Second, such issues must become political in order to save politics, that eminently human activity without which we lapse into collective unconsciousness and the friendly fascism of a society in which all significant decisions are made by the executive and its managers, the kind of future the Liberal Party has in mind for Canadians.

Politics is the art—not the science, but the art—of building up the polis and of working together on deciding and constituting the good life for all. The health of our political process, the health of democracy and the relevance of our political process are threatened by the number of issues which the process is not allowed or able to address. We are just now on the verge of giving up much of what is left of the political process to the courts. This may be appropriate; I am not so sure. What I do know is that there will not be much left for politics as such because so much has already been unconsciously conceded to the technocrats and to the bureaucracy.

A referendum on nuclear power would be a step in the right direction. Some people are frightened by referendums. This is understandable. Referendums are not the answer to everything, but in my view something is necessary to break the creeping irrelevance of our political system.

I do not hide the fact that I already have a pretty clear position on nuclear power. I believe the risks associated with nuclear power, such as reactor accidents, the effects of low-level radiation, the perils of nuclear proliferation, the environmental and occupational dangers of uranium mining, the problems of long-term radioactive waste disposal and the longevity associated with all these risks, should lead us to regard nuclear power as a special and unique case, and for this reason we should not proceed with it unless we do so consciously and together after the kind of process I have described.

I would not be happy if Canadians chose a nuclear future, but I want them to be able to choose. The forms of energy which we choose to use involve moral choices now more than ever before. Our moral relationship with nature, with the people of the future, with those who presently live on or around energy resources and with those who will work in the energy-producing processes which we set up—all these relationships are at stake here.

There are difficult trade-offs ahead, but we are not at this time in the dilemma we think we are in and which many would have us believe we are in. Too often we operate on the false premise that we must continue to live the highly energy consumptive life we now live and that we can do this by entrusting our lives to the experts. This is both a false sense of what is important in life and a false faith in our ability to come up with a technological fix which does not do more harm than good.

The truth is that we have not really tried conservation. The truth is that we have not really tried to develop renewable energy resources. The truth is that we have not really considered many of the options now before us, the soft energy paths, etc. We have not really tried individually or collectively to rethink our lives in the light of what we know about our ability to pollute and deplete a finite world. Thus, we are now taking many of the risks which we take as a society, not out of necessity and not because our backs are to the wall, but for no other reason than our own convenience and our own reluctance to drive smaller cars or to do whatever combination of things would be necessary to give, in a real way, the conserver society, as some people have called it, a try.

We are not faced with freezing in the dark. If we had tried all these other routes and still we faced energy shortages, then maybe we would need to contemplate nuclear power, but we have not done this.

I believe what we do about nuclear power will be powerfully symbolic for the western world. I speak here not just in the context of Canada but in the context of the western industrialized world. Not going ahead or stopping nuclear power at its present stage of growth will indicate that we are prepared, as a civilization, to repent of our headlong drive toward increasingly meaningless consumption—

Mr. Siddon: Hands folded.

Mr. Blaikie: —at the expense of the future, nature, and those parts of the world which we keep as our economic hinterland at the point of a gun.

Mr. Siddon: What are you going to burn, leaves?

Mr. Blaikie: I notice that the party which is so self-righteous and exuberant about getting God into the Constitution is becoming giddy at the language of repentance. I notice that the language of repentance bothers the same party which is concerned about God. Perhaps the people of Canada should take notice of that.

Going ahead with nuclear power will mean that we have given up on ourselves, given up on our ability to reshape the human community instead of continuing to bend heaven and earth to the false priorities of industrial civilization.

Mr. Kempling: Down on your knees.

Mr. Blaikie: Many in my party feel the same way as I do. Accordingly, we regret that the government of Saskatchewan has chosen to embrace so actively the mining of uranium in northern Saskatchewan. In the well-intentioned passion for creating wealth which may be used for the benefit of all the people of Saskatchewan they have made a Faustian bargain which, if it is not soon cancelled, will cost them their souls. But at least they have souls to lose. Others proceed with no pangs of conscience whatever. Nevertheless, I mentioned Saskatchewan so as not to appear naive or self-righteous in any partisan sense. I do believe, however that it is only within a truly democratic socialist economy that the environment can be protected and people done justice. Because justice and survival, in the final analysis, can go together, we do not have to pick between justice and survival, and it is to the posing of these kinds of questions to an informed Canadian public that this bill is dedicated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in the discussion today of nuclear matters I want to say a word first about the success of the development of the Candu reactor here in Canada. It has been a remarkable technological achievement on the part of Canadian scientists, engineers and industry. Indeed, by 1979, nuclear reactors were generating one-third of the electricity here in the Province of Ontario, with a total value of something over $1 billion. I cite that as an indication of the success of the Candu reactor, a largely indigenous system for generating electricity which makes use of abundant Canadian resources and is a unique Canadian technology.

Second, of course, the Candu reactor is economically competitive with coal-fired generation in large parts of the country, especially east of Manitoba.

Third, the technical performance of the Candu reactor has been outstanding. For example, statistics show that four Candu reactors were more reliable than any of the 110 large power reactors in the world today. In terms of lifetime gross operating factors, six of the world's top seven reactors in 1979 were Candu units operated by Ontario Hydro.

The bill before us today would eliminate exports of nuclear plants. If Canada were to adopt such a position and if other supplier countries were to follow our lead, we would be forcing on the rest of the world our judgment that they do not need nuclear technology. Many countries are facing rapidly worsening economic conditions because of the high cost of oil. Many of them simply do not have hydro electricity or coal as a viable option, and many of them are desperately short of the energy they need to raise their living standards to levels we would consider to be minimally acceptable.

● (1620)

It is true that many such countries have too small an electrical system to be able to use nuclear power, but if we refuse to sell to those who can use it we allow the world pressures on available oil supplies to increase and to make those supplies less available and more costly to countries with no other intermediate term energy options. Denying a country the energy sources it perceives it needs is not a step toward encouraging world peace. It is prudent to be careful in selecting which countries we shall sell to, assuring ourselves that they have only peaceful motives. It is not prudent to refuse to export one of the superior energy options in the world today to any foreign country under any conditions.

At home, export sales complement our domestic nuclear program. They permit economies of scale and the spreading of research and development and other overhead costs over a large number of units. They offer an opportunity to earn foreign exchange and make profits for our domestic firms. They also provide important experience in the management of international mega projects based on Canadian technology. Finally, of course, the demonstration effect from our Candu reactor sales can enhance Canada's broader ability to sell other high technology exports.

I am very pleased to have had the opportunity in recent months to participate in our sales efforts in both Yugoslavia and Mexico, two countries which are among those actively considering Candu reactors in their future energy programs. Korea is a satisfied customer already and is actively discussing with Atomic Energy of Canada the possibility of additional unit purchases. Romania has recently purchased a Candu reactor which is now under construction. During my recent visit to Romania, I found every indication that the Romanian government will pursue its intention to acquire a total of four Candu reactors in the time ahead.

The hon. member in raising the subject of nuclear energy today, and in proposing a moratorium on the further development of the industry, has referred in passing to concerns which he evidently has about certain aspects of safety and health regarding the generation of nuclear energy. He referred in particular to a question of uranium mining and the disposal of low level radioactive waste. In that regard and, indeed, with regard to other aspects of safety and health concerns, Canada's record is exemplary. I want to take a moment to touch on some aspects of those questions which are of some technical complexity but which are of great importance to the government of Canada and to provincial governments.

With reference to the disposal of low level radioactive waste, the bulk of the hundred million tonnes of uranium tailings disposed of today are safely isolated so that the environmental guidelines imposed by provincial governments and the Atomic Energy Control Board are met. The pollution abatement equipment installed in all operating mines prevents these systems from presenting any significant risk. The long-term problem is to replace the present control systems with passive systems or to dispose of the tailings safely.

In that connection, I am pleased to report that the Canada Centre for Mineral and Energy Technology has formed a group called the national technical planning group on uranium tailings research. The group includes representatives of the mining companies the federal and provincial government regulatory agencies, research groups, universities and consultants. This group is now in the final review stage of its report which will review present activities and sources of funding, propose a research program schedule, and propose a program management structure. The report is expected to provide the information necessary for the federal government to embark upon an expanded research and development program.

The hon. member opposite also referred in his statement to the question of reactor safety. I want to point out that the Candu reactor has an excellent safety record. It has less over-all impact on the environment than fossil-fuelled stations and hydro dams.

In that regard, I want to say a few words about nuclear reactors and safety. How safe is the Candu reactor is a question that is sometimes asked. The record of the Candu reactor has been, over all, one of outstanding achievement. In the 30 years since Canada's first major nuclear research reactor began operation, no member of the public has suffered any injury from a nuclear reactor accident, not one person has lost working time through radiation injury in our nuclear stations, a record which cannot be matched by those of other energy industries. This is not to say, of course, there are no risks associated with nuclear power. As with all other industrial processes, risks do exist but major efforts have been made to quantify and to ensure that appreciably lower risks than society accepts from other energy sources exist in the nuclear industry.

The greatest risk associated with nuclear plants is the uncontrolled release of radioactivity. The radiation from the normal operation of nuclear power plants is only a very small fraction of the natural and man made radiation to which we are continuously exposed from various sources, such as cosmic rays, medical and dental X-rays, jet flights, colour television, and fallout from atmospheric weapons testing. To prevent the release of radioactivity beyond acceptable levels is a major goal of reactor designers and operators. A series of barriers has been designed into the Candu reactor to prevent unplanned releases. These barriers range from the sheaths surrounding the fuel pellets to the massive airtight containment building around the reactor, which is surrounded in turn by an enclosure zone extending for one kilometre around the reactor. These barriers are in turn backed up by separate safety systems whose sole purpose is to handle accidents, such as shutdown systems and the emergency core cooling system.

Since the first nuclear reactors were designed, scientists and engineers have studied a wide range of hypothetical accidents so as to give increasing protection to the public. Indeed, the excellent safety record of Candu is both the result and testimony of the care with which these stations have been designed, licensed, constructed and operated. In all these areas, safety requirements are a dominant factor and the protection of the public from radiation hazards is a major consideration.

Another question which is sometimes asked, to which the hon. member referred today, is how we dispose of spent fuel. As members of the House may now be aware, Canada already has a well established research and development program regarding the technologies needed for the safe and permanent disposal of our nuclear fuel wastes. As has frequently been explained, underground disposal in stable geological formations will effectively isolate the fuel wastes. The initial stages of the program have been designed to test, through laboratory and field research, the viability of this concept.

While Atomic Energy of Canada has prime responsibility for the program, several departments and agencies of the governments of Canada and of Ontario also participate, along with industry and the university community. The over-all objective of the Canadian program is to ensure that there will be no significant effect upon man and upon the environment at any time. The deep underground disposal method has been approved by many world scientists and engineers as the most suitable way to achieve our objective.

Therefore, work in Canada is concentrated on disposal in the stable, hard rock formations of the Canadian shield. The formations being investigated, known as plutons, are scattered across the Ontario portion of the shield. Studies of the geological characteristics and of the behaviour of immobilized wastes will contribute to a generic safety and environmental assessment of the disposal concept to be presented to regulatory authorities.

Only after this process has been completed will technically suitable sites be selected for disposal. The site selection phase will take account of economic factors, community impact, health and safety considerations, and environmental effects on each potential technically suitable site. The factors will be discussed with any communities near the sites and elected representatives of these communities.

There is no question that public knowledge, understanding and acceptance, are important to the success of this program. A full public information effort is now in effect over virtually all the Canadian shield region of Ontario and at the Whiteshell Nuclear Research Establishment in Manitoba, where an underground research laboratory is being built as part of the concept assessment stage. Exhibits, films, briefings for the media and for elected representatives of communities near which work is being done and mailings to householders, have all been planned or conducted to provide the general public with information.

Over the past year, scientists involved in the waste management program have made many in-depth presentations to municipal councils, associations and other groups. Accordingly, every effort is being made to reach out to the larger public, in an attempt to inform a wider range of people about the work which is being done in Canada, to answer the question of nuclear spent fuel disposal. The research can be pursued to the point where the basic concept is adequately assessed and justified and a long-range solution to the problem of nuclear waste disposal can be demonstrated as safe and permanent.

I think I have demonstrated, with respect to any concerns the hon. member may have regarding uranium mining, reactor safety and spent fuel disposal, that the federal government is moving vigorously to eliminate any potential risks. There will be no moratorium on our desire to maximize the benefits the CANDU reactor brings to our trading efforts, our industrial strategy, and our ability to provide Canadians with an assured and inexpensive energy source. There will be no moratorium on our desire, held with equal commitment, to protect Canadians from any health hazards.

The hon. member opposite proposed a three-year moratorium in the nuclear industry. He should realize that such a moratorium would kill the industry well before his public inquiry ever reported. Presumably he is advocating the closure of the uranium industry across Canada, including Saskatchewan, as well as the manufacturing industry which is currently at an important juncture in its development. If the industry were unable to survive a moratorium, the uranium industry and the Candu option would be lost just when we may need it most. Would the hon. member prefer the importation of inferior and less safe United States reactors? Would he prefer that we attempt to reassemble the industry when required to do so, at considerable expense and difficulty? If he is concerned about employment, innovative high technology industry and exports, I ask the hon. member to rconsider the wisdom of placing the Candu option in abeyance while our competitors are free to pursue sales worldwide.

A public inquiry may be an effective instrument of public information and may contribute to policy formation and decision making. However, public inquiries may also serve as delaying tactics for governments to avoid their responsibilities. There have been a large number of public inquiries into nuclear power in Canada in recent years. Their proceedings and reports have contributed to the information and analyses available to the public.

I should like to cite one or two examples. The Ontario Royal Commission on Electric Power Planning and the Porter commission actively considered many aspects of the nuclear industry. In Saskatchewan, the Bayda commission on Uranium Mining reported on the beneficial impact and assessed the opportunities for that industry in Saskatchewan. The Federal Environmental Assessment and Review Process reported on four different locations for a new uranium refinery. The Ontario Provincial Environmental Assessment Board reported on expansion of uranium mining at Elliot Lake. The Ontario Select Committee on Hydro Affairs investigated a number of aspects of the nuclear industry. In British Columbia, the Bates commission conducted an investigation of the implications of uranium mining in British Columbia. Its mandate was terminated some time ago by the British Columbia government.

At the federal level, a number of parliamentary committees have looked into different aspects of nuclear power and, no doubt, will continue to do so. Parliament devotes considerable time to nuclear issues.

The government takes the position that further formal public discussion of nuclear power issues is unlikely to improve the quality of decisions on this issue and that Parliament, with its committees, is a sufficient forum in which to discuss these issues at the federal level. The government will provide any additional fora in which to do so.

The government has been conducting a review of the nuclear industry in Canada, as the hon. member mentioned. A number of background papers on all aspects of the nuclear fuel cycle have been prepared and will soon be made available to the public on completion of their translations. We hope these will contribute substantially to a well-informed public discussion of all aspects of nuclear energy generations.

There are many important reasons to believe that nuclear power has an important role to play in Canada's future. This is not the time to restrict or limit our energy options.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak this afternoon in the few remaining minutes on the proposed moratorium, the proposed public inquiry, and the proposed referendum put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie).

I think Mr. Speaker will find some of my comments rather repetitive of those of the parliamentary secretary. It is not very often I agree with the hon. gentleman, but I think the force of his logic this afternoon has me convinced of the argument put forward by the government.

The views of the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill are demonstrative of what one might call the red flag mentality of the NDP. In the early part of this century when automobiles were first seen on the roads, it was prescribed that somebody should walk in front of automobiles with a red flag to warn people of what was coming. Automobiles were deemed to the very dangerous; in fact they are. Nobody would say they are not, but society has learned to live with them and with the new developments in transportation, as they will surely learn to live with new developments in the energy field. I would submit that the mentality displayed by my colleague to the left in respect of the energy field is just as outdated and belongs just as much to the horse and buggy days as the rest of his party's political philosophy.

Let us examine the Canadian nuclear industry. I think it is something we can be proud of in Canada. In this country we have all aspects of that industry, starting with the prospector looking for uranium in the field to the mining industry which started at the Port Radium mine in the constituency I am so proud to represent. We now have uranium mines in Ontario, in the Blind River area. There are new mines in Saskatchewan. This is a very healthy segment of the Canadian minerals industry. There is processing and upgrading in Canada, for example the Port Hope Uranium refinery. We have technical expertise in that particular field. Of course, we also have the construction field. Of course, we also have the construction and operation of nuclear power plants. I understand a trip has been arranged to visit the Chalk River plant on Monday next, to which I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill has been invited.

Mr. Kempling: He will not go.

Mr. Nickerson: I do not think he will go I do not think he wants to know what the facts of the case are. Many of us who are interested in determining the facts and finding them out for ourselves will be availing ourselves of the opportunity to go and see these plants which have been safely in operation for many years.

Mr. Blaikie: I have been through Pinawa, Pickering, through them all.

Mr. Nickerson: We also have expertise in the area of non-energy use of uranium in Canada. For instance, I understand that a good deal of our uranium is used in the aviation industry. Several hundred pounds of uranium is used as counterweight in large jets. Uranium is also used for shielding against radio-activity. This is another field in which we have developed technology in Canada.

Certain areas of this country, Ontario in particular, has bet its energy future on uranium and the nuclear generation of electricity. In provinces like Ontario, where there is limited coal, and even less oil and gas, where most of the hydro potential has been utilized, the uranium alternative must be used for a reasonably priced source of electricity. There are other places in the world, such as Scotland, which immediately comes to mind, where at the present time some 25 to 30 per cent of their electricity is generated by nuclear means.

The parliamentary secretary stressed the importance of the nuclear industry to Canada's exports. We can be proud of the Candu reactor which we market all over the world. In exporting that reactor and in guaranteeing sources of natural uranium for it, we are doing not only ourselves a benefit but the countries which buy from us this particular plant and the fuel needed to operate it.

Having said that, again in many ways I am reiterating what was said by the parliamentary secretary, there are obvious areas of research which should be undertaken and, in fact, are being undertaken. Mining techniques is one of those area. How do we make the mining of uranium as safe as possible? There are dangers associated with the emission of radon daughters in uranium mines and we want to, if not eliminate it completely, since mining will always be a hazardous occupation, at least reduce it as much as possible. In all probability we need more studies into the disposal of radioactive mine tailings.

As I understand the situation, the raw ore contains impurities which are more highly radioactive than the uranium mineral itself. When these are extracted they can be a source of trouble. We need to look into this problem more closely. This is being done. Most of the mining companies in the field take their responsibilities seriously. We need to look more efficient generation techniques and safer designs of nuclear reactors. Candu is a heavy water cooled plant which uses natural uranium. It seems to be one of the best plants available now. It is continuously being modified and upgraded. But the time will come when we might have to go to another system. Many years in the future the type of Candu reactor we have now might become completely obsolete and we will have to go to nuclear fusion techniques. I hope research into that field of endeavour is being undertaken in Canada as it is being undertaken in other countries in the world.

We must look into the question of nuclear waste management, both the disposal of it and the reprocessing of it, to get the utmost value from the ores and metals produced in Canada. As I understand it, reprocessing is an expensive proposition and is not undertaken in this country at the present time. That does not mean to say we cannot look forward to the day when we will be able to undertake reprocessing in Canada.

The parliamentary secretary briefly addressed the question of nuclear waste disposal and the various methods which might be adopted to safely dispose of nuclear waste in the long term. He mentioned particularly underground burial in areas of stable rock and granitic plutons in the Canadian shield. He referred to the work that has been done close to Whiteshell in Manitoba in this respect. If I have any criticism it would probably be that insufficient finances have been made available to the underground laboratories in that area. If the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) is listening perhaps she could put that on her list of priorities for additional funding. I know she has a great many areas which quite deservedly should be priorities on her list and it must be very difficult for her to priorize them.

The safety of the industry has been demonstrated. In his presentation the parliamentary secretary said he knew of no one who had ever been adversely affected by the operation of a nuclear power plant. If we look at the accident statistics in the nuclear industry, as compared with other forms of energy generating industries, we will find they are comparable and in a good many cases probably the number and severity of accidents are less in the nuclear industry for instance than in the generation of electricity by the use of coal.

In total, the generation of electricity by the use of uranium probably is safer than the generation of electricity by the use of coal. He referred to the general levels of radiation, the radiation to which all people are subject; natural radiation and cosmic radiation. One he did not mention was the application of fertilizers to farmers' field, potash, for instance, which to a limited extent is radio-active. It is spread over a large area and eventually finds its way into waterways. Radioactivity brought about by the application of fertilizers to the arable land of this country, in total, is much greater than radiation caused by the mining and utilization of uranium.

Finally, I want to look at the proposal for a moratorium which is before us—a public inquiry to be followed by a referendum. I wonder if the hon. member who proposed this has really thought about the effect a moratorium would have on the existing industry in Canada. What would it do to the people on the exploration side of the industry. What would it do to the people who work in the uranium mines in Saskatchewan, Ontario and in other provinces in Canada who would suddenly find themselves out of work? What would it do to the electricity supply? What would it do to our export markets? We would be making a dreadful mistake if we were to follow the recommendation of the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill. I think we have just about had a stomach full of public inquiries into the uranium industry. We have had them in Saskatchewan and we have had them in British Columbia. We have had any amount of them. That is not to say that some good did not come out of them. There were some good recommendations made in Saskatchewan.

• (1650)

Only recently, the legislature of the Northwest Territories publicly debated this matter in Committee of the Whole. They heard various experts. They did not go so far as to suggest a moratorium, but the exercise was useful in that experts in the field were able to present their views, and members of the general public were able to find out the various viewpoints and come to their own conclusions. However, I think we have already had enough inquiries into this. We know what we must do. The matter has just about been studied to death.

In so doing we have found out the areas in which further research is required. These have been identified, and what we probably want now is both private funding—I am always in favour of private funding, because that does not cost the public purse anything—and maybe even some public funding into these areas of concern and research which have already been identified.

With respect to the proposed referendum, I do not really want to say anything more. Ideas of referendum have been debated ad infinitum. They have been debated to death in this House over the last few weeks. However, probably the most sensible ideas on referenda expressed recently in the last few weeks were those expressed only the other day by the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen). Instead of repeating what he said, I would advise hon. members who are interested to look at Hansard and find out what the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton said on this matter.

Mr. Knowles: He's our Edmund Burke.

Mr. Nickerson: In conclusion, I would submit that the decision as to whether we are to proceed into the nuclear age has already been made.

An hon. Member: That's the point.

Mr. Nickerson: What the hon. member is trying to do now is engage in a last effort in futility. I think it would be wrong and disastrous to the Canadian economy and disastrous to the Canadian future.

What we should do, as Canadians, is go ahead to the nuclear age with confidence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I expect most people would agree that we should indeed go slow on nuclear until we have solved waste problems. The importance of dealing with management, storage and ultimate disposal of used nuclear fuel is an issue which concerns many thoughtful people, and this is recognized in the National Energy Program which includes a statement, and I quote:

> If we make the right decisions today about all of our energy opportunities, we can move quickly off world oil, while still giving ourselves the time to analyse with care such issues as the technology needed to ensure the safe disposal of nuclear wastes, and the longer-term benefits and costs of the nuclear fuel cycle—

Against the risks of nuclear must also be balanced the risks in our time of not going nuclear, the risks of closing off our options prematurely. These risks are social, economic, health and environmental.

In 1976, when the United Nations held its conference on human settlements in Vancouver we saw, very dramatically, the two sides of this debate. There were calls for a moratorium on the spread of nuclear energy at a conference, where the main concerns were the starvation, death and the dreadful conditions of life in underdeveloped countries. No one can be unaware of what is involved in looking after the world's four billion people, a population which will escalate in three decades to eight billion. The struggle in the developing countries is harsh. Food shortages and higher prices for oil and commodities are presenting people with almost intolerable conditions of living.

Following Habitat, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was asked what he thought about the calls for a moratorium on nuclear energy. I will read part of his reply:

> We have this high technology in an era where many of the less developed countries are starved for energy, they need it not for explosive purposes; they need it in order to improve their standard of living; they need it for medical purposes, for agricultural purposes; they need it to reach some degree, some minimum degree of habitable environment, and we're sitting on this technology. We could say, well, . . . we don't share it because the dangers of proliferation are too great . . . It's too risky for you . . . We can trust ourselves . . . not to abuse this technology but we can't trust you so we won't teach you how to use it.

That is something for those who call for a moratorium to consider. The developed nations have a moral obligation to assist energy-poor nations to develop alternatives to oil. This conclusion was arrived at during the Venice Summit in June, 1980. I will quote from the declaration:

> We underline the vital contribution of nuclear power to a more secure energy supply. The role of nuclear energy has to be increased if world energy needs are to be met. We shall, therefore, have to expand our nuclear generating capacity. We will continue to give the highest priority to ensuring the health and safety of the public and to perfecting methods of dealing with spent fuels and disposal of nuclear waste. We reaffirm the importance of ensuring the reliable supply of nuclear fuel and minimizing the risk of nuclear proliferation.

That was from the declaration following the Venice Summit in June, 1980, a declaration which was arrived at following a very extensive discussion of the obligations of developed countries.

"The Health Hazards of Not Going Nuclear" is the title of an American publication which was borrowed by a Canadian scientist who, in an address last year, quoted some figures about the possibilities which would flow from our not going nuclear from, for example, an increased use of coal. Professor Yaffe pointed out that:

> In the last 80 years 30,000 coal miners in Pennsylvania alone have been killed in coal mine accidents. In Appalachia 57,000 coal miners suffer from black-lung disease.

He also gave some figures about the effect on the environment and the possible increase in acid rain if we were to neglect our nuclear technology in favour of existing technology, such as more use of coal.

To a very large extent, the debate about nuclear power is a debate about the nature of risk, about how we evaluate risk, how open the discussion is and how best to make these decisions which will affect not only us, but also future generations.

DUMPING OF CHEMICAL WASTES INTO NIAGARA RIVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of most urgent and pressing necessity. It is reported that SCA Chemical Waste Services will begin dumping treated chemical wastes into the Niagara River this month. The people of Niagara have conducted a mock funeral and have declared dead this once mighty river. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That in these days of upset wins and surprise moves the government even yet at this late time take action to prevent this proposed dumping, in compliance with the International Joint Commission's recommendation that governments prevent any additional discharges into the river, and in compliance with the Prime Minister's commitment to the people of Niagara.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE PRIME MINISTER

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise to exercise my right under Standing Order 43 and to add a footnote to the contemptible and quite irrational remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on fascism, which he chose to make outside this House. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That Canadians be alerted to the fact that the Prime Minister sees Fascism here;
Fascism there;
Fascism everywhere
But it's in his own chair!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TREATMENT OF EAST COAST FISHERMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, last week the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) closed the spring herring season on the east coast before it was opened. Now the government is going to gut any of the fishermen who might have weathered that storm by socking it to them via their income tax. I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the House instruct the government to call off its ton-ton bullies in the Department of National Revenue and let the east coast fishermen go about their business of being honest and hard-working Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

COMMERCIAL FISHING REGULATIONS ON WEST COAST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On Wednesday the B.C. Salmon fishing season will open without the proclamation of proposed regulations concerning two-area trolling. The government's hesitancy in legitimizing its policy proposals and press announcements is a result of fisheries department confusion and uncertainty and a sign that political rather than conservation considerations are foremost in the minds of ministry decision-makers. I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That the department curtail all major changes in commercial fishing regulations until the Pearse commission of inquiry has had the opportunity to hear the B.C. fishing industry's concerns and proposals and has reported back to the government and consultations with fishermen have followed so that a comprehensive management plan can replace the present ad hoc policy formation which is destroying the opportunity to make a living in the B.C. fishing industry.

COMPENSATION TO FARMERS FOR EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to grain farmers in Canada who have waited eight months to be paid compensation for the embargo on grain to the U.S.S.R. In light of the conflicting statements made by members of the government, namely, the statement made last Thursday by the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board that he could not in a definitive way say when such payments would be made and how, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) reporting on April 1 that compensation payments will be made within one week, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That the government end the anxiety of whether such payments will be made and how much producers will be paid and stop punishing the farmers of Canada for national policy that the government supported by immediately announcing adequate compensation payments for farmers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM—EXTENSION OF APPLICATION DEADLINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the herd maintenance program has now been extended to include a further 470 townships, and whereas many producers in those townships did not apply for herd maintenance assistance under the original program because of the government's original error in approving townships, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight):

That those producers within the extended townships be allowed additional time to submit their applications for herd maintenance.

THE CENSUS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) just released the lists of census commissioners for the 1981 Canadian census. In view of the fact that every Liberal Member of Parliament was requested to submit lists of potential commissioners, but all other members, representing 134 ridings in Parliament—soon to be 136—were not asked for their recommendations, and because the lists contain nothing but old Grits, many defeated candidates, their wives, their campaign managers, presidents of Liberal associations and are not necessarily Canadians who are qualified and need the employment or the $4,350 of the taxpayers' money each will obtain, under Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That the Minister of Supply and Services rescind the appointments which are blatant patronage and conduct a proper search for census commissioners taking into account ability to do the job and need of employment.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

PROPOSED LOCATION OF RADIOACTIVE WASTE DUMP AT SCARBOROUGH, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43. Whereas the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) has said he would be prepared to move his offices over to the contaminated environment of Les Terrasses de la Chaudière, and whereas there has been a proposal that there be a temporary radioactive waste dump in Scarborough as an ad hoc response to one more nuclear embarrassment visited on the people of Canada by AECL and unprepared governments, a response which has not been criticized by the minister, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House instruct the minister to show the same solidarity with his constituents as he seems prepared to show with federal government employees and consider moving his home next to, or on to the proposed dump site.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

IMPERIAL OIL PROJECT AT COLD LAKE, ALTA.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the continuous pressure being applied to the Government of Canada by Imperial Oil Limited which is threatening to mothball its Cold Lake project, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall):

That this House condemns such blackmail by Canada's largest foreign-owned multinational oil company.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

COST OF SERVICE TO PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing importance under Standing Order 43. Whereas, when the federal government first conceived the idea of using the RCMP for provincial and municipal purposes, attractive financial agreements were offered and some provincial governments and municipal councils therefore disbanded their own police forces, and it is now very unfair to propose substantial increases for this service when there is no alternative readily available, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That this House urges the Solicitor General to offer the provincial governments and municipalities a new agreement containing only a modest increase as this arrangement does provide a federal "eye" throughout Canada for the federal government.

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN TREASURY BOARD AND VETERINARY INSPECTORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Now that negotiations between Treasury Board and the government's veterinary inspectors have resumed again to try to reach agreement on salaries and inequitable working conditions, and to avert a possible national strike which would result in the loss of millions of dollars to our economy and export trade, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling):

That the Treasury Board negotiators take their responsibilities more seriously than they have up to now, and not unilaterally break off negotiations as they did on March 24, losing more than two weeks in valuable negotiation time which could have been fruitfully used, and which would have offset much of the sporadic time off taken by inspectors, and the unnecessary disruptions and loss of income to our livestock industry and the meat packing industry in Canada.

SUPPLEMENTARY SOCIAL FUNDING FOR JAMES BAY CREE COMMUNITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the appalling health, housing and sanitation conditions which the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) saw in his whirlwind tour of Cree communities in the James Bay area; in view of the fact that the James Bay and Northern Quebec agreement was signed over five years ago, with the intent of helping these communities develop decent facilities; and in view of last year's epidemic of gastroenteritis which took the lives of several children, and the possibility of another outbreak this year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the minister not wait two months until the completion of the bureaucratic review, but act now, on the basis of what he has seen with his own eyes, and secure supplementary funds to bring health, housing and sanitation conditions to a safe level.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

RESULTS OF CANADA-UNITED STATES MINISTERIAL DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who assured us that he would be in his seat at this time, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. After many months of studies, consultations, meetings, discussions, negotiations and so forth regarding the ailing automobile industry, which in Ontario alone provides one out of every six jobs, can the minister tell us what firm and specific agreements and decisions were reached during the meetings of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with his counterparts in Washington last week, agreements and decisions beneficial to the future of the Canadian industry? May I add that I have a great concern for the future of that industry.

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the concern of the hon. member but I would suggest it is inaccurate to say that nothing has been done for the auto industry in Canada. Along with all his colleagues in the House the hon. member has been made aware of the efforts made by both the Canadian and the American governments to help Chrysler Corporation; he is aware as well of the agreements which are under negotiation between American Motors and a European car manufacturer, and of a certain increase in employment at Ford Canada. However, I cannot speak of a definitive agreement which was allegedly concluded Friday in Washington because I was not a party to those discussions.

[English]

APPEAL FOR RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, despite the minister's remarks which did not answer the specific question about the meetings in Washington, the counterpart of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. Malcolm Baldridge of the United States, is quoted in Washington as saying that no agreements or decisions whatsoever were reached as a result of last week's meetings. That was my initial question.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said in Washington last week:

We're not talking about joint decisions . . . (with the U.S.)—we're talking about making our own decisions—

This is something for which we have been pushing for so long. As the minister knows, just ten days ago the Canadian Motor Vehicle Manufacturers Association, the Automotive Parts Manufacturers Association, UAW and others appealed for restrictions on imports, especially from Japan, imports which, by the way, increased by a whopping 94 per cent over last year. Could the minister now stop pussyfooting around and tell us in his own words what is his government's decision in this regard, before Canada becomes the North American dumping ground for automotive imports?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I just said at the end of my previous remarks that I was unable to tell the hon. member anything about the outcome or the decisions taken at the meeting in Washington because I was not there myself. I should think that that was the only answer I could give to the first question.

As to the second question, the hon. member knows that a Canadian delegation is now in Japan to discuss the issue of growing exports of Japanese cars to Canada. We are extremely concerned over this problem which grows worse as months go by, but it would be premature to voice an opinion before reading the report we will get from the delegation.

FUTURE OF CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance, since it is obvious that neither the Minister of State nor the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is able to make any decisions whatsoever regarding the auto industry, except to create more discussions. Therefore, since the Prime Minister himself told me last month that the U.S.-Canada auto pact was a high priority issue, I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister at what point the government as a whole would consider the state of the auto industry in this country to be critical enough to take the necessary action, much of which has been recommended by members of this party and other interest groups across Canada? It should be kept in mind that a $3 billion to $4 billion annual deficit is being experienced by the Canadian auto industry.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's question I should tell him that the matter of the automobile industry is considered frequently by the government. As decisions are taken they will be announced to the House.

EXPORT OF PARTS TO EUROPEAN AND JAPANESE CAR MANUFACTURERS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce I will direct my question to the acting minister. The minister has had discussions with his American counterpart on the auto pact and he will know that 70 per cent of the auto parts manufacturers in Canada are American subsidiaries which build to order for their U.S. parents. Did the minister discuss how these subsidiaries could become involved in the export of parts to European and Japanese auto manufacturers? Can he tell us whether the subsidiaries will be pursuing export orders directly into the European and Japanese markets?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that it has always been the policy of the government, every time a foreign company starts a subsidiary in Canada, to try to convince foreign investors to develop in Canada a new product for the world market. The same philosophy applies to the auto parts industry but, as I said in reply to the hon. member who spoke before him, I cannot disclose in detail the talks that went on in Washington since I was not involved in them. However, I would gladly convey the hon. member's question to the Minister for Industry, Trade and Commerce.

[English]

DISCUSSIONS WITH EUROPEAN AND JAPANESE MANUFACTURERS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The minister knows that many American auto parts manufacturers in Canada have no Canadian domestic or export sales force and carry out all export functions through their U.S. head office. What discussions has the minister had with the Japanese and European manufacturers regarding the sourcing of auto parts in Canada for their world production? Can he tell us how he would separate U.S. and Canadian parts production under such circumstances?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I would be happy to inquire of my colleague about this very important issue. My colleague or myself could then report back to the hon. member.

INCOME TAX

TREATMENT OF FISHERMEN BY DEPARTMENTAL AUDITORS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. As he knows, his officials have singled out Canadian fishermen, who are among the most lowly paid in the country, for auditing this year for tax purposes. Could the minister tell us why fishermen were singled out instead of such highly paid groups as doctors, lawyers, and dentists, whose incomes are well in excess of $45,000 a year? While he is answering that question, could he tell the House why his officials are using what can only be described as bully boy tactics on the fishermen in the process of performing this audit?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, first, it is not fair to say that only fishermen are being singled out. The fishing industry is being audited, as are other industries. For example, the pharmaceutical industry is being audited this year as well. We have a limited audit capacity and we try to spread that audit capacity as fairly as we can among the industries where we see the need. That is the first point.

• (1425)

The second point I want to make is that it is because of the policies of this government, and particularly of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, that the fishermen's incomes are now up to the point where they are self-supporting individuals in this country. I would like to make that point to the hon. member.

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, the fishermen's incomes may be up, but they are about one fifth or one sixth of what doctors, lawyers and other high paid groups earn.

Mr. Crosbie: Politicians!

An hon. Member: NDP party leaders!

TACTICS USED BY AUDITORS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): I would like to deal specifically with harassing tactics. No one wants preferential treatment for the fishermen any more than any other group, but one wants some fairness. Considering such tactics as the following are being used—threats to seize assets, inconsistent application of tax rules among fishermen, and arbitrary pay-back demands which have been forcing many fishermen to decide they have to go out of the fishing business entirely—will the minister assure the House that he will have his officials investigate these abuses and put an end to them?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I want to give that assurance. I do not intend to tolerate harassment where I find it. I thoroughly agree with the hon. member that there should be equity and fairness in the application of the law. Fishermen are no different, in that sense, than any other people in this country. I intend to see that the law is applied with fairness. With regard to an arbitrary pay-back, we do try to come to an accommodation with the individual, depending on his ability to pay. In that way there is a certain amount of arbitrariness, in the sense that it is based on the ability of the individual to pay off what is owing. But generally speaking, the law must be applied with fairness and equity, and I intend to see that that is done.

Mr. Crosbie: Fascist tactics!

REQUEST FOR AUDIT OF HIGH INCOME NON TAXPAYING INDIVIDUALS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): I am pleased to see that the minister will stop the harassment, but he has just referred to fairness and equity. The average fisherman's income is in the neighbourhood of $12,000. Considering that in Canada today there are more than 2,000 Canadians whose incomes are in excess of $50,000 a year who pay not one penny in income tax, will the minister undertake to audit their returns?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, it is important to note that the industry is being audited, and there is not simply an audit of fishermen. There is an audit of the industry, and the companies are being audited as well. However, I do give the undertaking, as I did before, that the law certainly must be applied with fairness and equity, and we do not intend to single out those in the low income brackets.

TIMING OF AUDIT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Revenue if he can tell the House whether he consulted with his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, before he approved that audit in the late spring of last year? Furthermore, can he tell the House why he authorized the audit to take place in the fishing industry and the 35,000 fishermen of eastern Canada at a time when they had just come through a bad year of bad markets and low returns?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the planning for this audit was begun under the previous administration and was in motion at the time that I took office.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bossy: St. Stephens strikes back!

Mr. Rompkey: I am not saying that the thing was fully in gear by the time I took office, but certainly the groundwork for it was laid and the planning was done, and it was ready to go when I took office.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): No, it wasn't. No, sir.

Mr. Rompkey: I want to make the point again that there is no singling out of industries except in the sense that the audit capacity is limited, and we do try to apply it to various industries in any one year. I appreciate the point the hon. member makes with regard to the seasonality and the unpredictability of the fishing industry.

AUDIT OF FACILITIES USED BY FISHERMEN

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): The minister can try to squirm out of it all he wants, but in fact he authorized the audit after he became Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That's right!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: He did so against the advice of his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. If the minister is going to conduct an audit of fishermen's incomes, is he prepared to recommend to his cabinet colleagues that they also conduct an audit of the facilities that fishermen have to use, which are the responsibility of this government, and which have fallen behind because of repeated cutbacks in the budget of his government? Is he prepared to do that?

• (1430)

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam speaker, with regard to cutbacks, it was the previous administration that took about $10 million of the small craft harbours program. That is the reason facilities are in the state they are today. As soon as this administration took office it added $10 million or $11 million to the small craft harbours program—

Mr. Clark: All in Westmorland-Kent.

Mr. Rompkey: —to bring those facilities up to standard. Those are the facts and they are on record. With regard to the individual situation of fishermen, my officials have been instructed to ascertain exactly what can be claimed as far as exemptions are concerned for premises and fishing property.

TRADITIONAL BUSINESS METHODS IN FISHING INDUSTRY

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, because serious charges of intimidation by officials have been coming in from fishermen, especially in Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, is the minister prepared to issue instructions to his officials that they should take into account the traditional way of doing business in the fishing industry, where a man's word is still his bond? They should take that into account.

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): I agree on the point that there have been traditional ways of doing things in the fishing industry. Indeed, in the case of receipts, for example, I have given instructions that where receipts were not kept, at least 25 per cent, and in some cases more, of gross income is to be taken as a guideline. I think we have accommodated, to the degree that we can, the traditional way of doing business in the fishing industry. There is to be no harassment and I certainly will not tolerate that. Where I hear of individual cases, and I can really only deal with them on an individual case basis, I certainly will take action.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Hit them with a flounder!

THE ADMINISTRATION

CONFLICT OF INTEREST GUIDELINES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. It relates to the conflict of interest rules brought down by the Prime Minister in April, 1980, part of which reads as follows:

> Ministers must also take care to avoid placing, or appearing to place, themselves under an obligation to any person or organization which might profit from special consideration or favour on their part.

That provision also applies to executive assistants and principal secretaries, in order to get around the Sherman Adams vicuna coat syndrome that occurred under President Eisenhower.

The principal secretary to the Prime Minister accepted a free ride to and from Washington over the weekend in order to participate in a function at the Canadian embassy. I know there is provision in the conflict of interest rules for disclosure of gifts over $200, and this would be worth considerably more than $200. I want to know from the Acting Prime Minister whether instructions have gone to principal secretaries in the Prime Minister's office and all ministers' offices, which indicate that this is not a proper activity on their part, to put themselves in that position with private corporations in this country.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker. I heard about it just at this moment; therefore no instructions could have gone out.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The minister is ever vigilant.

USE OF AIRCRAFT BY CABINET MINISTERS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. He will certainly be aware of the fact that Department of Transport planes are being used by cabinet ministers for electoral purposes in the byelections that are taking place today, and in other byelections. Is he asking the ministers involved, who are flying into the byelection territories on government planes, for a contribution toward the actual cost of those planes from the Liberal Party of Canada? Are we going to carry on this kind of pork-barrel operation in the department? Is the minister not going to crack down on this?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, members of cabinet can use the planes of the Department of Transport on government business. One of the articles that I read during the weekend made that point very clearly and indicated that, as a matter of fact, members of cabinet were doing just that. I have no reason to believe that they are not.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ALICE ARM, B.C.—DUMPING OF TAILINGS BY AMAX—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF REVIEW PANEL CHAIRMAN

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, on March 24 of this year the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans responded to a question that I raised about the tragic Alice Arm situation. He said "To ensure that my department does not examine itself, I have recommended that a scientific panel of distinguished outsiders look at the matter and give me their advice."

Since it was revealed on Friday that Dr. McInerny, who was appointed by the minister as chairman of this now famous Amax panel, in fact set the levels for the January, 1979, permit on the advice of Mr. Littlepage, who was paid approximatey $1 million by Amax to prepare their case, a situation that has clearly put Dr. McInerny in a conflict of interest situation, will the minister immediately, in this House today, remove Dr. McInerny from that panel?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, my experience with the hon. member's allegations is that the first thing you do about them is check them very carefully.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, the minister's comments will no doubt come out in the wash in the coming months.

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I will put my supplementary question to the Minister of the Environment. Dr. McInerny is also Mr. Littlepage's boss at the present time, which adds substantially to the conflict of interest situation. Since the chairman of the Environmental Health and Safety Committee of the B.C. Medical Association—a group which I am sure the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans would call kooks or quacks—has put on the record that the lives of Canadians are endangered by the Amax dumping, will the minister put an end to this shameless cover-up in Canada and at least call a public inquiry into the health and safety of this situation?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, my view is that expressed by my colleague. The important thing in this situation is to find from outside government and independent review which will establish exactly what the scientific implications are and that is being done by the government.

Oral Questions

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

FUNDING FOR NATURAL SCIENCES AND ENGINEERING RESEARCH COUNCIL

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. It concerns funding to the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council. I would refer him to the action taken recently by his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who followed the example set by the previous Clark government and significantly increased the funding to the Medical Research Council.

I should like to ask the Minister of State for Science and Technology whether he will follow the same course with regard to NSERC. Can he say when he will increase the meagre funding, from the 11 per cent increase already allocated, to something approaching the 35 per cent increase that had been allocated to NSERC by the previous Conservative government?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the hon. member and the House should know that, as a government, we confirmed the very significant increases for NSERC funding for the first year of their five-year plan. We have re-endorsed the principles of that five-year plan, and the funding for the subsequent years is now before the cabinet. I expect that in about a month's time I will be able to confirm the increased expenditures for the NSERC funding for the subsequent years.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister knows that what I am trying to do is to offer all the assistance possible to get that funding through. That is why I referred him to what his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has been able to achieve with a little bit of prompting. Perhaps he will be able to do the same.

I would point out to him that he, in fact, told us in committee a month ago, that he would be in a position by mid-April to indicate to the House the new funding quotas for the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council. Now he says it will be the middle of May. I am afraid he will go on and on putting it off, leaving the research councils in a state of uncertainty both about their funding and about the five-year plan. Can he give us an absolute guarantee that mid-May will be the deadline by which he does increase the funding to the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council and that it will be an increase amounting to the 300 per cent that has been allocated to MRC?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, I recognize the hon. member's conviction about the importance of these increases, and I welcome the urgency she attaches to them and the urging she is providing to me and my colleagues. I hope she will continue with those efforts to support us.

Miss MacDonald: I will.

Mr. Roberts: Clearly, I cannot give absolute guarantees until the spending has been confirmed by cabinet. It is true that about a month ago I said I expected to be able to do so about this time. I regret that there has been a further slippage due to factors beyond my control. As the hon. member knows, periodically the government assesses the outstanding claims against expenditures in terms of the amount of funds available. All that I can assure the hon. member is that I expect that process to take place about mid-May and that therefore I will be able to confirm at that time what the increased funding will be. I cannot give absolute guarantees for an event before my colleagues take part in that decision.

PUBLIC SERVICE

IMPLEMENTATION OF LAMBERT AND D'AVIGNON RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Would the minister inform the House how he intends to implement the recommendations in the Lambert and D'Avignon reports to increase the efficiency of the government and reduce excessive government spending?

● (1440)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): I welcome that question, Madam Speaker. As at least some hon. members will have noted, last week I deposited in the House a report entitled "Accountable Management" which is intended to bring Members of Parliament up to date on where we are with respect to the implementation of the various recommendations which have come forward, both from the Lambert Commission and the D'Avignon Committee.

Some of the highlights include areas such as the new expenditure management program which exists, and is sometimes called the envelope system.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The awful system?

Mr. Johnston: We have also deposited in this House, which is of particular significance, a new form of the estimates.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: As all members know, that is a pivotal recommendation to render better accountability of government—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Are you a pivotal minister?

Mr. Johnston: —and to bring these matters to the attention of parliamentarians. I am disappointed I have not had the commentary from members that I would like. Therefore, I would encourage all members of the House on both sides to look very carefully at the pilot projects which have been tabled in the House and referred to the public accounts committee. I welcome input from all members, Madam Speaker.

GRAIN

COMPENSATION TO FARMERS FOR EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. On April 1 the minister reported to the Standing Committee on Agriculture that the compensation payments due to farmers in Canada arising from the embargo on grain to the Soviet Union would be paid within one week. Now that the week has passed, is the minister able to give the House a further update about that?

An hon. Member: Which year?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I do not have the minutes of the committee. I do not believe I was as specific as the hon. member stated. I did say the other day that I hoped in a few days.

Mr. Epp: A few days, a few days, and a few days.

Mr. Whelan: That all depends on what you define as a few days.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: I still hope that in a few days we will be able to make the announcement.

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, the reply from the minister does not contradict anything that he has said so far.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKnight: It is a matter of whether it is one day, two days or a few days.

In light of that, why did the assistant to the Minister of Transport, Senator Argue, last Thursday in Saskatchewan say that he could not say in a definitive way whether payments would be made to the farmers of Canada?

Mr. Epp: Get your agricultural act together.

Mr. McKnight: Would the Minister of Agriculture intercede so that the farmers of Canada would have some idea as to when they will be getting it? Anything within 30 days—

Mr. Epp: Argue with Argue.

Miss MacDonald: Argue with your colleague.

Mr. McKnight: —anything within 30 days would be appropriate.

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, remembering very well just what the hon. member said, anything will be done within 30 days.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INQUIRY RESPECTING RAPESEED FREIGHT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It has to do with the government's refusal to renew the interim freight assistance program for processed rapeseed products. I know the Minister of Agriculture is keenly interested in this program. Therefore, could he enlighten this House as to what decision the government is going to make with respect to the renewal of the interim freight assistance program since it expired at the end of March?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I hope that an announcement on this will be made in a few days.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

STATUS OF WOMEN

REVIEW OF ADVISORY COUNCIL'S OPERATIONS

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Wesminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the status of women.

An hon. Member: Good luck.

Miss Jewett: Last week, on Thursday, I believe, the membership of the review panel decided to conduct a review of the council's operations. The panel consists entirely, with one exception, of people who were themselves involved in those shenanigans. I wonder if this kind of internal review, being judge in one's own cause, constitutes, in the eyes of the minister, the independent external review he promised about a month ago to Canadian women?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as I have told the hon. member and other members of this House many times before, I think it is incumbent upon members to respect the autonomy and independence of the council and to allow it to make decisions concerning its own affairs.

Miss Jewett: Madam Speaker, the minister himself recognized the autonomy and independence had been undermined—

Mr. Crosbie: He undermined it.

Miss Jewett: —by himself and others, and that is why a month ago he promised Canadian women that there would be "an independent external review of the advisory council". When is the minister going to have that independent external review?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is wrong in her assertion. In a meeting with a number of representatives of women's groups, I undertook to discuss the question of a review with the advisory council. This I did. At the same time I indicated that I would abide by its decision and that I would wait to see what kind of a report it would prepare. Once the report by the advisory council has been given to me and I see its contents, I will take what actions I think are necessary.

Miss Jewett: You promised.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, while the President of the Treasury Board is in a mood to report on his various projects, it was one month ago today that I asked the President of the Treasury Board when the House would be seeing the much promised Crown corporations bill, the omnibus bill. The minister replied as follows, as reported in Hansard at page 8224:

> I assure hon. members that very substantial progress has been made and that the bill will be brought forward in the very near future.

When will we see the bill?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I repeat what I have said in the past, that very substantial progress has been made indeed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Thirty days?

Mr. Johnston: The matter is a very serious one and is one which deserves the widest consultation and maximum input from all interested parties. That is what we are doing. Again I repeat that I do hope to bring forward legislation for consideration by my cabinet colleagues at a very early date.

Mr. Clark: Have you heard from Allan MacEachen?

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board has been promising for the last 13 months that the bill would be forthcoming in the very near future. Will the minister today flesh that out by giving us a date, or will he admit that the Minister of Finance has blocked his efforts to get the bill through cabinet?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance has been most co-operative with respect to all legislation that we have attempted to bring forth from Treasury Board.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Stand up and take a bow, Allan.

METRICATION

INQUIRY RESPECTING TABLING OF COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Small Business. When will the government be tabling the overview report of the metric commission?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I have not inquired about this recently. I will do so today and report back to the hon. member.

MARINE TRANSPORT

NORTH SYDNEY, N.S. TO ARGENTIA, NFLD. FERRY SERVICE

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the multi-modal minister of transportation. Would the minister advise the House whether or not he has now rejected his own suggestion that the ferry service from Nova Scotia to Argentia, which occurs during the summers, be cancelled? Will he confirm hopefully that he has cancelled that suggestion and that the $8 million or $9 million in costs will continue to be spent on that, and that the Newfoundland government will not be asked to agree to losing that service in order to have money spent on other transportation facilities in Newfoundland?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will attempt again to explain to my hon. friend what we are trying to do in Newfoundland—

Mr. Crosbie: I know what you are trying to do.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You are trying to sink the island.

Mr. Pepin: —in terms of a new approach. Should the province agree to a reduction or an elimination of a service, it would not lose the money that would be saved in so doing.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A new approach?

Mr. Pepin: It is in that context that the ferry from Argentia to Sydney—

Miss MacDonald: North Sydney.

Mr. Pepin: North Sydney was mentioned.

Mr. MacEachen: Flora's hometown.

Mr. Pepin: The other day in the committee I assured hon. members that this was not to be done this summer. However, it is an item for negotiation between ourselves and the government of Newfoundland.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the people of Newfoundland know what the minister is trying to do to them, and that is to reduce their transportation services and to put the squeeze on the Newfoundland government to say "eliminate a service here and then spend the money somewhere else". These are all vital services in Newfoundland. We cannot sacrifice a ferry service for a road.

TRANSPORT

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL HIGHWAY STRENGTHENING PROGRAM

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is this: will the Minister of Transport tell the House whether or not he is going to enter into a new primary highway strengthening agreement with Newfoundland and with the other three Atlantic provinces this year? Or has a decision been made that the Government of Canada will not contribute to road improvement spending in the provinces any longer, that, it is merely a matter to be left to DREE or not to be done by the Government of Canada at all? The agreement expired at the end of March and it is vital for these provinces now to know whether they will have any help in improving the Trans-Canada or their primary highway.

● (1450)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, on the new or second primary highway strengthening program, a decision has not been made. This is exactly what we are trying to work out with the government of Newfoundland. There are some savings to be made. There is a need to use whatever money is available in the most efficient way. The government of Newfoundland understands that and is willing to negotiate with us in that spirit. If more money is available by way of increasing the size of the envelope or what is in the envelope, so much the better. But we have to go at this two ways; if possible, increase the amount of money going to transportation in Newfoundland, and at the same time take advantage of any savings that can be effected by way of the best use of the money available.

Mr. Crosbie: Ten o'clock.

NATIONAL SECURITY

MISSING TASCHEREAU COMMISSION PAPERS AND MACKENZIE KING DIARY

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General who, I am sure, will know that Canadians accord considerable importance to the role the Taschereau papers and the Mackenzie King documents would have in clearing up some of the uncertainties surrounding the issues involved. I am wondering whether the minister could say why he and his colleagues appear to be so indifferent to the disappearance of these documents. Is he relaxed or indifferent because he is satisfied the documents have been spirited away somewhere, have been destroyed and hence are unfindable, or does he believe the embarrassment they might cause certain people could be avoided through some other method?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, while I am, of course, interested in this, I think it fair to note that my interest is more historical than political since the fact that these documents were missing from the material I have read was first noted by Jack Pickersgill in 1947. Their so-called disappearance has been a matter of record for a very long time.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I am not sure whether the minister was referring to the Taschereau papers or the Mackenzie King documents, because there were the two sets. In any event, I wonder whether he can assure the House that there is an inquiry going on within his department or in the Department of the Secretary of State to make sure every possible clue is being followed up to find out where these documents might be.

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, the inquiry which is under way now is one I have described in the House already. It is an examination being done of the Taschereau-Kellock material, the transcripts of the Gouzeko investigation, to ascertain whether the release of that information and those documents would violate the privacy of any individual, contrary to the government's policy in respect of personal privacy. I indicated that that inquiry would be completed, I hope, within a month or two and that the government would have the recommendations of the official doing the work and be prepared then to make a statement about whether the Taschereau-Kellock papers would be made public.

POST OFFICE

MAIL DELIVERY TO NEWLY DEVELOPED HOUSING SUBDIVISIONS

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. He has solved one of my problems and I thank him very much. I would like to ask him when people in fast growing areas such as Mississauga North and South, Brampton-Georgetown, and La Prairie, the riding of my colleague in Montreal, where subdivisions are growing at a rapid rate, can expect to start receiving this service they are paying for through their taxes, but have not been receiving at all for two years?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, under the latest Post Office estimates, it will be possible to add a number of postmen to provide services in some areas in Canada mentioned by the hon. member. The Post Office Department is, of course, subject to the restraints with regard to person-years as are all other federal departments. When the Post Office is no longer a department but becomes a corporation, it will then surely enjoy a greater freedom.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, the minister will pardon me if I am a little cynical. The last time we had new mail carriers in our community was the day the election was announced in 1979. If it takes an election to get mail delivery to these new subdivisions, will the Postmaster General urge the Prime Minister to call an election so we can get some mail delivery in our communities?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, I think that service in those areas will be provided long before the next election.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

ROCKWELL CORPORATION OPERATIONS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question I would have asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce but, I think in another context, I will direct it to the Minister of Finance.

I am sure the Minister of Finance is familiar with the Rockwell Corporation. This is the same corporation that has closed down five plants in the last five years and cut the work force in two others from approximately 1,500 to 260. Just last week it was announced by FIRA that it had been given approval to take over Wescom of Canada in Georgetown. I wonder whether the minister might explain what significant benefit we can expect from Rockwell this time?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that is a question I would rather hand over to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Deans: I do not blame the minister, Madam Speaker. I would rather hand it over to him as well were I the minister. However, I am under the impression that the cabinet gives ultimate approval. Therefore that means, in my mind, that the cabinet includes all the ministers. I wonder if I might ask this minister whether this matter was in fact brought to the cabinet, whether Rockwell's performance in Canada was considered, and what in heaven's name is the use of FIRA if it is going to approve this kind of takeover by a company which has abused Canada and the people who work here.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is right. Usually these applications are brought forward by the minister and considered at least in cabinet committee. There are a fair number of applications considered and it would be quite impossible for any minister to recall the details of every case. I can assure the hon. member that either the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or myself will provide him with the information which led to the conclusion. He may disagree with the conclusion, but at least I will assure him of the information.

THE PERFORMING ARTS

APPLICATION FOR FUNDS TO AID ST. LAWRENCE CENTRE, TORONTO

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications, but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. The parliamentary secretary will know that some time ago the St. Lawrence Centre for the Performing Arts in Toronto made an application to the special initiatives program for some funds to renovate and upgrade the theatre. This is a program which has already received the support and approval of the provincial and municipal governments, yet as far as we can tell to this date the federal department has yet even to acknowledge the letter of application. Could I have an undertaking from the parliamentary secretary that he will look into the matter and, beyond that if possible, will he provide some information as to when the theatre may expect both an answer to its letter and the determination of approval or refusal of its request, and I would prefer, of course, approval?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, fist of all I would like to point out to the hon. member that it is becoming a bit of a problem. The provincial governments, particularly Ontario, under the agreement in respect of Loto Canada, have said they would cover some of these expenses in the arts community. But then, after receiving the money from Loto Canada, they go back and tell these people who need the money that they should go back to the federal government for the money which the federal government has already given to the provincial governments. Having said that, I would assure the hon. member that the situation is being looked into and there will be an answer shortly.

METRIC CONVERSION

MINISTER'S RESPONSIBILITIES TO SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. The subject to which I want to refer affects the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. We would like someone to speak for small business on the issue of the implementation of metric in the retail food sector at a time when neither the Canadian Federation of Retail Grocers, Loblaws Corporation, IGA or Loeb approve of this move.

Would the minister responsible for small business advise this House whether he will or will not speak for small business, and address the concern of small business about forced metric conversion in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member may have contacts with opponents of the metrication of scales in the retail food trade. As for me, I am convinced that I speak also for Canadian small businesses, and my contacts in the small business sector do not lead me to the same conclusions as the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, I would like to invite the minister to the press conference tomorrow morning to hear the small business people in Ottawa complain about the implementation of metric.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR REPEAL OF ENFORCEMENT ORDER

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. I remind him that the last two ministers of small business in the Liberal government are no longer in this House because they would not listen to small business.

Will the minister intercede as a member of the Privy Council to repeal the order in council which forces metric on Canadian business people whether they want it or not? There are fines of up to $5,000, imprisonment, and business lock-ups. Will the minister speak for small business, or will he follow the same line as the last two Liberal ministers for small business, who are no longer in this House because they too did not listen to small business? No one over there speaks for small business.

Madam Speaker: Order.

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is quite free to hold meetings or to take part in press conferences for his own public relations. He is entirely free to take part in tomorrow morning's press conference at eleven o'clock. As concerns the question as to whether I speak on behalf of small businesses within this government, I must say that, in my opinion, the Canadian small business sector, as far as exports, the manufacture of new products and services are concerned, will benefit enormously from metric conversion in Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,744, 1,857, 2,075, 2,127, 2,151, 2,164 and 2,213.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

ADVERTISING EXPENDITURES

Question No. 1,744—Mr. Stevens:

For the current fiscal year, what are the estimated expenditures of the Department of Agriculture for (a) advertising (b) free or subsidized publications (c) other information conveyed to the public?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): (a) $179,290, (b) $2,011,200, (c) $543,950.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—LOCKEPORT, N.S.

Question No. 1,857—Mr. Miller:

1. In the past year, by month, what was the number of persons in the Lockeport, Nova Scotia area receiving unemployment insurance benefits?

2. For the same period, what was the amount expended for such benefits?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The commission does not maintain statistics on the number of persons or amount of benefits for Lockeport, Nova Scotia. To provide these statistics would entail a lengthy and costly examination of individual files and records.

VIA RAIL—PASSENGER STATISTICS

Question No. 2,075—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 65, what are all the reasons that Via Rail Canada cannot supply the information requested?

2. Does Via Rail Canada keep any statistics anywhere on passenger travel and, if so, for what reason are such statistics not kept for Brockville, Ontario?

3. What methods does Via Rail Canada use to assess effectiveness of its service if it does not possess such statistics?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. VIA Rail Canada cannot supply the requested information because the previous operator, Canadian National Railways, did not keep such information. VIA became responsible for trains through Brockville in April, 1979, and they estimate that during 1979 32,000 persons boarded and 29,000 disembarked at Brockville, Ontario.

2. VIA keeps many types of statistics on passenger train travel. With the development of a new reservation and reporting system called RESERVIA, VIA will have the capability to produce detailed statistics not currently available. The reservation portion of this work was implemented in 1980. Brockville, as an important point in the network, will be examined in greater detail once better operational statistics are available.

3. Effectiveness of the services is constantly monitored through the loads on the trains. The assessment procedures will be expanded considerably with the availability of data in greater detail.

COAST GUARD VESSEL 122

Question No. 2,127—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. What was the capital cost of acquiring and commissioning Coast Guard Vessel 122 based at Ganges Harbour?

2. Where was the vessel acquired and at what cost?

3. What are the annual operating costs for the vessel?

4. What is the average cost per rescue involving the vessel (a) on its own, taking into account overheads (b) in co-operation with other rescue agencies?

5. What is the average reimbursement per rescue paid to Coast Guard auxiliary personnel, in the area where the vessel normally operates?

6. Since the vessel was acquired (a) how often was it called out on rescue duty (b) how many auxiliary vessels answered rescue calls?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. $197,122.

2. James L. Reid Inc., Lachine, P.Q. at a cost of $182,752.

3 Year to date June, 1980 to February, 1981 $124,000.

4. (a) $900.
(b) $920.

5. $20.

6. (a) 175 times.
(b) 211.

SCIENTIFIC CO-OPERATION WITH CHINA

Question No. 2,151—Mr. Herbert:

Has the International Development Research Centre concluded an agreement for scientific co-operation with China and, if so, does the agreement provide for exchange visits between Canada and China?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The International Development Research Centre replies as follows: A memorandum of understanding was signed on September 16, 1980, between the International Development Research Centre and the State Scientific and Technological Commission of the People's Republic of China. The memorandum provides for co-operative development research activities in China, in other developing countries, and in Canada. Included is provision for exchange visits of scientific personnel between Canada and China.

MINISTERS' SPEECHES

Question No. 2,164—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to question No. 5 which states in part, that $62,400 was paid to H.J.M. Comm Productions Ltd., Ottawa, in a period of less than two years for preparing speeches for ministers (a) for what reasons was this particular firm hired (b) were bids or presentations obtained from other firms and (i) if so, what were the names and addresses of such firms (ii) if not, for what reason (c) what is the name and job designation of the highest ranking person who recommended the firm (d) what were the names and job designations of all other persons recommending the firm or who in any way negotiated the contract?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned:

(a) H.J.M. Communications Productions was hired in order to research and write speeches for Ministers of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

(b) Bids or presentations were not obtained from other firms as H.J.M. Communications, in the opinion of the then director of information, provided satisfactory service to ministers' requests for speech research and writing.

(c) Alan Duckett, the then director of information, Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce recommended and negotiated the contract with H.J.M. Communications Productions. Keith Gardner, the then deputy director of the information branch also assisted with negotiations.

WHARF PROPERTY, PORTLAND, ONT.

Question No. 2,213—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Department of Fisheries and Oceans refuse to grant a lease in the 1980 season for a wharf property owned by the government at Portland, Ontario and, if so, was the refusal (a) made to the township of Bastard and South Burgess (b) on the grounds that the township did not maintain an administrative program nor collect fees in 1979?

2. Did the Burlington, Ontario office of the department at 3050 Harvester Road, receive telephone calls from an official of the township on June 16 and on August 18, 1980, making inquiries and, if so, did the township receive a reply to the inquiries and, if not, for what reason?

3. Did the same office receive a letter dated March 5, 1981, drawing the matter to the attention of a Mr. Smead and, if so, on what date will the township receive an answer to its inquiry?

4. Does the government file involved bear the number 5883-70/P669?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): 1. No.

(a) The Department of Fisheries and Oceans issued a lease to the township of Bastard and South Burgess to administer the government wharf at Portland in accordance with the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act and Regulations. This lease was for a period of five years effective May 1, 1979, and required the township to collect all tolls, dues and charges in accordance with the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act and Regulations.

(b) This lease was terminated effective April 30, 1980, as the township refused to collect the toll and dues in accordance with the terms of the lease.

2. Yes, telephone calls from an official of the township were received. Written replies to the telephone conversation were not sent as it was felt that these matters were adequately answered during the telephone conversations.

3. Yes, letter of March 5, 1981, was received in the regional office on March 10, 1981, and a reply was forwarded March 13, 1981.

4. Yes.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—FUTURE FACING UNEMPLOYED CANADIANS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West) moved:

That this House expresses its sorrow and sympathy for the more than one million Canadians who are unable to find work and who, with their families, face an uncertain future, and urges the Prime Minister to endorse this sentiment by shuffling his cabinet.

He said: Madam Speaker, I rise in this House this afternoon to debate this motion with almost a sense of tragedy about what is and what might have been. I was reading this morning the front page of the Toronto Star of May 23, 1979. On that page there was a headline. Hon. members might remember that that was the day after the May 22 election in 1979. The headline read: "Joe sees growth, jobs and hope". Here we are, almost two years later, and we do not have the same sense of hope. We certainly have fewer jobs and more unemployed, and it is difficult to find anywhere in the actions of this government a true commitment to growth.

It is with that sense of reality, which I think all of us in this House have had to face, that I move this motion, which urges members of this House collectively—and perhaps particularly backbenchers in the Liberal Party—to express some sense of sorrow and sympathy for the more than one million unemployed in Canada today.

I think it is necessary for each and every one of us who accept the responsibility of sitting in this Parliament to accept responsibility for our actions. Particularly members of the governing party must accept some responsibility for their actions because it is they who time after time support a cabinet which seems to be less concerned about people and more concerned about political gain than is right or good for Canada. Without the support of those quiet tin soldier backbenchers, I wonder if the cabinet would have the courage to take us into the calamities which have characterized not only the last 12 months but a considerable period, approaching 12 years, prior to the last 12 months.

Unemployment

In Canada today there are well in excess of one million adult Canadians who would like to make a contribution to this country and who would like the opportunity to work, to produce and, in return, to have an income and a sense of stability. They would like to enjoy the kinds of friendships which characterize the workplace for most of us. However, those one million Canadians cannot find jobs. The reason they cannot find jobs is to be found in the attitudes and the hypocrisy of a succession of Liberal cabinets which are and have been more concerned with political gain than with economic growth, development and a future for Canadians.

I think too often in this House we deal with the broad picture and tend to forget that we have a responsibility to legislate on behalf of the people of this country in ways which help them. When we are talking about one million unemployed Canadians, I wonder how often we in this House realize that one in ten adults who live on our blocks or in our apartment buildings is currently unemployed. Some time this year or in the year ahead one in five of those adults will face the trauma of wanting to work but not being able to find a job, at least for some period of time.

One young person in seven in this country faces the reality of wanting to get a start in life and have work experience but not being able to find a place to begin to build the kind of future they have been taught they have a right to expect and aspire to.

Hidden in the statistics of unemployment are the tragedies. How often do we in this House stop to think about the concept of work? It is easy, perhaps, to remember that work provides an income, and incomes are important. We need money to provide ourselves with shelter, food, transportation and clothing. There is a basic reason for wanting to work. However, there are other reasons that are just as important to people.

• (1510)

We sometimes forget that a great deal of our personal identity, our sense of self-worth, of who we are and what we are, comes from our relationship to the world of work. Out of that, we are likely to develop a sense of self-worth because we produce a product or a service. Hopefully those of us who sit in this House, from time to time at least, through the fruits of our labours are able to conclude that by being here it makes a difference; perhaps not every day but from time to time.

The work place is where a lot of Canadians get a great deal of their sense of self-worth. When we say to one million Canadians that they cannot have a job and be part of the work place, we are robbing them not only of the income they need and want but of that sense of self-worth, a sense of being able to make a contribution to our society.

The third element for most people, which goes along with being part of the work force, is the sense of friendship and companionship. For most people this flows out of a daily contact with fellow workers or customers, the social interactions that take place in the work force.

We are saying to these one million unemployed Canadians that they cannot have a decent income or the sense of self-worth which would be available in a job, and they cannot have the friendships which flow out of the workplace. This is a real tragedy for those individuals as well as for our society. We are getting so used to such a high unemployment rate that when the statistics come out monthly we feel no sense of outrage on behalf of those one million unemployed.

Within that one million people I would like to identify and remind this House of are three categories which deserve special attention. First let me speak about the young people. Of the number of young males in this country looking for a job in March, 14.1 per cent, or 1.4 for every ten in your block or apartment building, could not find a job. Who are these young people? What will happen to their future if this situation is allowed to continue? At 15, 16 or 19 years of age, or perhaps after college graduation at 22, they go out and look for jobs. The first question an employer asks is, where did you work before? Fourteen per cent of them do not find that beginning work experience. The weeks go by, the months go by, the years go by. On any job application which they put forward, employers ask where they have worked before. These people have to put "nowhere". The employer probably thinks it best that he not hire those people, because experience tells him that people who are experienced in the world of work are more likely to make good employees.

Before we know it, a decade has gone by with a spotty work history. Somebody who is already 30 years of age still has 35 years to go to reach the magic age of 65. We have to predict that those people we are hurting today at 15, 16 or 19 years of age will be the victims of tomorrow and on into the second and third decades. That is what is happening in this country and it is amazing that we feel no sense of outrage about it.

The next class of people I will refer to as the breadwinners. A few years ago that was usually a male who had a wife and family. In our modern age, it could be a female just as easily as a male. These people have family responsibilities. They have children who are dependent upon them for material needs such as shelter, food, transportation and clothing. The young people are dependent on these adults for health, love, guidance, time and attention to help them, in turn, to develop into adults who have a personal sense of worth, adults who are ready and willing to make a personal contribution to the development of this country.

Do we make that job easier for those adults? Do we make the situation better for those children when we say to the breadwinners that they do not belong, that there is no job for them, that they cannot earn an income, have the sense of self-worth that comes from being a productive member of the work force, and cannot have the friendships which flow from the workplace? What does that do to the minds of those people? Not too much, perhaps, in the first day or two, a little more in the first week or two and a great deal more in the first month or two. We have a real tragedy when it spins out to a year or two.

How can those breadwinners maintain that sense of self-worth, that important component of parenthood which allows them to feel secure in their worth and, therefore, have the kinds of feelings which enable them to deal with their children in positive, developmental ways? As decades go by with extremely high rates of unemployment, are we creating a future generation who will find it difficult to find their place in the mainstream of Canadian society? I suggest we are.

What about the third class of person in Canada, which is a more recent phenomenon? These are what I call the re-entries into the work force, people who mostly have spent a significant portion of their life as parents. As they get into the mid-years of the adult life cycle, their families grow and move away and they are looking for a challenge. Perhaps they have faced widowhood or the spectre of divorce. Then suddenly, after 10, 15 or 20 years of being out of the work force, they have to look for a job for one reason or another.

Our society is very hard on people like that. In looking at an unemployment rate that in real terms in the month of March was 8.5 per cent, it is the young people, the new entrants into the labour force, who are least likely to be able to get that first job to get the experience and possibly develop the skills which will last them for the rest of their lifetime.

I could mention some of the other groups, such as the regional group, people who live on Indian reserves and face 90 per cent unemployment, or people who live in places such as the finance minister's home town, where on Cape Breton Island unemployment in the winter is characteristically very high indeed.

I draw this to the attention of the House because today we have two byelections. The people of Prince Edward Island in the consistency of Cardigan will complete their voting in just a few hours, and an hour after that the polls will close in the constituency of London West. I wonder what is going on in the minds of people who live in the ridings of Cardigan and London West. Do they realize that on Prince Edward Island one year ago, in the month of March, the unemployment rate was horrendously high at 13.4 per cent but that today it is 16 per cent? Do they realize that on that tiny island there are 2,000 fewer people working today than there were one year ago and that the money they would make, if they were still working, would be circulating through the economy and helping the people who run beauty parlors, restaurants and the service industries of the island? But they are not working today. One year ago 6,000 of them were unemployed; today 8,000 are unemployed. The rate has risen from 13.4 per cent to 16 per cent. It began over a decade ago with Liberal cabinets devoted to political gains at the expense of economic reality, aided and abetted by the red rump on the left.

● (1520)

Then let us consider the people of London West. I have data for the city of London. The voters may remember that they returned all the members from London; in 1980 they selected Liberals. One year ago they selected Liberals, and at that time the unemployment rate was 5.5 per cent. Today it is 50 per cent higher at 8.1 per cent. I wonder how many people of London West realize that their unemployment rate is 50 per cent higher than it was a year ago, when they returned every member of that district to sit on the backbenches of the party across the way.

An hon. Member: And with good reason.

Mr. Hawkes: If one wants to be unemployed, that is good reason to vote for the Liberals; if one wants jobs or a chance to participate, one should consider voting somewhat differently. I wonder if the people of London West who may be having trouble selling their houses or finding jobs realize that in that area today there are 13,000 fewer wage earners. There are 13,000 fewer people who have incomes to spend in that community today. I wonder if the people of London West remember that one year ago there were 10,000 persons unemployed, far too many. In the month of March there were 14,000 people looking for work. I bet there is one more person on every block or in every apartment building looking for work than there was a year ago.

Not only have those people lost the opportunity for earning an income, they have lost the opportunity to develop a sense of self-worth which comes from being a productive member of society. They have lost the opportunity to develop friendships in the work place. The tragedy is not only economic; it affects all aspects of our lives.

Could these effects have been predicted? I bring to the attention of the House one little example which people might remember because it occurred not long ago. The Minister of Finance, aided and abetted by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), brought down a budget last October 28 and gave us the National Energy Program. Those of us from the province of Alberta who were sitting in the House were quick to bring to the attention of the government, in question period and on every possible occasion, the fact that the program would produce greater numbers of unemployed people in Alberta who work within the oil industry and also create a problem for Canadian industry. We said to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that it would not happen right away, that next spring was the time.

March is the first month for which I have statistics. In the first month of Spring the unemployment rate in the province of Alberta went up 14 per cent. At the same time the Canadian economy lost 10,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector. Are the effects of a bad budget and of a bad energy program predictable? We predicted those effects in late October, early November, and today they are a reality. Unemployment in producing provinces is up 14 per cent; 10,000 jobs have been lost in manufacturing. That was predictable last October because Liberal backbenchers chose to support a cabinet which is more concerned with polticial gain than with economic reality and jobs for people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hawkes: I should like to take a minute to refer back to the headline of May 23, 1979 entitled, "Joe Sees Growth, Jobs and Hope". Let me contrast the job side of our nine months in office with the 12 months of the government opposite. During our nine months in office, even though women have a tough time in Canada getting jobs, an average of 23,000 women per month obtained jobs. In the last 12 months the average is down to 15,000. Our record on behalf of the women of the country, in terms of helping them obtain jobs, was 50 per cent better than the record of the present Liberal cabinet.

As for those young people who are facing a 14.1 per cent unemployment rate, our average increase was 6,000 young people per month who obtained jobs; under the present Liberal cabinet the figure is 2,400. Our record was 150 per cent better than the present Liberal cabinet in terms of creating an economic climate which produced jobs for our young people.

Then there is a special group, those who find themselves unemployed at 55 years of age or over, a forgotten minority in our society. In our nine months in office, 3,000 more people in that category per month obtained jobs. Under the present Liberal cabinet the figure is down to 833 people. Our record for people 55 years of age and over was 300 per cent better than the record of the government.

Looking at the available statistical data for the goods-producing sector of our society, which includes agriculture, manufacturing and construction, our record was 13,000 jobs per month, whereas the record of the Liberal cabinet is 4,000. Our record was 300 per cent better in the goods-producing sector that produces the real wealth, which is the first step toward a decent sharing program. It is awfully easy to share nothing equally. It is an easy equation; everyone gets nothing. Politically it is more difficult to talk about reality and the need to create real wealth before it can be shared.

In terms of tax spending on the creation of public sector employment, under our regime 667 jobs per month; under this cabinet, 4,750. There was 700 per cent more spending on public sector jobs than there was under our government. We created jobs in the goods-producing sector; that is, manufacturing, construction and agriculture. The government is creating job programs through tax spending. Under our government there were fewer taxpayers but more tax spending. The amount of taxes goes up for those who do work and the results in our society in the long term are not positive.

If you look, Mr. Speaker, at the figures for the regions of our country, you will see that the region which has been in the most trouble under this government in terms of job creation is the Atlantic region. Under our Conservative government there was a 3,444 increase per month in jobs in the Atlantic region. Under the present government the figure is 1,250. Our record was 300 per cent better. Why is this? It is simply because the people had a sense of confidence that they had finally elected a government which understood that Canadians want jobs. They want an economy that grows at a rate where jobs are created so that they can earn a decent income, develop a sense of self-worth and build the kinds of friendships that tend to go along with the work place.

In the face of nine months of demonstration, this government has taken us far away from concern for those people and their future and has confronted us with the constitution, and not even honestly. The government wants the members of this House to adopt an equalization clause which will enshrine in the law of this country the reality that the federal government can bypass provincial governments when it comes to making fiscal payments. This government is destroying the tradition which has been part of our attempt to develop a stronger Atlantic region and a stronger province of Quebec. This government wants the constitutional right in perpetuity to ignore those provinces when it comes to equalization payments. I wonder how the members from Newfoundland and some of the 20 members holding seats in the other Atlantic provinces feel about that. I wonder how the 74 who represent the province of Quebec feel. I wonder how the people of Quebec would feel if they really knew what was happening.

This government tells us about mobility rights. There are two important groups that we should keep in mind when we talk about mobility rights. The first group involves secretaries who live in eight of the ten provinces, in Yukon and the Northwest Territories. They still cannot work for the Department of External Affairs. Then there are the pilots who want to fly airplanes for the Department of Transport. They cannot obtain a job unless they live in the province of Quebec. This government in its day-to-day behaviour is the single largest employer which puts mobility problems in the way of Canadians who want to work in different parts of the country. It also wants a Constitution which enshrines the right of the government to deny the provision of social services to any Canadian who moves across provincial boundaries. This government threatens disadvantaged Canadians by telling them that if they move from province to province they run the risk of not being able to receive health care, family allowances or pensions, or of not receiving a decent education. It wants to deny the provision of social services to the people who need it most.

As this debate continues today I hope that members in the House will listen closely and underline those one million unemployed Canadians who need our help. Maybe after today we will see the kind of cabinet change needed to start on the road to being able to help those people.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have read the motion put forward by the official opposition, which is as follows:

> That this House expresses its sorrow and sympathy for the more than one million Canadians who are unable to find work and who, with their families, face an uncertain future, and urges the Prime Minister to endorse this sentiment by shuffling his Cabinet.

Mr. Knowles: Not many here to shuffle today.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, if that is the answer, then God help us! I want to read to the House something said by a young woman in Toronto. It is an excerpt from the "Metropolitan Social Planning Council Study—Layoffs". She says:

> My Dad is unemployed
> And I hate it
> It isn't his fault he hasn't a job
> He tries hard enough
> His company had to let somebody off
> Guess who got picked?
> I hate his employers for what they did
> For the quarrels and tension
> But especially for making my Dad feel
> So useless, unwanted, unneeded
> I hate them for it.

Mr. Speaker, this little girl expresses a sentiment far closer to the truth than an expression of sorrow and sympathy and a shuffle of the cabinet would. Surely that kind of situation justifies more than the idle nonsense expressed in this motion. Even if the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) were to accept this motion and shuffle his cabinet, we would still have the same people. It would not change the cabinet's direction or create a plan or economic strategy. It would not create any kind of vision for the development of this country on behalf of Canadians. Therefore, what would be the use of shuffling the cabinet? What is required is a dramatic change in the attitude of the government toward the needs of the people of Canada and the way in which the natural strengths of this country can and should be used in the interests of all Canadians.

That young 13-year-old girl who says that she hates the people who took the action which created unemployment for her family, created hardship, tension and quarrels, does not need sympathy. She does not need an expression of sorrow. What she and countless other young people who see exactly the same circumstances affecting their families in many communities right across this country need is a plan of action, not an expression of sympathy and sorrow. I want to suggest that there could be no less appropriate motion than the one we have before us.

Earlier today I was asking the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) about an approval given by FIRA which will allow Rockwell to acquire Wescom Canada in Georgetown, and therefore give Rockwell control over the lives of yet another group of employees. Rockwell's record in this country is abysmal. This is the company which from 1975 through 1980 closed down five plants in five different communities in the country. In addition to that, it reduced the work force in two other plants from a combined total of approximately 1,500 to 260. This is a company which says in its application to FIRA that there will be significant benefit, including increased employment, if it is allowed to take over yet another small company. The Minister of Finance told me that he would rather pass that question over to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). I cannot blame him; he must be embarrassed. I could see the embarrassment on his face. I could see in his eye the horror as he realized that he had approved something in cabinet which is inexcusable. The minister sat there while this measure was approved, and today he did not even remember it because he did not pay sufficient attention to what was before cabinet at the time. He did say he would go out and try to find the detail for me, which at this point is simply an explanation of something which can hardly be explained. It would certainly be an excuse for taking an inexcusable action.

I suggest that it is that kind of action which undermines the viability of the Canadian manufacturing sector. It is that kind of action which makes it possible for that young woman, 13 years old, to speak with such feeling about the effect of a company lay-off on her family. That kind of action does not require sorrow or sympathy. It is the kind of action which requires immediate attention.

This government has absolutely no plan. It has no strategy. It has no vision of Canada. The government does not even have an understanding of the greatness or the potential of this country. Where else in the world would one find a country with resources like ours? Where else in the world would one find a country which has unused manufacturing capacity in excess of 20 per cent? Where else would one find a group of employees laid off in such a vast number, which now exceeds one million? If one would take into account hidden unemployment, the number of unemployed is probably close to 1.4 million, Canadians who should be working, who want to be working, who have been out in the work force looking for jobs, knocking on doors, trying to provide for their families. Where else would you find all of the natural benefits that this country has? Canada, relatively speaking, is self-sufficient in energy; it has the ability to harness its energy, together with its resources and people, to build employment opportunities and a better life for everyone. Where else would you find neglect of such resources? There is no other place. Given that these resources could be mismanaged in the way they have by years of Liberal government and a brief interlude of Tory government, just for seasoning, one wonders just where we are going.

I was looking at some devastating statistics for the first half of last year which show that, in the province of Ontario, 130,000 people were laid off; people were being laid off at the rate of 1,000 for each working day. When we brought this to the attention of the government, the government shrugged. I mean, after all, what could they do? It said: "Well, we'll do the best we can. We'll make some temporary, makeshift work programs. We'll throw a few dollars into each constituency. We'll hire a few people." But did the government bring forward an over-all strategy? Did it do anything about the bank profit margin, the ever-increasing interest rates which undermine consumer purchasing, and the very manufacturing sector which was laying these people off? No, there was just an apology.

The number of people on indefinite lay-off reads like a "Who's Who" in terms of the municipalities of the province of Ontario. In Brantford 750 people were laid off in July; in Chatham-Sarnia, 2,440 people; in Hamilton, 275; in the Kitchener area, 2,950 people; in London-Stratford, 450 people; in Montreal and Quebec—to go outside of Ontario—485 people; in Niagara-St. Catharines, 2,700 people. In northern Ontario, another 115 people; in Oakville, 2,130 people; in Oshawa, 1,320 people. Ottawa-Kingston might interest some hon. members; there were 415 people laid off. These are indefinite lay-offs. In Toronto, 10,335 people were on indefinite lay-off in July of 1980. Most of them have not yet been recalled to work. In Woodstock, 500 people were laid off.

One must ask oneself, how can it be in this country that these statistics are staring us right in the face yet the government can sit and talk about its Constitution? How can it be, with statistics like this and the people of this country suffering as they are, that the government can fail to come forward with an economic program which would make some sense and stimulate consumer purchasing power to allow for a regeneration of the desires and the hopes the people?

I want to relate the most recent statistics, those which dealt with the first half of last year. In The Financial Post dated April 11, 1981, under the normal categories for measuring progress in the economy, average weekly earnings were down from the previous month from $329.37 to $324.97. That means that purchasing power went down. However, the consumer price index in February went from 224.1 to 226.4. Bank loans in February went from 96.80 to 98.57. Housing starts were down from 179 to 177. The all-industry output shows a marginal increase of .2 per cent. The labour force increased .08 per cent. Then one finds that manufacturing capacity usage—taking into account how much we produce and how much of our capacity we are using—has gone down this year to 79.9 per cent from 84.3 per cent last year at this same time. Why? Because the very things I am talking about—consumer purchasing power, the ability of people to go into the marketplace and buy, their wages, every measurable item—are under pressure. There is less being manufactured and less manufacturing capacity being used.

I note with interest that in the month of January manufacturing shipments were down 2.2 per cent; new orders were down 3.5 per cent; inventory was up .8 per cent—all of these facts speaking to an even worsening economic situation in this country and to even greater numbers of people being unemployed.

Where is the government's program? The Tories suggest we shuffle the cabinet. I must ask you, Mr. Speaker, do you not think that in this country it is possible to take advantage of what we have inherited, of what we have by virtue of the strength of the country itself? Surely it is possible for us to take advantage of that and build a society which is second to none. Surely it is possible to harness our energy and other resources, take advantage of industrial capacity, build a nation in which everyone will be able to have a job and where no child will ever have to say what the young child I have quoted said.

I look at plant closings in the province of Ontario in the year 1980. They occurred in every community: Beach Foundry in Ottawa; Bendix in Windsor; Canada Ferro in Brampton; Chrysler in Windsor; Crown Fab in Oakville; Essex Wire in Dunnville; Firestone in Whitby; Ford (Engines) in Windsor; Gabriel in Orangeville; Houdaille in Oshawa; Rockwell in Parry Sound—the same Rockwell I mentioned, incidentally, only a little while ago; Sealed Power in Stratford; Vulcan Equipment in Fergus; Winchester Western in Cobourg. And it goes on and on; one could read for 20 minutes and still not come to the end of the list. We are supposed to feel sympathy and sorrow for the people rather than demand of the government that there be in place the kinds of requirements which make it necessary to take into account the effect of plant closures and shutdowns on the people in those communities.

When other countries in the world were faced with the kind of economic restructuring that this country is now going through, they began to set up the necessary consultative programs to allow the change-overs to take place. They put in place the requirements which made it necessary for companies that were under economic pressure to still live up to their obligations to their employees and to the communities in which they were located. In Canada, legislation regarding labour standards is generally considered to be within provincial jurisdiction, but in truth that is not necessarily so. There could be and should be an over-all strategy in Ottawa which ties together the strengths of the nation, enables the people of Canada to move freely and to find new employment, and requires that people who receive FIRA approval and government grants live up to their commitments.

What was apparent 30 years ago in places like Sweden is only beginning to become apparent in Canada. Labour-management groups were established in major industry to prepare workers for redundancy two years in advance and to finance relocation and retraining. Unemployment was held down despite massive shifts in the economy. Now that we are faced with the same thing in Canada, why are we not moving ahead? Why do we not require a pooling of resources and that there be the money up front to guarantee employees will be retrained and be able to maintain their families during periods of dislocation? Why do we not require that such communities be repaid for the investment they made in providing the necessary site for the location of those companies? Why do we not put in place the kind of economic strategy that puts the Canadian people first? We should insist that one of the costs of doing business in Canada is that attention be paid to the effect of a particular enterprise on the people employed in it and on their families, and that attention be paid to the effects of relocation and dislocation on the communities involved.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the answer is not easy, but neither is it impossible. It can be found. Others have found it; others have faced it and succeeded. I cannot for the life of me understand why we should be offering sympathy and sorrow in place of action.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to respond on behalf of the government. I believe all members of the House share the degree of sympathy and concern on this issue that is expressed in the resolution. Where we differ is on the kind of approach that we would propose to take.

I shall begin by saying that I think it is important, when discussing unemployment, to shear away much of the mythology and mystique, and sometimes the misrepresentation, that surrounds the topic. I do not think any of us in this House gain anything by going through the monthly ritual of bringing out the employment statistics as a weapon for battering the government over the head. I think this matter is so important that it should engage all of us in an effort to discover answers to the problem. In order to do that, we must share a sense of the reality of economic conditions, shear away some of the more florid and flamboyant rhetoric—with apologies to some members who preceded me—and give an accurate portrayal of what is taking place in this country. In this way we will have a road map to guide us.

I do not think any of us gain by constantly shooting into the air great clouds of smoke and fog in an effort to cause confusion. I will try to dissipate some of that fog and smoke generated by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes). I do not think he was as relevant with his remarks today as he was two weeks ago, when he spent half an hour of the time of the House trying to decide what time it was. His remarks were far more relevant in that debate than they are in this. He did not do his party or this House a service by bringing forward a convoluted tabulation of statistics which was obviously geared to certain election proceedings taking place outside this House, and he totally obscured the reality of what is taking place in this country.

It is interesting to see how people use statistics in different ways. I think it is necessary to provide some correction to the position taken by the hon. member in the propositions he put forward. First of all, he tried to indicate that unemployment is uniquely and solely the problem of this country. He suggested, as did the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), that Canada had the worst employment problem in the world. As you and I know, Mr. Speaker, that is totally contrary to the truth. Over the past decade, even over the past year, we have had the highest growth in employment of any industrial country with the exception of Australia, which this year had a rate .1 per cent higher than ours. In the period 1973 to 1979, the employment growth rate in Canada was 3.2 per cent, compared to the United States where it was 2.5 per cent, Japan, 1 per cent, West Germany minus .6 per cent, Italy 1.5 per cent, Sweden 1.1 per cent and the United Kingdom .4 per cent.

For all the flourish of the hon. member opposite, he does not deal with the facts. Last year 326,000 jobs were created in this country. In the last three months 140,000 jobs were created. In the last year 178,000 jobs were created for women alone. The employment rate for women has dropped from 7.5 per cent, when the Conservatives took power, to 6.2 per cent this year.

We can take some satisfaction from those facts, Mr. Speaker. They are not the total answer, but we should not be running our country down and denying the progress made in the light of very serious and negative world-wide economic conditions.

It is crazy to talk about the employment picture while avoiding what is going on in the world around us. Does the hon. member for Calgary West, the oil-producing centre of Canada, forget that oil prices have gone up 500 per cent, 600 per cent, 700 per cent, 800 per cent since 1973? This has generated huge profits and enormous inflationary pressures on our economy and every other economy. Is the hon. member not aware that, in order to fight those highly inflated pressures, all governments would have had to introduce stronger monetary and fiscal controls in an effort to keep down the rate of inflation?

