MARINE TRANSPORT

WITHDRAWAL OF DART CONTAINERLINE SERVICE FROM HALIFAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of some urgency with respect to the port of Halifax-Dartmouth. Citing rationalization and economics, Dart Containerline, together with its new partner, Canadian Pacific, have now moved from the port of Halifax approximately 30 per cent of the container business moving through Halifax. Because of the serious and obvious economic impact on the port caused by this move, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House requests the Minister of Transport to cause the Canadian Transport Commission to review the present and historic freight rate structure between Halifax and Montreal and, second, to initiate a review of the impact of government policies on the maintenance of what might be described as equal opportunity principles between the historic river ports and those of Saint John and Halifax.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

DELAY IN MAIL DELIVERIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) rose in his place on January 30, 1981, and misled this House when he stated that for each letter which may be delivered late there are 90 or 92 which reach the addressees on time, and whereas the Postmaster General should know that if the public believes such a statement, they also believe that the Pope is an atheist, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That the Postmaster General immediately assume the responsibility of his office, remedy the deplorable state of postal delivery in this country, and quit living in a dream world.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MEASURES TO SETTLE STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, for more than four months now a contract dispute between CBC Radio Canada and its journalists has deprived citizens in Quebec of news in public affairs programs in both our languages. Recent settlements of 10 per cent to 12 per cent or more, plus fringes, have been fairly common in Crown corporations and private broadcasting. For example, Air Canada flight attendants have received 11 per cent; letter carriers have received 12 per cent, and employees of CKVR-TV in Barrie have received 11.2 per cent. Therefore, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That this House urge Radio-Canada to stop stalling, move from its ridiculous last offer of 8 per cent, and offer its journalists a decent settlement before more people begin to suspect that the CBC footdragging in negotiations is designed deliberately to black out information and comment on the constitutional question and the forthcoming Quebec election.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX

APPLICATION OF CAPITAL GAINS TAX TO FARMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgency. The past Progressive Conservative government was providing for a once-in-a-lifetime capital gains tax exemption for farmers in order to help continue the attractiveness of agriculture and to provide for a type of pension for retiring farmers, those who spend their whole lives and all of their money on their farms' development. The Grits during the last election promised both exemptions and advanced valuation days, neither of which they have followed through with to date. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

● (1110)

That this government be directed to refer the whole issue of farm capital gains tax and valuation to a committee of this House so that a proper method can be decided upon to aid farmers in this important issue as soon as possible.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

REGULATIONS GOVERNING GEORGES BANK QUOTAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Yesterday at the Right Hon. Prime Minister's news conference, he indicated that it was unfair to expect Canadians fishing in the Georges Bank area to practise restraint in their fishing efforts while American fishermen indiscriminately expand their operations. This has occurred in that area by anywhere from 15 per cent to 40 per cent on some species. In support of the view expressed by the Right Hon. Prime Minister I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the government instruct the Minister of Fisheries to amend his ultra restrictive 1980-81 fisheries management plan for the trawler fleet by immediately restoring the cod and pollock quotas in area 5Z, which is Georges Bank, as well as 4VSW, to the equivalent amounts permitted in 1980, since present quota allocations can only lead to eventual loss of jobs this year at sea and ashore in Nova Scotia.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX

REVIEW OF CAPITAL GAINS TAXATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, rampant inflation has greatly increased the ostensible value of real and personal property in Canada since the valuation day benchmark, set for capital gains tax purposes, approximately a decade ago. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Haldimand-Norfolk (Mr. Bradley):

That in order, at least, to mitigate the unfair and confiscatory process of taxing people on gains, based on inflation rather than any actual increase of market value due to improvements, or real appreciation, that the Minister of Finance immediately review this situation so that Canadians who have retained assets for a number of years will not have their estates and properties unfairly assessed for capital gains purposes when these gains are illusory only.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas drought-stricken livestock farmers have been frustrated by administrative procedures of the herd maintenance program, caused in part by the involvement of three federal departments and three ministers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo):

That this House recommends use of rainfall criteria as shown by the drought map which was leaked yesterday be reconsidered, that the appeals board be given final authority to handle all claims, and that a committee be struck to investigate the handling of this program with a view to making recommendations to put together a workable program for use in future drought years.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATE VISIT OF UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

GALA INVITATION LIST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. During the recent state visit of the President of the United States, opposition leaders of the provincial Grit parties, defeated Grit candidates and, in some instances, their wives, were invited to attend the gala performance honouring President and Mrs. Reagan, whereas the provincial premiers and leaders of the territorial governments were not invited. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House condemn the Prime Minister for his blatant contempt and total disrespect for the premiers, the leaders of the territorial governments and those Canadians who elected them.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

YORK CONDOMINIUM CORPORATION NO. 46—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. CMHC took majority control of the board of directors of York Condominium Corporation No. 46 in May of 1980, and then went on to take total control in February of this year. The CMHC lawyer stated that it was to "rejuvenate" the project and to make residents proud of the area. It has now been almost a year and there has been no rejuvenation and no pride in the project. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang):

That this House instruct CMHC to place residents of York Condominium Corporation No. 46 back on its board of directors so that the residents can proudly help to rejuvenate the project and, furthermore, review its policy in these matters.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Lang: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, I did not second that motion.

Mr. Lewis: I am sorry, Madam Speaker. It should be the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean).

Madam Speaker: The motion will be corrected to indicate the hon. member for Waterloo. It still does not have the approval of the House.

ENERGY

SUGGESTED COMPREHENSIVE PRICING REGIME—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The nation is experiencing a national catastrophe; energy self-sufficiency is being sacrificed to political ideology, and massive energy projects which should be proceeding are stalled due to political intransigence. The resumption of energy pricing meetings with the producing provinces is welcomed. In support of the success of such meetings, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson):

That the federal government announce, prior to the meetings, a new proposed comprehensive pricing regime for conventional oil production, for oil sands production, heavy oil production, tertiary oil production, offshore and frontier oil production as the basis for successful negotiations with the producing provinces.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—REPORTED WINDFALL PROFITS—COLLECTION OF PETROLEUM COMPENSATION CHARGE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and follows some questions by my colleague, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, yesterday, on a provision in government policy which appears to have allowed a $172 million windfall profit to oil companies operating in Canada. The minister will have had an opportunity to be briefed more fully than he was yesterday when he responded to those questions. Will he tell the House, first of all, whether the government collected the petroleum compensation charge on the inventories the industry had on hand on December 31, 1980?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the practice which has been followed with regard to petroleum compensation charges under the latest increases from January 1 is the same as that which has been followed over the last three years, at least. There were two similar increases when the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition was Prime Minister, and the practice has been the same.

As far as the collection is concerned, collection is taken on the product before it enters inventory, before it goes into stock. Therefore the collection is paid by the refiners on what goes into the stock or into inventory. There is no charge on what is in inventory. This is considered as income, and what happens is that the companies are paying income tax and are complaining that they are being charged income tax by the federal government on what is, in their view, and what is rightly, a purely paper profit.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, what is germane in the minister's long answer, designed to conceal rather than to communicate, is the admission that there was no charge on the inventory. Will the minister now tell the House of Commons whether the industry was allowed to increase prices on those inventories by an amount equal to $2.50 per barrel?

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, Madam Speaker. I said this is the practice that has been followed for the last three years. The same practice has been maintained. The industry complains, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition knows, that the 60-day delay which is imposed for passing on increases in terms of domestic crude is much too long and the companies are losing money on that side. While they may appear to be making some in the short run on this one, as I said they are forced to pay income tax on it, and they claim this particular arrangement is very detrimental to them. When a reduction of imports is to take place, those companies will find themselves in the situation where they will have to reduce immediately the price to the consumer while they will have paid the petroleum compensation charge on everything they have in inventory too, so they will end up losing at the other end.

MECHANISM TO AVOID WINDFALL PROFITS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, we have here a brand new principle introduced by the government that windfall profits are okay so long as you pay income tax on them. That is what he is telling us. He has admitted there has been a windfall profit that, by our calculation, is in the neighbourhood of $172 million, and he claims that is all right because it was done before and because they pay income tax on it. He says that the companies will be complaining; well, it is not the companies which are complaining, it is the consumers of Canada paying the $172 million who should be complaining.

The minister indicated there is a delay of 60 days before wellhead price increases are passed on, agreed to by the companies as a result of the minister exercising moral suasion. Why was a similar mechanism for a delay not put in place with regard to this situation to avoid that $172 million windfall profit?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition gets very excited over purely paper or book value profits. There is aboslutely no real profit as such here, while the taxes are quite real. The companies are required to pay up to 46 per cent taxes—

An hon. Member: When? What oil company pays 46 per cent taxes?

Mr. Lalonde: —every year, on the basis of the real value added to their income but, as I said, it is purely a paper profit. There is no windfall profit as such, as indicated by the Leader of the Opposition.

NATURE OF PROFITS MADE BY OIL COMPANIES—REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN GOVERNMENT'S TAXING PRACTICE

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He is clearly shielding his own inaction and lack of concern for the consumer by calling this a paper profit.

Would the minister please explain to me what a paper profit is? How can he describe a transaction involving a $2.50 price increase in real dollars on 70 million barrels of real oil, a total of $172 million which is paid by the consumers—how can he explain those real profits as paper profits?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, for the simple reason that that so-called profit is made on the inventory they are required to maintain, and for every barrel of oil they sell out of inventory they have to replenish it at a higher price, so it is a purely book value profit. There is no real additional money coming into the corporations.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Don't try to sell that nonsense at the gas pumps.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I think the minister missed the point. The industry is not paying any more for the oil that they are replacing in inventory. The additional price increase is flowed through entirely to the government on the replacement of those inventories. The paper profit that he refers to is a real profit taken on the inventories in place prior to December 31, on which the industry levied those increases following December 31, and on which there is no petroleum compensation charge paid to the Government of Canada. Would he explain that and, while on his feet, would he make a commitment to this House that he will change this practice so that there will not be unearned windfall profits taken by the industry on the backs of the consumers?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, we examined this matter very carefully several months ago and, as I indicated before, this has been the practice followed during the last few years, which includes the administration of my friend. Taking every factor into account, this was found to be the simplest and best way of doing this. If a better way can be found to manage the program we will certainly implement it, but at the present time under this administration, and the two previous ones, it is felt this is still the fairest way of doing it.

As to the first part of my friend's question, he knows that the refineries in this case act as tax collectors for the federal government. That $2.50 surcharge is money collected for the federal government—

Mr. Clark: That is not true.

Mr. Lalonde: —by the companies.

BANKS AND BANKING

SPREAD BETWEEN INTEREST PAYMENTS AND CHARGES OF CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, and it concerns another industry which has been experiencing some paper profits. I am referring to the banking industry, and the profits are in the form of bank notes.

I would like to ask the minister whether he thinks it is appropriate that our chartered banks should be making windfall profits from the interest rate policy of the government. I point out to the minister that the spread between what the banks pay and what they charge is now five points, that it has been five points for many months now and that, as a result of this spread, industry analysts are admitting that the banks have made windfall and inventory profits since the interest rate policy of the government was announced.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the same question was asked a few days ago and was replied to by the Minister of State for Finance. I have nothing to add except to support him in his answer that the question of bank profits must be considered over a longer term, taking into account rising interest rates and declining interest rates. When both these are taken together, it might be possible to reach a more valid judgment.

Having put that aside, I am quite interested in the point which was made in the House last week and again today, and I will be monitoring that situation very carefully.

REQUEST THAT CANADA FOLLOW BRITISH POLICY

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I thought we had a minister and not a monitor. I would like to point out to the minister that in his answer to my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap, on March 2, he indicated that the reason for the windfall profits was because of the external profits which the banks were making, whereas the evidence from the industry this week is crystal clear and shows that it is not as a result of external policy; it is as a result of the difference between what the banks are paying to the Canadian consumer and what they are charging the Canadian consumer.

Since that great radical—who I know is a model to the minister of Finance—his colleague, the chancellor of the exchequer in Great Britain, Sir Geoffrey Howe, introduced a windfall profits tax in his recent budget, I would like to ask the minister, since he is following Margaret Thatcher in all the bad directions, why, for once, he cannot follow the example of Great Britain and look at the windfall profits which are the direct result of the interest rate policy which is being carried out by his government.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Remember, you are a Jacobite.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have decided to run a Canadian policy. I am not going to follow the advice of the Conservative Party and decide to ape the Americans, nor do I intend to follow the advice of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood who surprisingly asks me to follow an economic policy which he himself has denounced as being reactionary. There is more to the policy that is being followed in the United Kingdom than this particular measure to take additional moneys from the banks. It is a very broad policy, and I do not think it is appropriate to Canada, nor do I think it is appropriate to take one single aspect of the policy of the United Kingdom and import it into this country. I thought the hon. member had passed that stage of his development.

POWER TO EFFECT ROLL BACK OF INCREASES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I can assure the minister that I have passed whatever stage of development he is referring to, but I have not reached the point of such senility—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: —that I am unable to distinguish a windfall profit, a profit which is the result of activities carried out by the Canadian banks in Canada at the expense of the Canadian consumer, and which has resulted in windfall inventory profits to our largest, most dominant and cartel-like financial institutions. I am amazed that the minister, who has been associated so long with those institutions, is unable to distinguish between the cost of doing business and a reasonable profit.

The Liberal party and the Conservative party together, when voting on the Bank Act, voted down an amendment by the New Democratic Party, a Canadian amendment proposing to deal with Canadian conditions, which said that the Minister of Finance should have the residual power to monitor and to roll back interest rate increases when they seemed to be excessive. Does the minister think that a five-point spread between what the banks charge and what they pay is excessive, and does he not think that the government should have the power to force a roll back in order to protect the Canadian consumer when the market is clearly not doing its job in protecting the Canadian consumer?

• (1130)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows perfectly well that one of the purposes of the revisions to the Bank Act was to provide greater competition in financial markets, not only through widening competition within Canada itself but also through the process of permitting foreign banks to compete in this country. I regard the operation of a competitive market as a much more important inducement to bringing down these spreads than accepting Sir Geoffrey Howe's proposal of putting a windfall profit tax on the banks at this particular time based not on long-term objective evidence but basically upon a propagandist thrust put forward this morning by the hon. member.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—POLICY FOLLOWED BY PETRO-CANADA

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Last week Robert Bertrand, the director of anti-combines investigations, alleged that the oil companies continued to overcharge their customers since 1973. The government accepted these allegations, but action has been postponed for two to four years because of the reference to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the seatmate of the minister, said last week that Petro-Canada was Ottawa's "honest broker in the field to make sure that the consumer would be protected". In order that the Canadian consumer can get lower prices for gasoline and petroleum products, will Petro-Canada now be announcing lower prices to Canadians for its products?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, it seems to me that the question is left hanging in mid-air. The role of Petro-Canada is to ensure that it becomes a very aggressive competitor in that sector and that it will introduce an element of even stronger competition than the market has known so far. Does this mean that in certain circumstances Petro-Canada's prices will be lower than those of its competitors? That will be decided by the marketplace on a competitive basis. So there is no question of Petro-Canada systematically following a policy under which its prices would always be lower than those of any of its competitors in the market.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, the government seems to take the position that there has been an immense rip-off, yet the one agency over which it has any direct control refuses to take any action. As a matter of fact, John Ridsdel, a spokesman for the Crown corporation, admitted that Petro-Canada's prices are the same as those of private major oil companies. He quoted the president, Wilbert Hopper, that the company is "in business to make money".

Since one of the announced priorities of Petro-Canada was a competitive price for industry and consumers, since consumers are getting a shellacking with the prices of the government—$3.25 per barrel this year higher than it would have been under our pricing policy—and since the minister has statutory authority to instruct Petro-Canada with respect to its policies, will the minister direct Petro-Canada to lower its prices immediately to a realistic level, so that the price reduction will have an effect and consequence upon its competitors in Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, being very competitive is not contradictory to making money. Petro-Canada is in the field to be extremely competitive with any other company and to operate on a business basis. As far as the allegation of the hon. member is concerned, to begin with the price per barrel at the present time is lower than it would have been under the Conservative budget.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Not true.

Mr. Lalonde: I invite the hon. member to look at the facts if he wants to ensure that he is not misrepresenting the situation.

We have a report by the director of combines investigation which is before the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. It is the report of the director after several years of investigation. The allegations contained therein will be examined by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, and the people against whom the allegations have been made will have an opportunity to have their say. This is the position of the government.

THE CONSTITUTION

CHARTER OF RIGHTS PROVISION RESPECTING EVIDENCE

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. About three weeks ago the minister stood up in the House and told members that they were paying attention to the Canadian evidence task force with respect to the charter of rights. Members will be aware of the article which appeared in The Globe and Mail on Monday, entitled "Americanizing Canadian Criminal Law".

In light of the fact that the Canadian evidence task force strongly recommended against going to the so-called tainted evidence rule in the United States, why does section 24 of the charter of rights not only write the tainted evidence rule into the charter but makes it obligatory on the courts to disallow any evidence which is considered to be tainted?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I am not here to reply to the questions put by members of the constitutional committee during its hearings. This question was debated at length in committee. The hon. member did not appear before the committee to ask any questions.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, it is clear the minister knows as much about law as he knows about finance. Will it be his policy not to answer any questions about any aspect of the charter of rights, or is he prepared to answer seriously a question which I suggest concerns a great many Canadians?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I was present at the committee hearings. Members who appeared before the committee asked many questions about this matter. We are now at third reading stage of this proposition; we have replied to all those questions. Never has a minister been in front of a committee as long as I have been.

Mr. Clark: You are in the House of Commons now; answer the question.

Mr. Chrétien: I was in front of that committee for more than 110 hours, and I replied to all questions on all technical aspects of this resolution. A little arrogance from the member does not impress me at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

REXDALE PLANT CLOSURE ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I am sure he will recall that on August 1, 1980, he announced on behalf of the government the approval of the take-over by Reynolds Industries of the United States of Canadian Canners Limited, Walmer Transport Company Limited, and Aylmer Foods Warehousing Limited. In approving that takeover, the minister indicated that there was a commitment not to close any of the operations in Canada for a minimum of two years. There was an announcement by the company of its intention to close its Rexdale plant on April 30, 1981. What action does the minister propose to take to enforce the commitment?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, this matter is being examined. If what is happening turns out to be contrary to the undertakings, I will have all the recourse provided by the law to pursue it.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, could the minister elaborate ever so slightly on what recourses in fact are available to him, given that the director of corporate surveillance for FIRA indicated that there has been no violation of the agreement? How can it be that last Saturday the minister said the agreement was in place and the plant must be kept open for a minimum of two years, and the head of the corporate surveillance department said there was no violation?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I will check into the accuracy of what the hon. member says was stated by one of the officials. As far as I am concerned, I will look into it personally. If it turns out that there is a breach of the agreement, in consultation with the Minister of Justice I will see that the law is respected and enforced.

EMPLOYMENT

REDUCTION IN JOB-CREATION FUNDS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister will know that, in the main estimates for the coming year, job-creation funds are reduced by 37 per cent from the current year. When inflation is taken into account, they will be half what they are this year.

In view of the Canadian unemployment situation today, could the minister tell us whether or not this significant budget reduction is a consequence of his current status within cabinet, or does it shift the policy priorities of the government? Are they deliberately creating a situation where more unemployed people will continue to remain unemployed in Canada?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. It gives me the opportunity to draw the attention of the House to the fact that, for the ninth month in a row, the employment figures in Canada have gone up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: We now have a seasonally adjusted unemployment rate that is substantially lower than it has been for the last year and a half, which happens to be the time when this government came back into office.

Contrary to the kind of doom and gloom certain critics and observers have portrayed about the economic situation in Canada, we in fact are developing a very healthy employment picture. I think all Canadians should take some satisfaction in that.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister would not like to leave the wrong impression. Employment creation in Canada in the private sector is 25 per cent of what it was under the previous government. Employment creation in the public sector is about 15 times as great. That is the reason the seasonally adjusted rate stays where it is.

My question to the minister relates to what he intends to do to meet the needs of 928,000 officially unemployed Canadians and well over one million unemployed Canadians in reality. He is cutting the budget in half for the year ahead in terms of meeting their needs. Can he explain to the House why he thinks the need in the year ahead will be half as great as it was in the year in which we are currently?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I find it somewhat ironic that the hon. member, along with his many colleagues, were applauding vigorously the statements made by the President of the United States just two days ago. The President has, in fact, cut the entire employment training budget of the United States government. Again, I think hon. members opposite are trying to have it both ways. They are trying to have their ideological music and still play a critical game, which simply will not work.

The fact of the matter is, as I have said many times in the House before, that we are taking the employment training money and targeting it into special needs groups. We have new programs designed to deal with the problems of the handicapped, and others who have major disadvantages in the work place, to provide special training for native people, and for women in non-traditional work. We are targeting the money into the areas where it is really needed.

Oral Questions

INCOME TAX

REVIEW OF CAPITAL GAINS TAXATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I have a brief question for the Minister of Finance concerning capital gains tax. Since it is approximately ten years from valuation day, and since the minister knows that when assets change hands now they are being taxed heavily on inflation, which I think he would agree is confiscatory, what plans do he and his cabinet colleagues have to revise or otherwise make more equitable the capital gains tax structure in this country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, shortly after the budget I released a discussion paper on capital gains, which discusses, among other things, the question of indexation or providing an inflation adjustment. I am awaiting representations and views from interested parties on that paper, and I will take them into account before another budget.

Mr. MacKay: I am curious about that answer, Madam Speaker. I wonder if the minister could elaborate slightly and say what time frame he anticipates he is looking at before he will be considering these representations. Also, does the minister agree with the statement made recently by Mr. Harris, the president of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, who points out the ironic situation where people who benefit from lotteries are not subject to capital gains while people who invest in their country are? Mr. Harris also suggests that this revision of capital gains would provide the needed stimulation to encourage the creation of new jobs. Does the minister hold to those views himself, or does he see any merit in them?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I would be glad to receive Mr. Harris' views directly; then I will consider them.

THE ECONOMY

QUERY RESPECTING JAPANESE-TYPE TRADING ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the Japanese economy had grown to the size of one trillion dollars by 1979, which is about half the gross national product of the United States and larger than any European country, and comparable to the Soviet Union; and in view of the fact that this economic growth is attributable to the relationship between the government and the large trading organizations, the banking establishment and the large manufacturers, will the minister initiate the same kind of arrangement in Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that is a very interesting suggestion. I understand that already there is a group of Members of Parliament studying that particular question of trading corporations. Their results will be considered by the government.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Where is the much promised omnibus Crown corporations bill?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the much promised omnibus Crown corporations bill is proceeding as it should.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: I hear some hee-haws on the other side.

Mr. Beatty: The donkeys are on that side, though.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I assure the House that we are proceeding rapidly, I hope, to bring forward legislation. I would say the consultation process has been very effective. It has been completed and I am putting final touches on a discussion paper.

Mr. Clark: A discussion paper!

Mr. Johnston: I hope to bring the matter forward for cabinet consideration at a very early date.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the Clark government within six months was able to go from a discussion paper to a bill introduced in the House of Commons, yet the President of the Treasury Board in more than a year has been incapable of even putting a discussion paper before his cabinet, when will the minister either introduce legislation in the House or admit to the Canadian people that his claims about making progress have been a fraud?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, the Clark government did a great deal more than that in nine months.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: It disappeared.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: Besides that, Madam Speaker, a bill was brought forward. That bill had serious defects. I see no point in bringing forward another bill which has serious defects.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Name them.

Mr. Johnston: That is why we have been engaged in a wide consultation process, to correct those defects. That is what I am in the process of doing. I assure hon. members that very substantial progress has been made and that the bill will be brought forward in the very near future.