I have heard the hon. member and other members of the Tory opposition speak with great fondness of the economic posture taken by the Conservative Party in Great Britain. Does he know that the unemployment rate in Great Britain today is 11.3 per cent, 4 per cent higher than ours? That is the result of the very kinds of policies that are advocated by the hon. member for York-whatever-it-is, the "hon. slasher" and other members, in the Crosbie budget.

I have heard the hon. member for Calgary West speak at great length about the injustices of the National Energy Program. He said it is going to ruin the economy. Let me point out for his interest a second statistical fact, that every time a dollar is added to the price of a barrel of oil, it has an impact of 0.1 per cent reduction in the employment growth of this country. That adds up to 11,000 jobs. If we compare the pricing put forward in our National Energy Program with the proposal advanced in the Crosbie budget, we see that we would have had an additional 140,000 people unemployed in this country by 1984. This is the kind of hypocrisy and double standard that hon. members opposite are trying to perpetuate. They proposed an economic policy that would lead to higher unemployment, less sharing of the wealth of this country, and a greater and more serious impact upon the non-oil producing areas.

Let me point out another fact which I frankly find funny. The hon. member for Calgary West has a hobby-horse that he rides about the growth in public service employment. Day in and day out he castigates this awful federal government for adding to the employment rolls of the public service and letting the private sector go free. If he were to look at the Statistics Canada reports a little more carefully, he would see that the growth rate in the public service at the federal level was 1.5 per cent. The real growth in public service employment came from the provincial governments. Over the last quarter it reached 14 per cent. It was the provincial premiers, upon whom he daily lavishes his fondness, who contributed to the growth of the public service in Canada of 14 per cent versus the federal 1.5 per cent.

• (1600)

It is time we got down to the real facts and realized what is taking place regarding the employment situation in this country. It is time we forgot the fol-de-rol and the fog which the hon. member from Calgary is trying to create. He stands in this House with all the drama at his command and says "Think of the poor people in Prince Edward Island. Think what they face today as they go to the polls, comparing the records of the Liberal and Conservative governments."

I would like to make one comparison which the people in Prince Edward Island, I think, would find interesting. It was the Conservative government which cancelled and decimated the direct employment programs which provided hundreds of jobs for people in Prince Edward Island. In fact, close to $45 million has been spent this year alone in direct employment grants. This has provided for the development of new wharves and harbours and new programs for long-range economic development. As well, it has provided for the introduction of the new, innovative program to develop long-term community employment.

That is what the people of Prince Edward Island gained by the defeat of the Conservative government a year ago. They gained the assistance of government in ensuring there would be employment wherever it was necessary. The Conservative government cancelled the direct employment programs which are absolutely necessary in the provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, northern Manitoba and northern Alberta. If the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) had asked for more money to create jobs for the Indian bands, he would have been in a sorry pickle if there had been a Conservative government sitting on this side, because there was no program from which he could have received money.

Let us not get involved in this great gnashing of teeth; instead, let us get down to the real issue of employment, which is: How do we direct government programs in the most effective way? That is the question. The hon. member for Hamilton-Mountain said that we do not have a plan of action, that there is nothing there.

Miss MacDonald: That is absolutely right.

Mr. Axworthy: I take issue with the hon. member for Hamilton-Mountain and point out to him how we have a well devised strategy, one on which we are working and which is having success. It is pointing in the direction we have to go in the 1980s. We have tried to do a careful analysis of who it is that is unemployed. The hon. member from Calgary kept talking about the other person in his block. In Alberta that is not much of a problem because the unemployment rate there is 4.1 per cent. For males over 25 in Canada the unemployment rate in Alberta is only 4.5 per cent. By most economist's standards, that is virtually full employment within that specific group. You must take into account that a lot of people change jobs.

Mr. McDermid: Changing jobs?

Mr. Axworthy: The hon. member from Brampton obviously has economic training, which is something to be desired. He should know that each month 300,000 people come into the work force and 300,000 people leave the work force. People do change jobs, you know. They look for improvement. They provide for new opportunities. People try to go where the jobs are. There is obviously a constant flow in and out of the unemployment ranks.

The hon. member talks with great pride about his government's record concerning jobs for women. I will tell the House what our record is. His mathematics are not very good. We created 182,000 jobs in the last 12 months; in other words, 15,000 jobs per month for women in Canada.

Miss MacDonald: You do so much for women.

Mr. Axworthy: That is true. I will talk to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) because she has a bad memory when it comes to what we are doing.

Miss MacDonald: I have a great memory.

Mr. Axworthy: She prefers to latch on to the sensational. I cannot be responsible for the sensational tactics of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Miss MacDonald: You find it tiresome, I know.

Mr. Axworthy: She is far more interested in her publicity and press clippings than in actual performance and progress, as we saw in the record of her own government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McDermid: Look who's calling the kettle black.

Mr. Axworthy: The record speaks for itself.

Mr. Jarvis: It is despicable.

Mr. Axworthy: I do not have to get on the soap box, as does the hon. member from Kingston to proclaim her intent. Our record proves what we have done. Our record shows the kinds of achievements we have made.

Miss MacDonald: Some record.

Mr. Axworthy: It goes back to the analysis that we made that hard core unemployment is concentrated on people in certain regions and groups.

Mr. Jarvis: You cannot believe this?

Mr. Axworthy: If you really look at who is unemployed, it is not most Canadians. Unemployment is concentrated among certain people in regions of Canada where there is no economic development. That is one reason this government in its early days established a DREE program. We have spent $600 million on DREE this year. This was to try to bring economic development to the poorer regions of Canada, to make sure they would have an equal opportunity. That is why we put the concept of equalization into the charter of rights in the constitutional package, so disparagingly talked about by members opposite. It was done to ensure that the poorer regions of Canada would have a fair share of the revenues. The hon. member for Calgary ignores that resource revenues for the people of Alberta are 15 times what they are for the people of Prince Edward Island. This concept of equalization in the charter of rights can somehow rectify that disparity so that there can be some kind of common standard across Canada. We think a charter of rights is important because of the need to equalize opportunities in this country.

Miss Jewett: That does not have a thing to do with it, Lloyd.

Mr. Axworthy: Let us talk about the necessity to equalize those opportunities. That is where the unemployment issue really resides. Our strategy was to begin to allocate our programs and resources to meet hard core unemployment. First, we reintroduced the direct employment programs. They were geared in terms of allocation to the poorer regions and areas of Canada. It may be of some interest to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, who has such a scoffing attitude toward the record of this government, that over 50 per cent of the participants in those programs were women. That is because we introduced an affirmative action program, something which her government never had the guts or ability to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: The hon. member can laugh, but that simply shows how committed she is to the issue. Rather than standing up and promoting the development of affirmative action programs to reduce the work barriers faced by native people, women and those who are disabled or handicapped she scoffs at it. That shows her commitment to the problems of women. She scoffs at our attempts at affirmative action programs.

Mr. Jarvis: You are beginning to take yourself seriously again.

Mr. Axworthy: That just shows how really committed the hon. member is.

Miss Jewett: Talk to your colleague.

Miss MacDonald: Find out from other women, Lloyd.

Mr. Axworthy: Let me talk about the non-traditional training programs which we brought in for women to assist them to move into new occupations which they have been prevented—

Miss MacDonald: You are getting tiresome.

Mr. Axworthy: We may be getting tiresome, but frankly, I find the hon. member opposite really demonstrates her true colours, which have nothing to do with the causes she espouses. She does not support real efforts to bring about improvements, progress or reform. All I ask is that the people of this country look at the record of her government in these areas, at the cancellation of employment programs, the refusal to move toward an affirmative action program, and find out whose record really stands up under scrutiny.

An hon. Member: Are you smarting under it?

Mr. Jarvis: Where is Bud Cullen?

Mr. Axworthy: Let us go to the issue which was raised by the hon. member for Hamilton-Mountain, namely the issue of lay-offs. He reamed off page after page of lay-offs. He asked why we did not do something about them. Somehow in his flow of rhetoric he forgets the introduction of the industrial adjustment program. That programs has been geared exactly to the very problem he pinpoints. This country is going through technological change. Industries do go through transitions. We cannot as a government stop progress. We cannot say to industries which have been producing products for 30 and 40 years that when some new innovation comes along they should not produce, that we should subsidize and support false economies. Of course, when industry changes, jobs change too. We must provide some support for those communities which are hard hit.

It is not just government alone that has this responsibility. As a member of a party which establishes close alliances with trade unions, it might be helpful if the hon. member spoke to some of the unions about the kind of immobility which is built into certain agreements in the areas of pension plans and seniority rights. For instance, people who are laid off from work in Windsor refuse to go 100 miles down the road where there are jobs because they lose their seniority. I sympathize with them because that work is their basic right. That is why we have built into the industrial adjustment program ways of trying to promote mobility of workers so they can move their families and bring their talents and skills to areas where there are jobs.

The paradox being faced in Canada right now is that in certain regions of the country we are short of skilled workers. In western Canada alone we are short of 35,000 to 40,000 workers. It is difficult to provide a flow of people from areas where jobs are disappearing. Mobility is one of the real issues we must face in Canada. A worker in a community will build the home in which his family resides and will, of course, be reluctant to move. These workers have a vested commitment. It is their form of property rights. There has to be some support and protection of the rights of those workers.

That is why the industrial adjustment program provides retraining assistance for those who want to be retrained, provides mobility assistance for those who want to move and provides industrial grants for bringing new jobs into areas. We admit this is an innovation. It is a new program. But we think it important to try this program in order to determine its effectiveness. If it works out we can begin to apply it in other communities across Canada.

The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain is wrong when he says there is no strategy. Of course there is, and it is there in the programs. It has been announced and is now being implemented. I suggest to the hon. member that rather than standing on his feet scorching the earth with the flame of his remarks, he might be far more effective if he looked at what is happening in Sydney, Windsor and Sorel and found out just how effective that program was for people in those communites. He would find out how important it was to give them some hope and opportunity for the future, to give them some choice as to the kind of future they want to face. It gets you nowhere to engage in false rhetoric. We would ask members of the parties opposite, particularly the New Democratic Party which has such a concern for the labour force in this country, to provide support for these kinds of initiatives, and to give us the kind of backing we need to develop and expand further programs. We will not get it from the Tories, we know that. They cut programs out. They do not provide that kind of assistance. The record shows they were not doing so. We might be able to look to members of the NDP for some assistance in this area.

Finally, we should also look at some of the efforts we have made in terms of training. There is no doubt in my mind that the one way to break through hard core unemployment is by providing new training skills and new opportunities.

The composition of the work force is changing. We are now going into the era of the 1980s when there will be far more demand for blue collar skills, for technical skills, for manufacturing and construction skills. We must prepare people for those opportunities. During the 1970s the major growth was in the service industry, in areas which provided tremendous opportunity for women and young people because they were the easiest to move into.

However, in the 1980s the work force is going to change. Job opportunities will be in the manufacturing, goods-producing and construction areas. Those are the areas from which a lot of people up to this time have been excluded. This is why in the revised critical skills training program we have tried to bring about a different combination of support, so that people can get on-the-job skilled training while having the opportunity to go to an institution to improve their academic skills. This is why we introduced the non-traditional program for women. They have found difficulty getting into new occupational areas. We are now providing major subsidies for people moving into areas to which they have been denied access.

Hon. members ask what we have done. On May 1 a brand new employment program will be introduced which gears the resources of this country toward assisting the disabled and handicapped, one of the groups which finds it most difficult to get employment. We will also be gearing our employment program toward the economically disadvantaged, those who have been out of the work force for 20 weeks. It will provide an 85 per cent subsidy to employers to bring them into the job market and will provide the re-entry about which the hon. member for Calgary West talked. He must have missed his mail or has not been looking at the paper on his desk, because there was an announcement that this program will be commencing on May 1.

This again is an attempt to target our employment training program at those groups which need help most. We want to zero in on exactly where help is needed. We want to get to the chronically unemployed, bring them in to the work force and supply the support needed to do that. We want to get the private sector employers interested in overcoming some of the biases or discriminations which have faced economically disadvantaged persons. We want to provide not only the subsidy rate for the handicapped person, but incentives to employers to change equipment and facilities; that is, to build ramps and bring in new equipment.

I do not consider this is necessarily all we can do, but it is a beginning. We have other important programs, like the economic development program in respect of which we have received close to 80 applications from across this country. This is a way of providing long-term employment, working with community corporations in low employment areas.

If the hon. member wants to know what we are doing, those are the kind of efforts we are making. We still believe more can be done. That is one reason we have a parliamentary task force, and why in a matter of a very few short weeks we will be tabling in this House and presenting to Parliament the findings of the reviews we have been undertaking in our own department in respect of unemployment insurance and labour markets. In this way we can provide a further new direction which can be debated in this House, by labour and by business, in order to establish a different approach to employment, training efforts and initiatives for the decade of the 1980s.

I think we are trying to make an effort to respond to the changing composition of the work force and of unemployment. We are doing it in the context of what is real, what is practical and what is effective, not what is purely rhetorical and irrelevant.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, we have been treated this afternoon to three entirely different speeches. We have just finished listening to the hon. minister of hoodwinking. I guess I am one of those terribly cruel, uncaring Progressive Conservatives who does not care for the little people or the unemployed, who wants to see them unemployed. That is a complete and utter falsehood which he travels around the country spreading. I want it to be known right now that this kind of nonsense will not be swallowed by the people of Canada. The people of Canada are too smart to accept that kind of gobbledygook.

The minister went on to say how cruel our budget was. The National Welfare Council said it was the fairest budget it had seen for the poor people in Canada. The Canadian people will not accept the minister's nonsense, and I want to tell him that the Progressive Conservative Party does not run Canada down. We like to build it up. We are a party of builders. For him to stand and say we do nothing but run it down is utter nonsense; and he should know better than to stand in this House and spread that sort of nonsense in the hope that the Canadian people will accept it from him.

Let me read a motion that was presented to this House. It reads:

> That this House deplores the complete inaction of the government, after six months in office, with regard to the creation of jobs, regrets the inhumane cutbacks in the Canada Works program that have eliminated hundreds of communities across Canada that have been suffering from high levels of unemployment and condemns the government for its failure to date to bring forward a comprehensive employment strategy for the coming year.

That might sound like a Progressive Conservative motion, but it was not. It was one brought forward some time ago by a well known Liberal, I think the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox). At that time he was condemning the government for a number of things. Let us see what he is recorded as having said in Hansard last December. He was extremely critical of the government at that particular time for inaction on programs. Yet the amazing thing is that the statistics he brought out showed that the unemployment rate would go from 11 per cent to 11.4 per cent by the year 1981. Indeed this is a novel way of looking at job creation in this country. The unemployment rate, as we now know, is well over 12 per cent. This minister is not saying anything about that today.

The hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) said on December 6, 1979, during the same debate:

> Mr. Speaker, in an affluent society such as this, suggestions that a 7 per cent or 8 per cent unemployment rate is acceptable are simply shameful.

● (1620)

I have to agree. The figure is up to 11 per cent or 12 per cent. I believe he is the chairman of the Quebec caucus. Where is he now? Why is he not standing up and being heard by the Canadian people? Where is he? Why is he not condemning the government for its inaction?

I take umbrage at what the minister has been saying. He has been going around saying 130,000 jobs would have been lost if the energy policy of the Progressive Conservative Party had been implemented. Yet I find that the province of Ontario is losing jobs every day because of inaction in the energy field. People are being laid off because they are not getting the contracts from out west which they should be getting. Those contracts would be going to Canadian companies. Canada's potential is unlimited and phenomenal. I have travelled, and I find that the only country which comes close to Canada is Brazil. Brazil has a great future. It has resources and people, and so does Canada.

The problem of the shortage of skilled labour should have been addressed years ago. Instead of training Canadians to do Canadian jobs, this government has seen fit to bring skills in and not train our own young people. Today the statistics on unemployment among young people are shameful. Among young people aged 15 to 24 there are 452,000 unemployed. A year ago 439,000 were unemployed. The figure is up 3 per cent. Unemployment among men in the 15-year to 24-year age group is up 4.2 per cent, and among women it is up 1.1 per cent. Those percentages may not sound extremely high, but if we look at our population as a whole, we can see that the problem is getting much worse, not better.

Among people in the 15 to 19 age group, 7,000 more are unemployed. This means that young people coming into the work force—about whom the minister brags all the time—are in fact not getting jobs. They are not getting the meaningful jobs they should be getting. A report by Statistics Canada recently said that 25 per cent of the young people who are getting jobs are under-employed. The ministry is forecasting 13 per cent to 14 per cent unemployment among young people this summer. That is completely unacceptable.

The minister talks about his various programs. I like to call them make-work projects. There is nothing permanent about them. In my community over the winter the Canada Works program provided 12¼ jobs. They were not permanent jobs; they will last perhaps 40 to 50 weeks, but no more. These are strictly stop-gap measures, but they look good to the public. They throw out a little money; they provide 12 jobs in the riding of Brampton-Georgetown, 14 jobs in Oakville and 10 jobs in Mississauga; and on it goes. However, they just do not provide meaningful employment, especially for young people.

We spent Friday going over applications for summer employment. There were 24 applications submitted in my constituency. I think we accepted 11 applications. Those were all we could accept because of the limited budget. Summer jobs were provided for 20 young people. The minister brags about how wonderful this program is and about what a great job it does for young people. I say that is nonsense. If we had a program which provided incentives to the private sector to hire young students for the summer, we would see many more employed and much more meaningful employment.

The Progressive Conservative goal was to create a climate which would encourage the private sector to have confidence in the government. That is very important. Employers are skeptical of government programs. They cannot face the paper work involved. Private industry and government must work to solve this problem, but for some reason the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) does not trust the private sector. He wants to do everything through grants and special programs.

I can give an example of how the small business person is skeptical of the government. Recently a tender was sent out by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) to 52 small businesses in Canada. Only ten applications were returned to him. Twenty-eight tender calls were sent out in Ontario, but there were only four responses. Why? A couple of the small businessmen came to me and explained why; it was the paper work. They have to go through an absolutely horrendous amount of paper work to tender on jobs. That is ridiculous. My point is that the private sector does not trust the government. That is a shame, because it should and they should work together. However, they do not.

The minister continues to create little programs to throw a few dollars here and a few dollars there in the hope that that will solve the problem. Private employment incentive programs introduced by the Progressive Conservatives would have stimulated employment by allowing employers to claim $80 weekly tax credits for providing jobs. They would have had the option of carrying unused portions of the credits forward. That policy addressed a couple of problems. It addressed itself to the employment of youth, which is very important. Youth is a very major target group. I would say almost half a million youths in this country are unemployed. The statistics say the number is a little smaller, but those are the ones we know of. The Progressive Conservative policy would have led us away from the trend, which the Liberals have established, toward creating a society in which young people are frustrated with the job market. What we are creating is a generation of unemployment insurance and welfare recipients. Young people—and they will tell the minister this—are fed up. They want continued employment, and they want futures they can plan.

What do we do in our apprenticeship programs? There are ten months of on-the-job training—hands on training—and then two months of classroom work. What do they do in the two months? They apply for unemployment insurance. The first thing we teach in an apprenticeship program is how to apply for unemployment insurance. That is a ridiculous approach. There must be better ways. As a matter of fact, I recommended one in this House to the minister of state responsible for student loans which would make far more sense than teaching young people to become dependent on unemployment insurance during an apprenticeship program. That is completely unacceptable.

We hear horror stories about how terrible our employment plans would have been and about how they would not have created any jobs. That, of course, is complete nonsense. Up to 105,000 young people could have been placed in meaningful jobs, 89,000 of them in the private sector. We proposed a youth employment secretariat, which would have zeroed in on youth employment programs, monitored existing programs and co-operated with the private sector and provincial governments to harmonize programs. Right now governments are going off in all directions. There are some good provincial programs, but the federal programs are not in any way tied in with what is happening in the provinces. That situation must change as well.

Our national youth service program would have placed 14,000 young people in Canada with the volunteer sector. They would have been working on federal, provincial or community projects. They would not have had to depend on unemployment insurance. That would have been a very important program.

● (1630)

According to the present minister, $100 million would have been spent to create jobs for 49,000 students. That means that in my constituency 20 students will get jobs. Under our program we proposed to set aside the same amount of money, which is rather ironic. But it would have created 70,000 jobs, 21,000 more than is planned by the present government. That is poor planning. I grant that money is being spent on job creation, but it is not being spent wisely.

I wish to point out a couple of other matters the minister raised during his criticism of the use of statistics which I found rather interesting. He talked about how the federal government will increase its staff by only 1.5 per cent. I note with interest that the energy minister has been given permission to increase his staff by 507 bureaucrats this year, bringing the department staff to 4,269.

To let one department grow by 13 per cent and still maintain that 1.5 per cent level, other ministries must shrink. The health department will have to say goodbye to 354 employees this year and Indian affairs will lose 398 people this year. I ask the federal government, who cares for the people? So much for the social service field. Heaven knows there is a great deal of work to be done in Indian affairs. I am sure my colleague will have some comments on that later. Obviously the social policy field is the clear loser.

Again we hear how devastating our budget was, how hard it was on the poor people. However, a professor from Ottawa's Carleton University says that this government's failure to count the effect of higher oil and gas prices on lower income groups through an energy tax credit, which had been the feature of the 1979 Conservative budget of John Crosbie, indicates the relative abandonment of social priorities.

The minister likes to say that by the time the next election rolls around the baby boom will be moving through and we will be very short of labour in the not too distant future. A few years ago that might have been the case, but recent studies suggest that that is really wishful thinking. For example, in Executive magazine of December, 1980, John Kettle wrote:

> At the end of the 1980s, the labour force should still be growing at around 2 per cent a year, and this is most unlikely to precipitate a labour shortage.

I therefore say to the government that it is time they took a long, hard look at their programs and policies. They should zero in on the young people of Canada who are experiencing unemployment rates of 13, 14 and 15 per cent. In a country with a future like Canada, that is completely unacceptable. In fact, it is a national disgrace.

I hope the minister will zero in on this area and present some policies which will give the young people of Canada some long-term, meaningful employment, jobs and careers they can count on for years to come.

[Translation]

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration for the honour he is affording me, especially today, by inviting me to speak to this motion of the official opposition concerning employment in Canada. I did say "especially today" because an election is being held today in Quebec. I did my duty this morning and I take a few moments to invite and urge the people of Quebec, particularly in my federal riding of Gatineau, to exercise their right to vote so that tomorrow morning the electors will not look at themselves in the mirror while shaving and say: I should have gone out to vote. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the best way to safeguard the right to vote is to exercise it.

Mr. Speaker, a debate such as this one is indeed what we need, for it will enable us to set Canada's employment situation in its true and full perspective and to point out—and this will be the thrust of my speech—how and to what extent the federal government has contributed to create jobs throughout Canada. Of course, in a system of free economy such as ours where people choose to do what they want and where we experience difficulties which affect certain regions or certain industries, there is unemployment. But we should not forget that in spite of that our workers enjoy one of the highest standards of living in the world. Unfortunately people do seem to forget that Canadians, be they in Quebec, Ontario or Alberta, have one of the highest standards of living in the world. Should it be recalled as well that in our economic system the main responsibility for creating jobs rests with the private sector? The role of governments, including the federal government, is to help private industry and create a more favourable climate for growth and expansion through budgetary or other measures.

Mr. Speaker, hardly a few weeks ago the federal government selected five regions, including Tracy-Sorel and Sept-Îles, both in Quebec, where it launched a $350 million assistance program to help regions and industries going through particularly hard times. Incidentally the federal government's job-creating role has undergone tremendous changes in recent years so that it could make a larger contribution in the creation of employment. Mr. Speaker, former manpower and immigration ministers used to hold responsibilities which were limited to placing and training workers.

During the seventies, the government launched various schemes, including the Local Initiative Program and the Opportunities for Youth Program, which once developed and improved became, for instance, the Canada Works Program, and now the community development projects which benefit Canadians by the thousands who are happy to be involved in useful projects hundreds of millions of dollars.

● (1640)

The integration of the Unemployment Insurance Commission into the Department of Employment and Immigration has favoured also a better co-ordination of the services to the benefit of the workers. Finally, we should not overlook that, at the same time, the federal government shares with the provinces the cost of workers' training to the tune of $800 million. I would be remiss not to mention that in the areas of training and retraining as well as job creation, the department pays special attention to the particular needs of the young, the women, the Indians and the handicapped. But today, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with the Federal Government's employment programs, namely, the Community Development Projects, the Community Services Projects, the Local Economic Development Assistance (LEDA), the New Technology Employment Program, and finally, the Summer Youth Employment Program.

Under the community development program, government assistance is granted to all areas of the country, with special emphasis on areas of high unemployment. Last fall, for example, $1,400,000 were committed to special projects in the Windsor area where many auto workers were laid off. Also, $7 million were committed to programs set up by natives in various regions. This was in addition to the $32.6 million provided through the local economy development assistance program and aimed at native communities across Canada. Also, Mr. Speaker, $10 million were added to the worker training program budget for special native requirements.

With regard to the community development program which, as we all know, is aimed at helping local organizations which develop and administer temporary job opportunities for the unemployed, I am pleased to report that as of April 2 last, 3,842 projects had been funded through federal grants for a total of $100,249,400. A little over $40 million were earmarked for community renewal and development projects, $11 million for fish breeding and related industries, $9 million for tourism, over $7 million for long term local economic development, with the remainder being split between conservation, housing, environmental clean up, and other local or regional economic initiatives.

The purpose of the community services program is to help support projects lasting up to three years and aimed at creating jobs for the unemployed, especially the young, the handicapped women, and native people. Among the organizations which have actively supported this program, let us mention the Chambers of Commerce, the YMCAs and the YWCAs, as well as other organizations serving the handicapped and other special needs groups of our society.

There were 456 projects approved, for a total of 1,080 jobs, and some 336 of those projects will last almost three years and, in many cases, will lead to permanent jobs. This program is still at the experimental stage, but has already been enthusiastically received by many social groups. The purpose of the program is to help such non-profit organizations as day care centres, distress centres, and senior citizens agencies, as well as to promote the development of voluntary services and help them become independent.

Particular attention is paid to programs for native people, women and immigrants. About a quarter of the projects will be directed to women, 14 per cent to native people and 12 per cent to immigrants. The federal cabinet has approved allocation of $11 million for this program during the fiscal year 1981-82. Mr. Speaker, the new technology employment program is designed to provide employment for the graduates of specialized courses in technical and scientific areas who have trouble finding employment in their field. It allows small businesses, research centres, as well as associations, community organizations and even individuals to receive salary subsidies to create jobs in research and development. The department has already received 647 applications which could result in the creation of 1,225 jobs. Sixty-two percent of applications come from small businesses and 72 per cent are directly related to research and development.

Mr. Speaker, the federal contribution to salaries can go as high as 75 percent up to a maximum of $290 per week per job for a maximum period of 12 months. The maximum amount that can be paid to an individual employer is $150,000. As I stated earlier, most of the recipients under this program are small businesses, but there are also other major employment sources in universities and colleges (13.14 per cent) and research centres (6.33 percent). Funds amounting to $6.6 million have been allocated to this program for 1980-81, and it is expected, Mr. Speaker, that the federal contribution for 1981-82 will exceed $7.4 million. Since the end of the current fiscal year, 56 new applications have been received and are now being processed.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to tell this House about another important job creation program known as LEDA, or the Local Economic Development Assistance Program, which is administered jointly by the Commission of Employment and Immigration of Canada and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. This program innovates in the field of community development. Its purpose is to assist small and medium size semi-rural communities which unfortunately always have a high unemployment rate, on the condition, Mr. Speaker, that these communities make themselves some effort to ensure the success of their economic development. This program is in two stages. During the first stage, the community can receive up to $50,000 for planning purposes. Acceptance of a development project leads to the operational stage, during which a LEDA Corporation can receive $250,000 a year for three years. This can be used to develop economic projects or studies or to support existing or even planned businesses. The projects of 13 communities have already been approved for an amount of up to $50,000 since they are only at the initial phase. It is expected for the fiscal year 1980-81 that approval will be given to 874 projects in which about 10,195 people, including 42 percent of young people and 32 percent of women, will take part. Finally, Summer Canada will provide this year $76.7 million to create employment for about 32,800 students.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to point out that in my riding, that of Gatineau, the department spent over $250,000 to create jobs for students. Those students must all be listening to this debate, and it is important that today's youth should listen to this debate; they will get jobs through the Canada manpower centres. A part of the $21.7 million allotted this program is redistributed by various federal departments and organizations. Past experience as well as unemployment rates and regional job opportunities for students are taken into account. The same criteria will be used for the other part of the $46 million program administered by the Employment and Immigration Commission on which hon. members will be consulted to find out whether or not they are in favour of setting up local advisory committees. The projects to be given priority will concern parks, recreation camping grounds and services, health and social services, energy conservation and renewable energy, tourism, arts and culture, as well as services for the handicapped.

• (1650)

Mr. Speaker, I close on these words. I am optimistic about the future of our country. The minister and his department have made efforts and much has been undertaken. I congratulate the minister on the programs he has introduced, and I feel

I can use the words he has used time and time again: This is only a start and not the end; it is only the start towards a better future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook)—Housing—Effect of inflation on industry and home owners; the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert)—Royal Canadian Mounted Police—Possibility of compensatory payments to Ontario and Quebec; the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid)—Supply and Services—Re-opening of contract to construct F-18 fighter aircraft.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—FUTURE FACING UNEMPLOYED CANADIANS

Consideration resumed on motion of Mr. Hawkes.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to address the motion which is before the House at the present time. I know that a number of things have been said about the rising unemployment, which is increasing right across Canada.

In his remarks the minister compared unemployment conditions in Canada with those in Great Britain. I suggest it is a real fallacy to compare a country such as Canada, a relatively new country with boundless resources from coast to coast, indeed offshore as well, with a country like Great Britain, with its economic conditions and hardships. I suggest that the government is not addressing itself to the problems that face us today in Canada right across this country. The number of programs which have been introduced by this government, notably the National Energy Program in the budget of last fall, have clearly done nothing but put a damper on the economic growth which could be taking place in this country from coast to coast.

I would like to limit my remarks to a problem which I see increasing very drastically. It is borne out very clearly in documentation from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Before I continue I would like to provide a bit of the background. In the past two weeks members of the Bigstone band, which is a small reserve in northeastern Alberta led by Chief William Beaver, walked 240 miles from the reserve to the city of Edmonton, specifically to the Department of Indian Affairs office, to draw attention to their plight. I am talking about living conditions but, more important, their walk has been termed "a walk for economic equality". Their chant has been: "We want jobs, we want jobs." There is a fallacy abroad in our land, and unfortunately some people believe it—one wonders if members of the government believe it as well—that Indians are lazy and do not want to work. I would like to remind the government that Indian people who walk 240 miles to demand jobs are not lazy. These people are sincere in their efforts to gain economic equality with their white brothers.

Mrs. Appolloni: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member opposite has just accused Liberal members of saying that Indians are lazy. No Liberal member has said that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. Shields: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is obvious that the hon. member who rose on a point of order was not listening to my remarks. I suggest that rather than stand behind the curtain she remain in her chair; then perhaps she will hear what I have to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Shields: I would like to talk about social conditions on Indian reserves. My statistics come from a survey conducted by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Life expectancy is a reflection of health standards or living conditions. For Indians, life expectancy is ten times less than it is for the rest of the population. Violent deaths on reserves are three times higher than the national average. Suicides, and in particular suicides in the 15 or 24 years age group, are more than six times higher than the national rate.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, a 15 or 16 year-old waking up some morning and seeing abject poverty, total futility in their lifestyle and living conditions, lack of opportunity, and deciding that he or she will commit suicide. The situation has reached almost epidemic proportions on Indian reserves. You cannot go to a reserve where the people have not experienced the tragedy of a young person committing suicide. In a country like ours, in the year 1981, that situation is absolutely atrocious. The strength and stability of family units appears to be eroding. There is a higher divorce rate, more births outside of marriage and more children in care. These are the social conditions which exist.

The next statistic I want to give you, Mr. Speaker, is probably the most significant one since it alone comments on the programs which have been offered by the government to assist native people. In 1964 an estimated 36 per cent of the Indian population received social assistance or welfare. In 1977-78, between 50 per cent and 70 per cent received social assistance. In a matter of 13 to 14 years the number of Indian people who received social assistance increased from 30 per cent to between 50 and 70 per cent.

• (1700)

One must then draw the conclusion that we are not actively providing economic opportunity, training or jobs. In the past ten years, there has been a total investment in the Indian communities across Canada of $250 million, creating 10,000 jobs. We must create 20,000 to 30,000 new jobs in the next 10 years. What is happening? Economic development funds are being withdrawn and budgets are being reduced. I will give the House a comparison. In the fiscal year just ending, in Wabasca, the people of Chief William Beaver of the Bigstone band said enough is enough and decided to walk from northeastern Alberta to Edmonton, a distance of 240 miles, suffering severe hardship. Indeed, some women were in their fifties and sixties and had arthritis. Little children also joined the walk. But they completed that march because last year alone $1.5 million was spent in that community on social assistance and welfare, but only $40,000 was spent on economic development. That shows the priority that the present government places on economic development in native communities.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has now been given the responsibility, through the western Canada development fund which gives priority to the economic development of native peoples, to search out and develop the economic viability of various reserves so that native Indians people on the reserves can be gainfully employed. We hear stories from the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox), from Indian affairs, from manpower, about various programs that the government are throwing out all the time to create employment.

Certainly, some programs were developed. There was the Canada development program where communities submitted projects and said: "These are the things we're going to develop in our communities and it is going to create so many man-hours of employment." But they are stop-gap measures. They are like frosting. There is nothing underneath. They remind me of the great big cake one sometimes sees in the lobby of a hotel, with candles and frosting, but if one cuts through the frosting there is nothing but a cardboard shell. There is nothing inside; there is no substance.

We must project a five or ten-year program and say, "This is what we are going to do with economic development."

I hear the comment that we are spending too much money on Indian people. Federal government expenditures for Indians increased 14 per cent per capita in real terms between 1970-71 and 1978-79, a period of nine years. At the same time, there was 128 per cent per capita growth in other federal social programs. Other federal social programs increased 128 per cent, but programs and expenditures aimed directly at the Indian people in that same period of nine years increased only 14 per cent. We know that that 14 per cent does not even keep up with inflation.

By all conservative estimates, Indian unemployment in Canada reaches anywhere from 35 to 75 per cent, depending on the locality. I ask all hon. members to think for a moment. What constituency would accept an unemployment rate ranging from 35 to 75 per cent? Not one. There would be such a furore developed in the community that hon. members opposite would not be sitting in the House of Commons; they would be thrown out on their ears.

The same would be said of any government which allowed that kind of unemployment to exist in any community. I am talking about white communities. However, it is an accepted fact that there is 35 per cent to 75 per cent unemployment right across Canada in Indian communities. We create situations where we are prepared to spend, on one band, on one reserve, $1.5 million in welfare, which is destructive, rather than spend $40,000 for economic development in a community which would create jobs. These are not my figures. These are figures that come right out of the survey prepared by the Indian affairs and northern development department. I have more copies if hon. members want them.

Let us talk for a moment about the human misery of an individual who must go home day after day to his wife and children and knowing he cannot provide for them because he is unemployed. Must he not say to himself periodically, "I wonder what my children think of me because they know I am not working and cannot get a job?" Is it any wonder that violence breaks out in the community? Is it any wonder that there is an abnormal amount of alcoholism on many reserves? Is it any wonder that young children—and I mean young children, 14, 15, 16 years of age—who should be looking forward to great opportunities, wake up some morning and decide that they do not want to live any more, that life is not worth living and they take their own lives? It is something to which we must all address ourselves. It is too bad that the hon. member who raised a point of order would not stop talking long enough to listen to what I have to say, because I think it is important.

Is there a way to stop this erosion which is taking place on reserves in Indian communities? Certainly there is. Many of the people living in Indian communities today are illiterate. Others have minimal education. What is the difference? We are prepared to spend from $30,000 to $100,000 educating young people raised in white communities so that they can become productive citizens. The Department of Employment and Immigration buys training positions in educational institutions. Indian people do not take advantage of these because the entrance requirement in vocational schools is usually grade nine education at least, and they do not have that.

• (1710)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his allotted time has expired.

Unemployment

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see that the debate has taken a new turn, because the last three speakers have spoken more constructively than the first ones I heard.

I should like to deal this afternoon with five areas, and I hope to make suggestions and recommendations to my colleagues so that they will know that positive measures are being taken in Canada in connection with the employment of Canadians.

[English]

The five areas that I should like to touch on are employment service, industrial and labour market adjustment, training, direct job creation and, if possible, disadvantaged employment.

Il va sans dire, Mr. Speaker, that the provision of an effective employment service is one of the main responsibilities of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is also a responsibility for every member of Parliament in this House.

I am fully aware of those aspects of the Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission service that can and should be improved. I am impressed with much of its performance to date and its plans for improvement. Just last Friday the Minister of Employment and Immigration presided at the official opening of the metropolitan order processing system in Toronto. This is a computerized method of recording all job vacancies and unemployed clients in a metropolitan area. It is a far cry from the paper-based technology which quite often resulted in an employment centre knowing very little about its clients or the job openings in its immediate area.

What is the significance of this innovative system? First, it has proved that the CEIC process has had a dramatic effect on the quality of service provided to employers and to workers. For example, MOPs, as it is called, the metropolitan order processing system, was installed in metropolitan Vancouver two years ago and was a major factor contributing to the 50 per cent increase in the number of vacancies listed and people placed by Canada employment centres in greater Vancouver.

The second and perhaps most important consequence that should be associated with the launching of MOPS in Toronto is that it signifies and is symbolic of a quiet revolution that according to international experts in such matters will result in the finest employment service in the free world within three or four years.

This may surprise you and some of my colleagues a little, Mr. Speaker. At first blush, I must say it took me happily by surprise. As I thought it over, I realized that the expectations against which we and the public measure the performance of Canada employment centres is really quite unrealistic. The centres are considered to be ineffective if they have not found a job for our sons, daughters or neighbours, whether or not there are any job openings for persons with their skills. Similarly, they are considered to have failed if they have been unable to find a skilled worker for any employer, whether or not the employer has fulfilled his or her obligations to train people.

What is the basis for this international opinion that Canada's employment service is emerging as the finest in the world? Partly, of course, it is a reflection of its performance to date. I will note a few of the positive results. Between 800,000 and 900,000 placements are made per year; people who go through the CEC route find jobs three weeks sooner than those who do not; 60 per cent of the people who look for jobs use the CECs as a job search vehicle. Partly, too, the international view is a reflection of our new national job bank, whereby all jobs which cannot be filled locally are entered into a national computer system and made known to all CECs across Canada.

Just as MOPS creates a "metropolitan" labour market, the national job bank has, since its inception 12 months ago, created a truly national labour market.

It sometimes happens that people in my riding have skills for which there is no demand at a particular time. The hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid) knows that we had to import people with welding skills for the naval shipyard. We were able to fill some of these jobs by going to the national job bank and bringing in people from as far away as the west coast. That bank was a great help in my previous riding. Some of the people now in that riding are currently being trained under that program.

Experts in other countries are similarly impressed with the work the CECs are doing in developing an effective employment counselling service. Counselling is the core or heart of an employment service's ability to assist people who have difficulty entering or staying in jobs. Canada is recognized internationally as a leader in the development of effective employment counselling. This is reflected in the fact that last September the first world seminar on employment counselling was held in Ottawa and attracted some 600 people from more than 15 countries.

These are just some of the reasons why the Canada employment service is so highly respected. We should take pride in the service and the people who staff its offices. It is a system which brings job seekers and job vacancies together effectively and efficiently for the benefit of all concerned.

I am putting great stress on the development of an effective counselling service. As hon. members know, while many of the people who come to CECs are fully job-ready, many are not. These range all the way from those who need training in how to conduct their own job search, to those who require a great deal of counselling on how to prepare themselves for the labour market and even how to retain employment. Of course, such counselling assistance is labour-intensive. However, consistent with the government's policy of helping those who need it most, this is a function that will receive priority attention.

For those members of our population who need more specialized assistance than that provided by a nominal CEC—I am thinking more of women returning to the labour market after raising their families, or natives, or the blind and the handicapped—it is vital that the CECs should organize themselves to meet the needs of such clientele.

What I have tried to do is give a brief "tour d'horizon" of the changes that are being made to help make the CECs more responsive to the needs of clients and employers. It is work that is most gratifying because it is people helping people, and it does help. Between 800,000 and 900,000 people find jobs annually.

I turn now to industrial and labour market adjustment. The hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) mentioned earlier that we would spend our money better if we gave it to small enterprises to train apprentices and prepare them for the job market. One of our priorities is to ensure that we reap the employment and economic benefits of changes in technology and trade patterns. Such changes have brought immense benefits in the past and will do so in the future, but—and I emphasize this—only if we make them work for us.

• (1720)

That is one of the key reasons for the $350 million industrial and labour adjustment program. It provides industrial and labour incentives to help make the shift toward the industries and jobs of the future, not only those of today. It has several broad features. First, it has provision for the enhancement of our critical trades skill training program, which assists industry to train many of the skilled people we need, such as millwrights, industrial mechanics, heavy duty equipment operators and industrial electricians. We need these people in about 27 key occupational areas. In addition, it is to make provision during slack times for the continuation of the training of laid-off apprentices in key trades, even if they are not in institutions or industry, and it provides for stepping up skill training in trade centres across the country.

A second broad element is the provision of industrial incentives in key industries. Both the critical trades skill training and the industrial incentives will help industry to expand and take advantage of new opportunities.

A third, very important element is the community-based portion of the program. Here I digress a moment to explain the community-based program we have in mind. It is to be used for the revitalization of industry by the designation of communities for one year with possible six-month extensions. We expect that there might be five or six such communities at any given point over the next three years. We have already moved to designate four: Sept Îles-Port Cartier; Tracy-Sorel; Windsor and Sydney.

In the communities selected a range of incentives will be available to help existing firms expand or change and to help new firms to come to the community. Just as importantly, there will be a range of measures to assist workers to adapt, including critical trades skills training, enhanced training allowances for workers training in labour-short occupations and portable wage subsidies to assist the re-employment of workers 46 or more years of age. There will be early retirement benefits for workers over 55 years old who have extreme difficulty adapting and cannot realistically expect to find new, high-paying employment. We will also be providing community employment programming to stimulate the local job market during the period of transition. For those who choose to move elsewhere, we will provide for a tripling of mobility benefits.

We now see a great number of workers going from the Atlantic provinces, Ontario and Quebec, to the west, specifically to Alberta and British Columbia. I visited the tar sands project around Fort McMurray last summer. At that time I spoke to many people who had taken advantage of the mobility grants which were put forward by the government. These people were the ones who benefited greatly because they got jobs. But I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all hon. members in the House that the people who run the tar sands, a project which will benefit all Canadians, also benefit because those men and women brought their skills with them and contributed to the over-all betterment of that area.

Another area I want to address this afternoon concerns training. Canada has one of the most substantial and significant adult occupational training systems in the world. It consists of basic training for skill development and occupational training in institutions, industrial training, apprenticeship training and critical trade skills training. Although training does not itself create jobs, it can and does enable people to fill them. It is crucial both for economic and employment growth. The availability of a skilled worker is often crucial to the employment of several other people. For example, how many times would you see one bricklayer, because of his particular skill, create three or four labour-intensive jobs? The same could be said of electricians and plumbers.

We are awaiting the results of the work of the special parliamentary committee and other bodies on the direction the training program should take for the future. In the meantime, we have moved to make better provision, through critical trades skills training, for training people in high level skills, mostly in apprenticeable areas, people who are needed in the economy now and whose skills will be required three to five years down the road when their training is completed.

I submit that training programs are very important. Financial provision for the industrial training program, including apprenticeship, will be at least $196 million this fiscal year, providing training for 132,500 people.

Provision of occupational, prerequisite, basic educational and immigrant language training will cost at least $362.7 million this fiscal year. In addition, $96 million will be provided to pay basic support allowances to people taking this training, and up to $190 million will be made available to continue the unemployment insurance benefits of others while they take this training. Altogether, we expect that about 170,000 people will receive training in institutions this fiscal year.

Direct job creation is worthy of study. Direct job creation is being used as a flexible, targeted approach to create jobs in areas where they are needed, with particular focus on the needs of those groups of unemployed with the greatest need. The fundamental purpose is to provide employment at times and in areas where the private sector is either contracting or is unable to expand rapidly enough to keep unemployment rates at an acceptably low level. The funding levels cannot themselves illustrate the second main purpose of job creation programming namely, to utilize the skills and energy of the unemployed to produce goods and services of benefit to the community at large.

Direct job creation is a quicker, more effective and less inflationary policy instrument for intervention on the demand side of the labour market than tax cuts, increased general government expenditure, or increased transfer payments.

A recent OECD study of direct job-creation programming in a number of countries, including Canada, gives positive recognition to this country's ability to create needed employment in a targeted and relatively inexpensive manner which responds to needs at the community level. The study estimated the program's net cost at between one half and two thirds of its gross cost. As noted by OECD, the relatively low wage levels do not contribute to upward pressure on wages generally and thus have little or no inflationary impact in times of economic slack. Because of their flexibility, they can be targeted on individuals and areas which benefit least, or not at all, from more traditional measures.

A key aspect of the evolution of direct job creation programming has been focused on sponsorship of projects by responsible organizations and the establishment of clear federal priority areas of activity.

● (1730)

I direct my final statements to current job creation programs which are providing in excess of 50 jobs for the young people in my riding. I think this is an innovation which is good not only for the community but for the country at large. I should hope that all hon. members will be very diligent in making sure that the young people who are employed under these projects this summer in their areas will have the opportunity to develop those skills needed to fill the jobs they will no doubt be filling in the future.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my appreciation for the opportunity this afternoon of taking part in the debate on this opposition motion. It involves a topic which is extremely critical in Canada today. It involves a matter with which members and others in areas directly responsible for the economic interests of our country should be concerned.

The motion states in part:

> That this House expresses its sorrow and sympathy for the more than one million Canadians who are unable to find work and who, with their families, face an uncertain future—

The fact of the matter is, those words are only too true. The future of those Canadians certainly is, at the very best, uncertain. We all must feel compassion and we should be expressing our sorrow and sympathy to those people who would be in the work force if they just had the opportunity of finding employment in this country, employment denied to over one million employable Canadians.

These Canadians want more than our sympathy and sorrow. They expect more and, in my opinion, they should receive more. These people want the consideration of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). They want the consideration and affection of the people who work in his department. They expect members of this House of Commons, their elected representatives, to address themselves to the plight they are currently facing; the difficulties they are having in providing a living for their families, education for their children and in coping with day to day inflation, higher food costs, higher energy costs and higher clothing costs. Most of them seem to think, and rightfully so, that the present minister and his government are certainly not addressing themselves to these problems.

As a member from Atlantic Canada, I intend to deal specifically with the problems being faced by the people of that area. I intend to deal with the tremendous difficulty they are experiencing in trying to find places for themselves in the work force. On a per capita basis, Atlantic Canadians experience one of the highest unemployment rates in Canada. It is my opinion and the opinion of many other Canadians that this intolerable situation should not be allowed to exist; that it is a situation which, indeed, need not exist.

Let me just give you some background statistics which indicate the real current difficulties in Atlantic Canada. My comparison will be made in respect of unemployment in March 1980 and March 1981. Realistically speaking, we have to work with the unadjusted estimates because they more closely and clearly reflect the true unemployment picture in Atlantic Canada.

In March of 1980 the unemployment rate in Newfoundland was an astounding 15.7 per cent. In March of 1981, after all the efforts of this minister and this government which, they maintain, they have expended to assist employment in this country, that rate dropped only .3 per cent to an unacceptable figure of 15.4 per cent. That indicates just how ineffectual are these programs which have been developed by the minister and this government.

The unemployment situation in Prince Edward Island is also appalling. In March of 1980 the rate was 13.4 per cent. Can you imagine an astounding unemployment rate of 13.4 per cent on an island with such a small population? Just one year later, unemployment in Prince Edward Island had increased by 2.6 per cent to an incredible 16 per cent rate. In spite of all the successful programs and efforts this government and the minister maintain they have made and have implemented to the benefit of Canadians, the unemployment rate in Prince Edward Island rose by 2.6 per cent to an intolerable 16 per cent rate in just one year.

Nova Scotia is one of the more fortunate Atlantic provinces. It is vocally and ably represented in this House by several members of the government party. Despite the fact that the government has several members in its party representing Nova Scotians in this House, the unemployment rate in that province in one year jumped one full percentage point, that is to 12.5 per cent of the total work force.

We are not proud of the fact that in New Brunswick the unemployment rate has remained fairly static at 13 per cent. Actually it went down .4 per cent during the year. It is certainly an unemployment rate from which the minister can take little comfort.

The unemployment rate in Atlantic Canada in comparison to that in the rest of Canada is unacceptable. This government should be condemned for its callous and uncaring attitude toward the difficulty Atlantic Canadians face in finding work.

The unemployment rate in Canada during the 12 month period of 1979 was 7.5 per cent, while in Atlantic Canada that rate was 11.7 per cent. Those are shameful figures. In 1978 Canada had an unemployment rate of 8.4 per cent. In the Atlantic region it was 12.5 per cent. The litany goes on and on. I could recite figure after figure, which would not be very encouraging to the people of Atlantic Canada, but suffice it to say that today, in 1981, the unemployment rate is still as intolerable as it has been in previous years. The government does nothing about it. The Department of Employment and Immigration does nothing about it. It is a disgraceful situation.

There have been no meaningful programs developed by the government. Let us not forget that this government has been in power since 1963, with the exception of a brief interlude. This government has to take responsibility for the fact that the country has been mismanaged and misgoverned. It is an economic calamity and an economic chaos that no economic development measures have been taken in Atlantic Canada, either in the short term or in the long term. There has been increasing inflation; we have seen unemployment skyrocket; Regional growth has stagnated to the point where it has ceased to exist. The difficulties in Atlantic Canada caused by inflation coupled with unemployment are just intolerable. What we require is some imagination. We require the government to implement programs which will be meaningful and create lasting jobs.

What do we get instead? We get makeshift programs which are meaningless. There is nothing of any substance. The hand-out attitude of this government toward Atlantic Canada obviously continues to be its solution to the problems of Atlantic Canada. The attitude of the government seems to be that DREE is there, that it will create part-time jobs, that the government will give Atlantic Canada equalization dollars and that that will make up for the 12.5 per cent unemployment rate which is being experienced in that area. However, that is not what Atlantic Canadians want. Atlantic Canadians want to contribute, as much as any other Canadian across this nation, to the future and to the economic stability of this country. We do not have those opportunities because this government has lacked initiative and imagination. We require the people who control departments, beginning with ministers and on down, to come up with proper policies which will create jobs and situations in which people will have the opportunity to produce and be involved in the permanent work force. We require a policy which would provide basically full employment opportunities for Altantic Canadians, or at least to the same extent as the rest of Canada has them. Obviously the minister's department is highly inefficient to the detriment of Atlantic Canadians. There is no basis on which we can pin our hopes for the future.

Various programs have been implemented. I refer, for example, to the educational programs to train people. I suppose that the fundamental idea behind them is good but they have not worked. It seems to me that the minister and his departmental officials do not really have any idea about what the programs themselves are supposed to be accomplishing.

I have received representation after representation from constituents who have experienced the frustrations of attempting to deal with the minister's department. They have attempted to enrol in some of the special programs and have been frustrated to the point where they just have not been able to fulfil their ambitions. There is a program in place called the vocational educational program. It is supposed to be assisted by the fee-pay scheme. It was created to try to draw people into the work force and to give them special training so that they can go out and train others, but in order for them to take advantage of this program they must be able to support themselves. What is happening in the meantime? People who are enrolling in these programs are finding that their applications, although acceptable to universities, are not acceptable to the Employment Insurance Commission. These people are extremely frustrated. I want hon. members to know that when people write to me and say things like "I am in a situation now where I am becoming a beggar in my own home," things are extremely serious.

I have documentation from various parts of Atlantic Canada and from various parts of my constituency which indicates that our young people, who so desperately need a foundation and a future in this country, are leaving the region literally in droves because there are no opportunities for them to upgrade their training or to better themselves so that they can qualify for jobs.

In my constituency there are the three small communities of Albert, Alma and Hillsborough. In one of them a young lady was looking for a job but was unable to find one. She was drawing unemployment insurance and trying to repay a student loan and another $500 she had borrowed from the university. She said, "My unemployment insurance has just about run out, and I am getting desperate". That just typifies the attitude of young people in this nation who are having problems in obtaining employment, and there are hundreds of thousands of them. This young lady provided me with a list of 69 young people in those three little communities to which I have referred who have left the region to seek employment outside Atlantic Canada because of lack of opportunities there.

These are frustrations people experience, and as we sit in this House of Commons we have no idea of how frustrating it must be for people who are attempting to feed their families and educate their children but cannot find jobs.

I urge the government to take this resolution very seriously indeed because it indicates that there is a desperate need in the community known as Canada for people to obtain employment, but employment is just not available.

• (1750)

The government can talk all it likes about external reasons for the desperate economic situation in our country. Ultimately they must accept the responsibility, for they are the ones who create a climate in which the country either prospers or becomes a pauperdom. Under the present administration, the future for young people in this country looking for jobs as well as for the rest who are on unemployment rolls is indeed very bleak.

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to speak on this important topic which is important not only to the unemployed who are dependent on tax dollars coming through government funds, both federally and provincially, which will provide some of the social benefits Canadians expect and should be able to obtain in this resource rich nation.

We are dealing with a topic that has had expression ever since I have been a member of this House and long before that. Over the years, the topic of unemployment in Canada has occupied much of the time of this House. However, the problem has not been resolved. In fact, over the last decade the unemployment rate has doubled.

Each month we hear over national television, radio, and the other media, the monthly proclamations of Statistics Canada on the unemployment rate in this nation. It talks about 900,000 or one million unemployed. Each month we expect the unemployment rate to increase. Despite the comments of what a great job the Department of Employment and Immigration is doing, we do not see a slackening off in the unemployment rate. In fact, it is rising.

As a former member of a profession in which I dealt with young people at the high school level, I have often thought that we cannot reflect in statistical terms the damage that unemployment does to the young people of this nation. I was pleased to hear the member who immediately preceded me talk about young people. The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) talked in terms of native people, the young people on the reserves who, out of frustration, a forlorn feeling and a lack of hope, are resorting to the tragedy of suicide, which occurs on the reserves in this country.

I cannot express strongly enough the frustration felt by young people in grades 8, 9 and 10 when they look at the rate of unemployment in this country. Those a little older in grades 11 and 12 try to choose a career for themselves. We hear about the numbers of people who have university degrees and are unemployed or underemployed, which is tragic for both the individual and this country. The young people in our high schools experience a feeling of hopelessness. They would like to have their choice of employment. They are not sure what their opportunities are. The government cannot give them any guarantees. It does not seem to be able to overcome the high rate of unemployment being experienced in Canada.

The problem with this government is more than policy. I am not sure that every member on the government side has the callous attitude of regarding the rate of unemployment as a mere statistic, although it appears that those who hold positions in the government prefer to deal with unemployment in terms of a statistical analysis. Not all are willing to accept 8 and 10 per cent unemployment, as suggested in the last budget. It is also suggested in programs initiated by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), such as summer youth employment programs, that he accepts a rate of about 8 per cent. Your riding does not receive very much in the way of funds and programs unless there is a certain amount of unemployment among the work force in that community. Programs suggested by our constituents show a need in our communities for recreational facilities, care for native people and young people, and work opportunities for our young people in our communities. The response we get indicates that there is a willingness on the part of people to work. In my riding in British Columbia, the young people have grown up with the idea that this government accepts 500,000, or one million, unemployed. It surprises me that they accept the fact that they will have tremendous difficulty in finding employment in the careers they choose.

What about the effect on the family? What about families that must support members who are perfectly capable and willing to work but find themselves in the growing reserve army of unemployed workers, an army into which the Liberal government drafts more people each day? These family members are often young and ready to work, but they are forced to remain dependent on their families because of a system that places profits and dividends ahead of job creation.

We must develop an attitude in this nation whereby we will use our resources to provide jobs for yound people. All too often we see our raw resource being exported at the cost of job and employment opportunities which go to other nations. Unemployment is left here. With today's rising costs and prices, those families supporting youngsters who are able to work could use all the income that is coming to them and more. What about the employment, income and hopes for the future of young people? What about families who live on the reduced earnings of breadwinners who are constantly out of work? Do you not think they would be better off if they could plan for the future without thinking that they might lose their home and their furniture and become unable to give their children an education because there are suddenly no more jobs? Of course they would.

What about older workers? Our society disregards people who have given years of service to the work force by allowing them to suddenly lose their job. There are very few provisions for retaining such people, despite what the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) says. They are thrown on the job market where they have to compete with young people. How do they feel?

What about Canada's native people? They have always been the last hired and the first fired. When there are fewer jobs all around, they are not hired at all. Unemployment on some reserves in my riding on Vancouver Island, next to fantastically resource-rich oceans and forest lands, is 80 or 90 per cent. The opportunities do not present themselves to our native people. How do they feel about unemployment?

The government talks about what it is doing to help women, but we see very little being done to effect those programs which help women. Official statistics show that last month unemployment among women was 8.1 per cent of the working population, compared to 6.3 per cent for men. Working women are paid less than men, and when they do not work, they draw smaller unemployment insurance payments than men. Many women who are unemployed live below the poverty line.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[English]

Mr. Miller: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock when we adjourned for the dinner hour, I was commenting about the fact that unemployment affects particularly young Canadians, native Indians and women in Canada. I would like to speak about some of the ways in which the New Democratic Party thinks the unemployment picture could improve if the government took the proper attitude toward unemployment, rather than acquiescing to it and using programs under the Department of Employment and Immigration to try to justify unemployment or to give some solace to Canadians.

In my riding of Nanaimo-Alberni, there are two very important renewable resource industries which provide opportunities for many of my constituents. One is the fisheries industry which comes under the jurisdiction of the federal government, and the other is the forestry industry which is under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Forestry Service. I think the service has responsibility to try to co-ordinate activities among the provinces, the industry and the federal government and encourage an objective look at our forests to ensure that such renewable resources continue to provide the economic stimuli they have provided in the past. We are not doing the proper job in forestry, either at the federal-provincial level or in the private sector. Indeed, we are finding that our forests are becoming a depleted resource rather than a renewable, long-term one.

We should see some leadership from the federal government in the field of intensive forestry management and in reforestation and regeneration of some of the 70 million hectares of forest land in Canada which is now lying fallow and unproductive.

W. G. Burch, the vice-president of Timberlands and Forestry company in British Columbia, at a forestry conference in Toronto last September spoke about intensive forest management. He suggested that there are some very large benefits to be gained if Canadians, through their provincial governments and with some direction from the federal government, started an intensive forest management program. He suggested that an increase in employment would be one of the main advantages of such a program. He said:

> Most forestry projects are labour intensive: in fact, it is conceivable that at certain periods of the year, a logging operation practising a full range of intensive forestry projects could employ more people on forestry work than on logging. A recent study by Les Reed indicated that an intensive forestry program across Canada would involve nearly 25,000 new jobs.

This is a productive way of employing Canadian people. Perhaps it would be more productive than some of the ad hoc programs the Liberal government likes to bring up each fall and summer which involve a few people over a few months of time. They establish a need in a community, and funding is often cut off without the demand being satisfied. The federal government could direct some of its attention toward that important field at the moment.

Fishing on the Atlantic coast, in British Columbia and inland is a very important industry in Canada. At the moment in British Columbia a very serious situation is developing in the fishing industry where people are being driven out of the industry rather than being attracted to it. Young people are not being encouraged to become involved in the fishing industry because of mismanagement on the part of the federal government and of the Liberal minister who has neglected the fishing industry in British Columbia. He has disregarded the potential employment of native people in the processing and fishing industry and of young people looking for employment opportunities along a coastline with which they are acquainted, a coastline which has a long history of salmon fishing, coastal traffic and transportation routes. However, what has happened is the result of mismanagement and the inability to control the size of the fleet. We now have a capital intensive fishing fleet which is probably overcapitalized to the point of being four or five times what we need. What that has done is to work against the young people who may wish to buy a fishing vessel and enter the industry, since the value of the licence, what people will pay for the privilege of fishing in British Columbia, at one time reached $10,000. It has been considerably reduced over the last two years, I might add, because of the poor fishing conditions.

What is happening to a renewable resource in British Columbia is that through mismanagement on the part of the government it is not implementing and enforcing some of its own fishing regulations, which attempted to stop the environmental degradation of rivers, streams and estuaries. These regulations are being totally ignored by the federal government. There are large coal port projects in Prince Rupert and off Tsawwassen in southern British Columbia which are not undergoing environmental studies by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. There are large coal thermal generation projects which will add to the acid rain problems in the very important Thompson River basin which is essential to the salmon industry. Up and down the coast there are coastal community groups fighting to preserve estuaries where salmon require a period of rearing, feeding and resting on their way to sea or, indeed, on the way back into streams for spawning purposes. We see the gradual erosion of the salmon habitat which has been reflected in the smaller runs of salmon and in the lower incomes which Canadian fishermen receive.

We have a government which has not met the challenges of providing a clean environment for our salmon resource.

The answer of the federal government is to allow those streams to be used for dumping mining and municipal wastes. We will allow our rivers and streams to be logged, debris deposited in those rivers and spawning channels ruined by logs and wood. The answer of the Liberal government will be to develop a salmon enhancement program. The Canadian taxpayer will contribute to this program which will provide hatcheries and small projects on streams which could have been raising their own salmon. The government says that it will develop this program and tell the public in British Columbia how marvellous it is and how it will project the salmon resources. If you do not deal with the real problems of environmental concerns, then it is simply a program to conserve what little salmon we have left in the province of British Columbia.

The attitude of the Liberal government to these two renewable resources is the kind of attitude it has toward most of our resources in Canada. What we need is a government which favours the protection of these renewable resources as well as of our non-renewable resources. The government should be using these resources in Canada to provide jobs. We cannot leave it up to the Minister of Employment and Immigration to come up with makeshift programs over the next ten years to solve our unemployment problems. The challenge for this Liberal government is to manage the resources in this country on behalf of the population and to provide jobs for Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member who just finished speaking left off by saying that he was worried about the fact that this government would only come up with makeshift policies to deal with what I view as long-range trends which have taken place in North American economies in the last ten years. I say that because I am convinced that the federal government is in the midst of coming up with a number of policies which, in my view, are not makeshift but, rather, perhaps for the first time, are very realistic with respect to the changes which have taken place in the economy in the past decade.

Principally, in three particular areas, I believe the government will go a long way to addressing the long range implications of changes which have taken place in the western economies in the past decade. Basically, I would like to deal with three particular policy directions which have been taken by this government in the past nine or ten months. The first direction is in the area of industrial restructuring and labour adjustments. I believe the minister alluded to this point this afternoon. I think most members in the House are aware that on January 19 of this year the minister of immigration and unemployment—

Mr. Knowles: The truth came out.

An hon. Member: It must be Freudian.

Mr. Frith: The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) decided to announce a federal commitment to industrial restructuring which would involve some $350 million worth of federal moneys going into this endeavour. The second thing that the federal government has done in the past year, by paying more than lip service to it, is to announce the government's long-range plans in increasing moneys to be placed into research and development in this country. The third major area where I think there will be a significant impact on industrial restructuring in North America will be announced in the next few months.

In my remarks tonight I would like to put forward two points. One stems from having a personal involvement in the community of Sudbury, which I now represent and have represented since February of last year. I think Sudbury can serve as a model for this nation in terms of how it came to deal with the need for this kind of industrial readjustment as a community. I think most members in the House are aware of the strife over the last three or four years in the Sudbury area. In 1977, because of changing markets on the international scene, we found that the companies required an adjustment of the total number of workers involved in the mining industry, particularly the nickel mining industry. This resulted in a fairly massive lay-off in 1977, by both the International Nickel Company and the Falconbridge Company, of some 3,000 workers. In my four-year term as the chairman of the Regional Municipality of Sudbury it meant not only a loss in terms of people from the Sudbury region but in terms of the severe hardships endured by the families concerned when this kind of massive lay-off occurs in their community. At that time there were no government policies in effect to deal with communities hard hit by massive lay-offs which would increase significantly the unemployment rate in a particular community.

Now that three years have passed I believe that the lay-offs which occurred were a precursor to a number of events which will begin to affect other sectors in Canada's economic structure. At that time, since we did not have any industrial restructuring policies, we were not aware of the need for some basic rethinking on the government's part to deal with these long-range problems. The only choice left to the unfortunate Sudburians who were laid off was to find employment elsewhere in Canada.

Over the three and a half to four years since the lay-off in 1977, the population of the Regional Municipality of Sudbury has dropped from somewhere in the neighbourhood of 170,000 people to 163,000. The majority of those 8,000 who went in search of employment elsewhere in Canada mostly had to go to western Canada to find employment. This was because their skills were largely in the mining industry. As a result of the economic boom which was and still is occurring in Alberta and Saskatchewan, those skills were needed in that part of the country.

The people who were left unemployed in the Sudbury area were perhaps fortunate in that at least they did have skills which they could use in other parts of Canada to find employment. That does not hold true for every community in this country. We often find in areas of the country which have significant lay-offs in other industries, whether in the manufacturing sector or the primary resource area, that the skills utilized in those areas are not easily transferrable. As a result of that, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has come in on January 19, with a program which at least allows these workers to adjust to a new kind of economic environment. By and large, that adjustment means that the workers who face this unemployment have to realize that they must be retrained in a different area.

In addition to my personal experiences in the Sudbury area and having sat on the special joint task force, the all-party committee of this House, on North-South relations, I have learned a great deal about changing trends in other parts of the world. Often in Canada perceive most of the countries in the Third World as heeding the pumping in of foreign aid, as if they were charitable organizations. But the Third World is no monolith. Within the Third World there are countries ranging from the poorest of the poor, such as Bangladesh, to what I would call the middle-income countries, which would include countries such as the Philippines.

Most important to Canada and most of the other countries within the OECD are the countries which are presently called the NICs, the newly industrialized countries. These newly industrialized countries, such as Korea and Singapore will, in the 1980s, become very significant threats to Canadian industries. For example, when we recently travelled to Singapore, we met with the minister of education and the minister of employment in that country. Singapore, for a number of reasons, has some very deliberate government policies to retrain its work force to deal with the realities of the 1980s. What it has done is to mobilize all of the resources in that country to retrain its workers from labour intensive industry to areas in which high technology is required. Countries such as Korea and Singapore have realized now that the route to follow in the 1980s will not be to attract labour intensive industries, but to work upon the strengths which they have developed within their own economic structures so they would have, one, a competitive edge in the international markets and, two, at least a reasonable access to the resources required to retrain their people for these high technology areas.

Just let me cite an example, to bring us back down to the Canadian level. Often, too often I think, Canadians are pessimistic about our past performance in the economic field. I happen to disagree with hon. members of the opposition who say that this government has mismanaged the policies which will directly affect Canadians in the 1980s, because the same hon. members of the opposition who complain about the size of the federal deficit are the ones who blame us for not giving enough priority and enough moneys to retraining.

I would just like to remind opposition members of the Conservative Party that when they were on this side of the House for their brief period in office, they did not address this whole problem of industrial restructuring. It has taken a Liberal government to talk about the need for the increased commitment to research and development, and it has taken a Liberal government to talk about, and place within the realms of the federal government's expenditure program for the years 1981-82, some $350 million in the whole area of industrial restructuring and labour adjustment. That is something that we have done on this side of the House. The hon. members of the opposition cannot complain that we have not taken our responsibilities seriously because if one followed some of their arguments about the need to reduce the size of the federal deficit and if one took account of the remarks made by other hon. members opposite about the high rate of unemployment, one would find that they do not fit with the facts which have evolved in the last year in Canada.

First of all, everyone recognizes the major reason for inflation. It is the rapid rise in the world-wide price of energy. Once those oil prices began to have their effect on the international economy—it became very evident, particularly to finance ministers in the OECD countries, that they would have to take some fairly severe restrictive measures to reduce the inflation rate caused by the rapid rise in energy prices.

Canadians, rather than being pessimistic, should be very optimistic because since these rapid rise in OPEC prices, or since 1973, our record has been fairly good. There are only two countries among what we call the seven industrial giants in the western world that have kept their oil price increases below that of Canada and those two countries happen to be Japan and West Germany. So I think that that record speaks for itself; but because of the impact of OPEC prices on our economy in Canada, the finance minister has had to deal with some of the realities. As a result, Canada is not alone amongst the OECD, these major seven industrialized countries, in terms of having to come to grips with the impact that those prices have on the world economy.

I have said, first of all, that we are not that badly off compared to other countries. However, what is more important, as the minister explained this afternoon, in terms of job creation among those seven industrial giants our record is excellent. He has mentioned that somewhere in the neighbourhood of 140,000 jobs have been created in the first few months of this year.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Frith: In addition, since this government took power after the February election in 1980, some 326,000 new jobs have been created in Canada. Although there will be no easy way out of the problems which are besetting the whole of the industrialized world, Canada is no longer isolated. We have to relate to ourselves and relate to the international economic order.

With that in mind, I think that the government has finally come to the realization that it will take at least the better part of this decade to face this high unemployment we are experiencing and the need for high technology training. We will have to begin with policies which, in the short run, will alleviate the unemployment situation somewhat, but, in the long run, will mean a whole readjustment of our economic order in Canada.

When we finally bring in the third part of this whole program upon which the Canadian government has embarked—which involves, first, as I mentioned before, the industrial restructuring and labour adjustment program and, second, an increased commitment to research and development—the industrial strategy will focus on what I consider to be the winning industries in this country. That is how we will find the long term solution to our unemployment. As a recent example of that, in Saturday's Globe and Mail, some analysts are now predicting that the Falconbridge Nickel Company will probably write off most of its involvement in the Dominican Republic. I use that as an example because often we say, "Well, how can we ever compete on an international basis with countries which have such low wage rates?" The fact is that Canadians have done very well in terms of adjusting to the new economic order.

It was pointed out in the article in the Globe and Mail that it costs roughly $3.05 for a pound of nickel to be developed from the lateritic deposits in the Dominion Republic, but only $1.70 a pound for the same mineral to be extracted from the sulphide ores here in Canada.

I am using the mining industry as an example, but there are other ones throughout our economy. What that tells me is that the International Nickel Company, despite the fact that it pays very high wage rates for its work force, has also, because of commitments to research and development, developed a technology which makes its operation here in Canada the most efficient one in the world. It is a lesson from which other sectors of the Canadian economy should learn.

I have mentioned the mining sector. There are other ones, such as the communications field, where Canadians are the furthest advanced in terms of the new technology which is being developed. As long as we have this commitment on behalf of the government and on behalf of private business in this country to continue to place high emphasis on the amounts of money spent on research and development, we will develop new technologies to which Canadians who will be displaced from labour intensive industries can be retrained to find new employment.

That is the basis and the thrust of the Liberal government's policy over the decade of the eighties. It means that Canadians will have to become accustomed, as many other countries have done in the past two decades, to the fact that workers will probably have to go through six or seven employers and will be required to retrain themselves four or five times during their lifetime in the work force.

I recognize that it is not an easy policy to sell to Canadians. If we have learned anything from the success stories in the Third World about these newly industrialized countries, it is that those that were the most successful in adjusting to the economic order on the international scene were those that have actively pursued industrial restructuring and labour adjustment.

I should like to explain some of the government's criteria for the new Industrial Restructuring and Labour Adjustment Program. I think that most members of the House were aware of the four communities which were to be the initial recipients of moneys under that $350 million program. They were Sydney, Nova Scotia, Sorel and Sept-Îles in Quebec, and the Windsor area in Ontario. I do not think that many members would argue against the need to have that program put in place in those four communities, knowing the kind of dislocation that has occurred in them whether in the primary metals sector, or in the case of Windsor, the massive disruption in auto production in North America.

With that in mind, the government introduced the program to ensure that the employment and economic benefits of changes in technology would go to people in those areas. That was one of the key reasons for this $350 million fund which would involve both the industrial and labour adjustment programs. It would provide industrial and labour incentives to help make this shift toward jobs in the future. This brings me back to what I said before, that if we are going to have an active program of retraining, along with retraining those people laid off, for work in areas where they could become productive, moneys would have to be made available to industries in the surrounding area. This would enable them to absorb the workers displaced from the other industries.

Some people may say, skeptically, that this is just another program on which the government cannot possibly deliver. I should like those people to consider some of the recent experiences in the textile industry in Canada. This industry is probably the most vulnerable to imports from Third World countries. Of people employed in the textile industry who suddenly found themselves out of work; within a year 56 per cent had found new jobs in the same area as that in which the textile manufacturing company had been located. This was largely because of the policies introduced by the government for industrial retraining and the incentives provided to other industries in the area enabling them to expand and absorb the work force.

I should like to point out some of the other criteria for the Labour Adjustment Program which has several broad features. The first is provision for enhancement of our Critical Trades Skills Training Program which assists industry to train many of the skilled people we need. I refer to millwrights, industrial mechanics, heavy duty equipment operators, and the like. It is to make provision during slack time for the training of laid-off apprentices in key trades, even when they are not either in institutions or industries, and it provides for stepping up training in key skills in trade centres across the country. That is one of the bases for the program of industrial adjustment.

A second broad element is the provision of industrial incentives in key industries. Both the critical trades skill training and the industrial incentives will help industry to expand to take advantage of new opportunities. The third and very important element, particularly from my own experience, is the community-based portion of the program. This will bring together the companies, the workers and two levels of government in order to overcome these problems that have been created by the past changes in the world economic order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, as I join in the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) and as I see the person named at the end of the motion shuffle his cabinet, I can think of one minister that we in Alberta would like to shuffle out pretty quickly, and that is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). There has been some talk about the jobs created in this country. Mr. Speaker, I can tell you about some jobs that are being lost in my constituency because of the energy policies of this government.

In the one little community of Nisku alone, there were over 100 Canadian companies operating in the oil industry. People learned skills in the past from large companies, then they bought a piece of land, put up some buildings, developed an industry of their own and hired Albertans to work for them in the oil industry. These people are now losing their jobs because of the National Energy Program inflicted upon this country too rapidly. The industry did not have time to readjust. In Nisku alone, there will be $40 million worth less work this year for 40 Canadian companies, and 450 people will be laid off. The forecast for the coming year is that $100 million worth of work will be lost because of the non-renewal of contracts. We can speculate how many people will be put out of work. Extrapolate that to the oil industry as a whole and you will see how many jobs will be lost because of a policy which was imposed upon the oil industry too quickly for the small Canadian companies to adjust. Even the large companies cut back some 40 per cent of their budgets due to the tax of 8 per cent. That does not sound very much, but when it is 8 per cent of the total budget and all the other taxes and royalties are taken into consideration, it cuts back on the amount of work that can be done and it hurts those Canadian companies a great deal.

I can think very quickly of one minister whom I would like the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to shuffle so that we can get ahead in a very important sector. This is one of the largest growth industries in the country, but it is being hurt very badly now and things will get worse because those March contracts will not be let this spring.

Unemployment

The hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith) said that we were doing "fairly well" in the job creation area. He gave examples of seven countries in the OECD. If some of those countries had our resources and our population, I think they would be showing much better results than we have shown. There are tremendous resources in this country but there is just a small group of people who have the ability, through our vocational institutions, and our research and technology, to develop them. If only the government would set goals in the food producing sector and in the energy sector that Canadians could work toward, we could put thousands and thousands of people to work. We would not be exporting dollars to pay for oil imported from Mexico and Saudi Arabia, dollars which are used to create jobs in those countries. We lose almost $6 billion per year in the food-producing industry. Most of that food could be produced in Canada, and it is a labour intensive industry. The transportation sector also needs to be improved. These are job-creating industries. Our governments should quit fighting each other and settle on some goals that Canadians can reach toward.

I should like to put on the record some statistics that we forecast some time ago. We predicted that unemployment would increase as the result of the National Energy Program. The figures for March show that in Alberta unemployment has increased 14 per cent for the month of March. Some 10,000 manufacturing jobs have been lost this month. These are reasons why we put this motion forward today.

In the few minutes available to me tonight I want to speak about an area of unemployment that concerns me greatly. I represent the riding on Wetaskiwin which is largely a rural riding. It has a number of small communities and a large native population. I should like to speak about what I call rural unemployment and the problems that rural people have in dealing with a very serious situation. Of course, people in the cities are concerned about this problem as well. When you consider that over 80 per cent of the country's population lives in large cities, you can see that this is a relatively small segment of our society, but one that is very important. One of our problems is that we are not establishing policies to keep people in the rural parts of this nation. All of the policies we are working toward tend to levitate from the rural areas into the urban sectors. All we have to do is look at what is happening in the farming industry. In the 1960s almost 20 per cent of the people used to live on farms. Now less than 6 per cent actually live on farms and we have only 326,000 farmers.

Because of the policies we have followed, many of the people who used to live on farms have moved to the cities. As well, many small hamlets, villages and towns are dying because there is no payroll to support them. Farms have become larger. As a result, farmers do not shop in those towns as much as they did in the past, and the communities are dying. The young people, the ones who used to stay and work on the farms, are now moving into the cities. There is unemployment in those areas. As people try to find jobs in other areas, they seek unemployment insurance but the Unemployment Insurance Commission states they cannot restrict their job area. They are told that if they live outside the community, they should drive into the cities where the jobs are. It is very difficult to argue that point. However, how far should they be expected to drive for another job? Should they drive 50 miles or 100 miles? Then, they find there is no choice: either they go on welfare or they move to the cities. Again, that is something which is forcing people to move into the cities.

In my opinion, we have to address this problem. All through what we call the industrialized world today, policies are established which move people out of rural areas into urban areas. We have not developed the policies or the ability to deal with the problems that occur when people live on top of each other. Along with that go all the social problems of increased crime and family problems. This situation occurs right across the nation. The costs of operating large cities are enormous. For instance, take the cost of transportation and the budgets for protection. All we have to do is to look at the city of New York and what has happened to it over the past few years.

Canada is a very large country. We have a vast north with an abundance of resources which have not yet been tapped. Canada has large rural areas. We must now try to establish programs which will help to keep people in the rural areas. In fact, we must try to attract people from the cities into the rural areas. This can be done partly by decentralization. Government is a large part of society today. I wish it were smaller. We could move government offices and people, where possible, outside of the big cities into the smaller areas. My province of Alberta has had a great deal of success in taking the Alberta Development Corporation, the Alberta opportunity company; the dairy board and the Athabasca University, to name just a few, out of Edmonton and Calgary. These entities have been moved to the smaller communities where payrolls have been established so that people can stay there. That is important. We must be able to establish those kinds of policies.

Perhaps transportation subsidies can be considered. Subsidies such as that will enable small businesses to move into the small communities of this country. Many small companies have expressed their desire to establish in smaller towns but they are concerned about whether there will be enough people to supply the work force required. Perhaps we can encourage people to move to those areas if we provide jobs and transportation subsidies to get the products to market.

It is necessary to continue policies which will encourage a viable, agricultural industry. In the past, the agricultural industry supported these communities. The policies that have been established over the years have encouraged larger farms. The return to the farmer has not been of the order to allow him to maintain a small operation. If he intends to continue farming, he must keep on expanding his operation. This is an area which requires a great deal of thought. This is something which governments, not only the federal government but provincial governments, must put their minds to. Otherwise, we will continue to see rural communities dying. Also we must encourage people to live in the northern part of this nation.

Next I want to talk about the people for whom I have a great affinity. There are 1.2 million of them in this country. They are classified as status Indians, non-status Indians and Metis people. This group has the largest unemployment rate of any group of Canadians. In many cases, the unemployment level is at 50 per cent, 60 per cent and 70 per cent. In some communities, it is even up to 90 per cent at times. This is an unacceptable situation in most communities in Canada, and yet we allow it. In some cases, we turn a blind eye to the high unemployment figures among these people. We have many statistics available for the status Indians. Some were put on the record by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) earlier today.

Recently many representatives of the status Indian communities have come to my office. They have told me that almost 70 per cent of their people are under the age of 21. These status Indian communities have tremendous difficulty providing the educational facilities and the jobs necessary for those coming on to the job market.

The department of Indian affairs, manpower and a number of other ministries are creating approximately 3,000 jobs a year for status Indians. From the statistics of the department of Indian affairs we find that 4,000 to 6,000 of these people are coming on to the job market each year. Those people range between the ages of 15 and 29. Hon. members can see that we are creating for them only 50 per cent of the jobs needed. Some of those jobs are only short-term jobs under such programs as LIP and others. These jobs are created for only a few months. When I say 3,000 jobs, I question whether that statistic is valid. Perhaps it is in the sense that there are 3,000 man years. But just the same, many of those jobs are short-term jobs.

As I said before, the Indian working-age population, that is from 15 to 64, which was realitively stable between 1966 and 1976, will expand rapidly in the early 1980s to about two-thirds of the Indian population by the mid-1980s. This increase in the working-age population is taking place in an on-reserve area. The employment market is not satisfactory to meet that increase. As I have said, there is 70 per cent, 80 per cent and 90 per cent unemployment on these reserves. This kind of situation is driving many of the people away from the reserves into the surrounding cities or communities where they try to find jobs. At the same time, the same increase in population is taking place among status Indians and non-status Indians who left the reserve because there was no work for them there. They are competing in a job market already saturated by the baby boom generation, those born in the late 1940s and early 1950s. We see a very serious problem developing. In my opinion, the reserves are not sufficient to meet the requirement for the minimum of 40,000 to 50,000 jobs needed today. Just to reduce unemployment right across this country to 8.5 per cent, we need to create some 50,000 jobs on reserves. This will only let us catch up, and it does not take into consideration some 4,000 to 6,000 young people coming on the job market this year. As I have said before, we have a serious problem which the government must start addressing now or we will be way behind. It is almost like a cone with the narrow part at the bottom, and it takes off as we enter the 1980s.

● (2050)

I would also like to deal with the low levels a labour force participation reflecting a continuing reliance on traditional pursuits. What I mean by that is that a number of status and non status people across this country have attempted to continue their original way of life, trapping, hunting and fishing. As the years have gone and the population has increased, this has just not been an adequate way of life to provide for all the young people coming forward. There are simply not enough trap lines and not enough available fish for large families to sell and make a living. The traditional way of life is no longer an adequate way of employment on those reserves and in those communities in the north.

There are ways to deal with this situation, and I want to go into them. One way is by job training close to the reserve areas. Any attempt to bring these people off the reserves into the cities to train them is successful only in very few cases. It is essential to have training programs close to the reserves.

The minister will be aware of a program that was conducted in that fashion at Meadow Lake, Saskatchewan. It was on-the-job training for carpentry which worked very well. Many of the young people attended that training program. They stayed day after day until they learned the trade. That is just one example of the success rate which can be attained when you take the training to those areas where the people have some skills, or at least to a community close by, so they still have some affinity with their own area, instead of trying to draw them out of those communities into already established on-the-job training programs generally located in cities or larger communities. That is one way we can entice young people into this kind of work.

The other example, of course, is the oil industry in the tar sands where companies have been able to draw people from the reserves for on-the-job training in their communities. This has been very successful and is another example of how the problem has been dealt with.

Despite the improvements in education and the shifts toward more active involvement in professional pursuits, Indian earnings are still way below the national level, as the young population increases in size more and more emphasis is placed on the educational aspect of those young people. As I said a few minutes ago, it is impossible with the budgets they now have to provide that kind of training. As a result, a large percentage of the native people in this country do not even have high school education.

If we are to draw these people into the job force, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) must expand the necessary educational facilities. Also, our colleges must train more Indian teachers who can then go on the reserves and teach many of the necessary skills in the people's own language, with an emphasis on their culture, so they might retain some affinity with the past and some way of going forward into the future to work in jobs which are there for them.

I see you rising, Mr. Speaker. Is my time up? I was just getting started. There are many other things I have to say.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions in this House when I have spoken about problems connected with unemployment I have stressed the links with the economy, because quite clearly when the economy is buoyant and there are more opportunities, people are also apt to be more generous and more ready to try innovative programs.

I was interested to see the same point being made in an article in L'Expansion. It was an interview with two French Members of Parliament.

[Translation]

Lionel Stoleru, who is Secretary of State for the Promotion of Manual Work, said, and I quote:

> Whether in the field of employment, income distribution or social protection, a slowdown in economic growth creates a need for imagination in social matters.

[English]

This dearth of imagination may be particularly painful if it prevents us from trying new and imaginative approaches to the problem of achieving full employment in the 1980s. We are in a strange situation at the moment in that we have both high unemployment and a great shortage of skilled workers. We have many young workers who are highly educated but lack specialized skills. The French, faced with a similar problem, have emphasized a return to skilled training and apprenticeship training. In the same article from which I have already quoted, Mr. Stoleru, having stated that he had increased the participation of youth in apprenticeship programs by some 40 per cent, and having described the measures which were taken to enhance the status of apprenticeship trades, went on to say:

[Translation]

> We must therefore pursue the effort to make school more life oriented with a schooling program where towards the end studies would alternate with on-the-job training.

[English]

To take that idea a step further, it seems clear that, in the future, people will have to train and retrain a number of times in the course of their lives, and that a broad base of education which gives certain flexibility, a knowledge of science because the future will be increasingly science based, will be essential together with great flexibility on the part of both employer and employee.

There are tremendous opportunities here for co-operation between labour and union in a way we have not seen before, but which indeed we are seeing in Europe. The most successful schemes of dealing with relocating workers, displaced as a result of improved modern technology. The most successful plans, those which have gone most smoothly, have been those where labour and management worked collaboratively on problems of displacement, retraining, changing hours and so on.

One of the opposition members who spoke earlier had some harsh things to say about direct job creation. Experience has shown that the fastest and most effective way of creating jobs is, indeed, by direct job creation. If this is done intelligently, the job which initially is created by the state, if it fills a need, will continue in some form or other supported by private enterprise. Two countries which have had particular success with this are Belgium and France.

The role of small business is also a very important part of an ongoing employment strategy because the experience, both on this side of the Atlantic and in Europe, has been that the smaller and medium-sized enterprises have greater flexibility, are more successful in job creation and are generally more innovative. This applies particularly to the information-type businesses, which may be the business of the future, in a special way.

According to the demographic studies which have been undertaken in Canada, there are a number of factors which it is important to take into consideration in our planning, one of them being that during the 1980s the labour force will become increasingly mature, with a substantially lower proportion of new, young entrants. This means that industrial adjustment programs will depend increasingly on redeployment and retraining of workers already in the labour force. This also offers the promise of more opportunities for the housewife who is returning to the labour force, having stayed home to raise children.

Growth in the service sector, which has traditionally provided the bulk of new employment opportunities for women, however, will taper off. Large numbers of clerical workers are now employed by banks and insurance companies and automation will replace many of the existing jobs, so that women will have to be prepared to take different kinds of training and different kinds of jobs, and it is important that the planning be done now.

The growth sectors in the economy in the future will probably be business services, manufacturing and construction. These are the pursuits for which young people will need to be prepared.

It seems likely that, in the very near future, the full integration of women in the labour force—that is, in the non-traditional occupations as well as in the occupations which have traditionally been filled by women—will become desirable on economic grounds and not only, as is the case now, for reasons of social justice and equality of opportunity.

Progress in training women for trades and in increasing the proportion of women in non-traditional occupations has been and is slow. The Government of Canada now spends more than $800 million a year on training, and in 1979-80 about 42 per cent of those taking Canada Manpower institutional training courses were women.

However, only 862 women took training in such non-traditional occupations as those of machine operators, computer programmers, welders, drill operators and metal workers, as compared with 35,000 men. The majority of women who were taking training courses were taking clerical-type courses, which may offer them very limited opportunities in the future.

The employment barriers faced by women are pervasive and interrelated, and, even in 1981, comprehensive and integrated federal programs are required. Counselling is required to encourage women to consider non-traditional occupations. Training and appropriate support services are required so that skills can be learned quickly, because the woman returning to the labour force does not usually have a lot of time or money to spend on a lengthy training program. She wants to be able to earn a salary quickly, and the methods of training must be those which are appropriate to an adult. Incentives are needed to ensure that employers hire and promote women in non-traditional fields. In fact, a systematic approach to the widespread problems of bias and discrimination and to counter myth with fact is necessary. This again will require an ongoing and concerted co-operative approach on the part of educators, business, unions, government and employers' associations.

We still see high schools allowing girls to drop sciences without consulting parents, and yet in the science-based world of the future, students, whether male or female, who have not had an adequate background in the sciences will be severely disadvantaged.

Among the factors which encourage women to enter non-traditional occupations will be higher wages, more chances for advancement and social support systems like daycare. Daycare means flexible arrangements. Not every child is happy in group daycare. Not every parent is happy with group daycare, but for parents who wish to have this particular method available, the whole question of trade unions and employers sponsoring daycare is one which has been discussed for the last 20 years but on which we have seen very little action.

Another approach to the care of children is subsidized parental leave. We have seen recently some trade unions include the question of parental leave in their contracts. I think this is an important development for the future. There are many parents who prefer to stay home and care for young children themselves. This surely is an option which society should encourage as much as institutionalized daycare. The choice should surely be available for parents based on their own personal choice and also on the parents' assessment of the needs of their children. Some European countries have gone very much further than we have in providing maternity leave or, as it is increasingly being called, parental leave, because in some cases it may be the father who would choose to have six months at home caring for young children.

If we really believe that the next generation is important, and if we as citizens really feel that we have a stake in the next generation, then surely all of us, including employers, employees, trade unions and those of us who are involved in law making, must be concerned about offering more options and more support to young parents who may leave the labour force for a period. Young parents who leave the labour force should be able to have assistance when they are ready to return—with retraining, if it is necessary—and certainly some kind of special protection.

One of the chief program instruments now available to the Government of Canada to provide training is the Adult Occupational Training Act. In discussing new federal-provincial training agreements, it is the intention of the government to include the expansion of women's employment in non-traditional fields, and I hope that part of this discussion will also include measures to facilitate the return to the labour force of women who have been out of it for some time because of child-rearing responsibilities.

Another lever that the federal government has is to give greater emphasis to on-the-job training through the industrial training program. There are obvious advantages to encouraging on-the-job training. Employers increasingly have more sophisticated and up to date equipment than do educational institutions. There has traditionally been some skepticism on the part of unions and others. Some fear that on-the-job training may be misused by employers to get cheap labour and that production needs may be put ahead of the employee's need to learn. However, these are problems that can be solved. There are many known ways of measuring and monitoring so as to ensure that on-the-job training is really that. In any case, surely an enlightened employer will consider it in his interests to ensure that on-the-job training really is a fact.

The government has instituted a new initiative for employers. It has been reimbursing up to 75 per cent of the wages of women taking on-the-job training in occupations which were traditionally reserved for men. For on-the-job training and apprenticeship courses, the concept of establishing pooled funds to persuade employers to hire apprentices has possibilities. Granted, apprenticeship training as such is under provincial jurisdiction, but there are methods, such as the one I mentioned, which would allow the federal government, in co-operation with the provinces, to provide additional incentives for apprenticeship training. Such funds could be created through payroll tax deductions or voluntary contributions in order that firms could be fully or partially reimbursed for training costs. In this way, all companies would share the costs and benefits of training. Management and labour representatives could help governments assess training needs so that apprenticeship policies are consistent with requirements.

Affirmative action programs which now exist in three federal government departments, provide a useful demonstration of what people can do who traditionally were not considered for certain jobs. In our time it is very important to move away from fixed ideas and to see what people can do, given the opportunity, and to build on these experiences to get greater flexibility. If there is anything that is sure about the eighties, it is that nothing is sure. It is therefore very important to be flexible and creative.

With an affirmative action program in place within the federal public service, we can begin to apply the same provisions in the private sector through contract compliance legislation. We have been talking about contract compliance legislation for a long time. I remember discussing it in 1974 and 1975. There has been little or no progress in that area. Surely now is the time to act.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, you are at the edge of your chair. That must mean that it is time for me to stop.

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is entirely fitting that this House should be considering this opposition motion in the name of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes). Allow me to read the motion which we are debating this evening. It reads:

> That this House expresses its sorrow and sympathy for the more than one million Canadians who are unable to find work and who, with their families, face an uncertain future, and urges the Prime Minister to endorse this sentiment by shuffling his cabinet.

This motion, without a doubt establishes the most significant debate on bread and butter issues in this House since the all-night debate of December 18 which was focused on the economic plight of the nation we are so honoured to serve. It is important to note that the debate in this House on that occasion—the December 18 debate which established a record for longevity in this House—was also prompted by a motion from the opposition "for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the economic crisis in Canada".

It is unbelievable, unexplainable and an undeniable fact that while the nation suffers the worst economic crisis since the thirties, the Liberal Government of Canada chooses to spend the time, the energy and the substance of this Parliament on a matter which is of indifference to the majority of Canadians concerned with the hard core facts of life, food, clothing, shelter. It is irresponsible of this government to impose on this House and upon this country a debate which has absolutely nothing to do with the provision of life's basics to the citizens of Canada. This is the strange priority of a government out of touch with the realities in Canada.

It is not just interesting, but it is a fact that will be long remembered, that it is the opposition party's initiative which is seeking to force a reluctant government to take cognizance that this most blessed nation in the world is suffering from a severe and crippling malaise in the form of mismanagement of the economy.

There is no one to blame for this situation but this government which has been in power for most of three decades, far too long a period, this government that attempts to blame every other factor in Canada and in the world for our economic difficulties, every other factor except its own ineptitude, its own blind devotion to party well-being before the welfare of Canada and its people.

This is the reason that we are called upon to debate in this House tonight an expression of sorrow and sympathy for the more than one million Canadians out of work, unemployed, disillusioned, disheartened, faced with an increasingly bleak future at a time of the year when Canadians, like the season, should be anticipating growth, productivity and prosperity.

It is indeed symbolic that in the midst of the gloomy forecasts put forward by economists from all sectors of the Canadian business scene, this opposition sees absolutely no indication that the present members of cabinet are prepared to acknowledge and address the issue. Without this purpose on the part of the cabinet of this Government of Canada, there can be no recovery undertaken. Without this purpose, the unemployed of Canada can only expect more, not less, in the way of personal distress in the form of unemployment.

This is the reason that the motion has been phrased to include in the national solution to the unemployment crisis, the urging of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that he take the first necessary step in the difficult road to economic recovery by rooting out the insensitive cabinet incompetents who hold such power to do damage to Canada. This is why this motion urges the Prime Minister to shuffle the cabinet—after all, it is his cabinet—and put in place some of the talent that must be hidden somewhere amongst the 140 or so members opposite.

I spoke of the distress being produced in the nation through the critically high unemployment rate inflicted upon Canadians by a government insensitive to the ordinary laws of market place economy and of good judgment. It is comparatively easy to express distress in statistics because you avoid coming face to face with the impact in the form of personal trauma and disaster which result from the individual circumstance behind each statistical entry. Statistics are a very comfortable way of dealing with problems that affect people deeply and disastrously. It is comparatively easy to acknowledge that unemployment rates are up 1 per cent or 2 per cent, but 1 per cent of Canadian employables is more than 100,000 citizens. This implies the possibility of more than 100,000 personal tragedies. This is the measure of the damage which the government is doing to Canada. It is not included in the drab, depressing statistical evidence stated as the percentage of Canadians seeking employment. The measure of the damage being done is seen in the individual case histories of those earnest, conscientious, ambitious Canadians who cannot find targets for their energies and talents.

This tragedy has been defined and quantified in a study by the Johns Hopkins University in the United States which was concerned with deep social consequences inherent in policies which produce situations where able, worthy people are unable to find work, are unable to put their energies and talents to constructive purpose, are frustrated in their attempts to be self-reliant, are faced with personal loss of assets, such as homes and automobiles, and, worst of all, of family and dignity. The Johns Hopkings University undertook a study of the implications to individuals involved in these situations. It is now widely accepted as the valid analysis of what happens to persons across Canada so affected, such as those who write daily to their Members of Parliament expressing their distress.

The Johns Hopkins University study concluded that every 1 per cent increase in the unemployment rate in the United States kills 37,000 persons. It is not through starvation. That does not happen in our western democracies any more; we are much too civilized for that. There are 37,000 persons who lose their lives through suicide, homicide, heart attack and stroke. Crime rates increase, violent crimes proliferate and family break-ups increase. These are the attendant personal disasters which walk hand-in-hand with unemployment. The study concluded that the social pathology of unemployment has been swept under the rug. The government has been unscrupulously lifting the rug to avoid focus on its failures. Lift the rug; sweep under a few more statistics!

I should like to read some of the statistics contained in the study to which I referred. Appendix 2 is entitled: "Relationship between Economic Conditions and Social and Family breakdown". It estimates the social costs of national economic policy and the implications for mental and physical health and criminal aggression. It refers to the impact of the 1.4 per cent rise in unemployment during 1970 in the United States of America, and it reads as follows:

> —the 1.4 per cent rise in unemployment during 1970 is directly responsible for some 51,570 total deaths, including 1,740 additional homicides, for 1,540 additional suicides, and for 5,520 additional mental hospitalizations. These are not major portions of the total number of deaths, homicides, suicides, and mental hospitalizations which occurred during 1970 through 1975. But, unlike most other factors which contributed to the statistics, rising unemployment can be readily avoided.

Using this methodology, one Canadian researcher estimated the following social impacts attributable to a level of 175,000 unemployed in Ontario over the next five years: total deaths, 8,830, of which 2,920 will result from heart disease inspired by concern for unemployment; 120 suicides and 20 murders; incidents of mental illness, 11,200 and prison sentences, 2,400. If that is translated into figures for Canada as a whole, we will have a total of some 50,000 deaths attributable to the trauma of being unemployed over the next five years.

In Windsor, Ontario, earlier this year, the mayor's committee on services for the unemployed reported that the inability to make credit payments or to make unemployment or welfare payments stretch to the end of each month has brought about uncontrollable stress and pressure and has resulted in increased use of alcohol, tranquilizers and other drugs to ease stress. Also the mayor's committee found that social agencies in Windsor have experienced increases in case loads ranging from 25 per cent to 377 per cent. The human tragedy associated with unemployment is also reflected in the committee's statement that having to go on welfare, after other benefits are exhausted, is having a devastating effect upon individuals and their families.

The Canadian Council on Social Development obtained the following comments from individuals across Canada on the relationship between high inflation and unemployment and increased levels of social and family breakdown. Don Peirce, executive director, Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton, said:

> I can't believe that any one would seriously suggest there's not a relationship between unemployment and other social problems. It is so ridiculous a statement it doesn't merit an answer.

Ed Smee, former director, Ontario secretary of state, said:

> If you don't think there's a relationship, resign your job, and go look for an alternative. Before you do, however, you might like to know that the last time we had an open competition for six positions in our department, over 1,400 people applied, and all of them had at least a BA degree.

Angela Julien, social planning department, city of Halifax, said:

There is a direct relationship between unemployment and social problems. Our department has believed for years that there is a tremendous waste of human resources when governments try to fight inflation by increasing unemployment.

There is a close correlation between increased unemployment, declining family incomes, increasing stress and social problems. When families have inadequate incomes, you can expect to find increased mental problems, increased use of medication, increasing child abuse, family violence, and marital breakdown.

There is an increasing number of testimonials in this report, but there is a further insult to the Canadian intelligence and integrity which is being encouraged by a government that seeks answers to the problems it creates. It seeks answers always by the creation of another government program or another government agency. This further expands the bureaucratic empire which strangles us all in red tape and taxes.

Unfortunately, governments do not provide answers for economic problems. Governments produce economic problems by not measuring the implications contained in their acts of intervention in the business, economic and social life of the nation. The National Energy Program is a prime example of incompetent, almost criminal disregard for sense and responsibility in this most important area of Canada's present and future. This bankrupt policy—and I think we give it credit and dignify it by calling it a policy—is the sole cause of thousands upon thousands of Canadians being unemployed today. If common sense does not soon take over from the present direction by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), the number of unemployed in Ontario alone, as a result of this government's National Energy Program, will reach more than 100,000. That is what we are talking about. According to the Johns Hopkins study, of those 100,000 unemployed in Ontario some 4,000 will die through suicide, homicide, heart attack and stroke.

Additionally, we are in the process of teaching a generation of Canadians that smart persons faced with a circumstance of mass unemployment will use the system to their own end and for their own benefit. Fortunately, the majority of Canadians appreciate honesty and effort. But we have a minority, and I think an increasing one, which views the system as theirs to beat.

I would like to read from an article which appeared in the Pentincton Herald entitled "The Cheques Roll In". Under the heading "Unemployment insurance: ticket for a long holiday" is the testimony of two young Canadians, one by the name of Sam, who says:

"I never feel guilty when I rip off the government," he said. "It makes me feel good. How much did they spend on this metric thing? I just took $5,000 or $6,000 from them.

"Every time I worked I knew they couldn't find out. I mailed my report card every other Friday afternoon exactly at 4 p.m. I get my cheque every Wednesday or Thursday morning—depending on what mail box I used."

He said he never had any problem keeping his claim running.

"As long as you make your appointment (with Canada Employment officers) you're all right."

The article continues:

"I went out of town too. As long as they get their report cards they think you're in town."

A person collecting benefits is supposed to be available for work any time.

Sam said he didn't really look for work until he thought his claim might run out.

Toward the end of the article it says:

He first collected unemployment insurance when he was 17 so by age 21 he knew the ropes. With $1500 in the bank and a desire to travel to Europe, . . .

He and a friend went to Europe and they mailed in their forms and received their cheques. There was no need to look for work as everyone, including government officials, realized there were no jobs.

All is not despair in Canada. We can look at the record of the province of British Columbia, the province in which I am privileged to live and call my home. I would like to read a brief résumé of what is happening in British Columbia under a government which is intent on encouraging the private sector to grow and to be a productive partner in the economy. This is what Mr. Bennett said in a recent speech:

In five years, we have achieved those goals, and our success is directly attributable to that private enterprise spirit and drive that pervades all parts of our vast and diverse province.

I submit that is quite in contrast with the drive of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, as a parent and long-time observer of the Canadian scene I hope that I will be considered qualified this evening to speak on one of the most challenging problems facing our nation today, that is, the upgrading of our labour force. Before looking at the present situation and what may lie ahead for Canadians, I believe it would be useful to have an historical perspective on training.

Technical and vocational education in Canada today is the product of evolution. Our early settlers learned by watching and practising, and during the nineteenth century such practical instruction became formalized as it was embodied in the school curriculum.

Federal government involvement in the field of education began with the proclamation of the Agricultural Aid Act in 1912, followed by the Agricultural Construction Act in 1913. And there have been various federal acts and agreements made under their authority since then, except for the period from 1929 to 1937.

The federal government has played an increasingly important role in this field, particularly since the passing of the Technical Education Act of 1919 which clearly defined the responsibilities of the provinces and the federal government. This act stipulated that the federal government would share up to 50 per cent of the provincial expenditures for technical education. This federal involvement was justified on the basis of the need of a rapidly industrializing nation for an adequate supply of skilled workers, provision of equality of educational opportunity, and the high cost to local and provincial authorities of providing adequate training programs and facilities.

It is also interesting to note that in 1919 the federal government's contribution to technical education was $700,000 compared with its contribution of $800 million to adult occupational training in 1980-81.

The Adult Occupational Training Act of 1967 marked a significant new departure for Canada. It clearly separated the occupational training of adults from the education of the young. The then newly-established Department of Manpower and Immigration was given responsibility for implementing the provisions of the AOT Act through the Canada Manpower Training Program. This act allowed the federal government to purchase training services from the provinces and private schools on behalf of its adult workers and to enter into contracts with employers. A striking feature of the AOT Act was its linking of occupational training for adults with the needs and opportunities of the labour market. The federal and provincial governments committed themselves to a co-operative determination of training needs and the development of training plans. Budgets and guidelines were set nationally, but the focus was on local needs and conditions.

In 1972 the act was amended significantly to increase its flexibility. The program was made available to more adults, some of the restrictions in the provision of industrial training were lifted and certain sections which were no longer relevant were repealed.

While it is very easy to sit back and criticize the training carried out under the AOT Act, the fact of the matter is that there are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have benefited from the program. Without it, many of them would not have had the opportunity to learn a skill or improve their skills. As in any program, there is always room for improvement. At the present time two task forces are studying it and their recommendations may have a great influence on the future direction of training in Canada. These two task forces are the Parliamentary Task Force on Critical Skills for the eighties, headed by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), and the other is a high level task force reporting to the Chairman of Employment and Immigration, Canada, which will work to develop a comprehensive employment strategy for the eighties. As a result of these studies there will no doubt be proposals made to increase the effectiveness of the training program.

For many years I have had an interest in the way that young Canadians are prepared for their careers. That interest has increased since I became a Member of Parliament and have had the opportunity to discuss with other hon. members the relationship between education and employment across the country. It is my opinion, and I am sure that many other hon. members will agree, that on balance we have not been doing a good job of preparing students for the labour market. Not only have we failed to give students the technical skills that the jobs of the future will require, we have also failed to provide them with an elementary understanding of the world of work and the ways in which working life is different from the lives they have so far known—family life and school life. We have not told students about the jobs of the future and we have not found ways to give them the hands-on experience that will reveal their strengths and weaknesses, their likes and dislikes, and what in general they can expect of work.

Too many students are making decisions about their education and the career they hope to pursue without adequate information and without much thought. Too many students are graduating without any thought to the labour market and the places in that market where they may find a niche. I have heard estimates that one-third of our graduating students cannot say what occupations they would like to follow. I suspect that another third of our graduating students, although they can say what jobs they would like, have only the most elementary knowledge of the world of work.

There is a lot that could be said on the subject of the needs of students and the problems that have so far hindered our attempts to prepare them for the working world. There is a big job to be done, and those who tackle it—employers, educators, governments and students—deserve every support and encouragement.

The experts tell us that the next decade will be marked by considerable industrial and labour market adjustment and that shifts away from traditional approaches to training will be inevitable. New initiatives and innovative methods responding quickly to local and regional needs, will have to dominate future training systems. Obviously, everything cannot happen at once. But where we can, we must move quickly to bring about meaningful changes to existing situations.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the government and, in particular, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) for the special efforts being taken to make training more readily available for those who have traditionally been relegated to dead-end jobs. I refer, of course, to the vast majority of women workers and our native people. Now thanks to such programs as non-traditional training for women and training opportunities for natives, they are being exposed to the type of training which will enable them to break out of their particular job ghetto.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the generous reimbursement package the government offers employers who train workers in highly skilled fields should have a considerable impact on reducing labour shortages which hamper economic growth. It costs a tremendous amount of money to train such workers, but it is a sound investment in the future prosperity of this country.

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate because of the nature of the motion, and I am doubly pleased to find such a distinguished colleague in the Chair this evening. I might say immediately that one would be tempted, and sorely tempted, to respond to some of the remarks of the Minister of Employment and Immigration

(Mr. Axworthy). Frankly, Sir, it is simply not worth it. The minister—I do not know why—is so preoccupied with his political detractors that I think he has lost all sense and all perspective of the portfolio. I was a critic of the then minister in a previous Liberal government, now the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen), and I thought he had some faults; but I will tell you, sir, the present minister makes the hon. member for Sarnia look like an absolute genius in that portfolio.

Earlier today the minister indicated, in a flash of brilliance, that there was hard core unemployment in the regional sense. He grasped equalization to his bosom as if it were a newly found phenomenon. Equalization is so much part of this Confederation that the minister could well have ignored it.

I remember the Kingston communiqué of a group of Conservative premiers and the leader, some years ago, on the subject of equalization; but I am sure it was not until 1979 that the present minister had ever heard of it and went on to talk about youth unemployment. I am delighted that the minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) is here, because I just saw an article about the terrible difficulties that well trained young people in Newfoundland have who wish to enter the teaching profession. There is a great surplus of them.

The minister does not need to tell us about this problem. This is a very longstanding, serious problem of young people, and even, for heaven's sake, of lawyers. There is an article in the recent edition of McLean's which talks about this enormous surplus of lawyers. If we have a problem with lawyers and well-trained Newfoundland teachers, can you imagine the problems of the untrained trying to get into the job field?

My colleagues have indicated the problems in those two areas and have covered them well. While I am tempted to reply to the minister, I will not do so. I want to talk about what this government and this minister ignored, in a very narrow sense, because maybe he and they will understand that. They talk about the general economic pressure, and it is true. They talk about it more as an excuse than anything else. They talk about, for example, the depreciation in the automobile industry. Given that situation, let us accept the argument that they can do absolutely nothing about the general economic pressures and the depression of the automobile industry. Let us accept that, as hard as it might be, just for sake of argument.

What could a government do? The minister talks about this great record of job creation. The issue is not the number of jobs created; the issue is: did we achieve our potential in job creation? That is the issue. If we created 300,000 jobs, and our potential was to create 600,000 jobs, we are a dismal failure. If, on the other hand, the potential was for 350,000 jobs, and we created 300,000, then we would have something to brag about.

Let me cite one example. I was interested to hear the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Frith) when he talked about OPEC and the international oil situation. If I interpreted his remarks correctly, all of a sudden he lumped us with all industrialized countries: France, Germany, Italy, Spain, and particularly western Europe. We are the same, he said. That is absolute nonsense. We are not part of that group. We have the potential not to be at the mercy of OPEC. We have the potential to be major energy exporters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: If we achieve that potential, we do not need to worry about that threat from the Middle East. I do not speak only of Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Alberta. I speak of the Atlantic provinces and the enormous potential for export of hydroelectric power, for example. But look at our potential in the last year and in the immediate future. The potential was in the energy field. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in his talk about the depression in the exploration activity, said there are no unemployment lines in Alberta or in Saskatchewan. What garbage! Do you know where the lines are, Mr. Speaker? They are in my riding and in ridings all over Ontario and Quebec. That is where the unemployment lines are because this government failed to achieve its potential in energy development.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: My riding is a 60 per cent rural and only 40 per cent urban. The city of Stratford is a small city of 26,000 people. In that city we manufacture all types of products in small plants. I do not have any big business, fortunately or unfortunately. They are all small plants. We manufacture a multitude of products which would have found their way into western Canada had this government acted intelligently and aggressively to achieve the potential in petroleum exploration.

I am told, and I accept it although it surprised me, that the petroleum industry is the largest user of trucks. I thought it might be forestry construction or mining that used trucks the most. However, I am told, and I accept it, that the largest industrial customer of trucking is the petroleum industry.

What do they make in these small plants in Stratford? They make brake cables; they make upholstery; they make oil filters; they make fan belts. These are the places that are laying off their employees.

• (2150)

If the minister is right and we cannot do anything because of the general economic condition, because of the international situation or because of the depression in the industry—and I do not think he is—surely, in the name of reason, we should grasp what we have. Therefore, when the Prime Minister says "I do not see any unemployment lines in Alberta and Saskatchewan,"—and I am not so sure that is true, but let us assume that is right—I wish he would visit Stratford or Woodstock or St. Thomas and the multitude of small Canadian cities in Ontario and Quebec. The unemployment lines there are a direct result of the National Energy Policy.

It was months before the minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) would admit that any rigs were leaving the country although my colleagues had been screaming about it for weeks and weeks. But I do not think that the rigs leaving is the tragedy; the tragedy is that we are not doubling and tripling the number of rigs in Canada. We should be exploring like crazy out there. If we were, then there would be no unemployment lines in Stratford and my colleague from Oxford (Mr. Halliday) would not have them in Woodstock and my colleague from Elgin (Mr. Wise) would not have them in St. Thomas. These are not great industrial centres, but small viable industrial cities, the heart of any employment strategy in any country.

The problem does not lie just with the automobile industry. In my riding we make industrial boilers, we make turbines and compressors. If one tarsands plant went ahead, I think we would have the potential for 300 jobs in one plant in the city of Stratford for welders, boiler makers, tool and dye makers, machinists and as well, there would be all the feeding plants that would supply that one industry. And that is from just one tarsands plant. Other members from central Canada and Quebec have similar ridings, and I am sure they would say exactly the same thing.

I know that would not solve the job problem in the region or the job problem of young Canadians who want to get into the labour market, but surely we could do that at the very minimum. It would take at least some of the pressure off.

The minister spoke about the program for the mobility of workers. They should be moving into Stratford, St. Thomas, Woodstock and St. Catharines. If we had achieved our potential last year and could achieve it next year, a mobility program for workers could be applied by moving workers into those ridings. But let us not hear talk about the mobility of workers when an area which could absorb them is being strangled.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Frith) spoke about the $350 million industrial restructuring program. He talked about research and development and about incentives to increase exports. I want to tell him and the House a few facts of life Mr. Speaker.

I received the minister's press release about the industrial retructuring program and I sent it to every manufacturer in my riding. I become very nervous when I sent out this minister's material, but I felt an obligation to tell my corporate constituents about the new program. I had several inquiries about it. But I found out shortly afterwards that ours was not one of the four designated areas. When I consider the areas that were designated, namely Windsor, Sept-Iles and the steel industry in Nova Scotia where there is very high unemployment, I am not going to argue about that. Before that designation, however, I had one very serious inquiry. The situation is as follows.

A company had to decide whether to install capital equipment in its U.S. plant or in the Stratford, Ontario plant. The material produced by this equipment comes into Canada tax free because it is of a kind not manufactured in this country. There is no tax on the $2 million or $3 million worth of this material which flows into the country. The machine would supply all of Canada's needs, so immediately it would stop imports coming into the country. It would produce $1 million worth of goods per year for export. The machine would provide 40 jobs, ranging from highly skilled to unskilled and would provide a viable research and development program once it was installed. I indicated that we were not one of the areas designated in the program but that there may be other programs such as the R and D and programs to increase exports of manufactured goods.

First of all, we do not come under the $350 million program, so we can forget that. There is no way the company can receive a loan or assistance for R and D because that would not start until after the machine is installed. If the company wanted to hire 40 engineers for some fantastic new product development, it is likely they could do so under the R and D program, but they do not qualify under this program. They do not qualify for incentives to increase the export of manufactured goods because about two thirds of production is for domestic supply which would stop $2 million or $3 million worth of goods coming in from the United States. The company does not qualify for anything.

The minister talks about his government's program, but I do not think that he ever talks to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). I do not think one has any idea what goes on in the other's department or that they have any idea of working together.

Earlier today I had to laugh because the minister talked about Canada Works, Young Canada Works and the program before that. I forget what it is called this year. Every time we change the minister we change the name. I mean the summer job program for students. In the nine years that I have been in this House, we have received the minimum allocation for each of those programs.

In a very parochial sense, certain things which enriched the life of the community to some degree, did take place. In some years, however, we did not have enough applications in the riding to use up the minimum amount we were allowed which I think was $50,000. The people in my riding are not keen on the hand-out idea. It was up to them to decide. It costs every bit as much to administer and audit a $50,000 program as it does a $5 million program in a very high unemployment area such as the province of the Minister of National Revenue. I got $50,000; he probably got $5 million and he deserved it, but the administration costs would be the same.

In the last nine years, if I had saved up the LIPs, the Canada Works Programs, and the community services program or whatever this one is called, it is likely I could have had a machine for one small company that would provide 40 permanent jobs, a whole research and development program, would stop $2 million or $3 million worth of imports and would increase our exports by $1 million.

Sometimes I wonder what on earth we are doing. What do I say to the small businessman? I cannot send many of these small business people to the Federal Business Development Bank, Mr. Speaker. The people who want to buy an extra machine or hire a couple more people are not in the league in which the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce move. When I talk to the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe), I might as well talk to that clock, Mr. Speaker. He has no authority. I do not think there is even a cabinet committee that considers a strategy for achieving job potential. If there is, I wish someone on the treasury benches would stand up on a point of order right now and tell me.

I see you are becoming restless, Mr. Speaker. May I close by saying just one thing. The great tragedy here is not that the government defies the facts of life; it is that it fails to reach out to the potential that exists, not just in our region and not just among our young people, but among the small businessmen all over Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING—EFFECT OF INFLATION ON INDUSTRY AND HOME OWNERS

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have been trying for some time to get some kind of reasonable answer from the minister responsible for housing in this country. In British Columbia, we have one of the toughest housing situations which has ever faced any area in the history of Canada.

First, let me go over some of the facts relating to my own riding of North Vancouver-Burnaby and what is taking place there. In the last quarter of 1979, the median price for a house in North Vancouver was $94,000. In Burnaby the median price was $79,000. One year later, those prices increased by 65 per cent and 69 per cent respectively to $155,000 and $135,000. People are taking out second, third and fourth mortgages. People are moonlighting at several jobs. They are building extra and illegal suites to offset their payments. Thirty-three foot frontage lots are going for $100,000 for the land alone. Land prices have increased 100 per cent in the last year as well.

Construction costs are up 20 per cent but there is little serviced land left to build on. I might add that construction permits are down 24 per cent over the past year.

Let us take a look at the dismantling of the community services contribution program. Services are not now being developed commensurate with demand because the cost to start up is too great a load for the community to bear. There is no hope for a family to own their own home if the family income is less than $30,000. Soon, those making combined incomes of $30,000 will be unable to purchase and maintain a mortgage on a house. Only those with incomes in the higher brackets will be able to own their own home in the foreseeable future as a result of the policies of this government.

Mortgage payments per month have increased 50 per cent in the last five years. What have high interest rates done? High interest rates have cut into the profits of builders, contractors and manufacturers. These costs must be recouped somehow. Profit levels for the small entrepreneurial contractor are 3 per cent. Inflation and high interest rates have signalled a serious decline in consumer confidence throughout the lower mainland and throughout Canada.

Let me tell hon. members about the housing starts in British Columbia. We have an average of 50,000 people coming in each year. This government cannot seem to understand that. In 1976 there were over 37,000 housing starts; in 1977 over 32,000 housing starts; in 1978 over 28,000 housing starts and in 1979 over 21,000 housing starts. In 1980 there was a bit of hope with 37,000 housing starts. However, there is some dispute about that figure. Those are the official figures of the government. Yet, when I talked to the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada officials they told me they could only find 33,000 housing starts, not 37,000. Yet this government talks about things moving up, housing improving, more starts, things happening and the government on its way. Tell that to the people trying to find a place to live on the lower mainland of British Columbia. Fifty thousand people will move to British Columbia this year as they did last year. Experts in the housing field, including CMHC and Clayton Research Associates, have adjusted their 1981 housing starts downward for British Columbia. The main problem is the inadequate supply of developed land. The federal-provincial agreement for assistance in making serviced land available has been cut. What a thing to cut in view of what is going on in B.C. at this particular time.

A minimum of 40,000 housing starts is what is required in British Columbia in 1981, according to HUDAC. The CMHC statistics are sometimes suspect, as I mentioned. We do not know what is going on.

Let me give you the figures for 1980 and 1981 for the first couple of months, and perhaps hon. members will understand my concern. In 1980 there were 5,133 starts in the first couple of months. This year that figure is down to 4,885. In high-demand areas there is no inventory of serviced lands. Those are the facts that lead to tremendous personal tragedies for any number of families in lower mainland British Columbia; they lead to tragedies for people in North Vancouver-Burnaby as well as in other areas. We are talking about 50,000 new people moving there hoping to find jobs, hoping to start families and to purchase homes. There is vacancy rate in apartments and the cost of housing is absolutely exorbitant.

● (2205)

What kind of answers do I get from this government on what it is doing with our housing? I get no answers at all. I doubt if I will get an answer tonight but I want the people of North Vancouver-Burnaby to know that at least this government has been made aware of the figures. I would only repeat the question I have asked on a couple of other occasions, and that is, what the devil is this government doing about the housing mess in this country?

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to elaborate on the minister's reply to the question asked by the hon. member on April 2 concerning the effects of inflation on the construction industry and home owners. I should like first to comment on the causes of the slump in the housing industry. In 1980, the trend of interest rates had a detrimental effect on the rate of home construction and has to a certain extent lengthened the period of stagnation in this sector. Housing starts in 1980 fell to 159,000 units, and this decline in activity, which has been going on for four years, constitutes the longest slump we have known since the years 1929-1933. However, it seems rather oversimplistic to blame this situation only on the pattern of interest rates.

As you may recall, Mr. Speaker, before the beginning of the regression, the building industry was producing housing at a rate of approximately 260,000 units per year. The number of completed units in the following years exceeded the absorption capacity of the market. The housing stock increased rapidly and the industry responded by slowing down production. This market adjustment became even more complicated as a result of a decline in immigration, and as the number of immigrants fell to 86,000 in 1978 compared with the record figure of 218,000 in 1974, this decline was reflected in the housing demand which has not led to a quick recovery in the home building sector. While the immigration trend showed an increase in 1980, with a total of 142,000 immigrants, the financial situation has hindered the economic recovery on many markets. However, certain tight markets have adjusted rather quickly to high mortgage rates, and some of them have even showed an increase in housing starts for 1980.

[English]

For example, housing starts went up from 1979 by 84 per cent, 31 per cent and 55 per cent in St. John's, Vancouver and Victoria, respectively.

According to preliminary data, urban single detached starts in the first quarter of 1981 were approximately 43 per cent above the same period in 1980. The same comparison also revealed that mortgage interest rates were higher in early 1981, above 15 per cent compared to—

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—POSSIBILITY OF COMPENSATORY PAYMENTS TO ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, it was a little more than a week ago that I put a question to the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) concerning the problem he was having reaching an agreement for the use of the RCMP forces in eight of our provinces. The suggestion I made to him in the question was that he might conclude an agreement with all ten of the provinces so that the two largest provinces, Ontario and my own province of Quebec, which use their own police forces, could receive compensatory payments in lieu of the benefits which are received by the other provinces.

This question derives from some questions I have been putting to the various solicitors general and also on the order paper for the last several years suggesting that if there are benefits accruing to the other provinces from the use of the RCMP and since there is a contribution made by the taxpayers in the two largest provinces of Ontario and Quebec, there should be compensatory payments in lieu of the benefits received by the other provinces.

In his reply, the Solicitor General stated that it is not intended to be a cost-sharing agreement and never has been. Maybe, but the figures might illustrate otherwise. The latest figures I have, given to me by a predecessor of the present Solicitor General, indicate that there are approximately 2,500 members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec obviously being used for federal duties or federal purposes. Of the approximately 8,200 members of the RCMP in the other eight provinces, approximately 2,100 are used for federal purposes, 4,100 for provincial purposes and 2,000 for municipal duties.

In addition, I am told that the amount charged to the eight provinces in the last year for which figures appear to be available—the 1979-80 period—totalled $119 million.

Going back some five years to 1975-76, the charge in that period was $68 million. I was only able to do my arithmetic for that particular year because of comparable figures, but the calculation, based on the number of personnel of the RCMP used in that year divided into the $68 million charged, indicated that we were charging at that time some $11,000 per person.

From that figure I gained the impression that this was a concessionary rate, and thus I suggested that if in order to maintain one police force in the eight provinces we were in effect to charge only to the eight provinces a rate somewhat lower—in fact, possibly substantially lower—than the actual cost to the federal government of those persons employed and since this cost was paid in part by the taxes of the residents of the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec, the two provinces which have two-thirds of the population of this country, there should be some return to these two provinces to compensate for the benefit which was being received in the other eight provinces.

I think it is important at this time to stress this point because the eight provinces, which are apparently reluctant to conclude an agreement, are under the impression—apparently also—that the federal government should be making some contribution toward the cost of the police forces, the RCMP, which are being used in these eight provinces. If this is to continue to be the case, the taxpayers of the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec should be compensated for whatever benefits are being given in these eight other provinces. Alternatively, the Solicitor General should ensure that the amount being charged is fair and just, so that there is no cost to the taxpayers in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

● (2215)

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) raised in his question a subject which at the moment is my greatest priority as Solicitor General. That is the renegotiation of the contracts for provincial policing services between Canada and eight provinces and 180 odd municipalities across the country. Those contracts expired last Tuesday. They are a very important job for the RCMP. In fact, almost half of the RCMP are engaged in providing provincial and municipal police services.

In their federal role, and there are 11,000 of them across the country doing federal policing, all of the payments of course come from the national taxpayers and the national treasury, as they should. However, under the provincial and municipal role where we provide police to fulfil the responsibilities to other levels of government, we expect that those governments and their constituents who benefit from these services will pay the largest share of the cost for those services.

The hon. member indicated that we should not charge those provinces any less than the cost of the service. I disagree. I think we should charge less than the services cost because there is some national benefit from having the RCMP as a provincial police force and a municipal police force. There are efficiencies. The country benefits from having the same police force working at three levels; sharing their training, communications facilities, offices and other facilities. These are advantages from which the provinces should benefit.

At the same time, these highly trained members of the RCMP are competent when they are working at the municipal level and provincial level to help us in the federal policing program. We are prepared to recognize that benefit and contribute a share of that cost to the provinces and municipalities. The question is how much.

We want to share with the provinces the cost to such an extent that the federal taxpayer will not be subsidizing these provincial police services. The hon. member for Vaudreuil is correct when he states there would be no justification for the federal government providing a subsidy to those provinces.

We do not intend to provide a subsidy. We provide policing service. The offer was available to Ontario and Quebec, not to get money from the federal government, and Canada would have benefited from it, but to have the RCMP serving in their provinces as provincial and municipal police. They chose, as is their constitutional right, to do the policing themselves.

Those provinces which use the force benefit from it. However, the benefits are in policing. The benefits should not be in some subsidy from fellow taxpayers at the national level to those who are in municipalities, whether or not they pay for their own policing, or who are in provinces which do not have the benefit of the RCMP.

These contracts are now up for negotiation. We have not settled the price. However, the principle is very clear. Each level of government will only be expected to pay for the benefits it receives. I hope to be able to report shortly to the House that contracts have been renegotiated and that the RCMP will continue to perform that very valued and historic role for the provinces and municipalities.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—RE-OPENING OF CONTRACT TO CONSTRUCT F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight at 10.19 to discuss the plight of over 1,000 workers who have been laid off at McDonnell Douglas (Canada) and the mysterious situation surrounding the F-18 contract signed between this government and McDonnell Douglas of St. Louis for an amount in the area of $4 billion in 1981 dollars.

● (2220)

As the House knows, the Department of National Defence had been looking for a long time at various aircraft in order that a purchase be made to re-equip our armed forces which are using outdated equipment. Many in this House studied, through the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, the various proposals which were narrowed down to two: the F-16 and the F-18.

In meeting with McDonnell Douglas officials, I and many of my colleagues were assured that, if the Government of Canada awarded the fighter aircraft contract to McDonnell Douglas, the F-18 Hornet, the Canadian plant in Malton would receive a significant share of the Canadian offset program. At the same time, my colleague, Alex Jupp, the then member of Parliament for Mississauga North and I both tried to receive assurances that Orenda engines would get some of the work on the General Electric motors, but no assurances were given.

At the time the contract was to be announced, the Quebec Liberal caucus met with the makers of the F-16 which they favoured, not because it was the best for Canada, but because it promised more work for Quebec.

At the same time—and we can give them full marks—they meet with McDonnell Douglas. What went on at that latter meeting has not been told. Was the Quebec Liberal caucus promised additional work in Quebec to the detriment of Ontario? Did the Quebec caucus support the F-18 contract because of a deal which was made between them and McDonnell Douglas? When asked that question, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) refused to answer, as can be seen at page 9103 of Hansard for April 9.

The contract was awarded in Ottawa last spring by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne), and we were all very excited. I attended the signing of the contract and was thrilled by the performance of the F-18 Hornet at the Ottawa International Airport. The workers at McDonnell Douglas were drinking champagne to celebrate, and now over 1,000 of them are walking the street looking for work.

Part of the offset program was construction of components or parts for the DC-9 and the DC-10. I would imagine that part of the contract has already been broken. McDonnell Douglas Canada, with the know-how and the trained manpower, bid on forward fuselage side panels and pylons for the new aircraft.

When Ottawa saw that there were no competing bids for side panels and pylons from Quebec, presto, a Crown corporation owned by the Government of Canada, located in Quebec, namely Canadair Ltd. put in its bid. In answer to a question which I posed on April 9, 1981, as found at page 9103 of Hansard, the Minister of Supply and Services said that it was an unsolicited bid. That is for the public to decide. Then the minister said:

—McDonnell Douglas invited the other bidders to attempt to fix their bids and the whole process is under review by McDonnell Douglas.

I would suggest that "fix their bids" is pretty strong language in the game of tendering, and begs more questions.

I submit that the F-18 contract has been a case of the worst kind of political pressure and that subcontractors in Ontario and their workers will be the victims. I cannot help but wonder, as to the workers at McDonnell Douglas, where the Onario Liberal caucus has been in Ottawa for the past year, especially the member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher).

When Bill Patrick, president of local 1967, United Auto Workers, which is the union that represents most of the workers at McDonnell Douglas, invited all political parties and Members of Parliament to a meeting with the union and its membership, not one Grit showed up. Not one Liberal was to be seen, not even the member for Mississauga North, which is where the meeting took place.

The Progressive Conservative Party was represented by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) and myself, the NDP was represented by Mike Cassidy, but there were no Liberals. Yet, some people wonder why the working man or woman or the unemployed, as most were at that meeting, are becoming so cynical at the complete inaction and non-interest the government displays. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), "Herb, lower the interest rates or I'll resign, Gray" has not lifted a finger to help. It takes Premier Davis to show the initiative, as he did last week, to travel to St. Louis to get some action, and there will be significant announcements made in the not-too-distant future. Union President Bill Patrick recognized this initiative as a positive step to help the workers with their plight.

● (2225)

What is happening with that multi-million dollar contract and the 2,000 new jobs promised, many of them at the McDonnell Douglas plant? Nothing to date. Why? The minister says the whole process is now under revision by McDonnell Douglas. Why? Because the government asked them to change the process? I think it is time that the Liberal government came clean on the entire matter, levelled with the workers of McDonnell Douglas and with the people of Canada. What deals were made? What concessions were made to the Quebec caucus by McDonnell Douglas and/or the government? Finally, when, pray tell, can the sub-contract be expected to be signed so Canadians can start to work on the F-18? For every day that goes by, another F-18 and all its parts is being built in another country, and we lose.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I would like to preface my remarks on behalf of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) with two observations. First, although the CF-18 contract is very lengthy, it is a public document accessible to the hon. member opposite. It describes in great detail the large number of commitments that McDonnell Douglas has made to Canada in connection with the Hornet project. Two, the decision to purchase this particular aircraft was based not only on the sum of the contractual obligations it generated but, more important, because of the suitability of the aircraft itself for Canadian defence requirements.

As for the two questions asked by the hon. member on April 9, as reported at page 9103 of Hansard, I would first like to inform the House that McDonnell (Canada) was not the only firm to bid on the forward fuselage side panels and wing pylons when the bids closed the first time. An additional Canadian firm submitted a proposal to manufacture the forward side panels and two additional firms submitted proposals on the manufacture of the wing pylons.

I would also like to reiterate the minister's response to the second question, which may be found in Hansard on the same date and page I mentioned previously. That is to say that the government was not pressured, nor did it request McDonnell Douglas, St. Louis, to re-open tenders for any of the structural components. The company elected to solicit Canadian industry for new bids when Canadair expressed an interest to join in the competition. The government is not interested in interfering with the McDonnell Douglas normal bid solicitation process. It is not unusual for bids to be re-opened to seek additional tenders if the first bids received are not necessarily responsive to the requirements, or if the requirements change. It should be noted that escalation factors, exchange rates and production requirements have all changed to some extent since the tenders were first called. It is in this sense that the minister used the phrase "to fix" tenders. Perhaps he means "to update" tenders.

The government did not request a bid from Canadair on side panels, wing pylons or any other components. The government has an agreement to purchase complete CF-18 aircraft from McDonnell Douglas. That firm is responsible for choosing its suppliers according to its own policies and the applicable regulations and laws of the United States. In short, there is no assurance that any Canadian firm will be chosen to perform the work in question. Our contract requires that Canadian prices must be competitive with the cost of performing the work in the United States. However, we have no reason to believe that this will not be the case. It is anticipated that McDonnell Douglas will identify the most attractive bidder within the next few weeks.

SPACE SHUTTLE COLUMBIA

CONGRATULATIONS TO AMERICAN PEOPLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43, the nature of which is such as I would think commends itself for unanimous acceptance by all members of the House.

In view of the successful landing only a few minutes ago of the space shuttle Columbia and the historic importance of this event, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House convey to the President and the people of the United States its congratulations on today's outstanding achievement in man's continuing adventure in space, and further, that this House commends the daring and skill displayed by Captain Robert L. Crippen and John W. Young in carrying out this historic mission.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous acceptance for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion moved by Mr. Nielsen, seconded by Mr. Neil. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Carried.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX

MISTAKES IN FILLING OUT INDIVIDUAL RETURNS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, whereas it is widely recognized that mistakes in filling out income tax returns can be made honestly and without any criminal intent whatsoever, and whereas reassessment may result in unexpected demands for immediate repayment of substantial sums of money, thereby putting families under great financial and psychological pressure, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That where honest mistakes have been made in the filing of income tax returns, and where reassessment results in demands for repayment of substantial sums of money, the Department of National Revenue impose its time requirements for repayment in a more humane manner and waive all interest charges imposed on such moneys for a reasonable period.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA OIL AND GAS ACT

CALL FOR REJECTION OF BILL C-48—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent importance. To my knowledge no political philosophy or party in this House advocates confiscation of private property ownership or rights without appropriate compensation and/or access to due process of law. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House categorically reject any legislative initiative such as Bill C-48, or policy direction by government which advocates or incorporates into the laws of Parliament retroactive expropriation by government, or Crown corporations of government, of property deemed to be private property without due compensation and/or access to due process of law.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

PUBLIC SERVICE

SHORTAGE OF AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43 which pertains to lower altitudes than the Columbia accomplished today. I hope the House will support and give unanimous consent to it.

In view of the fact that the government is short 300 air traffic controllers from the normal level, and since the serious shortage of air traffic controllers may play havoc with airline schedules this summer, particularly at Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant):

That the government restore the number of control positions at Toronto and develop a plan to have an adequate supply of controllers by expanding training programs and improving work conditions.

RE-ELECTION OF QUEBEC PREMIER—REMARKS MADE BY PREMIER OF NOVA SCOTIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion concerning the incredible remarks made last night by the Premier of Nova Scotia who praised Premier René Lévesque as a "very astute man" whose victory represented a victory for the constitutional stand of the eight dissident premiers. Therefore, in view of Premier Buchanan's obvious endorsement of separation in the context of the views of the eight premiers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne):

That this House condemns the premier and all others who see in Mr. Lévesque's election a victory in the process of undermining legitimate constitutional change in Canada.

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENTS TO PLACE QUOTAS ON LAMB AND MUTTON IMPORTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact lamb producers are faced with seriously depressed prices for their product because air shipments of fresh lamb are being allowed into Canada from New Zealand, and that if we are to diversify agriculture in Canada some protection must be afforded to infant industries such as lamb, mutton and wool producers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Minister of Agriculture table amendments to Bill C-46, the Meat Import Act, to provide for quotas on imports of lamb and mutton, and immediately enter into negotiations with New Zealand to determine fair and equitable quotas.

THE PRIME MINISTER

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau—

Mr. Taylor: —charged the Progressive Conservative Party with an element of fascism, which is totally wrong; whereas fascism is defined by Webster as "a political regime that exalts nation and race above the individual and that stands for centralized autocratic government headed by a dictatorial leader, severe economic and social regimentation and forcible suppression"; whereas the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has in the past invoked the War Measures Act authorizing arrests without warrant, invoked closure in the House of Commons suppressing free speech, and is now imposing metric on the food stores in Canada, even though 80 per cent of the stores and the people do not want it, etc., etc., I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

DEVELOPMENT OF NEW BRUNSWICK OIL SHALES

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, the government of New Brunswick has made representation to the federal government for assistance in establishing a research and development program for development of the oil shales of that province, which very likely contain a minimum of 15 billion barrels of oil. Obviously the minister's supposed interest shown in the project has been nothing more than lip service. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

RESULTS OF CANADA-UNITED STATES MINISTERIAL DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, for the second day in a row, after his well-touted meetings in Washington concerning the ailing auto industry, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who assured us that he would be in his seat yesterday and today, is still not here. I find that highly irresponsible on his part.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: Therefore, in the minister's absence, since the acting minister did not know what was going on yesterday, I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister tell this House his views on the $4.5 billion auto pact deficit which has been experienced by the Canadian auto industry and the 94 per cent increase in imported Japanese automobiles coming in to this country? What decisions were reached in Washington in the numerous meetings that the minister has had, on which, in his irresponsibility, he has not come to the House, nor has he given us even one of his famous press releases as to the outcome of these meetings? What decisions were made as a result of the meetings in Washington last week?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, instead of all this rhetoric, the hon. member could try to make some constructive suggestions concerning the problems now facing the Canadian auto industry.

As I pointed out to him yesterday, the hon. member is aware that the government has spared no effort to solve the problems of the Chrysler Corporation. He also knows that the newspapers announced yesterday and today that Ford has started to rehire employees and that the first V-6 engines made in Canada came out of the production line yesterday. As my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, is now in the House, he can also report on his meeting in Washington.

INCREASE IN IMPORTS FROM JAPAN

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to see that the great Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has made a courageous entry into the House of Commons—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: —to tell us about his conquests in Washington last week, since none of the other cabinet ministers knew what was going on.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the 94 per cent increase in Japanese auto imports into Canada over last year and the continuing failure of the minister to negotiate a consensus among Japanese manufacturers which would guarantee voluntary restrictions of exports of automobiles to Canada, can the minister tell us, notwithstanding his reluctance to impose temporary import quotas, what considerations, if any, have been given to using Japanese dependency on our natural resources as a lever to urge Japan's auto manufacturers to include at least some Canadian, or a higher Canadian, content in parts made in their production of automobiles, and for that matter a higher degree of investment in the Canadian auto parts and manufacturing sector? Has this position been taken with the Japanese? If not, why not? What is the minister waiting for?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, in my discussions with the Japanese, which began last year, I pointed out to them that our exports to that country were composed of a relatively small, in fact a too small, proportion of manufactured goods. I expressed the view that it would be in the interests of the healthy continuation of our trade with Japan that a better and larger portion of it would be in the form of manufactured goods.

• (1420)

I would be very interested to have my hon. friend confirm that it is the policy of his party, including the Conservative members from western Canada, to put the exports of resources from that part of our country to Japan on the block in the way that he suggested.

TIMING OF GOVERNMENT DECISIONS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Not only did the minister not answer that question, he has still not told us what decisions were made in Washington in his talks last week. It is very obvious that the minister is not taking this matter seriously, but I can assure him that we are, and that hundreds of thousands of Canadians who depend on a healthy auto industry in Canada are, as well.

An hon. Member: Quit skating!

Mr. Jelinek: My last supplementary question is this: last week the minister said, and I quote very quickly, "We're not talking about joint decisions", with the United States. "We're talking about making our own decisions." That is what we have been asking as well. The minister has a number of specific recommendations and a number of specific options. Can he tell us now why he has not taken action on these specific recommendations and options, and when can the industry and when can Canadians expect some of these specific decisions to be made?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): We have taken a number of specific decisions aimed at strengthening the position of the auto industry, its workers, and the firms in it in our country. My hon. friend was giving these details as I came into the House—the agreement with respect to Chrysler which protects thousands of jobs in this country, both in Chrysler itself and in hundreds of supplying firms; our agreement with Ford with respect to the future of the Oakville plant; the discussions we completed which led to the reopening of the Ford foundry in Windsor; the assistance with respect to the aluminum engine, at the Essex (Engine) plant.

With respect to the situation in Japan, we have already been talking to the Japanese and have said to them that we expect they will give us the same type of administrative guidance with respect to exports to Canada that they are giving with respect to exports to the United States.

We have a team in Japan right now to make sure that the Japanese understand that if they take action with respect to exports of cars to the United States, there must be equivalent action with respect to exports to Canada. If that is not done, and there is a diversionary situation with respect to exports of Japanese cars to our country, we will have to take action within our own legal framework, in the light of our own market situation, in order to assure the position of the Canadian industry and the Canadian workers. So we have been taking concrete action, and we are prepared to take further concrete action in the interests of the industry, its workers, and the entire Canadian economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EFFECT OF RELAXATION OF UNITED STATES POLLUTION AND SAFETY REGULATIONS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In his absence I will address it to the acting minister of transport. Last week the Reagan administration announced plans to relax 34 auto pollution and safety regulations in the hope of reviving the North American auto industry. Some 16 of these plans to rescind the regulations involve safety measures. Will the acting minister of transport say what effect these deregulations will have on North American manufactured cars sold in Canada?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker—

Mr. Nielsen: The acting minister!

Mr. Bockstael: —the relaxing of auto pollution devices in the U.S. is not to be granted in Canada. In Canada we will hold to the safety measures for which the specifications call. I will ask the minister to prepare a further report on the effect of the cars which are imported from the U.S. and whether the equipment will have to be maintained on those which are brought into Canada.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I am sorry, I do not want to hear from the parliamentary secretary on this question.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Under the system of ministerial responsibility there is a minister, there is an acting minister, and in his absence there is another acting minister. I will ask the question of the one remaining colleague from Manitoba, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who I believe is the acting minister of transport.

Mr. Nielsen: The acting minister.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): I will try it again. If, as, and when these proposed eased regulations come into effect in the United States, is the transport department prepared to impose stronger standards here in Canada so as not to sacrifice the safety concerns of the Canadian consumer?

Mr. Bockstael: The answer is yes.

Mr. Nielsen: So much for acting ministers.

Mr. Bockstael: The government is prepared to maintain the standards in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF SPRING BUDGET

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which concerns the economic crisis that Canada is currently going through. We now have more than one million people unemployed and the numbers are growing; the cost of living has increased some 12 per cent year over year and the situation is worsening. The government's budget forecasts have turned out to be completely wrong.

My question to the Prime Minister, who is responsible for the government as a whole, is as follows: now that the constitutional debate is almost completed, will he show that he is concerned about unemployment and about the cost of living by announcing the government's intention to bring in a new budget when the House resumes on May 12?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance has indicated that he intends to bring forward a budget in the fall. I might add that a great deal of work has been done and a lot has been accomplished by this government in the areas of economic policy and finance, since we came back for the fall session.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I am not asking a technical question that requires an answer from the Minister of Finance or his parliamentary secretary. I am asking a question of the Prime Minister who is responsible for other things than the Constitution in this country. Will he answer the question by telling the House whether we are going to get a new budget that will deal with increasing unemployment and increasing inflation, or is the Government of Canada just going to sit back while the people of Canada suffer?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Write him a letter, Ed.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will be happy to raise the matter with the Minister of Finance. I believe he will want to bring in a budget in the course of the next year.

REQUEST FOR ACTION ON GASOLINE PRICES AND HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, it will certainly be encouraging to the more than one million people who are unemployed now, all the young people who cannot buy houses and the pensioners who cannot buy food, to hear the Prime Minister say that within a year we might get some action.

Since there are two specific areas that do not require a new budget and that have already been brought to the attention of the government, will he, as Prime Minister, undertake to the House that the government will get in touch with the oil companies that have been shown to have ripped off the Canadian consumer by billions of dollars in recent years, and request that they roll back their price of a gallon of gasoline by at least six cents? Second, will the government take some direct action to bring down the price of mortgages so that young people will be able to afford to buy a home again?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, both these subjects were dealt with by the Minister of Finance in answer to similar questions in the past week.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

PLANS TO ASSIST PARTS SUPPLY SECTOR

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the minister well knows, the falling off in demand for cars and trucks in Canada has resulted in lay-offs in the industry, with perhaps a greater degree of lay-off in the auto parts manufacturing industry. In view of the recent announcement that Japanese car imports have increased by 94 per cent over last year and with the minister's own comment that he will not act against those imports, what assurance will he give that we in Canada will continue to have a parts supply industry? What alternative plan of action will he initiate for those persons who are subject to the present lay-offs and those that they can expect in years to come?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we have not ruled out any options. We are continuing to keep all options under active review. We are monitoring the situation very closely.

With respect to the auto parts sector, the efforts we are making are linked with assisting them to increase their sales in foreign markets, including countries like Japan, through trading missions, through assistance to trade fairs and activities of that sort. We are working with the auto parts sector through the Enterprise Development Program to help them get the capital they require in order to re-tool and re-equip.

Our efforts to facilitate the restructuring of the major vehicle manufacturers in this country are aimed also at not only facilitating their ongoing activity but at increasing the opportunities for the independent parts sector to have growing outlets for their manufacturers with the major manufacturers, so as to maintain and strengthen employment opportunities in the parts sector. The concerns and opportunities of that sector are very much part of our strategy and our efforts.

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): Since the minister has clearly made a statement with respect to imports, will he not now answer clearly and distinctly whether he will initiate a requirement for Canadian content in imported cars sold in Canada?

• (1430)

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, this is one of the aspects we have under review. It was one of the ideas presented to us at the major meeting with the industry we had last week. We do have Canadian value added requirements on the part of the motor vehicle manufacturers now as part of the arrangements under the auto pact. We are interested not only in maintaining but increasing the use of Canadian components in automobiles assembled here and sold in world markets. This is a very important part of our strategy and objective for the industry.

QUERY RESPECTING RENEGOTIATION OF CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is with reference to the Canada-U.S. trade agreement. Since Canada's deficit on auto parts in 1980 remains at an incredible $4.2 billion, the same as for 1979, what action has the minister taken to renegotiate the auto pact with the United States to improve the Canadian parts manufacturing sector? Has he anything definite to report? Does he have any progress or achievement to report?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I think my hon. friend is mistaken. The most recent figures indicate that the deficit has gone down considerably. I still think it is higher than it should be, but it has gone down considerably.

An hon. Member: What is it?

Mr. Gray: We obtained a commitment from the new Reagan administration that it would continue the formal consultations we began with the previous Carter administration with respect to the operations of the auto pact. This was a subject of my discussions in Washington on Friday, and one of the purposes was to renew the consultations which will be continued at the senior official level. The objective is to obtain a better working of the auto pact from a Canadian point of view. We want to see improvement in the whole area of the deficit on auto parts. This is an important aspect of our discussions with the United States under the auto pact consultations.

Mr. Wise: Madam Speaker, from the minister's comment I take it that there is really nothing definite to report as of today. But if Canada is expected to bear its fair share with reference to the Chrysler problem, we should also expect this government to insist on Canada's fair share with respect to the auto parts market. If the U.S. government refuses to renegotiate the auto pact, which is a very good possibility, what other concrete options or alternatives does the minister have to help the Canadian parts manufacturers?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I think my hon. friend's question is quite premature because the new Reagan administration has agreed to continue the formal consultations that we asked for under Article IV of the auto pact. This administration has been in office formally only three months. We have again begun discussions under the auspices of these formal consultations. The tone of the discussions was very positive. While it is too soon to say exactly how it will come out, I think that we are in a position to work together to help restore the health of the North American auto industry in a way which is fair and equitable to both countries, which means important improvements in the operations of that industry from the Canadian point of view.

HEALTH AND SAFETY

USE OF DALKON SHIELD INTERUTERINE DEVICES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Hopefully she is not pouting as badly as the Prime Minister is about yesterday's events and she will be able to answer my question.

In view of the fact that since 1971 some 127,000 Dalkon shield interuterine devices have been sold in Canada, and in view of the fact that the manufacturer of this particular brand of interuterine device, A.H. Robins, has stopped making them, presumably because numerous studies have shown conclusively that the Dalkon shield threatens the health of women by causing interuterine infections, resulting in hysterectomies, sterility and in some cases death, is the minister now prepared to initiate a campaign alerting women and their doctors to the risk involved in continued use of these devices and encouraging Canadian women to have them removed?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, this is the kind of question on which I would have appreciated receiving notice so that I could prepare a specific answer. I will now do it and report later.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, the fact that this is the kind of question, particularly this topic, on which the minister needs some notice, is part of the problem. This is a matter of concern which has been going on for some time, and I am surprised that the minister has nothing to tell us about this particular issue.

Madam Speaker, let me ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare another question about which she can take notice, unfortunately. In view of the fact that this device was allowed on the Canadian market, like so many other products without any pre-market testing by the government, or in this case by anyone else, will the minister finally take some steps to improve the protection of Canadian women offered by the health protection branch, and will the minister consider and talk to her officials about going after the company involved for recovery of costs incurred through our health care system as the result of this company's inferior product?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I will just repeat what I have said previously. In the case of a specific product which the opposition critic suggests is dangerous to the health of women, and because of the accusations he makes, it would be far more practical and constructive for everyone if he gave me advance notice, because then I could give the answer in the House. I might tell the hon. member that Health and Welfare is a complex and huge department, which the hon. member does not seem to realize because he does not know the intricacies of it.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

PLANS TO DEAL WITH SUMMER FOREST FIRES

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. As the minister is aware, units of Canada's armed forces last summer played a very important part in the forest fire problems which developed in northwestern Ontario. Given the small amount of snow during the winter which will result in very little runoff, and the expectation that fires could be worse this year, will the minister outline the plans of his department to support and give help wherever it is necessary?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I have already had contact with some of the western people—

An hon. Member: The western people?

Mr. Lamontagne: —who are responsible for actually looking after the security of citizens of their own provinces where forest fires are concerned. I can assure the hon. member that plans will not be changed. There will be some manoeuvres this summer. I can assure hon. members that authority will be given to these emergencies above any manœuvres of the armed forces.

POLITICAL PARTIES

FUND RAISING ACTIVITY OF LIBERAL PARTY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister approved a new method of fund raising for the Liberal Party which apparently consists of his cabinet ministers agreeing to go to cocktail parties held by the Liberal Party? For example, if you pay $150, you get a $130 tax receipt and the chance to meet Liberal ministers to try to persuade them to do something, just to meet them, or whatever the purpose is. Obviously it should be anybody's right to meet a minister if they have legitimate business with the government. But this is the method now in use.

If the Prime Minister has not approved this most peculiar method of fund raising, will he forbid this kind of humiliating sale of political favours, or what the Criminal Code calls solicitation?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Will the Prime Minister put a stop to this kind of practice by his government, which lowers the whole government in the eyes of the people of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I understand and accept the position of the hon. member that ministers should be available to meet any Canadian who wants to put a matter of business before them. But I fail to see that a minister has a duty to meet people at cocktail parties. If the Liberal Party wants to use the fact that ministers are very popular and that they are prepared to drink cocktails with other people, I do not see anything wrong with that. Just because the hon. member is not that popular, it does not mean that there is anything wrong with it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I can see that the Prime Minister feels very "Pee-Queliar" today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Perhaps the Prime Minister does not understand that this cheapens the whole process of government for cabinet ministers to sell themselves to go to cocktail parties. They do not even go free when they get a free drink. They sell themselves to go there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: If the Prime Minister does not want to forbid this tawdry practice, will he at least insist that the names of those who attend the cocktail parties and the names of the consenting ministers be published after each such affair so we will know who is doing it, why, and for what?

Mr. Dick: And what the bribery is.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member is insistent on referring to yesterday's elections, he should refer to the federal byelections in London and Prince Edward Island.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: As to the principle which the hon. member seems to be worried about, if I am not mistaken his own party indulges in fund raising dinners—

Mr. Crosbie: Never.

Mr. Trudeau: Never I am told.

Mr. Crosbie: Never in this kind of cheap political salesmanship.

Mr. Trudeau: The member isn't even telling the truth.

Mr. Crosbie: These are members of your cabinet selling themselves for payment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MARCH BY BIGSTONE BAND TO EDMONTON—CLOSURE OF DEPARTMENT'S LOCAL OFFICES

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As the minister is aware, after an orderly and non-militant walk from Wabasca in northeastern Alberta to Edmonton, the Bigstone band arriving at the Indian Affairs offices in Edmonton were met by signs saying "Office Temporarily Closed, Inquiries see Third Floor Security". Was the minister aware that the Indian Affairs offices in Edmonton were to be closed temporarily? Did the minister authorize the closing of the offices temporarily? Did the minister know that a security force was hired temporarily? Did he authorize their hiring temporarily? Does the minister condone the actions of the Edmonton Indian Affairs office which barred access to its offices to the Bigstone band?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): As the hon. member may be aware, Madam Speaker, we had discussions last week. We discussed a series of proposals that might work to the benefit of the Bigstone band. The hon. member was helpful in presenting those proposals to the band. It was the feeling of the chief and the hon. member that that would be satisfactory and would solve the matter without the necessity of any march at all. It is not only the allegations of the hon. member with respect to what officials in Edmonton may have done that he may be critical of, but he can be critical of himself in misjudging the matter entirely.

As far as the office being closed was concerned, yes, apparently there had been some notification that there would be occupancy of the office. It was the opinion of the director general in the field that the office should be closed to prevent that, because once occupancy takes place it is not a very pleasant picture with respect to evacuation. In the interests of avoiding any more ugliness, that course was adopted, and I think it was probably the right one.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, the minister indicated that I had full knowledge. I want to suggest to the minister that under no circumstances did I view that there was going to be any occupation whatsoever. It was a non-militant march.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I didn't say you.

Mr. Shields: I would like to ask the minister whether the offices were closed because members of the department were afraid to meet with Indian people. Is the minister going to take action to get rid of people who work in Indian affairs who are actually afraid to meet with Indian people?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I suggest the hon. member not talk in generalities. It is not fair to people in the public service who cannot answer for themselves. If he wishes to specify, be particular and substantiate charges of the kind he has made, that there are officials in my department who will not meet with the Indian people, I will look into it very seriously. I do not think the hon. member is prepared to do that or he would have done it by now.

INDUSTRY

INTRODUCTION OF INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Will he advise the House when he intends to bring forward for discussion his long awaited and much heralded industrial strategy?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the timing of further initiatives in the government's programs will become clearer once there is final disposition of the constitutional measures before the House. I am glad my hon. friend has asked the question because I take it, when we come forward with these steps, we will have his full and unqualified support.

Mr. Hees: Madam Speaker, naturally I would like to be able to support such a measure, but of course first I must know what the measure is. In that line, may I ask the minister if he would very briefly outline to the House just what this industrial strategy is going to consist of, Madam Speaker?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, we have already taken a number of steps that indicate our commitment to strengthen and broaden the industrial base of this country. The implementation of the national electronics program, the creation of the office of the future program, the support for the Telidon concept, the support for the Dash-8 and PT-7 engine—these are just some examples of what we are interested in doing in order to strengthen and broaden, in a regionally balanced way, the industrial base of this country.

I can give other examples such as our national space program, our efforts to have in place through the oil and gas legislation industrial benefits from offshore and Canada lands development for Canadians. What we have already done, using the work we have done within the government as a planning guideline, far surpasses anything that was done in a combination of the Diefenbaker years when my hon. friend was in government and the wasted months of the Clark government. Therefore, we have done a lot already.

ENERGY

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCE OF ALBERTA

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. My riding, perhaps more than many others, is directly involved in the energy negotiations because of the pipeline being built in the Welland riding. Can the minister of energy please inform this House and make a few comments on the status of negotiations between himself and the minister of energy for Alberta?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I do not think there is much more I can add to what has already been made public. There was a constructive meeting yesterday between the energy minister of Alberta and myself. We agreed to meet again in the latter part of May. Our officials will pursue several avenues which we found of particular interest, in the next few weeks. This is certainly a first step in the right direction. I cannot promise that there is an agreement around the corner, but at least there is a more positive atmosphere in our discussions than I have seen before.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ASSISTANCE REQUESTED FOR JAMES BAY CREE COMMUNITIES

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Over the weekend the minister made a superficial tour of Cree communities in the James Bay area. While there, he saw open sewers, full outhouses, and had a chance to drink contaminated well water. The minister has announced a review of the James Bay situation to see if the federal government is living up to the spirit of the agreement. Without waiting two months for this review, what is the minister prepared to do right away to meet the emergency situation which he saw over the weekend?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, it would of course have been more advantageous to have been able to spend more time, but the hon. member is aware, if anybody in the House is, of the number of meetings held last week with the Indian leadership here in Ottawa, and the meetings that I am required to attend this week in Ottawa. As far as the agenda was concerned it was prepared by Grand Chief Billy Diamond. We adhered to his scheduling in terms of places he wanted to see and the time we would spend there.

With regard to what we are going to do about it, I can tell the hon. member I met with senior officials who attended with me at the site. We are trying to find, through a readjustment of priorities, money to cope with the short-term situation. As far as the long-term treatment is concerned, we will have to wait for the findings of the report which we expect in two months. I might say I have discussed the timing with Grand Chief Billy Diamond and the Cree. They do not want a superficial job done. They think that two months is reasonable.

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, the minister made a very quick tour of the area, and the people there would appreciate action that is just as quick. Considering that in the community of Paint Hills there is a fresh outbreak of gastroenteritis, which last year took the lives of several children, no action can be too quick. Will the minister promise to take immediate action to provide at least decent drinking water for this and other communities? Surely that is within the spirit and the letter of the James Bay agreement.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, with regard to the situation in Paint Hills, that is a priority that we are already taking action on to see what can be done about the situation to improve it considerably.

ENERGY

DEVELOPMENT OF NEW BRUNSWICK OIL SHALES

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. A short time ago in the House the minister's parliamentary secretary announced the establishment of a federal technical committee to study the energy potential of the oil shales in New Brunswick. I would like the minister to tell the House just what participation he expects the New Brunswick government to have, when he expects the formation of the committee, and when its work will begin?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, consultations are now going on with representatives of the New Brunswick government, and we hope that the active discussions concerning this project will start in the very near future.

[English]

FUNDING FOR RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the minister can indicate with whom those discussions are taking place, and also comment on the fact that the New Brunswick government has expressed concern that the National Energy Program underestimates the potential role that New Brunswick oil shales could play in the security of energy supply as well as job creation for eastern Canada. New Brunswick has asked for some special form of consideration for a research and development program. Will the minister advise the House whether indeed he is prepared to give New Brunswick the assurance of that funding?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, discussions are taking place with New Brunswick officials, and the purpose of the study would be to determine whether there is as much merit and as much value in the oil shales of New Brunswick as certain people claim. The purpose of this study would be to evaluate exactly what are the possibilities in this respect, and we would be the happiest people in the world if the conclusions of the studies were positive.

SLOWDOWN OF CONVERSION TO USE OF NATURAL GAS

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Because of his comments and some of the programs which have been brought forward, I know the minister is very interested in natural gas as an option for taking us away from our dependency on expensive imported oil. I wonder if the minister knows that prior to the National Energy Program there was a large number of domestic and commercial conversions to natural gas, but since the National Energy Program there has been a real slowdown on those conversions, to a point where 100 people have been laid off at one conversion company alone because people have simply stopped converting. There are no more conversions. Is the minister aware of that and if he is, has he taken any steps to overcome this?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member may refer to a specific instance, but I think over-all there has been a significant increase lately in the number of conversions in other regions which I could mention.

As far as the program of encouraging conversion is concerned, I have stated repeatedly that people are eligible for the $800 grant for any conversion made since October 28. The program is in effect in that respect. I expect to be able to announce in the next few weeks all the details of this particular program. Its administration is being set up in every province. As a matter of fact, since the beginning of April offices have been opened in every province. Application forms should be available early in May so that citizens can apply formally for the grants.

However, people who want to switch to natural gas are encouraged to do so right now. They need only keep their receipts. If they have their receipts and they have converted to natural gas from oil, they will be eligible for grants provided under the National Energy Program.

Mr. Gurbin: Madam Speaker, if the minister will check even locally here in Ottawa, I think he will find that there has been a significant decrease, down to about 23 per cent of the number of conversions there were previously. I think that information is substantiated in a number of reports, so I ask the minister to check with his officials. I know we will all be thankful for specific information on this program because, throughout the winter, there have been a number of Canadians who have been waiting for specific details of that.

DISTRIBUTION SYSTEM EXPANSION PROGRAM

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the minister is aware that a number of Canadians in Ontario and Quebec are not able to take advantage of the program of conversion to natural gas because it simply is not economic for the gas companies to take laterals into small communities. However, it does become economic if we consider this in terms of the amount of imported oil we could replace if we could get those laterals into those communities.

I wonder if the minister has any proposals to overcome this difficulty, or if he is in fact prepared to take suggestions which would help to compare these costs and these benefits so that all Canadians can benefit from this program.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Of course, Madam Speaker. As a matter of fact in the National Energy Program there is a provision for a special program called the distribution system expansion program which has allocated several hundred million dollars to provide for the expansion of services, particularly gas services, to communities where it would not otherwise be competitively economic. We have a program under which there will be the possibility of subsidization of expansion of certain gas lines to communities. This, however, requires the co-operation of the provincial governments, since such expansion has to be approved by the provincial boards concerned. The utilities have to apply in this regard.

There have been discussions in the last few months with the provinces in this respect. I am happy to see that practically all provinces have agreed now to the formula under which this could be pursued. It will be up to the utilities to apply to the provincial boards to get permission to extend their lateral lines for this particular purpose, and there would be grants available from the federal government under the National Energy Program to achieve the exact purpose mentioned by my hon. friend. This is in the National Energy Program.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR EVALUATION OF FARM BROADCASTING BY STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Communications, if I could get his attention. In 1976 the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts conducted detailed hearings into the quality of agricultural broadcasting by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. In July, 1977, it presented its report to Parliament. It concluded, and I will read just one sentence:

> Your committee is convinced that farm broadcasting, in terms of both calibre and time allotted to it, has deteriorated to a level which should be of grave concern.

The committee made six recommendations. Four years later many of those recommendations have not been acted upon.

I would like to ask the minister if he would consider either referring the recommendations to a committee for re-evaluation—the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture—or establishing an independent inquiry to find out just exactly what is the state of farm broadcasting by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the answer to the hon. gentleman's question is very simple and straightforward. My estimates are presently before the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture. The president of the CBC can appear as a witness, if that is the desire of the committee. I suggest that the hon. member raise these questions with the CBC when it appears before the standing committee.

Mr. Murta: Madam Speaker, that is not good enough. There would not be time available for the kind of in-depth study which I think is needed with respect to agricultural broadcasting on the CBC, in a standing committee. I think the minister is really just sloughing off and not answering my question.

Is the minister prepared either to refer this matter to a committee for re-evaluation—because very little has been done in four years—or to establish an independent inquiry to take a look at the state of farm broadcasting on the CBC?

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, obviously the hon. member cannot have it both ways. He has just stated that the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts a few years ago had the depth, knowledge and expertise to bring forward this type of recommendation on the CBC and its agricultural policy. I assume the same permanent committee, which some of his own colleagues are on, still has the same depth and experience. If he is saying they do not, I think that is a vote of non-confidence in his own members.

QUERY WITH RESPECT TO "RADIO NOON" PROGRAM

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Communications. Is the Minister of Communications aware of the considerable consternation caused among the agricultural community by the decision of the CBC to discontinue the services of Barbara Klich on "Radio Noon" in Toronto? This decision has created considerable concern both among farmers and among consumers.

Point of Order—Mr. Crosbie

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I would be pleased to bring the hon. member's concern to the attention of the CBC, as is properly my role, but I remind the hon. member, who sits on that standing committee, that it would be his role to ask the same questions of the president of the CBC when the president of the CBC appears before that committee.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I will indeed do that when the president of the CBC comes before the committee, but in view of the responsibility of the minister to report to Parliament on the CBC I want to ask him whether he is satisfied with the way in which "Radio Noon" has been conducting its affairs lately through the letting go of Barbara Klich. I want to ask him whether this has done a service to either Canadians on the agriculture side or Canadians on the consumer side, both of whom are up in arms over that decision.

● (1500)

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, obviously it is not for me to decide on CBC content or CBC production, and the hon. member knows that full well. I think the hon. member would probably disapprove quite strongly if I did, indeed, give that type of direction to the CBC.

As I indicated to the hon. member, I will bring his concerns to the attention of the management of the CBC. I think the hon. member himself is in a position to bring those concerns to the attention of the CBC when its officers appear before the standing committee. The hon. member is also a member of the steering committee which determines the witnesses who are going to be called during the examination of estimates, and up to now I have not known the hon. member to be either modest or humble in his requests.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. CROSBIE—RESPONSE OF MR. TRUDEAU DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order which arises from the question period. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was responding to a question I asked today, he said—I think I have his correct words—"the member isn't even telling the truth". I submit that is unparliamentary language and the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister had a close shave in two byelections yesterday and lost his head in Quebec. Now he is fleeing from the House. It is the obligation of the Prime Minister, if he says a member is not telling the truth, to inform the House how the member is not telling the truth. The Liberal Party raised $15,000 peddling cabinet ministers at $150 each and gave tax receipts for $130 each. If the Prime Minister alleges that what was said is not the truth, he has the obligation to point out to the House in what way the member is telling a falsehood. It is the Prime Minister's obligation when he returns to the chamber—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If that is the hon. member's point of order, I just want to point out to him that since 1958 the expression "is not telling the truth" has been accepted as being parliamentary.

MR. CROSBY—SERVICES PROVIDED TO MEMBERS

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. It actually relates to a question of privilege I presented to Your Honour on April 8, 1981. You will recall that I earlier had given you notice by letter dated April 1, 1981, of my question of privilege. The question of privilege was very simple and very clear. It related to the preferential treatment given to some members of this House in respect of the distribution of—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I recall the hon. member's question of privilege. I gave him an answer in this House and undertook to see whether it would be practical, and whether we have sufficient staff, to carry out what the hon. member was asking; that is to say, that each and every member who speaks in this House be provided with a copy of the blues. I said I thought the hon. member did have a point, that all members of this House are equal. I telephoned the hon. member's office to give him a progress report on what I had done. I inquired of our services, asking them to let me know whether this service could be provided to all members who speak in the House and, if not, what would be necessary in order to do that. I have done what I undertook to do. I do not feel the hon. member has a further point of order to raise because I will give him a report when I receive one from the services concerned.

Mr. Crosby: I rise merely to respond to your remarks, Madam Speaker. I should have taken the opportunity to move a motion to the effect that, if a question of privilege is found, the matter ought to be referred to a committee. I appreciate that Your Honour is making inquiries, but I felt I had raised a valid question of privilege. In light of your rulings on other questions of privilege which you found to be invalid, I felt I would prefer to have a ruling on my question once you had made your inquiries. I simply rise to ask whether you are going to make a ruling in due course on the matter.

Madam Speaker: The subject raised by the hon. member does not constitute a question of privilege. The hon. member raised it as a question of privilege, but the subject he is discussing is one which was dealt with informally in this House through arrangements made, I suppose, in discussions among the House leaders of the different parties. It is not a question of privilege, but the point of the hon. member is well taken and I did undertake to look into the matter. I hope to be in a position very soon to tell him whether we can handle such a service for members.

METRIC CANADA TV COMMERCIAL

Question No. 2,221—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Is there a Metric Canada TV commercial that states water freezes at 0 degrees Centigrade and, if so (a) for how long has the commercial been televised and for how much longer will it be televised (b) what is its cost to date?

2. Since the inception of the metric program, by year, what was the cost of advertising (a) in the press (b) on TV (c) on radio (d) in publications?

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): In so far as Metric Commission Canada is concerned: 1. Several 30 second film clips concerning temperatures in degrees Celsius were prepared early in 1975 by the National Film Board in collaboration with Metric Commission Canada. Consistent with the long-standing policy of the commission these film clips were made available to the CBC, CTV and Global television networks at no cost commencing in 1975. Member stations of all three networks have since then shown these film clips as a public service. Consequently, apart from the small initial cost of preparing the material, there has been no cost to the Canadian taxpayer for the broadcast of TV film clips and messages relating to metric conversion.

2. Due to budget limitations, Metric Commission Canada has a policy of not buying media advertising time and space. Consequently, there has been no money allocated for paid advertising in Metric Commission Canada's budget since the inception of the commission. On one occasion only, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, office of information and public relations, on behalf of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce did spend approximately $130,000 on March 31, 1975, for newspaper advertising relating to weather conversion.

BOOKLET "FEEDING AND MANAGING LIVESTOCK DURING A FEED SHORTAGE"

2. Will the results be made available to Members of Parliament?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services):

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CROWN CORPORATION

The House resumed from Thursday, April 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet (for the Prime Minister) that Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, be read the third time and do pass, and on the amendment—Mr. Blenkarn (p. 9135).

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, as the debate closed last Thursday evening on Bill C-42, to establish the Canada Post Corporation, I was speaking about two areas of concern to the New Democratic Party in respect to this new Crown corporation. One concern was with regard to small contractors and the fact that this new Crown corporation will deny them the right to become members of a union to negotiate their agreements. That is a matter we discussed quite firmly in committee, and I should like to quote from the remarks of the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet), as reported in the Proceedings and Minutes of the committee for December 18, 1980, as follows:

> The present land mail service contracts that we have are valued at about $90 million. If we were to carry this to the extreme—and I do not want to exaggerate the figure—the possibility of increased expenditures could be doubled or even tripled.

I wonder what the Labour Relations Board would think of a private business which was denying its workers the right to become unionized because it was simply too expensive? I am sure the Labour Relations Board would take a very dim view of that.

The other area of concern we have in respect of this bill relates to telecommunications operations. In the original bill the minister brought before the committee there were provisions for the new Crown corporation to become very actively involved in telecommunications as they relate to postal matters. Members of multinationals came in large numbers—I think they gathered as many as 20 in one group—before the committee and lobbied against the corporation's becoming actively involved in this area. With the help of the Conservative party and some members of the Liberal Party, groups including IT&T, Xerox, Kodak and Bell Canada, as well as our favourites, the insurance companies and the banks, convinced the Postmaster General that these provisions should be excluded and that they should so have the right. On behalf of our party, I am very disappointed that the minister folded under the pressure and that the new bill leaves this field wide open to multinationals from other areas.

I think this is a sad day for Canada and Canadians because this is going to be the way of the future in the post office. In five or ten years we will look back at this bill and say that we as Canadians lost something we should have provided for in the bill, and that we should then have started to gear ourselves up for the future.

• (1510)

For a moment I would like to speak to the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), respecting what is known as a sunset clause. He said there was not time in committee to put it forward. It is correct that a sunset clause which could possibly be looked at five years down the road was never mentioned in committee. The Conservative Party should have spent a little more time with those kinds of programs instead of worrying about courier services, insurance companies and large multinationals. Very little was said about daily postal services in committee, yet they rise in the House and speak about it time after time. We all know that postal services are bad in every riding and that something must be done about the situation. That is what we are trying to do in this bill; we are trying to establish a corporation which will operate under some good management.

I should like to talk about the management of this new Crown corporation. The minister said that the management would be comprised of representatives from labour, management and Canada at large. It will be important for the government to select the very best people it can. I think the government should consult the Canadian Labour Congress and try to obtain some of the very best labour-oriented people to help bring this corporation together in a fair way. I hope the government is able to find a top management person who understands the operations and working atmosphere of the corporation. It will be very, very important for the directors of this board to bring about, in a very aggressive and determined way, a new service and a new program for the Crown corporation.

In closing, we urge the speedy passage of this bill, despite the reservations which I have just outlined. We are convinced that it is in the best interests of Canada to establish this Crown corporation as soon as possible.

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, I want to make some brief comments regarding this bill, particularly an amendment which was made at committee level. It is my understanding that at committee level it was possible to make provision for a reasonable opportunity for appeal by local citizens when there is closure of a postal service. This provision would be with respect to shutdowns, cutbacks or closures. It is a good provision. As the bill is written, a reasonable opportunity for appeal includes the fact that any regulation closing down a postal station, for example, would have to go to cabinet. This is a legislative improvement of the present situation.

Presently when the government moves to close local postal services, the decision does not have to go to cabinet, at least not by way of legislation. While I feel that provision is good in principle, I appeal to the government that the practice and the implementation of that particular clause should be equally as good.

In speaking to that area, I should like to use an ongoing example in my riding. The government announced the closing down of a postal service in the city of Winnipeg, Postal Station D providing full postal service and substituting for it a sub post office in a drugstore. Clearly it will not be possible for people to receive the same service from a very small counter within a portion of a drugstore as they would receive from a full postal station in the neighbourhood.

The principle in this legislation should be put in practice now, before the bill is passed. The residents of Winnipeg who are served by Postal Station D should be given a reasonable opportunity to appeal the decision to close down this postal station. By "a reasonable opportunity", I mean they should have available to them the time in which to make a proper appeal and the information needed.

We have written to the government about this matter. We have moved motions in the House requesting the studies or information upon which this decision was based, but it was to no avail. We have not received any justification from the government for Postal Station D being shut down.

We contend that a reasonable opportunity to appeal such a closure should include providing the studies on which the government has made its decision, so that the community can question the studies and offer alternative information. Then cabinet could look at this service to the community and say, "Let us make a balanced decision in this case; let us have all the facts before us."

One reason offered by way of speculation on this station's being closed is that there is no other building in this very large urban neighbourhood in which to house a postal station. The present lease on the building has run out, and the government claims that it cannot find another building in the area to rent in order to continue that postal service. Clearly this is unsatisfactory. It is a complete misrepresentation of the nature of the neighbourhood. There are adequate buildings in the area. I wish the government would not use such a flimsy excuse for a cutback in services.

I do not have before me the basis upon which the government made the decision to cut back this service. This is why I ask the government to hold off the closing of Postal Station D which is scheduled for April 24 and to provide the information so that the community can conduct a proper appeal.

I could guess at possible reasons why the government might close down a postal station. For example, the government might feel that it would save money by way of staff or the rental of space. But I must say that there are no savings in terms of staff in this particular case. The staff will be transferred out of the local postal station to the central postal station, so the government will still have to pay for staff. The space required for the local postal station and its many activities will be transferred to other locations, so the government will still have to pay for space.

Also I suggest that adequate revenues are generated by the postal service in the neighbourhood to support local services. If I had the financial analysis upon which the government decided to cut back the service, I could make a clear criticism of it, but I would like to make a couple of suggestions about possible revenues. Meter settings have been transferred out of this area. This is a very lucrative source of revenue and could support a local postal station. Lock boxes in the neighbourhood would be a source of revenue to keep the station open. In fact, in the downtown and centralized location in the city there are lock boxes. Their numbers are being increased and there is a three-month waiting period. Yet there is not even the space in the downtown central postal station to accommodate additional lock boxes to meet the local demand. So why not decentralize throughout the neighbourhoods in the city and reap the revenues which there will be by way of providing lock box services rather than simply depriving the postal station of these revenues and depriving the neighbourhoods of any local community service?

● (1520)

As I have said, lock boxes would be a possible source of revenue. I have been informed that a private company has opened up a lock box service in the neighbourhood of Postal Station D. I have a letter before me from the Canadian Union of Postal Workers in Winnipeg which reads in part:

—a private company has opened up a lock box service in the area of Postal Station D—

Is this some sort of continued privatization plan on behalf of the government, turning over public services to the private sector so that the private sector can reap the profit at the expense of the local community? There is clearly a demand here for lock box services. There is a demand for a service which could produce a revenue and for a continuation of neighbourhood services which people find convenient to use.

If I had the study before me upon which the government decided to discontinue this service, I could examine the facts with regard to revenues and expenditures. At this point I am simply forced to speculate on the reasons which were used to justify the closure of this postal station. This action is not in the spirit of the legislation which is before us. The spirit of the legislation before us is much better than that of the present administration of the government. The government should live up to the spirit of the legislation, immediately halt the closure of Postal Station D in Winnipeg and give the residents a clear and reasonable opportunity to appeal the decision to close.

I would like to say that the letters which I have received from the minister's office in response to my letters have not even been signed by the minister, so the minister has not really looked at this situation, and neither has cabinet. The new legislation would require that before a postal station such as this was closed down, cabinet would have to make a decision. It would have to confirm the regulations which would be passed under the legislation.

We are seeing a level of attention from this government which falls far short of what the legislation intends. I would have liked this legislation to pass much earlier than now so that people in my riding would be protected by it. I am informed by my colleagues who have been working on the parliamentary committee that studied this legislation that one of the reasons it has taken so long for this matter to come before the House is that Conservative members carried on a systematic campaign of delay at the committee stage. They raised all sorts of questions to put off the day when the legislation was to come before the House. So in large part the Tory members have been responsible for the fact that the postal station in my riding has not been protected by this legislation.

I am left to appeal to this government, obviously a government which today is demonstrating its insensitivity, to live up to the spirit of the legislation which is before the House.

Mr. Shields: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member who has the floor indicated that the Conservative Party, my party, was holding up the legislation. I would like to inform him that I have taken my name off the list of speakers and he has spoken for 30 minutes. Who is delaying whom?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In fairness to everyone concerned, that is not a point of order.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, as you have just said, that clearly was not a point of order. I remember that when the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) moved the amendment which is before this House, he indicated that a great deal of time was spent on this legislation, but perhaps not as much as should have been spent on it. He acknowledged that the Tories, through their gabfest at the committee level, had been delaying the return of this legislation to the House. I will not waste any more of my time—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Keeper: —with regard to the tactics of the Tories, who have deprived my community of protection under this legislation.

What I require now is a decision on the government's behalf to act in the spirit of the legislation which will be passed by this House and allow a reasonable opportunity for appeal by the community of the planned closure of the postal station. While I feel that the provision in the legislation with regard to proper appeal and with regard to the fact that cabinet must make the final decision on cutbacks in services are good provisions, I must ask the government to call a halt immediately to the planned closure on April 24 of Postal Station D and give a reasonable opportunity to the citizens to appeal that decision.

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to Bill C-42, which is an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts.

I could not help but be upset by the remarks of the previous speaker. I think all of us in this House recognize the valuable work done by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) who has worked so hard to create a postal Crown corporation. He had a commitment from the former prime minister, the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), to bring in a bill to convert the Post Office into a Crown corporation by the spring of 1980. For the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper) to suggest that we are holding up this legislation is ridiculous, to say the least.

This bill was introduced last October for second reading. It was discussed in the House on October 24 and October 28. It was then delayed by this government until November 20. It is not the opposition which decides what legislation can be presented to the House and when it can be presented. That is the government's responsibility; no one else in this House has delayed this legislation. It is the obligation of the opposition to debate, probe and amend any proposed legislation which comes before the House. For a member of the New Democratic Party to stand up and say that we are delaying legislation is anything but the truth.

Bill C-42 went to committee on November 25. We debated the proposed bill in committee on that date and on the following dates: November 27, December 1, 4, 9, 10, 11, 15, 16, 17 and 18. It is a very complicated bill. Everyone recognizes the benefits which will accrue to the public by converting the Post Office into a Crown corporation. Surely anyone who attended the committee meetings understood the complexity of the bill.

The bill was brought back to the House on April 8. We have an hon. member in the NDP saying that we delayed it. There is only one hon. member in this House who can bring any legislation before this House, and that is the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). The only person who tells him when to bring it before this House is the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). If there is anyone delaying legislation, it is the Liberal party, no one else.

For many weeks we have been asking for legislation to be brought forward, to get on with matters and suspend the constitutional debate. We knew there were important matters besides the Post Office, the economy and inflation, but the government refused to bring measures forward. Third reading began on April 9, and continues today, April 14. We also are anxious to have this bill go through, but we are not going to give this government a blank cheque.

There were provisions in the bill which were harmful to the public, and we have attempted to change some of them. Unfortunately, the government, with its majority and with the support of the NDP, was able to override our amendments.

The Post Office affects all of us. There is not one person here who is not affected by the post office every day in his life. Senior citizens are constantly sending us letters saying: "I do not get my letters on time. When am I going to get my mail? What are you going to do about the fact that I do not get postal delivery to my door?"

People are moving from Ontario to Calgary, buying a home, moving in, and finding out that they will not get any mail delivery for anywhere from two to five years. They are not being told that by the Post Office or by the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet). Then when they take the time to go down to the local post office to try to find out why, they are finally told, "We're sorry, there is a freeze on; we cannot help you". However, the Post Office does not provide any information telling people, they cannot have postal service. They keep quiet about that.

Numerous studies have been brought forward on the Post Office. I would like to refer to just a few of them. The first recommendations in this regard were made in 1962 by the Glassco commission and by the Montpetit commission. In December, 1978, Bill C-27 was introduced. It died on the Order Paper. In 1974 the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) was preparing to bring forth a bill to make the Post Office into a Crown corporation.

When one looks back at the history of the Post Office, one is astounded by some of the things which have happened. Between 1918 and 1965 there were three strikes in the Post Office. The people of Canada were without mail for seven weeks. Between 1968 and 1978 there were 11 Post Office strikes in Canada. However, that is not the worst part. A strike is one thing, but would one believe that as a result of the 11 strikes the people of Canada were without mail service for 51 weeks? In the last 13 years we have been without mail service for one full year. Then the government had the gall, supported by the NDP, to suggest we are holding this bill up. They should hang their heads in shame. We want to examine this bill to make sure that it is a viable bill and that the people can live with it. It is ridiculous to suggest that we are holding up passage of this bill.

There is some sad history relating to this bill. In 1967-68 the average cost of a piece of mail, regardless of size, was eight cents. The cost has now risen to 27 cents for the average piece of mail. In 1968-69 the Post Office lost $67 million. Last year it lost $279 million. It now looks as though it will lose $450 million.

It is interesting to look at some of the figures. In 1968 there were 36,000 workers in the post office; there are now over 60,000, an increase of 64 per cent. However, in 1968 each worker handled 132,000 items a year; now, according to the latest figures, they handle 106,000. There must be something the matter with the way in which the Post Office is operating. We know there are problems between the unions and the workers.

In speaking to Post Office officials from time to time, I have referred to some of the ridiculous expenditures by the Post Office. In the post office in Calgary and, I assume, in many of the other supposedly modern ones, there is an optical character reader. I am not sure what it costs now, but to upgrade it will cost something over a million dollars. I have written to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) asking him when this would happen. The Post Office management are crying out for these OCRs. The optical character reader has an efficiency ratio of 78 per cent and it replaces approximately 20 people. It operates at 50 per cent of capacity. Twenty people replace the optical character reader instead of 40. In other words, they need 20 more people in the Post Office than really necessary. What do those 20 people represent? It is almost ridiculous to go through the mathematics. Twenty people at $20,000 a year is $400,000. In a little over two years they could pay for the OCR. However, the Post Office supposedly imposed a freeze. The real problem is that it does not know how to make decisions. It cannot get any leadership from the Postmaster General; he would rather sit back and wait until somebody else moves in and tries to solve the problem.

We are aware that there are problems in the Post Office between the unions and the workers. The NDP does not like anyone to say that. It is quite evident that there are problems. There are also problems between the unions and management. One union leader has said, "I don't care if the Post Office ever works; I am not here for the Post Office". All one has to do is to ask, and he will say why he does not care.

There are problems with management and staff because the union sits between them and they do not know what to do. There is trouble between the two unions and between the inside and outside workers. Although there are a number of problems, it is hoped that by making the Post Office a Crown corporation some of them will be solved.

I should now like to refer to my own riding. The conditions there are a disgrace. There are approximately 4,000 homes without any type of mail delivery. I have tried to explain to the Postmaster General, the deputy postmaster general and the regional postmasters that this involves unbelievable cost. Some of these people have to drive up to five miles a day to collect their mail. As I explained to them, the cost for gas alone is over $200,000 per year. They keep saying that they cannot afford to do anything about it, but it is costing some people $200,000 per year. If the figures that I get from the Post Office are correct, the average postman can handle up to 500 homes. Therefore, it would require eight postal officers, eight postal workers, to handle the 4,000 homes in my riding that are without service. At a cost of $30,000 each worker, the total would come to less than a quarter of a million dollars.

This government does not know how to save money, Mr. Speaker; it only knows how to spend it. We should question everything that it brings forward to this House. We might agree with its legislation, but we are bound to examine it because we do not know what the government will try to slide through.

From time to time in this House I have risen to ask the minister some questions. On June 5, 1980, I put a question to him; on May 16, 1980, I moved a motion under Standing Order 43 and on June 26, 1980, I spoke on the adjournment debate. The questions that I brought up at those times have never been answered by the Postmaster General. He says, "Wait until it becomes a Crown corporation and we will solve all those problems".