Mr. Beatty: When?

DISPUTE BETWEEN CORPORATION AND QUEBEC JOURNALISTS UNION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I was going to address my question to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona with respect to why his party supported the amendment to the charter which he is criticizing, but that would be unparliamentary, so I will not do it.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Communications and the Minister of Labour, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. Considering that the management of the CBC French network has openly shown ill will in their conflict with the striking journalists in Quebec over the past four months, and keeping in mind the ridiculous offer of a salary increase of about 8 per cent, does the Prime Minister or his government intend to continue burying their head in the sand much longer and to shirk their responsibilities?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the government is not burying its head in the sand; it is allowing free negotiations to take place between the parties and it has suggested the appointment of mediators. But I am surprised to hear the hon. member say that the government should do more and intervene in these negotiations. How? Through legislation to take the right to strike away from the workers, or what? What is his proposal?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, according to the union and the two major political parties in Quebec, the CBC management is alleged to have offered free air time to the political parties during the election campaign, provided those parties stop boycotting current events and public affairs programs. Given such inadmissible blackmail on the part of a Crown corporation, does the Prime Minister intend to step in to put an end to that and, if not, why not?

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the hon. member might be interested to know that the CBC is now negotiating with six unions representing 7,500 employees. In two of those negotiations the federal mediator has drafted his report and this afternoon it will be handed over to the parties involved. As to the blackmail referred to by the hon. member, I believe that the question ought to be directed to the Minister of Communications.

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

QUERY RESPECTING CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Finance. It concerns the commitments he made in the budget of last October. There was a commitment that he would consult with the western prairie provinces regarding the use, the programs, and the specific initiatives for the Western Development Fund. I should like to know if the minister has consulted with the governments of western Canada regarding the use of this fund and, if he has not, when will he consult with those governments in accordance with the commitment made in the budget he brought down last October in this House?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, no consultation has taken place yet. When the plans are further developed in the government, it will be then possible to consult with interested parties, including the governments, as mentioned in the budget.

Mr. McKnight: I wish to ask a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. As the minister is aware, he made a commitment to consult with the governments. We are not talking about a small amount of money, we are talking about $2 billion. This government has the authority to take $37.5 billion out of western Canada within the same time frame. Is there a change in government policy at the moment? Senator Argue, the assistant to the Minister of Transport, has said, as reported in the Saskatoon Star Phoenix on January 15, 1981, that "... provincial governments will be given no special significance in those consultations." Is this a change in government policy? Does the assistant to the Minister of Transport speak for the government in this matter?

Mr. MacEachen: I have not seen what Senator Argue said nor have I talked to him on this subject. Without commenting on what the hon. member has said, what has been stated in the budget stands as government policy.

AIR TRANSPORT

DIRECT AIR SERVICE BETWEEN OTTAWA AND NEW YORK

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I am sure the minister is heartened by reports from the United States that authorities there have been unable to find a U.S. carrier which would be interested in providing direct air service between Ottawa and the city of New York. In view of this development, and it seems to be a new development, would the minister undertake to expedite negotiations with respect to changes that may be needed in the bilateral arrangements between Canada and the United States so that such a service can be provided as is desired by every responsible group in Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, we would all like to see an agreement for direct flights between Ottawa and New York. There are two ways to do that, either through the regulatory bodies, the CAB and the CTC in Canada, which is the first way, or the second way, which is under the Canada-U.S. bilateral air agreement. I think we have to follow that last line first.

First of all we wanted to see if some American airline would like to operate under the present agreement, that is, with a single route, New York-Montreal-Ottawa, Ottawa-Montreal-New York. We could not find one, but it seems that some might be interested if the Ottawa-New York route were a separate one. This is what we are exploring now. If we do not find an American company willing to use this approach, then we will fall back on the regulatory approach, and First Air and Air Atonabee would be allowed to compete.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I hope it is not the purport of the minister's answer that he is looking for an American carrier to provide the service between Ottawa and New York. That is what it sounded like to me. I hope he will stand in his place and deny that.

Will the minister press the American authorities to make whatever changes are necessary to provide the services, in the bilateral agreement or elsewhere, because apparently no one is interested now? Would he also assure the House that while this search is going on and while changes are being pressed with the United States, nothing in that procedure will hold up consideration by the Canadian Transport Commission of the applications that are now before it from First Air and Air Atonabee?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, the difficulty is with the phrase, "no one is interested now". That is what I said was not the situation. It may be that an airline would be interested if the route were defined differently. I am not looking for Americans, but it seems to me that this is the first way to go. We must assure ourselves that no American airline will give a direct service. There is an agreement between Canada and the United States on that subject so obviously that has to be cleared up first. If there is somebody in the United States who wants to operate under that agreement, he has the first right to do it. That is the spirit, and the law as it exists now.

Mr. Clark: The status quo forever.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): So there will be no change.

Mr. Pepin: It is only if that first avenue is found to be unproductive, the Americans being satisfied that they cannot use the right they have under the bilateral agreement, that we can go the other route, and that is the route of the regulatory agency. That is the law.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is some Canadianization plan if I ever heard it!

FISHERIES

EAST COAST MANAGEMENT PLAN

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans but unfortunately he is absent, as is the acting minister, the second acting minister, and the parliamentary secretary. I presume I should direct it to the Right Hon. Prime Minister, and I do so in light of his interest in the problem.

In the 1980-81 fisheries management plan the government shows a decrease in allocations to the Canadian trawler fleet for codfish caught on the Scotian Shelf, which includes area 5Z, or Georges Bank, of some 1,500 metric tons when compared to the previous year.

Since the Americans have now decided to abolish the 1979 fisheries management treaty covering Georges Bank, and will be catching whatever fish are available in that area until the boundary question is settled, I ask the Right Hon. Prime Minister is he making any plans to permit Canadians to do likewise?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not think it is correct to say that they will be catching fish without any limitation until the boundary is determined because we have an undertaking from the United States administration that, on the contrary, they will be putting forth a solid management plan which will have as its object precisely to ensure the conservation of the species.

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE RESTORATION OF QUOTAS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I note the answer given by the Right Hon. Prime Minister and, of course, I am sure he is aware that, in the two years that have passed since this treaty was under negotiation, the Americans have increased their scallop catch from an estimated 15 per cent to 40 per cent. Scallops are now the size of your fingernail, so this is really not a conservation program.

My supplementary question deals with yet another area of fisheries which comes under the government's management. It concerns the decrease in the trawler quotas on pollock in the same general area, of something like 2,000 metric tons, which will cost Canadians about 100 man-years and some $3 million in lost productivity. Will the Prime Minister undertake to look into this matter and, we hope, restore those quotas which would be of benefit to Canadian fishermen and the Canadian economy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, with respect, I would suggest to the hon. member that his comment at the beginning of his second question does not contradict what I said. He is quite right; for the past two years there has been overfishing. That was one of the difficulties with the present situation when the treaty was being held up in the Senate. That is why, on this side, we have attempted to put the best possible light on the President's decision to put an end to this since they could not get the treaty through the Senate, which we profoundly regret, and since this long delay was resulting in overfishing. We have accepted the President's undertaking to withdraw the treaty, I repeat, with some considerable regret on our side.

The President undertook, and I believe he repeated in this House—at least it was repeated at the press conference, in statements to the press—that they would be putting a scallop management plan in place there. It is precisely our hope and expectation that the overfishing of the past few years will now cease.

In lieu of the treaty we will have this management plan which I cannot say we are blessing in advance. But at least we see this as a positive step on the part of the United States administration to try to solve in that way the overfishing situation, which the hon. member and the government deplore. Whether it will work out or not, I honestly cannot say. But, as I argued, it is probably fair to give the United States administration a little time, since it is a new administration, to correct a situation which was getting more and more deplorable, not only over the past two years but over the years before that during the time when the treaty was being negotiated.

As far as trawlers and quotas are concerned, I am afraid I will have to take notice of that on behalf of the minister.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL PARLIAMENTARY TASK FORCE

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following agreement is a result of consultations I had earlier today with representatives of the opposition parties. Members of the special committee appointed to act as a special parliamentary task force on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements are Messrs. Blaikie, Blenkarn, Breau, Herbert, Loiselle, Thacker and Weatherhead. The said committee is empowered to adjourn from place to place within Canada and the necessary staff is authorized to convene the committee.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, there have been the usual consultations. We are prepared to have that matter go forward without debate.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, we agree.

Madam Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, last night before the House rose I was trying to lay the groundwork for what I have to say on behalf of Yukon and the Northwest Territories in connection with the proposed constitutional amendment. We have, on the one hand, the policy of the government opposite, as stated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) publicly, that Yukon will not see provincial status in his lifetime. We have on the other hand, the nationally publicized policy of this party that Yukon is a natural candidate for provincial status and will be granted that status when the people of Yukon make that request.

Under the Constitution as it now stands, there is provision in the British North America Act for the taking into the federal state of additional territories and converting them to provinces in exactly the same way that Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia entered confederation.

With the proposals now before the House, that process is no longer possible. As for provincial status, they can forget about it in Yukon, the Western Arctic and in Nunatsiaq. It will never come. Why do I say never? It is not simply "not in my lifetime", as the Prime Minister said; it has now become never. It is never because, by the formula proposed in the constitutional proposals before us, there are two provinces with a veto, namely Quebec and Ontario. If either one of those provinces objects to the entry of any other territory into confederation, as is now provided for in the British North America Act, the territory will not get in. That is the result of the proposals before us.

Another question which concerns us greatly is that of mobility rights. There was a great deal of time, effort and expense involved in the production of the socioeconomic terms and conditions with respect to the construction of the Alaska highway natural gas pipeline, if indeed that project ever goes ahead. Those socioeconomic terms set forth a hiring preference and a mechanism by which migration could be controlled so that the impact of thousands of workers who would be foisted upon Yukon all at once in the construction stage of the pipeline would be minimized. We tried to amend that provision in the joint committee. It was rejected. We have a provision in the constitutional proposals which will negate the effect of that mechanism. When that matter was raised with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) in a recent visit to Whitehorse, his response was, "Well, we will find a loophole". It sounded rather strange for a minister of the Crown who supports the constitutional proposals now before us to be telling the public in Yukon that a loophole would be found whereby we can get around the mobility rights of the Constitution. The fact is that when the proposals before us become law, if indeed they do, we can forget about the socioeconomic terms and conditions which would provide that protection to Yukon.

The other matter which concerns Yukon and the Northwest Territories greatly is the proposals contained in section 35(3), I believe it is, which deal with the attendance by elected representatives of Yukon and the Northwest Territories at federal-provincial conferences. At first blush that provision would appear to go a long way toward meeting the legitimate aspirations and desires of Yukoners and Canadians of the Northwest Territories. However, a careful reading of it will disclose immediately that all it does is maintain the status quo, because there will be no representation at the federal-provincial conferences by either Yukon or Northwest Territories unless the Prime Minister in his magnanimity deems to allow that representation at the table.

When the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was in Whitehorse recently, he said this, and I quote from page 5 of the text of his speech given to the Whitehorse Chamber of Commerce on February 14, 1981:

> Hand in hand with the economic development to which we all look forward must go political progress and evolution.

One cannot disagree with that statement. It was indeed our policy, our aggressive policy.

> For the past year, Yukoners have enjoyed full responsible government, at least in practice if not in statute.

That statement is absolutely false. Yukoners do not now enjoy, nor have they in the past year enjoyed, full responsible government either in practice or in statute.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Why would he say such a thing?

Mr. Nielsen: Why? Because of the deviousness of this government. It is very evident in their advertising campaign. They try to twist the minds of their listeners.

Mr. Collenette: Nonsense.

Mr. Nielsen: The parliamentary secretary says "Nonsense". All one has to do is refer back to the advertisements this government put forward at taxpayers' expense, trying to sell its constitutional package before debate even commenced in Parliament. One can refer to the energy ads which went out previously and which apparently we are going to be saddled with again, at taxpayers' expense. They do not tell the truth. That statement I just read is not the truth.

Yukoners do not have jurisdiction over laws. They do not have jurisdiction over resources. Yukoners do not have the right to introduce money measures in their own legislative assembly when even the municipalities in Yukon have such a right. The minister retains the residual power to say yea or nay to anything done by the legislative assembly, the elected representatives of the people in the Yukon. The same situation pertains in the Northwest Territories. Therefore, it is utterly false for the minister to say that full responsible government has been enjoyed in practice if not in statute.

The government recently got itself into hot water on the disposition of federal lands by not publicizing their availability and not giving all Yukoners full opportunity of bidding on their disposition. The minister said in the same speech:

> That means that the decisions of the territorial government have been made by your elected representatives.

That decision certainly was not made by the territorial representatives. It was made by the minister's public servants in Whitehorse and in Ottawa.

> It also means, obviously, that they must be held accountable for their performance.

"They" refers to the territorial legislatures. That patently is not so in the example which I have just exposed to the House. It was not the territorial government which disposed of the lands in question, it was the federal government.

Let me get back to the Constitution. After having disposed of those matters which are of direct concern to Yukoners, I want to deal with these proposals in a national way. We have been dragged, all of us, into a great constitutional crisis because of the intransigence of one man. It is doubly dangerous and doubly deplorable that that man should be the Prime Minister of Canada.

Before going into the nature and causes of the crisis, let us look at the nature of the country which is being subjected to this divisive impact of the Prime Minister's obsession with rewriting the Constitution in this fashion.

Canada is a confederation; it is not a unitary state. That is to say, there is a central government having certain powers allotted to it in the Constitution as it now stands, and there are provincial governments which in turn have power over other matters. That is clearly understood and has been clearly understood since the Constitution was devised in 1867.

The Constitution did not spring full blown into being. It was the result of protracted study by elected representatives over a protracted period of time. Prior to being passed in the form of an act in the British Parliament, it received the approval of the legislatures of the provinces which became the first members of this federal state, this partnership. Those which joined later did it in the full awareness of the terms on which they entered.

I suggest it is ridiculous to treat the Constitution as a scrap of paper representing a British act of parliament. Macdonald himself in the constitutional debates of that day referred to the BNA Act as a treaty. Certainly it was an agreement among duly constituted governments, each having its own elected legislature, as to the form and shape that the future nation of Canada should take.

At no time was it contemplated that in the future nation the central government would have the power solely and of itself to amend or change the original articles of confederation. Had that been the case, it is quite obvious that lower Canada, which was to become the province of Quebec, would never have become a partner to confederation.

The Constitution of 1867 was in no way imposed upon Canada by Britain. It was a device, an instrument, created by Canada. The work of Macdonald, Cartier, McGee, Brown, Tupper, Tilley and other Fathers of Confederation was passed into law by the parliament at Westminster because that was the only method by which colonies could assume the mantle of nationhood.

The tragedy of our time is that the Prime Minister and his party are now in a position of attempting to divest Canada of national status and return it to the status of a client state of the parliament at Westminster. To hear the Prime Minister's vague and bombastic threats of independence or of following the example of Smith of Rhodesia is to show up the falsity of his position in its true colours.

Canada has been an independent nation since 1931 when the Statute of Westminster established that Britain could no longer make laws affecting this nation. That statute and that departure simply placed the capstone on what actually existed at that time. It was merely statutory recognition of what already was the de facto situation.

At the request of the provinces, it was decided that changes to the Constitution would continue to be ratified by Westminster and that parliament would retain its function as the custodian, the trustee, and nothing more, of the BNA Act. I want to emphasize that the provinces were consulted on the constitutional implications of the Statute of Westminster. They made recommendations, and those recommendations were adhered to even though they meant a radically different approach to the constitutional content of that statute.

It is quite clear on examining the precedents that the provinces were regularly consulted when changes were contemplated in those matters falling within their provincial jurisdiction. This was done by Mr. St. Laurent in bringing in old age pensions, it was done by Mr. King in implementing the unemployment insurance provisions, which were the brain child of the previous Bennett government, and it was done in many more cases, I believe eight in all.

It is all very well to say, as Judge Freedman did, that consultation was not necessary. What is important is that those changes, the carrying out of these changes, was on the basis of consultation, and those charged with the carrying out of these changes did consult. They felt at the time that consultation ought to be the process in which they engaged, and they did do just that. Certainly the frequency and directness of such consultations very distinctly implied the growth and recognition of constitutional convention in these matters.

It is not my intention to enter a legalistic treatise on the growth of the constitutional convention. Anyone who is interested can read Jennings and others on the subject; Dicey is another very comprehensive publication. Suffice it to say that on almost every occasion, indeed, on every important occasion when the interests and jurisdictions of the provinces were involved, there was invariably consultation at that point. That point was made with some force by Senator Maurice Lamontagne, with a good deal more precision than I, before the special joint committee.

These are political matters, they are constitutional matters. Canada is not some newly emerging nation whose Constitution is determined by sections or clauses put down on paper in the inner reaches of the ruling class, in the bowels of the Langevin Building. Our Constitution came from the people of Canada. It came from elected members of the provincial legislatures. It was thrashed out, debated, argued over, and what went to England in the last analysis represented a consensus of the most advanced political and constitutional thinking in this nation. Canada was not given birth by a piece of paper; Canada already existed in the hearts and minds of its people. The Constitution was simply a baptismal certificate, as it were.

Macdonald made it very plain that his chief aim was to conciliate the various provincial and sectional interests and devise what he thought was a compromise, a Constitution that would be acceptable. That was a major consideration.

We now have a new ball game and a new ball. We have a Prime Minister who is determined to be captain of the team and the umpire as well; he wants to pitch and call the strikes. He tried to impose his will on the provinces, then on the country, and now on the British. The Prime Minister and his party have confronted Westminster with a rewritten, an amended, Constitution to which a majority of the provinces object. The box score on that, Sir, is that eight of the ten provinces are opposed to the action now being taken, Ontario and New Brunswick being the only two exceptions. Six of the ten provinces are fighting the action in the courts. Quebec Liberal leader Claude Ryan is totally opposed. The New Democratic provincial parties of Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba and Quebec have publicly spoken against the action. Four NDP Members of Parliament have broken with their party leader and their party and will vote against the Trudeau package in the Commons. An hon. member who spoke just yesterday, the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos), has also broken with his party and will vote against it.

The Prime Minister and his puppets are riding roughshod over the provincial governments. He has overturned the unwritten convention, or is attempting to, of 100 years. If the federal government with a majority in Parliament can unilaterally alter the Constitution against the objections of the provinces then, Sir, this is no longer a federal state. The rights of the provinces mean very little if they can be altered or subtracted from at any time by a simple decision of the federal government with a parliamentary majority.

Above all, Sir, the Prime Minister's position underlines his attitude toward confederation and to the separation of powers. Why should he consult with the provinces? They might not agree. He says the consultative process is too slow. It may be slow but it is 100 per cent democratic. If the federal government and Parliament can unilaterally amend and rewrite the Constitution in matters confided to the provinces by the BNA Act, then the BNA Act is a dead letter. Whether the Constitution is a pact or a treaty, as Macdonald called it, or a simple statute of the imperial Parliament, it is a matter for experts to determine. In any case it does not affect the issue, as I see it.

Whatever it may be, the Constitution is an understanding between the federal government and the governments of the provinces, those who signed in 1867 and whose legislatures ratified that action, and those who came in later by free choice. In no single instance was a single section or clause of the 1867 Constitution imposed on any province. They were free to accept or reject. For more than 100 years that spirit of compromise and conciliation, as Macdonald called it, was followed in all matters affecting constitutional change. That is what has been altered.

A constitutional convention having a century of practice as its mandate has now gone. The understanding that the Constitution was not the business of the central government alone, but that the provinces had very clear spheres of jurisdiction and that they would be respected, is also gone as a result of this proposal. It is this understanding, this compromise, this spirit of conciliation, which has been torn asunder by the unrestrained ego of one man.

The Prime Minister says he is not waiting for the provinces. They are too slow in agreeing with him. He says it must be done in his way. We have heard those words before, Sir, from the lips of dictators and tyrants.

The publisher of The Globe and Mail was taken to task for using the word "Tyrant". I am surprised there is no objection across the way to my using it. According to the dictionary, a tyrant is a person who exercises power despotically. A despot is someone who acts in an arbitrary manner. A despot does not take advice; a despot must have his own way. A despot insists on pushing his ideas to the end, riding roughshod over the rights of others. A tyrant is in the same category. A tyrant sees only one side of a coin, and usually it is the side bearing his picture. The publisher of The Globe and Mail may have erred a little on the side of emphasis, but in principle he was right on. It is strange, sir, how sensitive the Grits are on these things. He was attacked not for what he said but for saying it.

There was a suggestion in the remarks of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), the "minister of oil", as he is now called, that there was something wrong, not quite cricket, in the publisher of The Globe and Mail criticizing the Prime Minister's position. Saying what he said in England was even worse. It is hard to follow this kind of reasoning. We do not find the Prime Minister or his henchmen mincing their words in their references to the Premier of Alberta or even their friend, the Premier of Saskatchewan; but when the boot is on the other foot then the shoe pinches.

An hon. Member: One-party state.

Mr. Nielsen: If there is a one-party state in this country, it is over there. They are the believers in the one-party state, the advocates of rule by divine right. Nothing could be more evident in proving that situation than what the—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: I cannot hear hon. members; I would like to enjoy an exchange with them if they would rise—

An hon. Member: You are getting to them, Erik.

Mr. Nielsen: —and put a question. It is not what is said that pinches but the mere fact that in this bright new Grit world of friendly thought control anyone would dare raise his or her voice in protest.

It is, above all, the press whom they fear and distrust. It was not by mere coincidence that, after the Toronto Sun had attacked the Prime Minister and his government some years ago in biting terms, the office of that newspaper was raided. This was something not seen before in this country and something not often seen in England or the United States, or indeed any country where democracy is practised.

Perhaps the shabbiest episode in this catalogue of manipulation, evasion and half-truths which in those around the Prime Minister passes for government policy, was the put-up job—for it can be nothing else—on the British High Commissioner. So sorry and shabby and weak was this performance that even the Prime Minister has adopted a Pilate-like stance, washing his hands before the assembled media the other day in saying he had no complaints against the British High Commissioner. How does he justify the sickness of the episode in which that valuable and dedicated official's name was dragged through the mud to serve the political purpose of this government?

The government wanted to open a rift with England, they wanted to put pressure on Westminster. Think of it, Sir, this little group of time-serving wasters of our nation's patrimony putting pressure on the Mother of parliaments! That was their motive, their objective, and they have now had to back off. A member of the NDP, which is now recognized as the official annex of the Grit party, the little red rump as it has been referred to, or some sort of halfway house in this House, became involved. When the conversation with the British High Commissioner was reported, then the Grits went into action.

What was this conversation? In a reception on his own premises the British High Commissioner gave his opinion on the reaction of the British government and parliament to the constitutional package. He was doing his job, which was to put forward Britain's views. When the NDP ran back and tattled to their masters, the Grits did not for a moment hesitate to embarrass the British government and their representative here for their own purely political ends. That is what is sad, even tragic, about the whole sorry, shabby episode. A government in Canada was using an ambassador of another country as a whipping boy, and that is precisely what happened. It was a kind of diplomatic mugging engaged in by the Grits with their socialist accessories, the little red rump.

I say with regret, sir, that the position of the socialist members in this whole constitutional imbroglio has been one of slavishly following Trudeau's whistle.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I know that particularly with respect to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) it is hardly necessary to draw his attention to that standing rule that we refer to each other by title and riding and not by name.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, of course, Mr. Speaker, when I used the term "Trudeau" I meant the Prime Minister.

When the Prime Minister needs them, he just blows his whistle, and like Pavlov's dog they come wagging their tail, automatically salivating as they travel. Even the attorney-general of Saskatchewan, Mr. Romanow, read them a lesson a few weeks ago on the folly of the position taken by the federal socialist party under its present leadership.

An hon. Member: A little red Tory.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Romanow is a little red Tory. Does the parliamentary secretary say that? I am sure he would be interested in learning of that opinion.

The hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) and his advisers have sadly misjudged the mood of Canadians if they think the Canadian people are going to sit still for an arbitrary invasion of the powers of the provinces, which is precisely what this is. The actions of the Grit government on the Constitution are more serious than that. They represent a massive power grab, a raid by the feds, a step back toward centralization in the destruction of the power of the provinces as operational entities in this country.

If the Grit majority in this House, along with the socialists, the puppet master and the puppets, can legislate in matters belonging constitutionally to the provinces using—and we know the term for it—the British parliament to impose constraints on the provinces which they are not prepared to accept, then, Sir, the provinces have been destroyed. They will cease to exist as viable structures. Anyone who examines the situation even briefly is compelled to come to that conclusion.

But that is not all. If the Prime Minister is balked in this mania of his, if Britain says "We do not have the mandate to do these things", then the Prime Minister issues threatening noises about what will happen. If the British say that they recognize the convention of consulting the provinces, and the indications are that they will, the consensus principle that prevailed in the Statute of Westminster of 1931, in unemployment insurance, old age pensions, the retirement of judges and other instances where amendments were made affecting the rights and prerogatives of the provinces, and if they say that they cannot seek to impose on the provinces of Canada in matters of their own jurisdiction principles originating at the federal level, then they are told by this government that they have no choice. I say, sir, that is simply not so.

I see that, despite the fact I have another 20 pages left in my carefully prepared speech, I have run out of time so perhaps I can deliver the other half at another time.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I must say I am very pleased indeed to have the opportunity of making a few remarks with regard to this historic debate on the Constitution of our time. I congratulate all those members who have taken part in this debate ahead of me, because many of them have made signal steps in the direction in which we want to go in this nation.

It will be an historical moment when we bring the British North America Act to Canada with a charter of rights and an amending formula. We are in effect cutting the Gordian knot with the past but at the same time retaining our traditions and institutions that have served us so well over the years. After 114 years the time has come to patriate our Constitution. It is what we all want, it is what the United Kingdom wants as well, and it is the last vestige of colonialism.

Times have changed over the 114-year period. Particularly in the past 54 years we have tried to patriate our constitution on numerous occasions. This has been attempted by a number of prime ministers, including Mr. King, Mr. Bennett, St. Laurent, Diefenbaker and Pearson, each and every one of them without any success whatsoever.

It is important that we consider a number of aspects of this constitutional package. I do not intend to dwell at length on the preamble, because I recall a preamble that was presented at the first ministers' conference in the Convention Centre by the Conservative government of Ontario. At that time the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was prepared to accept it, but the other provinces would not agree.

I will not dwell on the charter of rights because many others are taking a great deal of time to discuss each and every aspect of that matter from many points of view and with many reasons.

So far as the amending formula is concerned, whether it be the Victoria formula of 1971 or the Vancouver formula, it would appear that in any event there will not be any agreement, certainly in the foreseeable future, between all provinces on any kind of amending formula.

Returning to the charter of rights, I want to deal with only one fundamental, basic matter, language rights.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, for the first time in Canada's history the rights to education in the language of the minority will be guaranteed throughout the country. The charter of rights and freedoms will give all Canadians the right to have their children educated in their official language where the number is sufficient to warrant it. English-speaking Canadians who will settle in Quebec will have the right to have their children educated in English, and French-speaking Canadians will at last have the right to have their children educated in French no matter where they live in Canada. By guaranteering minority language educational rights we will entrench in the constitution the agreement reached by the provincial premiers in St. Andrews in 1977 and in Montreal in 1978, to wit, and I quote:

> Every child belonging to the French or English minority has the right to receive in his or her mother tongue his or her primary and secondary schools instruction in any province where the number of children is sufficient to warrant it.

The Constitution now includes other linguistic rights concerning the use of French or English in the legislative assemblies, before the courts, in the statutes and the parliamentary documents of Quebec and Manitoba. Those rights will continue to be guaranteed by the existing constitutional provisions. In addition, at the request of the New Brunswick government, the linguistic rights will apply to that province.

The Constitution acknowledges the right to use French and English in Parliament and before federal courts. Those rights will be defined in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It also includes other rights which are now part of the Official Languages Act and which will be entrenched in the Constitution. French and English will be defined in the Constitution as being the official languages of Canada. In it will also be spelled out the right of the public to communicate with the headquarters or the main office of the institutions of Parliament or of the Government of Canada, or to be given services in French or in English and, in regions where the number warrants it, the public will have the same right with respect to any other office of those institutions.

[English]

When we look at the proposed Constitution Act of 1981, which is the resolution tabled by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) on February 13 of this year, in considering language rights we refer specifically to a number of sections, from Section 16 to Section 22. Section 16 makes English and French the official language of Canada and of New Brunswick, with equal rights and privileges as to their use in all institutions of government at the federal level across Canada and at the provincial level in New Brunswick. The section also assures that nothing prevents Parliament or the legislatures from providing for greater equality and use of the two languages.

Section 17 of the same resolution provides that any person has the right to use either English or French in the debates and other proceedings of Parliament and the legislature of New Brunswick. This right already exists, as we know, in the provinces of Quebec and Manitoba.

Section 18 requires that the statutes, records and journals of Parliament and the legislature of New Brunswick be printed and published in both English and French and makes both language versions equally authoritative.

In Section 19 there is provision for the use of English and French in all courts established by Parliament and in the courts of New Brunswick. It entitles any person to use either language before these courts orally or in writing and to have processes issued by the courts in either language.

Further, Section 20 will give members of the public the right to use English or French in communicating with or receiving available services from any head or central office at the federal level and from any other office whenever there is a significant demand for communication or service in such language due to the nature of the office.

Section 21 preserves the existing constitutional language guarantees, whether English or French, under Section 133 of the British North America Act, which applies particularly to Quebec, and under Section 23, which refers to the Manitoba Act.

Finally, Section 22 is designed to ensure that any rights or privileges existing with respect to languages other than English or French are not impaired by provisions of the charter.

It is important to note that an amendment has already been made to Section 20 so that the courts, rather than Parliament, would ultimately determine whether other federal offices should provide bilingual services. Also, the test for the provision of services in English or French would be based on a significant demand for services in the language required rather than on the number of persons in the area concerned using the language. The amendment would also require the provision of services where there is a reasonable requirement for services, such as at airports and train stations.

While the federal government would like to see institutional language rights at the provincial level guaranteed in the Constitution, it will not impose such rights over opposition by the provinces. The charter provides minimum guarantees in attempting to achieve the widest consensus possible from provincial governments. Thus, when the provisions for institutional language rights at the provincial level included in the draft charter tabled at the first ministers' conference in September received virtually no provincial support apart from New Brunswick, the provisions respecting the provinces were withdrawn. However, the status quo is preserved, and both Quebec and Manitoba remain bound by existing constitutional rights.

As New Brunswick officially requested that these rights apply to it, this has been provided. The amending formula has been modified to facilitate the opting-in of any province, with the concurrence of Parliament, to any or all of the provincial language provisions listed in Sections 16 to 20 of the charter which I enunciated.

As most provinces—other than Quebec, Ontario and New Brunswick—do not have sufficient judges, lawyers and other court personnel trained in French, it would not be realistic to entrench the right of an accused to be tried in his own language in criminal cases. The Criminal Code now provides this right, which is enforced in New Brunswick, Ontario and the Territories. As other provinces develop the capability, the right is provided that if a province delays too long the Attorney General of Canada may unilaterally proclaim the provision in force after two years' notice. This amendment was already made to the Criminal Code, and it was enacted in 1978.

Provinces are encouraged to provide the same rights in civil cases as in criminal cases. However, until there is sufficient court ability in the second language, entrenching such a right would be illusory. The right now exists constitutionally in Quebec and Manitoba and by law in New Brunswick. Ontario now provides for some civil cases to be heard in French.

I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the March 6, 1981 edition of The Toronto Star. It refers to Premier Davis' speech to the Empire Club and is subtitled: "Conservative premier reaffirms his support for Pierre Trudeau's Constitution package". The article indicates that one of the key elements championed over a decade by the Conservative party in the province of Ontario has been this:

> The right of parents to educate their children in whichever of their own two founding languages they choose is protected where numbers warrant.

The article continues:

> To those, both here and in Ontario and elsewhere, who would attack me for not making Ontario officially bilingual I offer a simple and direct response. Unnecessary excess that corrects no injustice serves no purpose. Understanding and commitment to fairness, on the other hand, breeds tolerance and co-operation. We will not, in Ontario, be stampeded to repeat the mistakes of others. We will chart our own path, in fairness and understanding, in the broad interest of all Ontarians.
> In summary, we have a package of constitutional changes that are consistent with Ontario's traditional views as well as our perception of current needs. I regret that many of my fellow premiers do not share that over-all view, but to wait for unanimity would be to wait forever.

I suppose I have received more correspondence on the matter of the supremacy of God in the Constitution than on any other aspect of the constitutional package. Personally I believe in God. I note that God is referred to in our Canadian Bill of Rights at the beginning, where it reads in part:

> The Parliament of Canada, affirming that the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free men and free institutions:—

Without doubt, this is still the situation in Canada. The Canadian Bill of Rights will be adhered to, in spite of the fact that there is no mention of this in the constitutional package. Also I point out that God is referred to in our national anthem, "O Canada", in line 7 which reads as follows:

> God keep our land glorious and free!

Mr. Beatty: Sing it.

Mr. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Perhaps we should all sing it. Every day before question period in the House we have prayers; we mention God. The Lord's Prayer is recited every day, and I have no indication that this will change. The people of the country do not realize that we recite the Lord's Prayer every day before commencing our deliberations in Parliament. It is important for these people to know that we recite the Lord's Prayer and give God precedence in the chamber.

The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) summarized it well when he said, as reported on page 8107 of Hansard of March 10, 1981:

> My belief in God is secure; it does not need to be enshrined in secular documents. It is now enshrined in the greatest of all constitutions—the Good Book.

God is there today and He always will be. Our Constitution must include a preamble which mentions God and other spiritual and national values. I am sure that such a preamble will be adopted in the course of the continuing constitutional discussions.

I should like to refer to another aspect of the constitutional package which is of great concern to me, particularly as a practising lawyer. An article appeared in The Globe and Mail on March 11, 1981, written by Mr. Roderick M. McLeod, who is a spokesman for the Canadian Association of Crown Counsel and assistant deputy attorney general of Ontario. Mr. McLeod contended that the provision in the charter of rights —Clause 24(2)—empowering the courts to exclude illegally obtained evidence in certain circumstances will result in the adoption by Canadian courts of the American rule of automatic exclusion of illegally obtained evidence. This is simply not the case.

According to Mr. McLeod, in the United States, the doctrine of excluding evidence obtained in contravention of the U.S. bill of rights—protection against unreasonable searches and seizures and the right to remain silent in the absence of counsel—has been developed by courts as an absolute rule designed to prevent law enforcement officers from violating a constitutionally protected right of individuals. The rule operates automatically in every case regardless of how minor the breach of the right and regardless of whether the admission of the evidence would cast doubt on the integrity of the administration of justice. This is why, in the Williams case referred to by Mr. McLeod, the accused was set free even though, on the facts of that case there did not appear to be a serious breach of his constitutional rights.

Mr. McLeod says that the situation in Canada, under the proposed provisions of Clause 24(2) of the charter, would be rather different. Clause 24(2) provides that a court shall exclude evidence obtained in contravention of a charter right—e.g., by an illegal search or seizure or by evidence obtained from an accused who has been denied counsel—only where it is established, having regard to all the circumstances, that admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. Consequently there would be no rule of automatic exclusion of illegally obtained evidence. The accused would have to establish to the satisfaction of the court that the illegality of the manner in which the evidence was obtained was of such a serious nature that using it would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. The circumstances which the court would consider in reaching a decision would include (a), the extent to which human dignity and social values were breached in obtaining the evidence; (b), the seriousness of the case; (c), the importance of the evidence; (d), whether the harm to the accused was inflicted wilfully or not; and (e), whether there were circumstances justifying the illegal action, such as a situation of urgency where the evidence would have been destroyed or lost.

In other words, says Mr. McLeod, the underlying principles of the proposed charter "exclusionary rule" are twofold. First, to ensure a proper balance between effective law enforcement activities and the fair administration of justice; and second, to avoid the courts becoming parties to activities which are serious violations of charter rights.

By providing the test of "bringing the administration of justice into disrepute", we are clearly signalling to the courts that we do not want the adoption of the automatic and absolute exclusionary rule of the United States, but one which operates to curtail the use of evidence where it has been obtained in flagrant violation of charter rights.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I take it the hon. member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) has not completed his remarks.

Mr. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): No, I have not, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Then the Chair will recognize the hon. member at two o'clock in order for him to complete his intervention.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McRae): Order, please. When the House rose at one o'clock, the hon. member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore had the floor.

Mr. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Before lunch, Mr. Speaker, I was in the midst of my remarks in reply to an article in The Globe and Mail of Wednesday, March 11, 1981, by Mr. Roderick M. McLeod, spokesman for the Canadian Association of Crown Counsel and assistant deputy attorney general of Ontario. I would like to continue those remarks at this time.

Mr. McLeod quotes the dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Berger in the Williams case, which condemns the absolute exclusion rule. This is, of course, the position of the Chief Justice because of the fact that the rule is automatic and absolute, being applied without regard to the seriousness of the breach. As the Chief Justice noted in the 1971 Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics case, cited at 403 U.S. Reports at page 388, a United States Supreme Court case, he is opposed to the U.S. rule because it represents a "mechanically inflexible response to widely varying degrees of police error". The proposed Canadian rule would allow for flexibility in determining when the breach of rights was serious enough to justify excluding illegally obtained evidence.

Mr. McLeod also asserts that the best means to ensure that the police observe the rights of persons is by "before-the-fact direction" or subsequent prosecution or disciplinary action for illegal conduct. The simple fact is that even if such ex post facto action occurs, it is of little solace to the person whose rights have been infringed. As Laskin, B. remarked in his dissenting judgment in Hogan v. The Queen, 1975, 2 Supreme Court Reports at page 574:

> Illegalities or improprieties attending the eliciting or discovery of relevant evidence are, on the orthodox common law view, res inter alios acta. They are said to have their sanction in separate criminal or civil proceedings, of which there is little evidence, either as to recourse or effectiveness; or, perhaps, in internal disciplinary proceedings against offending constables, a matter on which there is no reliable data in this country.

Laskin then went on to observe with respect to constitutionally protected rights:

> It may be said that the exclusion of relevant evidence is no way to control illegal police practices and that such exclusion merely allows a wrongdoer to escape conviction. Yet where constitutional guarantees are concerned, the more pertinent consideration is whether those guarantees, as fundamentals of the particular society, should be at the mercy of law enforcement officers and a blind eye turned to their invasion because it is more important to secure a conviction. The contention that it is the duty of the courts to get at the truth has in it too much of the philosophy of the end justifying the means; it would equally challenge the present law as to confessions and other out-of-court statements by an accused. In the United States, its Supreme Court, after weighing over many years whether other methods than exclusion of evidence should be invoked to deter illegal searches and seizures in state as well as in federal prosecutions, concluded that the constitutional guarantees could best be upheld by a rule of exclusion.

As for the propriety of the courts using the test of bringing the administration of justice into disrepute as a basis for excluding illegally obtained evidence, Chief Justice Cartwright and Justices Spence and Hall, dissenting in The Queen v. Wray, a 1970 case reported at page 272 of the Supreme Court Reports, were clearly of the opinion that this was a primary duty of the courts. As Mr. Justice Spence remarked:

I am most strongly of the opinion that it is the duty of every judge to guard against bringing the administration of justice into disrepute. That is a duty which lies upon him constantly and that is a duty which he must always keep firmly in mind. The proper discharge of this duty is one which, in the present day of almost riotous disregard for the administration of justice, is of paramount importance to the continued life of the state.

In the present case, the confession or statement of the accused and also the information given by the accused as to where the weapon could be found, as Aylesworth J.A. pointed out, were procured by trickery, duress and improper inducements and they were clearly inadmissible. Moreover, as the Chief Justice of this court has indicated in his reasons the purpose of exercise of such trickery was stated by the inspector of the provincial police to avoid taking a chance that the accused, as the result of speaking to his lawyer, would not take the police to the place where the gun was found.

Under these circumstances, I am in agreement with the chief justice when he characterized the description of the situation by the Court of Appeal as not any overstatement.

I am of the opinion that were the trial judge to have, as he very properly did, excluded as inadmissible the statement of the accused and yet have permitted the Crown to have adduced all the evidence as to the accused's accompanying the police officers and pointing out to them the place where the weapon had been thrown away, in accordance with the information which he had given to them in the excluding statement, it would not only have brought the administration of justice into disrepute but it would have been a startling disregard of the principle of British criminal law, nemo tenetur seipsum accusare. Surely no authority need be stated to establish that as the most basic principle in our criminal law.

Mr. McLeod also expresses concerns about the manner in which the government changed its position between July, 1980, and February, 1981, on how to deal with the exclusionary rule in the charter. The simple fact is that the government was searching for a provision that would strike a proper balance between the absolute and automatic exclusionary rule of the United States and the common law rule in Canada which, with the exception of involuntary confessions, allows the admissibility of relevant evidence even when it has been obtained by illegal or improper means.

In this regard, the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution received submissions from many groups that Mr. McLeod characterizes as "misinformed special-interest lobby groups" which advocated some provision that would permit courts to exclude illegally obtained evidence in proper cases. These groups included bodies such as the Canadian Bar Association, the B.C. Civil Liberties Association, the National Association of Women and the Law and the Canadian Civil Liberties Association. The only groups before the committee advocating the maintenance of the existing evidence rule was the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police and the Canadian Association of Crown Counsel.

Finally, in response to the specific questions that Mr. McLeod poses in his article, the following points might be made. First, the charter is not adopting the U.S. exclusionary rule, but a test which will require the accused to show that admission of illegally obtained evidence would, in all the circumstances, bring the administration of justice into disrepute. There is nothing automatic or absolute about this rule.

Second, the results in the Williams case would not occur under the proposed charter rule since admitting Williams' statement would not have brought the administration of justice into disrepute.

Third, both disciplinary actions against the police and the prospect of excluding evidence in cases of flagrant violations of rights by the police are considered necessary to ensure respect for civil liberties.

Fourth, the Supreme Court will develop interpretations of the new exclusionary rule which will establish guidelines for the lower courts and Crown counsel for determining when evidence is inadmissible.

Fifth, while the task force on evidence may be recommending against the U.S. exclusionary rule, that is not the rule which is being adopted in the charter. The rule adopted in the charter is the same as that proposed by the Canada Law Reform Commission in its report on evidence in 1975.

Sixth, the wording of the proposed exclusionary rule is not inconsistent with any provision of the United Nations covenant on civil and political rights which does not deal with admissibility of evidence.

Seventh, the report of the McDonald commission on the RCMP is not relevant to rules relating to admissibility of evidence.

Eighth, the suggestion that rapists will be turned loose in the streets despite their guilt because of a technical error by the police is nonsense, since the test for exclusion in the charter would not apply to minor breaches of the charter rights.

Ninth, the government's flexibility in the development of the exclusionary rule is simply an illustration of its desire to develop the best charter possible, taking into account the views of the groups which appeared before the committee and the members of the committee themselves.

In sum, Clause 24(2) of the charter seeks to strike a proper balance between the interests of the effective administration of justice and the interests of the fair administration of justice.

Attempts by the police and Crown counsel to create in the minds of the Canadian public fears that the exclusionary rule will turn our cities into havens for criminals who would otherwise be behind bars is to do a serious disservice. The proposed rule is not the same as the exclusionary rule in the United States and should not be held forth as such.

Time does not permit me to deal with some of the other aspects of this matter that I should like to deal with, so I shall sum up by saying that this constitutional package is enormous but necessary at this time. As Canada enters the eighties with a new made-in-Canada Constitution for the century ahead, it is clear that creating a Constitution is a painful, agonizing experience, as the Fathers of Confederation found out. In some ways, what we are going through now is not unlike the process we went through in getting our Canadian flag and our national anthem. But who would want to take them away today?

We need to patriate the British North America Act, our present Constitution. We need a charter of rights and freedoms and an amending formula, and we need them now.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today with somewhat mixed feelings. There is always pleasure in participating in a historic debate, yet for me there is a certain amount of sadness in this participation. The pleasure comes from taking part in a golden opportunity that has been presented where we can finally do something about our Constitution and where the first concrete steps toward constitutional reform can be taken.

There is still a certain amount of sadness, however, in that this golden opportunity has been seized by the government and used to achieve its political ambitions, its nearsighted visions of constitutional reform. This seizure is dangerous because the blatant attempts of the government in this direction have tended to destroy the principle upon which this country is based, that being the spirit of co-operation and consensus which is essentially known by all of us to be the federalist nature of Canada. It cannot be denied that the fundamental nature of Canada rests on the philosophy of federalism. As a government of a federation I think we should understand that the steps to good constitutional reform are, first of all, the steps of co-operation, steps of agreement, and steps of consensus. All of those are steps of unity.

Then we must ask how those steps can be taken, Mr. Speaker. I think this is fairly simple. We begin with simple patriation, followed by entrenchment of an equalization formula and an agreed upon amending formula. So we have a solution which is ludicrously simple; in fact, it is so simple that it has escaped the discerning eyes of hon. members opposite and of many, but not all, members to my left.

I believe that it is in fact possible to get agreement, not necessarily unanimity but certainly consensus, on a number of matters, such as patriation, on which we already have agreement; on equalization, which we know we have agreement for; and on an amending formula, on which we have already had substantial agreement. This would be acceptable. It would be the logical federalist approach and it would certainly be in keeping with the federalist spirit of Canada.

The government does not appear to want to maintain that federal spirit, however. It said as much on October 22, 1980, when the government and the NDP newlyweds voted against a Conservative motion which called for immediate patriation with an amending formula. That motion met with a degree of consensus and had it been given approval the Constitution would have been brought home. It would have been amended in Canada by Canadians and would have been the greatest exercise in unity in history.

That is what the majority of Canadians support. That is what the provinces support and that is certainly what the Conservative Party supports. Unfortunately, it is not what the Liberals and the NDP support. They want what the majority of Canadians do not want. In fact, recent polls indicate that 60 to 65 per cent of the Canadian population do not want unilateral action and that 80 per cent of the provinces do not want it either.

Hon. members opposite probably wonder why almost the entire nation is opposed to unilateral action. In order to attempt to answer this question I should like to ask one more question, one that is essential and with which all of us must come to grips. That question simply is: What is Canada? It is a simple question but at the same time a very difficult one. It is difficult in that we would probably receive as many different answers as we have different people.

For me, to describe what Canada is I have to think in terms of people and friends. For example, a friend who is a farmer in the Peace country; another friend, a banker who lives at the other end of the country in Prince Edward Island. Then I think of a friend who is a pipefitter living in Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories, and finally of a friend who lives in Vancouver and is a carpenter. Those people coming from wide regions, miles and miles apart, are Canadians and are essentially what Canada is. If I were to ask each of them what they thought of Canada, their answers would be different. Their answers would be very different because they come from different provinces and different regions. They have different lifestyles. They come from different economic strata having different desires and different goals. They have different conceptions of Canada.

Yet if we were to put them all together in one room, a very solid concise common denominator would exist. A togetherness, a camaraderie, would exist between them. It exists because they are all citizens of probably one of the most unique nations on earth. A togetherness exists even though people live thousands of miles apart. They know they live in a country traditionally willing to pull together, to co-operate and to help those in need, whether they live a thousand miles away or next door. They live in a country where consensus has been and is a way of life. It has made it possible for these friends of mine, the banker, the farmer, the pipefitter and the carpenter, to pull together, even though they may well be pulling for somewhat different goals and dreams.