About a month and a half ago, in reply to a question put by one of my colleagues, the minister said that for each letter that might be delivered late, 90 or 92 arrived on time. Being fairly well acquainted with the Post Office, I decided to check that out. I called the Ottawa postal station and was told that it takes two or three days for a letter to go from Ottawa to Calgary. We did an analysis and found that of 102 letters sent to Calgary from my office in February, six were delivered within four days; 25 within five days; 43 within six days; 12 within seven days; eight within eight days; six within 11 days; one within 12 days; one within 13 days and none on time. I would challenge the Postmaster General to prove that 90 or 92 letters out of 93 reach their destination on time. The minister made that statement off the top of his head.

In my constituency office the greatest problem I have by far is the non-delivery of mail. Pay is not received on time by union staff. They even have trouble with their unions and cannot get satisfaction there. There are problems between the union and the staff over pay. Many inside postal workers do not receive their pay sometimes for up to six weeks. What does the Postmaster General do about that? It is no wonder that we want to examine this bill. If we did not examine it, our constituents would be asking us why we can trust whatever the government brings forward. Obviously this government brings forward things which the public cannot abide.

I am as anxious to have the Post Office made into a Crown corporation as anyone else, but I think we must remember one very important point. This Crown corporation must be responsible to Parliament. The Post Office is in a mess but it did not get that way by itself; it got there because of inept ministers, past and present. I hope that the Postmaster General will keep in mind that one of the main ways to prevent the same thing from happening again is to have the Auditor General audit the books of the Post Office. If we do not ensure that happens, we will be remiss in our duties.

I am as anxious to see the work of the hon. member for Vancouver South completed as anyone. We hope to get the bill through, but I must tell the Postmaster General that of all

Crown corporations present and future, we will be keeping a closer eye on the new post corporation than on any other.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): I shall keep my remarks brief, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to speak today on Bill C-42 because I sincerely hope that we will see an improvement in the service offered by the Post Office. I also want to say that the former postmaster general has worked hard on this bill for this party in committee. I am pleased to be able to say that some of the amendments we offered have been accepted, and that was in no small part the result of his work.

I should like to share with the House my concern for the apparent lack of provision for the maintenance of the buildings. No such amount is shown in the budget. The buildings are presently maintained by the Department of Public Works. I should like to ask the minister whether this matter has been taken into consideration.

I should like to refer to a few complaints that have been received in my office since I have been a member of this House. Just last month 1,500 letters were sent by first-class mail from Ottawa and were delivered two weeks later. It took two weeks for those letters to be delivered, Mr. Speaker. The letters were of a very sensitive nature because they were sent during the provincial election held in the month of March.

On January 26 I received a letter from a constituent in Fonthill, an Eleanor Arbour, from which I should like to quote one paragraph:

> This is not the only problem we have had. I also received a letter from Buffalo that was mailed December 22, 1980. It arrived January 13, 1981. This contained tickets that we needed for New Year's Eve. The strange part about this is that friends of ours got tickets from the same place mailed also on December 22, 1980 and they received theirs on December 31, 1980.

It took this letter 22 days to travel 35 miles at the most, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to read a paragraph or two from a letter from another constituent, Mr. Kenneth Arnold of Port Colborne. He refers to a card that was mailed in Texas on December 29, 1980, and a letter mailed by his daughter in Texas on January 6, 1981. Both were received on January 12, 1981. The one mailed on December 22 took 21 days to come from Texas. In that time we could drive down there and back and spend a week or ten days, perhaps longer, vacationing.

• (1550)

Another paragraph reads:

> Could you please do something about our so-called postal service. I read in the newspaper the supervisor of the postal service said this was due to absenteeism, they even had to close some post offices due to this. If businesses or industry operated this way, they would soon be out of business.

That is just one constituent of mine who has written regarding his concern.

I have another letter from Hilda Pearce of the town of Fort Erie. A paragraph in her letter reads:

> In reference to mail delivery: air mailed in Gloucestershire, England, December 10, 1980, arriving yesterday January 12, 1981, this was the last straw.

That is an example of a letter mailed one month previous to the time of arrival in the town of Fort Erie. I hope that delivery service will improve with the passing of this legislation making the Post Office a Crown corporation.

I want to draw hon. members' attention to an organization which is active in my riding. It is called N-TEC, which stands for Niagara Training and Employment Agency Inc. N-TEC is located in Port Robinson, Ontario. The agency is a non-profit, vocational, rehabilitation workshop providing programs and services for the emotionally, mentally and physically disabled adults of the Niagara region. Currently, approximately 75 people are employed in their program. One of the vocational training programs they operate involves the delivery of bills for a number of public and private utility corporations in the Niagara region. I have visited this institution. I must say I am impressed with the facilities they have and with the staff who work with these people. This is a place where retarded and disabled people can find meaningful employment. They gain self-respect, create a self-image and learn resourcefulness. As a result they feel needed and wanted. N-TEC is heavily dependent on the revenues generated by the mail delivery program.

It seems that this program will be lost. N-TEC will be extremely hard pressed to meet all its obligations and will certainly suffer financial hardship as a result. In the light of the current economic climate, they doubt whether they could secure other contracts to recover the possible loss of mail delivery contracts which they have had. Indeed, it will be a severe blow to N-TEC.

Aside from the monetary issues, of course, the more critical issue is that of people, to which I alluded just a minute ago. People with disabilities have faced disadvantages throughout their lives. N-TEC's purpose is to try to even the score and provide opportunity where it did not exist. N-TEC gives people a chance to produce and therefore contribute to their own well-being as well as to society. The people at N-TEC do contribute. They take a great deal of pride in themselves and for the reliable and dependable service for which that organization is known. It is true there are jobs which disabled people cannot perform, but then there are many more jobs they can. Invoice delivery happens to be one of them, with the added bonus that these people can learn to work in their own community with their heads held high by the recognition they have earned.

Restoring self-dignity is the first step forward. That can only take place if meaningful work exists for these people. In this International Year of the Handicapped, should we not be thinking of ways to assist, not hinder, our disabled people? In the total scheme of things N-TEC's invoice delivery contracts are only a drop in what we might call the proverbial bucket. Whom are we hurting if we continue what has begun? They are not asking for a handout, a loan, a grant or even a parliamentary decree; in fact, they ask for nothing. The disabled ask for nothing but the right to be ordinary people.

What we need in this House, and what needs to be displayed by this government, is justice, justice tempered with mercy. I want to put on the record excerpts from two letters which I feel are important and pertinent to the subject about which I am speaking. One is from the Port Colborne Hydro-Electric Commission, dated December 11, 1980. This letter was addressed to the Department of Miscellaneous Estimates. In part, it reads:

A limited number of handicapped organizations have undertaken the delivery service of certain bills in the municipalities. This service, often by young mentally retarded people, relies heavily upon the income from the service to sustain their operation and even greater upon such a service to allow these less fortunate people a chance to take a meaningful part in their community.

I hasten to add, my request is not prompted by monetary gains, but by the need to allow such organizations the right to provide work so that those less fortunate can fulfil this meaningful role.

I am, of course, in complete sympathy with the minister and postmaster's attempt to make the post office an equitable entity.

I, however, feel that the limited loss of revenue cannot be weighed against the accomplishment of providing work for the handicapped and mentally retarded.

I have another letter from the Port Colborne Hydro-Electric Commission signed by Mr. Bishop, dated February 19, 1981. A news release accompanies the copy of the letter to me. In the news release we read:

To date, the Hydro utility have received nothing but negative response from the Honourable Minister André Ouellet, Postmaster General in the bid to have the bill changed to protect the handicapped people.

At the committee stage, the minister's remarks, although sympathetic, were more concerned with the financial implications that these changes may have on the post office.

The letter which was addressed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada reads, in part:

Surely the loss of revenue to the post office that this small band of willing, handicapped workers would cause would be a "drop in the bucket" when compared to the total revenue of the post office department.

I could plead, Mr. Prime Minister, further that this is the International Year of the Handicapped. But should we have to plead for these willing workers who are limited in the type of work they are able to accomplish, who in effect ask for nothing but the right to work? I suggest not. This is and should be their charter of human rights and should be protected by the duly elected government of this country.

In conclusion, on behalf of the Port Colborne Hydro-Electric Commission, I respectfully solicit, Mr. Prime Minister, your personal intervention and assistance in making minor changes to Bill C-42 to accommodate the handicapped people who are at present engaged in the small delivery service.

It seems ironic that we have been dealing with the Constitution in this House. We have been talking about a charter of rights and the rights people should have, yet here is a group of people who will be legislated against because they will not be able to deliver these bills for the power company. I say it is a shame.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fretz: In conclusion, I want to tell hon. members a story about someone who lived in my riding. He had a dream. He saw the potential in these people who are handicapped and about whom I have been speaking. He believed in them. He had a dream that one day there would be a place for these people to gather and to work. That dream has come to fruition. I have visited that place; I know it stands there. It stands as a memorial to the work this man has done.

• (1600)

It is a sad day for this House that Bill C-42 will not allow these people to carry on this kind of work. I visited the dream he had. I visited that place and talked with those on staff. It is indeed a fine place to visit. It is a fine memorial to the man who had that dream. He passed away about a year ago, I think, because he burned himself out for others. His name was John Brennan.

An hon. Member: Where are the NDP when you need them?

Mr. Fretz: Where are they? When we look at this particular provision in the bill, we can say with conviction that the government is heartless. It is heartless when it makes no provision to allow these people to deliver hand bills and power bills.

May I present this challenge to N-TEC and other organizations like it throughout the country which may still be delivering electric, power or gas bills for utility companies. Perhaps N-TEC should continue to deliver these bills or invoices because they are not letters. Perhaps, as the hon. member for Mississagua South indicated, that is not mail. Perhaps whether these invoices are mail in the strict sense of the word should be challenged in the courts.

I thank the House for the privilege of being able to speak for these few minutes on an issue near and dear to my heart.

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I too will be brief. The space shuttle astronauts had to make their decisions in split seconds during their magnificent re-entry and landing today. Therefore, ten minutes should be sufficient to get my point across. I have my stop watch set.

I welcome the opportunity to speak briefly before this House on a very important piece of legislation, Bill C-42, which seeks to create the Canada Post Corporation. I want to assure this House at the outset that I support and welcome a Crown corporation for the Post Office.

As member of Parliament for Hamilton-Wentworth, I have had the opportunity many times to present the Postmaster General with numerous cases of very poor postal service to many of my constituents. In some cases I have been satisfied that the Postmaster General's answers were fair and well researched. I hope the Postmaster General is listening at the moment because I am going to pay a rare compliment to him. I give the Postmaster General credit for his attention, patience and his negotiation to get a truly better bill for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Now for the bad news. I have to admit that in the majority of cases when I have contacted the Postmaster General, frankly I have not been satisfied with the answers he has given me, either in this House of Commons or through correspondence. Nor have I been satisfied with the Postmaster General's role in this House.

The hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) and I have known each other for a long time. We have a good working relationship when he wears his other hat as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. However, that is the problem: he wears too darned many hats.

I believe the Postmaster General is being spread far too thin for his various duties to be effective. In addition to his onerous role as head of the Post Office, perhaps one of the most difficult and thankless jobs, he is also splitting his time as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In addition to these weighty responsibilities, the minister has a heavy schedule as Quebec lieutenant of his party. The clearest indication that the minister is spread too thin is easily documented by the often uninformed answers he provides the House of Commons, even after I have briefed him from time to time on questions I would like to ask him as consumer affairs minister. However, I feel he has a handle on that department through his officials.

I hope once the new Canada Post Corporation is born that a different minister will be assigned to speak for that Crown corporation in the House. It will give the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs more time to spend, which I think he knows he needs to spend, on the very important area of consumer and corporate affairs.

May I deal briefly with another problem within the Post Office other than that of the minister, namely, the deplorable state of management-labour relations. We constantly hear of ongoing chaos and confusion through the media, through our work in the House and through our constituents. I cannot think of another institution or private company in Canada which enjoys or suffers worse relations.

This would seem to strike at the heart of our problem in our current postal system. There is precious little, if any, trust from either labour's or management's point of view. As long as this situation is allowed to continue, the Post Office, either as a government department or a Crown corporation, will not function effectively.

However, the problem is not primarily labour-oriented. A number of my constituents are Post Office employees. They are dedicated, do their jobs well and are proud of the valuable work they do in the time-honoured tradition of Canada's royal mail. They are frustrated, however, by the attitude of management. They are frustrated by the introduction of machinery, which has been done haphazardly without regard for those working on it. They are frustrated with a system of management where it takes two to three months to receive overtime pay. They are frustrated by a system of management which has refused to take employees' grievances seriously.

Just as management will take an intransigent attitude, so will employees. I firmly believe that if we transfer the same management personnel currently in the Post Office to the Crown corporation, just as if we automatically transfer the trouble-makers in certain sections of the Post Office to a Crown corporation, we will simply be transferring the problem, not eliminating it. We must be able to get the Post Office as a Crown corporation organized so that we can finally move the mail quickly, effectively and efficiently. We cannot sit back and hope that this is all going to happen; we are going to have to work at it.

People ask what good it is going to do by turning the Post Office into a Crown corporation. Good question. There are good Crown corporations and there are bad ones. We on this side of the House are going to ensure that the Canada Post Corporation will be a good one. We will be watching it very closely.

Aside from the management-labour concerns, the Canadian people in general, and certainly the citizens in my riding of Hamilton-Wentworth, are concerned with the length of time it takes to get the mail delivered. We have heard a litany of disasters throughout this debate from members on all sides of this House regarding these problems.

The Postmaster General states that 95 per cent of the mail is being delivered on time. To put it mildly, my people think this estimate perhaps a wee bit high. I receive on average two letters per week complaining about the postal system and many more phone calls. I guess a lot of people simply do not trust the mail. Let me describe just three of the most recent letter complaints I have received. A letter from the Canadian Pension Commission here in Ottawa was mailed on February 2, 1981, to a constituent of mine in Hamilton. It was delivered on February 19, 1981. I find it very hard to understand why it took a first-class letter complete with postal code 17 days to get from Ottawa to Hamilton.

Another case in point is from Mrs. Howell of Jerseyville, Ontario. A reply to a request of Mrs. Howell's was mailed in Toronto on December 17, 1980 and delivered on January 14, 1981. Jerseyville is roughly 45 miles from Toronto. It would have been quicker to hand deliver it. I could have delivered it.

Mrs. Goodram of Ancaster, Ontario, had a very important letter to send to her son in Calgary. She decided to register it, thinking it would get to its destination in good order and plenty of time. She mailed it on December 22, 1980. The registered letter finally reached Calgary on January 21, 1981. You can talk about the Christmas mail rush and all the delays that entails; however, for a registered letter to take that length of time to travel half way across Canada is unforgivable.

I will not go into the countless letters complaining that it took 25 days for mail to arrive from Britain or into the delays in getting mail to Dundas, Ontario, from Ancaster, Ontario—both in my riding—a distance of less than five miles. I do not even want to go into the case of the letter which went from Ancaster to Dundas via London, England. The current record, apparently, from Ancaster to Dundas is nine days. Nine days! That is the record for the Post Office. Do hon. members see why we want a Crown corporation? The service can only improve.

We all know the frustration of dealing with parcel post. If we receive a parcel within a few weeks, the odds are even that it will be damaged. I recently received eight packages from various provincial capitals across Canada. They were provincial flags which we were to instal at 447 Squadron at Mount Hope. Half the package had been repaired by Canada Post. The parcel-sorting machines simply chewed those packages up and spit them out. Mercifully, the flags arrived intact.

Two constituents of mine, Mike and Wendy Gould, went out to visit western Canada. While in Nelson, British Columbia, they purchased some unique stoneware pottery. Unable to bring it home through the airline, they decided—with much trepidation, I might add—to put their faith in Canada Post. Well, you guessed it; even though they packed it very carefully—they absolutely plastered it with "Fragile" stickers—and registered it, the thing was delivered smashed to pieces. The district post office said, "Sorry, we can't be responsible for damage incurred," even though it was properly packaged, properly marked and properly insured. Hon. members may ask, as I did, why on earth they would entrust their valued pottery to the Post Office. They wanted to use the Post Office, not some private courier, because day after day we are told to have faith in and use our postal service.

What happens when you have a small business and must rely on the parcel post system for movement of goods? Let us consider the case of Mr. Paul Orosz of Hamilton, Ontario, who has a small car radio business. He occasionally must return units to the manufacturer. Last summer, after successfully using the mails before, he mailed on three separate occasions from two different postal stations three properly wrapped, marked and insured parcels for return to the manufacturer. All three packages where smashed when they reached their destination. Mr. Orosz was presented with a bill of $377 for repairing those radios. We found out later that the parcels were insured for theft only, not damage. Mr. Orosz used the mail because, like many other small businesses, he could not afford courier or freight rates. But he will use these in the future. What is the cost to Canada Post and the new Crown corporation if many more people like the Goulds or Mr. Orosz decide not to use the postal system again?

We are having a difficult time getting proper mail delivery in some sections of my riding. These are rural areas which have been served by the same post office for many years now. An elderly couple ran one post office but they have declined to continue. The officials in that area have not been able to find anyone to carry out the job, so they are attempting to get some other type of service, such as box service or door to door delivery. This is also happening in one special community in my riding, West Flamborough. It is an area with a great number of elderly Canadians. Service must be accessible in the winter months or in just plain poor weather. A decision has not yet been reached. The minister has assured me, however, that action will be taken—or that at least this can be more fairly, efficiently and properly dealt with—when Bill C-42 is given final assent.

Although I feel there may be an axe being held over my head, the people in my riding deserve a postal system which is efficient, reasonable and improved over the present one, and so we are waiting for the birth of the Canada Post Corporation.

In connection with this legislation, I am returning it to the sender; but I will be supporting this bill to make the Post Office a Crown corporation.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, it is a considerable pleasure for me to rise to indicate the support of my party for the legislation which is before the House. As all hon. members know, as postmaster general I was committed, on behalf of my party, to introduce this legislation as early as the late spring of 1980. I want it shown on the record that that was accepted by the prime minister at that time, and I have to say to those who have spoken of delay that the delay is not due to any acts of the government of the leader of my party.

I also have to say, because it is appropriate to do so, that while I was occupying the post of postmaster general I received very considerable co-operation from all of the unions which represent the workers in the Post Office, and I also received co-operation from the managerial part of the Post Office. At my request I received very considerable co-operation from the Canadian Labour Congress, which agreed to oversee a committee which would work toward the implementation of a bill which, as far as possible, would meet the needs of management and the postal workers. I know my friend, the present Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet), received continuing co-operation from that Canadian Labour Congress committee.

The whole thrust of the bill I was working on and the thrust of this bill is to give a new chance to the Post Office and the Post Office family. I believe the bill recognizes in a very significant way the necessity to continue this great public service for all Canadians, not just a limited number of them. While the bill presented to the House is no doubt not without some defects, it goes a long way toward meeting the needs not only of the Post Office but also of the Canadian public, which is entitled to service from the Post Office.

I regret that I have to bring to the attention of hon. members a letter which was written by a friend of mine in the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), but I am going to mention it. I hope my friend, the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker), who has worked as the NDP critic on matters relating to the Post Office, will not take anything I say as being aimed at him because I assure the hon. member that these remarks are made only with respect to this letter; I impute nothing to my hon. friend, who has worked extremely closely with me and has contributed very greatly to the improvement of this bill.

Again I say I regret having to bring this to the attention of hon. members, but on March 24, 1981, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway wrote a letter to a gentleman in Vancouver in which he said this:

> Unfortunately, we have been unable to get all-party agreement for this very important piece of legislation.

He was referring to Bill C-42.

The Conservative Party has decided to stall the changes, mainly because the new Crown corporation is likely to hurt some of their corporate friends in the courier business. Although the bill was ready to be implemented as early as last fall—

The fall of 1980.

—the Tories have succeeded in keeping it off the floor of the House of Commons for almost six months.

I understand the cut and thrust of politics, but I do not understand a written statement which does not contain a grain of truth. I regret this very much because the hon. member is well and very favourably known to me. I suspect he did not even write the letter, but it is certainly clear that he signed it. I hope hon. members will bear with me for just a minute while I put the record straight.

● (1620)

First of all, the bill was introduced in July, 1980. While there were some discussions between myself and the Postmaster General to try to put it through in speedy fashion, that was made impossible because of action the New Democratic Party was taking in the House of Commons, action which was perfectly legitimate but which did extend the sittings of the House for another week and made it impossible to get any agreement for a further extension to deal with the bill.

Secondly, the bill was brought before the House of Commons for second reading on October 24. It was debated on that day, on October 28 and then on November 20. As hon. members have pointed out already during this debate, the determination as to when debates take place and when bills are introduced lies completely with the government.

The bill then came before the committee and was before the committee on December 1, 4, 9, 10, 11, 16 and December 18. During those days, because of the hard work of members of the committee from all parties and also to a very great degree the flexibility of the Postmaster General, there were at least 50 changes made in the bill, and hon. members can check the record on that. There may have been a somewhat smaller number of amendments, but they were the result of the deliberations at the committee hearings.

In addition, and just in case anyone thinks we were wasting our time, this is a list of the groups which came before the committee to give us their views about the bill, many of which helped improve it. The list includes the Canadian Telecommunications Carriers Association, the Canadian Bankers' Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Business Press, the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association, the Canadian Periodical Publishers Association, the Graphic Arts Industries Association, the Consumers Association of Canada, representatives of Canadian courier companies, the government of Ontario, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Chief Electoral Officer, the Retail Council of Canada, the Institute of Canadian Advertising, the Canadian Labour Congress, Bruce Light and Judge René J. Marin, commissioner of inquiry relating to the security and investigation of services branch within the Post Office Department.

Other groups that submitted briefs which were looked at by the committee include Action Bell Canada, the Canadian Business Equipment Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Direct Mail Marketing Association, the Canadian Industrial Communications Assembly, the Magazine Association of Canada, the Ontario Trucking Association, General Motors of Canada Limited, V.S. Services Limited, the Canadian Cable Television Association, Peter R. Kemball & Associates and the United Parcel Service Canada Limited.

I do not think I need gild the lily here, except to point out that all these groups which came before us have a very real interest in the Post Office and in the legislation which is before us. It does some credit to the members of the committee—and I give credit where credit is due to members of the committee on all sides, to the Postmaster General and my friend, the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke, and also colleagues of mine—that in a space of seven days all those witnesses were heard. Because they worked long hours, the bill came out of the committee in a form to be presented to the House of Commons very late on the night of December 18. The bill was released from committee that night because there was a very real sense on my part and on the part of others that, in view of the labour negotiations which were taking place at the time, all haste should be used within the bounds of common sense to get the bill through. As a consequence the bill was then released from committee and brought back to the House for report stage and third reading. It was not introduced to the House at the report stage until April 7. The blame for that, if one wants to lay blame, can only lie with the government. It certainly was not my party that was trying to hold up the bill.

I am sorry to dwell on this, Mr. Speaker, but I feel the accusation made in the letter of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway is so false the public is entitled to have an answer to it.

When the bill came before the House there were 11 motions at report stage, and they were dealt with expeditiously. It is interesting to note that three of the motions put forward by my party were accepted by the Postmaster General, and one was ruled out of order. Three of the government motions were accepted while four of the motions put forward by my party were rejected. One of those motions was supported by my colleagues in the NDP. That was the very important amendment, which we wish had been accepted by the government, relating to the necessity to appoint the Auditor General as auditor for the Crown corporation. Hon. members will remember that the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke spoke very strongly in support of that proposal and NDP members voted with us.

In respect of the rest of the debate, it has gone on for several days and I am happy to advise the House that it is going to end this afternoon.

I just want to say a couple of things. First of all, as my friend the hon. Postmaster General knows, just creating the Crown corporation is not in itself the whole answer to the problems of the Post Office. It is a start and it has to be given a chance. I hope the government, after this bill is passed with our support, will be extremely careful in the appointment of the board of directors. The Postmaster General knows that the number on the board of directors was expanded at our suggestion, with his consent and compliance.

It is also important that there be some continuation of management personnel. Having had some experience in that respect, I can assure all hon. members it will be extremely important to maintain continuity of management during the transition stage, at least until the Post Office is actually operating in full swing as a Crown corporation.

The other thing I want to say, and I will close on this, Mr. Speaker, is that there are many people who, because they are frustrated and as a consequence are criticial of the Post Office, perhaps unintentionally though sometimes intentionally, tend to leave the impression that we should just break it up and disband it because surely somebody else could perform the service. I want to address that matter by referring to only a few points.

The Post Office is a great Canadian public institution. There is no way the service which Canadians all over this great land require can be handled by just taking parts of the post office operation and turning them over to private corporations. I am convinced that if that were done the easy traffic would be handled at great profit but the difficult and costly traffic would not be handled at all. If the Post Office is to succeed, it must be able to compete for the profitable traffic to make up for the fact that it is called upon as a public institution to deal with traffic which is not profitable, but which is traffic which most Canadians insist on, with every right to do so.

I want to say to all colleagues that this party supports the bill. We think it represents a new beginning. Of course, we will be watching very carefully how the Post Office conducts its business affairs. I must say on behalf of my party we wish management and the employees of the Post Office well. We understand perfectly the immensity of the task which lies before them. My experience in dealing with the leaders of the unions in the Post Office has convinced me that the rank and file of Canada Post are as anxious to reform the Post Office and deliver the kind of service they expect Canadians to have as anyone else.

It is my very great privilege and pleasure to wish everyone in the Post Office well, with a sincere desire that the postal service of Canada improve and continue improving as the months and years go on.

Amendment (Mr. Blenkarn) negatived, on division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Therefore, the question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-50, an act to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal the Irish Free State Trade Agreement Act, 1932, the Union of South Africa Trade Agreement Act, 1932 and the United Kingdom Trade Agreement Act, 1937, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton) (for Mr. Lambert) moved:

That Bill C-50, an act to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal the Irish Free State Trade Agreement Act, 1932, the Union of South Africa Trade Agreement Act, 1932 and the United Kingdom Trade Agreement Act, 1937, be amended in Schedule VI at page 323 in the proposed tariff item 47810-1 by striking out the words "other than dental surgery".

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, it is not that a Conservative member needs me to speak in his defence, but we understood all along that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) wished to speak to his amendment.

Mr. Kempling: He is on his way.

Mr. Knowles: In all fairness it would not hurt us to sit in silence for two or three minutes, since he has been sent for and is on his way here.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we moved so expeditiously with the Post Office bill that I think we are one jump ahead of the bus service from the West Block. I have been advised that the hon. member is on his way. If that suggestion is agreeable to the House, I think we could expedite the business and that bill.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in light of the wind which is presently blowing, it was difficult to get here from the West Block, even in my spare form!

Miss Bégin: What about Participaction?

Mr. Lambert: The minister should not speak of Participaction in that particular wind!

● (1640)

The point I want to discuss this afternoon, and the subject of my amendment, is a rather narrow one. It deals with an amendment to tariff item 47810-1. The facts of the matter are these, Mr. Speaker. Prior to November 9, 1979, the Department of National Revenue collected duties on dental materials because it considered that the words "surgery" and "surgical prosthesis" in tariff item 47810-1 did not include dental surgery or dental surgical prosthesis. However, under appeal No. 1377 the Tariff Board ruled that the term "surgery" did include dental surgery and that "other surgical prosthesis" included dental prosthesis. The Tariff Board found that the customs administration had been in error for many years.

One might ask what happens to all that revenue which was apparently improperly collected. Has any of it been refunded? Is this merely one of those cases where the taxpayer has been told "tough luck"? In any event, that is not the subject matter of our discussion this afternoon.

The Tariff Board's ruling meant that no duties were payable in accordance with the law as it was written. However, the one firm in Canada engaged in a minor way in the manufacture of dental materials, that is Johnson and Johnson (Canada), wrote to the Department of Finance to have the duties introduced on amalgams and other dental materials at the levels which Customs had been collecting in error. While the dental laboratories conference did complain about the fact that duties would be removed from finished prosthesis, they did not ask that duties be imposed on dental materials. Indeed, when the conference determined that removal of duty-free treatment for dental prosthesis would mean the consequent elimination under tariff item 47900-1 of duty-free treatment for dental materials, they withdrew their request. The officials in the Department of Finance indicated, quite rightly, that the main petitioners for the restoration of the duty which had originally been collected in error were Johnson and Johnson. That is all this budget does, notwithstanding the fact that the Canadian Dental Association, on behalf of all Canadian dentists, is opposed to this particular proposal.

I have before me correspondence addressed to the minister from the president of the Canadian Dental Association, as well as to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) which gives some more background. The Canadian Dental Association was not consulted before changes to tariff item 47810-1 were proposed in the budget.

That is one point about which I believe the officials in finance are more than arrogant. I know that in the United States, for instance, industry, associations and all aspects of the economy have the opportunity to be consulted before a budget is actually taken up and passed. In England I know that associations, such as dental associations and other trade and manufacturing associations, are consulted before changes are made in legislation affecting the amount of duty and tariffs. And why not? Is this question of taxation a cat and mouse affair that the Minister of Finance springs like a hungry cat on some unsuspecting mice or other targets at the time of the budget so that he can wring from those particular bodies or individuals the maximum tax?

I would like to receive an answer from the minister as to why there was not consultation with the Canadian Dental Association and why the Department of Finance has chosen to plug the so-called loophole. It was a bad practice. It does not bring in any revenue. It does not do a darned thing. There are no dental supplies manufactured in Canada other than the limited amalgams put on the market by Johnson and Johnson, which I think back in 1974 bought a process which had been developed at the University of Alberta in Edmonton. The amalgams are manufactured here in limited amounts. They are manufactured much more in the United States, brought into Canada in bulk and sold here. There are no other dental materials made in Canada, with the exception of some prosthesis; but that is not the point. There was no objection expressed by the conference on that question and no action taken by the government in the budget.

All I am saying is that these materials used in dental surgery shall not be subject to the Customs Tariff as provided for under tariff item 47810-1. It seems to me that all along there has been the strongest possible case—I will admit it is on a very narrow item—for the government to leave the matter alone. The government is not going to encourage the production of these amalgams or other materials in Canada. There is not the market for these products in Canada. One could almost apply a 25 per cent tariff against American products and they would still be purchased by Canadian supply houses and sold to Canadian dentists at a price lower than the manufacturing price, along with the normal taxes that would be imposed in Canada. We would naturally impose a 9 per cent sales tax on those items.

I suggest to the minister today, as I have privately, that this matter could easily be conceded by the government and there would be absolutely no measurable impact on revenues. That is not the question. It is the principle that officials were right. We will see that they were right even though they were judged to be wrong. That is the sole effect of the government trying to restore an interpretation to a tariff item which the Tariff Board said has been wrong for so many years. I urge hon. members to accept the amendment and we could then adopt the whole bill as amended.

● (1650)

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), as he so aptly explained, is intended to strike out from Schedule VI of the bill a provision, or rather to make inoperative a provision contained in Schedule VI which bears tariff item No. 47810-1 and whose purpose is to reapply rates in force before an amendment made at about the end of 1970 and which came in 1979 after an interpretation of that tariff item by the Tariff Board. The effect of the new interpretation was to authorize the free entry of several dental materials which were subject to rates before that decision. Therefore, what we are doing in Schedule VI is to revert to the situation as it was before the board's decision.

Canadian production of certain of those goods such as dental obturation materials, had been started on the understanding that imports might not be duty-free. In addition, certain laboratories which manufacture dental prostheses realized that laboratories located in the United States were taking business away from them. With this provision we are therefore reverting to a previous situation, while taking into account the overall objective of a tariff policy designed to encourage the production in Canada of certain materials or certain merchandise or goods, in this instance those used in the production of dental prostheses.

However, in view of the numerous representations we have received since the budget was tabled about the complexity of the tariff provisions in the case of dental suppliers, Department of Finance officials have undertaken an in-depth study of the situation of all dental products to which rates are applicable. Unfortunately, it is now too early to announce the type of changes, if any, which might be proposed as a result of that study. It is also impossible to promise that everyone will be satisfied with the outcome of that study because, if we take a close look at the issue, we realize that there are very diverse interests between those who import such products and the Canadian manufacturers of the same merchandise and the same products.

Officials of the department are in consultation with commercial and professional dental associations. Other departments such as Industry, Trade and Commerce and National Health and Welfare will also be consulted in this in-depth study. I would also like to indicate, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian dentists have written to me to say that dental materials have increased 27 per cent. Now, reality does not seem to bear that out. The amendments contained in the budget affect only dental prostheses, materials and articles that are part of a finished prostheses as well as materials used in reconstructive dental surgery. The duty which is generally applied to these items is between 7 and 17½ per cent, although some still enter the country duty-free.

The instruments and other dental materials used by dentists are not at all affected by this change and I must add that most of these items, such as the materials, still come into the country duty-free. The items covered by the provision contained in Bill C-50 are in fact responsible for only a very small portion of total dental costs and would represent only a very small fraction of a possible future cost increase resulting from this amendment. I would think that possible increases will result from higher costs of materials used in dental prostheses, rather than from the changes resulting from Bill C-50.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, an in-depth study is under way and I think it is too early yet to agree to an amendment such as the one proposed by the hon. member. I would therefore suggest that the House reject the amendment put by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). However, I want to tell him and the House that his proposal is being given serious consideration, that the whole situation is being subjected to an in-depth and exhaustive review, and that we will be in a position to make a decision once this review is completed.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the Minister on what principles has he based the following conclusion: Since the Tariff Board has cancelled the tariff on the materials involved, why is he reinstating the tariff and making a study later, as he has said? Why not make the study first, and if the conclusions of this study show that the tariff should be reinstated, do it afterwards? But no, first the tariff is reinstated, and we are told: Perhaps it will be cancelled if it is justified. The Tariff Board has told the minister that the tariff had been cancelled. It was unfair. I therefore wonder why we are going back to the previous position.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I shall recognize the hon. minister so that he may reply to the question asked by the hon. member.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated, according to its policy, the government intended to subject these items and materials to a tariff. Technically, the Board indicated that they were not subject to a tariff. We are re-establishing what the government intended to do. In passing, I would like to point out to the hon. member that the general purpose of the tariff policy is to allow the Canadian manufacturing industry a certain margin of action in the production of certain goods. This is precisely why we are reinstating this tariff, to allow the Canadian industry to enter this sector of production.

The hon. member is asking me why we do not wait. As I have already stated, there are diverse interests involved. Obviously, the interests of the importer are not the same as those of the producers of such materials, even though there might be very few of them. We also say that we must maintain this relative protection. And we have seen that the margin is still not too wide to provide a certain freedom of action for Canadian manufacturers. We are now reviewing this whole situation. We shall find out what is the position of the various interests, and when we have reviewed the situation, we shall make a decision. This does not mean that the decision will be to remove the tariff. It could very easily be to maintain it.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, having seen some examples of how the government, having once levied a duty, will not let go, I want to speak about a little incident regarding some rather minor products that have a lot of contact with Canadians. I suppose there is hardly anyone who does not have some dental repair work or dental surgery done, so all of us will be affected by the decisions made by the government this afternoon.

I also have some doubts about the bona fides of those at the administrative level. I suppose that at some time or other all of us indulge in civil service or bureaucrat bashing. A lot of it is justified. I have been here for about 23 years and the longer I am here the more difficult I find it to fathom the mental process of the bureaucratic mind and the type of philosophy that permeates it. For many, it is that it will be right and right at all times, regardless of how wrong it may be. We have seen evidence of that in some of the practices of the revenue-gathering departments.

In the Department of Employment and Immigration we have seen bureaucracy become a law unto itself. The incident is merely a game; a practice which had been adjudged to be in error, even though an error of many years. I could not justify the minister's thinking when he said that it had been the government's intention or policy to subject the dental materials covered by item No. 47810-1 to customs duty. How can he tell us this? The words do not say so, because the Tariff Board says the words do not say so. There is no indication that that was the government's intention. It is the government's present intention, of course, that this should be covered, but to say that it was the intention when the tariff item was set up is to beg the question and, to me, is not justified by the events. But that is a minor item, Mr. Speaker.

Today we are on their reading of a bill that is as imposing in bulk as was the Bank Act. It covers a great deal of ground. The amendments to the Customs Tariff are detailed and laborious and there is nothing that is less interesting or more sterile for us to examine. These amendments arise out of the changes made at the Tokyo Round which is, in effect, a liberalization of tariff walls among trading partners. That is something that is welcomed on both sides of the House.

Some of these amendments will be of gradual tenure; they will be in effect over eight years subject, of course, to the sometimes wild flights of fancy of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), who feels that he can wrestle inflation to the ground by slashing prices in Canada to meet those of imports and thus make Canadian producers become more competitive. Goodness knows how much this lengthy exercise has cost the Government of Canada or how much it has cost a number of provinces to send people to attend the negotiations in Tokyo and in Geneva. Trade associations also sent delegations to give testimony to the negotiators. The whole effort, which lasted a number of years, has cost us a great deal of time and effort but is a step in the right direction. In some ways it is the negation of economic nationalism. This economic nationalism moves around the world in various and often unexpected ways.

Let us consider the Common Market. The nine members dispense with tariff barriers between the partners. This does not dispense with tensions among the various competing producers of goods and services within the community, however. One should hear what the French say about the English. And Britain is taking a hard, second look at its membership in the Common Market. France is apprehensive about Spain coming in. Each is trying to protect its own interests and, of course, to sell more goods to its neighbour. The object is never to buy more but always to sell more.

Judging from outward appearances, one might think that the Common Market represented a decline in economic nationalism, but is that really so? The Italians send tanker after tanker of red wine into the Bordeaux region to be mixed with the French production. When the French farmers hear about this, the trucks are summarily dumped by the wayside. Truckloads of Italian tomatoes are dumped in France. French wine is dumped in Germany. Now they are talking about English mutton and lamb. Goodness, those poor little beasties are getting some great maledictions in France!

Although there is still tension, it is certainly a great deal less than the tension created by the economic nationalism which some of us, who in the 1930s were teenagers, saw rampant in Europe and in other parts of the world, including Canada and the United States, when tariff walls were raised out of sight, and everybody closed their doors. What did we get out of it? We got World War II. It was bound to come.

The implementation of Bill C-50, I think, is a gesture on the part of Canada. I know it will receive assent on both sides as a stamp against economic nationalism. Through it, we are going to open up trade, which is the production and exchange of goods. True enough, that is not sufficient because Bill C-50 does nothing about non-tariff barriers. If there is anything which can get more oppressive and difficult to deal with, I would like to know what it is.

There are countries around the world which are great traders as long as their goods can be put in someone else's market. But try to get some of our goods, of a generally competitive nature, manufactured goods, for instance, into one of their markets. Try to get manufactured goods into Japan. There are all sorts of reasons why manufactured goods cannot appear on the Japanese market.

Let us deal now with the Common Market. Canada has heavy machinery plants, and in the pulp and paper manufacturing area as well as in the generation of electricity we have firms which stand second to none in the world. But it is very difficult for those firms to get tender documents not only from Common Market countries but also from Britain. The British board of trade simply says that there is nothing doing, that there are no copies of the tender documents available to anybody else, that the products in question will be made in Britain or within the Common Market. We are excluded. That non-tariff barrier is as good as slapping a 100 per cent customs tariff on the goods and services.

I do not think this House has had a satisfactory explanation from the ministers concerned as to what progress has been made, where further progress might be made, or to what practices Canada objects. Nor have we been told who are the greatest offenders regarding non-tariff barriers. I know we have some. If such be the case, let our trading partners tell us. I understand that some of our European friends consider our anti-dumping rules to be pretty barbarous. On the other hand, I invite the Europeans to look at some of their own. We can look at our American friends and see what they do. Some of their treasury board rulings and designations could be said to be pretty fast and vicious. We have only to look at some examples.

I always say try to sell ideas and commodities. We should not dwell on the difficulties. Let us see how we can do things. We should always stress everything positively. Do not tell me how you cannot do something, Mr. Speaker; I want to know how you are going to do it. I think that is how we should approach our negotiations. We should not put emphasis on the difficulties. I am not suggesting that our negotiators, in this particular round leading up to the accord embodied in Bill C-50, took that approach. They had a difficult task. The only thing many of us would reproach them for is their absolute secrecy in the early days. Everything was close to their chest at that time. They would not approach provincial governments. Literally they had to be dragged kicking and screaming into co-operation with the provinces. They would not take industry into their confidence. Things were very very difficult.

I think this is because there is a mental block in the bureaucracy in Canada that does not want to talk to business openly. There is a wall. Maybe it is the old Chinese wall. Nevertheless, a barricade exists between Canadian industry and what is known as government service. I would not say it is deliberate or that able administrators here in Ottawa do it so they can run the show. I will not impute those motives to them. With notable exceptions, there does not seem to be the required relationship between Canadian industry, Canadian business and government circles in Ottawa. I shall not speak about the provincial capitals because I know nothing about their inner workings.

Having dealt with that background, by this bill we are going to put and end to the Union of South Africa Trade Agreement Act, 1932, the United Kingdom Trade Agreement Act, 1937, and the Irish Free State Trade Agreement Act, 1932. The 1932 acts are, of course, in line with the general treaty of that year arising out of the conference held in Ottawa which gave rise to the BP classification in our tariffs. It worked wonderfully well. As a matter of fact, if it had not been for the BP, a great deal of industry would not have been built in this country.

As a result of the British trade agreement and the preferential treatment, American firms established many manufacturing subsidiaries in Canada so they could hit the European and British market. Via the British market they were able to trade with Egypt, India, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, all the colonies and East Africa. It was, in fact, the old British Empire that gave birth 50 years ago to the development of a great deal of Canadian industry.

This has created a branch plant economy in many industries. However, that is the only way there is going to be any industry. When the 1932 agreements were negotiated and implemented, this country had a remarkably small population of 11 million and had to deal with 50 million people in Britain, 50 million in France, 60 million or more in Germany, as well as the populations of Japan, China, India and the rest of the world. We were one little pea in a big bag of little peas and some big ones.

To put it in balance, we must be grateful for those men in the various countries who in 1931 and 1932 negotiated British preferential treatment, the British Trade Agreement Act and the various acts we are now repealing 50 years later. The reason is that Britain, having gone through the turmoil of World War II and a generation of terrible troubles thereafter, joined the Common Market, as did Ireland. We are totally excluded. It is meaningless to have British preferential treatment when Britain and Ireland are members of the Common Market.

In so far as South Africa is concerned, it too was a member of the group in 1932. It has gone its divergent way and is now being ostracized by countries in the rest of the world, many of whom are the world's greatest hypocrites. That is not the way to treat the troubles in South Africa. I certainly do not like apartheid, but we practise it here in Canada, only with more subtlety and with greater hypocrisy.

I find it absolutely unjustifiable that we have Canadian churchmen and various groups belabouring South Africa. I say physician cure thyself before you start preaching about others. Nevertheless, we are putting an end to our trade with South Africa on a preferential basis. I regret it. I think of all we could have done with South Africa. By being friends and maintaining communications with them, we could perhaps convince them to amend their ways and they could convince us to amend ours. By placing them in a ghetto and ostracizing them, we will not gain any influence over them, not if I know the people of South Africa, and I met many of them during World War II and have known others since that time. However, such has been the way of public thinking and the actions of government, because it was the popular thing to do.

We have put an end to our trade agreement with South Africa and put their goods under the general tariff. That will not change anything in South Africa one iota. What we have done shows the narrowness of our minds. Some day we will regret it. In Rhodesia we participated in an action against people who have now had to turn over government to elements whose future can be contemplated with some concern.

The whole of the continent of Africa is close to domination by the Soviet Union. It is being delivered. With patience, in ten to 15 years the Soviet Union will get the whole of North Africa. Next, of course, will be South Africa. That is the only bastion. When that happens, the United States will rue the day of their Andrew Youngs and others who ran about opening up the defences against the Soviet Union. These comments do not relate to this bill, but I hope the House will excuse my discursive remarks because they do relate to South Africa. Perhaps I can get a reaction from some members in this House. As soon as I mention South Africa, some of them tend to want to spit. I suggest they look at themselves in the mirror to see whether they should not spit at themselves.

I had a minor difference of opinion with the minister on one particular point. However, I recommend that the House pass Bill C-50. In saying that, the Minister of State for Finance is the jack-of-all-trades in finance. He is handling this Customs Tariff bill. I ask that there be prepared a truthful assessment to show where our tariff policy is heading, or whether it is drifting.

From where is the initiative to come for other changes? Where are some real initiatives with regard to non-tariff barriers? Will we have to get at non-tariff barriers by tackling them through our participation in international financial organizations? One area I suggest to the minister we might investigate in order possibly to get at some of these artificial barriers is the Inter American Development Bank. Our participation in that concern is at a reasonable level. Along with our friends in the United States, we carry a considerable wallop.

If various developing countries approach Canada, the United States and others with regard to financial aid on a multilateral basis, we should make it conditional upon the removal of certain improper trade practices to which we feel we are subject.

• (1730)

After all, if the United States can tie some of its economic relations and its economic help to human rights, there is no reason why we could not tie some economic aid to the removal of certain barriers. I offer the suggestion. Through the World Bank we participate in financial assistance in the Far East. There may be some bilateral financial assistance. However, this is where it becomes practical. That is our chief obstacle to increasing Canadian trade, apart from our high cost of production and, I think, perhaps a great deal of lack of interest on the part of Canadian businessmen who will not get out and really hack it on the market. Our Canadian banks are available for financing. The Export Development Corporation is there working hard, and can be made to work more effectively. We have a great deal going, if we would only recognize the fact.

I hope this aspect of our trading relationships with the world will meet the approval of the House and that we will do other things to improve that position. May we hear from the minister in the fairly near future as to what we can get with respect to a study on non-tariff barriers as far as they affect Canada?

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take a great deal of time in dealing with this bill but I do want to make some comments. The last comment of the previous speaker was of considerable interest to me. I think he is right that we have to get a better understanding of the imposition of non-tariff barriers as they come into play and into force, while on the other hand we are seeing a move by these very same countries to support the reduction, gradual or otherwise, of existing tariffs.

I know the minister's department has looked at this matter, and I am sure in times gone by the House of Commons has also looked at the impact of tariffs and the effect they have both on domestic industry and on its capacity to exist, but before I deal with that I want to say that on the matter of South Africa I noted that my colleague from the Conservative Party was waxing eloquent just a few moments ago. I think he must surely understand that every measure must be used during periods of time when it is generally acknowledged by the administration itself and by others around the world that the policies enacted by an administration toward people create situations which are discriminatory and which are considered by the majority in the free world to be unsatisfactory or unconscionable.

I therefore do not want to engage in a discussion of the relative merits of the hon. member's argument other than to say that the same argument can and has been used about other countries over many years, and there comes a point in time when an action is appropriate. At the time the actions taken were deemed to be appropriate, and I think they were appropriate.

Let me turn to the bill and the general philosophy of the bill. My concern is that as we see the nations of the world, Canada being one of them, galloping along toward free trade, the impact of that movement on Canadian manufacturing, Canadian exporting and the capacity of Canada to hold its place in the world and to provide employment opportunities and economic opportunities for Canadians in this country becomes somewhat suspect. I am sure I do not have to go back into history to explain the historic significance of tariff barriers. Much of the industry which exists in Canada, and has for 50, 60 or more years, is of a branch plant nature. It came to Canada in order to get behind the tariff wall. I think before we move too swiftly toward the elimination of tariffs, we have to appreciate that our situation is somewhat different from those of a number of other countries.

The movement away from a tariff wall, so to speak, toward a free trade, though it may be of benefit to certain areas of industry, could be disastrous for other areas. We must fully understand the branch-plant nature of Canada's economy. The reason why the branch-plant was set up in Canada was to make available an operation which would be able to take advantage of the domestic Canadian market while at the same time not having to pay the tariff which would have raised the product above the price that would have been the price established for the Canadian manufacturer.

Canadian industry is small. Generally speaking, it meets a market of about 10 per cent of the U.S. market. Our major trading partner is the U.S. Most of the branch-plant nature of Canada's industry is related directly to the United States. The U.S. manufacturing capacity is large enough so that if it had the desire and if there were no impediments in the way, it could quite conceivably meet the entire Canadian market requirements out of its current unused productive capacity. But it is not unreasonable to think that much of the nine million household requirements in Canada could easily be met by the indigenous capacity of U.S. industry to manufacture that is not currently being utilized.

If we were to have a free trade arrangement, as has been proposed by a committee of the other place—or at least is being considered by a committee of the other place—or if we were to go too swiftly toward free trade, there would be no imperative reason for the parent company to put the necessary capital reinvestment into the Canadian operation to maintain its efficiency. The end result of that could and, I suggest, would be that the Canadian operation would be allowed for a time to continue to operate, but in the final analysis it would not be kept competitive with its parent within the U.S. and in the end would become redundant. The justification would be that it should be closed because it is no longer competitive, and the U.S. manufacturer would solidify all of his manufacturing in his home base and would then just simply ship his products to Canada as manufacturers ship from Oregon to California, from Ohio to Florida or from West Virginia to South Carolina. That would be the relationship.

One of the factors we have going for us in regard to standing in the way is that we have a reasonably large domestic market, but not large enough to sustain if there is no reason for maintaining the efficiency of the industry. I think we have seen in the auto industry the very thing I am talking about. The auto industry is a rationalized North American industry. It is faced with a downturn in its market as a result, in many instances, of inefficient management unable to foresee what was evident to other manufacturers, and the initial reaction of the industry was to attempt to rebuild its industry within its home base, the United States, and to put less of its reinvestment dollars into Canada. It was only because we were able to say that at some point, I suppose, we could return to a tariff arrangement—and we did have in place some kind of agreement—that we were able to keep the industry from centralizing its operations almost totally in Michigan or in other parts of the northern and mid-northern United States.

I am frankly concerned that we are moving with some haste to establish a free trade arrangement over a period of time that will work to the detriment of Canadian industry, because of its branch-plant nature, that will work therefore to the detriment of Canadians in general, will not result in lower prices as many people anticipate it will, but will, in the final analysis, because of the lack of competition in Canada, result ultimately in higher prices because we will have to buy many, if not all, the products we want from offshore.

Without engaging in a long and difficult argument, I want to suggest that all is not quite as cut and dried as the provisions of this bill and the suggestions made by other people would make it appear to be. There is a requirement from the Canadian public on the Canadian Parliament to have a better understanding of the possible and likely implications of this move. Although consumer groups, and I support them in many things, may feel at first glance there is significant benefit to Canadian consumers by a reduction in tariff, because they will be able to gain access to what are today cheaper goods, the only thing which makes those goods cheaper is the fact that they have to compete with a Canadian-made product. Witness the soft fruit industry. Those of you who are familiar with the soft fruit growers' industry can appreciate the difficulty that industry has had over the years in competing with the influx of soft fruit grown in the United States and in other parts of the world, and the access that soft fruit has to the Canadian marketplace. You will appreciate the problems of the farmer who is faced with having to attempt to make ends meet with what is the mean average of the mid and end-of-season price while the importer is able to take advantage of the early, mid and end-season price and, therefore, has a much higher mean average. He is therefore able, because of climatic conditions and access to the Canadian market, to force the Canadian farmer in that industry at least—I am not familiar with other farming groups, but my colleague may be able to speak to them—to become competitive with considerably less cash flow and, therefore, a smaller profit margin. I am familiar with this group representing an area that was substantially involved. The Canadian farmer in that particular industry, in Ontario at least and in other parts of the country, is faced with this problem.

I want you to extrapolate that, if you will, and position yourselves in relation to a number of other industry sectors, considering the impact of allowing that which is happening in the farming industry to occur in those other industry sectors. If there were no tariffs in place, and if there was no reason, other than the marketplace, to want to be located in Canada for manufacturing purposes, then it is not unreasonable to assume that many of what are now called the North American multinational giants, but what really are U.S. multinational giants, would find no good or justifiable reason for maintaining their employment levels, plants or efficiency here.

My recommendation in this regard is, first of all, that we approach it with caution, and second, that we structure here in the House of Commons a group which will once again take a serious and hard look at the ever-changing nature, particularly now, of Canada's economic base. We should look at the winners and losers and the reasons there are those winners and losers in Canada's manufacturing sector. We should try to understand through an analysis the reasons why there have been so many plant closures in Canada in the last 24 to 48 months. We should determine whether those plant closures resulted simply from a rationalization of the parent operations in respect of greater productivity, and determine whether the increasing and potential opening of the market of Canada to a free trade arrangement will not be in the long run more of a hazard than a help to us.

There are certain specific groups we all hear from, ranging from the shirt manufacturers, who have written, I am sure, to each and every one of us, to the dental associations which have written to us on the other side of the issue, which are making a very valid case that has to be given careful consideration. But the basic and more fundamental problem is one that we will face somewhere down the road. My view of it, having had discussions of late with people in the United States and having looked at the potential hazard to the Canadian manufacturing sector in particular, is that if we were to move with unseemly haste, we could well create a situation which would allow them, quite justifiably, to say they need no longer be located here. The end result of that, of course, could be quite disastrous. It would require us to become even more dependent on our raw materials in order to maintain our standard of living. It would require us to sell ever more of those materials in an unprocessed and semi-processed state in order to maintain that standard of living. The political pressures to continue the wholesale sale of our basic heritage would be immense, and it is questionable whether any government, Liberal, Conservative or NDP, regardless of where it was located in the country, would be able to withstand those pressures, given the unemployment and the lack of economic opportunity which would become the order of the day.

I do not pretend for a moment to be an expert in the field, although I have studied it at some length for many years, and I do not know when you ever become an expert because experts seem to have very conflicting opinions, but having looked at it, I see some indications of potential difficulties. In our desire to appear to be nice guys in the world of trade and commerce, we are not only agreeing to reductions in and elimination of tariffs, we do not even understand that the countries with which we agree, or with which we enter into these agreements, do not necessarily always live up to the letter of the agreements.

Those of us who have looked at the problem still have a long and somewhat curious view of the DISC program in the United States, for example, and the fact that it was found, I think it is fair to say, to be outside the GATT Agreement. That did not end it. It stayed in place, nevertheless, because it would seem to be of some national concern and some national benefit. There are few of us who do not understand that in Japan, particularly in the automobile field, while there may well be a willingness to reduce the tariff, the possibility of entering the market as a result of all the other non-tariff barriers which are placed before the sale can be consummated is virtually non-existent for the North American manufacturer.

● (1750)

It concerns me when I hear people cheering about the reduction in anti-pollution control measures and safety measures in the United States. They seem to indicate that it is of some benefit to the industry at a time when industries are spending considerable sums of money re-tooling for world production. Many of the countries to which these companies hope to sell will demand that those anti-pollution devices and safety measures, which the United States is prepared to set aside for now, be in place. So, the cost will be considerably higher to produce two different levels of automobiles. They did not stick to their guns in an attempt to produce one automobile which met the world demand. Rather, they succumbed to pressures of a domestic kind.

Very few people recognize that one of the reasons we have difficulty selling aircraft in Japan is that the country is currently in the business of developing an aircraft industry. While they would argue, on the one hand, that they do not have tariffs to make it difficult for anyone to sell, on the other hand, by virtue of other measures, they make it impossible to sell.

If I may say so, we must put aside our boy scout attitude. I do not mean this in any derogatory sense, but the fact is that the world operates in a very tough-minded way. Therefore, countries of the world make their decisions based on what is in their best interests. The direction in which we are travelling may not be in our best interest. We may not be exercising the care and caution which is required to safeguard the industrial opportunity of Canada for future generations.

The whole area is fraught with question marks. The minister has entered into and completed the negotiations. He should know that what is on paper does not necessarily always reflect what one meets in the marketplace when one tries to do business in other countries. That is why I think the comment of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) was correct. We must get a handle on the non-tariff barrier problems which exist around the world and their effect on our enterprises which are attempting to do business outside Canada. We must get a handle on the extent to which the branch-plant nature of our economy is influenced by the parent operation and on the real possibility that free access to our marketplace could undermine the necessary investment to maintain the competitive position we require if we are to provide for ourselves.

We need a much more thorough review of the situation. We should look at today's society instead of adopting the ten-year-old view of the situation. We must look at the ever-changing economic conditions in every part of the world and the difficulties with which the manufacturing sector is faced.

We will not delay this legislation unduly today, but I hope the minister will be able to make a commitment that in the near future he will establish a group compromised of members of the House of Commons to look at the very difficult problems about which everyone talks but which no one really understands.

How do we enter the Japanese market? It is not a matter of building a better mouse trap. If we build a better mouse trap, they will keep us out until they have built a better one still. Anyone who is knowledgeable about international trade understands that. Therefore, when we take a look at Japan in the context of the rest of the world which is pooling its resources to solidify its economic conditions, it chills our spines, especially when we think of what might happen in the future.

I ask the minister to give these suggestions some thought before we are much further down the road. There may be a point beyond which we cannot possibly return. The minister must realize that countries do not necessarily operate by the written rules; they operate by the ones which serve them best.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make three brief comments in connection with the impact of tariffs. Canada is a vast and diversified country. In my view we must give a lot of consideration, when we set or remove tariffs, to the impact this will have on every part of our country. For instance, at the present time there is a rather heavy tariff on logs coming from the United States into western Canada. This has made the building of log houses uncompetitive with other types of construction. It is having an adverse affect. Whoever set these tariffs should look at what they are doing to the housing industry in western Canada; I am sure they will realize then that some changes should be made.

My second comment is on the way in which items are handled. There are emergency organizations that deal with items that come into the country. Some tariff officials take too long to consider these things. There has been an arrangement for several years whereby some of these items, particularly in terms of landed or stalled aircraft, would go through immediately as an emergency. Recently there have been delays in the Calgary office. This could very well put a company out of business. With the current unemployment situation in Canada, we should encourage every industry to stay in business as well as bring in more business. Administrative delays in the handling of a piece of machinery for a stalled aeroplane could very well ruin a business.

Third, I think we should look at the impact of tariffs on all parts of the country: the "far east", central Canada and the west. Too often tariffs are set to accommodate only one part of the country. Western people today are paying much higher prices for clothes and shoes because of tariffs. We must protect our Canadian industries. On the other hand, the coal industries in the east and in the west have been downgraded because we have permitted American coal to come into the country without being subject to tariffs. Westerners pay more for shoes and clothes; but our miners are not working. We should consider the impact right across the country so that all Canadians receive the benefit of tariffs or no tariffs, whichever the case might be.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

INCOME TAX

MEASURE RESPECTING AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill S-17, an act to implement conventions between Canada and New Zealand and Canada and Australia for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax, be read the third time and do pass.

[English]

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): When the House rose at six o'clock the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) had the floor.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is the third time I have taken the floor today, on various subjects. We are now studying a bill from the Senate. Unfortunately we do not see that often enough because the subject we will debate this evening is indeed a good one for prior consideration by the Senate.

I for one have been convinced for years that unfortunately the government sets far too many bills aside for first consideration by the House of Commons; they could be sent to the Senate first because our colleagues there have a wide experience in government affairs and they could very well study them at a more leisurely pace and I would say under much less pressure.

I am not a leader of the official opposition, but on the other hand I do have a certain knowledge as a result of my experience in the House of Commons. As it happened I was debating Bill C-57 this afternoon, the excise tax measure. It is well known that I am the expert on excise matters on this side of the House. Later on in the afternoon the Minister of State (Finance) (Mr. Bussières) brought in Bill C-50 for the consideration of the House. They rushed to come and get me because I had introduced amendments to Bill C-50 and if we are to study a bill having to do with double taxation I can say that, thanks to my experience, I am the expert on the Income Tax Act.

So here I am again tonight, for the third time. I apologize. I see the minister whom I know very well, but we are debating related but different subjects. Well, on this point I will speak at length. Although a Senate bill may look harmless and even if the subject may not seem very important either, it has to do with conventions to avoid double taxation so we are going to discuss the principles.

Mr. Minister, if I may, I would like to execute or rather to prod the goats behind you that are ruminating and seem to have only a ruminating interest in some of the comments made here.

It is just like what happened this afternoon when we were debating Bill C-57. During our discussions with the witnesses, certain government members were very excited and had animated exchanges with them. However, when we discussed the same bill this afternoon, they remained completely silent in the House, and those who were the most militant said that they were abstaining from the debate. Come on! Where is their political courage? Where is their moral courage? All I am asking them is to show some moral courage!

For my part, I must express my views on these bills. The government members can remain silent. They can take part in the committee proceedings in turns because they have a rotation system. I am thinking about the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, about the government members, about what happened when the committee was considering Bill C-57. I had to recognize about two dozen members who were there to represent the government. They are nothing but big lumps! Only a few of them are interested in the subject.

What I find most surprising is that they will then ask me: "Mr. Lambert, you are an expert in the matter. What is your opinion?" Well, I can say quite simply that it is not by being a big lump in committee that I became an expert.

I was a government member myself and I could reply to some parliamentarians who are now laughing up their sleeve that I was a parliamentary secretary myself long before them and much earlier in my career. I was also Speaker of the House and minister. They could start with that.

However, some bills are considered in committee, it is not enough to look clever in the House and gather around the speakers to applaud them, because we now have television in the House and government members feel that they should gather around the member who is speaking.

I simply say to you, and the minister will admit it this evening, that one has to be familiar with the bill not only in committee but also in the House. Then the minister will be able to assess his colleagues as well as the members opposite. At present, after 24 years in the House of Commons, I think that I am rated quite low as far as ability is concerned. There are several bills with which I am familiar, such as the Income Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Excise Tax Act, and the Bank Act. I feel that I rank in the lower quarter. That does not mean that I do not consider myself ahead of the vast majority of my colleagues in this area.

But let us get back to the subject. We are considering tonight a convention to avoid double taxation with respect to income tax and to promote economic activity in either Canada, Australia or New Zealand. I must tell the minister that I have some reservations because, and bear with me in my philosophical reflections tonight after my lecture this afternoon, I think we as Canadians have not done our duty in view of the declining role played by the United Kingdom in the Commonwealth. It was up to us to show leadership in the Commonwealth. Yet, what have we done? We sat on our royal assets. Lack of interest! I have had ample opportunity in the last two decades to visit New Zealand and Australia and I knew their soldiers as prisoners of war in the 1940s. I had friends everywhere, in government, in the bureaucracy, that is in the public service, and among the people too. When I went to New Zealand, my arrival was simply announced and people everywhere knew me. The same thing happened in Australia, which I visited on several occasions. Do you know what our colleagues in those countries were blaming us for? They felt that we, as Canadians, were too aloof.

[English]

We were too hoity-toity. We were too concerned with our place in the North American Sun. We did not, Mr. Speaker, take up the challenge that the Australians and the New Zealanders wanted us to, not to dominate them, but to join them. I say this is the best we can do with Australia and New Zealand, that is to join them in the activities of the Commonwealth out in in the eastern Pacific. We are not going to dominate them. O Lord, the average Aussie would hit you over the head, and with justification, if you tried it. However, we should join them.

The United States has met with some problems out in the Pacific. We are not going to try to take advantage of them. However, Britain was caught up in some real problems in the 20 post-war years. We could have served the cause of the Commonwealth a great deal more, and here I am not going to attribute blame to any administration. It started from the time I was in Parliament. There was the most amazing silence and lack of co-operation. There was the feeling that the Aussies and the New Zealanders were part of the Antarctic penguin group. It was almost that bad. In trying to accomplish certain problems within the Commonwealth, we have taken an attitude difficult to put into words. Frankly, I am disgusted with our attitudes on external affairs and defence. I used to be fairly close to that from 1963 until 1967, and even in the earlier years. However, I am amazed at our performance. This lackadaisical performance, this drifting with regard to the commonwealth, this drifting with regard to Australia and New Zealand has been more than countenanced by the present administration. All along their members have not cared one damn hoot. Why is that? I suppose it is because a lot of them felt that they were not part of World War II and therefore, in the spirit of a new generation, they felt that World War II was something that should be left in the past. They are like the kids who drifted on the streets in the 1960s and who said that the vets of the 1940s were part of history and should be forgotten, not one of them remembering that they sprung from the loins of a World War II vet and that life had been made safe for them as a result of the sacrifices of those who had ventured into the ranks of the armed services of the allies in the 1940s.

I am amazed at the complacent attitude that many people today hold toward people of my generation. We had a great deal to lose but we walked into the recruiting centres on a Saturday afternoon, we left universities in mid-course without thinking about any real challenge, but we were going to do our duty by our country. A good number of members on both sides of the House did that. I did it but I do not wear a medal on my arm and I would not care to. I will be damned, however, if I will be told by anybody in this House that I am less than loyal to this country because I oppose certain changes to the Constitution or because I oppose certain changes to the way of life that I defended.

An hon. Member: You're getting excited.

Mr. Lambert: No one will accuse me of being excited. I will point out and I will name any hon. member who will dare do that. I will name any hon. member who will call into question the loyalty of any of my colleagues who served during World War II.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is a fascist tactic.

Mr. Lambert: I will name any so-called youngster and I will name—

Mr. Collenette: Speak to the bill.

Mr. Lambert: I will name anybody who is a smart aleck. I will also name those who, like the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette), would dare suggest that I should speak to the bill. I have spoken to bills long before that hon. member ever knew anything about relevance. He is a political whippersnapper.

Mr. Collenette: Well, you have to start somewhere.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: With the emphasis on the whipper!

Mr. Lambert: Be that as it may, I want to come back to this particular bill and our relations with the Australians and the New Zealanders. To a whole generation, which encompasses the majority of government members, relationships with Australia and New Zealand are as strange as night is unto day. Few of them know Australians and fewer still know New Zealanders. We have missed the boat, Mr. Speaker. The opportunity was there. I knew the Aussies and I knew the New Zealanders and I know that year after year we have neglected our relationships with them. There could be formidable relationships today in trade and influence—influence at the United Nations and through working together. I am sure that if you had put together the Aussies, the Canadians and the New Zealanders, they would be marching as a team of three on the principles of the United Nations. Do they do that now? Not at all. We have been kept dispersed. I simply say that it is the responsibility of the administration that there has been this difficulty.

That we should have tax agreements with them is all to the good. Canadian oil drilling companies have headed out to Australia as the result of the National Energy Program. Other people are going to New Zealand to provide expertise. Ten or 12 years ago I remember that the husband of the president of the women's organization in my constituency was named by the government of New Zealand to head the offshore drilling program of the government of New Zealand. He was a Canadian who had acquired the expertise through working for one of the so-called international companies and because of personal relationships, was named to head the program.

This is the sort of contact that must be maintained between governments. When you know the people concerned and what they will be doing, you can help them and they can help you. The way some governments behave, you would almost think that some of our allies were enemies.

Turning to the detail of this particular bill, Mr. Speaker, there is one feature on which I should like some explanation and reassurance from the minister, and that is with regard to the changes that may be implemented in the agreements, that these shall be presented by way of resolution which shall be subject to affirmation by the House, if I am correct.

There are many other parts to this bill. I invite the hon. member who sits behind the minister and says "read the bill," to read the government fact sheet. He has not seen it, obviously. I will elucidate what this bill covers because the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Ostiguy) who made that statement obviously is not aware of what is in this bill.

What are the specific provisions of this tax treaty? First, witholding tax; second, capital gains; third, non-discrimination; fourth, teachers. Incidentally, there is no specific provision for teachers. Next come the provisions governing pensions and annuities. There are no tax hideaways for pensioners. You cannot decide that you are going to live in some of the more salubrious lands of Australia or New Zealand hoping to live in a tax hideaway. Next we find relief from double taxation and the anticipated legislative timetable. This bill was supposed to be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in the Senate. Next we find the anticipated nature of the reaction to the tax treaties. The bill is unlikely to be opposed, it says in this release. We can question some of it in so far as points of discussion are concerned. This is a government handout. The parliamentary secretary would have been as entitled to it as I have, but I got it. He did not.

In so far as New Zealand is concerned, the question might be asked how the new treaty differs from the existing 1948 agreement. The main differences are the following: first, witholding tax, and second, dividends.

Article 10 of the treaty provides that dividends paid to residents of one country by a company which is a resident of the other country may be taxed at the source country at a maximum rate of 15 per cent. There was no such limitation in the 1948 agreement.

Article 11 covers interest. It provides for a general rate of tax of 15 per cent in the source country. There were no such limitations under the 1948 agreement.

• (2030)

Article 12 covers royalties. It provides for a general tax rate of 15 per cent in the source country. The 1948 agreement provides for an exemption in the case of copyright royalty but does not put a ceiling on other royalties. I am sure the parliamentary secretary was fully aware of this.

In the case of capital gains, the rules under Article 13 permit a country to tax capital gains realized on the disposition of real property and of rights to exploit or to explore for natural resources found in that country. They do not restrict the domestic rules. I am sure the parliamentary secretary is able to explain all of these applications. The 1948 agreement does not deal with the taxation of capital gains. After all, the capital gains tax did not exist in Canada at that time. Therefore, the respective domestic rules are applicable.

What about non-discrimination? The revised treaty rights of the 1948 agreement do not contain any specific rules on non-discrimination.

Here is something for the parliamentary secretary for I am sure he will be interested in pensions and annuities. Under the 1948 agreement, pensions and annuities are taxable only in the country where the recipient resides. Article 17 of the revised treaty does not reflect that policy. It recognizes the right of either country to tax such payments at source provided they exceed $10,000. It is hoped the parliamentary secretary will serve in this House long enough to qualify for a pension in excess of $10,000. Then he might branch out to find out just what Australia and New Zealand have to say about the taxation of pension payments.

In so far as teachers are concerned, the two-year tax exemption provided visiting teachers in the 1948 agreement will be terminated. This is something of great interest, particularly in western Canada.

With reference to Australia, the question might also be asked as to how the new treaty differs from the 1957 agreement. The main differences are the following; first, withholding tax on dividends. Article 10 of the treaty provides that dividends paid to residents of one country by a company which is a resident of the other country may be taxed in the source country at a maximum rate of 15 per cent. This is of some benefit. The 1957 agreement also provides for a 15 per cent limitation. Article 11 covers interest. It provides for a general rate of tax of 15 per cent in the source country. There are no limitations under the 1957 agreement. Article 12 covers royalties. It provides for a general tax rate of 10 per cent in the source country. The 1957 agreement provides for an exemption in the case of copyright royalties but has not put a ceiling on other royalties.

Considering the attitude of the Government of Canada with regard to royalties, we hope many Australians have invested in Canadian oil lands because they will only receive 10 per cent on royalties. That does not mean that the Government of Canada will not raid Canadian owners of royalties on oil lands because the government has already indicated its disposition to depredation.

The rules in Article 13 provide that a country may tax capital gains realized on disposition of real property and of rights to exploit or to explore for natural resources found in that country. They do not restrict domestic rules. The 1957 agreement does not deal with the taxation of capital gains. Therefore, the respective domestic rules are applicable. See if you can sort that out within the Canadian and Australian taxation rules.

The revised treaty does not contain any specific rules on non-discrimination. In so far as pensions and annuities are concerned, under the 1957 agreement pensions and annuities are taxable only in the country where the recipient resides. Article 18 of the revised treaty does not reflect that policy. It recognizes the right of either country to tax such payments at source.

As I recall it, minister Benson, standing in this House at the time of the so-called revision of the Income Tax Act, said that it was Canada's right and obligation to tax all pensions at 25 per cent, regardless of where the recipient resided and how that recipient had earned his pension. I presume that is the situation in Canada. Therefore, that is also the situation in Australia and New Zealand where the pension of any Canadian who qualifies will be taxed at the same 25 per cent base rate.

In so far as teachers in Australia are concerned, the two-year tax exemption provided visiting teachers in the 1957 agreement will be terminated.

These are some of the factors with regard to this particular scheme. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will recall the particular difficulties we had with the former minister of justice, who was subsequently the minister of finance, Mr. John Turner, about amendments to agreements of this size which shall be subject to either positive or negative resolutions of this House. If there has been one subject about which there has been lengthy discussion in this House, one which has lasted now for 16 or 17 years, it is precisely that question of how to act in accordance with the rules. This is a reflection on House leadership. Frankly, they were scared—I was going to use a more awkward word—to refer the House rules to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization and request that it bring forward modernized rules reflecting the views of both sides of the House after what can only be qualified as a dog's breakfast which was imposed on this House in 1969. We knew it was a dog's breakfast but the government did not. Now we hear all sorts of comments about the House rules from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and others about how they are abused. They fashioned the rules, let them live by them.

• (2040)

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and other members, including some on the government side, who were interested in the rules at that time reached a consensus on how the matter should be handled throught the rules rather than through statutes. We have about half a dozen statutes kicking around in various places which determine how this House will act upon affirmative or negative resolutions for the purpose of bringing forward orders in council which may amend certain statutes. We have them in tax statutes with regard to double taxation. We have them with regard to the revision of statutory instruments. Now we are introducing them into the double taxation statute which is before us this evening.

The situation is less than a dog's breakfast. It requires a little good will on the part of the government. The government should say that it will consider the question of affirmative-negative resolutions with regard to orders in council affecting legislation or changes to certain legislation, and amend them to comply with the rules of the House so they do not depend upon erratic statutes that live here, there and about.

Government House leaders have been scared stiff. At the beginning of this session, the present government House leader was thumping loudly on his desk, speaking ad nauseam over the television about the changes that would have to be brought into this House in order to bring the rules up to date. I remember when he was a freshman member on the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. What he says today has not changed one iota from what he said then when he did not know which end was up.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Was that last year?

Mr. Lambert: No, it was some years ago, when he came here. There has not been one bit of clarification in that time. Whas has happened was simply that if someone on the government side speaks, one member of the opposition shall also have the right to speak, and then we will have a vote. This is strictly for the birds.

I see my time is running out. I appreciate Your Honour having given me the benefit of not looking at the clock. I recommend to the House that this bill be passed. However, the minister has to come up with some answers. We are entitled to them. I have raised the problems, now let us hear the answers.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to follow my colleague for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) who is much more knowledgeable than I with respect to income tax bills and tax treaties.

I compliment the government on reorganizing the tax treaty between Canada and New Zealand. I am surprised it took so long to produce a new tax treaty following the amendments to the Income Tax Act of 1971. It is high time the government managed to get this treaty organized. It was given first reading in the Senate in 1980, nine years late. In fact, at this point it is ten years late.

This should have been done at the time of the income tax revisions because our trade with Australia and New Zealand is exceptionally important to this country. These countries have economies that are similar to that of Canada. Therefore, we should be doing a great deal more than at present.

I suggest the minister take to cabinet the suggestion at present being worked out and work on it a little harder, namely organize some kind of free trade treaty with Australia and New Zealand. Those countries are in the southern hemisphere. They have a standard of living which is to some extent comparable to ours, though perhaps not as high. These countries have the same kind of industrial and sociological base as Canada. They represent a total population in excess of 17 million. If it were combined with ours, we would have a free market of 40 million people, producers and consumers. It would make us more competitive and give us the production runs needed by our manufacturing industry.

Goods manufactured in those countries could be sold in this country off season, and our goods could be sold in Australia and New Zealand also off season. That would give all three countries an opportunity to extend the length of production runs and would make it possible for us all to take part in the kind of industrial activity which is so important.

This is why tax treaties are important. It makes it possible for entrepreneurs in Canada to set up business in Australia and New Zealand and not be penalized by taxes. In the same way, entrepreneurs in New Zealand and Australia can set up operations in Canada without being penalized. That is the essential point in trade negotiations. An entrepreneur trying to do business in another country should not be double taxed.

I say to the minister that this is the first step, but only the first step. It is important that we organize the trade treaty, including taxation measures, so as to make it possible for us to integrate our markets. We in Canada have a market of only 24 million people, and we badly need a reciprocal market. We could have such a market with 41 million consumers if we joined Australia and New Zealand.

There has been some concern about imports into Canada of meat products, fruit products and so forth from Australia, and to some extent we tend to be parochial in that regard. The truth of the matter is that when we have the same products for sale to the world, there is no reason why we cannot combine and organize our sales to the world in an effective manner to protect both our interests. If we had some sense, we would not be complaining about Australian beef, Australian lamb or Australian fruit. We would be getting together with both Australia and New Zealand to market through a central strategy meat, fruit, wheat, coal and nickel to the rest of the consuming world. We would not have to worry that they might sell some fruit in our market or they might sell some lamb or some beef in our market, or that we might sell our products in their market. What we would be doing as producers and suppliers is dealing as effectively with other countries as countries in the Middle East are dealing with us as suppliers of oil products.

It is about time we had a government which was prepared to look at this situation in a cold, businesslike sense and not just from the point of view of a simple tax treaty. We have made tax treaties with such countries as Malaysia and Singapore, but we should look at this from a sensible point of view. Australia and New Zealand could be our closest and best trading partners. Indeed, there should be a free trade arrangement and a free tax arrangement so that it would be clear that the tax on businesses in one country would not be doubled in another country. It is very important that we do this.

In presenting this legislation will the government, before this year is finished, complete the present negotiations with Australia and New Zealand, and will it go one step further by developing one common market for our countries?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières).

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I would be quite happy to let the minister speak, but I think the point should be made that this is third reading. He does not have the right of reply, but I am sure the House will give him unanimous consent to speak.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank hon. members for allowing me to make some brief remarks. My first comments should please the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), for I should like to advise the House that the negotiations between the representatives of the Department of Finance in Canada and their counterparts in the Federal Republic of Germany will resume tomorrow on double taxation between the two countries. I hope that this will be the last round of negotiations, that our representatives will return with a final agreement and that we will be able to legislate another agreement in order to avoid double taxation.

As to market integration, an issue which goes far beyond the scope of this bill, I should like to remind the House that by giving third reading this afternoon to Bill C-50, we have put into force the new tariff agreements resulting from the last multilateral trade negotiations, better known as the Tokyo Round, so that we are really in the process of liberalizing international trade, which should surely meet with the wishes of the hon. member.

With regard to the technical question brought up by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on the matter of supplementary conventions, of course, abuse may be seen in the use, as indicated in Part III, of an order of the governor in council to change a tax agreement. Still, Clause 8 must be read followed by Clause 9 which stipulates that when an order under section 8 is used, it must be laid before Parliament and does not come into force until the thirtieth sitting day following its tabling, so that between the day it is tabled and that thirtieth sitting day, there is the possibility of addressing a motion to one or the other of the two Houses of Parliament with a view to cancelling the order, and that said motion must be signed by 50 hon. members.

So, in fact, a formula is provided allowing the House to have the order of the governor in council cancelled that would alter part of a double taxation agreement; that provision is one that can be found in all bills to implement agreements to avoid double taxation.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to add to what I said on second reading of this bill. I hope, like other hon. members, that we will have occasion to approve similar agreements, such as one that would create ties with our neighbors to the south, the United States, and one to create ties with the Federal Republic of Germany.

[English]

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, as a consequence of some of the remarks made by the minister I would just like to point out that the great "built-in protection" in the bill to which he made reference, being the need to submit an order passed by the governor in council to this House for its consideration, has, as an integral part of that protection a form of time limitation, and the minister might well have directed his attention to that rather offensive provision of the bill.

I am speaking, of course, of Clause 9(4) which provides that even though a motion may indeed be referred to the House, it is referred to the House for five hours of debate. We know that this government has an inclination with respect to most legislation which it now brings forward on a regular basis to impose either closure or some form of time limitation. This time limitation is now finding its way into statutes which are passed by the House regularly with respect to tax conventions between Canada and other nations. I recognize that it is important in international tax agreements to have some kind of control over what a rebellious democratically elected Parliament may do from time to time, but that is one of the failings of democracy.

With respect to treaties signed by Canada and submitted to the United States Senate for its consideration—as was the case with the east coast fishing treaties—the U.S. Senate, being democratically elected, decided it would not grant its approval. However, no time limitation was imposed in the United States with respect to the granting of that approval or the casting of a vote for or against the position of the United States government, even though at the time of entering into that treaty, the government of the United States indicated its support for the proposition which both Canada and the United States adopted.

I therefore find that Subclause (4) of Clause 9 is repugnant to the freedom of debate that should take place in this House with respect to every piece of legislation which is brought forward. This creeping time limitation may eventually give way to a circumstance in which we may well be confronted with 15-minute time limitations to consider any legislation the government may wish to bring forward. What is the purpose of our being here if it is not to reflect wisely—we hope wisely—upon the legislation the government brings before the House? We may well ask ourselves why we do not stay home. Why bother coming to this House, if it is not to debate freely the merit or lack of merit in any government legislation? I find it offensive to be confronted with what appears to be a routine piece of legislation with a built-in time limitation in the form of closure in respect of what should be a non-partisan matter.

• (2100)

May I just comment upon the general scope and effect of my experience of government reaction to the avoidance of double taxation in Canada and other foreign jurisdictions. A moment ago the minister spoke of the negotiations which the Department of Finance and, presumably, Revenue Canada had entered into with the Federal Republic of Germany regarding the very issue of the avoidance of double taxation. We know that such a treaty currently exists. It is not working very well. I can give the minister a piece of information which he might like to carry back to those negotiations with the West Germans.

There has developed a system of avoiding the application of the convention between our two countries, and it is the simple expedient of never issuing an assessment in the foreign jurisdiction. All foreign nations' tax authorities need do is to extract a penalty by way of a deposit against potential future tax liabilities and never issue an assessment.

I have just concluded a meeting with Revenue Canada, the branch which deals with the enforcement, as it were, of our tax convention with West Germany, and some of those officials threw up their hands and said, if the West German authorities would only issue an assessment, they could act. So far, all they have done is to extract $200,000, and they have done nothing with it for nine years.

If tax conventions are to have any real substance and, indeed, prevent double taxation of Canadian residents or Canadian business enterprises—and they should surely be as much our concern as German residents and German business enterprises are the concern of Germany—we must see to it that the effects we wish to produce are in fact produced and that we do not fall into the trap of permitting one of the authorities to evade the real purpose and intent of the convention by never issuing a tax assessment against a Canadian taxpayer.

It is my hope that particular attention will be given in these negotiations of which the minister spoke, to the obvious way of avoiding the intent and purpose of our conventions with foreign nations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO SHORTEN PERIOD REQUIRED TO HOLD ELECTIONS

Hon. Pierre Bussières (for President of Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-58, to amend the Canada Elections Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

[English]

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise this evening before our Easter break to speak on behalf of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) on a bill, the sentiments behind which have long been with us; that is, to shorten the election period. I might remind members of the House that this bill is identical, I believe, to a bill presented by the former government, led by the right hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark). I am glad to see the House leader of the official opposition party in the House, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), as I believe it was he who introduced that bill in the previous Parliament.

The bill we are discussing is very short, but it proposes a very important change in our election practices. If passed, the bill will shorten the election period from 60 to 47 days. I am sure many of us in this House who have been through a number of election campaigns, will welcome this shortening of the election period. I have no doubt there will be easy passage of this bill after due consideration, because everyone, I am sure, is interested in the basic principle behind it which is, of course, to shorten the period by some 13 days.

You know, Mr. Speaker, that the shortening of the period will be accomplished by the dispensation of the practice of sending copies of the preliminary voters list to urban households. Instead, a printed notice of enumeration will be mailed to each electorate.

It is important to note that a change of this nature has been discussed for many years. During the last two elections campaigns there were more discussions than ever about the length of the election period.

It is not only parliamentarians who have been concerned about this. I should like to draw your attention to the fact that the Chamber of Commerce, for example, has said that the two-month campaign means—and I am paraphrasing now—that public business is interrupted for quite an extended period. The chamber requested at its 1980 annual meeting that serious consideration be given, when the Canada Elections Act was next before the House for amendment, to shortening the election period.

Many others have contended that our drawn-out election campaigns have not allowed people to focus on the main issues and policies. Instead, public interest is lost and many people are not sufficiently well informed by the time the election date arrives. You may also remember that back in 1973 this House passed amendments to the Canada Elections Act dealing with election expenses. One of the provisions of that amendment was to limit paid advertising by parties to 29 days, I believe, before election day.

The effect of this in the 1979 and 1980 election campaign—because that particular provision was not in effect in 1974—was one of limiting the general focus of the public on the election itself. I am sorry, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton did not understand me.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What did you say?

Mr. Collenette: It was my contention that by restricting the paid election advertising to the last 29 days before an election—I think it was the last 29 days—the public's focus has, I believe, narrowed, so that in effect we do have what amounts to a four or five-week campaign.

What we are saying in this bill is: let us give it some statutory limitation; let us conform to what is in fact becoming a reality, a reality which has occurred because we amended this act previously to take into account the election expenses provisions, which I believe worked quite well in the 1979 and 1980 election and in the byelections since 1976.

During recent elections another form of complaint has also been heard. This complaint concerns the practice of sending copies of the printed preliminary voting list to urban electors. This concerns women particularly. I know my friends on the other side, who have shown a great interest in women's concerns during the constitutional debate, especially my friends in the New Democratic Party, will take this into account in considering the reduction in the length of the election campaign. Many women living alone feel that the voters lists, which are also posted in public places, receive far too wide a circulation. The name, address and sex of each person who has been enumerated are displayed on these posted lists. This information is also available to every person within a polling division, since the printed preliminary list is mailed to each household where the people have been enumerated. Thus, it is possible to find out who lives in all the houses nearby or in all the apartments in a building. It is a simple matter to determine from the list, for example, where there are women living alone. Recently many women's groups have passed resolutions opposing the practice of sending out the preliminary lists. The Canadian Federation of University Women, with a membership of 12,109 people across the country, passed a resolution to this effect at its annual meeting in August, 1980. Various police groups have also stated that they feel the wide circulation given to the lists is a security risk to many people. The bill, if passed, would help to alleviate these sorts of complaints, in addition to shortening the election period. To many people, a change in the practice of mailing preliminary voters' lists is as important, if not more so, than a reduction in the length of the election period.

● (2110)

I speak from personal knowledge. Not only was I on the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections from 1976 to 1978 when we were discussing amendments to the Canada Elections Act—and I heard the concerns of the chief electoral officer on this point—but as one who represents an urban constituency in metropolitan Toronto, 50 per cent of which is composed of apartments, I realize this particular problem must be dealt with. I wish the situation would be otherwise, but we must change the Canada Elections Act so that we do not put fear into the hearts of many of our female citizens who do not like the publicity which is now being afforded by these lists.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the provisions of the bill, I should like to review the facts that have led us to introduce these amendments. I have already mentioned some of the criticisms which this legislation would silence. I must also point out that the possibility of shortening the period required to hold a general election has already been considered by the Privy Council's privileges committee. The Chief Electoral Officer submitted a report on ways likely to shorten the election period in which he considered various ways to reduce the time required for drawing up lists of electors.

I noticed that almost all our government colleagues are here tonight and that we have two women members here, but all members opposite are well aware that one of the reasons why our elections are so long is that new lists of electors are drawn up at every election. Many countries do not do this. They use what are called permanent lists or continuing election records.

In his 1975 report, the Chief Electoral Officer did an excellent study on the use of such lists and records. The permanent lists are drawn up or updated once a year only. They have the advantage of being ready as soon as an election is called, but they can also be several months old and be outdated and thus deprive of the right to vote many otherwise eligible voters whose name does not appear on the lists. But on the other hand, the records can be changed at any time or very soon after publication of the writ of election. Both methods are costly because they require permanent or semi-permanent administrative systems to compile and update the lists. In his 1975 report, the Chief Electoral Officer estimated at about $30 million a year the cost of having a system of electoral files which could be regularly updated until an election was held. Of course, the cost would now be much higher.

[English]

After reviewing the pros and cons of some form of permanent voters' list, the chief electoral officer suggested that a substantial shortening of the election period could be achieved by eliminating the practice of printing and distributing copies of the preliminary voters' lists to urban electors.

Typesetting and printing these lists by traditional methods is a time-consuming and costly process. It was suggested that voters could be informed of the fact that they are on the list by a notice of enumeration sent to each household. Candidates would still be provided with photocopies of the preliminary lists. The Chief Electoral Officer pointed out in his report that this rather simple change in our election practices could shorten the election period to 47 days in all.

I think 47 days is quite a considerable period of time, especially when we consider the modern age in which we live with mass communications and jet travel. I realize this will impose certain hardships on rural ridings, and I see a couple of members tonight who have particularly large northern ridings. But it is our contention that 47 days would be sufficient in which to conduct the election period.

The Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections discussed the report of the Chief Electoral Officer at several meetings in 1976. After extensive questioning and debate, it became clear that the members of the committee did not think the introduction of permanent lists or a continuous electoral roll would be desirable at that time. However, there was considerable support in the committee for the idea of shortening the election period through the elimination of the printing of preliminary lists, as provided in this bill.

On March 23, 1976, a motion to that effect was agreed to in committee. At a later meeting on April 1, 1976, a second motion was passed. In that second motion, the committee recommended that even if the government decided not to reduce the election period, consideration should be given to eliminating the printing of preliminary lists for the reasons we have stated.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is important to remember that the bill under consideration takes into account the recommendations which were discussed at length both in a committee of the House and among the general public. It is also appropriate to mention that Bill C-58 is nearly identical to Bill C-21 which was introduced and tabled on November 5, 1979, on behalf of the previous government by my colleague for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the House leader of the official opposition. Only a few very slight technical changes have been made to this bill.

I hope that my colleagues opposite will support the principle of this bill and examine it seriously in the committee. Bill C-58 proposes two major changes in our election practices. First, it will reduce the election period to a minimum of 47 days, which will substantially shorten the length of election campaigns which have lasted something less than 60 days these last few years. A provision of the bill would guarantee a minimum of 11 complete days between the announcement of an election and the beginning of enumeration. In recent elections, according to many people, time has often been very short to recruit and train enumerators. The Chief Electoral Officer has noted for instance that, in 1979, something less than six days passed between the announcement of the election and the beginning of the enumeration. A lapse of eleven days before enumeration would allow the organizations of candidates to recruit enumerators and the returning officers to make these enumerators more familiar with the important work entrusted to them.

The second major change proposed under Bill C-58 will be to stop sending the preliminary lists to the electors. As I have just said it takes a lot of time to print those lists by traditional methods and that is one of the reasons why the electoral periods have always been so long. Instead of the lists the bill proposes that a card be sent to each enumerated voter.

Besides confirming to the elector that his or her name appears on the list this card would provide information on the revision of the lists, the location of the voting poll and the possibility of voting before election day. I should point out that this card would be sent to all electors whether they be in urban or rural ridings. Under current legislation the preliminary voters lists mailed to urban households give among other things the location of the poll, the revision procedures and other detailed information which is not made available to rural riding residents. The bill will help to do away with that serious and long-lasting anomaly.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to make a small number of changes in our election practices. These are not new ideas; they have been studied and discussed since 1976. As I have mentioned, following the past two federal elections, many groups and individual citizens have spoken out in favour of a Canada elections act along the lines of what is contained in this bill.

The government presents this bill in the hope that it will receive support from all parties. The members on the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections will, no doubt, study this bill in great detail. I know that they will be assisted in their work by the chief electoral officer, whose 1975 report has helped us greatly in trying to see if there are ways in which our election campaigns could be shortened. The Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections may want to suggest changes in Bill C-58, but I sincerely hope that we will be able to bring into effect the changes which are being proposed. As elected members, we must constantly strive to maintain the public's confidence in our electoral process.

I am sure, given the fact that the previous Liberal government, the previous Conservative government and now the present government have all agreed with the principle contained in this bill, that all members will give it speedy passage through the House of Commons so that when we do engage in the next election campaign we will be conducting it in a much more realistic time period of 47 days. I think that will probably bring us more into line with most other countries in the free world which have elections, even those large countries such as the United States, Australia, or other countries like them.

Mr. Knowles: The United States takes a year!

Mr. Collenette: My friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), says that the United States takes a year. Perhaps the U.S. is not the best example. It seemed to me that the campaign in the United States really took place only in the last six weeks before election day.

In any event, in many provincial jurisdictions the period is much shorter. We have just gone through an election campaign in Quebec which took about four weeks, I believe, and a 37-day campaign in Ontario. I think we will all be doing ourselves and the people of Canada a great favour by giving this bill speedy passage through the House.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would entertain a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That would necessitate the unanimous agreement of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Wright: Can the parliamentary secretary tell us about all the people who have spoken out about this matter? Who are they? Do we have it in writing? Are they in this House? Who are all these people who have spoken out about a change in the elections legislation?