It is this consensus and co-operation which allows those differences to be a unifying force, not a divisive force. The miracle of our federation is that differences can in fact be a unifying force. But what makes us a federation? It is very simply the fact that we have sovereign, democratically elected governments on two levels, provincial and federal.

We have such diverse goals and dreams, yet we expect both levels to pursue our dreams. Of course, the provincial level looks much more at regional dreams, the closer to home aspirations and things which have a close relationship interest. The second level, the national government, deals in a sense with our broader goals and our broader dreams. But that is not to say that the federal government alone acts for our national interests. The provinces, too, can act in our national interest, although this government would have us believe that only it can act in the national interest.

These two levels, each sovereign, each pursuing regional and national goals, make us a federal state and not a unitary state. We are a partnership, a cohabitation, a nation of different people from different regions coming together. We cannot escape that fact. Yet these people living together in harmony is the essential spirit of consensus and co-operation. It is that same essential federalist spirit. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself is well aware of what the spirit of federation is.

In 1964, in a speech at the Charlottetown conference when the Prime Minister was still a professor of law at McGill, he defined our federation as follows:

> Federation is by its very essence a compromise and a pact. It is a compromise in the sense that when national consensus on all things is not desirable or cannot readily be obtained, the area of consensus is reduced in order that a consensus on some things can be reached. It is a pact or quasi-treaty in the sense that the terms of that compromise cannot be changed unilaterally. That is not to say that the terms are fixed forever: but only that in changing them, every effort must be made not to destroy the consensus on which the federated nation rests.

He seemed to know what he was talking about. Has he now either forgotten what he once said or has he decided we should not remain a federation? Has he decided we should not remain a nation of consensus or a nation of co-operation? Instead, he wants us to be a nation of one government rule, a government that needs not to consult nor seek consensus. Instead of a government that would take those differences and turn them into a unifying force, this government is turning those differences into a divisive force. It is turning us away from the path of federalism, for if there is no consensus, there is no federation, as professor Trudeau himself stated in 1964. What there was then, and what we have now, is unilateral action. We have a unitary government with no goal either of consensus, or attempts, as the Prime Minister then put it, to "limit the field of consensus".

The question must be asked: What will the end result of unilateral action be? As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) stated in a speech to this House on February 17, 1981, will it be that Canada will be "compensated" once the "strike and the discord and abuse" of this government's unilateral action is behind us? Will unilateral action forever sweeten future relations, as the Minister of Justice would have us believe? Will it create a mood that will lend itself to future consensus? Or will unilateral action forever taint future federal-provincial relations? Will it forever entrench a prevailing mood of tension? Will we become a wholly unitary state? These are all interesting questions and time will tell. But now is the time for us to look at the results of that.

First, I would like to read a passage from the infamous Kirby memo which outlined the possibilities for the federal government on federal-provincial negotiations on the Constitution. On unilateral action by the government, we read in the memo:

> Ministers should understand that the fight in Parliament will become very, very rough.

So much for spirit of consensus and co-operation. So much for the rewards of federalism. This "very, very rough fight" will no doubt leave a bitter taste in our mouths, a taste which will not easily be forgotten. How does this government defend unilateral action? This government says that unilateral action first is okay because it is the voice of the people, that the government has been given a mandate and therefore it is carrying out the will of the people. The government says also that it has the support of western Canada because of the NDP alliance.

Neither of those points holds water. On the first point I would remind hon. members opposite that a voter's mandate is given and applies only to a program on which the successful party campaigned, plus the administration of public affairs. As I remember, the February "18-cent election" was not a July 1 deadline election. On the second argument, that of NDP support, we all know how slipshod that support is. We know that most members of the NDP are not speaking for their constituents, they are speaking only for their leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) who, in turn, is just another mouthpiece for the Prime Minister.

What does the real NDP voice for the west say, the voice from Saskatchewan of Premier Allan Blakeney? He has said:

> Should we not try to ensure that patriation, if it goes ahead, is accomplished in a way that minimizes dissension? Will it serve Canada's interests, at this point in our history, to compound division with division?

That is the voice from Saskatchewan. The same thing is being repeated by the premiers in Manitoba, in Alberta and in British Columbia. Division upon division, that is the result of unilateral action. If we multiply that division upon division by decades, we can see the result of this unilateral action down the road. We can see what it would be like to turn this nation into a unitary state.

Even the ghosts of constitutional reform past against unilateral action are beginning to rear their heads. For instance, we awn look back at the Fulton-Favreau white paper. This was a Liberal task force. In that white paper we read:

> The Canadian Parliament will not directly request an amendment directly affecting federal-provincial relations without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces.

That is what was said by Liberals not so very long ago, yet these Liberals do the exact opposite. They do not seek agreement with the provinces. There is no agreement, but they do not care. There is no consensus, but again we hear them say "who cares?" I care, Mr. Speaker. Canadians care. What we do not care for is unilateral action.

However, the Prime Minister creates the illusion that he does care. For example, on November 5, 1980 the Prime Minister told the partisan gathering of the Ontario Liberal Association the following:

The west demands a new deal from confederation and the federal government must help bring it about—I believe that for Ontarians to say no to the aspirations of the west today would be to say no to your own tomorrow.

● (1430)

Is it okay for the Prime Minister to ignore the west but not okay for Ontario? Again he can be seen as going directly against his own advice, for he is not paying attention to the aspirations of the west by moving unilaterally.

Then there are his compatriots in Quebec, the Liberal party of Quebec, headed by Claude Ryan. Does Mr. Ryan agree with the Prime Minister's unilateral action? Does the party agree with the Prime Minister? Obviously the answer is no. The message of Mr. Ryan's beige paper states that the essence of Canada is federalism.

Then we come to the leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Oshawa. Even he realizes the dangers of unilateral action. He stated on the opening day of debate on this resolution that the way the Constitution is changed is almost as important as the substance. He said: "We could have a situation of grave danger."

What caused him to change his mind? Perhaps he agrees with the Prime Minister that Canada should not be a federation, that all decisions should be made in Ottawa and that the provinces should serve no real purpose. Perhaps he agrees with the Prime Minister that Canada should instead be a republic and not a federation, as was indicated by the Prime Minister's remarks on November 23, 1979 when he stated that a republic might be better for Canada.

Is this the ultimate goal of the Prime Minister, the transformation of Canada into a republic? Is unilateral action merely the tool that will wipe the provincial governments off the face of the map? Many members opposite would say it is not so. They would tell us to read the words of Liberals in this House the day after the referendum.

I recall all too well the emotional rhetoric, the calls for reform, change, co-operation and consensus. What has happened since? The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) said as far back as October 21, 1977 that "fuller consultation by the federal government" is needed. He said the areas of the country must be made to feel that they are being consulted. Where is the greater consultation? Does he call a week in September greater consultation?

I return to the day after the Quebec referendum when the Prime Minister said:

What we must do is chart a new course and agree upon a common itinerary toward that common destination.

Is the July 1 deadline a common itinerary? Is this amending formula, this charter, this referendum, the common destination? He continued:

We shall constantly need the support of the Canadian people.

Where is the support? He does not have the support. He went on to say:

We are also counting on the support of all provincial governments, including that of Quebec. We shall all have to agree on the basic principles underlying our efforts. We have to be receptive to the needs and aspirations of all Canadians to stick together.

Those are his words, "to stick together". Has he lost the glue? If so, I would like to help him out. I have my own special brand of patriation glue. It will adhere to simple patriation, it will hold fast to equalization, it will bond permanently to an agreed upon amending formula. But it has a word of caution on it. It says "Danger; not to be used with unilateral action". Glue will fail to keep nations stuck together if used unilaterally.

Maybe my glue is not so good after all. I doubt that there is a glue that will work on this model we are debating here today. I cannot help but ask, where are all these words of the Prime Minister now? What happened to "aspirations of all Canadians" and "stick together" and "we all have to agree"? Perhaps those were just words to the wind and nothing more.

Then we have the words of the Minister of Justice on that same clear day in May when things looked so bright. What did he say? "But Canada is a federation." Those were his words. He also said: "We must consult the provinces." He consulted but he would not limit the area of consensus. He had the charter of rights in his hand, but in the words of the Prime Minister the charter was non-negotiable. Therefore, if the provinces did not agree with Ottawa, that was too bad for the provinces. That is the Liberal brand of consensus, the Liberal brand of federalism.

Let us take a closer look at that non-negotiable item. When we look at this charter, we must remember who it is for. It is for my friends in Vancouver, Prince Edward Island, Yellowknife and Peace River. Does this charter speak for them? Does it graciously grant them rights they do not already have? Does it make them the masters of government and not the servant? This government wants them to believe that it does these things, but I and the people of Peace River know that they have this right. They know they are not the government's for the giving. This government chooses to pretend that we are the slaves who must submit to their whim.

I and the people of Peace River have no objection to an entrenched charter of rights. What we object to is the means by which this charter is to become entrenched. We do not want this or any charter entrenched if it means sacrifice of the fundamental principle of federalism. On October 17, 1977, as recorded at page 36 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said that the people of western Canada—

—feel that they are not given enough opportunity to participate in setting up a national policy. They feel they are too remote from the central government in Ottawa, and left out of the centre of decisions.

The unilateral entrenchment of this charter is a typical example of what the Prime Minister referred to in that statement. Therefore, I and the people of Peace River country object to this charter. We object to the state being master, graciously granting the rights to the people who are therefore the servant. If the people say to the state that they do not want the state's charter or unilateral action, then the state must not and cannot follow through against the will of the people.

The Liberal Party accuses the Progressive Conservative Party of being hypocritical when the PC Party says the charter is desired, that patriation is desired, that equalization and an amending formula are desired, but we will not support Liberal formulas. It is the Liberals who are being hypocritical. They will not include numerous rights in the charter, such as the fundamental right of access to information and property rights, because they say there is provincial opposition. Yet the Liberal formula is opposed outright by 80 per cent of the provinces. If the government is concerned about provincial support, it would withdraw the package completely or agree to the Conservative amendment of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). It will not do so due to its ability to speak out of both sides of its mouth.

The Conservatives support the idea of a charter, as do the people of Peace River and, I believe, of western Canada. In fact, I believe the majority of the people of Canada support it. However, there is no support for this unilateral charter. The people want a charter of rights of and for the people, of and for natives, anglophones, francophones, ethnic minorities, women, men, children, the handicapped, property owners, even provincial governments.

This charter is inadequate. The people do not want this charter because there is no consensus and no agreement. If this government supports this package, federalism will be dead and unitarianism will live. We will have a unitary state with unitary attitudes, a unitary Constitution and a unitary amending formula. Although this formula has the facade of consensus, the referendum clause turns the amending formula into a unitary amending formula.

Canadians are asking themselves about the importance of an amending formula. It is the fundamental cornerstone of future development in our political structure, the foundation of the future path of national relations and will dictate our ability to accommodate change. In fact, it will dictate how we will be able to evolve, expand and exist together in harmony as a nation. It will dictate whether or not we will continue to thrive on consensus and co-operation, or if confrontation and division will become the order of the day.

The amending formula chosen, if the path of consensus is the desired one, must adhere to the following very simple principles. First, it must prove practical under close scrutiny. Second, there must be a consensus on the formula itself, because without consensus on the formula, consensus after will be difficult if not impossible. Third, it has to be fair to all parties.

Let us look at the formula we are discussing here today. That formula does not adhere to either condition. Under close scrutiny basic flaws can be seen. First, a permanent veto for Ontario and Quebec is illogical if the population of the west increases as the population of the east decreases. The premise for the reason that Ontario has this veto is the number of people in that province. If that is in fact the premise, then it must also be the premise that if the population is not retained the veto must be lost, for the reason for granting this veto would no longer exist.

Since the 25 per cent veto formula is applicable to any province that has or had that percentage of the population, it is stacked against the western provinces and is in fact in favour of the central provinces.

The 1976 census showed that Quebec had 27.12 per cent of the population, and according to StatsCan Quebec will be down to between 24.6 and 23.2 per cent by the year 2001. At the same time, the population of western Canada is predicted to rise from 27.2 per cent in 1976 to 31.9 per cent by the year 2001. Thus we can see that the western provinces would be reduced to second-class citizens.

Third-class status would then be conferred upon provinces such as Saskatchewan and Manitoba. That very simply is because the western provinces can veto only if at least two of the provinces having at least 50 per cent of the population choose to do so. Manitoba and Saskatchewan together do not have 50 per cent of the population of western Canada, yet they represent 50 per cent of the western provinces. They are not equal, then, in status to Alberta and B.C., and the west as a whole is not equal in status to each of the central provinces.

The second condition I referred to was the degree of consensus the formula must meet, and again I suggest there is none. The government is implementing an amending formula that does not even meet the very conditions it dictates as the procedure for future amendments. It does not have the support of every province that has or had at least 25 per cent of the population. It does not have the support of at least two of the Atlantic provinces and it does not have the support of any of the western provinces. The Liberals and NDP are thereby giving this House and this nation a first-rate lesson in hypocrisy, because their own formula cannot even pass itself.

An alternative has been submitted by my party which meets these two fundamental conditions. This alternative, which was dismissed by the Liberals and the NDP, treats all Canadians as equals and treats the provinces as equals. It recognizes the larger provinces with the rule that at least 50 per cent of the population of Canada must support any proposed amendment. It also recognizes the eastern and western provinces as strong voices. It is also just in that there has been an amount of consensus with the provinces as to its use. Final arrangements would have to be worked out, but that is not impossible. A deal could be arranged which would be in keeping with the spirit of consensus and co-operation that is so important, and in keeping with the federalist nature of our country. No province would be relegated to second or third-class status. Negotiations between the federal and provincial governments, even though they are not automatically possible, are not impossible, and I believe strongly that with the proper attitude on both sides, attitudes that lend themselves to those two key words "co-operation" and "consensus", our efforts would bear some fruit.

Canadians have traditionally been able to operate within the framework of co-operation and consensus; why not now? In the past the provinces have sat down with the federal government at the negotiating table and have come to agreements over pacts and have arrived at money agreements, such as various fiscal arrangements affecting the tax structure and revenue sharing, the Canada and Quebec pension plans, medicare and hospital insurance plans, welfare assistance programs, money for post-secondary education, manpower training programs—the list goes on and on—immigration policy and the many other things on which there has been agreement in the past. Why can we not expect agreement now and in the future?

This government chooses to ignore or forget the past. It chooses to go the route that would forever destroy the spirit of co-operation and consensus. Is this, as the government contends, because of the fact that the very nature of our country is changing? Is it, as the Prime Minister says, because agreement is no longer possible? My answer is, the reason agreement cannot be achieved is that this government does not want agreement, it does not want consensus and it does not want co-operation, except in the case of agreement with the provinces on the basis of its specific plans.

I should like to quote again to this House what the Premier of Saskatchewan said, and this should interest the members sitting to my left. He said in a speech to the Dalhousie law alumnae:

> The process permits a referendum where provincial legislatures fail to agree to a proposal for constitutional amendment. It is a way to temper provincial intransigence, but not federal intransigence.

The federal New Democratic Party should follow the Premier of Saskatchewan because Premier Blakeney was right in his remarks. The federal NDP should reject this package. It should reject this amending formula and its provision for the referendum. It is a referendum that would allow the federal government to bypass the provinces now as well as in the future, a referendum that would do away with co-operation and the motivation the federal government needs to reach consensus, one that would in fact do away with federalism.

For the reasons I have listed, I and the people of Peace River, the Progressive Conservative Party, eight out of ten provinces and, indeed, the majority of the people of Canada, have chosen not to support the government referendum and amendment clauses.

Let me look at the history of the referendum. We can see it has a rather marked past. It has been used in many cases to abuse the established system of government, whether that be a system of democratic government or the system of co-operation and consensus.

France in 1958, against a background of political instability, under the de Gaulle government, initiated a referendum that gave him the powers of a near dictatorship. Germany in 1934, while the Nazi party served as the force of propaganda and momentum, initiated a referendum that granted Hitler unchecked executive powers and enabled him to establish himself as a dictator. Canada in 1944, under Prime Minister Mackenzie King, initiated a referendum on conscription that split the country into two permanent factions. Had that referendum been avoided and had the government of that day acted with responsibility, we possibly would not have been left with the legacy of anti-Anglophone and anti-Francophone influences with which we have had so much difficulty dealing in the past.

Now the government wishes to entrench an amending formula complete with a referendum that will enable the government to initiate referenda on its own recognizance. The result would be to divide and conquer the people of Canada. The government would be the conqueror and the people would be the conquered.

It is time to stop and ask ourselves if this Parliament would be doing the right thing in passing this resolution. We are not doing the right thing if we send this document as it stands before us to the British parliament.

In conclusion, quite simply I am trying to say to this government. Let us stop and think about the spirit of our nation, about the backbone of Canada, which is federalism and the spirit of co-operation and consensus. Think about the effect unilateral action will have on that spirit. I submit it will be broken; the backbone will in fact be shattered.

I ask hon. members opposite to ask themselves what will become of Canada without the backbone of federalism, without that spirit of consensus and co-operation. Canada may still exist without it, but would there still exist the will of the people in the west, in the Atlantic provinces and in Quebec, to continue to fight for a better Canada? Or would the fight turn into one of region pitted against region, province against province and people against people? Will the loss of this spirit of co-operation, of the backbone of federalism, not result in division and conflict?

I believe that this government has a clear choice, one of consensus, of federalism, or the choice of unilateral action, of a unitary state, the choice of division. I do not think that choice is difficult. I think a five-year-old can see it, and I would ask this government to stop and listen to that five-year-old. I ask that they listen to the concerns of all Canadians.

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Trade)): Mr. Speaker, François Mauriac wrote on one of his Blocs-notes, and I quote:

> I remain on the side of those who mistrust the pretexts and excuses invented by the strong to ensure their domination and have us believe that might is right.

Recent history, as far as constitutional moods are concerned, compels us to be guarded, if not outright suspicious when dealing with these issues.

Some people have claimed that the hon. member for Rosemont has serious misgivings concerning the resolution under review. They are right and I mean to look into them now. They have also wondered how he would vote. That I leave for some other time. But what are these misgivings, Mr. Speaker? Through their elected representatives, the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) invites all Canadians to join with him in his constitutional proposal and justifies his move by the need to positively affirm the supremacy of the people in the enjoyment of their fundamental rights and assert our national autonomy in our statutes. This move which is in keeping with its underlying symbols and which all Canadian men and women should greet with pride and enthusiasm, having regard to our maturity as a nation, causes only resentment, anathema and what is worse, indifference among those towards whom it is directed.

How could this happen? As a great many other Canadians, I keep asking myself this question with nagging insistence and I formulate it at the start of my intervention in this debate which could have provided not only a futile consolation for our upside-down history, but an opportunity for mutual comprehension to those who still believe in tolerance and our collective destiny. Alas! because of the dichotomy created by a concealed antagonism and two opposite visions of our country, as well as the hardening of positions along party lines, the present debate has bogged down in abstruse rhetoric, which is both unfortunate and revealing at the same time.

First proposition. We must realize that past attempts at amending the Constitution by time-honoured methods have failed. Again, how could that have happened, Mr. Speaker? On the one hand, I think that we must definitely impute part of the blame on the protagonists themselves who, for all sorts of reasons, have been unable or unwilling to bridge the enormous gap created by partisanship, regionalism, sectarianism, distrust, mental fatigue, immobilism, egotism and egocentrism.

But in so doing, I feel we would be unfair toward those men. There is not a single woman in the lot of them, who have tried nevertheless to answer the difficult question which we ourselves, as legislators, have to discuss in the course of this debate. I feel part of the blame should also be put on those very institutions that have been used, of which the privileged and typically Canadian vehicle of the federal-provincial conferences, in an effort to reach a consensus. That mere word consensus, Mr. Speaker, sums up the dilemma we face. For, as far as I am concerned, the rule of consensus is precisely one of the main reasons why we are discussing this resolution today, a resolution that sanctions the unilateral vision of the constitutional reform, which the Canadian government decided to bring before us.

Some have suggested methods to better achieve what must be done. There has been talk of constituent assemblies, and I must say the concept really appeals to me in that I find it attractive and sparkling, that of a constituent assembly where persons elected for that specific purpose would, by virtue of their mandate, make a new Constitution, leaving it to the elected representatives to look after the nation's business. However, the problems of setting up a constituent assembly remain the same, in the final analysis, as those we have to solve today. And as things stand at present, I unfortunately no longer feel that the concept of a constituent assembly is that miracle cure, the panacea to all our ills, the ideal system through which we could solve all our problems.

Others have suggested other techniques, that of a standing, so to speak, provincial conference on the Constitution. The introduction in the constitutional resolution for the next two years of the concept of an annual federal-provincial conference could have been that constitutional entrenchment of the principle; for my part, Mr. Speaker, I would rather a time limit had not been set for that concept, that is, the principle of an annual federal-provincial conference on the Constitution, but that instead it be incorporated into our institutions, our textbooks, even though I may be accused of being slightly masochistic in my approach, since discussing the Constitution annually might be to entrench forever the melancholy constitutional mood of Canadians.

Second proposition. The unilateralism of that process and the temporary sanction of a certain vision of federalism. The federalism of seniority which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) referred to in a brilliant and pithy account coming from a man who in this debate cannot be accused of not having been through the ranks, deserves to be read and reread, analysed, digested and finally, to my mind, accepted inasmuch as that federalism of seniority under which this constitutional resolution is being presented is the only justification for the steps being taken or suggested by the government today.

Now, if it were only a matter of federalism of seniority, I would sit down immediately, and the answer would be obvious to me: I would have to vote no. But the problem is more complex. Indeed, as long as we have not determined, as Canadians, the respective balance offered by those two concepts, those two visions of Canada, that on the one hand, of the pan-Canadian federalism, the federalism of seniority which is that of the Right Hon. Prime Minister and others, and on the other hand, the federalism based on a community of communities of which the provinces are the main protagonists, and which the Progressive Conservative Party espoused in this House and also champions, then I feel it will be next to impossible to solve our constitutional problems once and for all.

On the other hand, if we realize as I do, all things considered, the failure of that pathetic contest last September, of that battle of leaders trying before us or before the television cameras to answers those same questions, as long as that problem is not solved, it will remain for me a constitutional status quo.

We are therefore facing an alternative which is not really one. The failure of September establishes the status quo for all practical purposes—and I will come back to that—namely, that we are ratifying a constitutional bid for power in the name of principles which may be tangent in many respects but which give us some hope of a breakthrough. However, I would like to state again my own views on this matter which indeed amounts to Pascal's wager.

Third proposition. I do not agree with the argument to the effect that we forgo our responsibilities when we ask the parliament of Westminster to make a decision for us.

Once the concept of a federalism of seniority is accepted, if not in essence at least in its application here, it is actually the Canadian people who are dealing with this matter. Along with our colleagues opposite, we represent the Canadian people. And after we have discussed all those issues ad nauseam and made our decision, I feel it would be pointless to ask a foreign Parliament to pass judgment on our decision; it should accept it. This does not necessarily mean that this process is politically fair or not, but as far as its legitimacy is concerned, I think that there is no other alternative once our decision has been made, and the Parliament in Westminster has to agree. Fourth proposition. Some people have suggested that the resolution before us is a valid answer to the referendum commitments made to Quebec. On this assertion, I must say that I readily agree with my colleague the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos) in answering no! This is not an answer to our referendum commitments, this is an instrument which the government is acquiring for its own use, for the use of all Canadians, rightly or wrongly, hoping that this new procedure will provide a way out of the deadlock and bring about the changes that Canadians and Quebecers want. However, when one contends that this is a final or even a partial response to our referendum commitments, personally, I do not agree.