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, it is for this precise reason that we need to give speedy passage at second reading to this bill and refer it to the committee, so that the minister who will be present before the committee can answer questions such as the one asked by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Wright). It is a very reasonable question but it is one which should not be spoken to in the context of the debate on second reading when we are dealing with the principle of the bill, but rather, when it is before the committee.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take part in this debate. At the outset I would like to express concern and disappointment in that the parliamentary secretary did not see fit to answer what I thought was a reasonably straightforward question which might have expedited this matter.

He raised a point in the House which at the outset I would like to address, that is, that this bill—and I think I quote him—"would go a long way to increase the confidence in the electoral process". With respect, I dissent. Certainly the purpose of the bill is not to increase the confidence in the electoral process. The bill has absolutely nothing to do with increasing the confidence in the electoral process. I think my good friend the parliamentary secretary overspeaks himself. I find there is a great deal of confidence in the electoral process.

One of the reasons for this bill is precisely one of the things that this bill would cease if it were passed. It is something upon which I have reflected. My friend was absolutely right when he said that I had the privilege of introducing a bill much the same as this one. There have been some changes made to it. I must say to him that at the time I had concerns with respect to the bill and I am now glad that the House will have an opportunity to reflect upon those concerns. One of these concerns is the fact that we have a system in place, in the electoral sense, in which the people do have confidence. That is one thing in which they do have confidence, although they are sometimes a bit shattered by the results of an election. I have spoken to many people who have confidence in the electoral system who find themselves, at the end of an election, saddled with a government which has broken every promise but one. That happens to be the promise about the price of oil. You will recall that one, Mr. Speaker. I see you smiling—you do recall that. Some of us in the country would urge the government to break that one last promise and get it over with so we can settle the impasse which exists in the country with respect to energy pricing. But that is said as an aside.

The process itself is open. It is governed by excellent officials. It ensures not only who people are but it ensures that neighbours, friends, political workers, candidates, official agents and everyone involved in the process who should be on the list is on the list. This is a result of the circulation of the list, the very thing that this bill, if it is passed in its present form, would eliminate. The list is compiled and circulated for a good reason; that is, to ensure the open and notorious aspect of our public elections. I recognize the balance and the concerns that my friend has spoken about; but this does become a balancing of the concerns. I care a lot about the process. It may be that we can accomplish the shortening of elections without eliminating the open and notorious aspect of them. That is why I am disturbed, with the reflection of time, that the bill is so narrow and that we have not yet addressed what was in the Speech from the Throne about electoral reform.

Everyone will recall that Speech from the Throne. I am sure we all recall the promises in it about great things which would be done for the country economically and socially. There would be electoral reform. Remember those words? They talked about proportional representation. We were supposed to deal with that. We were supposed to reform the institutions of Parliament to make them more responsive. We were going to look at the whole electoral process to ensure that all parts of the country were represented. Quite frankly, I am disappointed that what is brought forth here is a bill on a very narrow point taken out of another government's legislative program and dealing with only one aspect of it; that is, the shortening of election campaigns.

In the course of his speech my friend relied to a great extent, on the period of time for elections in provinces. We all know they are much shorter. I have a list of them here in front of me, but I will not deal with them in detail. It seems to me that the most extensive period of time is in British Columbia, which is about 38 days. I am not at all surprised that provinces have shorter periods of time for elections. I am not the least bit surprised about that. There are ten of them in the country, and they vary in size, complexity, geography, weather, and all the kinds of conditions which affect you and I, Mr. Speaker, as candidates in getting around from place to place to meet real people whom we ask to send us to Parliament. They all have that variation. However, the great difference between a provincial election and a federal election is that, notwithstanding the aeroplane, the automobile, and all the modern means of communication, the problem is multiplied ten times in a national election. So I think for that reason we ought to reflect very carefully on that bill.

As a person who advanced a bill on behalf of the government, I say that we ought to reflect very carefully with respect to that bill before we rush headlong to approve it. It must be explored quite deeply because this House of Commons is an interesting place. My friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette), told us that he represents the riding of York East in which apartment buildings predominate. He said that about 50 per cent of his riding is made up of apartment buildings. Most of the people in his riding, or at least half of his riding, have chosen to go upwards rather than outwards. So, relatively speaking, it makes it quite an easy and uncomplicated task for a member of Parliament or for a candidate in an urban area to deal with that constituency within a short period of time.

However, as people within a riding begin to spread out, and if one moves into suburban ridings, the circumstances may be different. If one goes into rural ridings, there may be even a greater problem. If one goes into the north, where there are great distances to cover and where aeroplanes are required to travel within the riding and covering those distances takes time, then a new set of problems arises which we must accommodate.

We accommodate diversities of language, we accommodate diversities of racial groups, and we accommodate regional diversities within Canada. There are electoral diversities which we must consider as well.

Quite frankly these are matters which cross my mind as I consider that bill. We never did reach that bill in the course of the last Parliament. I am just as happy we did not because of the differences which there are in the country. I am not suggesting that this bill will not ultimately pass, but I do not think we should rush headlong into it. I believe that hon. members who represent different kinds of constituencies have different sorts of electoral problems and should have an opportunity to speak in the debate, because the interesting thing about electoral reform in the House of Commons is that we have usually done it in consultation with each other.

The whole Election Expenses Act was an exercise in mutal assistance as the opposition and the government worked together to produce what I consider to be in principle—it is always subject to change from time to time—a masterpiece in the political process. It is that because all kinds of hon. members participated in that election.

It is no argument to say that this bill follows naturally from the provisions of the Election Expenses Act which requires that advertising begin only after the election campaign has been in process for a period of time. Paid advertising may be placed in newspapers, on television and on the radio only in the last 29 days of an election campaign.

I think the general public will agree with me when I say that 29 days is sufficient time. In terms of financing elections, 29 days is too much, however, in terms of the impact upon the public, I guess that 29 days is enough. People complain to us all the time about their favourite programs being pre-empted and how the election ads in the newspapers and over the radio in their automobiles and in their kitchens as they are working have interfered with their usual listening habits, yet this is all part of getting the message across. But the message is enough. However, if my friend is justifying shortening the election period by using the argument of the shortness of the advertising period, then, I say, with respect, he is comparing apples and oranges. I do not think one necessarily flows from the other. My reason is this. The kinds of advertising I am talking about, the paid advertising, is usually done in Canada on a national party basis. Even the leaders of the party depend upon that. The theme of the campaign, the theme of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the theme of the contender to the job of the Prime Minister is usually done on a national basis. I do not know about you, Mr. Speaker, but within my budget I cannot reasonably afford, in an election campaign under the Election Expenses Act, to have television advertising. I am sure you cannot afford it. I cannot afford to have the giant ads running in the newspapers. I cannot afford radio advertising, except for a very small part of the campaign, nor can any private hon. member in this House do so, because we are all governed by very strict expense provisions, and so be it. It is right that it should be so. This is not a complaint, it is a fact. This is not supposed to be anything else than the House of Commons.

However, what I can do, and what that time allows me as a candidate and everyone in this room to do is to build up, to augment or to develop an organization that works. Where is it, you may ask. Where the people are, on the street. In the context of an election, it allows me as a candidate, or anyone who stands for public office, the time within the election campaign, not to fly over the riding, not to drive through the riding in a motorcade, but to get out in the street and meet the people and to carry on the work that one should do in this business between elections, but to do it within the election context, when the public mind is focused on the election. That is the importance of time, whether it be in an urban or a suburban constituency.

That is why I think all of us should think very carefully about what we are doing. If we represent rural ridings then there may be another set of problems with which I am only partially familiar. However, they are there. It takes time. There are members now sitting on both sides of this House who represent rural constituencies and who know how much time it takes to go up and down the concession roads, to get out of your car, because one cannot canvass those houses on foot, and go out to meet the farmer, his wife and the members of his family, to get back in your car and get on your way again. No one who has not done it can quite understand the problems. But it all takes time.

I know that our society is becoming urbanized and we are centralizing in cities. But, whatever we do in terms of accommodating potential members of the House of Commons, we must, I think, accommodate the differences which arise with respect to this matter. That is why I do not think we should rush into this adopting this measure and saying it is the greatest thing since sliced bread, because it is not. There will be opinions expressed in the course of this election which will indicate that to the people.

I talked about sending out the lists. I realize there are problems. The parliamentary secretary mentioned some problems that have been brought to my attention, but, I confess, not as forcibly as they may have been brought to his. Even when I was in charge of that bill in the other government, I was not deluged with complaints about the operation of that act. I think we should perhaps work on changing the list and the form of the list. This might be helpful in shortening it.

Why should lists be sent out? It is part of the openness of the election system. It is part of telling people that they are part of a community and who else is in that community. It allows people who live on the street to know who lives up the street and to deal with them on a much more personal basis. It also assists the people who work for parties to assess whether someone who is on the list should be there or whether someone who is not on the list should be on it. It allows friends and neighbours to help others.

Its most important quality is its openness. When only a small number of the lists is produced and they are sent around to only a few people, that has the effect of treating some citizens differently from others. I think in an open election where every vote counts, and only counts once, and every voter is treated equally, they should be treated equally in every part of the process. That is the reason for the list and that is the reason we ought not to move quickly just in order to save some money.

When this bill goes to committee, I hope we will look, for the first time in this Parliament, at the matter of a permanent voters' list. I know this would be expensive but it would be a valuable adjunct to our system. I know it would mean that a number of people would have to be employed to do this, but I think it would be worth while considering, so that we could make sure that the process is as responsive as it possibly can be.

There is another point about the shortened election which some of us, and perhaps most of us in this House, do not think about. That is that it favours incumbents. It is very easy for us to pass on that and say that we should shorten the election but, in effect, it favours the incumbent. I often wonder if that is fair. I look at some of our practices and wonder if they are fair. I think we have to consider that a short time favours the incumbent. If we are to make the process open and if we are to make sure that it is open to everybody on more or less an equal basis, then we must examine every proposal that comes forward to make sure, whether it is with respect to our constituency offices or anything at all, that we do not favour ourselves as incumbents, even if we do so inadvertently. Even if we do that with the best intentions, I think the shortened election campaign favours the incumbent, and we ought to look at it from that point of view.

There are other hon. members who want to speak on this, Mr. Speaker. I said at the outset that I thought it was important that the bill be brought forward if the government thinks it should be. It is regrettable that it is not considered in the context of a host of other things that we should look at in terms of the election, but there is time to do that. There is no great rush that I know of to shorten the election to 47 days unless my hon. friend knows something that I do not. There is time for us to consider not just this little narrow point—and that is all it is, the narrow point—but some of the broader things that our members will be speaking about as the debate goes on.

It is a way of improving the process, not just for those of us who are here but for everyone who might want to be here and to ensure that it is open to everyone else. That is the spirit in which we will approach this debate. It will allow us as Members of Parliament on all sides to speak to the differences that there are in this country. There is a tendency for us to forget the broadness and diversity of the country from time to time.

One thing that being a Member of Parliament of Canada has allowed most of us to do is to get to know our country better and to realize that the issues of Prince Edward Island, say, are different from the issues that concern British Columbia, the prairies or central Canada. We also learn that the conditions are different, the solutions are different and that the law can apply differently, to discriminate among the different regions of the country. If that is the type of thing we have to avoid, I hope there will be expressions from all sides of the House about how this bill will affect the regions from which members come, the constituencies which are different and the problems which are different.

This is a blanket piece of legislation, whether your constituency happens to be in British Columbia, Ontario, downtown Toronto or somewhere north of sixty. That is the proposition we are going to apply to the whole diverse country of Canada. That is the spirit in which we will approach this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) told us at a House leaders' meeting that he proposed to bring forward this bill, I confess that I made an immediate and personal response. I said, what about making it retroactive for the last 16 elections? I have done a little arithmetic and realize that it would have added quite a bit to my life if we could have taken out 13 days from each of the last 16 federal elections in which I have been a candidate. Although that statement makes the point that candidates are concerned about the length of the election, the people who have the greatest interest are the voters of Canada. What we have to come to is a judgment on whether they like elections that last eight or nine weeks or whether they would like them a little shorter. I believe that the general view is that our election campaigns are too long; that they are such that toward the end of the campaign many people lose interest or feel that the same arguments are being thrown back and forth among the contending parties, and if we could cut the time by a couple of weeks it would be better for the process.

I agree with my hon. friend, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), that there is no final arbitrator who can say what length of time would be best. I suppose we cannot really tell until we have tried the shorter as well as the longer. But I express the view, that as I see it the people of Canada would approve of shortening the election campaign.

I remember that in 1979, after we had gone out of here, the House having been dissolved, the British Parliament was also dissolved. They held an election and their Parliament sat again while we were still out on the hustings. I know that the area of Great Britain is minuscule compared with ours, but that country has twice as many people and elects twice as many members as we do. It also has had twice as much experience as we have had with electing members to a democratic Parliament.

• (2150)

My friend across the way said his face turned red when he was talking about shorter elections. Thank God we do not have the United States system which results in elections lasting for about a year at a time. As a matter of fact, I sometimes wonder about the sense of their electing members to the House of Representatives for a term of only two years when they campaign for about a year. When do they get down to business? At any rate, it seems to me that we would improve the process if we had a shorter period. After all, the proposal in this bill for 47 days does not make it extremely short. It is still longer than any of the elections held in any of the provinces. However, I would hope the idea might be given some consideration.

Let me say right away that I agree with the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton that this is a matter which should be arrived at by consensus. This has been the practice about amendments to the Canada Elections Act down through the years. We usually wait a few months after an election, sometimes into the second session. But we are now into the second year, even if we are not into the second session. At any rate whatever changes are made, they are studied very carefully in committee, and I hope we will find a way to adopt that practice in so far as this matter is concerned.

I say with respect to my colleagues in the New Democratic Party that the same differences exist among their ridings as those to which the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton referred in his remarks. After all, I have a constituency that I can walk around in a few hours. I believe it measures about eight square miles. On the other hand, my friend, the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar), has an area which is larger than 15 or 20 countries in some parts of the world. Then there is my friend from Churchill and my friend from Skeena with large distances to cover in their ridings. There are others who have these far-flung ridings. As a matter of fact, you do not have to go to the north to find far-flung ridings. In the heart of Manitoba there is the constituency of Selkirk-Interlake. And so it goes. It is only natural that with these different conditions members will have different views.

I may say also there is some concern about what is to be done with respect to the lists. I believe there have been meetings among the bureaucrats of our various parties, persons who are not members of the House at all but who get called into action when there is an election. They have some joint concerns, and these matters could well be looked at by the committee. But I feel very strongly that these differences of views and the need for consensus and the need to study the details of this bill and even to consider other ways to achieve a shorter election period should not stop us from going ahead with this matter.

I gather from what my friend, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, said, that there are other members in his party who wish to speak, so that my sitting down now or my sitting down at one minute to ten o'clock would not result in the bill receiving second reading tonight. I see that opinion confirmed by the nod of the head from my friend from Nepean-Carleton.

I hope there might be some interparty consultation about this, maybe among the House leaders or maybe among the persons most concerned, in our parties. I hesitate to make the following suggestion, but I throw it into the pot along with all of the others, namely, that if it is felt that some of the details in the bill are not quite what some members want, then maybe instead of sending the bill to committee we could send the subject matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. My hon. friend from Nepean-Carleton says he does not think there is any hurry. That is what he thought on December 10 or December 11 a year ago. He knows what happened then.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You thought there was a hurry and you know what happened.

Mr. Knowles: There probably is not a situation like that one now, but time does have a way of going on. Just because the next election may not be until 1984 or 1985, that does not mean we have all kinds of time. This is 1981, and time marches on.

I hope in one way or the other that we will convey this idea of a shorter election period to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections so it can be considered there. I expressed the view that I think the judgment of the people of Canada will be with us, in other words, that a shorter election would be better for the process. That, of course, does not set aside all of the other things in the process to which my hon. friend referred. That does not set aside the extreme importance of the result of the election, but as between a long-drawn-out election of about nine weeks and an election of about seven weeks, I believe the preference of the people of Canada would be for the shorter election.

Therefore, I speak in support of the principle of the bill, although, as I say, our colleagues on the committee will want to go into the various details of it. I hope that before we are finished with this bill we will have arrangements for a shorter and more compact election period the next time members are sent out onto the hustings.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Essex-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I might indicate at the outset that I have to concur with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he indicated his belief in his reading of the electorate generally with respect to the time during which elections are held in Canada. I would like to think as well that my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), when he was expressing his concerns with respect to the lists, had not overlooked the other principles in the bill, in particular the reduction of the time period, and that there would be some concurrence in his mind as well. I notice he nods his head affirmatively that the principle of reducing the time period from what has been the historic practice in Canada to something shorter, perhaps to 47 days, which has no magic to it, but is an attempt to reflect the concerns of the electorate generally, has, up to this point, been viewed as being too long.

With respect to my other hon. friend who asked the parliamentary secretary where the concerns about the elections had come from, I ask him to recall the last campaign. Perhaps he might remember that even his campaign workers, particularly during the last two or three weeks of the campaign, heard comments that people really felt they had heard it all before. Television and radio announcements and comments at various all-party meetings and all-candidates meetings were old hat. People had had the opportunity already to reflect on the issues being put forward by the various party leaders. They were already in a position to express themselves and needed no further time to do so.

My hon. friend from Nepean-Carleton pointed out that there are distinctions and differences with respect to various ridings. It is interesting that three of us speaking this evening come from Ontario, and yet all three of us represent ridings which are rather different in their makeup. The first speaker, my colleague, the parliamentary secretary, represents a riding which is essentially densely populated by high rise towers but spreads out hardly at all. My colleague from Nepean-Carleton represents a riding which perhaps spreads out somewhat farther but does not have as many high rises as the riding of York East. My riding, out of a total number of 180 and some odd polls, has only 20 urban polls in the whole riding. With respect to the rural areas and the necessity for the openness and notoriety of the lists, my hon. friend from Nepean-Carleton points out a difference. I want to put something on the record on which I ask my hon. friends to reflect. My urban friends consider that the stability of the population in rural ridings is a benefit.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to impinge upon the time of the House, but I know you can make an allowance. I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council the business that we will be dealing with tomorrow. What are the intentions of the government with respect to the balance of this week? If he could answer those two questions it would be helpful to all of us.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I know that all members would like to work diligently on Thursday and Monday, but we feel that members deserve a rest. Therefore, it is the government's intention to call tomorrow Bill C-61, the Young Offenders Act. Hopefully we can rise tomorrow night for the Easter weekend.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

MARINE TRANSPORT—NORTH SYDNEY, N.S. TO ARGENTIA, NFLD. FERRY SERVICE

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise with reference to an answer to a question given to me yesterday by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). The minister has developed a policy which is even more punishing to Atlantic Canada and Canadians who are dependent upon transportation than his predecessor, Otto Lang. Mr. Lang excelled in the user-pay principle, but the present minister has come up with a new principle. Transportation needs are to be decided on something called the multimodal principle.

There is a transportation envelope for each province and there have to be trade-offs within that envelope for each province. In other words, he has said that the transportation envelope for Newfoundland will be $210 million a year. To give one example, he said to the Newfoundland government that if they want money spent on the Trans-Canada highway and other roads in Newfoundland this year, or on any transportation service, they will get it by permitting us to discontinue some service now being provided to Newfoundland.

The service the minister has chosen is the ferry service in summer from North Sydney to Argentia in Placentia Bay. He said eliminating this ferry service will save $8 million to $9 million a year. The Newfoundland government and people can then decide what other transportation mode they want it spent on. That is the new policy. The new minister is the Jack the Ripper of Canadian transportation policy, Jean-Luc the Ripper.

With the discontinuance of the Argentia-North Sydney ferry service, 300 jobs would be lost in Newfoundland. The minister is from central Canada where they have all the modes of transportation they need. All modes are efficient modes and they have been built up over 100 years. However, in the Atlantic provinces we do not have satisfactory multimodes or any mode of transportation.

In the envelope for Newfoundland, the minister is including the Cabot Strait ferry service which is required by the terms of union. Presumably he is including all road spending, the Trans-Canada Highway, the subsidies for the coastal steamship service, subsidies on the shipping service by Clark from Montreal to St. John's, the new shipping service from St. John's to Goose Bay where there is a CN marine scandal because they gave the contract under false tendering practices to a Liberal friend, Mr. Woodward of Coastal Shipping Limited, a contract which is now being investigated.

They are including airport spending in Newfoundland, the Newfoundland railway expenditure, VIA Rail bus service across Newfoundland, ferry service to Bell Island, St. Barbe to Blanc-Sablon, Change Islands and so on. They are including navigational service, the marine traffic control centres, ferry services. All these services are included in this envelope.

The people of Newfoundland are told that if they want an improvement in the Trans-Canada highway, their airport services, coastal steamship services and ferry services, they have to permit the government to discontinue spending somewhere else.

The Sullivan royal commission on transportation in Newfoundland did not recommend discontinuance of the Argentia to North Sydney service. They suggested that it continue with improvements. I want to point out to the minister that the MacPherson royal commission of 1961 said that the situation in Newfoundland, "Is a special case distinct from the rest of Canada". But the minister wants to take us in Newfoundland, ignore this special situation and say that we are going to be treated in the same multimodal, trade-off, envelope way as Ontario, Quebec or the rest of Canada. Well, it will not work, and the people of Newfoundland will not accept it, the municipal councils will not accept it, the people of the Argentia-Placentia area will not accept it, I will not accept it, the Newfoundland government will not accept it, and if the five Liberal MPs who represent other Newfoundland districts here in this House accept it and promote it, they will go down to defeat in the next election, believe me, Mr. Speaker. We are not going to accept it.

• (2205)

We traded off a number of years ago the railway passenger service in Newfoundland. It was a trade-off to get the federal government to assist in spending on the Trans-Canada highway. What we got in return was a bus service from St. John's to Port aux Basques that is inferior in many ways. It never satisfactorily replaced the rail service.

I urge the minister to stop this approach to Newfoundland. We need all of the modes improved in Newfoundland, not one mode set off against the other, not less spending on one if you want more spending on the other. The minister has sunk the synchrolift at the urging of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey). He terminated the Trans-Canada highway agreement. We do not know if he is going to start it again. He is teasing Torbay airport, doing relatively little for it. He has harpooned the harbour improvements in St. John's. This minister is a veritable Jean-Luc the Ripper. That may be all right here in central Canada and Toronto, but even in Toronto he proposes spending $300 million over the next ten years in improvements to the Toronto airport, doubtless needed. I agree that that is a needed expenditure. I will not even mention Mirabel. But he is down gutting our little province saying there is a $210 million transportation envelope, as though this was a gigantic amount when it is very, very little when you divide it among air services, coastal services, ferry services, marine services, water carrier services and the many needs of a province of 48,000 square miles on the island and 110,000 square miles on the mainland of Labrador, with all that implies in scattered communities and transportation needs.

I am asking the minister now—he has affirmed that the Argentia to North Sydney ferry service will continue this summer—to drop this kind of policy in Newfoundland, to make available to Newfoundland perhaps another $80 million to $90 million to enter into a Trans-Canada highway strengthening agreement. The highway is in a desperate condition. We need another three-year agreement, 75 per cent-25 per cent from the federal government. Stop trying to impose this new idea of trade-offs with the people of Newfoundland.

He is going to make Cape Breton suffer, by the way. The representative from North Sydney is in the chamber tonight, and if he wants to help his area in North Sydney, he will do his best to see that this ferry service is not discontinued.

So I hope the parliamentary secretary when he answers tonight will tell me that this ludicrous proposal is going to be dropped, because if it is not dropped, the howl of outrage and protest from Newfoundland is going to give that gentleman quite a lot to do. He will have to do a lot of travelling in Newfoundland this year.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member gets more alarmed about these issues, let me assure him that no decision has been made either with respect to terminating the Argentia ferry or with respect to a new highway strengthening program.

I realize that in the first case he does not want a decision and in the second case he does. It should be some comfort to him at least that the Argentia ferry is assured of sailing as usual this summer.

As the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has been at pains to explain to him, what is happening is a series of discussions with the province of Newfoundland and the other Atlantic provinces aimed at finding the best uses for the limited amount of federal money available.

The hon. member seems to get terribly excited when the minister mentions the idea of an envelope and trade-offs. This reaction is quite remarkable, since the hon. member himself spawned the idea.

When the hon. member asked the question yesterday, he said that "the people of Newfoundland know what the minister is trying to do to them, eliminate a service here and then spend the money somewhere else". I would like to quote from a document I happen to have on file. It describes a new system for controlling government spending. It says that the system:

—is intended to focus attention on the hard choices to be made and the trade-offs among alternative policy actions.

• (2210)

It talks about the need to "establish known limits". It says that "the creation of resource envelopes is central to the new system".

Perhaps the hon. member recognizes the document. He should, because he tabled it in the House in December of 1979 when he was minister of finance. So all this is really a great compliment to him. The Minister of Transport recognizes the value of the system proposed by the hon. member and is doing his best to implement it rapidly.

MARINE TRANSPORTATION—WITHDRAWAL OF DART CONTAINERLINE SERVICE FROM HALIFAX—HOLDING OF INQUIRY

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, on March 12, 1981, I had the opportunity to address some questions to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) in respect of the withdrawal of Dart Containerline service from the port of Halifax.

My main concern at that time was twofold. First I wanted to ask the minister whether he was in fact ordering an inquiry under the Canadian Transport Commission into the withdrawal of Dart Containerline service from the port of Halifax and, second, I wanted him to consider the role of the Crown agencies, the Canadian National Railways and the National Harbours Board, in relation to the operation of container services in the port of Halifax and the port of Montreal. I was concerned, as were many people in the port of Halifax, that the CNR, in conjunction with the activities of the National Harbours Board, had permitted this removal of Dart from the port of Halifax to the benefit of the port of Montreal.

The minister, much to my surprise, indicated that there was to be no such inquiry under the National Transportation Act of the kind we in Nova Scotia had envisaged. In fact, the Premier of Nova Scotia, the Hon. John Buchanan who had been in Ottawa a few days before, had spoken to the Minister of Transport, and had come away with the impression that there was to be a general inquiry into the activities of container traffic in the North Atlantic using both the ports of Montreal and Halifax, as well as other ports, including the port of Saint John. In fact, in relation to the matter of the inquiry, the minister was simply referring to Section 27 of the National Transportation Act which requires that when a railway company acquires an interest in a shipping company, the acquisition must be brought before the Canadian Transport Commission for examination and approval.

What is happening in this instance is that CP ships are acquiring, or are in the process of acquiring, an interest in Dart Containerline services, and it is the acquisition of that interest by CP ships that has attracted Dart to the port of Montreal.

This matter has to be reviewed by the Canadian Transport Commission, and that will be the subject matter of the inquiry. We do not know how broad that inquiry will be. It is very important for those of us who are interested in the port of Halifax to have the opportunity to present to the Canadian Transport Commission all the factors that have to be taken into account.

What is happening is this. The port of Montreal for the last number of years has been experiencing some difficulty in attracting the large container vessels which are now being employed in the North Atlantic and worldwide marine container traffic. Apparently this has resulted in severe difficulties for shipping companies like CP and Manchester Lines which have seen their north Atlantic traffic drop off. This is the motivation for those companies to become more active and aggressive in acquiring part of the north Atlantic container traffic and has led to moves such as the acquisition of an interest in Dart.

We are concerned because we who are interested in the port of Halifax see some sinister elements in this. In the first place, Canadian National Railways operates the only railway link between Halifax, Montreal and other westward points. The Canadian National Railways last fall, in accordance with an agreement drawn up some years before, acquired an interest in the CAST shipping group. This is an equity interest. It makes CN an owner in the CAST shipping group. It has the right, under its agreements, to acquire a very substantial ownership in the CAST shipping group.

This has caused some concern among other shipping companies, such as Hapag Lloyd, as well as Dart and other international marine transport companies. They are concerned that this unhealthy liaison between CNR and CAST may result in unfair competition to other north Atlantic carriers.

Many of us think that this is what motivated the move by DART to form a liaison with CP Ships. We think all of this ought to be reviewed very carefully and very closely by the Canadian Transport Commission. We are disappointed that the minister has not seen fit to exercise his authority and power under the act through the Canadian Transport Commission by holding a general inquiry to determine whether these activities—that is the liaison between CP Ships and Dart Containerline service, on the one hand, and the liaison between the CAST shipping group and the CNR on the other—are not detrimental to the public interest in terms of competition in international container traffic.

We are mainly concerned because of the great opportunity this gives the port of Montreal. This brings up the role of the National Harbours Board. We wonder what the National Harbours Board is up to. It appears that some time ago, with the help and co-operation of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), they were busily engaged in expanding very dramatically container terminals in the port of Montreal, both on behalf of the CAST group at the Task Terminal and on behalf of CP Ships in relation to the Racine Terminal. We wonder whether this was a plan and program to expand container traffic in the port of Montreal at the expense of the port of Halifax. We want and need an inquiry.

There are many people in Halifax associated with container traffic operations of Halterm and with the container traffic operations of CNR on the land side who say that no inquiry is necessary. I say to those people that what is happening is not in the best interest of the port of Halifax. It is an attempt to cover up what is going on. Those of us who are interested in the welfare of the port of Halifax want all facts to be brought before our national organization, the Canadian Transport Commission, so that everybody knows what is going on, everybody can see what is happening and can make their objections. It may well be that this whole move from the port of Halifax to the port of Montreal and the consolidation of container traffic within the port of Montreal are not in the Canadian interest. We want the minister to answer for that.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in the last month there have been several statements in the House on the subject of the hon. member's question. On March 10, I answered a late show question put by his colleague across the Halifax harbour. On March 17, during an opposition day debate, the minister went into considerable detail on the port of Halifax. So, tonight I will simply review the main points of this issue.

The minister indicated that he will not order an inquiry into the Dart move, but that several opportunities exist for those who wish to intervene formally in front of the Canadian Transport Commission.

At his meeting last month with Premier Buchanan, the minister agreed to undertake some further study into the questions of rail freight rates and icebreaking services on the St. Lawrence. But he pointed out that increases in Halifax-Montreal freight rates over the last ten years were considerably smaller than increases in comparable rates and clearly smaller than increases in the consumer price index. The cost of icebreaking services, to the extent that they could be assessed, would represent a negligible impact on the flow of container traffic.

The other aspect which has been raised is the question of port charges. It is a fact that harbour dues, berthage and wharfage charges are identical for all east coast ports. So there is no discrimination against Halifax. In fact, Halterm enjoys a 50 per cent rebate from the National Harbours Board on wharfage charges, a rebate which amounted to a subsidy of $1.8 million in 1980. It is true that the National Harbours Board intends to raise the land rental rate for Halterm, but Halterm has enoyed a fixed rate of 15 cents per square foot for ten years. The new rate has been determined in exactly the same manner for lessees at all NHB sites.

• (2220)

In summary, most people recognize that in spite of the move of Dart, the port of Halifax retains great promise. The president of Halterm, who stands to lose the most, has rejected the idea of government intervention, and the executive director of the Halifax-Dartmouth Port Commission has painted an optimistic picture of the port's future.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT—APPLICATION OF PROGRAM TO DEAL WITH REGIONAL INEQUALITIES

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my participation in this evening's proceedings arise out of a question which I asked of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on February 12, 1981. It concerned the designation of the manufacturers' tax credit program which was announced in the budget of last October. The criteria which have been used to determine the base for that program is what I was specifically questioning. I felt it was particularly pertinent that there were several areas in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and other regions of Atlantic Canada which qualified under the criteria that were made available to the House under the proposed program.

The fact of the matter is that apparently all of this is being managed under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, which has been in place for a number of years. In that regard I would like to draw a brief history of the program of DREE to the attention of the House, how it originated and what it was intended to accomplish, and then provide to the government a proposal which I think would be much more effective than that which, in my opinion, DREE has not been able to accomplish over the years that it has been in place.

Regional disparities, back in the 1950s, were recognized as being something the government should come to grips with. One of the first programs the government of the day implemented was a program of equalization payments. The purpose of these was to reduce to some extent the difficulties that regional disparities were creating in the country. There were a good many programs which developed after that, including the Agricultural and Rural Development Act, commonly known as ARDA, the Fund for Rural Economic Development, which was known as FRED, the Atlantic Development Board was created, the Area Development Incentives Act was brought before the House and, finally DREE was created.

The purpose of DREE at that stage was to co-ordinate the rest of these programs under one central authority. However, the principal purpose of DREE at that time was to concentrate on the development of those regions of the country which the government felt were in a state of regional disparity. Then after DREE was formed, it undertook an umbrella-like initiative, which included the Regional Development Incentives Act. This act was an inducement to manufacturers to locate in particular regions.

I suggest that DREE has been nothing more than a stop-gap department and it has provided nothing more than band-aid programs and band-aid assistance to certain regions of Canada which have not been long lasting or of any meaningful advantage to the area.

I would like to suggest to the government that people in Atlantic Canada—and I see here the parliamentary secretary from the Atlantic region who cares about what happens there and who will respond to what I am saying—would like to see something much more meaningful than the band-aid approach which has been promoted by DREE over the past several years. They would like to see something which will have a lasting effect. In this regard I would like to suggest that Atlantic Canada be set up as a specifically designated area by the federal government in its negotiations for special trade and tariff recognition in its agreement with the United States. We are geographically a part of that vast market of 48 million people—twice the size of Canada's population. There are 48 million people in New England who are our natural trading partners. If we were to develop a program which recognized the contribution that Atlantic Canada could make to the rest of Canada by giving a specific advantage to that area to manufacturers so that they would locate in that region for reasons of trade with the New England states, I believe that a lasting contribution could be made to Canada by Atlantic Canadians. It would withdraw them from the over-protective attitude of the government which seems to say, "Equalization payments will take care of all your needs", it would reduce the terrifically high unemployment there, and it would be something of lasting value for Atlantic Canada in its contribution to the prosperity and future development of Canada as a whole.

• (2225)

I think that is the approach which they should be taking rather than continuing on with what I refer to as band-aid programs.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, the minister has been asked many times by hon. members in this House why their constituencies have not been designated to receive the benefit of the Special Investment Tax Credit Program. I am beginning to derive considerable satisfaction from the importance they attach to this bold and innovative program. Most recently the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett) asked why more areas in New Brunswick had not qualified for this tax credit.

I will explain to him again the criteria that were used for designation. I will do so in order that he and other hon. members of the House will fully understand the justifiable bases on which these designations were made.

We, on this side, are concerned about people. We are concerned particularly about those who suffer the most economically, living as they do in areas where family unemployment rates are significantly above the national average and where per capita incomes are lowest in relation to the national average.

The Special Investment Tax Credit Program is designated to give these people a hand, by making it worth while for successful and profitable firms to locate in these areas and to provide them with the employment and other economic opportunities that they have lacked for so long.

But we are also cognizant of the need for fiscal restraint. Therefore, with reluctance, we decided to limit the benefits of the program to the 5 per cent of the Canadian population most in need.

It will be obvious to the hon. member opposite, and to others, that not all areas of Canada, and particularly not all of the Atlantic region, could be designated in the light of this contraint. Being from the Atlantic region, I would like to see more parts of it designated, but obviously this would not be equitable in relation to needs elsewhere.

● (2230)

The first point I would like to make in response to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal is that I, too, would like to see other parts of New Brunswick designated. Perhaps this will be possible in the future if the optimism which the hon. member holds for this program, and which I share, materializes in the form of proven success.

The second point I would like to make is that the SITCP is an incentive program. It is a challenge to the private sector to create jobs. But mostly it is a challenge to create jobs in areas where the need is greatest.

The member for Fundy-Royal has asked why more areas were not designated in New Brunswick. The answer is simple.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

At 10.31 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF REFUGEE STATUS TO TIBETANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to introduce the following motion. Whereas the Government of Canada has a well-known policy of accepting refugees; whereas Tibetans, having been forced out of their own country, are now under tremendous pressure and harassment to leave Bhuttan; whereas Tibetans have proven themselves to be fine, industrious citizens of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration consider extending refugee status to a limited number of Tibetans from Bhuttan.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

NECESSITY FOR AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND PRODUCING PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of most urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the Cold Lake and Alsands projects are in real danger of being cancelled because of the lack of an energy agreement with the producing provinces, and whereas the cancellation of these projects will have a disastrous effect on the already ailing Canadian economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That this House directs the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to have an energy agreement in place not later than June 1, 1981.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF NUCLEAR REACTOR AT BLIND RIVER, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Indian leaders are gravely concerned about the potential dangers of the proposed Eldorado nuclear reactor at Blind River and have requested an appearance before the Atomic Energy Control Board to voice their concerns. Because their numerous letters, telexes and telephone calls to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) have gone unanswered, and because their request to appear has now been denied, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development immediately shoulder his responsibility for the protection of Indian rights, begin responding to telexes, letters and telephone calls, and arrange for their concerns to be heard before the Atomic Energy Control Board.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—SUGGESTED MINISTERIAL REVIEW—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Recently the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) told the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence that he would seek firm answers from United States Secretary of Defence Weinberger concerning the state of the beleaguered F-18 program when the latter visited Ottawa. Today a United States official is quoted as saying that it is unlikely Mr. Weinberger will specify any changes in plans for the United States purchases because any such decision is still pending.

In light of these conflicting statements, and the report that, as a result of congressional budget cuts, the United States

F-18 research and development funds will dry up by mid-June, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the minister stop parroting the assurances of McDonnell Douglas and other vested interests, and act expeditiously to protect Canadian interests by ordering his own thorough and complete review of the disastrous F-18 program.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE CONSTITUTION

ANNOUNCEMENT OF QUEBEC SUPREME COURT DECISION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) supposedly champions the rule of law, traditions of Parliament, and the concept of provincial unanimity, and given the historic decision of the Quebec Supreme Court, four to one in favour of the federal constitutional package, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Masters):

That the Leader of the Opposition clarify with his caucus the inconsistency of the Tory property rights package which may well be ultra vires and does not have the support of the premiers, particularly in the west and in the maritimes, and as well that the Leader of the Opposition inform the House of the alleged agreement between the premiers on an amending formula of which he states he is aware today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is a political question.

ENERGY

NECESSITY FOR AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND PRODUCING PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Energy minister Marc Lalonde said yesterday—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gustafson: —that he does not expect to reach an energy agreement by July 1. Given the fact that the Cold Lake and Alsands projects could be shelved by June 1, coupled with the counterproductive effect of the government's energy policies on the economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That the government take immediate steps to come to an energy agreement in view of this very serious economic effect on Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DUMPING OF EFFLUENT INTO NIAGARA RIVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Recent press reports indicate that as a result of malfunctions in the Buffalo sewage plant, millions of gallons of improperly treated waste are being dumped daily into the Niagara River. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That this House urge the Minister of the Environment to verify these reports, and upon determining their truth, to inform the United States government immediately of Canada's deep concern about pollution in this international waterway.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE ECONOMY

REASON FOR HIGH INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, private borrowers in the United States are borrowing money on short term at about 14.75 per cent. The Government of Canada today is paying at least 2 per cent more than private borrowers can borrow money for in the American market. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That the Minister of Finance on motions do explain to the House of commons whether the reason for the difference in rates is the deliberate high interest rate policy of the government or whether the government has run down Canada's credit rating with lenders so that Canada is required to pay a 2 per cent premium to borrow money.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

MOTHER'S ELIGIBILITY FOR UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 with respect to some very discriminatory questions asked by some unemployment insurance officials. Considering that a Canada Employment official recently informed a Hamilton woman that she could be ineligible for unemployment insurance benefits because she was breast-feeding her child, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration issue a directive to all Canada Employment Centres to end this appalling and discriminatory practice which is a consideration in determining unemployment insurance eligibility on the basis of how a woman feeds and cares for her children.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

NATIONAL UNITY

SPEECH MADE BY MEMBER FOR SCARBOROUGH EAST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Yesterday's Toronto Star carried a very disturbing story about a speech given by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Gilchrist) to the Alliance for the Preservation of English in Canada, in which he went on record as supporting separatism in Quebec and in which he appeared to condone a threat against the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I believe all hon. members will agree that such inflammatory statements should be abhorred. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson):

That the hon. member for Scarborough East should apologize to all the members of this House and to the Prime Minister.

Failing this, I move:

That this House direct the Leader of the Opposition to follow the lead of his predecessor, the Hon. Robert Stanfield, and expel those members of his party who support separatism, who deny the bilingual character of our country as set out in the Official Languages Act, and who advocate disobedience of the law.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

MAURICE STRONG

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Maurice Strong has followed the natural Liberal progression from President of the Canadian International Development Agency to chairman of Petro-Canada, to commission agent for his friends in the Liberal government to the tune of a $1 million fee. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That this House encourage Maurice Strong to take the route that other Liberals sometimes take and run for office, unless of course another take-over intervenes.

That this House calls on the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs to give notice next week of the anticipated legislation to shorten or eliminate the six-and-a-half-year phasing-in period respecting pensions for veterans' widows contained in last summer's Bill C-40, it being clear that this House will give quick passage to this legislation.

EFFECT OF ANGLO-CANADIAN DOUBLE TAXATION AGREEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, in light of the burden placed on British pensioners by the acceptance of this government of the protocol amending the Anglo-Canadian double taxation agreement, which came into effect at the beginning of this year, and which seems to have been directly aimed at the minute pensions available to a large number of elderly Canadian residents, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Minister of Finance make a statement on motions at the earliest opportunity explaining how the signing of this protocol came about and, in particular, indicating what steps the government proposes to take to relieve the financial burdens imposed on those unfortunate pensioners, many of whom are not even eligible for full Canadian pension benefits.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR CONVENING OF FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): My question is directed to the Prime Minister, whom I first want to congratulate on receiving what he would regard as good news from the superior court of Quebec—

An hon. Member: Court of appeal.

Mr. Clark: —court of appeal? Court of appeal. I feel that the legal questions should be decided by the courts, and I am pleased that Parliament is agreeing to let that happen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My question concerns the other part of the process. It concerns the meeting here tomorrow of premiers of eight provinces to conclude their proposal for patriation of our Constitution, with an amending formula. The Prime Minister knows that in the telex to him from Premier Lyon there was a request for a meeting with the Prime Minister after the premiers had met for joint consideration of the new plan. If the Prime Minister receives such a proposal from those eight provinces, will he arrange to convene a first ministers' conference to consider that proposal?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would have thought that the Leader of the Opposition would be somewhat hesitant to speak on behalf of the provinces in this matter. The last time he raised it in the House, it was to enjoin me to meet with the eight premiers meeting here in Ottawa. When, after some hesitation—considerable hesitation, I would say—I accepted to meet with them, then it appeared that they did not want to meet me. So I think the Leader of the Opposition had better let the premiers handle this, and stay out of this business, himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister will want to consult the record to know just how wrong his rendition of history is, although he does confirm that he would prefer to have Parliament stay out of questions which are Parliament's business. My question to him stands. There is to be a meeting here tomorrow which the eight premiers involved believe will yield a new plan for bringing our Constitution home with an amending formula. They have formally requested the Prime Minister of Canada for an opportunity to discuss that plan with him. They have requested that in the telex in which they said:

Subsequently we hope to meet you—

That means the Prime Minister.

—for joint consideration of the new plan.

That is in the telex from Premier Lyon.

If there is a new plan brought forward, as the premiers expect there will be, will the Prime Minister of Canada agree to meet with them to discuss that plan, and will the Prime Minister consider convening a first ministers' conference to discuss that plan by which Canadians could patriate our Constitution and amend it here in an agreed way, and any other questions which he might want to put on the agenda? Will he convene a first ministers' conference if there is a proposal from those eight premiers tomorrow?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is making the same mistake which he made two weeks ago when he enjoined me to meet with the premiers to discuss something with them, to hear them out and to have a federal-provincial meeting of some sort. I repeat, it was after he had said that and pressed me—presumably, on behalf of the premiers—to meet and to discuss with them, it appeared that they did not want to meet and discuss with me. That is still the situation now.

The Leader of the Opposition says that Premier Lyon has sent me a telegram wherein he says he wants to discuss their plan with me. I have the telegram here, and the only part of it which refers to myself is in the final words. I read them:

It is our intention to communicate the conclusions of the meeting to you on the afternoon of the same day.

That does not sound as though they want to have a discussion with me.

An hon. Member: Read it all.

Mr. Trudeau: It sounds to me as though they are having a meeting in Ottawa, that they will try to discuss and hopefully agree amongst themselves, presumably to put the final touches on something which has not yet been quite agreed to. That is why I repeat, what I said last week in this House, that the veracity of the statement to the effect that they had reached an agreement was somewhat in doubt. It has been put in doubt since then by several of the participants who have said that they still have some decisions to make. Premier Lévesque said that, and Premier Blakeney said that, so the Leader of the Opposition in this House really is carrying a brief for some who have not asked him to carry it for them.

● (1420)

I will be in Ottawa tomorrow. I am not sure how the intention of communicating the conclusions of the meeting to me will be fulfilled. I do not know if Premier Lyon wants to see me. I do not know if he will send me a letter—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: What is beefing you, my friend?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member does not have the floor.

Mr. Forrestall: Who the hell cares?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I can understand the frustration of members of the House when the Prime Minister twice refuses to answer a very simple question having to do with his duty to the people of this country, as the first minister of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: On April 3 Premier Lyon, the chairman of the provincial premiers' conference, sent a telex from which I have already quoted in the House, to the Prime Minister, in which he outlined the plan of the premiers to meet first and then, and again I quote, "Subsequently we hope to meet you for joint consideration of the new plan".

I am not particularly interested in debating with the Prime Minister what happened last week. What I am interested in knowing is whether the Prime Minister will accept his responsibilities as Prime Minister of this country, to resolve in a Canadian way, and in co-operation with the Canadian partners, the provinces, a question of important constitutional significance.

If there is the agreement the premiers expect tomorrow, will the Prime Minister use that agreement as the basis for exercising his duty and convening a first ministers' conference that will allow him and the ten first ministers of the country—the ten provincial premiers—allow the 11 first ministers to sit down and discuss a Canadian patriation package, with a Canadian amending formula? Will he do his duty in that way if he receives that kind of plan?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, could I ask the indulgence of the House to recall the events which led up to this question.

I was enjoined by the Leader of the Opposition to meet with the premiers. I said I would do it. Then a few of them, several I believe, said that they did not want to meet me. They said this publicly. This is not a figment of my imagination. They said they were not sure that I was invited. Some said that I could bang at the door but they would not let me in.

Since then I have received a telegram—that is not referring to the April 3 one because it was after the April 3 one that I said that I would meet with them. Then it appeared that they did not all want to meet with me. They had not made up their minds yet about what they would do.

An hon. Member: No wonder.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, no wonder, all right. But they had not made up their minds.

Since then I have received a telegram telling me that it is their intention to communicate the conclusions of their meeting to me. I repeat, I had been prepared to meet with them. Now I am prepared to receive their communication in whatever way it comes. I will be here in Ottawa; I will be available, if one or several want to meet with me to communicate the conclusions. That was made clear ten days ago, that I was prepared to meet with them. I will see what they have agreed to do among themselves. Once again whether they will meet—

Mr. Lalonde: If they agree.

Mr. Trudeau: If they agree—whether they will want to meet or to send me a letter or what, but I am quite sure that the Leader of the Opposition will also be informed of the position that they take, if any.

The Leader of the Opposition knows the rules to which this House has agreed, that after today we will have Thursday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday, and Monday to consider what we want to do with this proposal presumably of eight premiers.

I do not think that the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting that in these five days we convene a federal-provincial conference. If the premiers indicate their desire to do so, and if a quick canvassing of my colleagues from the other two provinces indicate that they want to do so, certainly I will convene a conference in these five days if there is some measure of agreement. But the way we have written the House order is that on Tuesday evening we must make any final change we want to make to this resolution that is before the House.

● (1425)

The deadline is on the premiers, it is on myself, and it is also on the Leader of the Opposition. I take it that his party will see it as its duty to reflect on the meeting of the premiers. Hopefully the Leader of the Opposition will be communicated with also by the premiers in some way or other. Then his party, my party, and the New Democratic Party will make up their minds as to whether we can include something in the resolution by way of amendment on Tuesday. That is the way the House has accepted to play the rules.

I do not want to encourage the Leader of the Opposition to believe that in these five days we could easily have a conference of 11 first ministers. Two of them have already stated quite clearly that they did not want to meet if it was a matter of just looking at an amending formula without a charter. I must say that is the position of our party too. But still we will meet with them. Hopefully they will have made some progress. We will see what they say, even on the charter. Then the Leader of the Opposition and the other parties in this House will take their responsibilities for Tuesday night.

TIMING OF FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, we have made some progress. The Prime Minister is now agreeing to a first ministers' conference if that is requested by the eight premiers and if they bring forward a plan. But he has placed a limitation on it. The Prime Minister has agreed to a first ministers' conference within the next five days. I think most of us recognize that that is probably going to be impractical—desirable if possible, but probably impractical.

Is the Prime Minister limiting his suggestion, his willingness to convene a first ministers' conference, to the next five days or the next week? Or is he prepared to tell this House of Commons that whatever happens in the parliamentary agenda, whatever happens with the Supreme Court agenda, he will do his duty as the Prime Minister of the whole country and convene a first ministers' conference to discuss a patriation package agreed to by eight provinces if those eight provinces request such a meeting? Will he do that without time limitations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Of course I will, Madam Speaker. The resolution before the House specifies an obligation on us to do that. It is specified that over the next two years we must have first ministers' conferences to try to get agreement on an amending formula. The Leader of the Opposition says no.

Mr. Clark: No. I am shaking my head at your behaviour.

Mr. Trudeau: It does, Madam Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition wants to have an undertaking from me that I will have a federal provincial conference. I am answering that I will be obliged to do so once we adopt this resolution.

Mr. Clark: If we do.

Mr. Trudeau: I guess the Leader of the Opposition wants to know when it will be held. It will be held in the next five days if we all agree it is useful. If it is not, the Leader of the Opposition accepted the proposition before the House that we want the Supreme Court to see the resolution in its final form. That is the essence of the bargain we made here, that there would be no further amendments after Thursday night, that the Supreme Court would be rendering its decision on the basis of the resolution as it will have been amended next week.

If the Leader of the Opposition is asking me if I will meet the premiers, the answer is yes, Madam Speaker. But I think that the Leader of the Opposition and the premiers themselves should realize that such a meeting will not be able to affect the resolution before the House by the very nature of the bargain that the Leader of the Opposition wrung out of us. That is the nature of it, that we will not be able to accept any amendments after Thursday of next week.

If the Leader of the Opposition is asking me can we have a meeting in May, in June or in July, the answer is yes. But the results of that meeting cannot be in the resolution before the Supreme Court. Since the Leader of the Opposition, contrary I understand to the Premier of Alberta, has indicated that legality was the essence of it, I take it that after the Supreme Court has judged, in our words that will settle the matter. If the Supreme Court judges favourably, then there will be no difficulty in sending the resolution to London. I hope the Leader of the Opposition will agree to that, at least, because the leader of the Conservative Party in Alberta has not agreed to that apparently. He still wants to carry on the political fight.

Let me put it to this House: are we all agreed that once the Supreme Court has ruled favourably, that ends the matter?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition laughs, as he always does. But it is an important question. Otherwise the referral to the Supreme Court makes no sense.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT PROGRAM TO DEAL WITH INFLATION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who knows that any resolution passed by this House can be changed by this House by unanimous consent. The Prime Minister is not very keen on meeting with premiers. My question to him is this. Premier Davis requested a first ministers' meeting to discuss real issues affecting this country, inflation and the economy. The Prime Minister has now said that while he shares the concern of Premier Davis, and he agrees that inflation is an unacceptable burden on the people of Canada, he refuses to meet with the premiers on that subject until the seven industrial nations meet here in Canada in July. He says also that he refuses to meet because the government has laid down an economic program in the budget specifically directed at dealing with inflation. The Prime Minister wants to solve the global problems before he deals with his own problems here.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I would ask the hon. member to co-operate with the Chair. The Leader of the Opposition took quite a lot of time of the House in his first round—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: What about the answers?

Madam Speaker: The first round took quite a lot of time. There is an obligation on the Chair to go to other parties in the House. I would ask the hon. member for St. John's West, in consideration of that, to be brief in his two questions.

Mr. Nielsen: Make sure the answers are brief too.

Mr. Crosbie: My question to the Prime Minister is this. What is the economic program of the government that is specifically directed at dealing with inflation? Will he let the House and the country in on it? He refuses to meet with the premiers. What is this program?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I did not refuse to meet with the premiers on the economy or on anything else. Premier Davis did not ask me to meet at any particular date before or after the economic summit of July. The Minister of Finance has had meetings with his counterparts, and he will have others. I very much expect and want to have a meeting of first ministers on the economy. The question is when it would be most usefully held. In my judgment it would be most usefully held after the economic summit, when we will have a clear vision of the economic positions taken by our six industrial partners.

Once again, I will meet them when they want, but I doubt that the hon. member for St. John's West is any more qualified than his leader was in pretending to speak for the premiers in reference to meetings.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, in Massachusetts the Cabots speak only to the Lodges and the Lodges speak only to God. Is that the position of this Prime Minister, that he speaks only to God? He does not speak to the premiers.

Premier Davis has requested a meeting on inflation and the economy, and the Prime Minister has refused that meeting. The Bank of Canada rate has just gone up to 17.16 per cent. Inflation is running 2 per cent worse than the budget forecast. Will the Prime Minister outline to the House what this program of his government is to fight inflation? It certainly has not been effective to date. Will he advise the House whether he is going to deal with this before he deals with all the world's problems? Will he deal with the problems of little old Canada and meet with our ten premiers to discuss these economic problems?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in answer to Premier Davis I wrote these words:

> Following the Ottawa Summit, I shall be seeking the counsel of my colleagues and provincial Premiers on how we might best proceed to ensure a concerted attack on world and Canadian economic problems, including inflation.

Mr. Crosbie: The world is your oyster.

Mr. Trudeau: You're an oyster, my friend.

Mr. Crosbie: You're the Prime Minister.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa.

Mr. Crosbie: The Prime Minister never finished his answer. He hasn't got an answer.

Mr. Trudeau: Why don't you raise a question of privilege?

Mr. Crosbie: The Prime Minister is an oyster's ass.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Oshawa has the floor.

REQUEST FOR CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL PREMIERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister is on the same subject. A request came from Premier Davis for a meeting at the earliest possible moment. I would ask the Prime Minister this. Since the prime rate has now gone up to 17.16 per cent, setting off a new round of cost of living increases for farmers, small businessmen and home owners, who are already suffering, would it not make sense for the Prime Minister to consult with all the premiers to try to get a concerted national policy which could have a positive impact at home and could also be influential in influencing his judgment when he goes to the first summit, so he could go there with a national consensus in terms of what should be done to deal with the Canadian economy?

Mr. Nielsen: He does not want a national consensus.

Mr. Kempling: He has his own consensus.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On the contrary, Madam Speaker. The Leader of the New Democratic Party is reading my mind.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: As usual.

Mr. Nielsen: He can't read Greek.

Mr. Trudeau: As usual, the Tory party is coming down on both sides of this question. First they said I did not want to answer. When I said I was going to give an answer and that I had one here, they said, "Oh, but we have dealt with it together." They cannot have it both ways. Here was my answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I understand that the Tory party is somewhat miffed at their loss in the byelections.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order. I would appreciate it if the Prime Minister would be brief in his answers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: And I understand that the Appeal Court of Quebec has not made them any happier.

If they would bear with me, I would like to answer the Leader of the New Democratic Party by saying I have done precisely what he suggests should be done, consult with the premiers before the summit. That is where I write in my letter:

I would be pleased to examine any specific suggestions which you might want to make as to how we might intensify our efforts in combating inflation, either on our own or through federal-provincial measures.

That is in the context of the letter where I say that before the summit we will have a lot of work to do and we will be looking at ways in which we can combat inflation, both in Canada and as a world-wide phenomenon.

Mr. Broadbent: I hope that after the Prime Minister receives the responses from the premiers we will not have to wait for a year before the government acts in terms of some of those proposals to bring down the cost of living for Canadians.

EFFECT OF HIGH MORTGAGE RATES ON HOME OWNERS—POSSIBILITY OF PLANNING ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): On a specific item the government could act on now, without waiting for any advice from the premiers, I would like to go to the Minister of Finance. Mortgage rates are already at record levels. With the interest rate up again today, they are bound to jump. Hundreds of people are losing their homes, people who have to renew mortgages. Considering that the banks are earning record level profits, will the government, and specifically the Minister of Finance, at least call in the heads of the chartered banks, point out their profit margins to them, and force them to work out a program for mortgages that the average Canadian family can afford?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is asking that I call in the heads of the chartered banks. I do not think that would be a very constructive proposal at the present time. What I have been doing is—

Mr. Crosbie: Sleeping.

Mr. MacEachen: —analysing the situation with respect to home owners facing renewals in the current year.

Mr. Crosbie: The old analyser.

Mr. MacEachen: It is my belief, based upon this analysis in the light of increased incomes that are occurring along with increases in mortgages, that the vast majority of home owners will be able to renew their mortgages in this current year without increasing the proportion of their income that is customarily assigned to accommodation.

Mr. Broadbent: The Minister of Finance should do a little more analysing. He would find that what he just said is profoundly misleading. He should tell that to the literally hundreds of Canadians from coast to coast, if not thousands, who have lost their homes because they cannot afford to renew their mortgages.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN BUDGET

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he will provide a little assistance to another group of Canadians, namely, farmers, who are having trouble with the high interest rate policy of the government. Will the government raise the budget of the Farm Credit Corporation by $150 million and hold its lending rate to 12.5 per cent as requested by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, so that corporation can meet the real needs of Canadian farmers and at least prevent a few of them from going out of business?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, we are looking at what the hon. member suggests. We are considering ways and means of operating the Farm Credit Corporation, gearing some of its funds to the young starting farmers with either lower interest rates or no interest rates at all for the first few years. There has been no decision made in that regard. This is in relation to long-term money. The money young farmers need at this time is short-term money, the capital needed to finance hog operations, cattle operations, and the purchasing of fertilizer, etc., for this year's operations. Whatever we can do in that area we will do. There is very little we can do, but some of the provinces have special programs they have initiated on their own. Ontario, for instance, has not seemed to have become very much involved in this sort of program, but some of the other provinces have, with subsidized interest rates.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF HIS EXCELLENCY JANKHEER EMILE VAN LENNEP, OECD SECRETARY GENERAL

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

GRANT TO FORGES HPC LIMITED OF CAP-DE-LA-MADELEINE, P.Q.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. The minister will know that on March 27 the assets of a company known as Forges HPC Limited of Cap-de-la-Madeleine were seized to satisfy $7 million in debts, and this was just a few days after the company had been awarded a $2.7 DREE grant. Did the minister know of the financial position of the company, and, if so, why did he authorize the awarding of that grant?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, it is always easier to criticize a decision taken by managers of that program, in retrospect. Actually over 4,000 grants were made in that province by those officials and less than 5 per cent of the projects have failed.

In this case, as in all other cases, before sending the cheques we made the usual checks; we phoned the banks and the creditors and all of them said the project was moving according to—

An hon. Member: Plan.

Mr. De Bané: —plan, yes. We were comforted by the fact that the government of Quebec, Consolidated Bathurst, and a major European interest were the three shareholders in that company. We are going to do our best on our part to reopen that plant. If the shareholders, including the government of Quebec, do not want to reopen it, we will do our darndest to get our money back.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to this very diligent minister who usually knows his department. An award in the amount of $2.7 million would have to be approved by the minister; it would require his signature. Did the minister satisfy himself, because he could have by merely calling the local credit bureau in Cap-de-la-Madeleine, that this company was not in financial difficulty and, if not, why not? That is a simple question, Madam Speaker.

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, this is a very important question, but I would like to make a clarification. The minister personally approves all cases involving public grants over $1 million. The minister does that, of course, at the inception. One of the main rules is that when you apply to the government you must not have made any contractual commitment or obligations. That was done a long time ago when the application was made. Months later when we have to issue the cheque we have no other discussion. We ascertain that all the conditions which were set in the beginning have been respected. In this case what we did before issuing any cheque was to ascertain that all the conditions were met. We phoned all the creditors and shareholders to be sure that everything was okay.

PETRO-CANADA

ACQUISITION OF PETROFINA—FEE PAID TO SWISS BANK

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and it relates to an announcement or statement today by Petro-Canada to the effect that a fee of $1 million was paid to a firm named Sogener of which the principal officers are a Mr. Hentsch and Mr. Strong; that is Maurice Strong who is well known to members of this House.

On the basis of a letter from the minister to the Leader of the Opposition dated March 4, 1981, it was pointed out that Mr. Hentsch and Mr. Strong, the principal officers, had about a half a dozen phone calls, two or three meetings, two or three letters, and apparently some very deep thoughts. What I would like to know in regard to this transaction is whether this was a contingency fee arrangement, exactly what work was involved for this very substantial fee on the part of Mr. Strong, and whether the minister is prepared to allow the House of Commons through an appropriate committee of the House to consider the details of the work done for this substantial fee.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, as I indicated in my letter of March 4 to the Leader of the Opposition, which was tabled in this House at the same time, Petro-Canada some time last year retained a long-established Swiss bank by the name of Sogener to be its agent in the negotiation of the possible acquisition of Petrofina. As I indicated, Mr. Hentsch is the chairman of this bank and Mr. Maurice Strong is the vice-president. I am advised also that Mr. Strong has had an interest in that bank for some years. It is very much a minority interest. I am advised it is somewhat below 5 per cent. I am also advised that the fee for this particular transaction is below the usual commercial fee for such transactions.

As far as negotiations were concerned, Sogener was involved in the transaction which was, in the end, successful earlier this year. I am advised by Petro-Canada that all the arrangements were made according to the practices followed by corporations in this particular regard. Officials of Petro-Canada have appeared at various times before committees, and I am sure that at the next opportunity the opposition will be welcome to ask questions of members of Petro-Canada.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I now fully understand the Liberal campaign motto, "Lalonde is strong."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I wonder if the minister could perhaps now explain whether any other agencies were considered, and whether in fact the money has been paid to a Swiss bank account or has already been expended by Petro-Canada. I think a lot of people, in respect of this kind of transaction, would be very interested in participating, particularly if this is the minister's idea of Canadianization of Swiss banking firms. I want to know whether there are any more takeovers contemplated in respect of which intermediaries are to be used, and would the minister consider putting out the intermediary role to tender?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I would be very happy to inquire of the management of Petro-Canada as to the various points raised by the hon. member, and report to him.

THE DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON AFFIRMATIVE ACTION PROGRAMS

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Last week his colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, stated that he would not be able to meet the recommendation of the special House of Commons committee on the handicapped which would require larger firms to have affirmative action programs in order to do business with the federal government. I would like to ask the minister if, in rejecting affirmative action programs, his colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, was speaking for the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and also was he speaking for the government?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, at this particular point in time a decision has not been made one way or another by the government. I think the minister was expressing the fact that at the present moment he would not apply that particular restriction because a decision has not been made, but it is a question, as the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam well knows, that is being discussed. The hon. member knows we have implemented a major affirmative action program in the public service. We are implementing affirmative action programs in a number of training agreements we are now signing with private industry. The success of those programs will be gauged and evaluated in determining what the next step of the government will be.

FIRMS CONTRACTING TO SUPPLY GOODS AND SERVICES TO GOVERNMENT

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I am speaking of contract compliance in the private sector. Last September 27 the minister stated at a Manitoba women and trades conference, and I quote "I will be bringing a paper on contract compliance to cabinet this fall". That was last fall. There are over 600 companies doing business with the federal government. Only 18 in the private sector have contract compliance. The minister promised it last fall. When is the minister going to bring his program for contract compliance to cabinet, or is he letting the Minister of Supply and Services have the whole field in this matter?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in the speech from which the hon. member quoted I indicated that we would be examining the issue of contract compliance, but there was no indication of what the specific recommendations might be. That remains for the government to decide, and that decision will be made after the consultations which are now taking place with unions, private business and a variety of volunteer agencies throughout the country to determine how we can achieve our objective of ensuring that there is more access to the workplace for disabled people, native people, and women. That is a commitment of the government, and we intend to fulfil it, but we must bring in the measures most appropriate to that, and we will do that after fair consultation.

Miss Jewett: Where is the paper?

PENITENTIARIES

RUMOURED CLOSING OF KINGSTON PENITENTIARY

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Can the Solicitor General confirm or deny the rumour in the newspapers recently to the effect that the Kingston Penitentiary is to close?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, there has been a number of rumours over the years about the closing of Kingston Penitentiary. Taking account of the age of that institution alone, a good case could be made for closing it, but its closing would create a number of problems with respect to settlement, of employment, custody of inmates, and alternative uses of the location. I was surprised that the commissioner of the correctional service of Canada was quoted in the press as having announced that that would be closed, because the problems to which I have referred have not yet been solved to my satisfaction, and no decision will be made until those other problems have been dealt with.

INFORMATION

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF PRIME MINISTER'S SPEECH ON THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister confirm that his office instructed the Canadian United Information Office to print some 15,000 copies, with a second possible order of 10,000 copies, of a cleaned-up version of the Prime Minister's constitutional speech and that those copies are currently being distributed by Liberal Members of Parliament and the Liberal Party of Canada? Can the Prime Minister assure the House that the cost for the printing and distribution of these speeches will be borne by the Liberal Party of Canada and not by the taxpayers of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I cannot give the answer to that, but I certainly will inquire. I must say that I am not in complete agreement with the conclusions stated by the hon. member. I believe when I make speeches, whether they be good, bad or indifferent, they are distributed freely to the people of Canada, first to the people of the press gallery and than to anyone else who wants a copy. I do not think the hon. member would object to that.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, what is particularly at stake here is the abuse of the CUIO and the inability of the Prime Minister to differentiate between the funds of the taxpayers of Canada and the funds of the Liberal Party of Canada.

ALLEGED USE OF TAX DOLLARS TO MEET COST

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister how he justifies this expenditure of tax dollars, in view of the fact that the creation of the CUIO was justified on the ground that it be used to promote only the views of the whole of the Government of Canada and not just the views of one man on a resolution which is currently before Parliament for debate. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that he will put a stop to this practice of using the CUIO as a $23 million propaganda machine for the Liberal Party?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as I said in answer to the first question, I think it is somewhat hypothetical. I do not know the answer to how it was done and who is paying for it, but I repeat that when, as Prime Minister, I make speeches, these speeches are communicated to many people. They are communicated first to the press, then I believe to members of this House, and then to anyone who asks for them. I suppose when the Leader of the Opposition was the Prime Minister it was the same thing.

An hon. Member: Nobody wanted to hear him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: They were not communicated by the CUIO.

Mr. Chrétien: Nobody wanted to have his speeches; that was the difference. There was no demand.

Mr. Trudeau: I understand the hon. member's concern about the Liberal Party but, once again, when a speech is made by me, whether it be to a group in Toronto or at a press conference, I know we make a transcript of it, and this transcript is available and used.

Mr. Beatty: Is it bound?

Mr. Trudeau: It is not charged to the Liberal Party any more than I am sure the transcripts of speeches of the Leader of the Opposition were charged to his party. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Clark: The Canadian Unity Information Office?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member is worried about the fact that the copy is bound. I suppose that is a matter of costs, and it is also a matter of presentation. It may be cheaper to present it in that form than to have thousands—

Mr. Clark: Certainly cheaper to the Liberal Party.

Mr. Trudeau: Let me finish—or hundreds of thousands of copies of Hansard printed with all the other speeches which it contains, including perhaps the hon. member's speech in which nobody is interested.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ACTION TO DEAL WITH WAR CRIMINALS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Over a year ago the Solicitor General announced with great fanfare, following a meeting with Simon Wiesental, that an interdepartmental committee was being set up to examine the options available to the government to deal with Nazi war criminals living in Canada. The minister said at that time that the study should take approximately three months. Will the minister make public the report of this committee, which apparently has been submitted to cabinet and rejected by cabinet, and will the minister tell the House what action the government intends to take to bring forward for trial those persons who are now residing in Canada and who are accused of having committed war crimes during the holocaust?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, this matter comes under my responsibility. We have included in the charter of rights some reference to this, but first we have to deal with the charter of rights in this House before deciding whether to proceed with some legislation.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, the government knows very well that that is just a cop-out for its inaction and the betrayal of the promises it made in the last election. The fact is that the charter of rights has nothing to do with this matter.

TIMING OF GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, having made the promises, the Solicitor General is apparently silent. After his meeting on this question with Simon Wiesental, the Solicitor General said, and I quote, "I am satisfied there are witnesses, and war crimes could be proven".

If the Solicitor General is prepared to answer, my question is, what action will the government take and when will it take it, to live up to the promises it made in the last election campaign and to end 35 years of inaction on this very important question?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I answered that question earlier. We first studied the problem in the constitutional committee and there was a reference to that subject. As to whether legal action can be taken at this time against people who reside in Canada, we are now studying the issue and we will take action if necessary because there must be a law under which we can act. The cabinet has yet to make a decision about this, but we will look into it as soon as possible.

ENERGY

PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES IN RAISING RENTS FOR SERVICE STATIONS

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. The National Automotive Trades Association of Canada determined that major oil companies are engaged in a massive increase in rents for service stations. As an example, one oil company charged $22,000 for a two-bay station. The new lease went from $22,000 to $85,000 for the first year and, in the third year, the rent was to be $123,000. Another example: rent will rise from $29,000 in 1979 to $287,000 in 1982.

Will the minister investigate these facts and use his strongest persuasion to ask the oil companies to limit increases in rent to 20 per cent or less per year, in order that service station dealers in Canada can survive and the motoring public be protected from huge increases in the price of gasoline due to those increased rents?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I think it is important that there be indeed a certain control over the leasing costs charged to the retailers by the multinationals. However, I would like it very much if the members of the Progressive Conservative Party were to make up their minds some day. Do they want more or less intervention from the government?

[English]

Mr. Cook: Madam Speaker, is the minister aware that unless action is taken and oil companies comply voluntarily, the country may face a massive action by the National Automotive Trades Association to demonstrate the seriousness of the problem?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): Madam Speaker, we are aware of the problem and that is why I would urge the hon. member to do his utmost to convince his colleagues that they ought to support the petroleum industry Canadianization policy.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GILCHRIST—NOTICE POSSIBLE QUESTION TO BE RAISED

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, unfortunately I was not in the House earlier when a motion under Standing Order 43 was raised concerning a Toronto Star editorial. I am not sure who raised it; I received a copy from a page, but there is no reference to the mover. I see the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) is mentioned. I wish to reserve my right to raise a question of privilege concerning this motion because it impugns my statements which were reported in the Toronto Star. It is exactly 180 degrees from the actual positions I gave.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure the hon. member has a question of privilege. The motion under Standing Order 43 was dealt with the House today. If it is dealt with, it is dealt with. HOUSE OF COMMONS

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I referred earlier to an agreement between the House leaders. PETITION

MR. KEEPER—CUTBACK IN POSTAL SERVICES IN RIDING

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition which was signed by citizens from my riding in the west end of the city of Winnipeg. The petition is in the proper language. It makes reference to two important concepts: grievance and remedy.

The grievance which these citizens have in common is that the government has callously cut back postal services in the area and intends to remove the services of a full postal station from the area and to substitute a sub post office. The remedy must be presented by the House, that is, to stop the closure of that full postal station.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General) moved that Bill C-61, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Madam Speaker, this is the first bill I have had the opportunity to present as Solicitor General. Indeed I am very proud to be able to bring forward Bill C-61, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

At the outset I must say that this bill did not originate with me. Indeed, the legislation it is replacing is 73 years old; it has been virtually unchanged over that period, but not unexamined. Within the last 14 years and, more intensively, within the last nine years, there have been steady examinations of it and consultations about it between the levels of government. Because of the large number of solicitors general of Canada in the last five or six years, possibly none of them has been in a position to review the provisions and bring forward a bill which they would have been prepared to explain, defend and discuss with the provinces in the final sense.

● (1510)

Having now had the opportunity to be Solicitor General for a year and one month, I have been able to put myself in a position to bring this bill forward as my own recommendation to cabinet and to the House and I look forward to a full examination of it. I hope it may even be possible today to refer it to the justice committee so that it can be examined in depth and that the many experts across the country who are interested in this bill, and who have been consulted about it, will be able to come before the committee, make their views known and give their advice with respect to the bill. Although the bill merits considerable discussion, and I know it is of considerable interest to many, I hope it may be possible to refer it to the justice committee today.

I expect the bill will enjoy substantial support. I think the views presented to the committee will greatly illuminate discussion by Members of Parliament. That is why I think a relatively short period of time should be devoted to second reading and then the bill could be referred to committee.

As I indicated, this new legislation will repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act, which is now seriously out of date and out of time with contemporary practices and attitudes regarding juvenile justice. It is inadequate to meet the current problems of young persons in conflict with the law. The proposed legislation, which is aimed at providing an updated and comprehensive process to deal with juvenile crime which encourages both respect for the law and protects the well-being of both the young offender and society, is long overdue.

The new legislation, which is to be known as the Young Offenders Act, is the result of extensive study and consultation by the federal government with the provinces, academics, professionals and practitioners in the juvenile justice field, as well as major associations and groups, private agencies and the general public. I acknowledge that all of this consultation has had a major impact on formulating the underlying principles and the over-all substance of this legislation.

Despite the fact that this basic approach was developed out of a sense of benevolence and welfare, many are now of the opinion that treatment and rehabilitation can no longer stand on their own to serve or protect the better interests of children in a system which deals with offenders under the authority of the criminal law. It is further argued that, as society insists more and more on responsibility on the part of the young offender, his right to fair treatment in accordance with the principles of natural justice can no longer be left, as they have been under the present law, to the discretion of those persons in authority.

I believe that we should no longer condone by prolonging the existence of the Juvenile Delinquents Act injustices and shortcomings such as the following: discrimination against young persons by unnecessarily criminalizing them for various acts and behaviour which are not illegal for adults and which in most instances more properly belong to the domain of child welfare and youth protection legislation. I refer, for example, to the offence of being a juvenile delinquent, which is an offence under the existing law. It is very vague in its nature and it is sometimes used in parts of our country to deal with, for example, a young person who will not tell his parents where he goes at night and why he has money in his pocket. It is the type of offence which is too vague and not in keeping with modern ideas of young people having equal rights as adults have.

The second difficulty is the subjection under the existing law to indeterminate court sentences which may not be related to the seriousness of the offence committed and which may be more severe than the sentence an adult would receive for committing the same offence.

Another shortcoming is the subjection of young persons to an arbitrary review process whereby they may be brought back before the court at any time until they reach the age of 21, when new sanctions can be applied against them without new offences having been committed, including a belated transfer to adult court. This, in effect, is double jeopardy which applies under the existing law.

The final point I want to refer to is the subjection of young persons to informal court procedures and decision-making which do not guarantee them the right to legal counsel or a full opportunity to challenge their accusers and participate in decisions which affect them.

While I could go on, I prefer to limit the listing to the most obvious inequities and deficiencies. In so doing I want to assure hon. members that it is not my intention to impart the impression that such represents a description of the daily practice of juvenile courts in the country, but rather I would point out that some of these inherent weaknesses in the existing law have a tremendous potential for abuse and arbitrary action. Credit should be paid to juvenile judges and provincial administrators who, in most instances, have extended to young persons rights which are well beyond those provided by the letter of the law and which will be taken account of on a fundamentally secure, judicial basis under the proposed legislation.

The proposed legislation blends three principles. The first is that young people should be held more responsible for their behaviour, but not wholly accountable since they are not yet fully mature and are dependent on others. The second point is that society has a right to protection from illegal behaviour, even though committed by a minor. The third point is that young persons have the same rights to due process of law, natural justice and fair and equal treatment as adults, and that these rights must be guaranteed by special safeguards. Thus, the bill is intended to strike a reasonable and acceptable balance between the needs of young offenders and the interests of society.

I would like to highlight some of the provisions contained in the proposed legislation which seek to implement these principles. A significant feature of the proposed young offenders legislation is the abolition of the omnibus offence of delinquency itself. Under the new legislation, a young person would only be charged with a specific offence against the Criminal Code of Canada or other federal statutes and regulations. Misbehaviour, which presently constitutes the so-called "status offences", would no longer be an offence under the act. This proposal more realistically reflects the jurisdictional responsibilities of the federal and provincial governments under the Constitution. As well, it reflects the practice developed in many jurisdictions of decriminalizing behaviour which is seen as not being sufficiently serious to rationalize its continued inclusion under criminal law.

The age of criminal responsibility would be raised from seven years of age to 12. I firmly believe that the age of seven is much too young an age at which to attribute criminal responsibility. Children so young should more realistically be the subject of non-criminal proceedings such as child neglect and protection proceedings. I think I ought to note that there is, I believe, unanimous agreement among provincial attorneys general about this particular provision.

Under the existing law the provinces enjoy the flexibility of having the maximum age of jurisdiction set at any level, varying from under 16 to 18 years of age. Accordingly, the maximum age now varies across Canada. While promoting a maximum age of under 18 years, the new legislation will continue to allow the federal government to vary the maximum age at under 16 or 17 years at the request of a province. The most common criticism levelled against the new legislation is the lack of a fixed, uniform age for the entire country. Although it is clearly the preferred position of the federal government that uniformity should prevail, and many provinces agree with this concept, it has become abundantly clear as a result of the consultation process that there is no agreement and that it is impossible to achieve agreement on a uniform maximum age to apply across the country.

Provinces cannot agree on what that maximum age should be for dealing with young persons in a specialized juvenile justice system, both for philosophical and practical reasons. Differences exist as to when an individual is or should be considered sufficiently mature to be held responsible and dealt with as an adult. Practically speaking, due to the specialized programs, resources and services which are in place to deal with young offenders, considerable program shifts and adjustments would be required if the maximum age, which is under 18, were to be made uniform. Accordingly, it is proposed that the flexible upper limit be retained. Nevertheless, as a standard I hope the provinces—those who do not presently do so—will consider moving toward the age of under 18, as has been suggested by the federal government.

One particular feature of the proposed legislation is the acknowledgement that alternative measures to the court process can be used at appropriate times and in appropriate cases. It has been recognized for some time that many persons are brought to court unnecessarily when other effective ways may exist to deal with them and their behaviour problems. Such alternatives which have become popularized in the form of screening and diversion are not intended as a substitute for the judicial process, but rather to provide additional options for dealing with young persons who commit offences.

Informal and discretionary pre-judicial processes have become part and parcel of juvenile justice policy and administration in Canada. Police discretion, for instance, has for years been a fundamental cornerstone in the administration of justice. Probation and social service personnel make and accept referrals and undertake to initiate alternative agreements and programs with offenders, all in the interest of settling disputes and avoiding the utilization of formal court proceedings. Such approaches not only avoid unnecessary referral to the courts, but can offer the young person the opportunity to accept responsibility for his behaviour and become voluntarily involved in the resolution of his wrongdoing, frequently with the victim being involved.

However, we have been equally conscious of the controversy which exists between individuals and groups who espouse the informal versus the formal disposition of juvenile cases. There remain many concerns about the inherent dangers of exercising unfettered discretion in the application of diversion programs and to make sure that informality not trench upon the basic legal rights of young persons and their equitable treatment.

One of the criticisms of the new law has been to the effect that the federal government should have made diversion mandatory and more explicit. But the proponents of such arguments fail to recognize the importance to the young person of having the right to plead not guilty and the role of the provinces in the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. The use of alternative measures, in my opinion, is better left to the discretion of provinces which can develop programs to suit their particular circumstances.

For these and other reasons, including the belief that there is yet much to learn through experience about the diversion concept itself, new legislation does not prescribe any formal model or mechanism of diversion. While the legislation will sanction such practices in law, it will leave it to the provinces to decide what type of diversion programs will be implemented. Of particular importance, however, is the fact that the legislation does contain a number of conditions and safeguards which must be applied so as to protect young persons against potential abuses and arbitrary action. For example, that the young person must freely consent to participate and retains the option, at any time, of having the matter dealt with by a court; that the young person has the right to consult legal counsel before agreeing to any diversion program; and that alternative measures are not to be used in any case unless there exists sufficient evidence to proceed with the prosecution of an offence.

Another of the deficiencies of the existing law is in regard to its disposition or sentencing provisions. The proposed legislation will directly address the outdated and inadequate features of present sentencing policies by furnishing the youth court with a range of dispositions which delineate not only the over-all shift in the philosophy of the proposed act, but, more specifically, address currently accepted sentencing principles. Accordingly, the new legislation proposes a precisely defined range of sentencing options which will take into account the special circumstances and needs of young persons, while allowing sufficient scope and flexibility to provide for the rights and needs of victims of crime and address the need to protect society in appropriate cases.

Increased emphasis will be placed on formalizing in law community-based dispositions, such as community service, compensation and restitution orders, as methods of promoting, on the part of the offender, a greater sense of responsibility and understanding for his illegal behaviour, while at the same time attempting to promote reconciliation between offender and victim. These dispositions would be in addition to those of a supervisory nature, such as probation orders, where special conditions and requirements could be attached to meet the assessed needs and concerns both of the individual and also the community. Other dispositions would include an absolute discharge or the application of a fine which, under the proposed legislation, could reach a maximum limit of $1,000 as compared to the limit in the existing law of $25. In effect, the option of a fine, which is a very efficient form of punishment where appropriate, has really been unavailable because of the low ceiling imposed by the existing law which causes it to be a type of penalty that is not very meaningful.

Under the new legislation, the use of custody will be seen as a final resort which, when contemplated, is to be exercised with the utmost restraint. When it is being considered, it should reflect the seriousness of factors attendant to a specific offence or offences. Custodial dispositions will therefore only be given after very careful consideration, since they represent a radical restriction of a young person's freedom.

The youth court judge who is considering custody for an offender must request a predisposition report. Reasons must be given by the court for all dispositions. Custodial dispositions will be for definite periods of time but may not exceed two years in duration for a given offence, nor can they exceed the maximum period for which an adult could be sentenced for the same offence.

With regard to custody, it is important to note that the definition thereof is very broad, allowing a province to designate a variety of custodial facilities ranging from detention or containment centres to wilderness camps, community training residences or group homes. The essential feature in regard to all custodial facilities is that the young person's access to the community is restricted.

While the new legislation recognizes that the youth court is the authority which should decide whether young persons will be committed to custody, it also recognizes that there must be some built-in flexibility to allow the director of the provincial services plan to implement effective programs. Therefore, once the youth court has made a custody order, it leaves to the provincial director the administrative decision on the place and level of custody appropriate for the young offender.

The provincial director also has the flexibility to move offenders between institutions and programs and can authorize temporary releases to the community. In addition, the director can initiate an early release of a young person who is in custody to allow him or her to serve the balance of the disposition on probation in the community. Such a release is however, subject to review by the youth court at the request of the parties concerned.

It is the intent of the new act that the progress and welfare of young persons who receive custodial or other types of disposition should be subject to continuing attention and monitoring during the term of the disposition. To meet this objective, and to ensure that the public interest is safeguarded, an innovative and extensive review process is provided for, which will give all parties the opportunity not only to initiate the review of any dispositions but to attend and be heard. There will be a mandatory review in the case of any custodial disposition exceeding one year.

Contrary to the Juvenile Delinquent's Act, which is silent on the matter, the new legislation contains provisions regulating the creation, maintenance, confidentiality and use of juvenile court records. Under the present legislation, it is possible for an individual to carry the label "delinquent" well beyond his youth and, indeed, possibly for life. Although young offenders are intended to take responsibility for their illegal behaviour, the consequences for them are not intended to be as severe as those applied to adults in the ordinary courts. Therefore, when a young offender has completed his or her sentence and committed no further offence for a qualifying period, the record will be destroyed. The young person will thus be given a fresh start when he or she has shown it is deserved. The effect of this provision is that there would in law be no conviction against the young person; he or she would not face all the disabilities that flow from having a criminal record. That provision, I feel, should provide a young person with a major incentive to mend his or her ways.

The final aspect of the new legislation which I wish to deal with and which is of major significance is that of the rights of young persons. In determining the responsibility of young persons under new legislation, it is to be recognized that young persons have particular rights and freedoms, including the right to be heard in the course of, and to participate in, the processes that lead to decisions that affect them, as well the opportunity to be informed of their right as guaranteed under the law.

The foregoing principle is representative of our belief that the full exercise of due process under the law should be extended to young persons. We can no longer operate under a system of procedural irregularity when a young person's freedom and liberty are at stake, nor should a young person be exposed to the sanctions of the criminal law without at the same time receiving the benefits of the built-in protections it has to offer. A young person must be given the opportunity to defend himself and be judged in accordance with the principles of natural justice. No longer can we dispense with such fundamental rights because they are seen to conflict with treatment and rehabilitation ideologies, nor allow the exercise of unfettered discretion in dealing with young persons. I believe that the goals of reformation and rehabilitation for children are compatible with the protection of procedural guarantees.

Under the proposed legislation, the young person would have the right to retain and instruct counsel at all stages of proceedings in which he is involved. Special safeguards would be established in order to assure proper and equitable practices in the taking of statements. Parents would be notified of any arrest, detention and court appearance respecting their child and granted the opportunity to participate in the proceedings. Rules of evidence and procedure would provide the opportunity to challenge the Crown's case and present a defence. Furthermore, young persons would be granted the same rights of appeal as are available to adults.

It must seem strange to those who are unfamiliar with the existing legislation which affects young persons to hear that these rights and procedures do not presently exist. I look forward very much to moving those particular aspects of the legislation forward. The proposed legislation, which has undergone many changes and modifications in response to the views and recommendations expressed through a lengthy consultation process, will bring us a significant step closer to the achievement of a desired equilibrium between the prime objective of the criminal law to protect the public from criminal behaviour and the desirability of ministering to the needs of young persons who come into conflict with the law.

Last summer I had the honour and privilege of leading the Canadian delegation attending the sixth United Nations congress on crime and treatment of offenders in Caracas, at which the subject of juvenile justice was an official agenda topic. I was greatly encouraged by the fact that the only resolution adopted on this subject was to the effect that standard minimum rules for the administration of juvenile justice should be developed so as to protect the fundamental rights of young persons. The specific principles agreed upon largely reflected those included in the proposed Young Offenders Act.

I must say I am equally gratified to see the solid support and encouragement extended to the government and myself by the press and others who have commented on the new legislation. I am hopeful, as I indicated at the outset, that the bill can be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for further examination at an early date, and I will do my utmost to prevent any unwarranted delays in the passage of this legislation, the realization of which is so crucial to the youth of the country.

I want to add a word about a study, which I authorized and is now under way, of the juvenile justice system. What I have in mind and what is being developed by the research division of my ministry is a study on the functioning of the juvenile court to examine the activities undertaken by juvenile justice personnel in response to young persons being introduced to the juvenile justice system, observing the processing of juveniles in court, conducting surveys of court personnel and of parents and juveniles observed in the court. This is a study which will involve seven private research organizations in Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal, Halifax, Kelowna, B.C., Granby, Cowansville and Saint-Hyacinthe. There will also be a research initiative directed toward the rural circuit outside of Edmonton.

What I have in mind and what this study, which will cover a period of years, will develop is an assessment of the efficiency and effectiveness of the juvenile justice system, in the hope that changes can be made to the administration and that there can be an assessment of the effectiveness of the legislation I am now presenting in its early years of operation. This would show whether there are ways that the system could be made more effective and efficient in order to achieve its goals and also to satisfy taxpayers that it is operating as effectively and efficiently as possible.

May I conclude by urging the House to refer this legislation to the justice committee, so that the views of experts can be added to those of Members of Parliament, the legislation can be given full consideration and brought into effect as expeditiously as possible.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pick up on the last sentence spoken by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) with respect to this very important legislation. I know this has been a long session. We have had a long constitutional debate and a lot of us are tired, so I do not want to overreact; but if the Solicitor General is sincerely interested in getting this legislation through and in dealing with it in an expeditious and efficient manner, he might start off with the normal courtesy of bringing the legislation on when the official critic of our party is in the House. The Solicitor General was in touch with me yesterday. He knew that the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) was required to be out of the city today on official business.

This matter has been sitting on the Solicitor General's desk for well over a year. It is no secret, and he admits it, that the legislation was essentially drafted for him by his predecessor, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland. It is unfortunate that he has taken the unusual step of bringing it forward when he knows that our critic is not here, expecting us to deal with it in a propre manner. While I have an overview of the subject, I do not have the detailed and expert knowledge of the legislation that could be provided by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland. I am sorry that the spirit of co-operation which should prevail in this House was not shown here.

It was not bad enough for the minister to bring this legislation in at an inappropriate time, in the absence of the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland and the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour), both of whom have given a lot of consideration to this topic, but he has the effrontery to bring it forward at a time when the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs is sitting in another location on Parliament Hill and dealing with a very important matter.

● (1540)

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I had a fairly lengthy discussion with the official Conservative critic, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), about this matter. I indicated to him that I would not reflect on or mention his absence, but my friend has done so. I think one ought to remind the House that Parliament is sitting now and the top priority of the Members of Parliament should be to attend to the requirements of this chamber.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I simply reiterate that the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland is away on official business. This was known to the minister.

Many of us have been faithful in our attendance in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. We have been dealing with a very important piece of legislation with respect to freedom of information. A very important witness is there today, a former colleague of ours, Mr. Ged Baldwin. The problem which causes many of us some embarrassment is not being able to be in two places at one time. The minister can ask for co-operation from our side. However, once he starts co-operating on his side, he can rest assured that we on this side will do everything possible to give this bill proper, efficient and adequate consideration. We will not be unduly delaying this matter. Rather we want to get this bill into committee.

Mr. Kaplan: Why did your House leader agree?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The minister asks why the House leader agreed. The minister phoned and asked me specifically while I was in a committee meeting yesterday about the timing of bringing this legislation forward. I do not want to dwell on this aspect too long. I just want to let the minister know how unhappy I am with the way in which he has conducted himself. I agreed to make some calls to see whether it would be appropriate to go ahead and accommodate the minister in his request, but before I got back to my office I was advised that the deal was already finalized. We were advised and informed unilaterally by the government House leader, without any suggestion that there was anything wrong with it, that this legislation would be brought forward today. I have said enough about it now; I do not want to waste any more time. I simply say that I am very unhappy with the way in which this matter has been dealt with. I just want to vent my spleen, if I may, on the minister at this point so I can deal with the merits of the legislation in a proper way.

I want to deal with the bill and some of the developments which have taken place in regard to it. As the minister has pointed out, the legislation which this bill is replacing, the Juvenile Delinquents Act, was adopted in 1908. It was passed as a result of a concerted campaign by several child care workers and magistrates who were inspired by the youth court movement in the United States and the social reform ideas in vogue at that time.

In 1929, the act was consolidated with amendments which revised it somewhat. That was as a result of a federal-provincial conference on the revision of the Juvenile Delinquents Act. Despite minor amendments made by Parliament in 1932, 1935, 1936, 1947, 1949, 1951, 1972 and 1979, the act is to all intents and purposes the same legislation as that which existed in 1929.

I want to draw to the attention of the House some of the main features of the legislation. The philosophy of the present Juvenile Delinquents Act is a parents patriae social welfare type of approach wherein juveniles are seen as not being responsible for their actions. Juvenile courts are given complete jurisdiction over a child who has committed a delinquency, which might consist of a violation of the Criminal Code, a federal-provincial statute, a bylaw or an ordinance of a municipality, performance of immoral acts of some description or definition.

Under the present legislation, no formal diversion procedure exists whereby a young person is sent to a social agency rather than being processed by the court. Under the present legislation, if a young person has committed a delinquency, a judge can impose sanctions alone or in combination with such things as a fine of up to $25, placement on probation or placement in a foster home. There is provision for committal to the care of the Children's Aid Society or committal to a training school as well as the possibility of imposition of other conditions, such as restitution or the performance of a community service.