Fifth proposition. It has been asserted that hon. members felt, or were actually pressed by considerations of a partisan nature. To be honest, Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, this is not the case. I will do my utmost to explain the decision I will take when the time comes to vote. I resent somewhat the attitude taken by the Progressive Conservative Party when they decided not to vote on the first amendment they introduced. This would have given other members a chance to introduce other amendments which, in turn, could have been debated and voted on in this House.

To sit on this amendment for five weeks will result in just one thing: it will encourage the government into eventually limiting the debate. This is what I regret deeply. On the other hand, if the Conservative Party had agreed to give this House the opportunity to have a vote every three or four days, and decide on the many amendments that would have been introduced by members on both sides of the House, we would not find ourselves in this cornelian situation as we are now. Mr. Speaker, I for one would have liked to introduce amendments to this resolution, but I will not be able to do so, in the light of recent developments and considering the strategy followed by the Conservative Party.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to come back—

An hon. Member: Question?

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I believe I have had the courtesy, since the start of this debate, to listen to my Conservative and other colleagues without interrupting them, and I would ask the hon. member who just interrupted me to do the same with me.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to analyse the resolution itself and its three main components. First, the charter of rights. We have heard a lot about the constitutional entrenchment of a charter of rights. The least that can be said is that the principle itself does not command unanimity. Some people, including a number of provincial premiers, spokesmen for academic circles and certain members of the House claim that our rights do exist and it is not necessary to entrench them in the Constitution, and there I agree with them. Those rights do exist in Canada and, despite certain unfortunate events in our history, there is no doubt that when it comes to protecting the rights of the citizens the society in which we live is the envy of many others. Other people, including other provincial premiers, this government, members of the House and representatives of the academic world claim on the contrary that the constitutional entrenchment of rights can only give them a certain solemnity which in future will enable Canadians to hail the Constitution in support of their rights.

Both arguments are valid. The fact is that we are studying a resolution which calls for entrenching our rights and, to the extent that it gives more to Canadians than it takes away from them, I endorse it. That being so, it must still be pointed out that Canadian courts have not been unduly favourable to the existing Canadian Bill of Rights. After the spectacular Drybones decision our highest court went through a legal desert.

This conservatism of our courts, particularly the Supreme Court of Canada, brings two things to my mind. On one hand, those who claim that Canadian courts will become overly active should rest easy, that is not in the traditions of our courts. On the other hand, those who claim that the courts should not be involved in politics can be reassured by the tradition of legal interpretation of those same courts. In this respect, the Pratte report in Quebec highlighted the difficulties in interpreting Clause 1 of the resolution, particularly its allegedly very vague terminology, more especially clause 1 of the charter which reads as follows, and I quote:

1. The Canadian charter of rights and freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits perscribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

Well, Mr. Speaker, this supposedly vague language can be found in a number of Canadian statutes, for instance in the Criminal Code as it relates to search and seizure. So our Canadian courts will not be breaking new grounds when they interpret such a provision. That same provision will undoubtedly enable the courts to carry out the full intent of the legislative will of Canadian legislators within provincial legislatures or within the federal legislature of the Canadian Parliament. But a number of objections have been raised about the charter of rights and I would like to consider now two of the main objections from a Quebecer's standpoint.

First, the restrictions that the charter would impose through the mobility rights which it confers upon the regulations and the statutes of Quebec which govern, particularly in the construction field, the entry of a worker from another province, and second, the transfers between regions within the same province. I would like to say that this provision would apply, of course, only in cases of interprovincial mobility problems, and here I make a digression. I would not want anyone in this debate to accuse me of showing my centralizing or decentralizing inclinations, because as I see it the debate does not fit into that context. I think the debate can be set in the following context by answering three questions. First, what is the desirable balance between, on the one hand, the wish of the provincial units, of the provincial entities, of the provincial partners to develop their own territory and, on the other hand, the need for the central entity to ensure a certain co-ordination of the policies? Second, what is the linguistic balance? And third, which government is best qualified to provide service to the people?

If there is one area where we have to consider these questions carefully, it is certainly the economy, and it is somewhat strange that a provincial government, the Quebec government, made much during the referendum campaign of its wish to join a Canadian economic market without the present political integration, of course, even though economic integration in the European Common Market is much more significant than ours. This led the federal government to table a paper in the last round of constitutional negotiations which was entitled "The Constitutional Foundations of the Canadian Economic Union". I would like to quote from this paper, Mr. Speaker:

> In spite of the weaknesses of the BNA Act, the ability of the federal authority to go against the operating rules of the economic union is limited by the fact that Parliament is issued from the Canadian electorate as a whole and any federal government must retain the support of this electorate to stay in power. Thus, any form of discrimination based on the province or area of residence, of location, of origin and of destination in federal practices, laws and regulations must be approved by a majority of the representatives of the people in the House of Commons and may therefore be deemed to be in the national interest. Political and public debates as well as the regular representations made by the provinces concerning the relative equity or inequity of federal policies and programs give nearly daily evidence of the effectiveness of this constraint.
> The legislatures are not subject to the same constraints when they pass discriminatory legislation because each of them is accountable only to the electorate of one province. Consequently, the effectiveness of the Canadian economic union relies perhaps too much on the specific distribution of powers between the two levels of government, which on the other hand results to a large extent from a legal interpretation. Thus, when a decree seems to restrict the authority of Parliament as regards interprovincial trade, the provinces can automatically, in view of the lack of special provisions regulating the operation of the economic union, use their legislative powers to divide the Canadian market. When the particular interests of each province determine such a use of provincial powers, the only constraint which can prevent the provinces from acting in this way is the fear that the other provinces may take retaliatory action. Obviously, this constraint is more effective in the case of less populated provinces or those with a poorer economy.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the economy must be a priority for both levels of government in any attempt at constitutional reform. Having said this, I do not believe that there is really a question of taking away from the provinces to give to the federal government. I am not putting this question in that spirit. On the contrary, the economic issue is perhaps the one where the lack of agencies or entities likely to promote a better co-ordination between the two levels of government is the most dramatic. We have on the one hand the executive of a province and the federal executive, and on the other hand, the provincial legislative bodies and the federal legislative body.

However, as concerns the economy, there does not really exist any institution, Mr. Speaker, which can promote the co-ordination of regional objectives and integrate them within a pan-Canadian concept or vision of our economic development. I think that this question should be placed on the agenda of a federal-provincial conference in the very near future, and having said this, if there is one right in the charter which I believe to be basic and on which I have no sympathy with the objections of the Quebec government, it is certainly the right to mobility. This must be considered a basic right if we want to maintain an economic union in Canada, remove restrictions on the flow of capital and expertise and reduce as much as possible any action that the provinces and the federal government may take in certain cases to promote purely local objectives in relation to a national market. Discussions, on these matters, will have to take place as soon as possible in order to achieve true economic integration in Canada, at least to the same extent as our European partners within their economic community.

The other objection relates to language rights, and my colleague for Montmorency-Orléans dealt with that matter at length. First of all, I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution by providing the entrenchment of language rights suggests a great vision of Canada. Unfortunately, I do not share that vision because basically I agree with what the Pepin-Robarts report said, namely, that as far as language rights are concerned, the legislative action, the main impact, should come from the provinces. We agree in principle; in practice, I should like to point out a number of differences. I feel that this resolution at last gives French-Speaking minorities outside Quebec an opportunity to assert their rights in a restrictive way in some cases, I admit. My colleague from Montmorency-Orléans referred in particular to educational institutions and the fact that although we entrench the rights to those educational facilities the right to control them is not mentioned. That is a very serious problem. However, I think that those language rights, when we entrenched them in Section 23 of the resolution we were mainly concerned with the rights of francophones outside Quebec because, let us be realistic, the English-speaking minority in Quebec enjoys all those rights to a large extent and Quebec meets the conditions set out in Section 23.

On the other hand, my colleague from Montmorency-Orléans put forward the argument that in the very long term, in 15, 20 or 25 years, Quebec could become another Alberta and that as a result of the significant number of Canadians from other regions, even English-speaking Canadians, who would come and settle in Quebec, that linguistic balance could be upset. I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I think the survival of the French language in Quebec is an established fact. Since the quiet revolution, since French-speaking Quebecers took over their own economic, social and political levers, I think we now have in Quebec a flourishing and growing French-speaking society. On the other hand, there is outside Quebec a francophone community which is having much difficulty, to say the least. If we can give those francophones, through this resolution, the opportunity to gain sufficient strength so that in due time, within their own province, they can assert their rights without a constitutional or federal prop, it's all the better. Meanwhile, if that influx does come ten or 15 years from now, it would always be possible to consider amending the Constitution.

I am much more concerned about the present than the distant future, and though the immediate impact will be negligible on Quebec, according to all statistics available, it could be, hopefully, largely beneficial to the francophones outside Quebec in promoting their aspirations in reaching that degree of survival Quebec has now more than achieved in respect of the promotion of French.

Mr. Speaker, it has often been said that it will be difficult to amend the Constitution, especially in its charter components. Let's be fair and honest between ourselves. I for one believe that if some day the provinces were to decide they prefer to take back all the control and promotion in the language area, I do not see how the central government could object to it, and that amendment which could come up ten or 15 years from now, on the instigation of one province or another, could very likely pass. But, be that as it may, unlike my colleague from Montmorency-Orléans, I do not see in that provision the same implication, the same dangerous aspect as he does, and that is why I do not share his concerns on this issue. I would also have liked to make a detailed study of that Pratte report which stated that the charter will have a negative impact on a multiplicity of laws. Some mentioned that as many as 100 Quebec laws could be affected by the various provisions of the charter of rights and freedoms. Some refer to section 23 of Bill 101. I made my position clear on that issue. Reference is made to libel laws. There again, the Quebec charter of rights ensures the same rights to the freedom of expression as the Canadian charter.

So how could the Quebec government eventually complain that this new right, which supposedly will be entrenched in the new Constitution, will run counter to a provincial provision, when their own charter, which is one of the most comprehensive in the whole Canadian political system, guarantees this same right? Hence, it will be possible for our courts to interpret it in relation to the rights that are guaranteed and to the infringements of certains laws with regard to this charter. There has been some talk about anonymous pamphlets, and the same applies. Reference has been made to freedom of association and Quebec unions. On these issues, it is always the test of reasonableness that will be applied, and I have tried to show earlier that the Canadian courts would probably implement, given their history and their jurisprudence, clearly stated wishes expressed in political circles. There is a whole list of them, but finally, Mr. Speaker, if you consider all those rights that could be affected, that is in a first group, you can already see that the Quebec charter of rights enshrines such a right and that the Canadian charter of rights only gives them a new dimension. Already it is at the provincial level, and then actually, where there is absolutely no problem in allowing Quebec citizens to bring the issue before the courts, the law concerned could eventually be challenged before the courts, but it will be the test of reasonableness that will be applied, given the well-known conservatism of the courts.

The second provision of the charter on which I wish to dwell for a moment is that which deals with federal-provincial conferences and those two scheduled in the two coming years. Earlier, I dealt with this matter at the beginning of my speech. I would simply like to say how important and even essential it is for Canada to review these institutions, and this, on a priority basis. I was shocked and disappointed by the government's about-face on the old Clause 44 of the Senate resolution. Hon. members will remember that under such Clause 44 the Senate would have been given six month suspensive veto on constitutional matters. That provision has now been deleted from Clause 44, and the Senate is now the only Canadian body to hold an absolute veto, at least in theory, on any constitutional amendment. Any other deadlock can be broken one way or another, either by a referendum, through agreements on by a group of provinces. But if by any chance the Senate decided that some provision, some constitutional amendment agreed upon by all partners were not acceptable to them, they are the only body under the Constitution to wield that absolute veto.

Knowing the doubtful legitimacy, to say the least, of that institution in terms of representation, I feel strongly enough about this to state it is odious. And I must suggest that on that provision I would welcome an amendment to reintroduce Clause 44 if I could not do it myself, and also I would hope that in the near future we either withdraw that veto or reform the Senate into a house of the federation, a council of the federation or a house of the provinces, or any other form proposed by either the province or various groups, to ensure better representation in the upper chamber, at the regional level and at the legitimacy level.

Concerning the amendment procedure, my colleague from Montmorency-Orléans studied the question. In my view the basic question is that the Victoria charter enshrines a perpetual Quebec veto, and I must indicate on this matter that I have a rather regional approach. Despite submission by the Quebec government that there exists in any case a convention under which no constitutional amendment can be approved without Quebec's agreement, there is no such obligation either in fact, in practice, in law or in our books. Under the Victoria charter it would finally exist. I need not remind my colleagues, Mr. Speaker, that for Quebec this is vital, considering that famous difference referred to on language, cultural and other levels, to have at least on these questions—and eventually some veto might be considered for those matters only, but this is another story—to have a final veto as I said on any amendment depriving it in effect of the tools needed to promote its own difference at the cultural and language levels.

Further, I understand very well the frustration of some of my colleagues from other provinces that do not have that veto. In that respect, the Victoria formula is not perfect. But the alternative is a consensus, some other type of formula. In any event, the provinces—and this in my view ultimately justifies the proposed amending formula—will have two years to agree among themselves on an acceptable formula. I listened with interest the proposal made by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) in his contribution. He was then advocating a regrouping based on population rather than a regrouping on a regional basis. A group of provinces which would account for 25 per cent of the population anywhere in Canada would then have a veto right. I must admit that I very much agree with this formula, which is in my opinion a better arrangement than the one suggested here which has a purely regional basis. Let me give you one simple example, Mr. Speaker. Let us assume that Newfoundland has jurisdictional problems concerning its offshore resources, would it not be logical for this province to join in a common front with Alberta and Saskatchewan, for instance? On the other hand, British Columbia, faced with fishing problems, could join in with New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

In summary, regional considerations are sometimes artificial. I like the formula put forward by the hon. member for Edmonton East. With respect to the referendum, I believe, or the deadlock-breaking mechanism, again I shall be voting against amendment put forward by the Progressive Conservative Party. Why? Because I believe there must be some kind of constitutional deadlock-breaking process. Besides, I would certainly agree to give all the provinces an equal right to resort to the referendum process should there develop a deadlock. In fact, as you know it, Mr. Speaker, insincerity knows no such preferences that it should always be on the same side.

I am about to conclude, Mr. Speaker. At the very beginning of my speech, I referred to the Pascalian wager; that is, whether unilateral action on the one hand and the temporary consecration of this seniority federalism on the other hand were justified in the present situation. As far as I am concerned, the Pascalian wager goes along the following lines: Should I vote againts it, or in other words, should this resolution be defeated in the House, we shall be going back to the September conference, to the failure of constitutional talks, and being a realistic man, I do not agree with those who say that the exercise can be started afresh. The bona fide commitment which followed the Quebec referendum did not succeed in overcoming these problems, in bringing about a consensus. I do not see how we could succeed now. On the other hand, this constitutional bid for power, Mr. Speaker, can lead to either one of two things: either it fails and the bitterness created by this proposal would therefore put us right back to square one. And then, we will have as well a failure on our hands. So, and that is my contention, Mr. Speaker, this "coup de force", will bring about a change. How will that be effected? Within two years, we will have an amending formula which will be either good or bad, but that is not the point. The point is that we will have an amending formula which can be used to improve things. By then, we will have the will to use that new tool to make changes be it only to react against the negative attitude of some people about the content of the formula. This is my view, Mr. Speaker, I have no other choice.

My colleague from Montmorency-Orléans said that he would rather have the status quo than the resolution. I say that this resolution is better than the status quo and that is why, in spite of very serious reservations, I will vote for it. In closing, I would like to add a few comments about Clause 133. I know that some hon. members from Ontario on this side of the House have serious reservations about the lack of a provision in the resolution, making 133 applicable to and enforceable in their province.

It is to be hoped, Mr. Speaker, that the election soon to be held in that province will give those on the provincial political scene a more generous view of the voters they wish to win over, and that they will not resort to hiding behind a hypothetical backlash for the purpose of discarding their responsibilities. In this regard, I congratulate Mr. Hatfield for his action, which I believe to be such that it will contribute to the progress of the constitutional debate. Mr. Speaker, I shall close with a quotation. As you know, the Quebec members of this House have been accused by their fellow Quebecers of being traitors. As much as I accept such criticisms—somewhat like an artist will accept any criticism, whether good or bad—I still find them hurtful and painful. I therefore want to close by quoting from remarks made by the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) on October 21, 1980, as reported on page 3892 of Hansard:

> Compromise, said the late Hon. Guy Favreau, is "the meeting point between the thoughts of two intelligent beings". As John Kennedy wrote in "Profiles in Courage":

Compromise does not mean cowardice. Indeed, it is frequently the compromisers and conciliators who are faced with the severest tests of political courage as they oppose the extremist views.

The content of the resolution before us is a compromise between those who wanted more and those who wanted less and those who wanted both more and less. It may not fully satisfy every one of us—or any one of us for that matter—but it should be accepted, in my view, by the greatest number of people as a first step.

I have learned throughout the years that to compromise with others, one must first compromise with himself. I cannot ask others to give if I remain ungiving in my own first choices of means toward an end which I share with others.

So, I am compromising, as I should.

[English]

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, like hon. members who have spoken before me, I am pleased, proud and even a bit humble about participating in this debate. I suppose my main worry is that at this point almost everything has been said and most of the substantive points have been addressed by those who have gone before me. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I feel I can offer some new points of view and perhaps reinforce some that have been expressed by my colleagues.

I share the concern expressed by many about why we are doing this now, why are we spending so much of the very important and very limited time of the House and its members in debating the Constitution when there are so many other issues critical to the well-being of the country. I think of our beleaguered economy, our disgracefully high unemployment and our energy situation, among others.

From the replies to questionnaires that I sent out in my constituency, it is clear that the issue of most concern is none of the foregoing, and it is certainly not the Constitution. As a matter of information, it is the threat posed by the Garrison diversion project in North Dakota.

In the first caucus meeting of our party after the constitutional proposal was presented last October, I argued the point that the government was using this issue as a whitewash in order to divert attention from the fact that it had no answers for the more important and more immediate concerns of Canadians. Since neither I nor my party call the shots in this House, we had to play the constitutional game. I do not think I need point out just how outstanding many of my caucus colleagues were at playing this game. The package before us today is vastly superior to that which was presented last October. In no small part that is due to the fine work done by my colleagues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sargeant: Before I address the substance of this package I should like to put some of my background thoughts on record. As a springboard into this dissertation, I should like to quote the final sentence of the speech given in this debate by my friend, the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar). He said: "Only together can we build a great nation."

What are we doing when we construct a constitution, Mr. Speaker? The Oxford Dictionary defines a constitution as a body of fundamental principles according to which a state is governed. That is a little bland. A constitution is, or should be, a body of principles upon which we build a nation. The BNA Act of 1867 was such a document. So was the American constitution of some 200 years ago. Will this document of 1981 be the same? I think the answer is both yes and no, the difference lying in what kind of nation we want to build.

Permit me to digress a little, Mr. Speaker. At the turn of the century, the prime minister of the day, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whom I considered to have been not a bad sort even though he was a Liberal, said that the twentieth century would belong to Canada. And well it should have and could have, Mr. Speaker, had it not been squandered by successive Liberal and Tory governments. These Liberal and Tory governments allowed our natural resources and our industrial complex, our very economic well-being, to be pillaged by non-Canadian interests to the point where today we are the most foreign controlled of the so-called western economies.

My vision of what Canada should and could be is very different from what Liberal and Tory governments have made of this country.

Let me take you back to 1967, the year of our centennial as a nation. I graduated from university that year, the first class of the post war boom babies to do so. We were in the ascendancy. At about that time, those of us under 25 made up about half of the population of North America. We marched to the drum of the new left, seeing this as the natural evolution of the world our forebearers had built and our parents had fought to preserve. We recognized the incredible potential of Canada and planned to be part of the development of that potential. If the first 67 years of this century had not really belonged to Canada, nobody could have convinced me or my peers in 1967, that the next 67 years would not belong to us.

As well, 1967 was a year of nationalistic fervour. We put our country on display to the world and the world gave its approval. I recall all too well making the trek from Winnipeg to Montreal on two different occasions, once by thumb, once by car, to see Expo. I remember my pride at singing O Canada in the middle of the evening in a then popular bar on St. Catherines Street. Everyone in the place put down his beer, stood up, and joined in the singing. It was great to be a Canadian that summer. We had common bonds. We visited our brothers and sisters across the land, getting to know and appreciate the differences in our lands. And we had the future by the tail. Canada would finally claim the twentieth century as its own.

All this while, I was not even a Canadian citizen. Even though I had lived here all but the first year of my life and knew no other place, I had been born in Australia, and although a Canadian in fact, I was not by law. That changed in the spring of 1968 when I swore allegiance to this country.

It was in these years of the late 1960s that I started to develop my vision of Canada. At that time, the then prime minister, Mike Pearson, just before he left office, started a new round of constitutional reassessment, another move to repatriate the BNA Act. This round started by Pearson is just now reaching its culmination.

I mentioned earlier that my vision of Canada is vastly different from that which has been created by our inept governments of the last century. In the same manner, my vision of the ideal constitution is equally different.

I also said earlier that a constitution should be a document upon which to build a nation. I do not see any evidence in this document for building the kind of Canada I would like to see. I should qualify that and say that I do not see enough evidence in this document for building the kind of Canada I would like to see.

There are some historically important measures in it. I refer specifically to the provisions for equalization, to the bill of rights and its guarantee of rights to women, to the handicapped, to multicultural groups among others, to the recognition of the duality of this country, and to the recognition of aboriginal rights. I consider these to be major points. And for these important reasons I will support this package. But at the same time, it is still a capital "L" Liberal document. I for one do not want to build a capital "L" Liberal Canada. Were I drafting a constitution for Canada, I would reflect more the philosophy of Thomas More than that of Machiavelli.

I would include all of the specific points I just mentioned. But rather than institutionalizing a nation built on laissez-faire capitalism, I would want to be able to build a nation based on egalitarianism. Canada has that potential.

Consider the size of our country. Consider the incredible wealth we have here in minerals, oil and gas, forestry and human resources. There is no reason why in a land such as Canada one particular man should be able to cover his driveway in crushed meteorite because it is not dusty while another man, such as one man in my riding, lives in an underground hovel covered with logs and earth. You can bet that is dusty. There is no reason why Indians in northwestern Ontario should be forced to live on mercury-polluted fish, or why a man is forced to sleep on the streets in Vancouver. In Canada, there is simply no excuse for this.

In constructing the Constitution now, we are laying the foundation for building the Canada of the future. I still believe in the potential of Canada that I had in mind in the 1960s. I believe that we can and must build that kind of nation. The question remains whether this Constitution gives us a good enough foundation to do that. I think it goes only part way.

I have serious reservations about the process we have all been following in this particular act of constitutional construction. I do not refer necessarily to unilateral action. While on the one hand I might have preferred an approach that was not unilateral, I can accept, intellectually, the need and the legitimacy for such unilateral action. I will return to this point in a few moments.

In the opening of his comments, my friend, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) said:

> I have listened to many points of view, and I have found it sometimes difficult to determine exactly how much of what is being said is real, how much is partisan, how much is misinformation. I assume it is all said honestly—

I agree with his sentiments up to the last point. I cannot assume it is all said honestly.

If all of us in this process had been dealing honestly, we would not have the conflicts and divisions that we see today. If what we all said had been real, non-partisan and informed, we would be much closer to agreement than we are today. I speak not only of the members of this House but also of members of the Senate, members of the provincial legislatures and of the many academics, journalists and others who have offered their thoughts on the subject.

In this House, I have seen members of the party to my right act in what I consider to be only partisan interests. Out of the House, I need only refer to the ads placed in newspapers throughout the country by the Conservative Party pandering to the prejudices of many.

I have seen the government members opposite act in what I consider to be nothing more than self-serving cynicism. To me the need for including guarantees of rights for women, the handicapped and natives should have been self-evident, not just so hon. members could secure a few more votes.

I have seen some members of the Senate—a body which, as constituted at present, I consider to be unjust and perverse—balk because their already unjustified power was to be slightly reduced. I have seen provincial premiers act purely in self-interest, not in the interest of the country as a whole. One is reminded of Mark Antony's address to the Romans. In part it read:

> They that have done this deed are honourable:
> What private griefs they have, alas, I know not,
> That made them do it: they are wise and honourable,
> And will, no doubt, with reasons answer you.

We know full well that Brutus, Cassius and Casca were not honourable men. I fear that a more fitting epithet for many of us involved in this process might be in the last lines of the same speech when Mark Antony says:

> Now let it work. Mischief, thou art afoot,
> Take thou what course thou wilt!

In recent years, and more so in recent months, we have heard much of western alienation. Let us not kid ourselves, it does exist. While I cannot subscribe to the methods used by many western Tories and by many western oil interests in their approach to the matter, as a westerner, I know full well that this alienation must be addressed very soon. The address cannot be made only in economic terms. It must be made in terms of the distribution of power and, more important, in terms of attitude.

For example, in 1867 and 1870, just after lands which are now the prairie provinces were bought from the Hudson's Bay Company, Louis Riel, the Metis, and the Scottish settlers at Red River were forced to take action in self-preservation when an influx of Upper Canadians felt that since they had bought the territory, they could take over the properties of those who had lived there for half a century and more. That was example number one. This plundering has continued for more than a century. It must stop now if we are to build the nation of the next century which many of us envisage. This Constitution could have addressed this situation much better. What this constitutional process of 1980 and 1981 needs is some visionaries.

I find it ironic that in his introduction of President Reagan in this House on Wednesday, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spoke of the Polish people using both revolution and evolution in working out their own destiny, the irony being that his own document for Canada's destiny contains nothing revolutionary and not enough that is evolutionary at a time when Canada cries out for a creative, peaceful revolution. It is basically a dull document.

In 1981, Canada needs the vision of men like John A. Macdonald, George Etienne Cartier or George Brown, or for that matter Thomas Jefferson or George Washington. With all due respect to the excellent and hard work that many members of this House put into our Constitution of 1981, I have seen but one person whom I consider to have vision in the process of nation building. I am referring to my friend, the hon. member for Nunatsiaq who has the decided advantage of representing an entire race, the Canadian Inuit who will now be able to participate fully in building their own place in the Canadian nation.

Had the government been adventurous and adopted a daring visionary approach in drafting this Constitution, Canada would have been much better served.

In these few opening comments I have tried to outline briefly my vision of Canada and my reservations about the ability of this Constitution to allow us to attain that vision. I have said that I would have liked to have seen a much different type of package. But I recognize that my desire is limited by the fact that this is a Liberal document. I also recognize that it is a document which has been improved greatly by the work of many opposition members and of many Canadian individuals and groups who participated in the process.

Let me say at this point that I have long believed in the need for our country to have its own Constitution. Since my childhood I have been interested in politics. As a youngster in elementary school I knew that Canada did not have a Constitution. I certainly did not understand the full ramifications of what a Constitution meant, but I knew that we would be better off with our own Constitution. I well remember in my third year political science course reading about such things as JCPC and learning that until 1949 the ultimate court in Canada was not even in our country, that it was a judicial council of the Privy Council of England. I wondered why this was the case.

I am quite receptive to the idea and I favour patriation as soon as possible. It is for this reason that, although I recognize the many limitations of this package, I also recognize its many strengths. I will, therefore, support it.

I should like now to address a few comments to those strengths. First, I want to comment on the matter of unilateral action. I mentioned earlier that intellectually I can support both the need and legitimacy for such action. I also mentioned that I would have liked to have seen a broader base of support. I do not think there is any argument on that point. All of us would like to have seen the premiers and the Tories support the package. But I cannot support a need for unanimity. So long as the premiers insisted on unanimity, the prospects of ever patriating the Constitution were hopeless. To suggest at this time that we go back to the provinces to make one more try for such unanimity is to dream in technicolour. I certainly cannot agree with the premier of my province, a person of whom I have not been especially proud throughout this process who, during his speech in London, was asked by a British Labour MP if the requirement for unanimous consent by 11 governments is not somewhat exaggerated. This Labour MP asked where in the world there is a federal system that requires unanimous agreement. According to press reports, Premier Lyon replied, "The answer to that question is, in Canada". I find it rather amusing that the party of John A. Macdonald, the Progressive Conservative Party at both the provincial and federal level, should be screaming and weeping for unanimity.

The party to my right is using its weapons, rather dubious poll results, which might indicate the majority of Canadians are against patriation. If old Sir John A. had used that approach, if he had waited for unanimity among the colonies and had asked for a popular mandate, where would we be today? I will tell you one thing: we very likely would not be living in a country called Canada as we know it. I refer hon. members to an article in the Winnipeg Free Press of February 13 of this year written by a former history teacher of mine, named Lovell Clark of the University of Manitoba. I quote some passages from it:

> If Premier Lyon's requirement of unanimity had prevailed in the past the Dominion of Canada would certainly not have been created in 1867, and if not then, perhaps never—
> Anyone who knows anything about the crucial events from 1864 to 1867 which culminated in the creation of Canada realizes that the movement for union of the colonies was not a mass or popular movement. It was rather the work of a creative minority whom we refer to as the Fathers of Confederation. At Quebec City in October, 1864, the Fathers drew up the seventy-two resolutions which, with little change, became the British North America Act of 1867. It was very much a Canadian document.
> The Quebec Resolutions were not the result of a compact among provincial governments, as is often erroneously alleged. To begin with, the provinces of Quebec and Ontario did not exist; they were created by the same act that created the Dominion of Canada. Instead, there was the single colony of Canada, a union of Upper and Lower Canada formed in 1841. The maritime colonies were represented by members from both the government and opposition benches of their legislatures.
> It was no part of the intentions of the Fathers to submit the Quebec resolutions to the people for approval. If they had done so there is little doubt that the proposals for union would have been soundly defeated. The resolutions were debated and approved by the legislature of Canada, but they were never even laid before the legislatures of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.
> In New Brunswick the government of Premier Leonard Tilley was forced into an election on the issue and was badly beaten. An anti-Confederate government replaced it. Thus the people of New Brunswick were the only ones ever consulted about the confederation proposals and they left no doubt of their opposition. Premier Charles Tupper of Nova Scotia did not dare to lay the resolutions before the legislature, so unpopular were they—

What finally brought about the creation of the Dominion of Canada was the perseverance of the Fathers of Confederation and external pressures from the United States and Britain.

War was imminent with the United States because of the northern states feeling their oats, having defeated the south, and because of the Irish-American Fenians. The article continues:

The role of the British government was of decisive importance in the achievement of confederation. Union would better enable the colonies to defend themselves . . . Publicly, the British government made widely known to maritimers its "strong and deliberate opinion" that union of the colonies was "an object much to be desired."

Privately, the lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick was told in no uncertain terms that he was to work zealously to promote confederation. This he proceeded to do, taking advantage of the Fenian menace in the spring of 1866 to turn the anti-Confederate government out of office by means that were of dubious constitutionality. In the ensuing elections the pro-confederation forces were returned to office, but not on the issue of confederation.

The lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia, who had opposed confederation, was replaced by a Nova Scotian hero of the Crimean War with instructions to vigorously promote it. By these and other means, the reluctant maritimers were dragged into the union.

It was only after the passage of the British North American Act through the British Parliament in March 1867 and the creation of the Dominion of Canada on July 1, that the Fathers submitted their handiwork to the judgment of the people. In the elections for the first Parliament of Canada the confederation coalition, now headed by Sir John A. Macdonald, won a majority in Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick, but was disastrously defeated in Nova Scotia . . .

The premier of Nova Scotia, William Annand, and Joseph Howe led a delegation of provincial and federal representatives to London to demand that the British government "release them from the toils of confederation into which they had been dragged against their will", which of course was clearly the case . . . the British government absolutely declined to allow Nova Scotia out of confederation.

I would like to ask any of the members to my right whether they think that confederation was such a bad deal, the confederation that was brought about without the kind of unanimity for which they ask for. I would like to say to my friends on the right "I'm sorry, you may be right to want a broader base of support, but you are not right in insisting that we must have unanimity."

While I much prefer old John A. to the person who fills that seat today, John A. was just as bad at ramming things down folks' throats.

I should like now to turn my comments to some of the other points in this package. I would like to comment on the amending formula, the so-called Victoria formula. On balance, I suppose it is as good as any of the formulas for amending the Constitution that have been put forward. I can agree with the notion that we divide the country into four regions and have a veto and a particular vote on future amendments, but there is one point that I find troubling. As a westerner, it puzzles me a bit. I must point out that this is probably the main complaint I am getting from constituents in my riding. It refers to the fact that in the western region we still have the requirement that two provinces representing 50 per cent of the population have to agree to future amendments, whereas in the maritime sector this is not the case.

This was changed to accommodate Prince Edward Island. The people in my province and the people of Saskatchewan wonder why this same accommodation cannot be made for Manitoba and Saskatchewan. It is a small point. I have been told that the reason the maritime provinces got this concession was that their premiers requested it and the reason the western region did not get it was that the premiers of the western provinces did not request it.

This is not constitution-making; this is political gamesmanship. It is a small point that reinforces my earlier point about western alienation. If this government really wants to address western alienation, they should look at these very small points. It would not take very much to give the same concession to the western region with regard to the 50 per cent population rule.

I must point out that I find very distasteful the Conservative approach to this question. They recognize it is a bit of a problem, but to print ads in newspapers across western Canada which, as I mentioned earlier, really pander to the prejudices that try to create a hatred among westerners for central Canadians is simply not a way in which I would like to build the future of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That accusation is not so, and you know it.

Mr. Sargeant: Read this. I should like now to make some comments on the equalization and the provincial resources parts of this Constitution. I will only say a few words because others in this caucus have addressed this issue and we are all in agreement on it. I consider both of these to be very important issues. They are very important steps that can be used to build this nation which I envision.

The resource amendment will allow the provinces to consolidate their base, to use their non-renewable resources as a base upon which to build a secure and diversified economic structure. The equalization formula is one that is very important to this party as a democratic socialist party, where rich parts of the country assist the poorer parts.

There are no arguments that some provinces are wealthier than others. For this reason we believe in the constitutionalizing of the concept of equalization. We consider it to be a major step at this time. In the type of Canada of which I spoke earlier, the need for such entrenchment would be irrelevant. Once Canada becomes the truly egalitarian state that I visualize, equitable distribution of wealth will be a matter of course. May I call it four o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being four o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, as listed on today's Order Paper, namely public bills, notices of motions, private bills.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING MOVEMENT OF WESTERN GRAIN

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West) moved that Bill C-266, to amend the Railway Act (movement of Western Grain) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on a bill on which I have been working since November, 1978, at a time when the Canadian grain economy and the grain transportation system were facing a serious crisis. The lack of freight cars and poor performance by the railway companies was costing the farmers and the Canadian economy hundreds of millions of dollars in lost grain sales.

The record of the Canadian Transport Commission in regulating the grain transportation system is, in my opinion, abysmal. It had the power to end the back hauls on Canadian National and Canadian Pacific between Calgary and Edmonton years ago. It had the power to require the railways to interchange traffic for Churchill and Prince Rupert years ago. It has had the power, under Section 262 of the Railway Act, to require the railways to provide rolling stock and locomotives to ship farmers' grain. However, the Canadian Transport Commission has done nothing about making the railways live up to their statutory requirements to carry all traffic offered for carriage. I submit that the people of western Canada have little faith in the Canadian Transport Commission when it comes to grain movement, albeit it has now established a western Canadian office.

Some time ago, in fact in February, 1979, I initiated an application to the Canadian Transport Commission asking it to hold public hearings in western Canada to determine if the railways were giving grain transportation suitable priority, as required by law. I made the application then but no hearings were held, while the grain crisis at that time continued to cost the people of western Canada a lot of money. On April 24, 1980, the Canadian Transport Commission answered my application by saying that the purchase of hopper cars by the provinces and the federal government relieved the railways of their responsibilities. The Railway Act says in Section 262 that they shall offer suitable accommodation for all traffic. The CTC decided that someone else, namely, the provinces and the federal government, not the railways, should fulfil an obligation which, under the law, belongs to the railways.

I do not accuse the CTC of bad intentions, but it has been unable to understand the problems facing grain transportation. The Canadian Wheat Board has the advantage of being right on the spot, right on top of things, and knowing where grain sales are being lost and where backlogs occur. It knows where the grain is.

Since the CTC has said it will not deal with or regulate the railway companies in respect of grain movement because there is public investment in the hopper cars, there is now a regulatory vacuum which has to be filled. I suggest the Canadian Wheat Board is the logical candidate.

Actually, the idea for Bill C-266 came from a recommendation of the Hall commission. Mr. Justice Hall recommended, as appears at pages 538 and 539 of his report:

> Throughout the hearings there was almost universal support for the Canadian Wheat Board . . . there is no doubt that the board is accepted as the producers' friend.

Again to quote Mr. Justice Hall:

> The commission recommends that the Canadian Wheat Board play a more prominent role in the total co-ordination of grain transportation. Grain movement co-ordinators at Vancouver and Thunder Bay should become Canadian Wheat Board employees and be given extended powers over the ordering and placement of grain cars destined for those port areas.

I welcomed the creation of an over-all grain transport co-ordinator by the former Minister of Transport, my friend the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), but I disagree with the creation of that position outside the Canadian Wheat Board. The Hall report said it should be part of the Canadian Wheat Board.

There are obvious reasons why the Hall commission recommended the Wheat Board be given control of grain cars and co-ordination. When the board is negotiating a sale, it will have first-hand knowledge and control of the transportation in order to maximize returns to the producers. The board can co-ordinate marketing objectives with ship arrivals and rail movements, and the board knows where the grain is and where it must go.

What does my bill do, Mr. Speaker? It has two aspects. It gives the Wheat Board the power to require railway companies to supply locomotives and rolling stock for grain movement. It updates a section of the Railway Act regulating grain movement.

Back when the act was originally written, most grain went to Thunder Bay, so this section 266 applied only to Thunder Bay. My bill, C-266, would extend the regulatory power to Vancouver, Prince Rupert and Churchill and it does not affect Section 262, the general accommodation section. It is pure coincidence that my bill has the same number as the section, Mr. Speaker.

My bill deals specifically with grain movement. The power in this section of the Railway Act has not been used frequently. In fact, in 1916, the Board of Transport Commissioners required the Canadian Northern to supply 1,200 cars and 36 locomotives to carry grain from the Goose Lake district to the Grand Trunk Pacific at Saskatoon, and required the Grand Trunk to haul the grain from Saskatoon to the Lakehead. I am not aware that the section has ever been used since.

By updating the section to include all ports, and by engaging the activities of the Canadian Wheat Board, this section could be used in any future grain crisis with positive effect.

The most recent crop year saw an improvement in grain movement because of the additional hopper cars provided, not by the railroads but by the taxpayers. If, as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) indicated, the CNR or CP started rationing transportation capacity to blackmail the people of western Canada, the Canadian Wheat Board under the provisions of my bill could step in with this new section to stop any such nonsense.

I want to give a couple of reasons why I believe my colleagues in this chamber should support this bill. It has two parts, first it gives the Canadian Wheat Board power to co-ordinate grain transportation as recommended by the Hall royal commission, and, second, it updates the section of the Railway Act dealing specifically with grain movement to include Churchill, Prince Rupert and Vancouver as well as the Lakehead.

Now, even if some hon. members cannot agree with all parts of this bill, I would ask them not to talk out the bill but to let it go to the committee on Transport where we can find common ground and at least make some changes to which a majority of the committee, if not all, can agree.

While transportation of grain by rail is relatively smooth at the moment, this new section can deal with new problems that will undoubtedly come up as the railways scrap more of their rolling stock or go on strike against the statutory grain rates. This section could have prevented the Churchill shipping season foul-up in 1980 when the railways refused to interchange traffic until it was too late.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government and official opposition will agree that this matter needs to be pursued further in committee and by the government, and that the kind of powers not presently enforced by the CTC when it comes to grain movement should be transferred to the Canadian Wheat Board and be extended, not only to Thunder Bay, but to the ports of Vancouver, Churchill and Prince Rupert.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I want to lend my support to this bill, and while I have some reservations about everything that the Canadian Wheat Board is doing today, I like this motion, provided it does not interfere with the work of the grain co-ordinator. If responsibility is divided, it will be difficult to put your finger on anyone when the system breaks down. Someone has to have the over-all responsibility and, as I understand the work of the transportation co-ordinator, he should be co-ordinating the work of the CTC, Canadian Wheat Board, pool elevators and the railways in order to service the farmers.

Under the present act, the authority of the company is limited. The CTC has the authority to order the railways at a certain time of year, as follows:

—after the close of navigation on the Great Lakes and before the next harvest, and grain in certain sections or districts cannot by reason thereof be marketed—

That provision does not appear in the amendment, and I agree with that.

If the CTC is to have certain authority, then it should have it throughout the entire grain-moving season, not just when certain things break down. So the amendment is far more wide-sweeping and is designed to move the grain which is something to which we have to direct our thoughts, programs and administration very much more than we have been doing.

I would like to suggest to the government that one of the major concerns of people in the west is this apparent lack of interest in moving their grain. Every year we have bottlenecks and problems. Any ordinary business has to have a cash flow, and that includes farmers. They have to have cash coming in to keep operating. When they have a quota today and the elevator is jammed, the grain is not moving, they have to find other ways, because they do not have a payday every two weeks or every month on the farm, particulary grain farmers. This problem is very frustrating, not only for the farmer but for his family.

Recently I held a meeting in the Lomond district of my riding where close to 100 farmers appeared. The elevators there were jammed full and the farmers could not deliver their quotas, so in order to get the cash flow they had to haul it to another elevator where there were cars but no grain. Surely that is a matter of co-ordination.

If there are cars at Cluny and no grain, and the reverse at Lomond, it does not seem very difficult for someone to co-ordinate that and avoid putting the farmer to the expense of hauling his grain an additional ten, 20, 30 or 40 miles. It is pretty frustrating for these farmers.

So I arranged a meeting as I felt the authorities should know what was going on. The farmers were not going to be abusive; they just wanted to move their grain. I invited representatives of the Wheat Board, the CPR, the grain co-ordinator, representatives of the wheat pools and the Departments of Transport and Agriculture. The federal and provincial Ministers of Agriculture and the federal Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) took an excellent view of this. At this meeting the farmers were able to get some information and the authorities were told of the farmers' concerns.

What most annoyed me, however, was the fact that the Canadian Wheat Board was the only one to refuse to send a representative. They took the attitude that they held meetings when they wanted to and there was going to be a meeting in the Vulcan area, 50 kilometres away, the following week, so they would not bother attending this meeting. The ministers found time to have someone there, as did the CPR. The deputy co-ordinator was there. I was very disappointed in the Canadian Wheat Board. Surely this organization, created by the farmers, should have been the first one to say: yes, we want to know what the problems are. But no, a second invitation to Senator Argue and the Canadian Wheat Board met with refusal. They would not come to hear about the problems. I do not think that attitude is what the farmers want from the Canadian Wheat Board. In the beginning, the Canadian Wheat Board was created by the western farmers in order to solve problems, to move their grain and to give them the best possible price. As the hon. member noted, the Canadian Wheat Board still has tremendous support from Mr. Justice Hall whose opinion I value. He said that there is almost universal support for the Canadian Wheat Board. In the minds of many farmers, however, the Canadian Wheat Board is becoming too big. If it becomes a monopoly created by farmers, it is just as bad as a monopoly which is not created by farmers. I think there must be some change of thinking on the part of the Canadian Wheat Board very soon. It should realize that it should be securing and reflecting the thinking of the greatest possible number of farmers. It has a tremendous job to do. In my opinion, the closer the board is to farmers and the grass roots, the better job it will do.

The meeting was held, and some of the difficulties were resolved. The CPR gave some suggestions which were accepted by the farmers. With respect to the Cranbrook situation there were two very cold wintry weeks spent in the mountains in December. During the two weeks of the setting of the date and the meeting, a tremendous amount of grain was moved from the elevators at Lomond. The farmers started to get a little cash in their pockets. In my view, that co-ordination could have been done without the necessity of calling a meeting, but I was thankful it was done and is still going on.

There are other difficulties, including the rebuilding of the road from Milo to Lomond, which is an important factor, so that full loads can be hauled with hopper cars. This will be important.

In view of all the money which will be spent to rehabilitate, I urge that the line to which I have referred be considered along with the other two lines for which allotments have been made for 1981.

The grain which can be hauled from various places must be co-ordinated. There are elevators, different types of grain and different grades, and in my view a co-ordinator has a very important job.

Another reason I support this bill is that it mentions Churchill and Prince Rupert. I have not been to Churchill, but according to the information I have secured from farmers and through reading, there are times when Churchill could carry a much larger volume of grain. We should be using Churchill to a much greater degree than we are, particularly those who are within reasonable distances. I refer to Saskatchewan, perhaps Manitoba and some parts of Alberta. But where that access is closer, we should not be routing grain to Thunder Bay or Vancouver if it can go to Churchill and get into the markets of the world.

The Canadian Transport Commission has an important role to play in the movement of grain. It has been letting farmers down to a considerable degree by not taking a very active and alert interest in the movement of grain all the time, and not just when matters are at issue. There is also a role for the co-ordinator to play. The legislation under which the CTC works is important. I think the important change this bill would make would be to give the CTC a little more authority. If this authority were to hamper in any way the work of the co-ordinator, that could be discussed in committee and worked out.

By having members of this House from all sides who are knowledgeable in grain matters discuss them and work out a program, we might be able to do something really splendid for the movement of western grain. That is the object the hon. member had in submitting this bill.

If we could move more bushels of grain and get more cash flow into the pockets of farmers and producers, the better this country would become. There is a saying in the west that when farmers are poor, everybody is poor; when farmers are having hard times, everyone in the community is having a hard time. A farmer spends his money when he has it. He buys clothes for his wife and children; he buys cars; he buys trucks. He spreads his money around, and it circulates. When he does not have money, many businesses feel that depression as well.

I urge hon. members on the government side of the House to support this bill and send it to committee. There is nothing to be lost, and there is a tremendous amount to be gained by finding new and better ways to move grain in western Canada.

Mr. Maurice Bossy (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I may not be a western farmer, but I have been in the farm business all my life. I believe I understand the needs of the western farmer and the many representations which have been made concerning transportation of grain in the west.

One of the great qualities possessed by the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) is persistence. He never gives up, I understand, and with incredible determination he continues to find new and strange ways to gain greater control over the operations of the railways.

Bill C-266 is a perfect example of this persistence. Curiously enough, it turns out to be an amendment to Section 266 of the Railway Act. Section 266, as it now stands, gives the Canadian Transport Commission the power to direct the railways to move grain east after the seaway is closed and before the next harvest. This is quite a specific power.

As I see it, Bill C-266 would do two things. It would transfer that power to the Canadian Wheat Board, it would extend the scope of the section to cover grain movement throughout the year, and include movements to Vancouver, Prince Rupert and the port of Churchill. In essence, the section would apply to all western grain movement.