It may be important for us to understand what has led up to this particular legislation. There has been a considerable amount of consultation and study. A number of publications and reports have been prepared and issued on the problem of juvenile delinquents. In 1961, the then minister of justice established a five-man departmental committee on juvenile delinquents. In 1966, the standing committee in this House reported on juvenile delinquency and the report was tabled in the House. In 1968, a federal-provincial conference of justice ministers was held. They discussed the justice committee report and the reform of the juvenile justice system. In 1970, legislation was introduced through Bill C-192 in that year; it was called the young offenders act. It received first reading but was allowed to die because of some severe criticism levelled at the legislation during the course of that year.

In 1973, a federal-provincial conference of corrections ministers was held. They established a federal-provincial review group on the juvenile justice system. Also in that year, the solicitor general at the time set up an interdepartmental committee on young persons in conflict with the law. In 1975, that committee submitted its report. Between 1975 and 1977, the solicitor general's department initiated a consultative process on the 1975 committee report. In 1977, the solicitor general tabled a document called "Highlights of the Proposed New Legislation for Young Offenders". In June 1977, a federal-provincial conference of attorneys general and ministers of corrections discussed the highlights of the proposals. In 1979, the parliamentary secretary to the then solicitor general tabled the document entitled "Legislative Proposals to Replace the Juvenile Delinquents Act".

The present state of affairs in Canada is simply this. The juvenile justice problem is a significant one. In 1978, there were close to 91,000 delinquencies processed under the existing act. It is widely recognized that the law as it presently stands is outmoded and ineffective. It is badly in need of modernization. The preceding administration of the Progressive Conservative government had undertaken to make significant changes in the law, as evidenced in the document tabled in the fall of 1979 to which I have just referred.

To the extent this bill, C-61, is a manifestation of a realization that the law is in need of change, it is welcomed literally by everyone in the justice field. Many studies and reports that have been done in recent years indicate clearly there is need for change.

I want to look briefly at some of the provisions of the bill and consider the consequences and changes that are affected by this legislation. First, in terms of the policy approach of the bill, the minister made reference to the basic premise and philosophy of the bill in his opening remarks today. He referred to the three principles of the legislation. First, that young people should be held more responsible, although not wholly or fully accountable, with respect to their activities; second, that society does have a right to protection; third, that the young offender does have a right to due process and fair treatment.

The philosophy of the existing legislation respecting juvenile delinquents is found in Section 3(2). It provides that a child shall be dealt with "not as an offender, but as one in a condition of delinquency and therefore requiring help and guidance and proper supervision." If members refer to the paper tabled in this House in October 1975, they will see that the provision in the bill is similar to those set forth on pages 2 and 3 of the legislative proposals tabled by the then solicitor general.

● (1550)

Second, with regard to offences covered by jurisdiction, this bill covers only specific offences against the Criminal Code and other federal statutes and regulations. The offence of delinquency under the present law is abolished; the minister made reference to that. I will return to that aspect of the bill because there are some areas in which intensive negotiations and discussions with provincial counterparts will be absolutely essential to ensure that the legislation is fully effective. Without the assistrance and co-operation of the provincial authorities, the legislation will not be effective. In fact, it will suffer some very serious defects.

The position with respect to restricting the application of this legislation to the federal area of jurisdiction is in keeping with the recommendation made by the Law Reform Commission. It suggested excluding less serious conduct from the ambit of criminal law. I again refer hon. members to the 1979 report, page 4.

The third aspect is the way in which this bill deals with jurisdiction by age. The minister pointed out that the age of criminal responsibility has been raised from seven to 12 years of age. The maximum age will be 18 years. However, at the request of a province, the government may set the age of under 16 or 17 as the maximum in a particular province. The present legislation sets the maximum age at under 16, but allows for the establishment of different maximum ages upon provincial request.

This provision is quite interesting to me. I will refer to that later as well. It is an arbitrary age. There are some difficulties in terms of legislation affecting people on the basis of age. There are different people involved, different levels of maturity and development and different circumstances. I am sure everyone here will agree with the increase in the age to which this legislation would apply. As the minister stated, there have been consultations with the provinces. Two provinces suggested that the minimum age be raised to 14. The remaining provinces, the majority of those consulted, were satisfied with age 12. Statistics show that a significant number of 12 and 13 year olds are in conflict with the law. We should look at this revision if there is some area of complaint with respect to the way in which these particular provisions are going to apply in relation to uniformity of law across Canada.

In our debate recently on the Constitution, the government introduced the concept of opting out. Yet this is a very undesirable trait in legislation, according to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other spokesmen for the government, including the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). We have to ask ourselves whether this kind of provision will provide for the so-called checkerboard effect across Canada. For example, a young person may commit a criminal offence on the Macdonald-Cartier bridge which crosses the Ottawa river between Ontario and Quebec. At which end of the bridge the offence is committed will have some bearing. At one end of the bridge, if charged, he can take advantage of the Young Offenders Act, whereas if it occurs at the other end in the other province, it is quite a different proposition. One province may have determined the appropriate maximum age is 16, whereas in the other jurisdiction it may be under 18. I do not know where that would lead. Young offenders may decide to move to a jurisdiction where they can take advantage of a more modern law.

In terms of principles of criminal law and the uniformity concept, we should look at bringing some uniformity to this provision. It has been suggested by such people as the distinguished member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) that during the course of committee meetings we provide an option to those under the age of 18 years to make application in an adult court to have the young offenders provisions apply. In other words, young people across Canada could have available to them the provisions of this act even though the age of majority varies from province to province.

Suggestions will be made in committee in the hope we can come to some conclusion. I take it from the remarks of the Solicitor General there will be full and thorough examination in committee. There will be an opportunity to consult broadly with the people involved, young offenders and other young people, counsellors and others involved in pilot projects across Canada. The committee should have the advantage of that kind of testimony and full opportunity to ensure that the legislation will be the most effective that we can pass in this House. That is certainly the intent of members of my party, and I trust of all members of the House.

I want to deal with another aspect of the bill with regard to the diversion provisions. The bill makes special provision for diversions. Not all young persons who break federal laws have to appear in the youth court. Under this legislation, in lieu of having a case tried before the court, they have the option of providing a community service or agreeing to make restitution to the victim. This is all voluntary. It is an interesting and novel provision which I believe will receive general support.

There is nothing in the bill to preclude the accused from having the right to have the matter tried in the young offenders court where guilt or innocence can be established. Under the present legislation, there is no provision for a formal diversion procedure. There are provisions which have a similar effect in that a judge may have a hearing and then provide that the matter be adjourned sine die, to a date in the future not specified, without having guilt established if the accused agrees to some type of rehabilitative program. While there has been the development of this kind of practice in the courts, this new legislation will give formal recognition to the ability of the court to allow the accused young offender to perform a community service or make restitution without the necessity of fighting the case. It seems to me it has been recognized for some time that the criminal law need not be invoked in all circumstances. Many young people are needlessly appearing in juvenile courts.

● (1600)

I want to turn now to the nature of proceedings under this particular legislation. The bill is said to establish strong guidelines for proceedings. Offenders rights are made explicit; there is a right to counsel at all stages of the proceedings and a judge is required under this legislation to advise young people of their rights. This is different from the present act which is silent on rights. It provides that under summary conviction procedures the provisions of the Criminal Code apply. It also provides that all trials shall be as informal as possible. We will want to look at these provisions to make sure the rights and interests of not only the alleged young offender but also of society as a whole are adequately protected. We are entering new ground, uncharted waters, in this area.

The fifth aspect I should like to deal with has regard to the provisions in respect of detention and bail. The bill gives the same entitlement to bail as exists for adult offenders at the present time. The legislation does contain provisions by which notice must be given to a young person's parents, and provisions under which a young offender will by and large, in every case possible, be detained separately from adult offenders. The bill does provide that a young offender can be placed in the hands of a responsible adult to avoid the strict custody contemplated by incarceration in an institution.

The sixth aspect deals with transfer to adult court. This bill would allow such transfer when an offence is committed by a young offender after his fourteenth birthday. There are explicit criteria provided to guide a judge's decision. A judge must consider the so-called predisposition report and the parents' representations before making a transfer order, and transfer orders in themselves are subject to appeal. Again this is another area we will want to look at very closely, particularly the criteria judges must consider when making an order, to make sure the rights of young offenders and society are adequately and properly protected.

The seventh aspect is in respect of disposition. The minister has referred to disposition, known otherwise as sentencing powers. There is a wide range of options, anywhere from absolute discharge to incarceration for up to two years, with a wide range of additional conditions which a judge may feel appropriate under the circumstances.

Other aspects of the bill which are dealt with are fingerprinting and photographs. The bill does provide for photographs and fingerprints to be taken, but these are to be destroyed if there is an acquittal or if the proceedings are discontinued. There are also special provisions in respect of storage of these kinds of records, with control of access to the information in respect of young offenders. The present act is silent with regard to the authority to take photographs and fingerprints. This issue has been the subject of conflicting judicial determination in the recent past, so these provisions will be helpful in clarifying a situation which is now unclear, at least on the basis of judicial interpretation.

The bill does provide for public hearings. As members of the House know, juvenile delinquency matters have by and large been carried on in camera, away from public scrutiny. At the present time there is a prohibition against publication in the press particularly of names mentioned in the deliberations before a juvenile court. Under this bill the courtroom will be open, but restrictions remain on press reports regarding trials in juvenile courts.

The philosophy under the present act was that trials of children should take place without publicity and separately and apart from the trials of other accused persons. Everyone will agree that in camera hearings should be, and generally are, viewed with some suspicion and are more susceptible to potential abuse. As long as protection is afforded the young offender, with a prohibition against the publication of names and identifying information in relation to the young offender, it may be a step forward in opening the whole process of allowing more access to these courts, placing the court, its officers and even the judiciary under public scrutiny.

I will conclude my comments by dealing with some of the principles of the bill. With regard to youth court records under this legislation, when a sentence is completed and no further offence is committed within a qualifying period the records will be destroyed. The qualifying period is two years for a summary conviction and five years for an indictable conviction.

In the present situation there is no provision for the destruction of records, and there are no regulations for the creation and maintenance of confidentiality of, or accessibility to, juvenile records. Indeed, a young person after conviction could be labelled a delinquent for life under the law as it now exists. That situation will be changed by these provisions. As I say, there can be no argument against the proposition that young persons should be responsible for their actions, but one would hope that these illegal acts carried out by people in their youth should not carry severely undue consequences. One thing hoped to be accomplished by this legislation is that young people will be given an opportunity to make a fresh start in life through rehabilitation and redemption.

I think it fair to imply in general terms that our party agrees with the concept contained in this legislation. It is in fact modelled very much on the legislation brought forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland, when he was solicitor general. I recall that the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland said when this legislation was tabled he would grade it in terms of the three Rs. He said the bill does in fact give greater responsibility, does in fact provide for greater rights in respect of young offenders and does provide for greater flexibility in rehabilitation.

As I said at the outset, I do not know why the Solicitor General had to wait for the one day in the whole year when the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland was out of the House to bring forward this legislation. That hon. member may have been away another day because of illness, but I believe this is only the second day he has been absent. He is a faithful attendant. The fact of the matter is that the matter has been before him for some considerable time. He has indicated there are some provisions which must be looked at in terms of our committee work. It is very important for us to see that we obtain the best possible legislation, and I have addressed myself to some of its aspects. Obviously this bill cannot be the whole or total solution to the problem. It can only treat the symptoms of the disease. Young people in our country in their formative years need to be given some alternative to being on the streets and facing very severe criminal consequences.

There are some statistics which are quite distressing in terms of the development of criminal records and in terms of criminal activities in our country. Between 80 per cent and 90 per cent of adult criminals in Canada had their first brush with the law as juveniles. In such places as Winnipeg, Manitoba authorities have been in contact with more than 10,000 juveniles with respect to a variety of delinquencies ranging from highway traffic infractions to murder. The investigation to which I am referring revealed that boys as young as 15 years of age were charged with attempted murder and rape last year. In 1980, ten-year-old males were turned over to juvenile authorities to face charges of indecent assault and wounding. Boys of eight were charged with robbery.

As we sit in our comfortable pews across the country, we sometimes do not realize that these kinds of offences are occurring. I once came home to my own house and found that a magnificent robbery had taken place there. There was hardly a trace of the robbers. There was a broken window under a porch. It was a very professional job. I saw a couple of leaves on the floor. The perpetrators had gone upstairs without disturbing a thing and had taken a collection of silver coins. I was just amazed at that time to find that the robbers were two eight-year-olds. They were caught because a confectioner in the district became suspicious when he saw those silver coins. He called the police, who apprehended the boys. I happened to be talking to the juvenile court judge the next day. I told him how surprised I was to see these young children involved in this theft. It was hard for me to believe. He said, "This is the third time they have been before me". They each were eight years old.

This shows that some new approach has to be taken with respect to allowing such children opportunities for another new chance. This legislation by itself will not solve all these problems, but let us hope it is some assistance in terms of creating a slightly different attitude toward juvenile offenders.

Of course, certain young offenders are not covered by this legislation. They will be dealt with by social welfare officials, which gives rise to a conundrum. We are raising the age to 12 years, and everyone agrees that that is good, but whether social welfare agencies in each of the provinces will be able to deal adequately with this kind of situation is another problem. I think we should look at these things in committee and try to determine what is best for our young people and for society.

On February 14, 1981 the Winnipeg Free Press reported on an interview given by Sister Geraldine MacNamara, the director of the Rossbrook House, which will be known to hon. members from Winnipeg. Sister Geraldine spoke about young people getting into conflicts with the law at early ages. In the article Sister Geraldine said:

"If you have children getting into conflict with the law at a very early age it seems there are several other factors at work besides simple moral depravity—"

The article went on to say:

These young people are dealt with by professionals briefly or taken care of for a year or two in an institution and are then "immediately thrown right back into the same situation they came from," she said.

They must be given alternatives to a life on the street.

"As long as neighborhoods are allowed to deteriorate and people are left in a virtually hopeless situation, social problems like young offenders will continue," she said.

I suppose people such as the good sister who deal with these problems have an understanding of some of the problems we face in society with respect to dealing with young offenders and the very serious difficulties we have in trying to create an atmosphere in which these young people can have the opportunity in life so many of us have enjoyed in our great country, with its terrific potential and the opportunities which are available. If opportunities are available for so many, they should be available for all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: In this context I want also to make reference to the vital importance of working in conjunction with the provinces. Because if this legislation is passed in its present form, children under the age of 12 will no longer be covered under any provisions of the Juvenile Delinquents Act or the proposed young offenders act. Violations of provincial and municipal law will no longer be covered under the legislation, so the provinces need time and should be given time to develop appropriate complementary legislation.

An interview with Ross Paisley, the deputy attorney general of the province of Alberta, was reported in The Calgary Herald on February 18, 1981. In that interview Mr. Paisley said, and I quote:

"We've been working on this—

That is, complementary legislation to the proposed young offenders act.

—for some time and now just hope that we have enough lead time to get it into place"—

The article went on to say:

The proposed act does not cover offences under provincial and municipal laws.

The province, Paisley said, must therefore develop complementary legislation to deal with provincial and municipal offences.

He also made reference to the fact that his department will have to examine the child welfare act in that province to see if it needs beefing up in its provisions for children under the age of 12 years. This indicates that each of the provincial jurisdictions will now be directly affected by this legislation since it will put a new onus and a new responsibility on the provinces to deal with the void which now exists because of the changes brought about by this legislation.

In view of the fact that the federal government is taking this initiative, it is absolutely essential that there be full co-operation with provincial authorities to make sure there is, if at all possible, the most uniform treatment of our young people in Canada. It is one thing for the federal government to take steps which would reduce its responsibility under this act; it is another thing to do it only after such time as it is satisfied that there is adequate provision made for young people under the age of 12.

My colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), has pointed out to me that there has been some work done with respect to a diversion program in his city of St. John's. He indicates to me that it is an extremely impressive pilot project. He points out that the program secretariat was established in May of 1979. In September of 1979, the program received its first cases. Since that time more than 350 juveniles have paticipated in this pre-charge program which has brought both offender and victim together to work out a suitable settlement. Twenty-three volunteer mediators underwent training for their work, and these 23 volunteer mediators have been involved in mediation sessions, which have attempted to focus the responsibility on the offender. I think this is one of the purposes of this legislation.

My colleague has also brought to my attention some research work which has been done by a Dr. Frechette, who has been conducting research on juvenile offenders within the juvenile court system of Montreal. Dr. Frechette's early findings leave no doubt that the expansion of diversion programs, self-help programs and so forth is urgently needed across this country. Thus far, Dr. Frechette has studied 400 juvenile offenders. Of those 400 cases, 50 per cent have already made adult court appearances. Of those 200 individuals, between 70 and 80 have been sentenced to terms in penitentiaries. The question is and remains, how many of those 200 individuals might have been spared appearances in court in their adult years if programs such as diversion had been in operation?

We in this party are prepared to deal in a responsible manner with this legislation. I trust the legislation will be dealt with fairly and expeditiously. I hope it will be before the committee as soon as the committee has completed its work on the freedom of information legislation, which I hope will be completed before too long.

We compliment the Solicitor General for following the initiative which was taken by the previous solicitor general, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland. In his very brief period of time, he was an outstanding solicitor general. We hope the current Solicitor General will follow the traditions established by my colleague.

We accept the principle of this legislation, we want to work on it in committee, and I thank the House for its indulgence in allowing me to address this important piece of legislation.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in this debate on what is undoubtedly one of the most important bills which has come before this session of the House of Commons. As the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) indicated, we are dealing with legislation which has essentially been unamended and unchanged in substance since 1908 when it was originally introduced. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) points out that that was the year of his birth; of course, it was a very good year indeed.

In examining the provisions of this bill, it is important to look back at some of the principles which have guided legislators and parliamentarians in the past and which society has applied generally in dealing with the problem of young offenders or young people in society who have violated the law. There have been many attitudes taken to young offenders. Some 2,000 years ago, Socrates wrote:

> Our youths now love luxury, they have had manners, they have disrespect for authority, disrespect for older people. Children generally are tyrants. They no longer rise when adults enter the room . . . They gobble food and tyrannize their teachers.

That was not the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaking about the hon. member for Burnaby; that was what Socrates wrote some 2,000 years ago.

The response to various forms of inappropriate conduct on the part of young people has also varied over the course of history. We have seen very, very harsh measures taken against young people, measures which would be unthinkable today. For example, during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the use of hanging was commonplace in cases of serious offences by children, some as young as seven or eight years old. One example is an English case at Abingdon Assizes before Whitlock. One John Dean, an infant eight years old, was indicted, arraigned and found guilty of burning two barns in the town of Windsor. It appearing upon examination that he had malice, revenge, craft and cunning, he had judgment to be hanged and was hanged accordingly. That is how they dealt in those days with persons who burned barns. We might contrast that with the response of the present day.

As I said, the legislation was initially enacted in 1908. It was principled upon progressive reforms. The tone and purpose of that legislation was not to treat young persons as criminals, but to quote from the legislation itself, as "a misdirected and misguided child"; one needing "aid, encouragement, help and assistance".

There is no question that the Juvenile Delinquents Act of 1908 is seriously outdated today and must be substantially changed. But we must be very careful, in amending and overhauling this important piece of legislation, to keep in mind the important principle which was enunciated in the 1908 legislation, that we must not replace this bill with a Criminal Code for children. We must bear in mind the fact that young people who come in contact with the law must be dealt with in a special manner and that adequate resources must be brought to bear to deal with them.

It has been suggested by the drafters of the legislation that there is a shift in emphasis away from the important principle of 1908. In fact, one policy analyst of the Department of the Solicitor General, Mr. Tom Sterritt, has been very actively involved in drafting the bill. He stated that the new bill changes the focus of the law and that it may not be the needs or the welfare of the child that are paramount any more; it may be the protection of society. Indeed, the protection of society is and must be of great importance, but one must question whether by substituting a Criminal Code for children we in any way enhance the protection of society. I suggest the evidence is very much to the contrary.

Many studies have been done in the past of this important area, starting back in 1965 when a committee of the Department of Justice examined the area. In 1970, a bill was proposed in the House which met with great resistance and was substantially withdrawn by the government. In 1975, the interdepartmental committee tabled a report entitled "Young Persons in Conflict with the Law", which made a number of important and progressive recommendations. I will come back to that report in a few minutes. In 1977, there was a further attempt by the then solicitor general to bring in a document known as "Highlights of the Proposed Young Offenders Legislation", which withdrew from some of the important principles suggested in the 1975 report. Finally, as was mentioned earlier, in 1979 the Conservative government tabled a document indicating the general nature of the legislation they would be proposing in this important area.

There is no question that there are serious deficiencies in this area of the law, in the area of how we as a society deal with young people who have violated the law. Those deficiencies in the legislative structure have led to great frustration on the part of all people affected by them, starting, of course, with the police, who must enforce what is recognized by many to be a totally inadequate law. In many cases the police know that the resources which are being availed to young offenders are completely inadequate. Unfortunately—and I say this in the case of some police officers—their response is one of violence. They believe the young person will not be adequately dealt with within the context of the criminal justice system, and, therefore, in some cases we see instances of brutality against young people who have come in conflict with the law.

Fortunately this is not a common occurrence, but the recent report of a respected group in the province of Ontario, Justice for Children, documented a number of serious concerns in this area. I point this out as evidence of the fact that the police forces of the country are as frustrated as other elements in the justice community with the inadequacies of the Juvenile Delinquents Act as it presently stands.

There are suggestions of excessive force being used during arrests. There are suggestions of harassment of young people who have come in conflict with the law following their return to their communities. Surely these kinds of things must not be condoned. Hopefully they will be dealt with, not only through changes in legislation, but through changes in resources.

We must also recognize the concern of members of the judiciary. Juvenile court judges have commented frequently on the inadequacies of the Juvenile Delinquents Act and in many cases have expressed their exasperation and despair at the lack of an adequate judicial framework and a lack of resources. I will deal with the question of resources later in the course of my remarks.

We must recognize the element in the judicial equation which is often forgotten, and that is the victim of the offence. Too often we forget about the fact that there is a victim. The victim is shunted to one side, is not informed of what is taking place as a result of the offence, and of course suffers and feels quite justifiably that he is not an important element in the disposition of the offence.

We must bear in mind that there should be adequate victim support mechanisms. I am pleased to note that the Department of the Solicitor General has a couple of pilot studies presently under way which are attempting to focus greater attention on the role of the victim, with follow-up mechanisms to ensure that the victim is not a forgotten member of the justice community in cases such as this.

● (1630)

It goes without saying that in too many instances young people themselves who have violated the law hold those very laws in contempt. In many cases they recognize that they are dealing with the judicial treadmill and that the treadmill is one which is completely unsatisfactory to deal with the very serious concerns which society must face in the area of violations of the law, both in terms of violations of property law and in terms of the increased incidence of violence against persons, such as, for example, assaults. So, this is an important area. It must be dealt with. We must recognize that all elements of the justice community, whether it be the judiciary, probation officers—whom I have not mentioned yet but who are dealing with excessive case loads in many cases—the young people themselves and the police, all say that the time has come to fundamentally overhaul the way in which we deal with young offenders.

What about this legislation? There certainly are a number of welcome provisions in it, provisions which are long overdue. For example, the end to status offences and the hodge-podge of offences which in this day and age must surely no longer be contained in a civilized Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Another such provision is the omnibus charge of juvenile delinquency, which includes sexual immorality or any similar form of vice, whatever that means. We have seen that this is a particularly invidious provision because it often discriminates on the basis of sex. Young female delinquents are much more liable to be charged under this particular provision than are young male delinquents. Statistics for the most recent years show that while 11 per cent of all young people who were charged with delinquency were females, 42 per cent of those young persons who were charged with this particular offence of sexual immorality were females. In many ways it is a crime of female delinquency. We welcome the fact that this will be abolished in the new legislation.

We welcome the provision for public trials. We support the suggestion that while trials should be public, the names of the young people accused should not be disclosed. We welcome the end to indeterminate sentencing which, once again, constitutes discrimination against young people. At the present time no adult is subject to this form of indeterminate sentencing and surely, as a matter of equality before the law, this kind of sentencing should not exist. We are pleased to note that the new legislation would accept the recommendations of a number of committees and put an end to indeterminate sentencing.

We note that there are guidelines on the transfer of young offenders to adult court. At the present time the Juvenile Delinquents Act contains no guidelines. We recognize that the explicit mention of guidelines is long overdue in suggesting to the judiciary that when they exercise their discretion it must be exercised with extreme care. We may be soliciting the views of a number of witnesses as to whether or not the age of 14 is an adequate one and should be maintained for transfer or whether that age should be raised, as the Committee of Young Persons in Conflict with the Law suggested. They suggested that it should be raised to 16 years of age.

We welcome the increase in the age of criminal responsibility from seven years of age to 12. There are arguments which have been made, and we certainly will be examining them with care, to the effect that the minimum age of criminal responsibility should be increased beyond 12 years of age and that it should go as high as 13, or 14, as is the case in the Province of Quebec. Those arguments are compelling arguments, Mr. Speaker. In fact, they were accepted by the very distinguished committee which produced the report, namely, the committee of young persons in conflict with the law. I would suggest that there must be very strong reasons for rejecting that particular recommendation.

Finally, we are pleased to note the long overdue implementation of procedural safeguards, the right to access to legal counsel, the right to bail, and a number of other important procedural safeguards which so far have been denied young people who have come before the juvenile courts, although we might say that a number of judges have voluntarily extended those provisions in their courts. I would note that it was a Juvenile Court judge from the province of Alberta, the very distinguished Judge Litsky, who described the procedures in juvenile court as being star chamber procedures or black magic courtrooms. As I said, we welcome an end to those particular provisions of the Juvenile Delinquents Act. We welcome the recognition that young people are entitled to the same procedural safeguards as adults, since in many cases they are subject to very serious penalties if they are found guilty.

Having pointed out our support for these provisions in the proposed bill, and frankly, a number of other provisions in the bill, we do have serious concerns which we believe must be addressed. If there is one concern which is greater than all the rest, and which surely represents a flagrant violation of the principle of equality before the law, and which represents, in my view, a violation of the government's own charter of fundamental rights and freedoms, it is the government's failure to bite the bullet and impose a standard age, a standard maximum age right across this land to define what constitutes a young offender. The government has copped out on this important question and its excuses are simply not adequate.

Mr. McDermid: They have opted out.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): As the hon. member suggests, they have opted out. Of course, what this does is to create a checkerboard of rights right across this land. We have heard that from the Conservative Party because, of course, they have proposed an amending formula which would permit this very checkerboard of rights right across Canada. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) has recently suggested that maybe that is not what they will be doing, and the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) shakes his head quizzically. We are not exactly sure where he stands on this important question of a checkerboard of rights or a floor of rights right across the land. It can surely not be suggested that to define a young person in the city of Ottawa as a criminal and put him into the adult justice system and into an adult penitentiary for exactly the same conduct which a young person in Hull, across the Ottawa River, would be defined a juvenile delinquent, a young offender, and would be given the additional resources and would have been kept out of that adult penal system, is the right way to go about things. So, many of us here recognize that the penal system is almost an admission of failure, because if a young person of 16 or 17 years of age enters into such a system, there is no doubt whatsoever that their chances of getting out are very slim indeed. There have been many groups who have recommended—indeed, insisted—that there must be a simple recognition of equality before the law, a standard upper maximum age. The committee of young persons in conflict with the law in its report considered various options and recommended that the youth court have exclusive jurisdiction to deal with young persons between the ages of 14 and 18 years of age who have committed an offence. That committee has accepted as an absolutely essential requirement that there must be a standard maximum age right across the country.

I have said that the government's actions violate its own charter of rights. Section 15 of that charter says there can be no discrimination on the basis of age. How else can this particular provision of the Young Offenders Act be construed than as discriminating on the basis of age or as denying equal benefit before the law? I predict that if the government is foolish enough to go ahead with this provision, it will be challenged very quickly in the courts of our land where it will be thrown out as a violation of the government's own charter of rights. Thus, Mr. Speaker, that provision must be changed.

We welcome the suggestion that young people should be diverted from the formal criminal justice process wherever possible. But there are very grave dangers in the absence of any kind of adequate guidelines for dealing with diversion in this proposed bill. There are just simply not sufficient safeguards.

The concern here, of course, is one which has been echoed by a number of persons. Once again the excellent report of the committee of young persons in conflict with the law recommended a form of mandatory screening, a suggestion which is presently in effect in the province of Quebec. The Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) suggested that he was not prepared to accept that, because there must be an opportunity for a young person to plead not guilty. Of course, that could be a part of this legislation, and naturally should be a part of this legislation. We recognize that there is a very real danger in opening up the possibility of diversion. If adequate safeguards are not applied, the police and the prosecutors will, in some cases, use forms of coercion. When they do not have what they consider to be a safe enough case or a tight enough case legally, they might attempt to divert a young offender who, had he gone to court, would have been acquitted of a particular offence. So we must examine very carefully the diversion provisions. I suggest we must consider very favourably the possibility of a form of mandatory screening. We will want to hear from a number of witnesses on this particular suggestion.

The bill suggests that young people should be separated from adults when they are being detained. I am sure everyone in this House would agree with that principle. However, it permits a cop-out again, because what the bill says is that young people must be detained separately from adults, but when there is no place of detention for young persons available within a reasonable distance, they can be detained with adults. Not only does that violate the provisions of the international covenant on civil and political rights, but surely it must violate all standards of criminal justice which this House is prepared to accept.

To suggest that a young person, 14 or 15 years of age, could be detained pending trial with adults, with people who in many cases have been convicted of a number of offences, surely cannot be condoned. It is happening today. I can give a couple of examples. In the province of Quebec, a 15-year-old boy was kept in an adult jail. Why was he kept in an adult jail? Because there was no facility in Quebec to deal with anglophone juveniles. Nine out of 15 anglophone juveniles last year in the province of Quebec were sent to adult prisons. There is, as the social affairs minister in Quebec admitted himself, a chronic need for a centre dealing exclusively with anglophones. Of course, this bill would perpetrate that kind of inequity.

We see that in the city of Saint John, New Brunswick, there are young people who are being detained in cells in the same jail as adults. Of course, they are kept in separate cells, but, once again, this is not a separate facility. These children are being kept in a jail with adults. That must not be tolerated and the bill must be changed in that respect.

We have concerns about the provisions with respect to the subsequent use of records from youth court proceedings. There can be an argument made that a judge who is considering sentencing or disposition should have access to the full history of the person before him or her. However, to suggest that this record can be used more generally is, I would submit, a suggestion which could give rise to abuse. We will want to hear again from witnesses on that.

These are some of our concerns about the bill, but I suggest one of the most important concerns which must be addressed in this area of young offenders in the law is the whole question of prevention. This is an area which, with respect, neither of the two previous speakers have addressed. One need only look at the recent report which was tabled by the standing Senate committee on health, welfare and science, an outstanding report, entitled "Child at Risk". It points out that we, as a society, have failed our children, that those children who are being processed through the criminal justice system in many cases have no business being there, had we taken adequate preventive steps. It identifies a number of measures which could be taken, and points out that in many cases the failure to take these steps results not only in a young person coming in conflict with the law at the juvenile stage, but results as well in further criminal activity and in a budget of over $.5 billion for our correctional system in this country.

What are some of the factors that this committee identified? Surprising as it may be to some, perhaps, it said that we must go right back to the prenatal stage. We must look at malnutrition of the pregnant mother. We must look at the whole question of intrauterine abuse, the fetal alcohol syndrome, for example, the effect of smoking, the effect of the use of some drugs on the fetus itself. We must look at the effects of prenatal emotional stress. We must look, as well, of course, even after the child is born, at diet and at possible metabolic disorders. I suggest there should be some form of mandatory screening of all young people to ensure that they do not have dietary deficiencies or metabolic disorders. So, it pinpoints the prenatal stage as being one important area.

It turns then to the paranatal stage and suggests that conditions at birth can influence the subsequent behaviour of the child. For example, it even points to the special care which must be taken with premature children. It then turns to the time-frame of early parenthood and points out that there are significant stresses on single parents, partly because of the inadequate resources which are available to these families in our society at present.

It talks about the effects of emotional deprivation. Study after study has shown that almost without exception, violent offenders have been shuffled between foster homes, have come from broken homes and have simply not had adequate resources when they were young. To quote from one study, they were unwanted at birth, they had frequent placements in infancy, and then graduated almost always from minor offences to major crimes.

The whole area of child abuse is another one which has been identified as an important element in dealing with the question of young offenders: the use of violence against children and the possibility that, in turn, children will see violence as an acceptable alternative. The distinction between a spanking and a beating, and the condonation of that distinction in our criminal code under Section 43, is one which I, for one, cannot support.

There are a number of other recommendations which are made by this excellent study and which I hope will be acted upon by the government. It talks about the influence of violence in the home and about the importance of parents and other role models in the home setting an example on the use of violence. Perhaps one of the most important areas that it pinpoints is the question of violence on television, the fact that in many cases television sets are used as babysitters, that in the course of an average child's lifetime, he or she will see on television some 13,000 or 14,000 people dying; the perpetration of values on television program after television program which suggest that the accumulation of wealth and greed is desirable; the despair and the frustration at the gap between expectation and reality. Violence unquestionably breeds violence. It points out the importance of adequate, well-funded daycare facilities to ensure that when a parent must work, the children are adequately looked after. We certainly support that recommendation.

Finally, it talks about the unquestionable link between poverty, about the fact that there are over one million children in this country who live in conditions of poverty, and the link between poverty and later juvenile delinquency. Let me quote the following from a report which is as valid today as it was when it was written in 1975, a report called "Poor Kids", by the National Council of Welfare:

> To be born poor is to face a greater likelihood of ill health—in infancy, in childhood and throughout your adult life. To be born poor is to face a lesser likelihood that you will finish high school; lesser still that you will attend university. To be born poor is to face a greater likelihood that you will be judged a delinquent in adolescence and, if so, a greater likelihood that you will be sent to a 'correctional institution'. To be born poor is to have the deck stacked against you at birth, to find life an uphill struggle ever after. To be born poor is unfair to kids.

● (1650)

Surely, to be born poor, must be unacceptable to all members of this House.

What are some of the other concerns that must face us when dealing with this area of young people in conflict of the law? What is perhaps one of the most important concerns is the totally inadequate allocation of resources by governments, federal and provincial, to this important area. I need only point to an example in my own province. Recently a report was issued showing that juvenile offenders were being kept in overcrowded centres in British Columbia and that perhaps as many as 40 per cent or 50 per cent of the kids presently being held in detention centres have no business being there. The only reason they are there is because society has not provided the funds for any other resource. These youth detention centres, one of which is located in my constituency, are grossly overcrowded. There are no facilities whatsoever to deal with the psychiatrically disturbed young offender.

Where are our priorities as a nation when we can put millions and millions of dollars into building new penitentiaries in Renous and Dona Conna but fail to allocate adequate resources to ensure that young people who come in conflict with the law, are dealt with.

There are other concerns, Mr. Speaker. I have mentioned the example of the youth detention centres and the failure to allocate adequate resources to them. Many examples can be given of what we set as the priorities of this nation. I know that my time is limited and I will not abuse that, but I should like to give a couple more examples, if I may.

There are no secure psychiatric facilities whatsoever for juveniles in the province of British Columbia. Emotionally-ill children are mixed in with juvenile delinquents. The supervisor of one of the youth detention centres has said that all they can do is to assign staff to watch over disturbed youths. He said it was a really tough time for the staff because they feel so helpless and that "We just followed her around" referring to a particular patient.

In an article in the Vancouver Sun of March 6, 1980, a Dr. Gossage is quoted as follows:

> I am unaware . . . of any facility in this province which can help him. And I have to say I think that't just terrible.
> . . . He is but one of many children who are going down the tube because of the failure of society to address this problem.

This is a scenario which is repeated in province after province. In Ottawa, the hospital has stopped admitting young people who are psychiatrically disturbed saying that unquestionably, unless the provincial government of Ontario allocates adequate resources, there will be suicides and serious repercussions as a result.

I could cite examples on and on, Mr. Speaker. What is clear is that our society has not placed adequate priority on the allocation of resources to young people who have come in conflict with the law. We have seen a dramatic increase in the suicide rate among young people. In the province of British Columbia, for example, 50 adolescents committed suicide in 1979. The failure to provide adequate treatment for emotionally disturbed young people is an indictment both of provincial and federal governments and is not dealt with by this bill. There must be adequate minimum standards right across this land.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, while I welcome a number of the innovations in this bill and recognize that some important steps forward are being taken, I have serious concerns over and above the concern with the bill itself. I suggest that we as a society must realign our priorities and recognize that our young people, our children, must be a priority. We must implement the recommendations of the committee on the International Year of the Child and of the special Senate committee which wrote the report "Child at Risk". We must surely consult with these and other groups and with the provincial governments which must implement this legislation. I suggest we invite representatives of all provincial governments to appear before the justice committee as an example of the co-operation which should take place in this field.

If we can allocate millions and millions of dollars to the Space shuttle "Columbia" and take great pride in our accomplishments in that area, surely to goodness the time has come to allocate adequate resources to young people in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for the opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C-61 which enacts the young offenders act. At this stage of the bill it is appropriate to consider the general principles that underlie it and also some of the specific provisions which ought to be given special consideration.

Before I do that, I wish to make some remarks of a more personal nature. The young offenders act which is to replace the Juvenile Delinquents Act, represents years of evolution with respect to the treatment of young offenders in Canada. In many cases, debate in this House is based upon documented experience, but I have had a long career dealing with juvenile offenders and with the administration of the laws that apply to them. I think it is worth recording that when I commenced my law practice 25 years ago in Halifax, the Juvenile Delinquents Act, which was then the statute in force, did not even apply in the county of Halifax. That particular statute applied at the option of the province in cities and towns and could be excluded in certain places within a province. In 1956 in Halifax county, juveniles did not have the benefit of the Juvenile Delinquents Act but were treated as adult offenders. I give this example to illustrate that while progress is slow, it is made.

One of the reasons there has been such a long period of evolution in the development of law relating to juvenile delinquents is the fact that the Juvenile Delinquents Act was first enacted in 1908 as Chapter 40 of the Statutes of Canada. When one considers the times, it was a relatively thoughtful statutory provision. One of the ideas behind that statutory provision was that it would creat one offence which would apply to all illegal conduct by young persons. That offence was called a "delinquency". The persons who formulated that law at that time had in mind that young persons ought not to be charged in a specific way for the wrongs they might commit or for the violations of laws that might occur.

The idea was to realize that young persons were simply offenders who had breached the law without giving full regard to the exact law that had been breached. It was in this way that the concept of a delinquency was created, and that concept endures to this day. It is a concept that we should not lightly dismiss, that of an offence of delinquency, in favour of a specification of an offence which a young person might commit. That is one thing that we should review very carefully when we consider this bill in the House and in committee. It is a concept that has stood the test of time. There are many who feel that it ought to be changed, but it is still worth careful consideration before that particular change is made.

I was somewhat disturbed by the remarks of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) when he entered the debate, with the respect to the absence from the House of the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence). I think it can be said that the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland, as a former solicitor general, has a great interest in this bill. It is unfortunate that he is not able to participate in the debate on second reading because I think he would have a great deal to contribute. I am sure it was with that in mind that the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) mentioned the haste with which the bill was brought before the House for consideration, not with the intent of casting any recrimination on anyone, but rather to say that this was an unfortunate occurrence.

I sincerely hope that the Solicitor General has not interfered with the non-partisan spirit that ought to pervade in a debate dealing with young persons in Canada, by interjecting that unfortunate remark. I can say to him that in this very House yesterday when Bill C-58 was called, his colleague, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) was not here to speak to it. He might confer with his colleague and ask him where he was and why he was not present in this House when the bill he sought to have approved on second reading was being considered. When we cast dispersions on other members with respect to their presence or absence from this House, we enter on dangerous ground.

There is one other matter for which I am entitled to take the Solicitor General to task, and that is his suggestion that Bill C-61 ought to pass this House with a minimum of debate and then be considered in committee, presumably the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I say that because I think all members in this House ought to be very interested in any provision which affects the young people of Canada in such a serious way as this young offenders act does. If any debate was justified in its prolongation in this House so that members could consider and express their thought on such an important measure, surely it is this piece of legislation. Any suggestion that it should be swept through this House with a minimum of debate and discussion is not acceptable to me. In many ways, I think it destroys the credibility of those who seek passage of this bill and approval in this House. The bill is indeed of a non-partisan kind. It was formulated through committees, public discussion and discussion within departments. It was brought forward through previous solicitors general and considered by a great many people. I would certainly like to think that the motivation of those people who dealt with the legislative provisions, now included in Bill C-61, was to improve the situation, create a better law applicable to juveniles and young persons across Canada.

I want to comment briefly on the matter not specifically dealt with by previous speakers and which reflects, to some extent, on the remarks made by the previous speaker. In Canada, we have a very difficult situation, as everyone in this House knows. In their wisdom, the framers of the British North America Act decided to vest in the federal authority, the Parliament of Canada and, the Government of Canada, the right to enact criminal law legislation. At the same time, the Fathers of Confederation vested in the provinces of Canada the administration of that criminal law. So we have these two elements in the administration of justice in Canada: the federal authority enacting a law, and the provincial authority administering the law.

I say that because a great many remarks relate to the treatment of young persons within provinces whether they are young offenders or whether they are in difficulty of a kind which might involve them with other legal process. Those persons, to a great extent, are the responsibility of the provincial authorities. While we would all seek to have them dealt with in an appropriate and gentle way in order to dissuade them from any unlawful activity in the future, it cannot be a part of this particular bill.

As I understand it, this bill is made by the Parliament of Canada pursuant to its authority to enact criminal law legislation. That is what the bill must deal with. Social justice is a subject which ought to be, and I am sure is, important to all members of this House, but it is a matter which cannot be dealt with effectively as part of the implementation of the authority to enact criminal law.

That leads me, first, to consider briefly the history of Bill C-61, because other members have dealt with it. I want to record thanks for the work of the committee which provided a report in 1975 called the report of the committee on Young Persons in Conflict with the Law. I think it is worth while to refer in specific terms to some of the thoughts which were expressed by the formulators of that report. I should say perhaps that the report was made to the solicitor general of the day, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand). The committee was under the direction of the deputy solicitor general of Canada of that time, Mr. Roger Tassé. Contained in the report is a statement which bears recording in this House. Under the heading of "The Challenge of our Times", we read:

> Within a modern democratic society, it is neither possible nor desirable to expect that the life styles and behaviour of individuals will conform to a single standard. A society that places a high premium on the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms and prizes material success and rewards individual aspirations, must recognize that the pursuit of such ideals also fosters a diversity in forms of behaviour.

I think that thought was well expressed. Canadians ought to realize they cannot expect from our young persons a standard of conduct or a similarity of behaviour. Our system has to realize and recognize there are those who will not conform to the standard and, for a period of time, hopefully a limited period of time, may find themselves in conflict with the law.

The law we want to formulate in this House is a law which will recognize that difficulty and will deal with it as a social difficulty, not in the frame of mind that we must punish those who, in their youth, find themselves in a difficult situation—although punishment may be a method by which persons are brought to a proper course of action and standard—but to provide a system which redirects the course of those who run afoul of the law.

With that in mind, I want to repeat what I said earlier with respect to the Juvenile Delinquents Act of 1908. It charted a course, which I think has been a very effective one and one which I have watched grow over the years. There are a great many things which can be done to improve the law. We ought to keep that in mind. However, we must recognize that the course which was charted in 1908 is one that we would be wise to follow.

I want to review the provision of Bill C-61 in more detail. First, I want to comment on something which has arisen already in this debate, that is the interrelation of the new young offenders act, enacted by Bill C-61, with the constitutional provisions proposal now before the Parliament of Canada. In very simple terms what I am concerned with is that that constitutional proposal contains a charter of rights. As the heading of the proposal indicates, it guarantees rights and freedoms. One of the freedoms and rights it guarantees is non-discrimination before the law.

I will not detail the provisions of the constitutional proposal other than to say that discrimination is outlawed. I do want to question whether the Government of Canada now seeking to have this proposal approved by this House of Commons and adopted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom and made part of the law of Canada has properly considered those provisions of the charter of rights in relation to laws such as the young offenders act.

I am not questioning the motives of the framers of the provisions of the young offenders act. I am just suggesting to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this House, that this is yet another situation in which the Government of Canada has given evidence that it does not really appreciate, realize or recognize what the effect will be of the charter of rights provisions, or what the effect will be on the people of Canada. In this very bill, as pointed out by previous speakers, the government suggests that there is a provincial option with respect to the application of the act to persons of varying age. Under the provisions of the act, it can be applied to young persons under the age of 18, under the age of 17, or of the age of 16, in accordance with the option selected by a particular province.

Obviously this creates a checkerboard across Canada, as has been mentioned. It creates the possibility of discrimination in relation to the application of a law. It raises the very question with which the charter of rights presumably deals. We question how well thought out this proposal is in relation to the new constitutional provisions.

I want to mention that because there are many other areas I could mention with respect to the application of the charter of rights. Strangely enough, I was present in this House last night when Bill C-58, which amends the Canada Elections Act, was before the House. That act contains provisions relating to voting rights. At the same time, the constitutional proposal in the charter of rights says that every citizen of Canada has the right to vote in an election. There is another illustration in which the government of Canada has not related the provisions of its constitutional proposal, that is, the specific provisions of the charter of rights, to the provisions which we are considering in this House.

When this comes to the committee, somebody will have to look at this very carefully and decide whether the provisions of Bill C-61 which relate to the age at which the legislative provisions apply to young persons in a province can be enacted in light of those constitutional provisions.

My suggestion in that connection is that what we must have and must look for is flexibility in the law, not a discriminatory provision. The law might be so worded that it can be taken advantage of by certain young persons under 18, that it can be applied at their option, or something of that nature.

I can see where there is a difference of opinion as to whether persons of 17 or 18 years of age ought to be dealt with under the law as young offenders or as adults. However, I do not think that the law should apply differently across Canada. That is something which has caused difficulty in the past. If we are going to remedy the mischiefs of the past, this is the time to do it.

With regard to the provisions of Bill C-61, in relation to the definition of young persons, I suggest that some method be established to provide for flexibility. However, we ought not to start on a course that will result in a different application across Canada. In the case of the government of the day, it is not consistent with the course of action they have adopted with respect to the charter of rights in the constitutional proposal.

I have heard other speakers in this House deal with some of the specifics of the bill. I do not want to repeat what has already been said, but there are a number of matters I would like to deal with very briefly. The first is: the provision under the bill for what is called "alternate measures". This provision simply means that a young offender suspected of violating the law, when brought before the authorities, need not be brought to a youth court, that is to say, a judge of the youth court; he or she can be dealt with in a different way. The bill spells out in what way that person can be dealt with. I want to warn people that this is potentially a very dangerous provision. It is totally dependent on the good faith and good offices of those who administer our criminal law. From my own experience, I think it right and proper for me to suggest that one can have confidence in our law officers across Canada, but there is always the exception that proves the rule. There are those among our law officers whom it may be dangerous to entrust with such power or authority.

Under the previous law, it was possible for a juvenile court judge, when he had a youth before him, to suggest a course of action other than proceeding before that juvenile court. I am not entirely sure that that kind of provision is not more sensible, one that is more likely to avoid any difficulties or mischiefs. I point this out because I know it is of real concern to a number of people who examined the young offenders legislation in its various stages, including the format in which it now appears before this House, namely Bill C-61.

The real pith and substance of this bill is the youth court. The success of the new provisions will rise or fall with the capability of the youth courts across Canada and the persons who act as judges and officers of those youth courts. What we are dealing with in this bill, as in all legislative measures, are people. We can enact any law we want, but if the people do not administer that law fairly and faithfully, the provisions that we enact in this Parliament will go for naught.

I want to examine very briefly the administration of the Juvenile Deliquents Act across Canada in the case of most provinces by the family court or equivalent. In my province of Nova Scotia, as I have indicated, the practice has developed to the point where all juvenile offenders are brought before the family court of Nova Scotia. The family court there, as in many provinces, not only has a legally trained judge, but, in most cases, there are social workers available, as well as psychiatric and other medical help. Indeed, there are other officers who can perform the functions which are required to assess offenders and to chart a course to set them on the road to change. We must recognize very clearly that under this bill the youth court, its function, and the function of its officers will determine the value of this bill when it is enacted and applied across Canada.

Let me point out again that the youth courts are the responsibility of the provinces. When the Solicitor General comes before the House of Commons, presents a bill and sets up a court which is called the youth court, which is merely the family court which has existed and functioned in most provinces for several decades, let us not be fooled that this is an improvement in the law which the Government of Canada is now sponsoring. What the Government of Canada has to provide to create any real effect in an area of this kind is the funds, resources and capabilities which allow for improvements in our provincially constituted and appointed courts such as the family court.

Let us not be fooled into thinking there is any magic in this bill. Let me digress to say that much of my legal career was spent in legislative drafting as legislative counsel for the province of Nova Scotia. I was reminded daily that the laws which we were framing, proposing and enacting would accomplish nothing unless the laws were properly applied. More important, the farther we get away from the basic law, the basic concept of fairness—and, I suggest, the ten commandments are as good a representation of the basic law as you will find—the more difficulties we can create.

I do not want anybody to think that by enacting a new young offenders act with more elaborate provisions and procedures we are resolving the problem. The problem has to be resolved by people, by good faith and by careful consideration of the problems which come before our youth courts and the problems in which the youth courts find themselves involved.

In this connection, mention was made of preventive action. There again we are not referring to the criminal law or criminal justice system but to the whole social justice system. In the many years that I appeared before juvenile and family courts, I have never seen a child who did not have another problem which was not connected with the criminal justice system. In practically every case, although there were notable exceptions, the child brought before the court had experienced difficulties in his or her family life or educational life causing a departure from standard behaviour. It is only through a competent and effective social justice system that we can remedy these kinds of defects.

Let us not forget the parents. Most offenders who come before family and juvenile courts across this land, with notable exceptions, have difficulty in their family life and in their relationships with their parents. The more serious cases in the provinces can be corrected, or at least dealt with by children protection laws. These laws, as far as I am aware, exist in every province of Canada.

● (1720)

I want to be clear again that we do not discharge our responsibilities by merely enacting and passing in this House of Commons a young offenders act. We have to work to improve our social justice system. We have to work to improve the facilities available through our educational system and through our help to families in need so that the situations which result in proceedings before juvenile and family courts are corrected before they reach that stage.

In that sense, I suppose there is a preventive action involved in our deliberations, but it is very clearly one we cannot successfully deal with in this House of Commons by considering a bill of this kind. As I have said, it is wise for us to keep that in mind.

There has been a long history to the Juvenile Delinquents Act in Canada. I want to call to the attention of members, particularly the Solicitor General, what I believe to be the words of his department, at least to the extent that the publication I will now refer to was preceded by a letter from the Solicitor General.

In that document it is indicated that the word "delinquency" has acquired a pejorative connotation. You will recall that I began my address with an explanation of that word. It is now associated with the word "criminal". In this proposed young offenders act we are moving away from the pejorative term "delinquent".

Let me remind all members of this House that this is exactly what this House of Commons thought it was doing in 1908. Members then thought they were moving away from the treatment then given young offenders. They thought they were moving away and creating a new course of action to be applied to young offenders, and they called that new course of action "delinquency". Some 70 years later we are saying that term has acquired a bad connotation and we are simply moving to other terms, "young offenders" and "youth court". I can tell you, just as sure death and taxes, there will be another House of Commons assembled in 25 years, 50 years or maybe 100 years' time, which will be saying we have to change this young offenders act because it has acquired a terrible connotation. It is now regarded as criminal. It is a terrible thing and nobody wants to be known as a young offender. I know the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will not be here at that time, and neither will I, but I know it will happen.

Mr. Knowles: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Crosby: I did say in 50 years' time. Let us not fool ourselves and let us not try to fool the public about what we are doing and trying to accomplish here. What we are trying to do is simply to improve the system. We are trying to give the juvenile offender and the system that applies to him a new start. That is all we can do. We can introduce new terms, we can make a few changes, but we have to come to grips with the real and effective provisions of this bill.

To demonstrate why we may not be doing that, let me point out that one of the most offensive provisions of the Juvenile Delinquents Act is that provision under which a juvenile can be transferred to an adult court for prosecution. That is one of the most offensive provisions and this proposed act has hardly changed it. Steven Truscott would still go to trial in an adult court. A 14 or 15-year old who commits murder will still probably be exposed to the regular criminal process. That is how we are coping with some of the problems that arise. That is our great evolution in relation to the Juvenile Delinquents Act. In so many cases we are just changing the label; we are just varying the procedures.

As I said, and I repeat—and let me close on this note—what we have to consider are the people who administer justice as it applies to young persons across Canada. We have to consider the personnel in our youth courts; the judges, the social workers and everybody else. Those are the people who are going to make for a better system of dealing with juvenile offenders. Those are the people who are important, not the law.

We can contribute by giving the administrators of the juvenile justice system, if I can call it that, an instrument through which to apply their abilities, allowing them to help offenders and chart new courses for them. That is all we can do. We can work toward that task. As I have said, this does not involve political parties. It is a non-partisan task because we are working for the people of Canada, and I hope the Solicitor General will keep that in mind.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Kaplan: Question.

Mr. McDermid: You will have to be patient for a little while, Mr. Solicitor General. The Solicitor General is calling for the question, Mr. Speaker, but I think he is just a little premature as there are a number on this side of the House who wish to address Bill C-61, the proposed young offenders act.

I should like to preface my main remarks by congratulating the minister. This is his first bill in the House. Although he cannot claim it as his bill because it was formulated by his predecessor, I am sure it is a great experience to introduce and pilot it through the House. I congratulate him and I wish him luck.

I am the first non-lawyer to speak on this subject in the House, and I do not make any apologies for that at all, not one. My responsibility with the Progressive Conservative Party is in respect of the young wing of the party and of youth concerns. I feel it is incumbent upon me to address this House on this legislation, a bill which has some very long term ramifications for our justice system.

Let me start by saying we agree with the concept of greater rights, greater responsibilities and greater flexibility in dealing with the rehabilitation of young offenders. This is a very good concept. It is long overdue. I am not even going to touch on the subject of its history as that has been covered by my colleagues.

I should like to touch upon a few subjects, the first being age. Under Clause 2(1) of Bill C-61, a child is defined as being anyone who is or appears to be under the age of 12 years; it defines a young person as anyone who is or appears to be over the age of 12 and under the age of 18.

There is also a provision in the same clause that the governor-in-council may issue a proclamation at the request of a province to establish the maximum age of a young person as being either under the age of 17 or 16 years.

The consequence of this provision is that the youth court would have exclusive jurisdiction in respect of an offence committed by a young person between the ages of 12 and 16, or 17 or 18. A person under the age of 12 is to be subject to provincial child welfare legislation. Where the individual is over the age of 16, 17 or 18, he would be subject to ordinary criminal law and the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts.

The change effected by Bill C-61 is that the minimum age of jurisdiction of the youth court is to be increased from 7 to 12 years, and the maximum age is to be increased from 16 to 18 years with the possibility of a reduction rather than an increase, as is presently the case under the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

The effect of increasing the minimum age is that the youth population which will be subject to provincial laws and social welfare programs alone will increase dramatically. This will put a tremendous additional cost on the provinces. Of course, we are interested to find out if there is any increased funding in view of the shuffling off of these responsibilities to the social welfare programs of the provinces. It also would have the effect of decriminalizing any delinquent acts committed by those who are under the minimum age. The effect of raising the maximum age would be to increase the number of young people who would be subject to the juvenile justice system at the upper age limit and require that a province request explicitly that this be reduced. Despite many attempts over the years to establish a uniform maximum age across the country, the federal and provincial governments have been unable to come to an agreement on this issue, and I think that is unfortunate.

• (1730)

The inequity in our justice system across the country has been well covered today. People will be treated differently because of their ages. In fact, we know that the current age level in the various provinces and territories is as follows: in Quebec and Manitoba the age is 18 years; in British Columbia the age is 17 years; in all the remaining provinces and territories the age is 16 years. In Newfoundland, where the Juvenile Delinquents Act does not apply, the age under provincial legislation is 17 years.

Mr. Kaplan: Sixteen and a half.

Mr. McDermid: Sixteen and a half, is it? The Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) is at least following my remarks, and I am pleased about that.

Despite these many attempts, we have been unable to do it, and I hope we can address that particular problem in committee. I tend to agree with my colleagues when they say that this will have serious ramifications on equality of law in the country.

One of the concerns which has been expressed to me by those people who deal with the courts is that there is no provision and no option for those under the age of 12 who do get into trouble with the law and whose cases perhaps should be referred to a youth court. There is no provision for that. We heard today about examples of young people to whom an appearance in family court in all likelihood would be to their advantage and for their well-being, but that will not happen, and I think the minister should examine some of the cases in the province of Quebec. In fact, he mentioned this in his address. In some of these cases in Quebec social workers have handled young people under 12 exclusively and have not referred them to the court. Some of the stories are somewhat disturbing. I hope that is something we will look at in the committee and discuss fully. We should discuss whether an option should be provided to a child under the age of 12 who is a chronic problem. Perhaps such cases can be referred to family courts if it is felt that that is necessary. I cannot see how that would be possible under this bill, unless provincial governments set up other courts to handle these problems or institute legislation giving them the power to refer cases to family courts.

The present Juvenile Delinquents Act does not define offences covered in the legislation as such, but defines as a juvenile delinquent a person between the ages of 7 and 16. The youth court would have jurisdiction now under Bill C-61—which has, as I said, reduced dramatically the number of offences for which a young person could be brought before the youth court—with respect to federal offences only. Under Bill C-61, any violations of provincial or municipal law or any status offences would be subject to provincial child welfare and child protection legislation.

The differences in philosophies between the present Juvenile Delinquents Act and Bill C-61 are most apparent in the social welfare approach of the Juvenile Delinquents Act and the alternate measures we find in Bill C-61. The declaration of principles in the Juvenile Delinquents Act, as I said, takes a social welfare approach by which concerns about the behaviour of young people is expressed, and the courts merely provide a means by which social intervention can take place to deal with the family and environmental causes which lead to alleged delinquent behaviour.

The declaration of principles in Bill C-61 constitutes a somewhat different approach for dealing with young people. First, the new legislation would cover specific acts committed by young people and not their behaviour as such. Second, the declaration of principles recognizes some of the contradictions inherent in applying criminal law sanctions to situations in which individual acts take place in particular socio-economic environments. It recognizes that there are not only individual rights to be protected but also that the social impact of certain acts must be minimized. It recognizes the due process rights of young people but also their responsibilities, as well as those of the family and society.

There is a number of concerns with respect to this legislation about which I want to talk for just a moment. I know they will be discussed more fully in the committee. In this legislation there is no provision for contributing to juvenile delinquency. This has caused some concern, mainly because the acts of a person who contributes to juvenile delinquency will be dealt with in a senior court, and young people will probably in many instances be the only witnesses and will have to testify in senior courts. Clause 60 of Bill C-61, a new clause, covers evidence of a child or a young person and solemn affirmations. This is an excellent clause. I recommend to the minister that it be incorporated into the Criminal Code. If an individual is charged with contributing to juvenile delinquency, perhaps young witnesses will have to appear as the only witnesses in senior courts.

My colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), touched on differences in ages. Many solutions have been offered. One suggested solution was the option of petitioning a family court to be heard in a higher court for a particular offence. In those areas where juveniles are those people under the age of 16, it could conceivably be that people 17 and 18 might have the option of petitioning higher courts to be heard in family courts. That is another option at which the minister and his officials will look.

The old act allows a family court judge to direct that a child be put into the custody of a municipality or a children's aid society and to direct that certain payments be made to cover the care and protection of that young person. That provision has disappeared now as well. I realize that that will now be under provincial jurisdiction. I expect that it will be under the jurisdiction of a director, who would be under the jurisdiction of the attorney general or the solicitor general of a province. It would be his duty to take care of that particular individual, but that is an option which we have now taken away. We are narrowing the scope judges have and this, of course, could be extremely dangerous.

There are many other points I want to cover, but I will not do that today. I might, however, deal with perhaps four or five briefly. I know another colleague wants to speak before we call it six o'clock. I will cover a number of situations when we get to the committee.

● (1740)

There are a number of provisions in the present Juvenile Delinquents Act which do not have their equivalent in Bill C-61 and hence are repealed. There is no equivalent in Bill C-61 to Section 17 of the present act which indicates that proceedings are to be informal and are not be affected by any irregularity based upon that informality. Section 22 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act provides that where a parent or guardian has conduced to the commission of an offence by a young person by neglecting to exercise due care of that person, he may be ordered to pay a fine, damages or costs. This section is repealed and is not replaced by an equivalent in the new legislation. In other words, parents will no longer be held responsible for the acts of young people.

Section 23 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act provides that a child's religion is to be respected when he is placed in any foster home or any other residence. There is no equivalent in Bill C-61. I hope it is covered somewhere else, and I hope a child's religion is respected when he is placed in the care of a foster home or whatever. I do not see that provision in this bill. I hope the minister will deal with it in committee.

Sections 27 to 28 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act deal with the creation of a juvenile court committee. These sections are repealed and are not replaced. Section 33 of the act makes it an offence for anyone to have contributed to juvenile delinquency. Sections 34 provides a penalty for inducing a child to leave an institution to which he has been sent by the juvenile court. There are no equivalents to these sections in Bill C-61. I am sure the minister will give these answers in committee.

In summation, we have concerns with this act. We will go to committee with some suggestions. Hopefully the minister will call expert witnesses and will accept suggestions from our side of the House as to who some of those witnesses will be. Hopefully we will carry this bill through, not hastily but wisely, and will bring forward a piece of legislation which will benefit young people of Canada, will provide proper protection of the victims, as well as proper sentencing and care of young offenders so that they will be returned to society, rehabilitated into worth-while and contributing Canadian citizens.

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make a contribution to this debate. I am particularly indebted to the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid). I know there were other matters in the legislation with which he was concerned, but in order to provide me with a few minutes, he very kindly gave up some of his time.

I understand the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) wanting to get this piece of legislation through quickly at this stage, most ministers feel that way. In fact, I am not sure it is necessarily in anyone's interest to be overly hasty. I do not foresee second reading debate going on day after day, week after week. But I think it is the type of legislation which would not necessarily attract the public attention I would like to see it attract. Sometimes when very bad legislation is drafted, by its very nature it will attract public outcry. Indeed, that happened around 1970 when we were considering this type of legislation.

One advantage of second reading going on for a reasonable length of time is that it brings to the attention of various individuals, groups, organizations and agencies, a matter with which they may not have been otherwise preoccupied, a matter in which they should demonstrate some interest.

We have lived with the present act for over 70 years. There have been no substantial changes since 1929, over 50 years ago. I received the information package from the minister last February. I circulated it in my riding among judges, people working with young offenders and lawyers practising that type of law. I have not received much response to it. Perhaps it is because it is good legislation. I think it generally is. The Solicitor General understands that most of us on this side feel that way, but I hope that as the process develops, if there are concerns out there, that we will receive responses.

I think it is very important for people, such as the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown who is not a lawyer, to participate. Those of us who are lawyers see this as a movement in the judicial process, from the old act to the new one, and are quite comfortable with it as a process. People who are not lawyers often look at the substance of the change in a much different light. Therefore, I encourage participation on all sides of the House by those who do not necessarily belong to the legal profession.

It is amazing that the present act has stood up as well as it has, considering the social, economic and cultural changes which have occurred since 1929, especially in the past three decades. I think "amazing" is the proper word. It is likely attributable to juvenile court judges and provincial authorities and agencies responsible. During this period of time, I suppose they have taken some poetic licence with the act which had not changed as society changed.

The juvenile court was put in a very unusual position because it was not only adjudicating, it was part of the treatment process. Court officials are not necessarily trained or inclined to be part of the treatment process. Therefore, when the minister paid particular tribute to the juvenile court judges and provincial authorities in his information booklet, I very much agreed and seconded those kind of remarks. If this legislation is any indicia, with good intention and every justification, we have likely infringed upon what is commonly known as basic rights and freedoms. Perhaps it was inevitable and not a matter of public controversy because the courts are closed. I suppose, as part of the treatment process, certain licence had to be taken. It was difficult for the court to be part of the treatment process. Given the legal confines regarding rights and freedoms, the two roles, challenges and responsibilities could not be discharged satisfactorily.

The legislation changes the role of the court significantly from a treatment agency to one of a legal function. It is not simply a legal function in adjudicating guilt or innocence. As an aside, I have always found the adjudicating function in the present system to be rather difficult because the adjudication consisted of asking: Is this young person a juvenile delinquent? There were many guidelines for this, but it was almost as difficult as an adult court asking: "Is this accused an habitual criminal?" The meaning of the words was broad.

Another legal function which will be given to the court under this new legislation is to define the responsibility of the intervention flowing from the disposition. When I say "intervention", I mean the agency or the person who picks up once the disposition has been made, whether it is custody, probation, restitution or community service. There is no awarding of wardship, as I understand it, compared to the present act. Therefore, we do not have a situation where intervening agencies could extend or increase the period of control. It is desirable, indeed essential, that the court establish the maximum degree and length of the intervention. It is also desirable, although it may not be essential, that the agent can initiate the lessening of that period but should not increase it without a reference back to the court. This is recognized in the bill before us.

● (1750)

Before dealing with some other parts of the legislation, I want to emphasize one concern which bothers me more than any other, that is, the relationship between the two levels of government in this area. First, the minister in referring to committee talked about expert witnesses appearing before that committee. I concur in that. But he did not say that this would include the provincial perspective. I believe it is incumbent upon the Solicitor General to not only permit provincial witnesses, but, I think, he has a responsibility to enlist provincial witnesses at the committee stage. This may not be a good analogy, but I went through a similar type of procedure in committee with respect to the Fisheries Act. That act is federal legislation and administered in certain provinces by provincial authorities. We were assured in committee that extensive consultations had taken place. Indeed, they had. But unfortunately the federal government consulted with one and not both of the two provincial elements which were concerned—environment and fisheries. Therefore, while there had been consultation and concurrence on the one arm of the provincial government, the second group was never consulted. The second group was very upset with this legislation. They came before committee at the last minute and made a very strong plea for substantial changes to the legislation. I do not want to see a repeat of this. It was unnecessary. It caused unnecessary delay to important legislation. We did not have the proper amendments because it became very much an adversary approach between the two levels of government. Therefore, at the committee stage I hope we will hear from provincial governments. We do not need to hear from ten. I presume there is a community of interest and a consensus there so that we can hear from one spokesman what the problems or criticisms are.

I agree with what everyone has said about a serious attempt being made to set a common maximum age. I do not think I need dwell on that subject any longer. But there is a serious shortcoming. Given this government's track record with respect to federal-provincial relations, I very much doubt that a serious attempt to set a uniform age has been undertaken.

I think we must plug some gaps in the system which are created by the legislation since it only deals with offences under the Criminal Code, offences under federal legislation and regulations. It does not deal with provincial legislation. It does not deal with municipal ordinances and bylaws. Looking at the latest statistics available from Statistics Canada from the justice statistics division, I noted that there were somewhere in excess of 6,000 cases in 1979 which dealt with legislation other than federal legislation, in other words, provincial and municipal. These 6,000 cases were cases where the young person was found to be a juvenile delinquent. I am not sure if the machinery exists in the provinces to immediately fill the gap which would be created upon Royal Assent being granted to this legislation. Therefore, I think the provinces need some time. I would like to know from the Solicitor General at the committee stage how much time will be needed to fill that particular gap. I am concerned because I am told that in certain provinces the system is already overcrowded in many of its parts.

I am also concerned with the provision for children under the age of 12. Again, looking at the figures of the justice statistics division, I find that over 2,300 persons were found delinquent who were 11 years of age or under. Of the 2,300, over 2,000 were offences under the Criminal Code. Therefore, by raising the age from seven to 12 I believe another gap will be created.

I point out to the Solicitor General that I find the same trouble as he, I am sure, with respect to statistics dealing with juvenile delinquency. They are not terribly reliable and the reporting system is bad. I sympathize with him but I cannot offer him any assistance. I am very concerned about the gaps that are created mainly for provincial governments as a result of this legislation. I am delighted that my colleague from Halifax raised this because I find the same trouble as he with this diversion or alternate measures system contained in section 4 of the act. I find it very vague. For example, in the information brochure which my colleague was looking at, the question posed is: Will every young person who breaks a federal law appear in the youth court? The answer given is "Not necessarily". The minister goes on to deal with this alternative measures provision. It says that these programs which are called diversion programs may entail community service involvement, special education programs, counselling and restitution agreements. The common characteristic is that they are all voluntary. There is nothing about that in the legislation.

I agree with my colleague that, the key instrument here is the person who is considering whether to use such measures, that is, the alternative measures. This could be a very bad flaw. I do not know if there is a way to make this less vague, but I find it terribly vague. In the hands of an unscrupulous person, agency or authority, some very serious consequences could flow from this section.

I understand that there is an escape provision. I agree with that. Certainly if the accused does not wish to go that route, he cannot be forced to. I again emphasize that the abuse of the measure under subsection (5) is no bar to future proceedings. My main quarrel with that provision is its vagueness on the one hand and, on the other hand, I do not see the checks and balances which I would like to see in terms of the exercise of authority by the person who initiates the alternative measure process.

I am again assisted by my colleague from Halifax who has had much more experience with this subject than I have. There is no indication in Section 4 that the young person has been advised by legal counsel in terms of agreeing to take the alternative measures route. I think the Solicitor General will have to deal with that at the committee stage and assure us that this is the best he can do. I know diversion is a key element of the whole program, and I support that. But I have some very serious questions about that particular section and its efficacy procedures.

There was one other matter I wanted to raise with the Solicitor General. I believe I have only a minute left in which to do it. This is a question on which maybe the Solicitor General will drop me a note or about which he will speak to me privately. The principles here are very important because it says that the act shall be interpreted in light of them. I do not understand the difference between responsibility and accountability. It says that one of the principles is that the offender shall be responsible but not necessarily accountable. I am a lawyer and I have played with words for a good number of years and I cannot get around that particular aspect of the act. But it is a small point.

This is the final point I wish to make. I understand the need to eliminate truancy, incorrigibility and sexual immorality. I know the capricious nature that has often resulted in a person appearing before the court, but there are some very desperate parents out there who have legitimately used this provision from time to time. I do not know where parents can turn at this point.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock p.m., the House stands adjourned until Tuesday, April 21, 1981 at two o'clock p.m.

May I add that the Speaker extends the usual invitation to hon. members and the staff to enjoy some hospitality in Room 16. I hope it is possible for all hon. members and members of the staff to attend.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSING

CALL FOR REDUCTION IN INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Due to the fact that the housing situation in Canada is in a horrendous state because of the high cost of land, materials, high interest rates, and a noticeable decrease in available mortgage money, forcing an increasing number of Canadians in all provinces to abandon both house building and house buying, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the government take immediate steps to reduce interest rates to a more affordable and stable level as a means of preventing further and possibly disastrous chaos in the housing market.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE CONSTITUTION

POSITION TAKEN BY NATIVE PEOPLES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Now that it has been indicated that the NDP-Liberal collusion has produced an anaemic amendment not acceptable to the Native Council of Canada with regard to the constitutional resolution, and since the NIB is also indicating its withdrawal of support, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish):

That the government explain the statement by Mr. Daniels that "there was pressure on the natives to accept what Ottawa offered in January" and, furthermore, that the government seriously consider today the recommendations suggested today by these two groups.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

STUDY OF CHILD WELFARE LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The Department of National Health and Welfare has commissioned Ottawa lawyer Corinne Robert-Shaw to prepare a report on existing legislation across Canada relating to hcild welfare. In view of the fact that this study has been refused the funding required to include child abuse as one of the topics to be investigated, despite petitions from welfare groups in every part of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the reporting date of the Robert-Shaw study be extended by six months, that its mandate be broadened to include the urgent problem of child abuse, and that the necessary additional funding be provided for that purpose.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SMALL BUSINESS

REIMBURSEMENT FOR COST OF COLLECTING FEDERAL SALES TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Recognizing that hundreds of thousands of small businesses across Canada collect sales tax on behalf of the federal government, and recognizing that this tax collection service is required by law with absolutely no compensation, and recognizing that this task adds significantly to the already heavy paperwork burden experienced by small businesses, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House request the Minister of Finance to provide compensation for this service by allowing small businesses to retain 3 per cent of the federal sales tax collected, up to a maximum of $1,000 annually.

THE LAW OF THE SEA

REQUEST THAT CANADA RE-AFFIRM SUPPORT FOR FUNDAMENTAL OBJECTIVES OF CONFERENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 43, concerning a matter of utmost importance about which I have already secured the support of the parties.

Considering that the Third Conference on the Law of the Sea opened in 1974 at the United Nations; considering the decision reached at the end of the Ninth Session of the Conference to conclude the negotiations during the Tenth Session, so that a new Law of the Sea Charter may be adopted and signed here at the end of 1981; considering also the limited progress made during the first part of the Tenth Session which ended last weekend in New York City, due in part to the desire of the United States of America to carry out a complete revision of the results achieved to date at the Conference before adopting its final recommendations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-South-Delta (Mr. Siddon):

That this House reaffirm the support given by the Canadian people to the basic objectives of the Third Conference of the Law of the Sea and urge the United States Administration to undertake forthwith the revision of the draft Convention in order to increase the chances of concluding the work of the Conference when the Tenth Session resumes in Geneva in August 1981.

GRAIN

COMPENSATION TO FARMERS FOR EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to draw the attention of this House to an urgent and pressing cash flow squeeze which is affecting western farmers because of the government's tardiness and delinquency in processing and delivering grain compensation payments which are as a result of the boycott on Russian shipments. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) in answering questions on the timing of payments is fond of the phrases "soon" or "in a few days". I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That the ministerial stipend of the Minister of Agriculture be suspended until such time as grain compensation payment cheques begin flowing to western farmers, hopefully "soon" or "in a few days", to assist farmers with the heavy initial costs incurred at seeding time.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

NEGOTIATION OF SERVICE CONTRACTS WITH PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I too rise under Standing Order 43. The failure of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) to negotiate new contracts between the Government of Canada and the provinces that employ the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has undermined police services in those provinces and caused further damage to federal-provincial relations. Accordingly I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That this House instruct the Solicitor General to review the obstinate stand taken by the government respecting the financial arrangements in the RCMP contracts with the provinces and continue the negotiations based on good faith and common sense and not on threats to withdraw services.

TORONTO INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—CALL FOR PUBLIC HEARINGS ON MASTER PLAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is trying to encourage public debate on his department's master plan for Toronto's international airport by holding limited public hearings at what he calls open houses, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to hold full public hearings over a period of time that will enable individuals and organizations the opportunity of presenting constructive proposals on this important matter of public transportation policy.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

REPORT OF STATEMENTS ATTRIBUTED TO MR. GILCHRIST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I seek the attention of all hon. members of this House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43. The Toronto Star of April 15, 1981, under the heading "MP's Humour Isn't Funny", reports that the member of the House of Commons for Scarborough East (Mr. Gilchrist) would like to invite to Canada the fellow who shot President Reagan.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Order.

Mr. Flis: The Toronto Star states that the member for Scarborough East would like to have that fellow shoot the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Flis: The member for Scarborough East says that this is one way to get rid of the Prime Minister.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher):

That all members of the House indicate that such ideology is inappropriate for a Canadian who is elected by his peers to serve in this House, and that all members condemn, deplore and censure the crass political advocacy of the member for Scarborough East.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Your motion is deplorable.

In view of the persistent and mysterious reports concerning Canadians involved in some way or another in the Gouzenko case or in other espionage networks affecting national security and the disappearance of other related papers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

RAILWAYS

BOOKING PRACTICES APPLIED TO RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43. Whereas rail travel is considerably more energy efficient than most other established modes of transportation, whereas it should therefore be the policy of this government to encourage rather than discourage it, and whereas railroad employees have long appreciated the benefits of rail travel through the use of their passes, which passes they received over the years as the result of collective bargaining and not through the generosity of the railways, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That VIA Rail, Canadian National and Canadian Pacific be instructed by this House to stop the discriminatory practice whereby railway employees are now not permitted to book sleeping accommodation more than seven days in advance, in spite of the fact that VIA Rail is fully compensated by the employees themselves for such accommodation, and that this practice be stopped immediately so as to permit railway employees to be able to plan to use rail travel for their summer holidays which they really cannot do under the present rules.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT PLANS TO DEAL WITH INFLATION

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it touches on the sad record we are experiencing in this country with respect to inflation. I wonder if the Prime Minister would indicate if he has noticed that inflation in the United States has come down quite dramatically in the last quarter, having reached a 7.8 per cent level, while the inflation level in Canada is well over 12 per cent. If he indicates to the House that he has noticed this, would he also indicate if he plans any new measures to try to curb inflation in this country, or are we to assume that the government is content to continue to fiddle while our economy is literally being burned by inflation?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, it has often been said that inflation affects everybody, but it is affected by everybody as well. In his budget the Minister of Finance has clearly indicated that the fight against inflation was a priority for this government. The hon. member gives the statistics for the first quarter of this year concerning a decline in inflation in the United States. If corresponding figures for the first quarter were available in Canada, we could make a comparison. The figures quoted by the hon. member to draw a parallel with Canada are not those of the same quarter since they apply to another quarter. Therefore, we cannot make a comparison between different quarters.

[English]

EFFECT OF INFLATION ON FARMERS AND SMALL BUSINESSMEN

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): If the Prime Minister chooses to duck out on answering to the House with respect to inflation, perhaps I could put a further question to the Minister of State for Finance who, I think, gave a pathetic answer to my original question. Of course we all know that inflation affects everyone. Would the minister indicate if he is aware that it affects the farmer to the extent that almost 100 per cent more farmers went bankrupt last year than the year before as a result of rising interest rates and inflationary pressures?

Second, small businessmen, in higher and higher numbers, are going under in this country as the result of the government's stubbornness in not digging in and doing something about inflation and lowering inflation rates.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I must say that the hon. member is particularly set upon the phenomenon of interest rates. He ought to know himself that, according to the method used in Canada, those interest rates do reflect inflationary expectations and that until such times as all economic agents are truly determined to launch a genuine and effective fight against inflation those pressures on interest rates will remain. Madam Speaker, the hon. member refers as well to the category of agricultural producers. I am convinced that if he were to examine the output of agricultural producers and the situation, he would realize that the situation is excellent and that the programs designed especially for agricultural producers and implemented by the Minister of Agriculture protect them against rising interest rates. I would also like to add that any individual, any class in society, be they agricultural producers, small businessmen or private individuals, must share the costs that a society must bear, namely, the cost of inflation.

• (1420)

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, my last supplementary question is for the same minister who says that interest rates are governed by the expectation of inflation. Does the minister not realize it is his government that is triggering the inflation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: If the minister does realize that, would he indicate to the House whether he is content to see interest rates in this country stay at the peak level of something over 18 per cent as far as the prime lending rate is concerned, while the American rate has fallen 4 per cent compared to the U.S. peak level? Could the minister explain that to the House?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I appreciate that the hon. member was not on the government side long enough to know that the action any government can take is limited. He is still nursing certain illusions which he has been entertaining for a number of years and which, fortunately or unfortunately for the economy of our country, he will continue to have for a few years yet. I should also like to indicate to him that if he draws a comparison between current interest rates on certain short-term commercial instruments in the United States and in Canada, he will find out that the gap between the interest rates on those instruments is getting ever narrower, so that Canadian interest rates are not overvalued but they do reflect market trends and the over-all economic situation.

[English]

ACTION TO HELP CONSUMERS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, it is obvious the Prime Minister does not see fit to address questions about inflation. He is above all those matters of importance to average Canadians.

Mr. Darling: The Prime Minister wrestled inflation to the ground.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Therefore, I will address my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of doubts expressed by two national organizations about the accuracy of the Consumer Price Index, and since even according to Statistics Canada we are now one tenth of a percentage point away from the highest rate of inflation in modern times, can the minister of many hats—and I hope he is wearing his hat as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs today—say what steps he will take to protect the consumer from the ever-increasing pressure of inflation? Does he or his government have any real or accurate feeling for the plight of the Canadian consumer?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Yes, Madam Speaker, the Canadian government has already brought down a budget whose first priority was to deal with the neediest in Canada; it did not wait for the comments of the hon. member. In his budget, the Minister of Finance provided for the retired, the people who are the most severely affected by rising costs due to inflation. On the other hand, the hon. member asks what I intend to do: I intend to continue to work in close co-operation with my colleagues in the cabinet in monitoring the situation closely and ensuring that our economic policy meets the needs of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I have this morning conducted my own instant fresh-frozen survey of everyday going prices in metropolitan supermarkets in Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Dundas, Ottawa, Montreal and Halifax.

Mr. Darling: What about Burks Falls?

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): I am sorry, I missed Burks Falls.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): I checked the prices of such things as a three-bag container of 2 per cent milk, a loaf of bread, a pound of hamburger and a dozen eggs. I asked people if the last budget had really helped them at the supermarket counters. Needless to say, the average worker will not be able to afford the basics unless this government does something to halt the unbelievable rise in inflation.

Can the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs tell the House what he will do, other than being vigilant, about living up to his responsibilities as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs? Also, will he ensure the average Canadian will not be forced into paying a buck fifty for a bus ride, or $1.50 for a loaf of bread in about five years time? What is he going to do?

• (1425)

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, a recent study made in the United States reveals that it takes fewer hours of work in Canada to feed oneself. The same study also indicates that of all industrialized countries, Canada is the one where food costs are lowest. The hon. member should know that.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

STUDY OF CHILD FATALITIES CAUSED BY PARENTAL NEGLECT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. A continuing federal study has revealed that up to 200 Canadian children die each year as a direct result of parental or guardian abuse. In plainer language, that is homicide. Considering that important peole involved in the study want it completed, why has the minister decided to terminate it?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I suppose, Madam Speaker, that the hon. member is referring to the study mentioned recently in the press and conducted by Mrs. Corinne Robertshaw, a public servant who prepared a project for my department during the International Year of the Child and to whom I granted a ten-month extension to complete her project.

I have satisfied myself, and she has confirmed to me through my deputy minister, that this project is now completed. I am happy to say that I shall publish her report on child abuse. I thank the hon. member for mentioning this in the House because I believe that many members will then want to bring pressure to bear on their provincial governments to improve the child protection legislation.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the public information is not that the study has been completed but that the minister has decided to put an end to the work that has been done up to this point. That is an important distinction. I would like to ask the minister two questions related to that. First, is she telling us that all of those involved in the study are satisfied that the work has been completed? If the answer to that is no, why does she not allow them to finish the work, which I understand would only take a few more months? Second, with regard to publication, will she assure the House that all of the information involved in that study will be published, and not just the recommendations?

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that I have indeed checked that the report, which was prepared by Mrs. Corinne Robertshaw alone, is now completed. This report took a total of 28 months to prepare. It concerns child abuse and revolves around Section 43 of the Civil Code, which, as the hon. member is well aware, deals mostly with provincial legislation and services. I have ensured that the report in its present form can help the services and the people involved in this area.

As for whether or not the entire report will be published, I must say to the hon. member that I shall have a complete legal opinion about this only tomorrow. This involves determining whether the child abuse cases referred to could be detrimental to the children whose individual case histories are known to us. If required, I shall ask Mrs. Robertshaw to edit her report so that that part of it will remain confidential.

[English]

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ASSUME ONGOING RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): We will look with interest, of course, at the report when it comes out in detail. We respect the problem that may be involved in confidentiality as it pertains to children. However, we will look with great care to see that there is no cover up of any kind. At this point I am prepared to accept the minister's guarantee that there will not be. My last question is this. A few years ago the federal government initiated, in terms of the creation of some new bodies at the federal level, a study of the situation of women in Canada, which led to some important recommendations that, indeed, are finding their way into the new charter of rights. I would like to ask the minister a question about this very important area of child abuse. Will the federal government create a centre for the responsibility of children, at the national level, that will have an ongoing responsibility for looking into the welfare of Canadian children?

• (1430)

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, today is the 21st of the month and the hon. member is three days late. I announced the creation of the centre which will deal with violence against children within the jurisdiction of my department, on the 18. In fact, I announced it on the 17th, and it is reported in the Toronto Star of the 18th which I have here. The hon. member is therefore somewhat behind in the news, and the reply is yes. I am creating such a centre which will serve as a clearing house or information centre for all concerned in Canada.

I would also like to draw the attention of the hon. member and of the Progressive Conservative Party, which moved a motion under Standing Order 43 on this subject, that the Badgley task force established by the Minister of Justice and myself has been working for several months on the more specific problem of federal responsibility for sexually abused children.

[English]

REQUEST THAT MINISTER MEET WITH PROVINCIAL COUNTERPARTS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, if the minister is not prepared to authorize the continuation or completion of this study, is she at least prepared to meet with the provinces as a tangible expression of her concern? She has admitted there is a jurisdictional problem. Will she meet with her counterparts in the provinces at least to discuss the findings of this report, because child abuse in Canada is much more widespread than this House realizes?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I must point out to the hon. member that he did not understand that this work deals specifically with all types of violence against children and revolves around Section 43 of the Criminal Code—I believe that I said Civil Code earlier—which deals with practical problems which come basically under provincial jurisdiction. I am therefore satisfied that the report now available is adequate and of such significance that it should be released immediately. I believe that it will then be up to the provinces to decide what they want to do individually in an area which is basically within their jurisdiction.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON ACID RAIN TREATY

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment.

Last Thursday The Globe and Mail reported Mr. Robin Porter, senior State Department official in Washington, as telling a group of visiting students from Toronto in Washington that an acid rain treaty with Canada is at least three or four years away.

In view of the fact that such a statement contradicts the minister's own assurances in this House that the August, 1982, deadline for the treaty is still on target, does he give any credance to Mr. Porter's statement, and what is the government's current timetable for completion of negotiations with the United States toward the signing of an accord on acid rain?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I too saw the report to which the hon. gentleman has referred and I am told, as a result of inquiries which have been made, that the statement which was reported was taken somewhat out of context. A parallel was drawn, during the discussions with the high school students, to the negotiation of the Great Lakes water quality agreement which did, I understand, take that length of time to complete. There was an indication that there may be problems similar to those in the Great Lakes quality agreement negotiations when we get to the stage of negotiating formally the trans-boundary air pollution treatment. The United States administration has assured us that it intends to keep the timetable which we established; that is to say, we expect the formal negotiations to start sometime early this summer.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Is the minister's reply based on assumptions or secondhand information, or has he or his officials in the Department of the Environment been in touch with Mr. Porter to confirm his statement or seek some sort of an explanation for it?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, as I think I reported to the House previously, I have been in touch with the Secretary for the Interior. I met him in Washington. He confirms the determination of the administration to meet the timetable which President Reagan confirmed to us on his visit to Ottawa. We have been in touch with officials of the United States since the newpaper report and have received assurance that that timetable will be met.

NATIONAL SECURITY

INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED ACTIVITIES OF JOHN WATKINS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last month, on March 24 to be exact, I asked the minister to look into the case of former Canadian ambassador to Moscow, Mr. John Watkins, and his alleged espionage activities, which led to his death during RCMP interrogations in Montreal. The minister promised to look into the case at that time. Now that he has had an opportunity to do so, and following up on the somewhat belated and not totally accurate front page story in The Globe and Mail last Saturday, will the minister shed some official light on this matter, particularly in view of the probability of subsequent connections arising from that unexplained case?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, as the House will appreciate, this matter is also under the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General. I think I can say from the point of view of my department that at the time in question the ambassador had been retired for several years as a result of ill health. We were informed, as a result of the investigation which took place, that there was no evidence whatsoever to support any allegation that he was acting for the government of another country.

REQUEST FOR FULL-SCALE INVESTIGATION OF ESPIONAGE ACTIVITIES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. In light of the minister's indecisive response, and in view of the long history of known espionage activity in Canada, starting with the Gouzenko revelations in the 1940s right up to last year's expulsion of diplomatic personnel from the Soviet embassy and, most recently, the disappearance of a portion of the Taschereau papers, I would ask the Prime Minister whether he is now finally prepared to initiate a full-scale investigation into espionage activities in Canada, both present and past, where they are connected, for the sake of national security. I would ask the Prime Minister whether there has not been enough evidence to warrant an investigation. How long must we wait to get to the bottom of this whole stinking mess, because that is what it is and continues to be?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not agree with the hon. member that this whole thing is a stinking mess, to quote his words. We know of some clear instances of espionage around the Gouzenko case, and there are other cases where persons in foreign embassies were declared persona non grata and expelled from the country. Presumably espionage has been going on, is going on, and will go on. If we know of any spies we will get rid of them. If we do not know of any, I fail to see how an investigation by some public body will turn up any names of spies that could not be turned up by other methods. Finally, it seems to me that the hon. member opposite was a member of a Conservative government for some fleeting months in 1979, and I know of no initiatives they took to start an inquiry into the whole stinking mess they left behind.

AGRICULTURE

PLANS TO MEET DROUGHT CONDITIONS IN WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In parts of prairie Canada dust storms and extreme drought conditions appear again to be heralding another difficult year for sheep and cattle producers. Would the minister outline what kinds of assistance programs are in place or being prepared in order to maintain producers in the beef, dairy and sheep industries in these dry areas?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, we have a set of contingency plans in case the weather does not change for the better but stays dry. We hope and pray it does not stay dry, but we do have a set of plans we can put into force in case there is a long or prolonged drought in western Canada.

PROCESSING OF APPLICATIONS UNDER HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is again directed to the Minister of Agriculture in the absence of the minister for DREE.

I understand that a certain amount of last year's herd maintenance applications which could not be dealt with by the review board under their administrative guidelines will have to be transferred to Ottawa. We know that something called ministerial discretion will be used when this happens, but can the minister tell us just what that entails in terms of the criteria which will apply, which ministers will be involved in the process, and when we can expect a final decision on all applications?

● (1440)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks many questions under the guise of one, but the main thing I think he wants to know is what we will do with approximately 2,500 applications which were not cleared by the appeal board and by the officials in Regina under the auspices of, as he said, the minister in charge of that program, the minister in charge of DREE. There will be a group of ministers dealing with that shortly in Ottawa. I hope we can deal with it in a few days.

PIPELINES

FINANCING OF TORONTO TO MARITIMES PIPELINE

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and it concerns the TQM pipeline to the maritimes. The minister has committed himself to the building of this pipeline and, in so doing, he has extended the pricing zone to maintain the same price for all regions east of Toronto. He has also said quite recently that he wants to have an attractive development from the point of view of the province of Alberta and the Alberta natural gas producers.

Since the line is not likely to be economic, is the $500 million amount which is provided for in his energy policy to cover the operating deficit which is likely to develop as a result of this line, or is that $500 million to be reserved exclusively for capital costs?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, in the National Energy Program we set aside $500 million to ensure the completion of certain pipelines in Canada to bring natural gas to regions which are not served by natural gas at the present time. A part of that amount would obviously be available for the pipeline to the maritimes. That would reduce the capital cost of the line and thereby ensure that a rate could be established which would ensure also a higher netback to the producers in Alberta than would have been the case without such support for the construction of the pipeline.

PROJECTED PRICE OF NATURAL GAS TO EASTERN CONSUMERS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, the minister has answered only half my question. He has not responded to the part relating to the operating deficit which is likely to occur.

Since the minister has said that this will be attractive to the maritimes as well as to Alberta producers and the province of Alberta, has he in mind an increase in the price of natural gas over what is now projected—which will impact most severely on Ontario consumers—as a means of balancing the cost of this pipeline and making it profitable for the developers of the line?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the subsidy which would be provided for the construction of this pipeline would come from all Canadian taxpayers in a proportionate way, so it is not true to say that this cost would be borne by the Ontario consumer.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATIVE AMENDMENTS

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is it the intention of the minister to present to this House for consideration amendments in relation to the operation of the Foreign Investment Review Agency, with the object in view of tightening restrictions on foreign ownership, when Parliament resumes on May 12?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the throne speech opening this session spoke of the intention of the government to propose three changes to the act. One is to give public notice of large takeovers. The second is to have a system of review of performance of large multinationals. The third is to have a financial facility to assist Canadians in providing alternatives to takeovers. This is in the throne speech—

Mr. Siddon: Twelve months ago.