There are some other less significant changes proposed in this bill. For example, the hon. member wants the Canadian Wheat Board to be able to tell the railways to supply "the necessary cars and engines" as well as "furnish all facilities within its power". To me, this seems a bit redundant, but it is not something on which I want to dwell.

I suppose the question we must ask is why we need the amendments. Is the Canadian Wheat Board better suited than the CTC to tell the railways how to allocate this equipment? By suggesting these amendments, the hon. member implies that there is a need to exercise this power over the railways. Is there?

The other question is why we should broaden this section to cover all western grain. I grant that the hon. member has a point. One could legitimately ask: if we will have power over the railways on grain movement, why restrict it to the eastern movement for only part of the year? I suppose there are historic reasons why Section 266 of the act is the way it is. But given the principle that we will tell the railways what to do in relation to grain movement, one might as well give oneself full powers. It is this very principle about which the hon. member is so persistent. He never misses an opportunity to let out the battle cry of his party to nationalize the CPR.

Not long ago, the National Farmers' Union was in town. It wanted the government to nationalize fully both the CPR and CNR and to run them as public utilities. At that time I did not notice the hon. member for Regina West in the vicinity. Perhaps he recognizes that there is a problem with this approach, but he still calls for greater control over the railways.

Approximately two years ago, I understand, the hon. member tried another tack. He applied to the CTC for an investigation of whether the railways were violating Section 262 of the Railway Act in relation to grain movement. This section is very relevant to this discussion because it indicates that, in general, the railways must provide suitable accommodation for the loading, carrying, unloading and delivery of all traffic offered for carriage. If they do not, the CTC can order them to do so. By all appearances, it is a sweeping power which applies to all commodities and, hence, to grain.

At the time Section 262 was tested in the Supreme Court of Canada in 1959, unfortunately for the hon. member, the Supreme Court ruled that the section did not impose an absolute duty but only a relative one, so far as reasonably possible, for the railways to respond. The court looked at other factors, particularly the financial position of the railways. I hope one of my colleagues will have a chance to go into the relevance of this case in more detail.

The CTC, in its wisdom, rejected the hon. member's application, citing the Supreme Court case and, incidentally, the numerous efforts of the federal and provincial governments to improve the grain transportation system.

Naturally, that did not stop our persistent friend from Regina West. He was back again this session with motion No. 5 on the Order Paper which we debated once and may have the pleasure to debate again.

I have to admit that the hon. member, as well as being persistent, is at least consistent. Motion No. 5 indicates among other things:

—make the railways fix up their tracks and buy hopper cars, and give the Canadian Wheat Board more power to control grain movement.

The message in Bill C-266 is very much the same. It is too bad that it also runs into the same problems.

If I may be permitted a brief comment which is somewhat relevant to this discussion let me say that one might have the impression that the government is determined to block the hon. member's crusade for better service from the railways. This is not so.

A few weeks ago, the hon. member won an appeal to the CTC to retain a particular passenger service in the Sudbury area, and only last week a report from the Standing Committee on Transport dealing with express services was debated. If the hon. member had been here to participate, he would have heard the minister recognize how valid his concerns were regarding express services. He would have heard how the minister insisted on certain conditions being fulfilled before allowing the railway to proceed with its plans. Also he would have heard the minister ask the House to adopt the report, which it has.

So the government is by no means opposed to measures which improve the performance of the railways, as long as they make sense. I submit that the reason the hon. member lost his case under Section 262, the reason he was unable to obtain support for his motion No. 5, and the reason why this bill cannot be accepted is that it does not make sense.

Bill C-266 would transfer the power in question from the CTC to the Wheat Board. How is the Wheat Board equipped to handle the administrative aspects of such a responsibility? The Wheat Board has direct power over three specific grains—wheat, oats and barley. I know one of the hon. member's colleagues would like that power extended, but for the moment it is not.

On the other hand, railways handle hundreds and perhaps thousands of commodities daily. With improved productivity in recent years, rolling stock spends less time in yards and more time on the move. The CTC, with its national network of offices and inspectors, monitors this dynamic system. Of particular relevance to this discussion is that the CTC's newly established western office is widely considered as a valuable addition.

Transferring powers under Section 266 would not exactly emasculate the western CTC; I cannot really claim that. The point I am trying to make is that the Wheat Board really could not make rational decisions in this regard with its present structure. One could argue that the Wheat Board should be endowed with extra staff for this purpose. But does this make sense for a seldom, if ever, used provision?

If the Wheat Board had this power, how could it actually exercise it? Much as my hon. friend wishes this were so, one cannot snap one's fingers and produce the right number of hopper cars and engines at a given place in the country; that is impossible. There is enormous potential for dislocation if some rolling stock is suddenly redirected. While the particular grain transport need might be satisfied, there would, in all likelihood, be delays in other traffic. I would like to hear the reaction the member for Regina West gets when he makes this sort of proposal to the coal, sulphur, or potash producers. These products are equally important to the west.

I will put all partisanship aside and say that when the Tories were in power, they had the right approach to problems of grain movement. They realize, as does this government, that because railways were losing money on the movement of grain, they were not able to invest in the grain transportation system as much as was needed. I suppose the member for Regina West realized that too. After all, he wrote a letter to The Globe and Mail which was published on February 26, which reads:

> An overwhelming majority of western farmers agree that the railways should be compensated for their losses.

But until this takes place—and we hope it will be soon—the solution is not to bully the system through a piece of legislation into doing something of which it is not capable. The solution is co-operation and co-ordination of efforts. The Wheat Board, the grain commission, the grain companies and pools, the producers, and the CTC all have an interest with the railways in moving the grain. This is why the Tories appointed the grain transportation co-ordinator. We think the office has done a good job and that the spirit of co-operation is there.

The best example of what this has achieved is our record export performance last year, which was up 20 per cent from the previous year. This year, unloads at terminals are running 4 per cent to 5 per cent ahead of last year. In fact, the terminal elevators are brimming over and waiting for ships. This sort of picture does not seem to call for Draconian legislation which would upset the distribution of responsibilities between the different parties involved in the system.

Last November there were complaints about country elevators in southern Alberta being clogged. No doubt this is the sort of situation which this bill is expected to address. But would it? As amended, Section 266 would obviously apply, and the Wheat Board would have to decide whether to order the railway, in this case the CPR, to provide equipment. If the CPR did provide the equipment instantly, would that have done any good? The problem, as it turns out, was a labour dispute in Revelstoke to the west, which was affecting not only grain but all commodities. It was not a lack of willingness or any sort of corporate blackmail on the part of the CPR.

In the end, each party acted rationally. The Wheat Board, seeing that the grain was not moving, restricted the delivery quota. It would not have made sense to make farmers drive to a full elevator only to turn back without leaving their load. As an interim measure, the CPR managed to move a considerable amount of the grain east to Thunder Bay until the labour dispute was resolved.

I would venture to say that most problems can be tackled this way, by understanding the situation and capitalizing on the opportunities. Applying a heavy-handed legislative club would not have solved the Revelstoke problem, nor would it solve other similar cases.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, the difficulties which were experienced some years ago, which caused us to lose potential grain exports, have been overcome for the time being. They were not overcome by legislating the operations of the railways; they were overcome by financial assistance by governments but, even more important, by a co-operative attitude and a will to make the system work.

The job is far from finished, if we are to meet the grain export targets we have set for ourselves. But it is the positive and rational attitude which must prevail. I do not think that this bill is a contribution in that direction.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I rise with great pleasure to speak on this bill, which involves a subject that is important not only to the western wheat farmer, as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) has acknowledged, and important not only to the economy of the whole of western Canada, but to the very heart of the economy. That is to say, our agricultural base—our oldest economic base in Canada. This is the reason so many people came from other countries to Canada.

Wheat has been one of our greatest exports. Our fundamental and economic existence would be something vastly different from what we presently find it to be if we did not have a prosperous agricultural community based in western Canada. Therefore, I do not think any of us should underestimate the importance of the subject which we find before us. I say this humbly as one from the east who knows how much all Canadians have benefited from the strength of western agriculture in our country.

The approach we are being asked to adopt by the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) is to take power from the Canada Transport Commission and give it to another regulatory body, the grain commission. I am not sure if this type of meddling through giving the power from one agency to the other will be the solution. I am not even convinced that the member for Bow River, who spoke in support of the bill, is sure that it will be the solution. His comments were to the effect that we should at least refer it to the committee so that we can discuss it further. I think that is a fair representation of what he said. I really do not think that is good enough. We, as responsible legislators and Members of Parliament, have the obligation to come up with reasonable and workable solutions before we can ask other members in this House, as representatives of their constituents, to begin to come to grips with fundamental problems.

All of us are concerned that the maximum amount of grain be transported to and from our ports. This has been a concern of the hon. member for Regina West for a number of years. For example, in 1979 he made an application to the CTC to try to have Section 262 apply in respect of the handling of grain. At that time, the CTC rejected the application of the hon. member for two very solid reasons. First, the CTC indicated that the government had already been taking measures to try to cope with the problems of grain transportation; it had appointed a grain transportation commissioner. Second—this is a very important legal argument since it goes to the heart and philosophy of what the hon. member is proposing which is why members on this side feel it is unworkable—the application went against the fundamental philosophy of what we feel our boards, agencies and railways should be doing.

The CTC rejected the application based on the A.L. Patchett & Sons Ltd. v. Pacific Great Eastern Railway Co., a 1959 decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. In interpreting Section 262 of the act in question, the court said that the duty of the railway to furnish "suitable accommodation" is not an absolute duty but is one which must be considered in the context of all the other obligations the railways are called upon to fulfil. In other words, the railway does have an obligation to transport grain. The Lord knows that we need those railways to do that. But what happens if their cars are tied up elsewhere? What happens if they can do it only at great economic loss? That is to say, you cannot force a railway, under all circumstances, to do things which are unreasonable.

Mr. Benjamin: The law says you can.

Mr. Peterson: This is what the law has been, as interpreted by the Supreme Court of Canada.

I believe this recognizes the fair combination of what we are trying to achieve in terms of our economic direction. It is an economic direction that recognizes that private enterprise, with its concomitant profit motive, is really the engine of our economy. It is really the incentive which helps individuals to go out and make this a stronger economic country. We do not believe, as does the hon. member opposite, that everything should be nationalized and that we can set up boards and then dictate what they should do in every situation. We still believe that there is room in our economy for the spirit of free enterprise, which necessitates profit. It is this delicate balance that we seek to maintain and it is one which would be offended if this were to go through. In particular, we would be offending the spirit of the Supreme Court of Canada decision in the Patchett case. Another problem arises in this situation.

Mr. Benjamin: We are on section 266 now.

Mr. Peterson: The hon. member for Regina West says, quite correctly, that we are dealing with Section 266 now and not Section 262. In 1979, however, the hon. member went to the CTC with a pig in a poke and was rejected. Now he comes back to us with a pig in a poke and says it is something different. This is the very same type of provision and the same type of approach with which he is asking us to deal at the present time.

One can invoke the name and the excellent report of Mr. Justice Hall who called upon us to take responsible measures to deal with the question of grain handling. This government is cognizant of that attitude. Unlike the hon. member for Bow River, I do not agree that the member of the other place who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board has been derelict in his duties. I would ask the hon. member to speak with the westerners with whom the minister has worked so closely, with the people in Saskatchewan, and with the co-operatives with whom he has been working on a national energy program to help them diversify their investment portfolio and have a greater stake in our energy program. He has been working hard to obtain new transportation facilities.

As every member of this House knows, the government has entered into a co-operative enterprise to provide over 2000 new railways cars for the transportation of grain in this country. In the last election we made a commitment to add increased trackage and we are not ashamed of that. We are happy to work with the farmers and to see that they have the transportation facilities necessary to get their grain to market.

I cannot accept the criticisms levelled by the hon. member for Bow River at our commitment to ensure that western farmers are adequately and properly given their just desserts and the recognition they deserve because of the role they fulfil and have fulfilled for so many years in this country.

There is another, technical reason why we should look again at Section 266, and this goes back to the Supreme Court decision. Section 266 imposes a specific obligation, as was intended. Therefore, in the words of the Supreme Court of Canada, it would override the general obligation that would prevail in any particular or limited situation.

The hon. member for Regina West recognized that Section 266 gives a very large power to the CTC, but he said it was invoked only once, in 1916. It appears that it was invoked in a desperate situation. Section 266 is still on the books. We might ask why there have not been more applications under Section 266. Is this an indication that perhaps what we are doing here is just a little bit of word smithing, substituting one administrative agency for another, without it having any real impact or giving any benefit. We have power under Section 266 to act in an emergency.

I should like to point out that I think we will have a problem if we implement the amendments proposed in this bill. One of the problems which could arise would be the conflicting obligations that might be imposed on a railway. If the hon. member's proposal were accepted, the Wheat Board could supposedly commandeer any car, any railway trackage, any locomotive to move grain at any time it decided to do so. Would it have to decide on other priorities? What would happen to the potash industry? If the cars, the shipping facilities, the dock facilities at the Lakehead or Vancouver were all tied up by potash, what would the position be then? Why is the Wheat Board in any better position to decide on the priorities of the railways than the railways themselves as represented by the Canadian Transport Commission? It has, as commissioners, representatives from all sectors. It can hold public hearings and is delegated to represent the public interest. It has an obligation, not only to deal with wheat but with all transportation needs in the country.

We do not want the nightmare of having two boards, both having jurisdiction over where the cars should be at a particular time and who should have priority. Such matters must be settled by the body delegated by Parliament to have responsibility for settling the bigger issues, all of which have national and international importance.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this bill, as far as I can see, is simply legislating schizophrenia on the railways. Surely there are sufficient agencies with responsibility for grain transportation without adding another.

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Mr. Peterson: The hon. member opposite has indicated that he has a question. I would be delighted to receive any questions he might have at the close of the debate on this issue.

Mr. Knowles: I am asking for the question to be called.

Mr. Peterson: I am always willing to respond to the questions of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I have found them to be relevant and pointed. I defer to his experience in this House and welcome the opportunity to discuss this matter with him in public or in private when I have completed what I think are essential remarks dealing with the philosophy of the matter before us.

Mr. Knowles: Let us have the vote.

Mr. Peterson: At this time I think what we want to do is continue with the thrust of this government, which I am proud to support at this time. It recognizes the role of the farmer in western Canada, the importance of this to the economy, and the necessity for us all to join in that enterprise to ensure that their goods get to market. This is a co-operative effort involving the railways. It is an effort which is going to involve the ports, and one which must be considered in the context of all the transportation needs of western Canada.

Le Président
The Speaker

Chambre des communes
House of Commons
Canada

OTTAWA
March 4, 1981

The Hon. Stanley Knowles, M.P.
Room 632, Centre Block
House of Commons

Dear Colleague:

I refer to the Motion which you introduced in the House of Commons on December 19, 1980, to the effect that employees who worked extended hours during the December 18-19 sitting be paid extra compensation.

I am pleased to inform you that the process of confirming the names of the employees concerned and arriving at an equitable compensation formula, has now been concluded. Accordingly, some 192 employees will be receiving extra compensation later this month, based on the following formula:

up to 5 hours overtime $25. (36 employees)
5 to 9 hours overtime $50. (63 employees)
9 to 12 hours overtime $75. (21 employees)
over 12 hours overtime $100. (72 employees)

Accompanying the cheques to employees will be a letter from me extending the thanks of the House to them.

You should note that the regular House of Commons provisions for overtime pay applied automatically to these employees, with the exception of Table Officers, Hansard Reporters and Pages. The latter two categories benefit from time off during prolonged inter-sessional periods. Thus, extra compensation as a result of the motion introduced on December 19th last will be paid 95 employees, over and above the overtime pay they have already received in accordance with the prevailing overtime regulations. Ninety-three of the remaining 97 employees will continue to benefit from time off during prolonged inter-sessional periods.

The preceding information is offered in order that you may appreciate that provisions already exist to compensate House of Commons employees when they are called upon to work extended hours.

I trust the foregoing will prove useful to you in the event a similar occasion to that of December 18-19 presents itself in the future. Thank you for your continued interest in the well-being of House employees.

Yours sincerely,

Jeanne Sauvé

REASON FOR NON-REFERRAL TO COURTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In a February 23 letter to the Alberta minister of energy and natural resources, the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) said, in reference to the National Energy Program, that "The Canadian solution to such differences in the past has been to resort to the courts—" I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski):

That the government be asked to explain why only selective "differences" of their own choosing are considered to be relevant to referral to the courts for "the Canadian solution" and not general matters which would include the Constitution.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE JUDICIARY

FEMALE NOMINEES FOR APPOINTMENT TO SUPREME COURT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Women constitute 51 per cent of the Canadian population, but not one female has ever been appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) were unable to find a suitable female candidate for the last appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada, therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney):

That this House invites Canadian women's groups from across Canada to forward to the Prime Minister names of qualified women who would be willing to be considered for appointment to Canada's Supreme Court.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RIGHTS OF INDIAN WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, in the past, members on all sides of the House have indicated their concern about the discrimination suffered by Indian women, so I hope that members on all sides will support this motion. Section 35(2) of the Constitution Act now before the House provides that interim constitutional conferences shall have an agenda item respecting constitutional matters that directly affect the aboriginal peoples of Canada. The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) is required to invite representatives of the aboriginal peoples to participate in the discussions on that item. In order that the rights of Indian women will be adequately recognized and protected in our Constitution, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House urge the Prime Minister to include in his invitation representatives of organizations which specifically represent Indian women.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, on January 1 Canadian oil companies, including PetroCan, attached the petroleum compensation charge to inventories of 70 million barrels of oil which they had on hand. As the government knows, this $2.50 per barrel charge should only be levied on oil delivered after January 1. As a result, the oil companies, and in particular PetroCan, have cleaned up on a windfall profit of at least $170 million. Because of this I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

S.O. 43

That the government reduce immediately the price of home heating oil and gasoline through its socialized government owned outlets so that a rebate equal to at least the profit that has accrued to PetroCan as a result of the petroleum compensation charge can be passed on to the consumers of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

MORTGAGE INTEREST RATE INCREASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Many people are feeling the pinch of skyrocketing mortgage interest rates. In one particular subdivision in Belleville a number of people, some on disability pensions and other forms of fixed income, are now receiving notices of mortgage increases from Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The increases are over 75 per cent. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That on these mortgage renewals where CMHC is directly involved as the mortgagor no renewals involving the percentages mentioned be allowed and some gradual increases only be permitted.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

OPERATION OF DUTY FREE SHOPS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Press reports indicate that the Foreign Investment Review Agency is negotiating with not one but two foreign companies for the operation of a duty-free shop at Toronto International Airport, which could open the way for many others, and is contradictory to the government's policy of Canadianization. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House direct the Foreign Investment Review Agency that preferential consideration be given to Canadian applicants in the operation of duty-free shops within Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

WEST COAST FISHING VESSEL BUY-BACK PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas 8 per cent of the B.C. "A" licence fishing fleet has been offered to the government's buy-back program, and whereas 238 of the 348 applications received will not be considered by the minister's officials because they have only $3 million allocated to the program; and whereas funds contributed through licence fees since 1974 in the accumulated amount of $9.3 million have been spent on other programs, thus betraying the rationale for increased licence fees in 1971; I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That the minister admit he is out of touch with the extent of the problem in the British Columbia fishing industry, that he direct more resources to the west coast, and that he immediately allocate an additional $6 million to the buy-back program so that at least the program can function with the funds that B.C. fishermen have contributed for this purpose in the past seven years.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DISASTERS

HAZARD POSED BY NEW BRUNSWICK SHIPWRECK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the motor vessel Opal went aground on the Red Head Beach near Saint John, New Brunswick, on February 12, 1981; and in view of the fact that over-exuberant sightseers are causing damage to the property of area residents, not to mention the inherent danger of the presence of the ship should another storm occur, I move, seconded by the hon. member for South West Nova (Miss Campbell):

That this House urges the Minister of Transport to secure immediately or remove the ship, or force the New York owners to secure immediately or remove the ship in the interest of the safety and peace of mind of area residents.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, on March 3, when asked to raise interest rates on Canada Savings Bonds, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), in standing committee said:

—we stay with the view that the rates are reasonable and that they are reasonable because of the particular characteristics of these bonds.

Ten days later the Minister of Finance raised the interest rate to 13.75 per cent, above the rate paid on guaranteed income certificates, savings accounts with banks and other institutions. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That this House demands that the Minister of Finance immediately today on motions explain to this House why 11.50 per cent was a satisfactory return on March 3, and how it is necessary, because of the quality of the bonds, to increase the rate of interest to 13.75 per cent on March 13, and how in ten days there has been such a worsening of Canada's credit to force the minister to increase bond yields by 2.25 per cent.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CRIMINAL CODE

CALL FOR REVIEW OF GUN LAWS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the present gun laws permit a peace officer to search a person's home and seize his guns on suspicion, and an Alberta court has ruled that such searches and seizures are illegal unless the owner has committed an offence, and whereas the gun laws require a complete and thorough overhaul, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin):

That this House urge that the gun laws be referred for review and amendment to the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee at the earliest possible time.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

IMPACT OF INTEREST RATES ON FARMERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given that many

Canadian cattlemen today are teetering on the brink of bankruptcy with interest rates sustained at levels beyond the ability of cattlemen, and farmers in general, to pay; given also that banks have begun to foreclose on a number of mortgages and that this could mean the loss of livelihood to a number of farmers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the Minister of Agriculture immediately give special terms of reference to the Standing Committee on Agriculture to study the effects of interest rates on farmers; that the study place an emphasis on the cattle industry; and that recommendations for relief be made by the committee.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

SAFEGUARDS RESPECTING SALES OF NUCLEAR REACTORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Despite protests to the contrary by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and others, rumours abound that Canada is about to water down its nuclear safeguards in order to sell more CANDU reactors abroad. According to Canada's special negotiator for nuclear safeguards, no changes to our sales criteria for nuclear technology, fuel or expertise are contemplated unless—and the operative word is "unless"—international agreements on the use of nuclear technology are instituted to replace our own minimal sales requirements. Because of the possibility that future international agreements on the use of nuclear reactors might replace existing Canadian safeguards developed to prevent CANDU reactors being turned into nuclear bombs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

● (1415)

That this House insists that the strongest possible safeguards be maintained concerning the sale of nuclear reactors to foreign countries and that this House instruct the Department of External Affairs to reject any international agreement on nuclear sales which would replace and weaken Canada's present minimal proliferation protections.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

STATUS OF WOMEN

DEMANDS OF NATIONAL ACTION COMMITTEE

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the status of women. The minister will know that the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, an umbrella committee representing some 150 women's groups from all parts of Canada, met this past weekend in Ottawa. The committee demanded two things. It demanded the minister's resignation as well as the resignation of the executive of the advisory council. Will the minister tell the House what action the government is prepared to take on these recommendations?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, we are prepared to take action on the positive, constructive suggestions which come from any women's group. We have just had a very informative and helpful meeting with the executive of the national action group. The issues the hon. member raised did not come up in quite the way he suggests. I think what that group is far more concerned about is getting on with dealing with the substantive concerns of women and getting away from the kinds of conflicts and allegations which have been so prevalent in the past. We certainly identify with the sentiment that it is time to get on with the real issues affecting women and to get away from some of these false issues.

APPOINTMENTS TO ADVISORY COUNCIL

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, obviously one of the substantive issues for women in Canada is the matter of the person who represents them in cabinet, and through their recommendations women are clearly suggesting that there is a lack of credibility there.

The minister will recall that last week he appointed a president and six new members to the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. The National Action Committee, for one, was not consulted before the appointments were made. Did the minister consult, for example, women's business and professional groups, the farm women, the YWCA, Women and the Law, or any other women's groups? In making these appointments of people to advise the government, with whom did the minister consult?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, it may be of some interest to the hon. member, who is concerned about the nature of the appointments, that the woman who is the head of the Farm Women of Canada was appointed to that council.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Furthermore, if he will take a closer look at the qualifications of several of those who were appointed to the council, he will find that they represent business, education, the Inuit and native communities, and the farm community. They represent the general interests of women. Our criterion is that they be prepared to serve the interests of women, not a particular women's group.