Mr. Gray: —and this is what we are working on.

As to whether the time of such action will fit into the period suggested by my hon. friend, that is a matter for consideration by the government in light of the progress of the work of the House.

HOUSING

POSITION OF MINISTER ON RENT CONTROLS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the ever-changing minister responsible for housing. In the middle of the Ontario election campaign the minister stood up in this House of Commons to deny that he had ever called for an end to rent controls. He was innocence personified at that time, in the middle of the Ontario election campaign. However, the clothes are once again off the emperor. At the weekend he was quoted—and I suppose he could have been misquoted—as saying that he is in favour now of an end to rent controls.

In light of the fact that housing costs and rental costs are skyrocketing right across the country, and that housing speculation in Vancouver, Calgary and Toronto has gone wild as a result of the free market, high interest rates and skyrocketing inflation, I wonder if the minister could please explain to the House why he is advocating at the present time that tenants be equally subject to the same skyrocketing inflation which is hurting everyone else so badly? Why is he now saying that tenants have to be faced with that kind of skyrocketing inflation?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, at the National Housing Conference convened earlier this year, an all-sector conference, I had the opportunity to listen to debates on both sides of the issue of rental control. It was just prior to that conference that I indicated that I was not expressing a personal opinion on that subject or any other subject dealing with housing, awaiting that conference. As a result of that conference I am sure that the hon. member and many in his party, some of whom attended the conference, will know that the issue of rent controls, although it is under provincial jurisdiction, is identified as being a significant player in the cost of housing and availability of housing, whether in the rental sector or whether the spillover is into the private sector.

Although there are only three provinces at the present time which do not have rent control—the province of British Columbia is in the process of de-phasing—I am sure it is known by any respectable economist or any respectable person knowledgeable in the market, that rent controls have had an effect. They have made it difficult for the young person first coming into the market to obtain rental accommodation. They have made it difficult for people moving into tight metropolitan markets to find accommodation. That was because people were not building, and that was due in large part to rent controls.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, the minister does not know what he is talking about. He cannot possibly know what the housing situation is like in Vancouver or even in his own home town of Toronto. He cannot understand what the situation is. He does not even realize that rent controls do not apply to new home building.

MINISTER'S POSITION ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister why he has not been making any statements about the level of interest rates in our society? Why is he not making any statements about that? Why has he not been making any statements about the speculation—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rae: Finally, Madam Speaker, why has he not been making any statements—

Madam Speaker: Order. I did call the hon. member to order. I thought he had asked his question.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I have had the opportunity of addressing a number of housing sector groups. I have addressed the question of, for example, protection to those people who are most seriously impacted as a result of some of the deteriorating markets. I have indicated that the government, having increased social units by 5,000, sees that as an assistance to people who can ill afford to compete in the tight housing market today.

However, I think I also have to remind the hon. member of questions earlier in the day as to what this government is doing to combat inflation. Surely the answer is not quite as simple as that proposed by other members of the hon. member's party, who say we should spend a million dollars on this program or that program and the problem is solved. That means an additional deficit, which we can ill afford.

ENERGY

POSSIBILITY OF REACHING AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As the minister is aware, there is a real threat that the Alsands project and the Cold Lake project could be permanently cancelled if an energy agreement is not reached by June 1. Is the minister going to reach an energy agreement with Alberta by June 1?

• (1450)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, obviously I cannot answer this question since it takes two to make an agreement.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, the minister knows full well that he can do a lot to put some sense into the negotiations. But will he aim for an agreement by June 1, recognizing that these two plants, which are equivalent to a $20 billion to $25 billion investment in the oil industry, could go down the tube if an agreement is not reached by June 1? Will the minister aim for an agreement by June 1?

An hon. Member: Yes or no?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, since last November we on this side of the House have indicated that we were eager to reach an agreement as soon as possible and that we were willing to show flexibility. Obviously any agreement would imply an equivalent amount of flexibility on the other side also. I hope this flexibility will be forthcoming in our next discussions. As far as I am concerned, I will certainly do my best to have an agreement at the earliest possible time.

Oral Questions

HOUSING

CRITERIA TO QUALIFY FOR SHELTER ALLOWANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Bruce Lonsdale (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Public Works who is responsible for housing. In recent newspapers reports the minister indicated that he perhaps prefers the phasing out of rental controls, with the co-operation of the provinces. Could the minister advise the House as to how shelter allowances will be negotiated with the provinces?

Second, he indicated that a shelter allowance would be provided to people who were paying more than 30 per cent of their disposable incomes. Would the minister be prepared to consider that 30 per cent and to re-examine it, in light of the different income levels whereby people earning substantially large incomes could conceivably be paying more than 30 per cent of their disposable incomes, yet poorer people with perhaps cheaper income levels could not conceivably maintain proper rental facilities with 30 per cent of their incomes? Would he perhaps consider reducing it to 25 or even 20 per cent of disposable income, rather than using a figure of 30 per cent?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is a lot better than NDP questions.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the question of a shelter allowance, as I indicated in the House previously, is being studied in the social cabinet by the ministers responsible for social areas in the administration of this government. They have undertaken a study of the issue of shelter allowance, the device which is presently in place in four provinces of Canada. It is one that has been a useful tool to respond to a very tight market and to respond to a difficult market in other jurisdictions, for example, in the United States. It is one that provides and is a very good targeting device to respond to rental markets and people having difficulty in rental markets. However, having said that, it is also a difficult item in this sense that any action by the federal government would have to be co-ordinated with the provinces.

Mr. Epp: Oh, come on.

Mr. Cosgrove: I fully expect it is an item that will be on the agenda and that it will receive serious study and discussion with the provincial ministers of housing, officials of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and myself, later on in the year.

STATE OF MORTGAGE INSURANCE FUND

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my brief supplementary question is directed to the minister responsible for housing. I want to ask him about the situation respecting the mortgage insurance fund and whether he will give us a definite answer as to the state of that fund. Has it actually improved its position as a result of the sales program instituted by our government, by Mr. Boivin? Have more moneys come into the fund than have been drained away from it as a result of walkaways and other contingencies? What is the state of that fund today?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. It appears as if I am invited by him to give a status report, almost quarterly, on the fund. Of course I do not have the specifics today as to the exact amount or the exact position of the fund, but I can repeat the answer I gave the hon. member before. With the market tightening and with market conditions improving, it goes without saying that the corporation is recouping money back into the fund from the sale of homes which had been recovered from defaults. This means that the fund is improving, that the money borrowed from the government is being repaid, and that the target date of March, 1982, for complete repayment of funds borrowed is still a realistic and likely target.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON SHELTER ALLOWANCE PROGRAM

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question supplementary to the one posed by the hon. member for Timiskaming. In response to that question the minister said two contradictory things. First, he said that the government was considering a proposal in its social policy unit of cabinet. Second, he said that that proposal would be introduced for discussion with the provinces. The second statement would indicate that a decision has been made. Will the minister tell the House of Commons whether a decision has been made in principle to proceed with a shelter allowance?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, if there was an inclination or assumption drawn by the right hon. member that the statements were contradictory, it was not intended. Of course any minister, dealing with any counterparts in any area of responsibility, must have some position to take for discussion to the provinces.

The federal government has not adopted a position vis-à-vis rent controls. It is an area on which I would have to have instructions from my cabinet colleagues. Given the wide range of options, I suspect it would be a reasonable way in which to propose discussions with the provinces. As I said, some already have shelter allowances, some are now investigating it, and it would take a lot of negotiating and a lot of background work before any position could be identified.

Mr. Clark: I will try to make this simple, Madam Speaker. Is the government considering a proposal on a shelter allowance to put before the provinces? Has a decision on that proposal been made, and what is that proposal?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, I think I would be repeating myself to say that the government authorized an analysis—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cosgrove: —of how shelter allowance could be introduced, bearing in mind that some provinces are already in the field, some provinces are in the process of studying it, and how, if the federal government were to act in that way, such a program could be brought in with those things as given. I think that is no contradiction.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Oh!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MOVEMENT OF 420 AIR RESERVE SQUADRON TO SUMMERSIDE, P.E.I.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. It concerns the 420 Reserve Air Squadron at Shearwater. Regretting the decision of the minister to turn around his earlier commitment to leave that Squadron at Shearwater, might I ask him two basic questions which are quite different?

First, at the time he approved or authorized this subsequent decision to move 420, together with 880, from Shearwater to Summerside, did he believe that there would be enough trained and skilled personnel in the Summerside or the general western Prince Edward Island region to support the 420 Squadron which, after all, is the only air reserve squadron in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to hear that the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East understands the problem very well. As he will remember, when we decided to shift the 415 Squadron from Summerside to Greenwood, we decided to compensate Prince Edward Island by shifting these squadrons from Shearwater to Summerside. This he understands very well.

As far as the 420 Air Reserve Squadron is concerned, I understand very well that the move from Shearwater to Summerside will make it difficult for the people in this reserve squadron to exercise their competence in Summerside while the 420 is being shifted there. However, we are looking into alternatives to ensure that we do not lose the competence which has been developed over the years in the 420 Squadron exercise. We are looking at an "air reserve augmentation flight' so that we could perhaps diminish any loss of the competence of the people in the 420 Squadron. But this is under study at the moment.

● (1500)

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the minister's sensitivity. I gather that he was aware, one way or the other, how Squadron 420 would survive with respect to trained personnel. In the past the minister was kind enough to consult with the appropriate civic leaders in the area. Would he extend that courtesy to civic municipal leaders, as well as to military personnel who may have demonstrated through their roles and professionalism an expertise in the area of the survivability of Squadron 420? Would the minister undertake to meet with those interested people and parties for the purpose of securing a better understanding with respect to this matter? In the interim, would the minister give some assurance that he will make no final decision until such time as he has had an opportunity to meet with the responsible people?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is well aware that I have already written to Mr. Harrison of the Dartmouth Chamber of Commerce, as well as to the mayor of Dartmouth, Mr. Brownlow. I would be very glad to meet with them to discuss the matter further.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. COSSITT—MR. STEVENS—ALLEGED USE OF UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: Sometime ago I was ready to rule on points of order which were raised by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) and the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), but they were absent from the House. I see that they are both present today. Their points of order concerned the use of the words "obstruct" and "obstruction", which were said to be unparliamentary. I gave a preliminary ruling at the time these matters were raised, but I also said that I would like to look into the matter further. I do not want to go into all of the meanings which one can ascribe to the words "obstruction" or "obstructionist", but I will quote from a ruling given by my predecessor, Mr. Speaker Jerome, on May 26, 1975, wherein he said:

> In respect of the word "obstruction", several meanings have been ascribed to it. One does not have to examine the precedents. It is not an infrequent occurrence in this House that one side refers to the actions of the other side as being an obstruction of one kind or another, so much so that on one occasion where precedent does provide some assistance the use of the word "obstruction" in respect of an individual and specific member was found to be not out of order . . .

At that time it was the hon. member for York-Peel who was allowed to use the word "obstruction" in reference to another member. The usage at that time was not judged to be unparliamentary; therefore I would be hard pressed to determine now that the word is unparliamentary.

DND—TRANSPORTATION OF GENERATORS

Question No. 1,666—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Was a Canadian Armed Forces Hercules aircraft used on July 13, 1980, to transport a 21,000 pound electric generator, owned by Woodward Oil Company, from Armed Forces Base Goose Bay to Gander International Airport and, if so, what amount did the Department of National Defence receive for this shipping service?

2. Did the company seek and obtain clearance from the Canadian Transport Commission to ship by this method?

3. Did the company seek and obtain clearance from any commercial carriers who were able to carry the electric generator?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes. $4,945.02.

2 and 3. The requirement to ship an electric generator became a matter of emergency on Saturday, July 12, 1980. A commercial carrier with the capacity to lift such a load was not available. Since, as stated above, this was an emergency and it occurred during a weekend, the Department of National Defence was contacted and a request was made to provide assistance on a cost recoverable basis. This service was provided on Sunday, July 13, 1980. The CTC was informed of this action on July 12, 1980, as part of regular procedure for responding to emergencies without prior CTC authorization.

DND—CIVILIANS TRAVELLING TO EUROPE

Question No. 2,168—Mr. Jelinek:

1. How many civilian personnel travelled to Europe on regular DND flights between November, 1980, and January 30, 1981, and how many were approved through (a) Fitness and Amateur Sport Directorate (b) the Department of National Defence, and of those approved through DND, how many required the Air Transport Commission's approval?

2. For the same period, what was the total number of vacant seats on all DND flights?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. 1,133.

(a) 27.

(b) The breakdown of the remaining number is as follows:

Members of military families on posting or leave	899
DND civilians proceeding on temporary duty or posting	129
Non-DND civilians on departmental business	56
Others approved by DND	22
Total	1106

None of the above personnel required approval from the Air Transport Commission.

2. 237 (on all 18 DND regular flights to Europe).

DREE—FOREIGN OWNERSHIP IN COMPANIES RECEIVING GRANTS

Question No. 2,170—Mr. Herbert:

1. Does the Department of Regional Economic Expansion record the percentage of foreign ownership of the companies to which subsidies are given and, if so, what percentage (a) given to companies (b) of the amount given in the Montreal special area in the period 1977-1980, was to companies having a foreign ownership in excess of fifty percent?

2. What are the corresponding figures for (a) Quebec (b) Canada?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. Under the programs of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, companies are eligible for incentives and other forms of financial assistance under certain conditions. Because such assistance is available irrespective of the nationality of shareholders, information is not recorded on the percentage of foreign ownership of the companies to which assistance is provided.

2. Not applicable.

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 2,228—Mr. Gustafson:

1. Under the Herd Maintenance Assistance Program (a) what amount was paid to date to farmers (b) how many producers received payments?

2. On what date will the program be completed?

2. What amount was included in the 1979-80 and 1980-81 estimates for the cost of operating the hospital?

3. (a) Was an agreement signed with the government of Alberta to protect the accumulated seniority, sickness, holiday and pension rights of the employees (b) what were the monetary terms of the agreement?

4. Has the government retained a continuing role in the use or administration of the hospital?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned:

1. (a) Yes—at 00:01 hours on December 1, 1980.

   (b) 648 employees.

2. 1979-80—$11,976,000.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to finish the remarks I started some time ago on this resolution. I am mindful of the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in Vancouver that if the country splits up over his constitutional resolution then the country is not worth saving. What an arrogant, narrow attitude for a Prime Minister to have.

Before I leave the first schedule and move on to the charter of rights, I would like to refer to the part of the resolution which would repeal Section 20 of the British North America Act. Section 20 reads as follows:

There shall be a Session of the Parliament of Canada once at least in every Year, so that Twelve Months shall not intervene between the last Sitting of the Parliament in one Session and its first Sitting in the next Session.

I must ask what the Prime Minister's purpose is in seeking to have Section 20 repealed. Why should we give any Prime Minister, especially the present one, the right to call Parliament into session or not call it into session, as he wishes? Should the Prime Minister be allowed to run the country without having to convene Parliament? In theory and in practice, if Section 20 is repealed, a Prime Minister could run the country for a year, or even longer, as his private fiefdom, substituting orders in council for acts of Parliament.

In the second place, I cannot think of one single reason why anyone would want to wipe this or any other item of Canadian history off the books. To do so would not serve any useful purpose or add anything to the sense or purpose of this document. What it does is point to the sinister purpose behind the inclusion of this schedule in the resolution and, indeed, the whole resolution itself.

For the benefit of those members who still feel that they can vote for this resolution, I would like to read Section 58(2) of Part VIII of this resolution. Those members who tell their constituents that they are voting for this bill so that we can bring home the British North America Act and amend it here in Canada will have a lot to answer for if this resolution is approved by the Parliament of the United Kingdom and imposed on our country. Section 58(2) reads:

The Constitution of Canada includes,

(a) the Canada Act,

(b) the Acts and orders referred to in Schedule I; and

(c) any amendment to any Act or order referred to in paragraph (a) or (b).

There can be no doubt as to the meaning of Section 58. What we are debating here is the new Constitution of Canada, to replace the BNA Act of 1867 and all its subsequent amendments. Paragraph (c) clearly states that when the Parliament of Canada makes any amendments to our Constitution, assuming this bill becomes law, such amendments will be to the Prime Minister's Constitution and not to the one we have lived under for the past 114 years.

I would like to voice my objections to some of the specific items in the resolution, in the unhappy event that it should become the new Constitution of Canada. Commencing with the preamble, I would like to address myself to the motion put forward on behalf of my party by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). I cannot understand how anyone could object to this motion. It is basic and fundamental to the founding principles of our nation. Our motion reads:

Affirming that the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free individuals and free institutions.

● (1510)

In his statement before the joint Senate-House of Commons committee on the Constitution, the hon. member for Provencher went on to say:

—affirming also that individuals and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law.

I have on my desk some of the representations made to me on this subject by my constituents in Victoria-Haliburton. These are in response to a newspaper release that I sent out, in which I noted that the unholy alliance of the Liberals and NDP in this House rejected our motion. I might add that I have to date received not one piece of correspondence supporting the Liberal-NDP position, but I have received well over two thousand responses supporting the position of my party.

I have been a little surprised, but very pleased, that all of the mail I have received in response to the position I have taken on the issues of the supremacy of God, abortion, the right to own and hold property and capital punishment has supported my stand all the way. I feel that I am representing the views and convictions of the majority of my people.

On the question of abortion, I reject out of hand any motion that the expectant mother should be the sole arbiter as to whether she will or will not abort a foetus. That would be tantamount to giving pregnant women decision-making powers that are rightly those of the courts and the medical profession. I am deeply disturbed as it is by reports that some courts have ruled that a foetus does not have the status of a person until it is delivered. I suggest that that is why some people want to specify in our charter of rights that only persons have rights.

It is an established fact that a foetus is a living thing, medically, morally and spiritually, and yet, if we are to accept recent court rulings on the subject, the foetus does not have any rights until it has been delivered. This raises the very serious question as to who is to speak for the foetus until it is delivered. It is we who must answer the question. It is our responsibility, and we must decide how best to protect the foetus until it is delivered and becomes a person under the law.

Abortion must not be allowed to become a political football. It is one of the most serious social and moral issues facing our society. But it is more than just that; it is a matter of life or death. I totally reject the concept of abortion on demand. To me, it is unthinkable. We must not accept abortion as just another method of birth control. Basic standards of moral conduct rule out abortion as a means of escaping the consequences of permissive and irresponsible lifestyles.

To return to the statement on Conservative Party policy, presented to the constitutional committee by my friend, the hon. member for Provencher, I draw the attention of the House to page 6 of his statement, wherein he states our policy with regard to right of ownership of property. This statement seeks to amend Section 7 of the resolution by substituting the following:

Everyone has the right of life, liberty, security of the person and the enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with principles of natural justice.

I find it difficult to understand how anyone could quarrel with this statement of principle, especially in a country where the right to own and hold property has been a fundamental right since confederation.

Here again the Liberals and NDP joined forces to oppose this motion, but I was surprised and pleased some time ago to hear that the member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) spoke out in support of this motion in his remarks in this House on the Constitution resolution. On page 8135 of Hansard for Wednesday, March 11, the member for Winnipeg North quoted from the fifth amendment to the American constitution. I quote the member as follows:

—no person shall be "deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law".

The member for Winnipeg North might have completed the amendment by adding: "nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation".

The point is that the member stated that this provision is in the resolution that we are debating, and that he supports it. I am pleased to have his support for the principle of our motion, but unfortunately the right to own property is not contained in the government's version of the resolution. However, I would like to take the member's words in Hansard literally and to hope that he will stand by his guns and insist that this provision be included in Section 7 of the resolution, as it now appears in the late Right Hon. John Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights.

I believe that the rule of law and the strict adherence to this concept offers greater protection than someone's interpretation as to what constitutes natural justice. Interpretations can vary, according to who happens to be sitting on the judge's bench at any particular time.

Section 15 of the resolution is too weak and lends itself to abuse by any future government that might want to bestow special privileges or special status on particular groups in our society for political gain or expediency. It would lend itself too easily to quota systems in hiring and appointing, a form of discrimination. I am opposed to discrimination in any form, no matter how it is dressed up in pious rhetoric and legalese.

To stay with that point for just a moment, I would like to cite an example of what I mean. One of our proposals would make it unlawful for anyone to discriminate against anyone else in the workplace, in making accommodation available to any person, and in other ways that have often been referred to as selective placement.

Our motion reads as follows:

> Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

Now I would like to move to Section 7 of this resolution. As I mentioned earlier, in the unhappy event that this Constitution is foisted on the Canadian public, Section 7 leaves a lot to be desired. It is here that we can take the first steps towards relegating the Prime Minister's permissive society concept to the trash heap where it belongs. In fact, it is in Sections 7 through 14 that we would like to lay the groundwork for bona fide, de facto protection for law-abiding Canadians.

Beginning with Section 7, I must again insist that the wording of this section falls short of guaranteeing the rights spelled out in the section. Fundamental justice can mean many things to many persons, whereas due process of law refers specifically to the protection of life, liberty and the security of the person according to established law.

Fundamental justice is a high-sounding phrase, and like just about everyone else I like the sound of it. But for the purposes of safeguarding human and civil rights, I must refer to the precious wording of the law as we have enjoyed it in Canada through the British common law.

Although the phrase "established by law" appears elsewhere in the section entitled "legal rights", I am concerned that the wording of Section 7 might encourage courts to interpret it to mean something other than what is intended. I think that this is just one more example of the sort of escape hatches, or loopholes, that this government is trying to slip through in this Constitution resolution.

This concern has been expressed by other members who have taken part in this debate, namely the concern that our parliamentary system of government and the British common law will be replaced by something that the average Canadian does not even fully understand. There is a deep and legitimate concern that the role of Parliament and the powers presently conferred on Parliament will be gradually assumed by the Supreme Court of Canada.

● (1520)

We are all reasonably familiar with the basic difference between our constitutional monarchy or parliamentary system of government, and the republican system in the United States. The United States system is based on the Roman triangle, with the executive, legislative and judicial powers at each of the three corners. The Supreme Court of the United States has the responsibility of interpreting the U.S. constitution. However, in the final analysis, the voice of the people is expressed in the House of Representatives; the House of Representatives has the final voice. The final voice of the Canadian people is vested in their Parliament, and that voice and that power must remain here if we are to survive as a parliamentary democracy.

Several months ago when these debates first began, the concern was expressed that if we follow the government's present course with this resolution, the Supreme Court will not only interpret and rule on law, but will also be allowed to make laws. In my view, that would subordinate Parliament to the courts.

For over 300 years, Mr. Speaker, the courts and Parliaments of Canada and the United Kingdom have resisted pressure to introduce some elements of the United States jurisprudence, in particular their rules with regard to the types of evidence allowed to be introduced into criminal trials. As recently as January of this year the present government attempted to introduce the U.S. exclusionary evidence rule into the body of Canadian law. Happily they were forced to back down.

I have with me a letter from the vice-president of the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police on the subject of law enforcement which reads as follows:

> Dear Sir:
>
> Further to our conversation of last night, I am enclosing a copy of a news release issued by the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, January 27th, 1981.
> At an Executive Meeting held by the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police on January 28th, 1981, the news release by the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police in reference to the recent amendments to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms was reviewed.
>
> The members, who represent the entire police community of Ontario, were unanimous in their decision to support the stand taken by the Chiefs of Police of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police of which we are members.
>
> The fears expressed by our fellow chiefs are not imaginary. You might say we are confused and wonder why this sort of legislation would be introduced which would destroy the fine justice system we have in this country today.
> Knowing your background and the stand you have taken in issues involving the safety of the citizens of Canada, I am sure that you would agree that if the American exclusionary rule, commonly known as the "fruit of the poisoned tree rule" were introduced in law in the Dominion of Canada, the quality of law enforcement in this country would degenerate.

We, in law enforcement, and indeed as citizens, are extremely concerned and solicit your co-operation and support in changing or amending the Charter.

Yours in matters of mutual interest.

Yours truly,
J. G. Wales,
1st Vice-President,
Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police.

This matter of law enforcement is causing a lot of concern not only to the police forces throughout my area but, as stated in the letter, to the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police.

Anyone who reads the newspapers and reviews the lenient sentences imposed today by our courts on hardened criminals will know that this is not a time for Parliament and the courts to treat criminals as though they were a privileged class. I have stated many times in this House and in my riding that more tears are shed today for the criminals than are shed for the victims of crime.

This is a time for us to get tough on those members of our society who scoff at our laws, who prey on innocent, law-abiding citizens and who are presently getting the sympathy that should be reserved for their victims. I have always been a proponent of capital punishment and I am more convinced today than I have ever been that we must reinstate capital punishment for premeditated murder and for murder resulting from the commission of other types of crimes.

A few days ago a man was convicted in a local court for the murder of a Catholic priest. It was a heinous, callous, deliberate murder. The evidence was so conclusive that the murderer pleaded guilty. And yet, Mr. Speaker, this convicted murderer was allowed to bargain with the court and received a five-year prison sentence. Was that justice? No, of course not. It was a travesty of justice. I was sickened by it.

In my closing remarks I would like to say that I cannot support this attempt on the part of the government to replace the British North America Act with this Constitution before us today. This document does not contain the elements of an acceptable Constitution, and it contains too many items and provisions that are unacceptable to the majority of Canadians. This is evident from coast to coast. Canadians are wondering what is going to happen to the nation that they have enjoyed in the past, yet the government persists in going ahead with its Constitution—or the Prime Minister's Constitution, as I would have to call it.

On behalf of mysefl and my constituents in Victoria-Haliburton, I call upon the government to withdraw this resolution and act upon the Progressive Conservative Party's motion which calls for patriation of our Constitution and its amendment here in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is quite an honour and a privilege for me to address the House today in this historic debate. It is a responsibility and a duty for me as a Canadian and a Quebecer, and finally as the representative of the constituent of Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot to take part today in the building of our nation. Indeed, we have been discussing this issue in the House for the past six months. I wish to point it out, Mr. Speaker, because in spite of the fine speeches we have heard in this House, the debate on the patriation of our Constitution has sometimes been diluted in an abundance of electoral and time-serving considerations or has been turned into a mere exercise of political marketing.

I refer, Mr. Speaker, to the Leader of the Official Opposition who has tried throughout this debate to use the patriation project to enhance his own image as party leader, while squandering the valuable time of the House at a cost $300,000 per day out of public funds. I also refer to the eloquent silence of the Ontario premier who felt that the anglophone vote was more important than the rights of half a million of Franco-Ontarians. It is essential, however, to keep in mind that beyond all electoral considerations, beyond the provincial boundaries and jurisdictions, Canada's sovereignty and the basic rights of all Canadians are at stake in this proposed constitutional reform. It is within that perspective that the action of this government must be judged and it is within the same perspective that we must judge the people who downcry that action.

Of course the opposition against the proposed federal constitutional reform cannot be passed over in silence. But as La Presse editorialist Marcel Adam so rightly put it in an article published last February 28, and I quote:

It is not enough to awaken public opinion and have it endorse one's cause. One must also take constructive initiatives likely to defuse the crisis.

When the Right Hon. Leader of the Official Opposition crisscrosses Canada, warning people that our country is on the verge of breaking up, his statements certainly cannot be described as being "constructive initiatives". The official opposition dug in its heels unnecessarily to prolong this debate which has now been going on for 54 years, and yet that same party approves the position of the government, if we are to give any currency to this excerpt from the brief presented last January by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) on behalf of the Progressive Conservative Party, and I quote:

We are tabling our proposed amendments to the government's proposed resolution, knowing full well that the majority of Canadians want the constitution brought back to Canada. Most of them also want that a charter of rights and freedoms of the people of Canada be enshrined in the constitution.

As I was saying, the official opposition dug in its heels to prolong the debate, in spite of that statement, so their attitude can hardly be called a constructive initiative. Finally, Mr. Speaker, when the Ontario premier categorically refuses to make Section 133 of the British North American Act applicable to his province, although recent polls published in the Toronto Star reveal that 52 per cent of Ontario residents would accept institutional bilingualism, here again we cannot say that his attitude is constructive. And yet, Mr. Speaker, our government did not relent in its efforts to break out of that constitutional deadlock.

Having heard the evidence and recommendations of no fewer than 97 interested groups, having received 1280 briefs, having held 104 sittings and debated the resolution during 263 hours, the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons presented to Parliament a proposed resolution improved by 82 amendments which in many cases greatly enhance the situation and the dignity of all Canadians. And so it is that Parliament today is studying a constitutional proposal which at long last will free Canada from the final remnant of the colonial era and proclaim the full sovereignty of the Canadian people. We now have before Parliament a charter of rights and freedoms which will guarantee at last the basic freedoms and the democratic rights of all Canadians everywhere in Canada.

At long last Parliament is considering an amendment formula which henceforth will enable the provinces to have their say about the changes to be made to our Constitution in the future. This amendment formula once rallied near unanimity in Victoria ten years ago and, as my colleague for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal) indicated, it will confirm the partnership status of the provincial governments and grant them the authority to propose and approve any change which might affect their powers. This amendment formula will at last enable us to break free from the constitutional impasse in which the rule of unanimity has kept us for 54 years. As recently as last week, Mr. Speaker, I entertained the hope that the eight dissenting premiers would propose an amending formula that could form the basis of future negotiations.

Today however, I must confess my great disappointment in the face of this proposal which I think is a backwards step compared to all the hard work done by Parliament over these long months of debate. Not only do the eight opposing premiers reject the idea of entrenching a charter of rights applicable to all Canadians into the Constitution, but their amending formula includes an opting out provision for any province that is dissatisfied with an amendment. Is that the way to build a nation? Is that the way to Canadian unity?

[English]

An editorial in this weekend's Citizen summed up the position of the eight provinces very well. It reads as follows:

> A constitution is not a constitution unless it binds the elements of a nation together.
>
> The unlimited opting out provision, the absence of an equalization guarantee and the exclusion of a deadlock-breaking mechanism combine to make this accord not an exercise in nation building, but rather a blueprint for nation wrecking.

[Translation]

That is where the so-called heroic filibustering by the official opposition in the last few weeks has brought us. That is the result of the trade-offs to which the Prime Minister agreed in a last ditch effort to gain provincial agreement for his proposal. Both the government and the official opposition have found unacceptable the proposal made by the eight dissenting premiers. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) qualified it as "incremental sovereignty-association" and in an interview last week the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) indicated his disappointment with the provincial proposal. That is why, Mr. Speaker, we must stop fooling ourselves with the rule of unanimity and accept the fact that the time for sterile discussions is over and the time to act is now. Parliament has before it a proposal for an over-all constitutional reform which I believe satisfies the aspirations of Quebecers who rejected on May 20 of last year the nebulous proposal of the P.Q. government. Although they re-elected the same government last week, these Quebecers forced that party to abandon any possible move aimed at changing Quebec's status within the Canadian federation.

In this way, Quebecers have clearly shown in my opinion that they want federalism, renewed federalism which will provide them and all Canadians with the opportunity to develop fully in this land of plenty that is Canada with guaranteed rights and freedoms. However, even with all the good will in the world, this proposal could never satisfy all expectations. It especially does not satisfy the insatiable appetite of the provincial governments who consider the federal government's initiative an attempt at interference with their fields of jurisdiction. Quebec fears encroachment, among other things, in the area of education. It is important in that regard, Mr. Speaker, to consider the demographic situation in order to fully understand the scope of the education related provisions contained in the proposed resolution. In an interesting demographic study published in La Presse last October 18, Jean Poulain states, and I quote:

> . . . the latest data show that in less than 15 years, over 600,000 Quebecers left their province to take up residence elsewhere.

This year alone, according to statistics just released by the Canadian Association of Movers, Quebec ranks first among the provinces for the number of families moving to other provinces, with 54,056 people. Mr. Speaker, these 650,000 Quebecers who have moved to other Canadian provinces are mostly francophones. Every year, they join the hundreds of thousands of other francophones outside Quebec throughout the country who have no constitutional guarantee that they can fulfil themselves in what is nevertheless one of the two official languages of our country. Mr. Speaker, wherever they live, these francophones have the right to use their own language, just as the linguistic rights of the anglophone minority are respected in Quebec. For this reason and because the phenomenon of interprovincial migration is now a fact of life in Canada, I consider fully justified the entrenchment in our Constitution of the provisions concerning minority language rights and minority language educational rights.

Indeed, if mobility is to characterize our future Canadian society, it is incumbent on us to entrench immediately in our Constitution safeguards to ensure the respect of the cultural and linguistic integrity of both founding peoples of Canada. However, this responsibility does not belong only to the federal government. The provincial governments, which have exclusive jurisdiction in matters of education, must also take their own responsibilities to attain this object. Section 133 of the British North America Act already states that Quebec and Manitoba must provide legislative and legal services to their minorities in their own language. More recently, Mr. Speaker, in a gesture of great wisdom and openness of mind, the premier of New Brunswick also accepted that these provisions apply to his own province. In fact, his proposal was agreed to unanimously last week by the legislature of his province.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I must publicly state my deep disappointment at the obstinate refusal of the Ontario government to follow the example of New Brunswick. Some will say that extending the provisions of Section 133 to Ontario would only be a symbolic gesture without any real meaning. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this argument is only a red herring which does not succeed in hiding an unwillingness which greatly exceeds the strategic framework of the recent election campaign in that province. And when it is argued that this would result in an anti-French backlash in Ontario, I can only reply that the refusal of the Ontario government is conversely creating in Quebec an even greater anti-English backlash which is even more dangerous as it is only promoting the cause of the independentist separatist movement in Quebec.

Yet the Ontario government has not lacked opportunities to show its good will. Already in 1969, the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism recommended that New Brunswick and Ontario take the initiative in recognizing English and French as official languages and in accepting the linguistic implications of such recognition. Again, in 1972, the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution expressed this wish once again by making it clear that people should be able to use both official languages in the legislatures and in the courts. More recently, at the first ministers' conference last September, Ontario had another opportunity to show its concern concretely for the 500,000 francophones living in that province.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, it is not for lack of opportunities that the Ontario government has not introduced bilingualism on an institutional basis; yet, each time, it failed miserably. Today, Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge my hon. colleagues from Ontario, as well as hon. members of the official opposition to avail themselves of all possible means at their disposal to try and persuade the Ontario Premier of the urgency to enshrine the linguistic rights of the Francophones of his province in our new Constitution. Over half a million of them hope to see their government move in that direction, while five million French-speaking Quebecers are monitoring the situation very closely. It is in this sense, Mr. Speaker, that a commitment from the Ontario government to apply to its province the provisions of Section 133 would be interpreted as much more than a token gesture; it would be regarded as a concrete demonstration of national unity, an irrefutable proof for all Canadians to see that harmony between our two main linguistic groups in Canada is more than a worthy goal, a tangible reality.

This proposed Constitution now being debated is to be regarded as the foundations of the Canadian society of tomorrow, a society based on equity, freedom and tolerance, on the respect of minorities which make up the Canadian mosaic, where the basic rights of individuals would be enshrined in a wholly Canadian Constitution. We must carry through this great project together, Mr. Speaker, for the sake of our own generation and of a great many others to follow. We must also carry it through as an example for all the countries which are seeking justice and freedom.

I should like to conclude my remarks with this statement which was made by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in Brandon, Manitoba, on February 4, and I quote:

> Our Charter is not only a Canadian accomplishment, it is also a victory for the human spirit.

It is with this in mind that I have always publicly endorsed the proposed patriation of our Constitution. Although I am once more deeply disappointed by the failure of the official opposition to press the Ontario government into giving official status to the French language both within its legislative assembly and its courts, I remain nevertheless firmly supportive of the government's initiative. This initiative is, in my opinion, the first step towards a better Canada, Mr. Speaker, and it is important that we take it together.

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, before beginning my remarks in this very important debate, I want to pay tribute, as others have done, to the members of both Houses of Parliament who have worked so hard, not only in the special committee but in other deliberations surrounding this important matter.

Surely the object of constitutional reform has got to be unity, to unite Canadians in a renewed, reinvigorated federalism, flourishing under a revised Constitution of which all of us can be proud. Unfortunately, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) conceded, this debate has in fact divided our country. The reasons, in my opinion, are clear. They are based on past mistrust of the Prime Minister and his administration and the obsession that he has demonstrated in the past to push his own concepts of confederation over and around other partners in our country.

The early use of closure in this House and the continuing threat throughout this debate to use it again is a matter that has caused great resentment in this House of Commons and, I think, justifiably so. The poet James Russell Lowell once expressed the feelings of many of us when he described a man who was willing to sink half his present repute for the freedom to think. There was more to the effect that this same man, "be his cause strong or weak, would gladly surrender the rest for the freedom to speak."

This is something that is so fundamental to the House of Commons that it has coloured this debate. I believe there are many of our colleagues on both sides of the House who are not going to be able to speak. That is a shame because there were two explicit promises made to make certain that this situation in fact would not occur.

Listening to the Prime Minister in the course of his two-hour plus speech, as he twisted and turned for most of his time, I recalled a verse that I had read once from the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam which I think describes part of this problem. It goes like this:

Myself when young
Did eagerly frequent,
Doctor and saint, and heard great argument,
About it, and about, but ever more,
Come out by the same door
As in I went.

What a pity our Prime Minister did not act earlier on the Constitution. He alluded to this when he spoke on March 23. He said at that time that he had a consensus of provinces in 1971 at the Victoria conference, but that one province held out for something. The irony of it all was that what that province of Quebec wanted it got anyway.

Then the Prime Minister said—and no one has checked him up on this yet, because he has given the impression of single-minded, faithful, dogged determination on constitutional reform—"I let a few years elapse". He sure did. He waited until April 19, 1975, by his own admission, and by then he had blunted our economic progress and soured our country; and that is why the whole process of constitutional reform is so difficult today.

• (1550)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: I agree with the observation "better late than never". We could have a more bipartisan and more constructive approach, and could have had in the past if the Prime Minister had stopped his standard tactics of confrontation, or as Walter Stewart would say, "the methods of divide and con", which, by coincidence, is the first syllable of the Constitution.

However, looking back toward yesterday, if carried to extremes, can cause one to lose the visions of tomorrow, so it is not my intention to spend my entire speech rehashing old events. However, there are reasons for the deterioration in federal-provincial relations during the past dozen years, and I want to remind my colleagues in the House that, besides the ones involved in constitutional reform, these past difficulties are very relevant in assessing what is happening in our country today because they affect the present climate and the present mood.

Anyone, for example, reading the current energy policy of this government would automatically have a sense of déjà vu, as I did when I listened to Donald Macdonald bringing in his policy on December 6, 1973, which at that time was a very comprehensive one. It was going to do a lot of things for Canada. It was going to provide a national market for our conventional and synthetic oil supported by a pricing mechanism with sufficient incentives to develop our oil industry, pipelines to be constructed to the eastern part of our country and an incentive plan for conserving our energy.

The big news at that time was that we would be self-sufficient in energy by 1980 if all went well. Today, seven years later, there is still no pipeline to eastern Canada, although the Prime Minister solemnly promised that on January 25 of last year. There is chaos in the industry and no agreement on pricing between the government and the producing provinces. This kind of performance does not help to instil any confidence in the Canadian people, and it is only one of the many gross errors of the Prime Minister and his government.

If John Diefenbaker were here today, I could just hear him say, with every justification: "The same old bunch are at it again".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: What can Canadians hope and expect from a government like this as it modifies our Constitution? Will it and can it widen the scope of our freedoms, making us a happier, better nation? I have my doubts, since under our British tradition our Constitution is not the source but the consequence of a large and varied basket of freedoms which we already have as part of our heritage. This government cannot give us rights. We have those rights now. It can attempt to restrict them, define them or enumerate them, but it has no business giving the impression to the Canadian people that it can bestow them. This government wants to keep the residue of power; that is this government's ambition. But that is exactly backwards. The residue of power belongs to the people, and any country which forgets this does so at its peril.

J. A. Corry, an eminent and able legal scholar at Queen's University, put it this way: he said the Constitution——is never a guarantee of good government: If the Constitution is a good one, in the sense of fitting well with the balance of opinions and attitudes in the country, it makes good government that much easier to achieve. But the main service of a good Constitution is to put obstacles in the way of bad government.

Does this government's concept of a Constitution match Professor Corry's description? Does it fit well with the balance of opinions and attitudes in Canada, or will it by the clause encouraging referenda allow a bad government to spend its citizens' tax dollars for propaganda to influence their thinking? This is a very serious and fundamental concern. The fairness of a government's approach is absolutely vital if we are to have referenda as a device to be used in shaping the future of our country.

Last October the executive secretary of the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee, a non-profit public interest group, sounded a warning. He singled out government propaganda on the issues of energy and the Constitution as containing gross errors of fact in the advertising campaigns funded by public moneys. He made the point as well that the federal government is not subject to Section 36 of the Combines Investigation Act which disallows statements which are misleading or false. He wrote at that time:

> Why is it that our democracy has no protection against misleading advertising by government—no avenue to challenge government propaganda? Several weeks ago two newspapers closed, a hue and cry went out from politicians and journalists about the control of the press by two large chains. Almost immediately, a Royal commission was announced by cabinet.

Let me say as an aside it was to be under that great non-achiever, Tom Kent.

But which is the greater threat to our freedom, Mr. Speaker, the closure of a couple of newspapers or the freedom of government to mislead without any challenge? The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), who has done such an outstanding job during this constitutional debate, had this to say in the House on February 17, as reported at page 7388 of Hansard:

> But I do not believe that there is any provision in this constitutional proposal which is more objectionable than the permanent enshrinement of a referendum to change Canada's Constitution. This is not just any referendum, it is not asking the people; it is a referendum which could be held in order to break a so-called deadlock, a deadlock wholly determined by the federal government. It is a referendum which will still be controlled by the federal government. It is a referendum which would be used to by-pass the people's elected representatives in provincial legislatures. It is a referendum which could be used by a majority to override the rights of minorities, the very essence which this proposal purports to protect.

When we realize that the government is by far the largest advertiser in this country, spending about $2.50 per capita for this purpose, and when we consider that in the United States, a far richer country, the government ranks about twenty-eighth in terms of national advertisers, spending about 65 cents per capital, we can see the enormous importance referendum advertising provisions have; and this is why I so strongly support the concept put forward by the hon. member for Provencher. I would recommend it to other members of this House. We must have some sort of guarantee to control the government in this respect.

Many Canadians seem to have temporarily lost their capacity for moral outrage; we are a very complacent people, slow to anger, slow to become excited about social issues and abuses. Some of us, however, remain profoundly suspicious about the motives behind some changes being perpetrated in our country. The omission of any reference to the Deity and the absence of property rights do not compliment any Constitution. I trust members of the House will take cognizance of the amendments our party has proposed to the Constitution in the House and will recognize and rectify the mistakes which have been made.

It should be kept in mind as well that there are means other than the Constitution to change a country or shape its future. For example, while the government is commanding the attention of the nation with its ham-handed approach to constitutional matters, it is simultaneously dealing a blow to the destiny of the north and the Atlantic region by appropriating their hydrocarbon resources in a way that is clumsy, arrogant and unjust. While the government is whipping up public concern over the alleged crimes of the petroleum industry, its alleged overcharging and gouging, it is interesting to me that our national petroleum company, PetroCan, is not very competitive, or at least does not seem to be, as I do not see it selling its products for any less than the "seven sisters" in the oil industry. That is a kind of anomaly. As Peter Brimelow pointed out recently in his column:

> But the real cost to Canada of Ottawa's socialization of the oil industry is cultural, not economic. Calgary's oilmen were an unparalleled area of national self-confidence. They were making Canada's presence felt all over the world. And all by themselves, without legislation, they were beginning to over-shadow foreign investors by the same natural processes of economics that saw U.S. entrepreneurs grow past the foreign investors who built the American economy.
> Now they seem fated to be sacrificed, like the merchants of the Maritimes, to a timid, defensive and ultimately mean-spirited centralism.

That is the tragedy of our country. We have not been allowed to develop uniformly all across this great nation. The government talks about federalism but practises centralism. That is what is holding our country back.

There are many other areas apart from constitutional reform where Canadians have reason to be concerned about their rights. Let us consider the McDonald commission inquiry into the RCMP. It is not so much a commission as it is an annuity. The "E Specials" of the force are today doing what they always did, some of which is necessary, but still without any legal definition, and this is four years later. The latest snag in its procedures I think will find a further interesting revelation. By its decision on January 27 last, the Supreme Court of Canada, in the case of Franz Colet v. Her Majesty the Queen, officially put to rest the ludicrous proposition advanced by Commissioner Simmonds that as long as their intentions were good the RCMP could break and enter with impunity. The learned judge in that case, Mr. Justice Ritchie, said very clearly that where police officers were acting without authority they were trespassers, and he thus reaffirmed the common law rights of ownership. But this government will not include the common law rights of ownership in the Constitution, which is a very, very serious omission indeed. I hope this House will see fit to rectify that omission, as I mentioned before.

● (1600)

There is another irony. While our national police force is subjected to a four-year inquisition, has anything been done about organized crime in this country except from the point of view of a few CBC programs and a couple of commissions, the Cliche commission and the Laycraft commission in Alberta, which touched on some of these matters? Not on your life. We politicians are investigating our police force and not doing a thing about organized crime.

In my judgment, constitutional reform is not necessarily any guarantee of sovereignty. True sovereignty means more than bringing home a statute, with or without changes. It means being able to exercise control over our country and defend our territory. Are we really able, without the help of our neighbour to the south, to protect ourselves even from hostile reconnaissance by long-range aircraft of the U.S.S.R.? Can we alone effectively patrol and exercise surveillance over one of the greatest treasures any nation has ever known, our north? Obviously we cannot. Who was responsible, as one of his first acts in becoming Prime Minister, for cutting our NATO commitment in half, and who is responsible for and has presided over years and years of allowing our military capability to diminish? Certainly it is not our party or our leader. In fact, that has been the story of our country. If we do not pay attention to some of the things which involve meaningful sovereignty, we may get our Constitution home all right, but some day we may lose our independence. It is not that simple to bring home a statute without tending to the very fibre and the very basis of what a country should be.

Now the Constitution is being touted as a cure-all. In the midst of our current economic and regional struggles, which are more acute now than when the Prime Minister was first, or even more recently, elected, many people are understandably cynical about taking all this time at this point in our history to discuss and consider a Constitution which, in the opinions of many, has never been that much of a problem.

Some measure of past consistency of purpose and solid achievement in governing would have assisted the Prime Minister to lead and to achieve the trust that is necessary to do something as fundamental as changing a country's Constitution. I suppose what I am really saying is that people like to assess the track record before they place their bets. This government and this Prime Minister have not had much of a track record.

Even the Prime Minister's writings before he came into public life are suspect. Few people to my knowledge have said or written more derogatory things about the people in public life in his native province than has our Prime Minister in his salad days. In an essay, "Some obstacles to democracy in Quebec," published in the Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science and referred to in the book "Federalism and the French Canadians", the Prime Minister referred to the shameful incompetence of the average Liberal Member of Parliament from Quebec and said:

> The party strategists had but to find an acceptable stable master—Laurier, Lapointe, St. Laurent—and the trained donkeys sitting in the back benches could be trusted to behave. Even the choice of front benchers very often smacked of shysterism.

That is despicable. I do not think anyone in this House believes that, but I wonder if the Prime Minister still holds those views. I hope not, but let me bring to the attention of my colleagues in the House a very interesting speech the Prime Minister gave on May 19, 1967 when he was parliamentary secretary to the then prime minister. He told a service club in the federal riding of Mount Royal:

> Politicians who spend their time and energy complaining about the Constitution are simply trying to find excuses for not doing as good a job as they should. Canada's real problems are not constitutional ones but concern housing shortages, the cost of living and other serious problems.

Mr. Epp: Who said that?

Mr. MacKay: The Prime Minister. We know that in the meantime the problems about which the Prime Minister spoke in 1967 have not been solved but have become worse under the pernicious inertia he has generated in this country. The Prime Minister went on to say on that same occasion in his riding:

> Those who blame the Constitution for their troubles are deluding themselves in thinking that constitutional changes alone will work some kind of miracle on this continent.

Perhaps even then he was speaking with a "hell of a tongue in cheek", to quote him again more recently.

Don McGillivray, a very respected columnist, in the January 15 edition of the Montreal Gazette, again referred to the Prime Minister's more recent performance in a column entitled "Pierre is 0 for 5 on Promises". He wrote:

> Trudeau said he would head a national government that uses its strength to realize the aspirations and economic potential of each of our provinces, it would be a national government that builds up rather than tears down, that would make the 1980s a decade of opportunity rather than a decade of doubt.

A year later, as Mr. McGillivray points out, the Trudeau government is almost at war with the provinces. I am not going to list the other failures Mr. McGillivray listed; they are there for all to read. But I do want to give the right hon. gentleman credit—and I mean this sincerely—for finally recognizing that our Supreme Court should have the opportunity to assess and to rule on our Constitution. To do otherwise would have been to deny not only fundamental justice but also to undo in a real way the historic work done in making our Supreme Court supreme in law in this country, taking away the umbilical cord which connected our legal system to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. That was a consistent and good thing to do, and I respect the Prime Minister for finally recognizing that fact.

The recognition of the rule of law rather than the experience and expedience of politics has changed, in my view, a great deal of the atmosphere in the House and the country. That is one improvement or concession which I think one should not be afraid to concede. It is something which transcends narrow, legal interpretation of any Constitution and goes to the soul of our nation.

However, there is another matter which I think is very, very important, and that is that it will be difficult for Canada to be a unified and developing nation when it is formally divided by our Constitution into different classes of provinces. Our neighbours to the south once had a great president, Abraham Lincoln, who at the time he was debating the issue of slavery said that, while he did not expect a nation divided would stand, he did not expect the union to fall either. He thought it would be one thing or the other, all slave or all free.

How can eight provinces in Canada feel that they have the dignity and status of full participation in a Canadian federation when they are formally subordinate to the Quebec-Ontario axis? I think hon. members will agree that it will be rather difficult and demeaning. Certainly it is not necessary. It is the perpetuation of existing bureaucratic and Liberal government thinking which pays lip service to federalism, as I said before, but really practises centralism. A good rallying cry for Canadians who are fed up, particularly those in the regions of the east and west, would be "federalism, yes; centralism, never".

If we are to have any hope of changing our inequitable and flawed approach to true regional equality, Members of Parliament from Ontario and Quebec must be willing to abandon party lines and vote according to their consciences with a generosity of outlook which will accept the concept of each Canadian province as an equal in terms of status when it comes to voting on those issues affecting our nation's destiny in amending our Constitution. To give any province a veto will never work. Even in the United Nations there are not two classes of member states when it comes to voting in the General Assembly. And surely in Canada we do not want to create the equivalent of a Security Council to which only two provinces can belong.

Speaking about regional interests, I have been very disappointed in the behaviour of members of the Senate so far, with a few notable exceptions, some of whom have transcended party doctrines. Most hon. senators have done very little to stand up for our regions. This body was designed to protect the provinces and to be the institution of sober second thought, but so far, because of a discipline imposed by the government, the Senate is proceeding in lock-step with the House of Commons, not even waiting until matters are concluded by elected members.

Some senators from other parts of the country, but particularly, from my point of view, from the Atlantic region, have spoken out; and I want to emphasize again how it was that our former advantageous trading position and independence of spirit was the first casualty of confederation. Our offshore resources are a recent casualty of so-called renewed federalism. Even the transportation imperatives which were once a part of the British North America Act have been allowed to fade away.

Let me speak specifically about the former Section 145 of the British North America Act dealing with the inter-colonial railway, which was a very vital ingredient of confederation. That section, which provided an obligation to maintain a satisfactory railway system in the eastern part of our country, has now been deleted. I would like to put this section on the record but time does not permit. The present policy of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is to downgrade, close and bypass the rail system in eastern Canada and to ship vast amounts of goods and services directly by water from Quebec to Newfoundland.

Would Nova Scotia or Newfoundland join confederation today? The answer is not all that clear; but changing the rules in the middle of the game is not an honourable thing to do, unless one has at least the consent of the majority of the players. This is what the federal government is doing.

I suppose it is fair to say that where one stands on an issue depends upon where one sits. I stand for fair treatment for my region. In so doing, I know it means fair treatment for the west and that ultimately it will be for the good of the country. If the diverse parts of the country which have the drive and the resources are not kept subservient by the votes and the money in the centre of the country, ultimately we will all be better off.

When John Diefenbaker talked about one Canada, he did not mean one Canada with an Orwellian creed—that all provinces are equal but some provinces are more equal than others. All of us in the chamber at various times have talked with great pride about our country: its magnificence, its size, its diversity, the warmth and variety of its societies, and the talents of the people enclosed within its borders. Often we speak about its wonderful potential. Often we use the rhetoric of a great Liberal prime minister who made the celebrated prediction that the twentieth century belongs to Canada. But potential can be lost. Athletes, poets and even countries have had their potentials set back if they lack proper training, proper opportunities and, in the case of a country, proper leadership. Some countries have had their futures affected by war and depression, some by egocentric or careless leaders.

I think of Argentina which in the early part of this century had the same potential as Canada. Indeed today it is making progress because of the competitive excellence of its people in many fields of endeavour. I mention Argentina as an example because it is a large, beautiful country; a confederation with 22 provinces and a federal district. It is a country much like ours, with about the same population and many other traits in common, including the production of vast amounts of wheat and the raising of cattle. They have their pampas; we have our prairies. We claim interest in the Arctic; they claim interest in the Antarctic. Generally they are of European stock. They are still having a great deal of trouble with inflation, but I have been told by prominent Argentinians that one of the main reasons for their setback was that their politicians let them down. I hate to see our country fractured and failing to realize its potential because our politicians let down Canada. I do not want to have to say in the future or to hear anyone else say, for example: "What Juan Peron did to Argentina, Pierre Trudeau did to Canada".

My main concern is that we not subordinate parts of our country, not destroy the feeling of equality between the partners of confederation. If in its so-called wisdom the federal government wants to codify more rights, or wants to bring in other changes to see how they operate, then with some difficulty in the future, if these measures are not satisfactory, they can be changed. But if we give the centre of our country a different and superior status to the rest, how will we ever change it. It will be very difficult and may destroy us one way or another, because although we are proud Canadians, we have a strong attachment and loyalty to our provinces.

Surely Ontario and Quebec are confident enough and secure enough, in the leading role they play by virtue of their present size, economic strength and geographic location, that they would not want to set their status in stone, to formalize by statute this condition in such a way that other provinces will always be subject to their veto. There will be, to use again United Nations phraseology, a sort of security council built into our country.

However, I want to emphasize it is not fair to lay all the blame for our constitutional impasse on the federal government. As partners in the existing arrangements, the provinces have not been able to formulate or agree upon a plan which has consistency of purpose and generosity of approach.

Our most populous province, Ontario, seems willing to support the federal position for reasons related in part to language, while Quebec, our largest province, is opposed to the position of the federal government for the same reason. If I am right, it is a very shabby approach for both to take, based on political and cynical, short-term self-interest to win elections rather than stemming from any patriotic or idealistic motives. Premier Davis, in return for a less zealous approach by the federal government toward bilingualism, although perhaps he has other reasons as well, supports the Prime Minister. I suspect Premier Lévesque is opposed because he does not want any constitutional initiatives to interfere with his own language policy in Quebec. As well, it suits his nationalistic purposes to point to the constitutional issue, if it in not resolved, as a symbol of colonial status.

In the meantime, 800,000 francophones in Ontario see that their access to French language facilities is a privilege and not a right. Twice that many people, at least 1,800,000 non-French-speaking citizens in the province of Quebec, are similarly partly denied access to their language because of Premier Lévesque's deliberate actions in this respect. I must say that non-English speaking Quebecers may have more rights than Franco-Ontarians. As we all know, this is a very, very bad situation.

What this really means is that probably as many as 2.5 million people in Ontario and Quebec are placed in a very aggravating position. This is happening because their rights are being sacrificed on the altar of short-term political expediency. This is not very heady stuff from which to build a constitution, and it is a poor reflection of any definition of the just society about which we used to hear so much.

I see Mr. Speaker is signalling that my time is just about up, but may I say in conclusion that the provinces have been less than generous in matters of language in the past. They have become increasingly protective and chauvinistic about other matters as well. A good example is the restricting of employment or of mobility rights, which is spreading like a disease across the country.

I do not understand why we have to involve the United Kingdom, to the extent we are, in our constitutional problems. I do not understand why we have dissipated so much of our badly needed energy focusing on a difficult and complex package when we could have merely brought the Constitution home and dealt with it in a mature manner in our own country. It is obvious to the world that we Canadians lack something when we are not mature enough to fight our own battles and make constitutional amendments in our own country.

The Premier of our smallest province, where our nation-building first began, Angus MacLean, summed up the matter very well when he appeared before the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution on November 27, 1980. At that time he said:

> We are incapable of understanding, Mr. Chairman, the logic of an argument that purports to remove the last vestiges of 55 years of colonialism by returning us to a status we have not known for 113 years.
> We are not impressed by the logic of a federal government that purports to be terribly embarrassed about going to London for constitutional amendments, and yet deliberately seeks from London the most fundamental changes ever to be made to our Constitution—

I have not seen any analysis better than that.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a privilege to enter into the constitutional debate at this time. The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) referred to former Prime Minister John Diefenbaker. It is at the point where he ended that I would like to begin.

As one follows John Diefenbaker's quest for a bill of rights, it is surprising how often he spoke about the need for a bill of rights before it was actually implemented. On May 16, 1947, he said in the House:

> —it would assert the right of a minority to be protected, in the exercise of its rights, against the majority.

On March 24, 1952 he spoke about the protection Canadians needed because of race, religion and colour discrimination. On May 2, 1946 he moved an amendment to the Canadian Citizenship Act to have a bill of rights included in its provisions. He wanted freedom of religion and speech, peaceful assembly and habeas corpus. On April 12, 1948, he spoke again. On June 10, 1948, two months later, he spoke once more at Winnipeg. He pleaded for protection against discrimination because of colour or race. On October 29, 1949, he placed a private member's resolution on the order paper which asked for a declaration of human rights with fundamental freedoms of religion, of speech and of the press. Every year in opposition he put a private member's resolution on the order paper calling for a Canadian bill of rights.

● (1620)

When the Bill of Rights was finally passed, he was quite proud, as he had every right to be. But with it came major disappointments. He knew that it did not bind the provinces; he soon found out that it hardly bound the federal government. He suffered through years of judicial interpretations while his bill was held to be not relevant by the courts, with rare exceptions, such as the Drybones case. He said:

> The courts, while never denying the constitutional significance of the Bill of Rights, had shied away from it in their judgments, sometimes indulging in juridical acrobatics to avoid having to deal with it.

He knew that to give a bill of rights full force and effect would mean a constitutional amendment. The opposition say we should go back to the provinces. What did Prime Minister Diefenbaker say? He said:

> My experience with the provincial governments indicated that they were too jealous of their jurisdiction over property and civil rights to support any amendment applicable to themselves. I have little hope that their attitude will be altered in years ahead.

Having witnessed last week's events, what Prime Minister Diefenbaker said was a prophecy of what was to come. He was right.

Some members of the opposition say there is no need for a charter of rights, that we are protected by the common law. This is what Prime Minister Diefenbaker said in this regard:

> Some say that it is unnecessary and our unwritten constitutional rights protect us. They have not in the past. They cannot unless you and I have a right to the protection of law in the courts of the land.

In this debate the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said that Parliament is a trustee of the provinces' rights. He is probably right, but I find it ironical that he would use the word "trustee" in that way. Prime Minister Diefenbaker used it in a different way. He said:

> Without a bill of rights, having regard to the experience of recent history, that heritage of which we are trustees will not be passed along to those who come after us.

In the final analysis, his Bill of Rights did not stand up as he would have wanted it to. Only on rare occasions did it bind any government. But in his quest to protect the rights of individuals Prime Minister Diefenbaker was right. We, as parliamentarians, must protect the citizenry from discrimination. There must be certain freedoms that are common to all Canadians. As Prime Minister Diefenbaker said in 1948, there cannot be nine kinds of citizenship in this country. He said that the introduction of a Canadian bill of rights was just one step in a long journey, but that it was a major step forward. I say to this House, let us continue that journey. Let us freely admit that without men like Prime Minister Diefenbaker, and without the men who came before him—the idea did not originate with that prime minister—we would not be taking this step today.

I do not think we should tarry any longer. It has taken us seven months to get this far. Let us enshrine in the Constitution those rights, those ideas, those common decencies which Prime Minister Mackenzie King once said "free men have cherished." Let us say no more that there is a provincial freedom of speech and a federal freedom of speech. There is only one freedom of speech—a Canadian freedom of speech. Let us say no more that there is a provincial mobility right or a federal one; let us say only that there is a Canadian mobility right. Let us take all the rights contained in the Constitution and not separate them by provincial boundaries. Then and only then can we say that we acted in the interests of Canada and of Canadians as a whole.

The official opposition, and now the Premiers, studiously stay away from the charter of rights. Spokesman after spokesman from the Conservative Party has talked about process—substance is avoided. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said:

> The aftermath of the adoption of this resolution will have us looking around at the breaking of our federation and, perhaps, at the breaking of our nation itself.

He went on to say:

> Our Constitution has been made a source of Canadian shame and division.

Finally, he said:

> If public opinion wanted a charter of rights as strongly as this government says it does, then public opinion would made itself felt.

As a member of the joint committee I listened to public opinion for almost three months as witness after witness came before it. I would like to quote a few of those witnesses. Mr. Gordon Fairweather, the chief commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, said this:

> Our thesis is that the charter of rights and freedoms are there to protect the weak against the strong, to protect those who have no power from those who have . . .

Will protecting the weak from the strong be a source of Canadian shame? I say, "Hardly!" Doctor Carole Christinson of the Afro-Asian Foundation of Canada asked that a charter of human rights be entrenched in a patriated Constitution. The Canadian Bar Association presented a brief stating that they wanted an enshrined charter of rights and that they had been asking for it for many years. We have listened to the public and we intend to entrench a charter of rights. I suggest that this charter of rights will not be a source of Canadian shame but rather a shield to protect the ordinary man on the street from legislative oppression and discrimination. It will not be a source of shame, it will be a source of Canadian pride.

I would like to talk about specific rights. Firstly, equalization, which is the concept of sharing between provinces. Mr. Graeme Haig of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce came before the committee. This is what he said about equalization:

> The chamber's view is that the system of transfer payments must be maintained . . .

This is what Mr. Haig said about mobility on behalf of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce:

> The business of hiring preference from one province within a province to the exclusion of residents of other provinces is to us abhorrent.

This government agrees with Mr. Haig's statement. The support of the Chamber of Commerce on these two items conforms to our concept of Canada. It affirms that one cannot be a Canadian without sharing. It confirms that the individuals under a constitution should be able to work anywhere in Canada notwithstanding residence. This government intends to vote for these rights in this charter. If there is shame, I say shame on the opposition for not voting with us.

Then there was the matter of non-discrimination because of race. Mr. Art Shimizu of the National Association of Japanese Canadians came before the committee. Some members of the committee tried to show that even though there was a bill of rights in the United States it did not help the Japanese Americans during and after the war. Mr. Shimizu said that because of an enshrined bill of rights—

> —the Japanese Americans were able to return to their homes a full nine months prior to the termination of the Pacific war, while the Canadian Japanese languished in the internment camps and were being deported, sent back to Japan most likely and dispersed, for almost four full years after the unconditional surrender of Japan when the presumed reasons for their confinement had vanished.

We have included that protection in Section 15 and we intend to vote for it. We have included many basic rights in this Constitution which we intend to vote for. The official opposition can beat their chests and talk about process, insult this party and the leader of it, but in the final analysis what they will be voting for is against the enshrined rights of the average Canadian.

I would now like to deal with the pleas which were made on behalf of the handicapped. In our original draft of the resolution rights of the handicapped were not included. Mr. Gordon Fairweather of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, who came before the joint committe, said this:

> The list of grounds presented in that section is incomplete. In particular, no promise of equality under the law is made to the disabled.

Mr. Clarke Macdonald of the United Church of Canada said that the rights of the physically and mentally disabled should also be stated. Mr. David Vickers of the Canadian Association for the Mentally Retarded said:

> Our plea to you is not a plea for special rights. Our plea as advocates of people with a handicap is that they too will be afforded the full opportunity that attaches to their Canadian citizenship; in short, a plea that they will not be forgotten in the new bill of rights so that they may become Canadians first and handicapped second.

There was one young man who had a very profound effect on myself. That man was Ron Kanary of the Coalition of Provincial Organizations for the Handicapped. He came in a wheelchair to my office. He spoke quietly. He had appeared before the special parliamentary committee on the disabled and the handicapped and he also appeared before the joint committee.

● (1630)

He said:

> We are looking for the Constitution to set a tone so that changes may come about, not overnight but over a period of years, that we can become fully integrated and active and contributing as a force of people in society.

He asked no special favours and we gave him none. All we put into the Constitution is the right that the handicapped will not be discriminated against by legislation. When the official opposition votes against this charter of rights, let them make no bones about it; they will be voting against the hard fought rights of the disabled, like Ron Kanary, and his organization. I say to the opposition, the only source of shame among all of us is that we did not do this years ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Irwin: There has been a grest deal of debate about referendum. There has been much shaking and quaking by members of the opposition. They fear the use of the referendum.

[Translation]

They look on the referendum process as a deterioration of democracy. Yet, they fail to say what may be done in a democratic society to break a deadlock. Their solution to a deadlock is another deadlock. If the provinces and the federal government cannot agree among themselves on a solution to a problem, it seems to me it would be better to ask the Canadians instead of Westminster to settle the matter. What has the opposition so much to fear from the people? To my mind, no process can be more democratic than consulting the people.

[English]

As Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent once said:

> As a Liberal, I have always believed in the capacity and judgment of the ordinary people. And I carry that belief to the point of believing that when we do not carry the judgment of the people, the fault is in ourselves and not in the people.

What is remarkable about that statement is that it was his last speech as leader of our party. He had just been turfed out of office by the people of this country and he did not blame them. If there is a difference between Liberals and Progressive Conservatives, I say that in defeat we do not blame the people. A referendum should not have to be used.

The mechanism in the Victoria formula is there for the provinces and the government to utilize. However, if it has to be used, then this government is prepared to fully trust the people of this country. It is not our Constitution, it is not the Premiers' Constitution; it will be the Constitution of the very people who the official opposition refused to trust in a referendum.

On language, it seems that in this House history keeps repeating itself. Many of the problems which plague us today are those which have plagued us for the last half century. I say it is about time that we solved some of these problems. The first one which we should solve is minority language education.

In 1916, the appellate court of Ontario upheld regulation 17 which seriously curtailed the rights of Franco-Ontario children to have schooling in the province in their own language. Prime Minister Sir Wilfrid Laurier wrote to the Globe: "We French Liberals of Quebec are fighting Bourassa and Lavergne. Will the English Liberals in Ontario fight Howard Ferguson and the extreme Orange element?" John Dafoe replied: "Let our Quebec friends thoroughly understand the situation. We shall not allow them to impose their will on the rest of Canada."

Prime Minister Laurier went to the House of Commons in an effort to convince Ontario to change that regulation. He had a resolution put before the House imploring the Ontario legislature of "the wisdom of making it clear that the privilege of the children of French parentage to be taught in their mother tongue be not interfered with". That was on May 9, 1916. Sixty-five years have passed and the problem is still with us.

[Translation]

The problem of minority linguistic rights still prevails in Ontario. Had it not been for the intervention of the Ontario government, the Penetanguishene school board would have prevented French-speaking children from being taught in the minority language.

[English]

There were times in the last month when I thought we had really matured as a nation. I listened to the members of the joint committee and I thought: "That's my type of Canada". So many prominent witnesses came before that committee, a cross-section of this country, and their concept of Canada was the same as mine. The unique experience was that most of them did not have a special interest in minority language education or the official languages. For instance, Professor Irwin Cotter of the Canadian Jewish Congress pleaded eloquently for the linguistic rights of francophones and anglophones. J. P. Nelligan of the Canadian Bar Association came before the committee and said:

> The Constitution should guarantee the right of a parent to have English or French as the language of instruction of his children in publicly supported schools in areas where the number of people speaking that language warrants this course.

The National Congress of Italians came before the committee and their spokesman, Antonio Sciascia, said:

> Well, if we want to put into effect what we preach, which is bilingualism, then we have to start implementing that policy somewhere, and I think that if we treat the francophones in Ontario the same way that the anglophones are treated in Quebec, then I think that would be a good start.

His Worship Mayor Dennis Flynn of Etobicoke, on behalf of the national executive of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities went much further than anything in this resolution on the question of minority language rights.

I am not quoting l'Association Canadienne-Française de l'Ontario, and I am not talking about what the Council of Quebec Minorities said. I am telling the House what an Italian organization, a Jewish organization, an august board of lawyers and an Ontario mayor with an Irish-sounding name said. We are all Canadians and we share a common understanding of Canada. I left that committee with a good feeling. I thought we all agreed on the merit of two official languages. I thought we all agreed on the merit of minority education.

Then I came back to the House, and on March 3, 1981, I heard the Progressive Conservative member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) say:

> Unfortunately, no one pointed out that the Durham report recommended the union of Upper and Lower Canada and the use of one federal language, English. Had this been adhered to, we would not be having this acrimonious debate in the House today.

I could not believe my ears. At first I thought that what the hon. member meant was that in 1867, if the Fathers of Confederation had applied a broader brush, we would not be having a language problem today. But that is not what he meant, and it took me a few minutes to realize it. Many hon. members were in the House that day. What he meant was that in 1867 they made a mistake in making French an official language along with English in certain provinces, and giving certain French-speaking Canadiaans some official status in this country.

Well, he is one Member of Parliament from Ontario and I am another Member of Parliament from Ontario, and I say to him through you, Mr. Speaker, that he is wrong. I say, that the mistake of 1867 will be rectified. I say to the hon. member that the pleas of Sir Wilfrid Laurier will be heard in 1981. I say, that this time, through Sections 16 to 23, we will enshrine in the Constitution, once and for all, the official language of this nation and the minority language rights of its citizens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Irwin: It is unfortunate that, with the fall of the previous government, the energy negotiations and the constitutional debate overlap each other. I find it hard to believe, especially having sat on the joint committee with colleagues such as the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), various members from Ontario, the west, the maritimes and New Brunswick, that we could be so pedantic and use phrases which will leave scars in this House for years to come. I keep reminding myself that if the Constitution stood by itself, or if the Charter of Rights stood by itself, this acrimony would not exist and we would agree on such fundamental principles as patriation, an amending formula and a Charter of Rights. I hope that I am right.

Prime Minister Lester Pearson once said: "The fundamental principle of Liberalism, the foundation of its faith, is belief in the dignity and worth of the individual." Notwithstanding our disagreement at this particular time, I think this basic belief is the belief of all hon. members of this House. I say now is the time to entrench that dignity and worth of the individual.

In conclusion, I want to thank each and every member of the joint committee and the support staff who worked for so many months to make this a better document. There is, however, a man I have watched anguish over each and every amendment to this constitution from the day we started to discuss it. Let there be no mistake; if there had not been such a man, there would not be the rights for the aboriginal people that there are in the Constitution now. If there had not been such a man, there would not have been rights for the handicapped. This man's vision of Canada is stamped on each and every amendment to this Constitution. He fought, he spoke, he convinced. Part of him is this charter of rights. That man is the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Chrétien).

● (1640)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Irwin: Finally, there is the man I consider to be the soul of this Constitution, one who is seldom thanked. I refer to the man who spent most of his political life working toward this day and this time; the man who, like the Phoenix of old, rose again to lead this party and this government; the man who best exemplifies our party's historical past and philosophical future; the man who has shown us the way along a difficult road. The opposition blame him, but I congratulate him. I refer to the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) and in order to avoid interrupting him while he is speaking, perhaps I could dispose of the proceedings on the adjournment motion for this evening.

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, before I begin the substance of my speech this afternoon I, too, would like to extend my deep appreciation and thanks to all members of this House and of the other place who sat on the special joint committee which helped produce the resolution which is before us today. Many long hours of hard work went into those committee sittings.

I often get very angry—usually quietly angry—when I hear some members in this chamber try to argue in a spurious way that this is a document that is being forced upon Canadians by some foreign Parliament at Westminster. We all know that the constitutional resolution of 1981 which will become the new Constitution of Canada was conceived in Canada, was written here and was debated, discussed and argued by members of the Canadian Parliament. It will be passed, before too much longer I hope, in this chamber in Canada. It is not a document of another Parliament—it is Canadian-made for Canadian people.

It is with a sense of both urgency and pride that I enter this debate. We are on the eve of passing into law one of the most important resolutions in our nation's history, a document which will have impact on the lives, the hopes, the responsibilities of all Canadians. It is a document, in my opinion, that is long overdue.

The British North America Act of 1867 has served us, but the time has come for a new constitution, written by Canadians for Canadians; a document deeply imbued with the great traditions of British justice, of fair play, of flexibility, and of common sense. It is a pragmatic document, not flowery and philosophical and not beyond comprehension of ordinary people and the application of elected representatives.

Too often constitutions are written by elitists, for elitists. The constitutional resolution before us is written for people, for our fellow Canadians. It is written not only for the two founding races but for all citizens of our great country. It is written for our native community, for the millions of Canadians who chose Canada as their homeland. It is written for minority groups. I commend this resolution to the people of my constituency, to the people who first elected me ten years ago to sit in this chamber on their behalf. I will be proud to defend it at any time in my constituency.

There are many reasons for my support for the resolution, but because of time limitation I will confine my remarks to just two or three major aspects.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I am unabashedly a strong federalist, although I have always recognized and respected provincial rights and aspirations where those rights and aspirations have not adversely infringed the Canadian national ethos. I suggest to all hon. members that the resolution before us reflects my general, philosophical approach to federalism in our country today. It does not, Mr. Speaker, reflect the arguments of those members who would call for the establishment of a Constitution based on the concept that Canada is a community of communities, or, as one wag has put it, a nation of five hundred shopping plazas!

The only free country in the world of which I am aware in which a confederation, that is, a loosely-knit community of semi-autonomous states, has effectively worked is the Federal Republic of Germany; that is, West Germany. However, unlike Canada, Germany is a very old country, deeply imbued with an all-pervasive sense of what was once called "pan-Germanism", whose origins stem from centuries of gradual development. While German states may have strong individual powers, "Germanism" transcends most, if not all, conflicts of a political, judicial and economic nature.

Canada, on the other hand, is a relatively young country whose fragile culture is still weak, whose national identity has only recently begun to reflect a national presence. I suggest that we cannot afford the luxury of establishing a confederation much as some provinces would dearly like. We cannot afford to chance future national growth by giving in now to narrow, parochial and regional interests which would only serve to weaken and destroy that delicate fabric which is so desperately needed if we are to go forward as one nation, one people.

That is why I am a strong federalist. That is why we need a strong national presence throughout our country. However, a strong national presence does not mean, in my view, a highly centralized, over-bearing bureaucracy with a heavy hand on virtually every provincial activity. Far from it. For our new federation to work, there must be specific provincial jurisdictions, shared powers, and federal paramountcy in key areas of an overriding national purpose. This, to me, is co-operative federalism. And, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the proposed resolution provides for that kind of co-operative federalism.

Last October, the New Democratic Party caucus was prepared to support in principle the resolution on constitutional change presented by the Government of Canada. We did so because, first, in our judgment, action was needed at this important historical time in our country and, second, because key elements in the proposed resolution were part of established New Democratic Party policy.

We include among these a Bill of Rights, the recognition of the duality of Canada, especially its two principal linguistic groups, and third, entrenchment of the important principle of equalization which is central to a social democratic party. In addition, it provided for, at long last, our own Canadian constitution with a workable amending formula.

Therefore, in supporting this resolution I am supporting my own party's constitutional policy as passed at conventions by the members of my party from all areas of Canada. However, Mr. Speaker, last October we found some glaring weaknesses in the Liberal proposals in the original document. We were not satisfied with many aspects of the charter of rights, equalization, native and women's rights, and the exclusion of rights for the handicapped.

Consequently, my party said that we would support the resolution in principle only if two important conditions were met: that regional and federal balance was restored to the federal system: that is to say, in this particular case that provincial control of non-renewable natural resources be firmly established in the Constitution; and second, that a number of specific improvements were made in the resolution apart from this, particularly in the Charter of Rights. In a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), my leader singled out as examples of these specific improvements the strengthening of the provision as it affected equality for women, the strengthening of the position of the native peoples of Canada, along with significant changes to the amending formula.

As a result of constructive negotiation with the government, my party was able to achieve three important concessions from the government. First, affirmation of provincial ownership and control of resources. Second, the provinces, for the first time, will have the right to levy indirect taxes on their resources. Third, the provinces will have the constitutional right to participate in interprovincial trade.

Many have condemned those of us who support the Constitution because of the seemingly arbitrary way in which the process has evolved. To some extent, I agree. The government has at times attempted to push and ram its way through. The Prime Minister has a personal timetable to which we objected. We strongly opposed closure at first reading. We demanded the committee proceedings be televised so the people of Canada could be as close as possible to those proceedings and deliberations. And we vigorously fought to extend the committee's hearings so that all groups of citizens who so desired would have the opportunity to present their briefs.

But the process has not been negative and in vain. Quite the opposite is true, Mr. Speaker. With very effective fighting both in public and in private, the NDP has been able to achieve positive changes in the original reduction. Among these I include the entrenchment of treaty and aboriginal rights for our native people; and, second, an important change in the provision respecting women in Canada. We now have provided in the Charter that women will be guaranteed not only equality before the law but under the law. Third, the amending process has been changed to make it clear that a referendum can be used only as a deadlock-breaking mechanism.

In addition, there were a number of other changes that members of my caucus fought vigorously to obtain and were indeed obtained. I include the handicapped people of Canada, the recognition of the multicultural dimension of our society and a general toughening up on the Charter of Rights.

As a result of these changes and improvements in the resolution which are quite substantial, an overwhelming majority of our caucus decided to support the constitutional resolution. However, in saying this I want to stress two important points concerning the future disposition of the resolution. We have argued that nothing objectionable be added to the resolution and that there must be a full and fair debate of the resolution in the House of Commons. These final objections have more or less been achieved.

However, I would like to add at this point that the main reason, in my judgment, that there may not have been full and fair debate is that for approximately six weeks this chamber was hung up on one amendment. That amendment was not a government amendment, it was an amendment put forward by the official opposition, the Conservative party. Consequently, if anybody is to be blamed for denying full and fair debate in this chamber, I accuse my friends to the right and not the government.

There are still some members who would argue that one last attempt be made to gain a consensus of the provincial premiers to give the resolution a broader acceptance. In other words, some land of national consensus. I would not be opposed to this last minute attempt if I were not completely convinced that such an exercise would be futile. Most of our present and former provincial first ministers have exhibited, over many years of negotiations and deliberations, an inordinate capacity for parochial and regional preoccupation. No doubt most of this "me first" approach is due largely to local political myopia. A great deal of it also emanates from widespread distrust of the Prime Minister. But I do not know why those premiers should allow their personal distrust of the Prime Minister to stand in the way of bringing forward this constitutional resolution which will give Canada its first, updated and modern constitution. I think it is nothing but another example of this political myopia to which I alluded a few minutes ago that our premiers want to think only of their provinces and regions instead of putting the interests of the nation as a whole first and foremost.

What advantage could be gained from yet another constitutional first ministers' conference before the resolution goes before the Supreme Court of Canada, if most of those ministers cannot agree among themselves as to what a new constitution should be all about? At their second last ad hoc meeting in Montreal they could not issue a press release because they could not even agree on an agenda. After a half century of fruitless bargaining with the provincial premiers, I say it is fair and reasonable for us at the federal level to proceed. I am afraid that another first ministers' conference would lead only to another first ministers' confrontation, in spite of the so-called compromise consensus announced last week by eight of the premiers. What is to be gained from an amending formula, the very basis of which is the right to opt out? When human rights are enshrined in a charter, those rights must be inviolate. All Canadians must be protected, not just some.

I would like to draw special attention to the work of two members of my caucus in their successful efforts to give our native and aboriginal peoples a fair deal. If it had not been for my leader and the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar), these peoples would have been no further ahead in their struggle for rights and freedoms than they were before the resolution was drafted. In the original draft, only those native and aboriginal rights already recognized by the federal and provincial governments would have been included in the document. Thanks to the hard bargaining of my leader and the hon. member for Nunatsiaq, all aboriginal and treaty rights are guaranteed and enshrined in the constitutional resolution, much to the chagrin and extreme displeasure of most of the provinces.

Further, there has been much discussion and debate as to the position of our Commonwealth colleagues at Westminster. Many Tories and other opponents of the constitutional resolution have argued that we are forcing Westminster to do our dirty work for us; that we are forcing them to pass a charter of rights and an amending formula that we could not have passed here in Canada. I find this argument not only spurious but deliberately provocative and contrived. If the argument had any validity at all, I would ask the question; Just what have Canadian parliamentarians in this House of Commons and in the constitution committee room been doing for the last five or six months? Surely the opponents of the Constitution do not think that they can seriously expect the people of Canada to accept their argument?

The constitutional resolution is a Canadian document. It was written by Canadians, here in Canada, for Canadians. All we are doing in sending the document to Westminster is using, because of legal necessity, a traditional and historic technicality, I hope for the last time. It forces the British parliament to pass the constitutional resolution, because in so doing the British parliament is patriating the British North America Act of 1867 which we all know is an act of the British parliament.

As far as the resolution's fate at Westminster is concerned, I am strongly optimistic that our Commonwealth colleagues in London will appreciate the wisdom of passing it with little or no debate. In my judgment, they have no alternative.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should set the record straight on one point. The constitutional resolution is not the Prime Minister's Constitution. Because of the hard work done in committee, the original draft has now become a dynamic, compassionate, effective and reasonable document. The constitutional resolution is the product of many parliamentarians. I have no illusions about its application. As in all other federal jurisdictions in the free world, there will continue to be jurisdictional disputes, there will continue to be differences of opinion, there will be continued differences in adjudication. But I feel that we have a document that is both relevant and workable and that future parliamentarians, prime ministers, provincial premiers and jurists alike will, over time, continue to mould an even better constitutional framework for future generations. For the present, I am satisfied that we have done a good job.

• (1700)

There are two aspects to this debate that I find somewhat difficult to comprehend. One is the argument raised mainly by the Conservatives about the exclusion of property rights in this resolution. It is my understanding, based on the British North America Act, that both property and civil rights are under provincial jurisdiction. When we wrote the charter of rights, we were in effect taking away a very large area of jurisdiction from the provinces and putting it under federal control. I find it incomprehensible that we would also try to take away the other major area of jurisdiction from the provinces, namely property rights, if we were at all serious in the first place about getting provincial consensus and support for the Constitution.

I would like to state very clearly that in supporting this resolution I am in no way voting against the right to own private property. I simply say that property rights and property ownership rightfully come under provincial jurisdiction for a variety of reasons. It is much easier and legally feasible if, for example, arguments concerning rights of way, easements and expropriation of private property are adjudicated, along with the legal struggle or battle, among the municipalities and owners of private property under the auspices of provincial governments, rather than taking the legal battle to the Federal Court in Ottawa.

That is one reason why I support this Constitution as far as property rights are concerned. Property rights and ownership of private property belong with the provinces. Let them pass laws dealing with whether governments at all levels can expropriate; and, if the expropriation goes through, there should be fair compensation.

The other point I cannot understand is why the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) would for so long support five, six or seven provinces acting against what I consider to be the national interest. Although I do not want to put words or thoughts into his mind, I am quite sure he has lost that fight, through no one's fault but his own. It is my belief that the leaders of all parties in this chamber come here, perhaps first and foremost to lead a national party, but through that national party to try at least to represent the entire nation. They do not come here as a mouthpiece for, or the puppet of, two, three or four provincial premiers.

I am happy to have this opportunity to tell the House and my constituents that my party leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), under great duress and pressure from certain segments of our party in the west, stood up for national rights, the rights and best interests of Canadians, not simply the best interests of our party in one province.

In closing, I would just like to say this. If I have one disappointment with the resolution, it is that in the preamble we did not guarantee to all Canadians the right to live and work in a safe and healthy environment. This challenge still lies ahead. Those of us in this chamber who have worked hard to fight against pollution and polluters, to make our lakes and rivers clean and productive, to make the air we breathe clean and pure, the workplace safe and healthy, will continue our struggle until we win. And win we will.

As I wrote in my last message to my constituents:

> Long after the political pundits and commentators have criticized and condemned the process, historians, political scientists and constitutional experts, while not agreeing on all aspects of this resolution, will at least, I feel confident say we did our best to give our fellow Canadians as a reasonable and workable Constitution under very trying and divisive circumstances.

The constitutional resolution is not a perfect document. But then, none of us in this chamber is perfect either. We have just tried to do our best. And I suggest that is all our constituents expect, no more and certainly no less.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, like everyone else who has risen before me, I am acutely aware of the significance of these deliberations. The opportunity is rarely given to Canadian politicians to participate in a constitutional debate so, unlike many members of the official opposition, I have resisted the temptation to disinter old campaign speeches and will attempt no more than to share with my colleagues on both sides a few relevant personal reflections on the resolution before us and on the nation that possesses my loyalty and commands my conviction.

This House is a legislature, but it also possesses a judicial authority which, although rarely employed, is nonetheless real. I point this out because, although I do not want to avail myself of this judicial power, I do want to evoke its spirit. For in this constitutional debate there is an idea on trial. The idea—and now I am quoting from confederation newspapers—is "the new nationality" of "one people—one in laws, one in government, one in interests". In other words, Canada, as it was conceived and given form by our ancestors 114 years ago.

Admittedly the purity of this idea has been compromised as it has passed through the generations. We tolerate a diversity that our founding fathers did not anticipate and probably would have abhorred, but its core, the realization of an underlying, sustaining unity to our existence and its expression in a vigorous national government, has remained substantially intact until quite recently.

Since the early 1970s, however, this core has been bludgeoned to the breaking point by the forces of cultural chauvinism and economic acquisitiveness. The instrument employed by the agents of these two forces, that is, many of the provincial premiers and most of the official opposition in this chamber, in an effort to legitimize their assault, is an alternate, diametrically opposed concept of Canada as a community of communities, a compact, a consensus, a federalist state, a partnership of two equal sovereign jurisdictions, incapable of being operated except in tandem, unable to be changed at this time save through unanimous consent and fated, through historical and geographical imperatives, to follow a decentralized destiny.

Most Canadians continue to give their allegiance to the traditional concept of the state but the vigour, and at times the flair, with which the assault on its legitimacy has been prosecuted, especially over the last few months, has confused many people and subsequently weakened their commitment to the point where the proposed constitutional improvements appear not only odious but illegal.

Well, are the administration's opponents correct? Is their version of Canada the appropriate one and ours, on this side of the House, wrong? Let me examine both ideas.

I want to go on record as saying, simply but emphatically, that the opposition's vision of Canada, this unholy trinity of compact, consensus federalism and community of communities is one of the boldest frauds ever promoted in our political history. It is as intellectually dishonest in its formulation and its propagation as it will be, if victorious, calamitous in its consequences.

These are harsh words, but they reflect my concern with a view that is advanced by its supporters as the original, and therefore the legitimate, concept of Canada. If you read the literature of the confederation period written then, or subsequently by historians, you will find nothing of substance to support their claim. None of our founding fathers believed they had created a community of communities. None of our founding fathers believed that the new state had been conceived through a compact, and none of our founding fathers believed that its future would be sustained or altered according to a consensus procedure, and because they did not believe any of these things, they did not say them.

● (1710)

They did say that the national government undeniably had to be the superior level of government with powers that were independent of and which dwarfed those of the provinces, and they crafted the British North America Act accordingly.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, the opposition's idea of Canada's constitutional origins is a mythological fabrication. But despite this, despite its less than reputable origins, could this idea still stand on its own merit as a viable, new, radical interpretation of the Canadian state and the people whose destiny it seeks to guide? After all, its proponents insist that it certainly mirrors today's reality more clearly than does our own.

But what is more illusory and short-lived than today's reality? Constitutions are designed for the centuries. What is there in today's reality that would serve future generations of our new nationality? What kind of country would we have when the national government would be perceived and treated, as it is now by many, as a distant, largely irrelevant imperial power by semi-autonomous provinces, eyeing each other suspiciously, eager to take offence, and anxious to exercise retributive power?

What motivation to greatness would there be in a nationality that believed that less is more, that you can come together by pulling apart, or that the ultimate objective is to think small? How will its people flourish with an economy characterized by fragmented domestic markets, a shrunken industrial base and expensive overheads?

If this vision of Canada were ever to be given constitutional form, I would fear for our posterity. The state would survive but it would ultimately become a body without a soul, alive yet lifeless, a Canadian Commonwealth perpetuated not for its own sake but for the convenience it offers its constituent members. In sum, Mr. Speaker, this idea frightens me. It is contrary to the intentions of our founding fathers and its implementation, I believe, would deny the aspirations of most contemporary Canadians.

What of the ancillary ideas which have accompanied this perception of Canada into the constitutional arena? If I may, I would like to comment briefly on the nature of the response our constitutional proposals have elicited in and outside this House.

I confess that I had expected something more uplifting than I have witnessed. After all, the federal Conservative Party is the possessor of a rich political heritage which I thought would have significantly shaped the style and substance of its members' arguments. But apart from the deliberations of the joint committee and a particularly fine address in this House by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko), this heritage has been ignored by a strategy that more closely resembles the bitterly contested elections of 1979 and 1980 than it does a productive, reflective debate on the nature and future of the great Canadian experiment.

Admittedly, some Conservatives have advised compromise and conciliation but, at the same time, the party has bent every effort, much of it malicious, to pit west against east and anglophone against francophone, in a futile attempt to force total surrender upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Yes, some Conservatives have supported, in fact have worked to improve, the charter of rights, but the vast bulk of their colleagues have treated the charter with unrestrained contempt.

These are not the only inconsistencies in the official opposition's reactions. Consider these as well. On one day it is the protection of the sacred British principle of the supremacy of Parliament; on another day, indeed sometimes even in the same argument, it is a demand that Parliament abandon the debate so the courts might decide. Or some speakers will passionately demand more powers to the provinces or urge the maintenance of existing powers, while others will just as passionately insist that we transfer property rights from the provinces to the federal government in our new charter and they would all have Canadians believe that the British North America Act, without mention of the Deity or the family, was a superb Constitution, while the Canada Act, because at this time it mentions neither, is a seriously, if not fatally, flawed document.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, to mention the Vancouver formula, a modified Vancouver formula, a modified Victoria formula, no referendum, or a referendum before the package goes to Britain. Ah, the referendum! It strikes such unqualified terror in the opposition, but I confess I do not understand why. It was very obviously lifted from Australia. Since that country's dedication to democracy and federalism is surely unquestioned by members of all parties in this House, I should have thought that even a cursory examination of the Australian experience would have relieved any initial anxieties of the provincial premiers and their federal allies.

For example, since 1901 approximately 100 proposals have been considered for the purposes of referenda. Only 37 have been submitted to the people; eight passed and 29 were rejected, including every item which would have increased federal power at the expense of the provinces. So much for the tyranny of the majority.

In review, how do we account for the advocacy of a radical interpretation of Canada by the Conservative Party? How do we explain the party's anger and the anomalies of its constantly shifting arguments, including the ones which were made at today's press conference? How do we explain its irrational fears? Do they collectively reflect the opposition's traditional view of the state, the nation and the Constitution? I doubt it. There is little in their performance of D'Arcy McGee, Sir John A. Macdonald, Arthur Meighen or John Diefenbaker.

I suggest by way of explanation that all the evidence reveals a party in such intellectual disarray that no one has either the insight to draw on the magnificent traditions of its past or the courage to tame the passions its members have aroused or the prejudices they have exalted. If nothing else, this debate has vividly illustrated just how far a once proud party has strayed from its historical commitments under a leader preoccupied with mutiny and a field commander who mistakes unctuousness for piety.

On the other hand, this government's concept of Canada flows from the understanding that our founding fathers were creating a state with an identity separate from and superior to the individual colonies whose territories and people it embraced. That is why they proclaimed, proudly and confidently, that they had created a new nationality. That is why they invested the government of this new nationality with powers to control what they very clearly intended to be in a subordinate legislatures. These men knew that sooner or later, federal state, leaders would arise who would seek their destiny primarily or exclusively within the narrow confines of a province, and they were determined to give the future leaders of this new nationality the tools with which to inhibit or roll back such developments.

Given this background, why do we doubt the legitimacy of the processing of these constitutional proposals? This government—any government in Ottawa—has not only the right but also the duty to protect and promote the nationality in times of great stress with any or all of the tools at its disposal, including unilateral constitutional initiatives. So our idea, I therefore claim, is valid and our process legitimate.

● (1720)

What, then, of the content, specifically the charter? I consider the charter to be the long overdue, logical fulfilment of the promise of confederation. For too long have we tolerated impediments to our right to enjoy the full legal benefits of Canadian citizenship. If our nationality is to be whole, if it is to remain healthy, and if to have a vigorous future as it has had a past, we must transcend the barriers of place, geography and circumstance with this new charter.

If it has a flaw—and it is not without blemish—it may be found in its caution. Simply put, it does not go far enough. I am thinking particularly of its inability to advance more vigorously the interests of a Canadian economic common market. Not only must labour move more freely inside Canada, but so too must capital and goods if we are to maximize our economic potential and create wealth for personal enjoyment and social service.

In addition, sexual discrimination should be totally obliterated. French language rights should be extended further, and a preamble displaying our acknowledgement of the transcendent moral authority of the deity should be reintroduced.

But these concerns can wait. I agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he says that more reforms will follow patriation, and I trust that they will enjoy a high priority on his agenda or that of his successors.

To sum up, although I admit to a modest employment of hyperbole in delineating the choices we face as a Parliament and as a nation, I firmly believe that a fundamental decision has to be made by Canadians within the next few months between the reaffirmation of our nationality as it was originally conceived and historically implemented and the revolutionary visions of its opponents. Obviously, I have chosen to remain with the former. It is a concept of Canada which created one of the largest, most powerful states in the world. Why would it not in its enhanced form prove capable of sustaining that position?

There are occasions in the life of a people when they are offered an opportunity of transcending the limitations of the moment and, by doing so, transform themselves. Our founding fathers had the insight to recognize that moment and summoned the courage, without benefit of electoral mandate or public discussion, to act, and we are the beneficiaries.

Such an occasion has presented itself again. Should we rise to that occasion? Of course. Are we lesser people than our forefathers? Can we rise to that occasion? Well, Mr. Speaker, rise we must. And rise we shall.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to the preamble of the BNA Act. We have heard speakers this afternoon refer to the Fathers of Confederation and what they intended, and I think we should refresh our minds as to exactly what they wrote into the preamble. I quote:

> Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a Constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom:
> And whereas such a union would conduce to the welfare of the provinces and promote the interests of the British Empire:—

I emphasize the second paragraph. The provinces, by deciding to unite, created a federal government. Little did they realize that that federal government would turn into a Frankenstein a few score years down the road, but that is what is happening. It was never intended that Canada would be a unilateral country. The Constitution sets out that the federal government is not supreme, as one of our members so vividly pointed out the other day, and that the provincial governments are not supreme. Each of their powers is according to what is set out in the British North America Act.

The British parliament is supreme. There is no other government there, but in Canada the Canadian government is not supreme. It has only the powers which were given to it by the provinces, and the provinces retained other powers which are set out in the BNA Act.

In 1867 the plan was not to weld the provinces into one country; not at all. Neither was it to subordinate the provincial governments to a central authority. Otherwise, not one of those four provinces would have joined in 1867. The BNA Act established a central government in which the provinces should be represented. The central government was entrusted with exclusive authority only with respect to affairs in which the provinces had a common interest. That was set out in the British North America Act. That is what is causing concern among the provincial governments and the people of Canada to a very large degree today. If we allow this unilateral action by the Canadian government, we will be changing the very nature of this country as we have known it.

Many men and women in this country fought for Canada. Many of their colleagues gave their lives fighting for this country. They did not do that to have the country changed into a unilateral state, which is what we are seeing take place now.

In checking history I could not find one prime minister who would do what the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is doing by way of unilateral action. I could go back further, but I will go back only to 1925. In 1925 the minister of justice, the hon. Mr. Lapointe, made a statement on a proposed enactment by the U.K. parliament of a measure vesting the Parliament of Canada with the power of constitutional amendment. This is what he said:

The British North America Act itself is not only the charter of the Dominion of Canada; it is just as much the charter of the provinces of Canada—

That is what we are forgetting today.

Would it then be fair for us to arrogate to ourselves the right to change the act which is just as much the Constitution of the provinces as it is our own? . . . Within their sphere the provinces enjoy the powers of self-government just as much as the dominion Parliament does, and if so, surely the dominion Parliament cannot take upon itself the right to change a statute which gives to those provinces the powers which they enjoy—

Unilateral action will change this country. In 1925 the prime minister of the government of that day recognized that.

Let us move to 1946, when a great Canadian, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, was minister of justice. He was asked the question whether Section 133 of the British North America Act could be altered without provincial assent. Section 133 is the section which provides French and English language rights in the Parliament of Canada, the Supreme Court and the legislature of Quebec. Mr. St. Laurent was asked if the federal government could force the same thing on every other province. This is what that great man, who has passed on, said:

Legally I say it can. The situation appears to me to be this. There are persons and nations who reach a high estate in the affairs of men, and the high estate they reach imposes upon them high obligations—I feel—and I believe my fellow Canadians of my race and religion can feel—that a better guarantee than anything that might be found in section 133 is to be found in that respect, for those who have been formed under the principles of British freedom and British fair play, to protect what are our essential rights.

It is not the manner of those who have themselves had, and whose ancestors have had, the formation that comes from that long history which has brought us to this point in the civilization of mankind, to do things which the conscience of humanity at large would regard as dishonourable; and the conscience of humanity at large would frown upon as assemblage in this House that attempted to take from me and from those of my race the right to speak the language I learned in my infancy as one of the official languages in which the deliberations of this House may be carried on. So it is of everything else that is not within section 92. If it is fair, if it is just, if it is proper according to the standards of human decency, it will be done; if it is unfair, if it is unjust, if it is improper, all members of this House will say, "It is not our manner to do such things."

● (1730)

The great prime minister would not force himself to do something he considered dishonourable, even though it was legally right in his mind. Also in 1950, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent said the following in his opening statement at the constitutional conference of federal and provincial governments:

—it is, and has always been, the view of the present federal government that the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces which gives a federal character to the Constitution of Canada must be respected.

I should like to repeat again the opinion I have expressed on many occasions that, regardless of the legal position, nothing placed by the Constitution under the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature should be dealt with or altered without provincial participation.

Those were the words of a great prime minister of Canada, albeit he was a member of the Liberal Party.

Then in 1956, in reply to a question by the Right Hon. Mr. Diefenbaker, Prime Minister Pearson said:

My right honourable friend also referred to the fact that we said very little in the Speech from the Throne about constitutional amendment, and that we seemed to have dropped the Fulton-Favreau formula. We have not dropped it, Mr. Speaker. We shall do our best to put it into effect if and when we get the agreement of all the provinces, but without that agreement it cannot be done.

Then there was the fourth principle of the Hon. Guy Favreau in 1965 which indicated:

That the Canadian Parliament will not request an amendment directly affecting federal-provincial relationships without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces.

I come now to 1979 when the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said the following at the February 6, 1979, meeting of first ministers:

So, will there be unilateral action by the federal government regardless of the result of this conference? Our priority would be to seek agreement and move in areas of federal and provincial concern where we could move together but if we are not successful I repeat we preserve our constitutional right to change our constitution, the federal one, just as the provinces keep their right to change their provincial constitutions and I do not think either the provinces or the federal government would want to give up that right . . . Our priority is to change this constitution collectively, federal and provincial . . . We will adopt a Charter of Human Rights, we will constitutionalize it. We cannot force the provinces to do it. We are trying to convince them to do it . . . I can answer unequivocally that the federal government intends to entrench a charter of basic human rights and of linguistic rights. Now, this will bind the federal government; it won't bind the provinces unless they want to bind themselves but here again we can under our constitution bind ourselves just as the provinces, many of you, have adopted charters of human rights. Well, we have adopted one and we want to constitutionalize it.

Those were the words of the present Prime Minister who has now changed his mind and is imposing items upon the provinces. He has said that conferences fail. I wonder why in 1979 he said that it will not bind the provinces unless they want to bind themselves? In other words, they would have the right to opt in or opt out.

I should like to refer to a book which was written by the Prime Minister entitled: "Federalism and the French-Canadians" which was republished in 1961 in "Social Purposes for Canada". On page 148, the Prime Minister argued against the centralizing policies of socialists. He stated:

And there is surely some good in trying to improve upon, or modernize, the rational but perhaps aging division of powers adopted by the Fathers of Confederation. I am inclined to believe, however, that Canadian socialists have exaggerated the urgency of rewriting or reinterpreting the BNA Act. Most of the reforms that could come about through greater centralization could also follow from patient and painstaking co-operation between federal and provincial governments. And the remaining balance of economic advantage that might arise from forcefully transferring more power to the central government is easily offset by the political disadvantages of living under a paternalistic or bullying government.

He said, "living under a paternalistic or bullying government"; that was back in 1961. How he has changed! He does not mind establishing now a bullying government and ignoring the provinces. He does not mind doing something unilaterally which no other prime minister in the history of Canada would have even thought of doing.

On March 31, 1976, the Prime Minister sent a letter to the premiers in which he wrote:

In practice, of course, the federal government has in the past sought the unanimous consent of the provinces before seeking amendments that have affected the distribution of powers.

Also he wrote:

—our Joint Address and having it included in the British legislation as an enabling provision that would come into effect when and only when it had received the formal approval of the legislatures of all the provinces—

Those were the words of the present Prime Minister. It reminds me of the saying: "Do as I say, not as I do". Then he wonders why the provinces are not happy with the present situation.

The present Prime Minister has not approached this matter in the same manner as former great prime ministers, such as the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent. He has used trickery and bargaining in regard to the Constitution of the country. I do not see how anyone, even members of his own party, can be proud of that. Part of that trickery was the inclusion of several items, some of which were good and some of which were bad, in one package so that people have to accept the bad with the good. Rather than separating them and voting separately on them, one must accept the whole package.

● (1740)

Today I heard a member of the Liberal Party say that they would give us rights. The Prime Minister of Canada and the Government of Canada cannot give me rights. They might be able to take some of them away, but they cannot give them. I have all the rights they want to include in the charter and some others. One has those rights if one is born a Canadian citizen. I consider that I have those rights from God and not from the Prime Minister of Canada. If the Government of Canada can give me rights, then it can take those rights away. I do not think we would be fooling the people at all by making them think that they are receiving rights that they do not have today, as the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Irwin) said. They are not receiving any rights they do not have, they are losing some, which is what I want to deal with. This is another subject to think about when one considers the Government of Canada and the Prime Minister taking part in this kind of trickery. I quote from the Kirby paper which says:

There would be a strong strategic advantage in having the joint resolution passed and the U.K. legislation enacted before a Canadian court had occasion to pronounce on the validity of the measure and the procedure employed to achieve it. This would suggest the desirability of swift passage of the resolution and U.K. legislation.

This concept is what some members opposite and some members to my left are supporting. It is trickery being performed on the Canadian people. It is no wonder that the premiers of the provinces are upset.

I would like to give you another example of trickery, Mr. Speaker. In the Constitution there is a section which limits, at least to a degree, the control of the Senate. What happened is that the Prime Minister sold out to twenty Liberal senators. He sold out for votes; it had nothing to do with principle. Where are the principles which were embodied in the administration of the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent when he spoke about the high principles of people in office and their obligation to apply those principles?

Then there was the bargaining in connection with women. The Prime Minister likes to bargain. When the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) pleaded for the rights of women a few days ago, the Prime Minister said that he would give her that if she gave him her support. He says that he will give anything if he receives our support. I want to tell the Prime Minister that the rights of Canadian women may certainly be discussed but that their rights are not for sale to the highest bidder. I think the Prime Minister and his party should know this. They should also know that women are not to be traded for political support.

So intent is the Prime Minister on bargaining that he even wants to trade God for lesser things. He has left God out of the Constitution. I heard the Prime Minister speaking on a radio show broadcast from Vancouver a few weeks ago. He said that the premiers were the ones who wanted to leave God out. He said that he wanted the provision but that they would not allow it. He then stopped; he would not go on to say that the preamble which the premiers had rejected included a number of factors. There is not a premier in Canada who would reject having reference to God included in the preamble of our Constitution. But then the Prime Minister goes out and ties this issue to other matters such as language rights, and he says to the people of Canada that the premiers did not want a reference to God included in the Constitution. The Prime Minister is adept at putting items that everyone wants in with items that he wants. To obtain the good, we must accept the whole package. The premiers saw through the Prime Minister's trick and refused the preamble.

The Prime Minister says and I quote, "The premiers are against God." I want to say that bargaining has its place with respect to earthly things. I also want to state emphatically that God is not negotiable and we are not out to bargain. He cannot be traded. He is a supreme being, the creator of the world and all that is good. It is inconceivable that we could have a charter of rights without recognizing the supremacy of God. People tell us not to worry about it, it will be in the charter some time in the future. I ask why not now? It is wanted by all the people of Canada.

Someone said that there are a few atheists in Canada. I do not believe there are any. I have never seen one yet. Those who profess to be atheists call for a priest, a minister or a pastor when they are dying. This is a Christian country and we should not leave the reference to God out of the charter.

The people of Canada came from far away countries. They came to Canada for many reasons, one of which was freedom of religion, so that they could worship God in accordance with their own dictates. In Standard, Dalum and other areas of Alberta some of the Danish women there built a church while their men prepared the land or went out to work. The Ukrainian women in the Vegreville area built their church. We are now saying to these people that we will be taking God out of the charter. They will be thinking that the next thing we will be saying is that we cannot even recite the Lord's Prayer in the House of Commons or in schools. If that is what the NDP want to support, and if that is what the Leader of the NDP bargained with the Prime Minister over, then I am sure the people of Canada will not appreciate it very much.

There is another bit of trickery when you look at Clause 15 in the charter. Before the matter came before the joint committee, the words in Clause 15 were "Everyone is equal". That was quite satisfactory. Then, before the committee, the Ministger of Justice (Mr. Chretien) changed the word "Everyone" to read "Every individual". The pretext was that "Every individual" does not include the unborn child. What will that change do to our country? I know what it might well do. In 1979 there were over 65,000 abortions in Canada. If the amendment including "Every individual" passes, then provincial and local governments will have people on their backs asking for abortion clinics. They will say that they need to have an abortion clinic, otherwise they are being discriminated against. The first thing that will happen is that our local hospitals will be providing abortion facilities. The minister of health will be forced to construct abortion clinics. All of this could be avoided if reference to the unborn child were included in the charter. We go to great lenghts to protect the whales. I hear members opposite cry out in horror when we want to execute a man who murders a little boy or girl. They say that we must not think of murdering them. Now we will be murdering the unborn children, for that is what abortion is, murder. Can any Canadian in this country, or any member of this House, stand up and say that they would support that type of thing?

Section 12 says that everyone has the right not to be subjected to any cruel or unusual treatment or punishment—capital punishment—with a view to the fact that the court would decide that executing a man or woman who deliberately plans and takes the life of another human being would be cruel and unusual punishment. Well, here again, with these kinds of words they are trying to fool those who believe that we need capital punishment in this country and, that it is the basis of all our laws. We punish a child for doing something wrong. Then we punish him more severely for doing something more wrong. Then if he does the ultimate crime, he should have the untimate punishment, death, if he deliberately plans and takes the life of another human being. Many problems will arise in this country through that.

As one man said to me, in Standard, "I wonder how those who are opposing capital punishment would feel if their little girl were tortured, deliberately abused, mutilated and killed following a sex act, a little girl who could not help herself." Do we say that man has a right to live? That man has earned death and he should be executed. But in our charter of rights we are saying, "Oh, no. That would be cruel and unusual."

Then we come again to this matter which I consider trickery, this matter of aboriginal rights. Why does the government not define "aboriginal rights"? For years, the Prime Minister would not accept aboriginal rights. He said, "I don't know what they mean." He said in this House, just weeks before this was put in the charter, "I don't know what aboriginal rights mean. Define them, and then I might put them in the charter." But finally he put it in the charter without defining it. What does it mean to the Indians across Canada, to the status Indians, to the non-status Indians, to the Métis, to the Inuits and to all the other groups? Does it mean anything? I am asking, does it mean anything? If it means something, define it. Be fair to our Indian people.

For years and years we have been unfair to our native people, the Indians and the Métis and Inuits. We have shoved them off in reserves. We have shoved money at them and we expect them to live under conditions of starvation. We will not let them do this and we will not let them do that. We confine them in the Indian Act. We send them gifts of money which they cannot receive properly even then. We send them money for water and sewerage, and we send it to them in December when one cannot even think about digging on the prairies or putting in water and sewers. It is unfair, and here we have the perpetuation of the same thing. Our Indian people and our Métis people and our Inuits have a right to fairness; but they are not getting it if all we do is simply put aboriginal rights in the charter, or if we merely say they will have aboriginal rights. They want more than that.

Then we come to the referendum. Again, there is trickery on the part of the Prime Minister. He blatantly fools the people by saying, "We'll let the people decide," knowing very well that over half the people are in central Canada. I object to being a second-class citizen because I was born in Alberta. I object to the people of P.E.I., Nova Scotia and New Brunswick being second-class citizens, or the people of Newfoundland or Saskatchewan, Manitoba or B.C. being considered that. We are Canadian citizens. We each belong to a province. Each of those provinces should have equal rights. They are provinces. If we want counter balances, let us have the same number of people from each province in the Senate. There should be a Senate reform so that there can be a counter balance. However, let us not make second-class and third-class citizens out of people of Canada. How can the members of the NDP go back to Saskatchewan and British Columbia and tell their people that they are now second-class citizens? And Manitoba—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but the time allotted to him has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, it is for me a great honour to take part in this historic debate on the future constitution of Canada. In my intervention I will not pretend that I have invented every idea set forth thus far, that I am saying something new or that I am coming up with new arguments; although I do not hold a copyright I did associate myself with these ideas over the years. The fact remains, Mr. Speaker, that repetition is the only way to make sure that the people of Canada have had every opportunity, every chance to make up their mind on the patriation of the constitution.

Nor do I claim to have a monopoly over truth, because for us the absolute very seldom exists. Today I am expressing my opinion honestly, openly, without duress from or obligation toward anyone, whatever the people across the aisle or the separatists in Quebec may say. I urge the people of Canada to pay very close attention to everything that has been or will be said in this House about the constitution and to everything that has been or will be written on the subject because some day Canadians will have to make a decision either in an election or in a referendum. I said a moment ago that the absolute very seldom exists, but something which is absolute, Mr. Speaker, is my full support, my unconditional devotion for my leader the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) and for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). When this debate has become a thing of the past, I want my descendants and the children of my descendants to be governed by Canadians under a Canadian statute, a legislation and a constitution of our own.

Mr. Speaker, nowhere else in the world do we see such an effort to have a country's constitution taken out of alien hands. Nowhere else do we witness elected representatives, seven provincial premiers and the Progressive Conservative opposition in this House fight so strongly against patriation of the constitution as it is now proposed. The point to remember, Mr. Speaker, is that if their efforts and their tactics are successful, perhaps I will never get to see that and other hon. members will never get to see that constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I remain confident still, I believe I have the same confidence felt by Mr. Pearson and all hon. members during the flag debate, the flag which we are so proud of today. When we look at it we can say with pride that it is Canadian, it is ours, and that brings warmth to our heart.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of this debate I have heard a lot of discouraging words on the opposite side, words which say the resolution is a dangerous document, words about destruction of partnership, threat to the unity and health of this country, personal attacks against the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and attacks on bilingualism and the French fact. What makes those members so right and us, Liberal and NDP members who favour the resolution, so wrong? Why do those members call the Liberals the oppressors, and through you, Mr. Speaker, call the Conservative members the great defenders of democracy in this House?

I have here in my hand a letter from one of the Tory members.

May I call it six o'clock, sir?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. With the consent of the House, I shall take this opportunity to inform the hon. members that pursuant to the Order of the House made on Wednesday, April 8, 1981, the Clerk of the House has received from the House leaders of the Progressive Conservative Party, the New Democratic Party and the government notices of amendments which will be printed in tomorrow's Order Paper. The Order states that these amendment are deemed to have been moved and they can therefore be debated immediately.

I understand that the members who have already taken part in the debate can now speak again about the amendments if they are recognized by the Chair.

When the House rose at six o'clock, the hon. member for Gatineau had the floor.

[English]

Mr. Cousineau: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was saying that I had received a letter from an hon. member of this House. I do not intend to read it all but I should like to read part of it. I am sorry to say that I do not think members of the opposition received the letter from their colleague, because it was sent to the Liberal caucus and senators. The letter says, in part that "A sheep-like loyalty from his followers was all that Adolph Hitler needed to seize power in the 1930s. Please don't tell me that it couldn't happen here." That letter was on notepaper headed "House of Commons, Canada". The comparison it made was to one of the greatest murderers that mankind has ever produced. I do not think this sort of thing has any place on Parliament Hill, Mr. Speaker. I am quite sure that many members on the other side feel the same way, deep down in their hearts.

After I received the letter, I asked the member concerned if he agreed with everything he had signed and he said, "I honestly believe in what I said in that letter". I answered that that was just too bad in the circumstances.

I heard some speeches in this House a couple of weeks ago. One in particular was made by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) who spoke in favour of the resolution but made no personal attacks on anybody. A member of the NDP spoke against the resolution but made no personal attacks. One of my colleagues, a Liberal, also spoke against the resolution but did not draw any comparison with Soviet Russia and made no mention of Adolph Hitler. Those were true, honest and sincere opinions and that is what we want to hear in this House. I respect those hon. members. That was Parliament at its best, with an expression of opinions.

Is it dangerous to think of preserving and reinforcing the human rights of Canadians? Is it dangerous to try and find an amending formula? Is it dangerous to talk about equalization? Is that the destruction of parnership? Is it destructive to permit any Canadian to continue his education in English in Quebec? Is it destruction of partnership to permit any French Canadian to continue his education anywhere in this country? I ask hon. members to think about that.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Canadians are bewildered during this debate by certain allegiances, nay, by some alliances. They wonder why there was a union to fight separation in 1980, and why there is now this allegiance to and this union with the very person who wanted to break up the country once and for all?

On May 20, 1980, Quebec wanted a change. The status quo had to be broken after 54 years, and in the meantime, the Quebec people gave a mandate to the Parti Québécois on April 13, 1981, to continue to govern and to build Quebec and not to destroy Canada by separating. I hope that Mr. Lévesque will keep his word: no referendum or elections before three or four years. Quebec has shown confidence in him and we have to respect this decision. However, I urge him not to betray this confidence and to work in the interest of Quebecers toward the welfare of the Canadian people as a whole.

All Canadians, and all the Premiers of the nine other provinces promised in 1980 that there would be some changes. What are the changes suggested by this government? To patriate our Constitution, to entrench in it the basic freedoms of Canadians, to provide a constitutional amendment formula if the provinces cannot agree within three years, and to enshrine the principe of equalization of wealth by the federal government from the affluent to the less prosperous provinces.

Mr. Speaker, Canadian history is characterized by the concept of sharing and of helping the various regions which, for whatever reason, do not have an equal share of the natural resources of our country. The members of this government believe that it is the responsibility of the Canadian government to see to it that no region of Canada be forgotten in the sharing of the wealth or the advantages brought about by these resources. Sharing is part of our history and it is this spirit of sharing which will ensure the future of our country, sharing of our poverty, of our troubles, sharing of our dark moments but also of our joy and our wealth.

In 1867, Mr. Speaker, French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians entered into an alliance which granted certain rights to the provinces thus created. In Quebec, for many years, for almost a century, the main language used in business and in industry was English. I learned English as a youngster because we had Slovak neighbours who had just come to this country.

• (2010)

[English]

And these young fellows, Simurda, Kolesar, Milchak and Kopil, could not speak French at that time. Their fathers worked at the CIP mill in Gatineau, Quebec. In the 1920s, 1930s and 1940s the working language at the CIP mill, which is just one mile from the capital city, was English. Why did I learn English? Because I wanted to communicate with these fellows. Today one is a prominent surgeon, one became a colonel in the Canadian army, and the rest are working at the CIP mill. They also wanted to communicate with their francophone friends and today these people are trilingual. They can speak French, English and Slovak, and I do not think they are any poorer because of that.

As I grew up, I continued to learn the English language and I worked at the CIP mill during the summer months. Although 85 per cent of the workers were francophone, the working language was English, the majority of the bosses were English and the majority of the orders were given in English. That was the way of life. We accepted that, and I do not think we had any choice at that time.

However, the frustrations became more apparent in the 1950s and these frustrations resulted in a PQ member being elected in our riding in 1976. Today the working language is French. Yet 90 per cent of those people working at the CIP mill are bilingual, and incidentally, 90 per cent of the anglophones working at the CIP mill are also bilingual.

The coats of arms with the inscription "A mari usque ad mare" became official on November 21, 1921. On our coat of arms there are two flags, the Union Jack and the fleur de lys of France originating in the reign of Louis XIV, which recognized the two origins and the two founding cultures. What I heard from the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) disturbed me greatly. I never thought it was possible to hear these things in the House. If the hon. member and some of his colleagues do not want to learn French, that is their business. In fact, I respect their decision.

I have a story to put on the record. Once I was fortunate to visit the Canary Islands. One night I was served by a Spanish waiter with whom my wife practised her Spanish. I learned that this young waiter could speak English, French, German, Italian and Spanish. Hon. members might ask why he could speak five languages. He told me he wanted to communicate with the tourists and that he wanted to make enough money to be able to come to Canada to live and become a Canadian citizen. He is not alone. How many immigrants come to Canada today knowing two, three, and sometimes four, languages?

[Translation]

Some people feel that bilingualism is forced upon them. I had an argument with the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Lambert) during a committee meeting and told him that that was not the way we saw it in Quebec; for us, bilingualism means understanding, communication, equality within the country, and also acceptance. It is an acceptance of the fact that there are some French-speaking citizens of this country who want to be Canadians, neither French nor English, but 100 per cent Canadians.

Also, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is one French-speaking member of this House who would refuse to speak to an English-speaking member just because he or she does not speak French. It is rather the opposite that occurs. Those who want to make the effort, and there are some now who do, can communicate with the French-speaking members of this House. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has done it as well as others, and they still do. During the 1980 referendum, I had the pleasure of hearing in the same forum the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons) speak not of Newfoundland, not of Quebec, but of Canada.

Is it known, Mr. Speaker, that these two hon. members from Newfoundland are now learning French? I congratulate both of them. The assurance that Canadians may use either French or English anywhere in Canada, A mari usque ad mare, as I was saying a while ago, is one of the responses to this threat.

In the past few years, Mr. Speaker, several young Quebecers have gone west because of the economic instability and political uncertainty in their province. And I should like to quote a headline in last Saturday's issue of La Presse:

> The exodus westward kept up in '80:
> 30,572 QUEBECERS HAVE LEFT

This is not a fabrication, Mr. Speaker, it is a reality. I hope that this exodus will end and that the results of April 13 will not intensify it. Thanks to this charter which will include the right to get an education in French, these young Quebecers will be able to return to their home towns with children who can speak the language of their grandparents.

In the past hundred years, many Quebecers have left their province to go to the United States because they hoped to find work and a future there. Some 1,600,000 Franco-Americans are now living there and they do not all speak French. One of the best examples I can give you is that of Tom Cousineau, an "All-American" who is one of the best players on the Montreal Alouettes football team and who cannot speak a word of French.

Mr. Speaker, in the past few years the Canadian economy has shifted to the West as in 1880 the economy was in northeastern America. I would like our young people to have the opportunity and the privilege to educate their children in the language of their choice. Am I asking too much, Mr. Speaker?

I think that as the result of that important reform, Canada will be a country much more effective and better governed, a country where governments at every level will be more receptive and more sensitive to the needs of the people. I think that the rights of every Canadian should be protected under a charter incorporating individual, political and democratic rights. Even with our traditions, Canadians make a serious mistake when they take those rights for granted. Such a charter will protect us all individually and collectively from a government anxious to impede or deny civil freedoms. Equality before the law, protection against illegal arrest, freedom of expression, of speech, of peaceful assembly, of thought and religion are at the basis of a free society and the way to provide those freedoms to society is to incorporate them in a constitution which cannot be altered nor left at the mercy of a parliament or a legislature.

I feel that the right of all Canadians to move about freely from one province to another to find work must be guaranteed. Fundamental rights, Mr. Speaker, cannot be bartered for specific and varying claims from the provinces. If we wait for unanimous agreement, we shall run into a wall, a deadlock; that is what will happen, and the past proves it. Unanimity might be reached tomorrow, or the day after, or perhaps never.

If we accept the April 16 proposal of the eight provincial premiers, the country will be made up of ten provinces and, as the leader of the opposition once said, it will be a community of communities. Each province will have different rights: we will be Ontarians, Albertans, Newfoundlanders, Quebecers living in a country north of the United States and called Canada. Is that what we want or do we want a country made up of ten provinces, whose citizens are equal, who have the same rights and privileges from the Atlantic to the Pacific, A mari usque ad mare, Mr. Speaker? If we go ahead with the proposed resolution now before us with amendments, there will be ample opportunity in the near future to work in a Canadian context with a view to finding an equitable solution to the other constitutional problems.

Mr. Speaker, I want to close by repeating the words of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development, and I quote:

> Canada is a beautiful land, but we have the opportunity of making it even more fertile, and of leaving to our children and the children of our children a country in which the diversity and the equality that must exist in our society are recognized.

To my mind, the constitutional debate of 1981 is a historical time which, once the quarrels, the discord and the insults have been forgotten, will be of benefit to all Canadians. We will have a country that guarantees the weakest in our society equal rights and protections the like of which are to be found in very few democracies. Mr. Speaker, those words spoken by the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development are now part of the history of this beautiful and great country, a country that will have grown through this historical debate.

● (2020)

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in rising today I intend to place before the House the various sections of the omnibus amendment introduced earlier today to the public by my leader. Before I do that, I think it important that we take stock of where we are in terms of the debate on the Constitution thus far.

What we have to do in the remaining three days of this debate before this matter is adjourned for a ruling by the Supreme Court is to remind ourselves as members of this House what in essence we are debating. We can get caught up with the various details of the proposal before us, but I think we have to come to grips with the issue that has now taken so much time in this House of Commons.

Whether the proposals of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is of such merit that it will not only change the Canadian constitutional framework but renew the federalism as it is sometimes called, or whether we can achieve the same result without the division and acrimony which now surrounds this exercise is the question we have to address. Is there a better way?

What has to be kept in mind and cannot be said too often is this: the Constitution of Canada, the fundamental law of the country, should be changed in such a way that it unites Canadians rather than becoming a source of division. A constitution, once it passes this Parliament, the provinces, the Supreme Court and the Parliament in Great Britain, remains a living document. It is not placed on a shelf somewhere as an achievement and then remains there for everyone to look at and to take pride in. Rather, it becomes a working instrument for the federation, the country. If that working instrument is flawed, then the integrity of the nation, its ability to function, is put into serious jeopardy.

No matter what our different views might be on the best approach, all of us must accept that the fundamental rule under which we are going to operate will be that the Constitution is to be used by Canadian rather than be a source of division.

There are three things we try to do in our amendment. First, we have attempted to define the necessary consensus required here in Canada before we undertake the adoption of such important matters as a charter of rights, the equalization provisions, the amendment on resources and the way in which we will change the Constitution in the future.

What we are suggesting is that Canadians want an alternative between the tyranny of unanimity on the one hand and the tyranny of unilateral action on the other. We must address ourselves to whether there is a middle ground, or compromise solution which, while we might have our differences, will allow the Constitution to work for Canadians in the future and will reduce the division and acrimony which now exists because of the constitutional exercise.

Second, we are offering a compromise position on the amending formula which seeks to meet the concerns of both the federal and provincial governments and which, unlike the government's amending formulae, represents a potential consensus.

Third, we are offering in our amendments a series of amendments to the charter of rights to ensure that the document truly reflects the guiding principles and fundamental values of Canadians. That is the context in which we bring forward our amendments.

What must also be kept in mind is that had it not been for the work of this party, this matter would already be out of the House of Commons, out of the Senate, would have been passed and be in England. What would have happened had this party not taken its responsibilities is that a constitutional amendment would have been born in division, sent to England, done an end run around Canadian institutions without the benefit of either this debate or, what is more important, without the Supreme Court of Canada being able to rule on its legality before the matter was finally disposed of in this House. It was because of this party and no one else that more time was bought. We bought that time at some risk to ourselves. However, as our leader said on October 2, there comes a time when an opposition party must stand up and defend that which it believes to be right and oppose that which it believes to be wrong, even though for the moment public opinion might be, as it was back in October, that the Prime Minister's proposal had a lot of support across the country.

● (2030)

From the beginning we have opposed the arbitrary, unilateral, divisive approach of this proposed resolution. We have said it before and we have to say it again: we want this Canadian Constitution changed here in Canada and we want to have consensus here in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: We have a serious reservation over the effectiveness of the charter of rights and the proper operation of the amending formula, both of which are being imposed unilaterally by a regional majority in this House of Commons.

We have doubts about the charter and the amending formula, not because of the principles of an amending formula or a charter, but because they are being imposed and do not reflect all the regions of the country, and I say this with all sincerity to members opposite. No matter how you want to explain it away, I say to you that in many parts of the country this proposal, because of the unilateral element, is becoming the source of serious division in the country.

The Prime Minister, as I have said before, says he is justified because there cannot be agreement, and therefore he must move ahead unilaterally. Let us consider that for a moment. The Prime Minister, as he likes to do so often, has placed matters in stark terms—not stark realities, but stark terms. On the one hand he says unanimity does not work; you cannot have the support or the agreement of the 11 governments, the federal government and the ten provinces. Speaker after speaker on that side has been saying to us that the Conservative Party wants unanimity. That has not been the position. That is the position they would like us to take, but that has not been the position of the party.

On the other hand, we have said that unilateral action is not acceptable. The Prime Minister says: if you cannot get unanimity, you then swing the pendulum all the way over and accept the unilateral action. He says he is now justified in that unilateral action because he cannot get unanimity. Surely there is a middle ground. Surely there is an amendment to which we can agree in this House.

We have proposed, under section 63, that such an amendment be made possible, namely, that, for the first time in Canada, we define what is an adequate consensus. We suggest that an adequate consensus could fall between those two extremes, which would be a consensus composed of two-thirds of the provinces enjoying at least 50 per cent of the population. People could argue that the consensus should be wider. I accept that argument. What I am saying is that you cannot have a consensus which ignores or refutes either extreme. It is because of that attempt by us to define consensus that we have moved an amendment to Section 63.

Let us consider the amending formula itself. In order to reach agreement, obviously both sides to an issue have to give, to compromise somewhat. It has been interesting to note that the premiers took that first step by putting forward an amending formula which, they believe, both reflects the consensus and represents an amending formula that will work.

How many members of this House remember the day, and I will not give the entire quotation, when the Prime Minister asked if we had heard Premier Peckford say we could patriate before he got jurisdiction over the offshore resources? He talked about Premier Lougheed. He asked whether Premier Lougheed would be willing to patriate with an amending formula before he got jurisdiction over resources. He went on to refer to the various premiers. I say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Prime Minister and members of this House that the premiers did just that. What they did was to say they are willing to accept an amending formula with patriation. It is now up to the Prime Minister, I would suggest, there being other issues which have to be discussed in terms of a renewal of the federation, to sit down and see if that compromise cannot, in fact, be found.

Let me refer now to the amending formula. I will not go through all the flaws of the Victoria formula, but on running through them very quickly one sees immediately that there is to be a veto for two provinces, Ontario and Quebec. In a federation there is to be a veto for two members; the other eight do not have the power of the veto. Even if the population of one of the two provinces falls below 25 per cent of the national population, having once had the veto the province will always has it. The unfairness of the situation becomes evident very quickly.

I would ask members of the NDP, most of whom come from western Canada—26 of their 32 members—when they go back to western Canada, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, do they say to their constituents they must accept third-class status? Do they say they feel an amending formula is right which creates different classes of provinces and through that different classification of provinces different citizens? How do they defend that? They do not defend it because they cannot.

The Victoria formula not only is outdated, it is wrong, it is unfair and it does not work. If members opposite want to continue with that formula, I say to them what they are perpetuating is a centralized system which, in a sense, drives the far reaches of the country away from the centre. For those of us who want a strong national government it is wrong to just give lip service to a strong national government without giving the regions a reason to feel they are part of the central decision-making ability. They must have that ability.

The hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang), who is a jocular fellow and does not see beyond his own nose, can see this only in the perspective of his own province. I suggest that he see it in the perspective of Atlantic Canada, in the perspective of western Canada and see it in the perspective of Canada itself.

I have said earlier, as have other members of our caucus, the Vancouver formula needed further refining. It has gone through further refining. What it does is create an amending formula whereby all the provinces are regarded as equal. It is not only important that the provinces be regarded as equal, it is important that Canadians be regarded as equal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: On the question of opting out, I hear members opposite say some would opt out and we would have a checkerboard Canada. That is a very glib and easy term to use. Was it the government of hon. members opposite which brought in the Canada Pension Plan but also allowed for the Quebec Pension Plan? Are hon. members opposite who come from Quebec in the Canada Pension Plan or in the Quebec Pension Plan?

● (2040)

Mr. Clark: Checkerboard.

Mr. Epp: A checkerboard. Why? Was it because it was convenient, because it worked, or because we would not have had a Canada Pension Plan without it? Of course all of us want a strong national government, but let us be realistic; those kinds of checkerboards have existed in the Canadian federation.

What is opting out? I think it is important for us to define that as well because hon. members opposite are now using a new term, which is "incremental sovereignty-association". I think that new term has been in vogue since last Thursday. The provinces are saying that if the amending formula is used to take powers away from the provinces—not powers granted to them but powers agreed to at the time of confederation—at that time and at that time only can they opt out of those amendments. In dealing with such matters as resources or provincial boundaries are hon. members saying, for instance, that should the Labrador boundary be changed, Newfoundland should not be able to opt out of that kind of arrangement?

So the one question which comes up is the question of the charter of rights. I want to say here again—I have said it before and other members have said it—that not just since this discussion came up but back in the days of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker and in the days of the general conventions of this party this federal party has endorsed an entrenched charter of rights. That is not a new position. That is a position this party has taken for a long time.

So the question then becomes, "what about the opting out of the charter of rights?" Today the Canadian Press said that we had reversed our position on the charter of rights with respect to opting out. In our amendment we have said very clearly that there would not be an opting out of the charter of rights. Why not? Because I believe rights are universal. They apply to all Canadians, and this is why there cannot be opting out. However, I think the point must be made that when the Vancouver formula was discussed, a number of the provinces did not accept the concept of an entrenched charter of rights, and so they did not discuss whether the opting out of a charter would be operative. Obviously for us in this House who are facing a proposal which includes a charter of rights that luxury does not exist. We have to deal with it, and so, as a party, we are saying—and we have said it before—that rights are universal, that they apply to all Canadians and that the opting out formula does not apply. The opting out formula applies, and always did, in those areas—and I emphasize this—where the provinces have had rights since the time of confederation, period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: What about the question of safeguarding Canadian institutions? If one takes a look at clause 54, one sees a number of areas which could be the subject of amendment. How can there be amendment? We have said clearly that unanimity should apply in three areas. Let us look at those carefully. We believe unanimity should continue to exist with respect to any change to the monarchy and the office of the monarchy. In other words, all 11 governments would have to agree to any change in that respect.

Second, we believe that unanimity should continue with respect to what is known as the guarantee of members in the House, depending on the number of senators when a province has the so-called senatorial floor. In other words, the province of Prince Edward Island would be protected and would not have fewer members than it is now guaranteed.

Finally, and obviously, an amending formula should also require unanimity.

What about the process we put forward? I will not go into the details of removing the interim amending formula. If there is consensus, an interim amending formula is obviously not needed. I know the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) likes to talk about the two years, but I do not think those two years will bring any positive results. The reason I say that is that, because of the acrimony in the country with respect to federal-provincial relations, I think it will take much more than two years to bring the country together again.

We have talked about a referendum and the fact that we do not need a referendum. That amendment is before the House as well. What we have said in terms of process is that we need an amending formula which is fair. I have explained that very quickly today. A package could be approved if two-thirds of the provinces having at least 50 per cent of the population are in agreement. That is consensus. That would rid us of the spectre of unilateralism as well as the spectre of unanimity.

What about the Canadian charter of rights? We have offered a number of amendments to the Canadian charter of rights. One is with respect to the sovereignty of God. I noticed very quickly that in its amendment the government has accepted the supremacy of God and that it will be brought forward for a vote this Thursday. I commend the government for seeing it that far, but I want to read the words because I think the matter goes far beyond what the government has done, even though, as I say, I commend the government. The words are the following:

> (a) the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free individuals and free institutions, and
> (b) individuals and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law—

As I take a very quick look at the government amendment, I say that it embodies some of those aspects, but I feel that in our society today we should also include the integrity and the role of the family. I wish the government had also seen the necessity to include that in its amendment as well.

What about the matter of property rights? I know that the first argument which will be raised is that we are now in the provincial sphere and that property and civil rights are provincial matters. What did the Quebec Court say? In a five to zero decision the Quebec Court said that the proposal of the government affects provincial rights. That being the case and if this matter is going to the Supreme Court, why not include property rights? I know hon. members opposite debated this in their caucus. Was it a matter of the price of NDP support? Members of the NDP have said time after time that they are against property rights. They have said that it would be more difficult to nationalize resource industries if property rights were in the charter. What we have said is that property rights should be in the charter, but we have also included the words "in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice". Having checked, I believe that the matter of Prince Edward Island would be covered because of the wording we have included.

What about the matter of the charter applying equally to men and women? We have moved an amendment, and I am glad that the NDP has seen the wisdom of it. We have done it in the Senate, we have done it here and I am glad we are following it again. We have moved an amendment whereby the charter would apply equally to male and female persons. I think it is important to note that in 1929 it was finally recognized that women were persons and had equality.

Another important issue is the matter of the right to life, or the so-called abortion question. In the committee and in this House there was one general attitude, no matter which side of the issue hon. members were on. It was that the charter should not affect that issue and that the courts should not have the power to come down on one side or the other, as was done in the United States supreme court.

• (2050)

We believe that Parliament and the representatives of the people should make those decisions on moral grounds. Therefore, we are moving the following amendment:

Nothing in this Charter affects the authority of Parliament to legislate in respect of abortion and capital punishment.

We believe we have given to the House and to Canadians a way out of the division, to reach consensus, to improve the charter, and once we have a certain amount of consensus, to bring the Constitution home.

I should like to take a look at the NDP amendments. They have the one on equality of men and women and also the one on aboriginal rights. When I take a look at my telegrams I see that in no way do the aboriginal people of Canada feel that the NDP is protecting their rights by its amendments. Not one group does. Why not? It was because they either wanted a consent clause or to be part of the amending formula. The hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent)—

Mr. Clark: Speaking for the west.

Mr. Epp: I suppose he speaks for the west or for whoever. He said to the Indian people, "I see why you feel you are not protected, but I will move nothing which does not first enjoy the approval of the government". That was his position and remains his position today. That is called parliamentary courage! The aboriginal question will not be resolved by a simple amendment. It will not be solved because of its history and its complexity. Therefore, the only way we will get to a satisfactory amendment is to sit down, either in a constituent assembly or at a first ministers' meeting, and bring in the aboriginal people in order to come up with a compromise and a negotiated solution. It will not happen with the NDP amendment, and it will not happen during these three days on the floor of the House.

I am sorry I do not have sufficient time to go through the various nuances of the amendments, but in conclusion I say that what we have proposed is consistent with our view of federalism, namely, that change must come and we welcome change.

Mr. Broadbent: Not yet.

Mr. Epp: Yes, we do. I enjoy the interventions of the hon. member for Oshawa. He made as much sense today as he ever has, so we do not have to measure it for very long.

We believe that federalism is better served by a compromise and by defining consensus, and once having done that, we can improve the charter. If members of the government search their consciences, I believe they will see the merits of the case. I know from speaking to many of them that they are seeking the way to get around the division which they see arising because of the manner in which they proceeded. It is for that reason and for Canada that I believe these amendments should be passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I have listened for the second time to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), and I must say that I am as confused as I was the first time I heard him some months ago.

An hon. Member: As always.

Mr. Towers: So what is new?

Mr. Stollery: Hon. members opposite are laughing. I would presume they are laughing at anybody who, at this point in our undertakings, suggests that we should go to a constituent assembly after five or six months of consideration. After the spectacle of last week, the member suggested that we should sit down with the first ministers once again. What can one say? It is very difficult to take seriously the proposals of the hon. member for Provencher. I am sure the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) will deal with this more thoroughly in view of the fact that the Conservative Party has tabled an omnibus amendment which contains a series of proposals that they know perfectly well cannot pass. In fact, during this debate they have spoken out of both sides of their mouths. On the one hand they said they were in favour of a charter of rights, and on the other hand they put conditions which make it impossible for Canadians to have a charter of rights.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stollery: This is the sort of spectacle to which we have been treated since last October. Now the leading spokesman of the Conservative Party suggests with a straight face that we should go to a constituent assembly.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You did not even read the proposal.

Mr. Stollery: As other hon. members have pointed out, it is a great privilege to participate in this historic stage in the evolution of Canadian constitutional development. Here we are in 1981 taking, in the Canadian House of Commons, the long overdue final steps toward becoming a complete nation. We are succeeding in Canada at what few, if any, nations in the world have achieved. When we pass this resolution, we will have become a nation with our own Constitution which reflects our federal nature in a manner consistent with a great nation, the sixth or seventh most industrialized country of the western world, with two languages, English and French, representing two of the great cultures that have developed in the western world since the fall of Rome.

Mr. Stevens: Who wrote this?

Mr. Stollery: We will have guaranteed future generations of Canadians an important charter of fundamental rights and freedoms, consistent with what we as Canadians believe our country stands for.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: Our country stands for freedom of conscience and religion, freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression—

Mr. Stevens: How about property?

Mr. Stollery: —including freedom of the press and other media communication, freedom of peaceful assembly and association. Canadians will be assured through the charter of the rights to move freely across the country from one province to another, take up residence and pursue employment in any province.

An hon. Member: On freight trains.

Mr. Stollery: I presume hon. members opposite do not believe in these fundamental freedoms which are being guaranteed in the charter of rights. Certainly they think they are pretty funny; I guess they will vote against them.

Canadians will have legal rights which include the right to life, liberty and security; the right to equality before the law; protection against unreasonable search or seizure, arbitrary detention and imprisonment; protection against denial of counsel, undue delay of trial and cruel or unusual treatment or punishment; protection against self-incrimination, and the right to the assistance of an interpreter.

Mr. Stevens: We have all those.

Mr. Stollery: Canadians will be protected from discrimination on the basis of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, physical or mental disability. Those Canadian citizens of the English or French language minority in a province will have the right to educate their children in that language wherever numbers warrant. The charter recognizes and affirms the aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada.

● (2100)

Mr. Taylor: What does it mean?

Mr. Stollery: The charter attempts to preserve and enhance the multicultural heritage of Canadians. We will have done all of this to continue the shaping of a free, orderly and humane society, which is the envy of the world, without a civil war or a bloody revolution. In other words, we have done all of this peacefully. You would have to search long and hard, Mr. Speaker, to find another people who can say the same.

Last week the eight premiers, after months of talk and promises, once more attempted to hatch a stone. One of the characteristics of this constitutional debate is the need for those, like myself—and I see a member opposite shaking his head—to continually restate the obvious. It is obvious that the premier's position would be unacceptable to any responsible national government. I add that the Conservative proposal presented tonight would be unacceptable to any responsible national government. For example, it is obvious that you cannot have a country if different rights for citizens apply in different provinces of that country. Yet that is what the premiers propose—

Mr. Taylor: Why not?

Mr. Stollery: The hon. member opposite asks why not.

An hon. Member: That is what you do with your amending formula!

Mr. Stollery: If the members opposite would show the same courtesy I showed when I listened to their spokesman when he presented his proposal a few minutes ago, I would appreciate it. I think I deserve it. I have listened to this kind of nonsense for five months and I have not taken the opportunity to be as difficult with members opposite as they have been with me. It is called freedom of speech, something members opposite say we have already. But they were not so willing to give it to us two weeks ago when we were not even allowed to debate the question at hand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: If the proposal of the premiers were accepted, it would inevitably lead to disintegration of this country. They propose that if a province does not like some part of the charter, or if in the future a province does not like some constitutional amendment adopted by a formula agreed to by the provinces, then that province should simply ignore that constitutional amendment or right. How could the country possibly survive that? The premier of Newfoundland would apparently like jobs in Newfoundland to be preserved for Newfoundlanders. If Ontario was in economic difficulty, the next step would be that it might decide jobs in Ontario are to be preserved for the residents of Ontario. Quebec, Saskatchewan and Alberta could easily decide the same thing. That is what eight premiers of this country are proposing. It is not far-fetched to believe that some provinces in this country might not be enthusiastic about aboriginal rights. Well, they decide that they will just opt out of that section of the charter of rights so that the native peoples of Canada will have some rights in some provinces and other rights in other provinces. As I said, it seems characteristic in this debate to restate the obvious, to show that that kind of approach to nation building is doomed to failure.

Political rhetoric aside, I know that many members opposite, including members from western Canada, including members from Alberta, think that the constitutional proposal is not such a bad one. What must they think of the antics of their premiers? How can the premiers come out after all these months with virtually the same negative position that they had last September?

Mr. Taylor: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Stollery: How can they really say that Canadians should not have the same rights in all parts of Canada? How can they seriously propose that provinces should have the right to opt out of any future amendment to the Constitution which a provincially elected group of politicians happened not to like? The greatest fraud of all perpetuated by the Tory party lies in their not explaining that it is quite possible that, in the future, a provincially elected government might hold quite different views on a narrow constitutional question from the majority of the people in the province. That happened last year in Quebec. But the premiers tell us that they, and not the people, will decide what rights the people in a particular province shall have. I find it hard to believe that the majority of the people in Manitoba are against the rights which are outlined, or that the people of Saskatchewan or Nova Scotia are really against the charter of rights. It is just not believable.

Nothing which has been presented to this Parliament in the nearly nine years that I have been a member is as easy to understand as this constitutional proposal which we have been discussing for five months, or for much longer. I would point out to members opposite that the original debate on confederation lasted only five weeks.

Mr. Taylor: So what?

Mr. Stollery: This constitutional proposal is simple and clear. In my opinion it is a good thing for future Canadians, a good thing for this country. The members opposite obviously say no.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) has been very vocal tonight. He is opposed to the charter of rights. He opposes everything.

Mr. Taylor: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Sollery: He has a great deal to say tonight. The members of the Conservative Party have been tyrannizing the House of Commons. They have made it impossible for members to speak. They have acted in what I consider to be an anti-democratic fashion. Meanwhile, members of the public have been saying to Members of Parliament, and possibly to the hon. member opposite, "But how can you be against a charter of rights for Canadians? How can you be against a constitutional amendment proposal which is the only one that all of the provinces have ever agreed on?" To those questions the opposition have no answers for the Canadian people. For six months or five months they have had no answer to the Canadian people.

• (2110)

Mr. Taylor: Wouldn't listen to the premiers.

Mr. Stollery: They have proposed an amendment tonight which is no answer to the Canadian people, for that has been another characteristic of this debate: mindless opposition, without ever giving anyone a reason why they are opposing what they are opposing.

Mr. Taylor: That's better than being a sheep.

Mr. Stollery: They all agree in the committee that the charter of rights needed more strengthening. Then they opposed passing it.

Mr. Taylor: They are gaining progress.

Mr. Stollery: How can anybody understand that? What a ridiculous position. The official opposition apparently opposes the only amending formula that the provinces and the federal government ever agreed on, and proposes an amending formula on which even the provinces do not agree.

Mr. Taylor: Why didn't you patriate the Constitution, then?

Mr. Stollery: It simply does not make any sense.

Mr. Taylor: Because its a Liberal MP and Liberal premier in Quebec. That's why. Why didn't you patriate it, then?

Mr. Laniel: Your new friend!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) has the floor.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, I was in the Chamber on the day that the petty, melancholy corporal's guard of Conservative MPs applauded the first speech of the hon. member for Provencher. The hon. member for Provencher talked at length about rights of all Canadians and then proposed a formula ensuring that all Canadians will not have those rights.

Mr. Taylor: Baloney, baloney!

Mr. Stollery: Imagine, the irony; such an empty, frightened flat remedy from a Member of Parliament for Provencher, the constituency which twice acclaimed Louis Riel. The hon. member for Provencher said at the time that Confederation works. Well, the Quebec referendum apart, the problems of increasing western alienation apart, the fact that for ten years federal cabinet ministers have not been able to make decisions without meetings with their provincial colleagues—including the harvest of moss off New Brunswick which must be decided by a federal-provincial conference; the temperature at which Chinese barbecued meat must be sold in Toronto's Chinatown, which must be decided by a federal-provincial conference—apart from all of that, a situation has developed in this country where a majority of the premiers are prepared to state their position publicly that Canadians should not have the same rights across Canada, including the right to work in other provinces.

How can the hon. member for Provencher claim that the present rules of Confederation work? I can only presume that when that vote was taken during the snowstorm in Quebec City on March 10, 1865, in view of his attitude, the hon. member for Provencher would have been one of the 33 members who voted against Confederation.

I think that the Canadian public should know that after he delivered his speech here in the Chamber, explained it to us at length, the importance of the debate, the need for every Member of Parliament to be heard on the subject, the long term importance of this constitution for Canadians of the future, the hon. member for Provencher showed his interest in this tremendously important debate by going off to South Africa for three weeks. I believe the Canadian public—

Mr. Taylor: That is where they have entrenched rights.

Mr. Stollery: The hon. member says "shame" to me. Why should he be ashamed of the public knowing where the leading spokesman for the Tory party went after he delivered his speech? Surely he is not ashamed of the fact he went to south Africa, or is he? To study human rights, yes. To study the charter of human rights in South Africa. Mr. Speaker, that is an opting out position.

Mr. Taylor: You don't mind them opting in, though, do you?

Mr. Stollery: I believe that the Canadian public has every right to ask: why are the Conservatives afraid to unlock the future? Why do they not dare take on the forces of provincial self-interest in the name of the nation? Why do they say, "Yes, I am for human rights; in fact, I am for a tougher charter of human rights than you are," and then put conditions that make progress impossible? How can the Conservatives say they want to discuss the economy and then filibuster their own constitutional amendment for weeks? Why did they tyrannize the House of Commons for several days and make it impossible for Members of Parliament to speak?

Mr. Taylor: To stop closure.

An hon. Member: Rule 75C.

Mr. Stollery: Why are they so bitter?

Mr. Taylor: We don't like dictatorship.

Mr. Stollery: We know about the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart). He sits right over there and he is there tonight. He told us why he is against it. He hates French. But I suspect that he was speaking for a small group—

Mr. Taylor: Another misrepresentation.

Mr. Stollery: —and not for the majority of members of Parliament opposite.

Mr. Taylor: Why don't you tell the truth once in a while? That's another misrepresentation.

Mr. Stewart: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) on a point of order.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I challenge the hon. member across and I ask for an apology. Nowhere in my speech did I ever speak of hate of the French Canadians. I demand an apology in this House, from the hon. member, which he should offer if he is a gentleman.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is very difficult to find a point of order. Perhaps the hon. member, after reading the debate of the night, may seek to raise a question of privilege, but certainly not a point of order. The hon. member for Spadina.

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Stollery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Stewart: A point of privilege?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) on a question of privilege.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member just accused me of, in attributing the word "hate" to me was unparliamentary. As a member of this House, I hate no one; and I teach that to my children. If this fellow over here with his diatribe—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Again, the hon. member has made his point, and I think it is clear, and the whole matter is now clarified.

Some hon. Members: No, no!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. gentleman for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) has expressed his views. The hon. member has made his point and I think the Chair has heard it.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member told a lie.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Some hon. Members: Withdraw, withdraw!

Mr. Taylor: It is a total falsification and he did it rudely.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please I will hear the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) on a point of privilege, but if it is to make accusations which I just heard, that the hon. member has told a lie, that is not parliamentary; but I will hear him on a question of privilege.

Mr. Taylor: Well, Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, then. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) said that the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) had said that he hated the French. The hon. member for Simcoe South did not say that. I heard his speech. He did not say that, or anything like it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Again that is quite argumentative. One hon. member says something that another hon. member has said. Where does that put the Chair in this debate?

Some hon. Members: It is on the record.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Simcoe South said to the House that he had not said that. Now we will wait for the hon. member for Spadina. If he wants to withdraw what he said, the Chair and hon. members will accept that. If not, the hon. member for Simcoe South would perhaps have a question of privilege to raise at the next sitting of the House with Madam Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Withdraw it, Peter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Spadina.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2120)

Mr. Stollery: I am not clear on this point. If hon. members opposite—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) on a point of order.

Mr. Taylor: If the hon. member is going to withdraw one untruth he had better withdraw his whole speech because three quarters of it is—

An hon. Member: The truth hurts.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, the truth seems to have touched some raw nerves over there tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mayer: How would you know? You would not know it.

Mr. Stollery: For months I have listened to the speeches of the Conservatives.

Mr. Gamble: You have not been here.

Mr. Stollery: I was here when the hon. member who just spoke was out organizing the campaign to dump his leader. I was here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) seeking the floor on a point of order?

Mr. Gamble: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is regrettable that while the nation seeks to deal with a matter as significant as the Constitution, we should hear comments of the kind we have just heard, comments that are untrue, made with respect to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gamble: That may be amusing but on two specific occasions—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I should like to hear the hon. member on a point of order, if that is possible.

An hon. Member: That means he has changed his mind.

Mr. Gamble: It does not mean anything of the kind. It simply means that it is inappropriate that I should be quoted as having endeavoured to do something which I did not endeavour to do. As part of a speech—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: You are a failure!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Chair fails to recognize a point of order. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery).

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, I hope that the time which hon. members used for their interjections will not be taken from my time.

For months I have listened to the speeches of the Conservatives opposite. I have watched the faces opposite. They show the scars of their national convention at which one third of the delegates said that they favoured a leadership convention. Faces opposite have grown longer and longer as they wonder more and more if they are not being used in a skin-saving attempt by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). We know that the Leader of the Opposition is desperate for a national election.

Mr. Taylor: At least he is not a dictator.

Mr. Stollery: He will do anything to save his neck. He has had it. He is finished. The only question remaining is whether or not he will take the Tory party down with him.

Mr. Gustafson: But he is honest!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stollery: The hon. member opposite says, "But he is honest". He admits that he is taking the Tory party down with him. That is why the hon. member opposite sits opposite.

Mr. Nystrom: Stollery for leader.

Mr. Stollery: The Leader of the Opposition is about to go down in history as the man who ran a national election campaign in a world petroleum crisis against Petro-Can and is now running his leadership campaign against the Canadian Constitution. If you did not see it, you would not believe it!

I have been a Member of Parliament for nearly nine years.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Too long.

Mr. Kempling: You would never know it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Resign.

An hon. Member: Motorcycling to Ottawa!

Mr. Stollery: I have been a Member of Parliament for nearly nine years.

An hon. Member: Taxi!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You should do the decent thing and resign.

Mr. Stollery: Since I have been here, this chamber, reflecting Canadian life as it has been in the 1970s, has seen many debates on complex issues such as energy and economics, including employment and inflation. We are now contemplating pension reform. These have been increasingly complicated issues resulting in an exponential increase in the need for study and knowledge by Members of Parliament. They are issues which have reflected the revolution that started with the oil crisis of 1972, a revolution that has put a stamp on the 1970s.

It is again an irony that this simple constitutional resolution that many Conservatives say is unnecessary because the British North America Act works, is in fact a vital element in the ability of the national government in Canada to govern and to resolve the issues of energy, unemployment, inflation, pension reform, etc.

At the beginning of this debate the super patriot from Athabasca stood here and shouted "O Canada" while the provincial government in his province of Alberta closed down his own town and put his constituents out of work.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Lies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but this allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, since I last spoke in this debate—in this important, historic debate—certain events have taken place. As my colleagues have done, I want to join in paying tribute to members on all sides of the House who spent weekends and many hours serving the nation and serving Parliament in a committee which did an exemplary job of presenting to the nation, in living colour on television, the debate which now comes to another conclusion.

Certain events took place in Parliament itself. We have been accused of all kinds of things, such as delay, obstruction and filibuster. I happen to think that certain people in Parliament learned an important lesson, that is, that this institution will actually work in times of crisis and in times when the sensitivities of Canadians throughout the country are aroused over matters that take place here. I will never apologize for my contribution to whatever that was called, be it filibuster of delay.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) learned an important lesson. He had to learn that the timetables he had set for himself and for the nation in bringing about his version of constitutional renewal, had to be sacrificed to the will of Parliament.

We gained some important time; time for parliamentarians to reflect on what is happening. We gained time for provincial premiers and provincial legislatures to address the problem and we gained time for all Canadians throughout the country to become better acquainted with what is about to happen in Parliament in this crucial period in our history.

• (2130)

I welcome the opportunity to speak once more. I thank my colleagues on this side of the house, some of whom will not be able to speak because there is not enough time and so I thank them for giving me the opportunity to speak a second time. Like every member in this House, I receive mail, not just from my own constituents but from people throughout the country who live in wonderment who are bewildered and confused because they no longer understand what this debate is all about. They no longer understand what the Prime Minister, this great social reformer, this great institutional engineer, wants to do with Canada. They have developed a certain respect for the institution of Canada, the important and crucial components of which are the provincial governments. People have learned to respect their provincial premiers. Our provincial premiers came to Ottawa and participated in a public dabate last weekend. The provincial premiers were on one side and the Prime Minister on the other. There was a breakdown of communications. People cannot understand for the life of them why Canadians are diametrically opposed over a matter which my friends on the other side say is so simple, straightforward and so easy to understand. There is a reason for this bewilderment and confusion. People participating in this debate no longer address themselves to the questions which were initially debated after the Quebec referendum which prompted the urgency and indecent haste now demonstrated. The people of Quebec were provided with an opportunity to choose whether they still wanted to be part of this confederation of this great nation, which Sir John A. Macdonald could see 114 years ago as becoming one of the greatest in the universe, or whether their legitimate aspirations in terms of industry, culture and religion would be better met with a separate state.

Certain things were wrong and were discussed at the time of the Quebec referendum. Many of us travelled to the province of Quebec. Several of the premiers who participated in last weekend's debate also travelled to Quebec at the time of the referendum as did the Prime Minister and some of his ministers. They promised the people of Quebec there would be fundamental and immediate action if they once again chose to stay in confederation and played the important role which Quebec had always played in the union.

We did not talk about a charter of rights. We did not talk about the things which now predominate in the debate. In fact, we talked about things much different than that. For instance, we talked about such things as the reform of the Senate. We talked about electoral reform. We talked about better equality and regional reflection in some of the regulatory boards which play such an important role in this country. We talked about reform of the Supreme Court. We talked about reform of this institution. We talked about restoring the role intended for private members when this institution had its beginning, allowing them a meaningful contribution to the policy-making process and allowing them to keep an effective check on what the government was doing. But I ask hon. members whether they have heard any speaker over the last five weeks talk about these things. I say we have not.

We are talking now about a charter of rights which is to be the solution to all problems which have faced this nation since confederation. We no longer talk about the need and the failure of the Senate to fulfil this crucial role intended for it under confederation to represent minorities and protect them from the tyranny of the majority inherent in a direct democracy process, such as that which is the usual role of the House of Commons. The Senate was to bring a regional voice to represent regions in a different way from what Members of Parliament can do. As well, the Senate was to be a conciliator between the central government and the provinces in cases where there is an impasse in certain matters. The Senate has never filled that role, and so we have these problems throughout Canada because there is no effective spokesman for legitimate regional concerns.

We talked about electoral reform. Why did we talk about that? Obviously we talked about it because it is not right for a government to have no representation in half of the country. In the government there are only two representatives of one province of western Canada. That is not a good situation.

There are better ways of electing a parliament to ensure that the vote a government or a leading political party receives in a certain region is adequately reflected in terms of representation in the House. It is not a healthy situation for the Official Opposition not to be represented in one province which has over 25 per cent of the population. That is why we talked about electoral reform and that is why we made promises to the people of Quebec during the referendum.

We talked about reform and equality in terms of regulatory bodies. We talked about the inequity of having Supreme Court judges appointed disproportionately from certain regions of the country while other regions are almost completely shut out. We talked about reforms to the procedures of the House of Commons. That debate is no longer relevant nor is it going on. We have now found another solution to the problems of Canada. That solution is something termed by our Prime Minister some time ago as "a new society." We no longer concern ourselves with the fundamental things that I have talked about. We are now making some fundamental changes in terms of a charter of rights, a new contract, which will profoundly and fundamentally change the relationship between the individual and the state.

The problems which the Prime Minister is trying to solve with his charter of rights are now new. The tensions and crises we are trying to overcome are not new. They have been with us since confederation. In terms of nationhood, 113 years is a short period of time. It is fascinating to read our history. It is fascinating to learn that Canada has lived in a sort of suspended state of disintegration ever since confederation. For instance, in 1868, one year after confederation, one of the four partners, namely the province of New Brunswick, held a referendum and voted to leave confederation. It was not satisfied with the results of the arrangement. My province of British Columbia joined Confederation in 1871. We were not an unorganized territory as were some of the other regions which joined confederation later. British Columbia was a Crown colony, as was Newfoundland when it joined. All of our political leaders felt, as most of us now feel, that the interests of British Columbia would be much better served through the wider concept of a great confederation of which the then prime minister spoke at the time. There were tensions even then. We all know that British Columbia did not pay as much attention to the fact that it should be properly represented in the Senate as part of the deal to join confederation, such as the other provinces did. We joined confederation on the promise of a railway from coast to coast, reaching all the way to Victoria.

• (2140)

Few people today know that the Liberal government which followed that of Sir John A. Macdonald tried to renege on that promise to build a railway to British Columbia. In fact, an offer of settlement was made to British Columbia to buy back that promise for $750,000. B.C. rejected that offer and insisted that the terms under which it joined confederation be met.

There were threats of secession even then. There was uneasiness in British Columbia. We felt we had been cheated and that central Canada really was not serious in making us an equal partner in confederation. So serious were the noises from the west that Lord Dufferin was despatched to British Columbia to ease the tensions and to settle some of the disputes that had arisen. He wrote the following to the Prime Minister:

> At this moment British Columbia is obsessed by a frenzied sense, however unreasonable, of injury and wrong.

This frenzied sense of wrong still exists in Canada today. It exists in the west and is aggravated by the colonial attitudes, which have developed over the years, of central Canada toward the west. There is preferential treatment for consumers in central Canada. They were protected by preferential freight rates against high costs of east-west trade. There has been preferential treatment for central Canadian businesses. They were protected against the high costs of shipping to the west by tariffs and trade restrictions.

So serious was the dissension in western Canada at that time that one of the people who led the movement to bring the colony into confederation, Amor De Cosmos, said in this House as a Member of Parliament that he heard, as we do now, his province described as greedy and insulted in many other ways. This same man said the following on February 13, 1879, and any member can go to the Library and look this up at page 1079 of Hansard of that date:

I move for leave to introduce a Bill, entitled an act to provide for the peaceful separation of British Columbia, seconded by any gentleman opposite who thinks it proper to do so.

As this frenzied sense of wrong is still alive in British Columbia, there is a movement of separatism which is gaining momentum and is very much alive in British Columbia. We should not ignore that. It is not a charter of rights and the entrenchment in the Constitution of the cardinal principles of democracy which are the hallmark of western democracies everywhere which will allay and correct this frenzied sense of wrong that we in the west still feel.

What is it about this charter of rights which causes all this controversy? First, I do not believe that we who are elected to this institution through the democratic process have a mandate to make the changes which are contemplated in this charter of rights. We do not have a mandate to surrender the supremacy that rests with this institution in favour of another institution.

This place was created by men of history and by the people. We are the servants of this institution, not its master. It is not for us to decide on changes that should be made to it. I defend my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), when he says that changes as fundamental as those that the Prime Minister has designed for us should be made by the people themselves in another forum than here. When he mentions the constituent assembly, that is the preferable way. Indeed, that would be the way that most modern countries which change their constitution would go about it.

We are now rewriting the Constitution completely, starting from the beginning as if this were a new society somewhere on the moon with no history, nothing to start from, and entrenching a charter of individual rights. As my friends on the other side have said, it is reasonable to question what is wrong with entrenching in the Constitution certain political and democratic rights which were, after all, the cornerstone of all the ideological foundations of the parties represented here, with the possible exception of one. The right and the liberty of the individual is the cornerstone of the ideological base of my party. I suppose it is the ideological base of what was once known as the Liberal Party.

On the surface the objective of entrenching these cardinal principles of democracy such as freedom of speech, freedom of action, freedom of thought and freedom of religion is a very laudable goal. I go further by saying there would hardly be a member on any side of this House who would not fight to protect to preserve the individual rights which are inherent in these cardinal principles of democracy.

Every one of us is almost daily confronted by a constituent who feels his rights have been offended. He asks for help in going to battle. Once we entrench these rights in the Constitution, there will be a change. If an individual phones his Member of Parliament because he has been aggrieved by an act of bigotry, that member will no longer be able to stand in this House to come to his defence. The member will probably have to tell his constituent that his rights are now entrenched in the Constitution, the Supreme Court has jurisdiction over those rights and he had better go and fight for them. Of course, the constituent will not know that it costs a lot of money to have his case heard in the Supreme Court. So far the Member of Parliament has been able to stand up for his rights without having to send him a bill.

What is wrong with this charter of rights that we are about to entrench in the Constitution is that it is not simply dealing with the cardinal principles of democracy. It goes much further. That is what the debate the premiers were involved in was all about. Not only does this charter of rights entrench the cardinal principles of democracy, the political rights, it also entrenches certain rights that are not within the jurisdiction and mandate of federal politicians. It entrenches certain rights of individuals in our country which are under the control of the provincial governments.

Is it not the right of provincial premiers to concern themselves about that? Should the premiers not ask what it would be like after these rights have been entrenched in the Constitution? The language right, for example, says that a person is entitled to be educated and to have his children educated anywhere in this country in English or French. It is a laudable goal to become at some future time a country that is truly funcationally bilingual. This is no longer just a dream. The young children in most European countries on graduation from school are functionally bilingual. They converse in many languages, many of them are multilingual. However, to take one language and throw out all the great things we have strived for and pride ourselves in, including the concept of multiculturalism, and say that henceforth we shall be a bilingual and bicultural country is something that certainly offends me.

• (2150)

Not having had the privilege of being born in this country, I chose Canada and I thought I came here under certain conditions. Approximately one-third of our people living here today arrived in this country believing they did so under certain conditions, one of which was that this was a multicultural country. That is no longer so.

That is not the matter about which the premiers are concerned. They are concerned about the fact that there could be certain areas in eastern and western Canada where, as a result of the entrenchment in the Constitution of these rights to education, the taxpayers will have to build French or English schools, as is the case in the province of Quebec. That may not necessarily at that particular time be one of their priorities. There are small communities in the constituency I represent that do not have water or sewer; they do not have a hockey arena, a library or a cultural centre, and those may be greater priorities at a particular time. We are leaving a certain vagueness in this whole scheme because we say "where numbers warrant". We say we are going to be very reasonable about this. However, it is the Supreme Court that will decide what the numbers will be. Will the numbers be 5, 7, 15 or 500 children? No one knows. The premiers and the taxpayers must know because they will have to pay the bills.

It is just not good enough for people opposite to say that because of a concern which has been expressed about certain aspects of this charter of rights that we hate the French. Why is it that the premier of the province of Quebec, newly elected with a large mandate, is against this charter of rights? Is it not a strange twist of fate that it is precisely for the same reason the people of Quebec who have acquired certain advantages and gained certain momentum in restoring a certain cultural integrity in their province now feel oppressed by the very person who portrays himself as the king and the saviour of the legitimate rights and aspirations of his compatriots?

These are the things that are wrong with this charter of rights. It is wrong to believe that just because we now entrench in the Constitution a charter of rights and give the Supreme Court jurisdiction over the rights of individuals that all will be solved and no one will ever again be discriminated against. Some members on the opposite side have stood up and said just that. One minister stood the other day and said: "Is it not beautiful to know that we shall wake up one morning, having done this deed here in Parliament, and there will never be any discrimination in this country again?" How naive can those people be? Do they really believe you can legislate the attitude of people, that you can prevent bigots from acting like bigots by simply making a law? Of course you cannot.

We have a great history in this country, a history of pride, freedom and a belief in all that is beautiful and great brought to humankind through democracy. Why is it so urgent that we now entrench a charter of rights? What is so wrong with our Constitution or so wrong in the country that we have to take these very dramatic steps?

What is wrong is that we have a Prime Minister who has a certain vision about his country that does not coincide with the mainstream of life and does not coincide with the history and the tradition on which this country was built. He is not so concerned about a repetition of certain events which took place in 1970 when he imposed the War Measures Act. He is not so much concerned with that. What our Prime Minister wants to do, and he has said this in many speeches to his fellow Canadians in the province of Quebec, is to attain two objectives through his charter of rights. To do so he is prepared to sacrifice everything else that forms part of this constitutional package.

The Prime Minister believes in a unitary state as opposed to a confederate system. He wants to lay the foundation to allow for the evolution of a unitary system of government in this country.

Secondly, as he has said on so many occasions, he is going to bring the French fact in Canada beyond an irreversible position. He is devious and sinister in the way he is going about that. I am not saying this is bad or good, but those are the two things the Prime Minister has in mind in respect of this charter of rights, and that is why he, with all the political skill and deviousness he possesses, has managed to divert this debate away from that about which we should be talking to a discussion of nothing but his charter of rights.

Is the entrenchment of my freedom of speech in the Constitution going to redress this frenzied sense of wrong which exists in the west, this threat of separatism? Of course it will not. Is the protection against discrimination on grounds of race, religion, colour and all these things going to redress this frenzied sense of wrong in the west? Of course it is not.

Let me conclude with this comment. I would tell you what this constitutional debate we are engaged in and now completing will do. It will destroy the dream which has been laid out for us by Sir John A. Macdonald.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member may continue with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Oberle: Thank you, Sir. I do not wish to abuse the courtesy of my friends, so I will conclude. What I am saying is that if we continue with what we are doing, in ignoring the real things we should be talking about, namely, the changes to our constitutional framework, we will destroy the dream held out to us by Sir John A. Macdonald when he said we are a great country and we shall be one of the greatest in the universe if we preserve unity in this country and if we preserve confederation. We shall sink into insignificance and diversity if we suffer to be broken. There is a message there. I have a great feeling that if we continue with what we are doing right now, we shall suffer the breakup of our great country.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the House, may I point out that it is 9.59 p.m.? I could begin my speech tomorrow.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Permission has not been granted.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member for Edmonton wants my wisdom very badly, especially during those hours when we have to deal with some of the propositions I will have great pleasure dealing with tomorrow, because some of them are rather funny.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but it is now ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—HALL REPORT RECOMMENDATION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I raised a question in the House on Friday, April 3 to which I did not receive a sufficient answer. I pursued the same question in the Standing Committee on Transport and ran into a wall there. I have receive no response at all from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael) or from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) with respect to the following question I posed on April 3. I said:

> The pension trust fund of the CNR made sufficient profit this year to invest $53.5 million in oil and gas properties. This is just one investment in a huge investment portfolio. Due to these enormous profits, would the acting Minister of Transport instruct the president of the CNR to grant an immediate pension increase and to establish at least a partial indexing of railway pensions, especially since today's pensioners must cope with 12.2 per cent inflation and the devastating effects of the National Energy Program?

The parliamentary secretary stated he would look into this and provide me with an answer, but I have received no answer.

What is causing concern on this side of the House is the repeated news reports that the CNR has a role in a bid to buy Gulf Canada. There have been repeated news articles stating that CN is about to buy this company out, and what role the CNR would play in such a takeover is not clear. Other news reports have stated that the CNR has joined with private interests in planning the purchase of a large stake in Gulf Canada Limited.

What we are concerned about is that we might have a repeat of the Petrofina fiasco, which was a devastating blunder costing Canadian taxpayers untold millions of dollars in special fees to Swiss banks and $1 billion leaving the country and going to Belgium. We are entitled to some answers with respect to whether or not CNR is planning to purchase Gulf. There are other news reports that a bid has been made. The Financial Times states:

> A complex $2-billion deal that would give a group of Canadian companies major holdings in Gulf Canada Ltd. is about to be completed, according to business sources.

Neither Gulf nor the CNR has confirmed or denied that these developments indicate a possible takeover bid. The government will probably wait and wait, allowing leaks to drive Gulf share prices higher and higher, until the shares are so high that Gulf would be crazy to turn down an offer.

I want to point out that it is a railway pension fund which will be paying for these high-cost shares to purchase Gulf, if these facts are correct, and we are not receiving any statements at all from the government the minister or anyone else that this will take place. Of course, Canadians will be expected to pay for this government's bungling once again.

It is most unfortunate that the Minister of Transport is not here to answer. It is an affront to us that he is denying us any statements and doing absolutely nothing to allay our fears that the CNR will take over Gulf. I ask the parliamentary secretary to ask the Minister of Transport to have this subject matter brought before the Standing Committee on Transport and to lay all the details on the table. This could possibly set government policy for the future with regard to the government's taking over oil companies. I am sure it is the government which is pressing the CNR to buy Gulf. I do not think Gulf has taken this idea by itself.

From the point of view of the CNR pensioner, this scenario is just another kick in the pants. These pensioners are expected to pay into the pension trust fund. They get no benefit from the use of their money. At the same time, they must deal with the lowest pension levels in Canada. There is no indexing of their pensions, and we have a 12.5 per cent inflation rate. We have a devastating National Energy Program and a do-nothing budget. It is true that any pension trust fund money used by the company is returned with profit. However, that profit figure is then deducted from the unfunded liability of the company to the pension trust fund. This does nothing to increase the amount of pension paid to employees. In fact, it only serves to benefit the company at the pensioners' expense, since if the investment happens to lose money, any losses are assumed solely by the trust fund.

• (2205)

We want some solutions to this. Pensioners and we on this side of the House are entitled to an explanation. Will the CNR be purchasing Gulf or not? We must ensure that the Minister of Transport sponsors an immediate inquiry and also has this subject matter brought before the Standing Committee on Transport to seek out the source of the leak of the Gulf takeover and either verify or refute it.

This inquiry would also serve to clarify the relationship between the CNR pension fund and CNR investment practices, thereby giving pensioners a more equal footing in the relationship.

I should like to refer to further news reports. They are coming out repeatedly. They started last year, and we are still getting them today. One is entitled: "CN reportedly has a role in bid to buy Gulf Canada". It is not clear what role CN would play in such a takeover. Should it proceed or not, although it is known that acquisition planning is well advanced? From where are these sources coming? I am referring to an article which appeared in The Globe and Mail back in December, 1980 by Jeff Carruthers. It reads:

> CN could have access to two major sources of funds, which could be used for such a multibillion dollar acquisition debt which the Crown-owned corporation can and does raise on its own, and new funds from Ottawa, and a substantial pension fund—

From where is Mr. Carruthers getting this information? Other stories have appeard in the Financial Times about this takeover.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as usual I have to correct some of the misconceptions held by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie). He complained that the CN pension fund has invested in oil and gas properties. What he fails to realize is that it is only through prudent investments such as this one that the interests of pensioners are protected in the long run. The steady improvements in the fund's earnings, resulting from such investments, will allow CN to reduce its unfunded liability and increase its capacity to pay existing and future pensioners. To reduce investments and make shortsighted pension increases, as the hon. member suggested, it a sure way to pension bankruptcy. Independent actuaries will confirm this.

Instead, CN has been providing pension increases within its means. It has granted voluntary increases every year since 1971 and will do so again this year. So far this has cost the company over $200 million, money which comes not from the pension fund but from operating revenues. The increases may not have kept pace with inflation, but they have at least dampened its effect.

As to the Hall report, the hon. member should get his facts straight. Indeed Dr. Hall spoke of a heritage fund, but rather than formally recommend it, he made a point of saying that such issues are best dealt with through the collective bargaining process. In fact, the pension improvements mentioned previously are largely the result of the introduction of pensions as a bargaining issue. Recent progress has been made through union-management negotiation in the direction of the heritage fund concept.

I might conclude by saying that the hon. member, with his years of experience in Parliament, ought to know that it is not to the Minister of Transport that he should address this question. As a collective bargaining issue, it should go to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), or as a broad pension issue, it should go to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) who hosted the recent national pension conference. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is sympathetic to the needs of pensioners, but he does not have the prerogative, nor the responsibility, to negotiate their pension interest. The Minister of Transport does not have the privilege of involving himself in the collective bargaining between the unions, the pensioners and the railways.

The hon. member asked his question on April 3. I was here on April 9 to answer it, but he chose not to pursue it on that day. He cannot say that he has not had an answer, since tonight is the first opportunity to deliver it.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—REVIEW OF SALARY AND ALLOWANCES—COMPARABILITY WITH PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, on March 24, 1981, I questioned the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) in the absence of the Acting Minister of National Defence with respect to two matters affecting the personnel of the Canadian Armed Forces. First, I mentioned the review of salaries and allowances then nearing completion. Second, I asked whether steps were being taken to ensure pay comparability between the Canadian forces and the federal public service.

I want to consider both the pay rates provided to members of the Canadian forces and the comparison of those pay rates to the salaries available in the public service and private sector. But such a review is only valuable if I first list some general matters relevant to those considerations. Let me begin by recognizing that the Canadian Armed Forces were established under the National Defence Act and are the responsibility of the government and the Parliament of Canada. They, of course, are under the direction of the chief of defence staff in relation to their activities.

The Canadian Armed Forces in 1980 consisted of about 80,000 regular members, with 20,000 in the primary reserve and an additional 19,000 reservists and cadets. They are supported by 33,000 civilian employees in the Department of National Defence. The regular force personnel are distributed across Canada, with the largest contingent stationed in the Halifax area. We are proud to be regarded as a military town in the city of Halifax because of the number of armed forces personnel who reside and work in the area.

I mention these statistics by way of reminder that the Canadian forces are really just Canadians in uniform. They are men and women who have volunteered in the defence of Canada. Their code of discipline is onerous by civilian standards. While there are benefits, the reality of military life in peacetime is that Canadian forces personnel must compete in a real world for most of the goods, facilities and services which they require. I believe it is important that we provide the members of our Canadian forces with just compensation, not only a living wage but a salary which allows them the status and life they ought to enjoy.

I would like to consider the increase in pay granted to the Canadian forces effective April 1, 1981 and the comparability of their pay in light of that standard. According to the announcement made by the Acting Minister of National Defence, the Canadian forces received a pay increase which on the average was 12 per cent. That seems relatively fair in the circumstances, but we must remember that there has been an increase in the consumer price index of 12.4 per cent. So even with that high rate of increase they are falling behind.

If you take specific cases you will note that a recruit in the Canadian forces receives approximately $8,200 and, when fully trained as a private, will receive approximately $14,000. If you compare that with the amount of money being paid to our policemen across Canada, you will find that it is much less than what an urban police officer earns, both as a recruit and when fully trained as a first class constable. I could mention the pay provided by the increase to a pilot at the higher level. It is listed as $37,620, which seems like a very fair rate of remuneration. However, you must consider that the rate applies to a major with at least two years seniority in his rank. If you compare that with the salaries available in the private sector, or even in some parts of the public service, it pales by comparison.

The point of all this is that if we do not pay the members of our armed forces adequate and fair compensation, they will simply go off to other activities. I happened to note in the Ottawa Citizen of this very date, April 21, 1981, where Major General Claude Lafrance, a veteran of Korea and the last fighter pilot in the Canadian Armed Forces, has left his post to assume duties in the Department of the Secretary of State in the SX category, which I believe will provide him with remuneration in the range of $60,000 to $70,000 annually.

• (2215)

So that is one example of the failure of the pay scales to provide adequate remuneration even at those higher levels. What we have to consider is how the rates of pay provided for members of the Canadian Armed Forces compare with both the Public Service and the private sector. We could only hope that the minister would take this into account when he deals with the Treasury Board on the matter of armed forces salaries and that together they will provide a rate which allows persons to pursue a career in the Canadian Armed Forces in a manner which provides them with compensation equal or nearly equal to what they would earn in the private sector, and certainly equal to what they would earn in the public sector.

There are other problems which pertain to the Canadian Armed Forces and affect their morale just as much as the rate of pay. I have in mind the failure to properly equip, arm and provide facilities for the Canadian Armed Forces. In the air command we have moved finally to provide a new fighter plane, the CF-18 Hornet. In maritime command, we have advanced a destroyer-life extension program. There is a call for the development of the Canadian patrol frigate. In a mobile command, there is a program to replace the wheeled vehicles and to provide new artillery systems. I hope the government will pursue all of these programs along with an adequate wage policy because in the end, the defence of Canada is at the mercy of our armed forces personnel.

In peacetime, the plight of those members of the Canadian Armed Forces often presents real difficulty. In the last election campaign, at a time when the army of the Soviet Union was invading Afghanistan, at a time when the situation in the Middle East threatened world peace, all political parties were concerned with the plight of the Canadian Armed Forces. So I hope that with those two controversies put aside, we will continue to support our Canadian Armed Forces.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I must point out that I am rather amused to find that the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) has asked for an increase in the presence of the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). As the hon. member for Halifax West has already mentioned, a pay increase for the forces was announced by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) on April 1.

The increase averages 12 per cent on the over-all payroll over 12 months and comes to an average of 12.31 per cent for non-commissioned officers and 11.05 per cent for officers. This compares most favourably with the pay increase announced on November 2, 1979, by the former Conservative minister of national defence, and that increase has compounded to about 12.14 per cent over an 18-month period.

In various policy statements made during the 1960s, the Government of Canada adopted the concept of the "fair employer" with respect to the determination of rates of pay and terms and conditions of service for its employees. In order to give meaning to this concept for the military, the Treasury Board established a joint Treasury Board-Department of National Defence advisory group on military compensation in November, 1968, to advise on appropriate rates of pay. Recommendations emphasized that attention be directed to the areas of conditions of service and compensation to ensure that comparable benefits to those of the Public Service are given to the military.

Three factors are considered in establishing military pay rates: the economic increase; a benchmark for comparison with the public service; and the military factor, which comprises such elements as hours of work, particular career requirements, pensions, and so on.

In this recent pay raise, the economic factor was taken into full consideration. However, the military factor is still undergoing a more complete review which should be finished in the coming months and phased in at the next pay adjustment. This pay increase also took into full account the question of comparability with the public service which was raised by the hon. member in his question of March 24, and which forms a fundamental basis to the annual military pay review.

Comparability benchmarks have been developed where a specific military function could be identified as equivalent to other occupations. This involves over 70 job matches between military trades and Public Service occupations which are themselves routinely compared with their private sector equivalents.

So, in summary, Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the government is paying its military personnel in a very equitable manner. However, I would add, on a personal note, that I believe that because of their dedication and professionalism, our military personnel deserve every red cent they get.

HEALTH—ADOPTION OF WORLD-WIDE CODE GOVERNING BABY FOOD MARKETING

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, on April 9, 1981, the question that I put before the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) during the question period in the House of Commons, related to a marketing code which will be debated at the World Health Organization in May, 1981. The code is one that is recommended by the executive of the World Health Organization and concerns prohibition of improper marketing techniques of breast milk substitutes. The code deals with such techniques used by the infant formula industry as so-called educational advertising, distribution of free samples, using so-called milk nurses or mothercraft nurses or medical representatives as sales people.

These sales techniques have apparently been very effective over the years in promoting the use of infant formula instead of breast feeding. This practice is carried on not only in the industrial nations but has been effectively practised in the Third World countries.

The practice of using breast milk substitutes in these poverty-stricken countries is fraught with dangers. One such hazard is the lack of sanitary facilities to prepare the formula. The water is frequently contaminated and the utensils used are improperly washed. This leads to high incidence of infection and diarrhea in infants.

Second, the nutritional value of skim milk and skim milk products is much lower than in breast milk. This nutritional value is further depleted by improper dilution of the milk powder used.

Another consideration is the spacing births. A mother who is lactating is less likely to conceive so that breast feeding helps to control the birth rate.

In recent years there has been a rediscovery of the merits of breast feeding with the realization that nature does indeed provide a perfect food for infants and that we should make better use of it. Human milk fat is almost completely absorbed, supplying the necessary energy in a newborn infant even if it is premature. It provides amino acids that are particularly suited to the needs of a newborn and especially of the pre-term infant whose liver is not functioning efficiently. There is a great deal of evidence that the newborn infant can acquire, from breast milk, immunologically protective mechanisms sparing it infections, allergic manifestations and gastroenteritis. Breast feeding has a psychological benefit. The skin to skin contact between mother and infant on breast feeding promotes maternal-infant bonding.

That many of the infants in the Third World are denied the benefits of breast feeding is brought out by some startling statistics that are available. In Chile, deaths were found to be three times as high for infants fed with bottles in the first three months of life as amongst those exclusively breast fed during the same period. A conservative estimate by a university of California researcher estimates some ten million cases of infectious diseases and malnutrition occur each year as a result of artificial feeding in the Third World.

A great deal of the blame for promotion of infant formula feeding is placed on the multinational companies' intense advertising practices in the Third World. The question of whether or not this code should be adopted as a World Health Organization regulation or a non-binding recommendation, was answered by the minister saying that Canada's stand would be that of supporting it as a recommendation.

I am asking for a clarification of this. Why should Canada not take a more positive stand and recommend that regulations rather than a recommendation be enforced?

● (2225)

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I heartily commend the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki), for raising this important and vital subject. I can assure him that the Canadian delegation to the World Health Assembly in May will indeed support the adoption of a code on the marketing of breastmilk substitutes.

The hon. member may be aware that the executive board of the World Health Organization, at its meeting in January, decided to recommend that the assembly adopt the proposed code in the form of a recommendation, that is, as a measure which national governments will voluntarily agree to implement on their territory, in the hope that abuses can be corrected through the concerted voluntary action of member states. The general view expressed by the provincial officials in the consultations which the department has had with them is to the effect that a code, adopted as a recommendation, stands a better chance of immediate implementation. Such consultations with the provinces will continue until the question is brought to a vote on the floor of the World Health Assembly and, irrespective of the decision taken, will need to be pursued for a few months, since implementation of the code in Canada will require the co-operation of both levels of government.

The code is proposed as a universal measure intended for developed and developing countries alike. Its early and successful implementation will therefore depend not only upon its receiving the support of the largest number of member states, but also on the extent to which it can be adapted to the specific socio-economic, political and cultural situations operative in each country, including Canada.

Ideally, self-regulation by the industry would be the solution to the problems which the marketing of breastmilk substitutes causes in the developing world. Events over the last few years have established that such an approach is almost Utopian. The World Health Organization therefore proposes that a code governing the production, storage and distribution, as well as the advertising of infant feeding products, be promulgated to protect the health and well-being of all infants in the world.

The resolution before the World Health Assembly also proposes that the implementation of the code be monitored over a two-year period and that the measures required to improve its effectiveness then be reviewed.

As the hon. member knows, the department has been active for years in the promotion of breastfeeding. In the weeks and months ahead, the decision to be made in respect of the implementation of the code in Canada will therefore receive the department's most careful consideration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

At 10:28 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.