REVIEW OF COUNCIL'S STRUCTURE AND ROLE

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, the minister is very clever at avoiding the question. The question was not about the person but the groups who represent women across the country. The minister is saying that he will make decisions on behalf of the women of Canada.

Last week under questioning here in the House the minister said that he preferred to support the advisory council's decision to hold its own internal review of its structure and its role. An internal review is clearly not credible either to this House or to the women of Canada. Will the government, simultaneously with the in-house review, order an external review which can be more independent and more believable?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is quite interested in the questions which were raised last week. I remind him of the answer I gave last week, which was that all along the position of the government has been to support the independence of that council and to allow it the right to make its own decisions about its own affairs. It is important that that independence and autonomy be maintained, and therefore what we are saying is that we gave recommendations and advice and discussed our concerns with the council. The council has decided it will do a review, report its findings to women's groups and consult with them, and then make further recommendations to the government. At that point in time I would be very happy to answer the hon. member's question.

THE JUDICIARY

QUALIFICATIONS FOR APPOINTMENT OF WOMEN TO SUPREME COURT

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice, and it pertains to recent remarks made by the Prime Minister to the effect that he and the Minister of Justice were unable to find any qualified women in Canada who would merit appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada.

● (1420)

I should like to say to the minister that women have been filling the normal qualifications for appointment to the Supreme Court for years. Certainly they have been practising successfully in all fields of law for years, and they have been ably filling positions on the provincial superior courts and supreme courts. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice what qualifications he and the Prime Minister were looking for in these appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada over and above those required of men in the search they made for a woman to be appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, there is no opening on the Supreme Court of Canada, so there is no problem at this moment. I have to tell the hon. member that when there was an opening not long ago, we tried to find the best qualified lawyer or judge available to fill that post on the Supreme Court. The candidate had to be from Quebec, and we did appoint a judge from Quebec. At that time we looked at the possibility of appointing a woman to that post, as we do always, but at the same time, when there is a vacancy, the best person to fill that position must be found. Unfortunately, the candidate whom we named at that time was better qualified than the women considered when we had to fill that position last summer.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, I always find it interesting that when the government refers to appointments of women, it uses the adjective "qualified", as if a woman somehow had to be better qualified for an appointment than a man. That is the attitude that the government takes. I should like to say to the minister that we are all interested in seeing women appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada, and since the government on its own has not been able to find a suitable candidate among women for the Supreme Court of Canada, would the minister undertake to give to the House the assurance that he will now consult with the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, the Business and Professional Women's Association, La Fédération des Femmes du Québec, the National Association of Women and the Law, and all other women's groups, to find suitable women candidates to be nominated to the Supreme Court of Canada so that we will see the male monopoly in the Supreme Court of Canada broken once and for all?

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, when there is an opening we will consider the best candidate available to fill that position, and if it so happens that that candidate is a woman, I will be the happiest man in the House.

EMPLOYMENT

FUNDING FOR WOMEN'S PROJECTS THROUGH OUTREACH PROGRAM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. A minute ago he said with a straight face that the government was interested in "real issues" affecting women. Considering that the women's Outreach program has been extremely effective in helping women gain access to the labour market, and also considering that women have a much higher rate of unemployment than men, could the minister explain to the House why the government has cut the annual budget for this fiscal year of the women's Outreach program by some 25 per cent, if it is really interested in real issues affecting women?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's information is not quite correct. In the new estimates which were just tabled in the House, the budget for Outreach is well over $11 million, which is a substantial increase over the last year. I would also point out to him, as I think I did to some of his colleagues during the time when they considered my departmental estimates, that we have frozen the allocation for Outreach in order to get a higher proportion of the money going to women's projects, and in the past year we have increased by close to 50 per cent the number of women's projects funded under Outreach.

At the same time, we have taken the Community Services Employment Program and funded over 100 women's projects in this country to provide direct employment to those programs, all of which was designed to give them a chance to develop innovative enterprises and activities directed at women's issues. I would like to have more, Madam Speaker, but under the restraints we have we are trying to reallocate the money for these projects and set as a priority the very important concern of women's employment.

● (1425)

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I referred to the reduction in the proportion of Outreach funding going to women's programs. In that regard, specific Outreach projects have been cut at the rate of more than one per month so far this year. In this context will the minister, as a minimum and as an expression of the government's concern with women, especially women in the economy, guarantee that the government will restore all those Outreach projects which have been cut so far this year?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, there seems to be some difference in understanding. I am indicating to the hon. member that we have increased the number of available Outreach projects for women's employment concerns in the past year, and have tended to increase them even more for the coming estimates' year.

Also, we have gone ahead and set up some experimental programs dealing with women's employment centres, providing them with their own department. It is my intention to use that as a model to establish those kinds of centres in major urban areas across Canada in the coming year. So, we have a plan in mind to provide more comprehensive and more extensive counselling in service programs for women in the employment field. I agree with the sentiment of the hon. member, and I think the sentiment is being fulfilled by the actions we are taking.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I will not dwell on the first point. It was that the budget for Outreach projects in general has been increased but, as the minister knows, women's programs, as a percentage of the total budget, have been reduced. I will leave that. The minister has not denied that a number of projects have been cancelled, at the rate of more than one per month for the last few months.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PROVISION OF CHILDREN'S DAY CARE FACILITIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I should like to go to another area which concerns women, and more specifically affects children in Canada. It has been estimated that only 10 per cent of all those who have a need for day care services in Canada have access to adequate or professional day care facilities. With regard to the concern for the 90 per cent of the children who have need, will the minister commit the government, first, to providing a fund which will enable groups in the private sector that start up day care facilities to receive capital grants and, second, on behalf of the government will he undertake to ensure, or at least show leadership in ensuring that all federal employees who have need of day care services will have them provided?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I agree very much with the sentiments expressed by the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party. However, I would point out that there is one major difficulty in making such a commitment, that is, that day care programs are basically decided by provincial governments.

Mr. Broadbent: No.

Mr. Axworthy: We supply our funding through the Canada Assistance Plan, but we cannot set the priorities or the allocations. This is a responsibility of the provinces. My hon. colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, met with her provincial counterparts—and I believe she is meeting with them again this week—to encourage the expansion and extension of day care programs; but we must rely upon the provinces to make those decisions.

Mr. Crosbie: Come off it.

Mr. Axworthy: As far as the second program is concerned, I can inform the hon. member that the President of the Treasury Board and other ministers are working right now on the development of a day care program for federal service employees.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

PRICES OF OIL AND GASOLINE

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Recently the hon. member for Sarnia was quoted as saying that he believed the price of oil used for heating and of gasoline should move quickly toward 85 per cent of world price, and that the Liberal caucus was prepared for such price changes in an effort to reach some agreement between Alberta and Ottawa on the National Energy Program.

Does the government believe that its deception, starting with the promises of the 1980 election, has gone far enough? Is the government flying a trial balloon, through this former minister, to see whether the public is ready for the enormous flip-flop on energy prices?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I refer the hon. member to the National Energy Program, in which we indicated quite clearly and specifically—I do not have the page with me, but if he gives me a few minutes I will find the page—that we did not want the total blended price of gasoline over this decade to exceed 85 per cent of world price. That includes not only the wellhead price but also the refinery gate price. This was clearly spelled out in the National Energy Program when it was published on October 28. There has been no change since then. Indeed, it is in the program as it is. What is being argued about at the present time is how much the wellhead price should be, which is what we are discussing with the government of Alberta.

• (1430)

Mr. Wilson: The minister is clearly having trouble with members in his caucus. I guess it is not the first time that we have seen him having trouble with members of his caucus in trying to arrive at this price.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson: I hear members opposite talking out. I think they are concerned about the answer the minister just gave.

The minister has frequently referred to the positive position taken by NOVA, an Alberta corporation, with regard to the energy program. About a week and a half ago the president of NOVA, Robert Blair, stated that he was disturbed that NOVA has been used by federal spokesmen as an illustration that the National Energy Program must be all right as is. He went on to say that this is a distortion, the National Energy Program is not all right as is. In view of the comments from the hon. member for Sarnia, and in view of the comments by Mr. Blair, where he had recommended moving quickly to 85 per cent of world prices—two $10 price increases this year and next, which coincidentally arrives at a price equivalent to 85 per cent of world price—would the minister confirm that a price increase of this magnitude is under consideration as a means of achieving that 85 per cent relationship?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I will try to answer the various points one by one. With reference to caucus, the hon. member must hear voices from his own caucus. I invite him to resist transferring those voices into other caucuses.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the other point that he has raised is concerned, I can tell him that there is no such consideration being given at all at the present time to the kinds of figures to which he has referred.

As far as Nova is concerned, we have never pretended that the elements of the National Energy Program were the be all and end all of everything. We have already agreed to make some changes to improve the program, which have been well received and have proven to be quite helpful to the industry.

I hope that in the discussions we are undertaking with the producing provinces we will arrive at a satisfactory arrangement. But I want to assure the hon. member that we will not expose Canadians to the type of action, the terrible treatment that the minister of finance on his side imposed on them in December of 1979.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PUBLIC SERVICE

POLICY GOVERNING STAFFING PRACTICES OF PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Last week, when faced with a report of selective hiring from Quebec only, the Minister of Transport expressed shock. The Public Service Commission now says that it is government policy to limit employee searches in all provinces. Would the President of the Treasury Board like to take his turn at expressing shock? More particularly, since it is his responsibility, would he attempt to change this policy so that all Canadians are given an equal opportunity to apply for jobs in Canada with the Canadian government?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Siddon: So much for mobility!

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I have been reading the statements from the Public Service Commission. I believe the hon. member is aware that staffing is the prerogative of the Public Service Commission, not the Treasury Board.

Mr. Ellis: Madam Speaker, it may be the prerogative of the Public Service Commission, but surely the President of the Treasury Board has some input into this policy. We find that in response to ads for a position in Annapolis Valley-Hants in Nova Scotia, the hiring is done in Moncton, New Brunswick. So much for the policy. It seems to me that the policy only applies to those areas where the right colour of representative sits. Therefore, could the minister apply some pressure to the Public Service Commission and have that policy changed?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, the whole purpose of the Public Service Commission having staffing responsibilities is to avoid the application of pressure. It is to ensure that the merit principle is respected. As a result of that we have one of the finest public services in the world.

The issue is, though, that this is a policy. My colleague, the Minister of Transport, has commented upon it. I myself have looked at it and I would certainly be prepared to discuss it with the Public Service Commission. But I am in no position, nor do I want to be in a position, to put pressure on the Public Service Commission with respect to their staffing policies, which is their prerogative.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DEPARTMENT'S TREATMENT OF MANITOBA INDIAN BANDS

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The Manitoba Indian chiefs feel very strongly that the Department of Indian Affairs in Manitoba has been unable to respond to the needs of Indian people and is, in fact, working from the basis of arbitrary budgetary allocations. It has proceeded to impose budgets on Indian bands rather than negotiate budgets. Officials have not taken any action on the needs of off-reserve Indians, ignoring a very real and growing problem. I would observe that this is due at least in part to the limited funds available for Indians. Is the minister taking any action to obtain additional funds for Indians so that his meeting tomorrow with the Manitoba Indian chiefs will have some hope of success?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, my colleagues and myself are always looking for additional resources for the Indian people, since everyone in this House knows about the poverty situation which confronts many elements of the native people. I hope that there will be additional funding to alleviate some of these concerns in the relatively near future.

In the meantime some of the specific matters that the hon. member is talking about have been addressed through meetings which have been held by the Manitoba Indians with my deputy, my executive assistant, and so on. I have been informed that some of these matters have been resolved satisfactorily. Whatever ones have not been resolved, I will endeavour to resolve myself tomorrow.

Mr. Keeper: Madam Speaker, the minister seems to be unaware of the complete breakdown in the working relationship between the Indians in Manitoba and his department, to the point at which they are calling for the resignation of the whole executive of that department.

The minister should understand that since 1970 allocations for Indians per capita have increased by 14 per cent, whereas general allocations across the budget have increased some 128 per cent. It is time to remove fiscal restraints from the budget for Indian people. Will the minister take some action on that immediately?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, the question is somewhat repetitious. I have already indicated that I am taking action. I have indicated I am hopeful there will be additional funds. I cannot see what more I can add until I meet with the Manitoba Indian group tomorrow.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

INDUSTRIAL USE OF CANCER RISKING SUBSTANCES

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In view of recent statements that more than 10,000 Canadians will die this year from cancer they contracted on the job, and that if 20 substances now in common use in industry were better controlled, cancer risks could be greatly reduced, can the minister say whether the current review of Part IV of the Labour Code is actively addressing this aspect of industrial health and safety?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the question raised by the hon. member is a very important one. Indeed, the review of Part IV of the Labour Code, which is presently under way, with in-depth consultation with both the Canadian Labour Congress and business leaders within the country, is aimed at better enabling government to regulate the protection of safety and health of workers, certainly as it relates to cancer but also as it relates to other diseases and safety situations. It is hoped that legislation will be forthcoming in the near future, at the conclusion of this comprehensive review, aimed at consolidating as well as improving the laws in that regard.

STAFFING PRACTICES OF PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Treasury Board. Earlier in this question period the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings brought up the issue of appointments to the Department of Transport. I read from an ad for foreign service secretaries which was in the Ottawa area on the weekend. The first sentence of the ad reads as follows: "If you are a resident of the province of Quebec or Ontario with secretarial experience and have the ability to take dictation", you may want to work in a foreign embassy.

Could the minister explain to me why Canadian secretaries, to be entitled to work in our foreign missions, should be from the province of Ontario or Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the question asked by the hon. member may be very interesting but, as I have just explained, it does not come within the jurisdiction of the Treasury Board. It should be addressed to my colleague, the Secretary of State.

[English]

The Public Service Commission reports through the Secretary of State. As I explained, staffing is not a responsibility of the Treasury Board.

An hon. Member: It's a government responsibility.

Mr. Hawkes: The nature of that ad would appear to run counter to some sections of the new Constitution Act. Given the fact that the Quebec government has found at least 100 laws which will have to be changed once this act passes, can the minister tell us what staffing preparation he has put in place through the main estimates to enable the Government of Canada to change hundreds of laws and regulations that will need to be changed if this act, as it is presently written, goes forward? Can the minister tell us where to find, in the main estimates, that staffing increase which will be necessary to straighten up the chaos which will follow?

An hon. Member: More big government.

Mr. Johnston: I am not sure I fully understand the thrust of the hon. member's question. I have already explained in some detail in this House, at the time of tabling the main estimates—

An hon. Member: Call in Gallant.

Mr. Johnston: —exactly what the person-year requirements of the government are in the coming year. I indicated that those increases were primarily due to the census for 1981, and that certain other departments, Energy Mines and Resources, for example, and Fisheries and Oceans, required additional person-years. I think that I fully explained the requirements envisaged by my colleagues in the cabinet at that time.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ALICE ARM, B.C.—DUMPING OF TOXIC WASTE BY AMAX MINE

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. As the minister knows, during the 1979 election a special order in council was passed at the instigation of the minister to allow an extraordinary increase in mine tailings effluent from the Amax Mine in Alice Arm, British Columbia.

In view of the fact that that was done secretly and that it exceeds—as my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Skeena said—by thousands, the present regulations set down by the federal government for effluent outlets, why was it done secretly? Why was there no environmental assessment review procedure? Why is the present government prepared to stand on what was done secretly and refuse the Nishga Indians a public hearing into whether or not this is sound, before the company starts to dump the effluent into the inlet on April 1, especially keeping in mind that the Utah Mines problem in British Columbia was exactly the same situation, and ten years later we are finding out that everything said by the scientists hired by the companies has turned out to be false? I want an answer to that.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): I doubt if I can match the hon. member's level of indignation.

Mr. Fraser: You are darn right.

Mr. LeBlanc: I would hope to match, however, the level of his information. If his only source is the hon. member for Skeena, I would really suggest that as a former minister of the environment he might want to check his facts again. The reality is that I have looked in the records to see if there was unusual haste in the judgment that was made preceding the order in council which gave the permit to the mining company. I have found no evidence of this at all. It was made very clear when the permit was issued and the order in council was passed, that on judgment of the scientists who had reviewed this situation they felt this type of tailings deposit was acceptable.

Some months ago, I asked for another review, and I was given the same answer. But in order to remove any suspicion from my department, I then, with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of the Environment, sought out three distinguished non-governmental scientists, an oceanographer and biologist, to undertake a scientific assessment to review the conditions attached to the permit, and the monitoring and to give me their opinion.

I regret that this endeavour has met with delay because the issue has become one of public inquiry and not of scientific review. I agree with what my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, said. It is a scientific problem, not a legal problem. My hope is that our conversation with the Nishga will succeed and that we might convince them that public hearings by a scientific panel of non-governmental people is the best route. If they recommend an inquiry, of course I will be happy to look at this.

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, that is just the biggest pack of garbage I have listened to in the House on environmental matters for years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: Given the fact that the principle here is whether or not the Government of Canada is committed to public hearings on these matters, how can the minister sit in his seat, or stand on his legs, and say that the secret directives changing the government's own regulations is justifiable? You have set up the environmental assessment review procedure and you have done an end run right around it. If this kind of disgraceful thing—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, I wonder if I am at the National Arts Centre, rather than the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. LeBlanc: The order in council was passed, and I have checked it and reviewed it again. Like all orders in council, they are passed as recommendations to the minister, then being accepted are proclaimed when and if the time comes to proclaim it. I have seen nothing unusual. In fact I have suggested—

Mr. Fraser: You have seen nothing unusual about it.

Mr. LeBlanc: Perhaps if the hon. member would listen, he might learn something.

Mr. Fraser: I know more about this than you. That's why it hurts.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The idea is to allow the minister to give his answer. If the question was posed, you need an answer.

Mr. LeBlanc: I think that I made it very clear, in the official release which accompanied the proposed names of the scientific panel, that they were perfectly free to hold public hearings, to focus on the issue, and to give all the information that was available. That is still my view.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL DEVELOPMENT PROJECT—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC HEARING

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is not unrelated to the one which has just been the subject of an exchange between the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the hon. member for Vancouver South. It is directed to the Minister of Transport and is with regard to the commitment to proceed with the development of Northeast Coal. Even though details are sketchy, we know that the federal government is involved to a very large extent, financially and in other ways, with this development.

Has the minister given thought to establishing a type of public hearing similar to that held in connection with the pipeline in northeastern British Columbia, to arrive at a set of socioeconomic conditions which will protect the people, give people information about the project—people in the area, I am talking about—and also allow them to have some input into the manner in which this project proceeds, so that their legitimate concerns and aspirations are met?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I would certainly look at this idea, but I am under the impression that if such an inquiry should be held, it should be held by the provincial authorities. The minister of state for economic development confirmed that the environmental aspect with respect to the port of Prince Rupert had been looked at by the federal Ministry of the Environment. But again, I take notice of the question and will look into it further to see if more can be done.

Mr. Oberle: Every time I talk to the minister about this he seems to be referring to the port of Prince Rupert. I am talking about the big hole being dug in central British Columbia, in which the government is directly involved. Will the minister be as aggressive as he was during the development of this project with federal funding and participation, by insisting that federal jurisdictions are met with respect to environmental, ecological concerns and socioeconomic concerns, keeping in mind that the government of British Columbia has not seen fit to participate in the pipeline hearings? If the province does not proceed with the public hearing, would the minister use his good offices to insist that be one of the conditions which would assure continued federal co-operation in this project?

• (1450)

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, it may be that one of my difficulties is that I am acquainted with the constitutional issues in this country. The responsibility for that "big hole" in terms of the environment is a provincial one. If I keep referring to the port of Prince Rupert, it is because that port is a federal responsibility, and one might make the case that not enough attention is being given to the environment. But, as I say, that "big hole" comes under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Crosbie: It is about time you spoke up, Jean-Luc.

Mr. Clark: Tell us about the Pepin-Robarts report.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO COLLECT TAXES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my question for the Minister of National Revenue is with regard to a topic that I suspect has become a major concern to all Canadians, namely, the high price of petroleum products and those who benefit from high prices.

Given that the combines report on competition demonstrates that high transfer prices between the multinational parent companies and their Canadian subsidiaries cost Canadians an extra $3.2 billion between 1958 and 1970, and that Sun Oil has stated it was "ahead as long as the Canadian tax authorities recognize these high prices fully as costs despite their basic unreality"; and given that Sun Oil's report concludes that such practices are continuing, what action does the minister plan to take to stop this obvious tax dodge by the company?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, my department is presently reviewing the report. I do not have a full and complete report, but if it shows that there were practices which were not legal under the law, then certainly we will be taking action.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, the report states that the Department of National Revenue already has the power to insist on arm's length prices in dealings between parent companies and their subsidiaries. Revenue Canada apparently has been duped in the past. Most likely on a continuing basis Canadian subsidiaries are paying artificially high prices to their parent companies, writing these off as costs. Will the government now re-assess the taxes of these corporations to recover the billions of dollars lost to the federal treasury?

Mr. Rompkey: Madam Speaker, we do assessments on a regular basis on a number of industries across the country in keeping with our resources.

Mr. Crosbie: Leave the fishermen alone.

Mr. Rompkey: This is an ongoing practice. In this particular case we are doing a specific review in light of the report, and if we need to take any action, we certainly will.

REQUEST FOR EARLY SETTLEMENT OF JOURNALISTS' STRIKE

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil-Papineau): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Following the announcement of an election in Quebec last week, the strike by CBC French-speaking reporters is becoming even more significant. Can the minister tell the House whether he and the CBC intend this situation to stagnate or whether they intend to provide six million Quebecers with the news reports they are entitled to?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, this strike has very serious implications because of the election in Quebec. The mediator of Labour Canada, Mr. Guy De Merlis, met with the parties involved last weekend. The CBC has made a new major offer to the union, which the latter is now considering.

TRADE

ACCESS TO UNITED STATES MARKET—DISCUSSIONS ON AUTO PACT

Mr. John Thomson (Calgary South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Trade. In view of the increasing tendency toward protectionism in the United States and the adverse effect this will have on the promotion of export trade with our most important trading partner, did the minister press his cabinet colleagues to obtain a commitment during President Reagan's recent visit to Canada which will improve our trade with the United States? In particular, was any attempt made to negotiate greater access to the American market for Canadian manufactured goods under buy-American regulations or under the auto pact?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (Trade)): First, the Prime Minister did raise the issue of the auto pact with the President. Both leaders agreed that the bilateral consultations which had been initiated by the previous administration should continue. At a meeting attended by my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Baldrige, Ambassador Brock and myself, the auto pact was discussed. We discussed not only buy-American legislation but buy-national legislation, an issue raised by both governments.

With respect to the buy-American legislation, we specifically centred our discussion on urban rapid transit systems. We think we can increase our share of world-wide markets, not just on the North American continent.

Mr. Thomson: Madam Speaker, could the minister tell us whether it is the government's intention to carry on these discussions and negotiations? Does the minister expect this will result in an improvement in our trade position with the United States, taking into account its move toward protectionism?

Mr. Lumley: Yes, Madam Speaker. As the hon. member knows, our bilateral trade with the United States is fast approaching the $100 billion mark, which is an excellent example of trade between two countries in the world. My colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, is presently making arrangements to visit Washington to have further discussions with Ambassador Brock and Secretary of Commerce Baldrige.

DISPUTE BETWEEN CORPORATION AND QUEBEC JOURNALISTS' UNION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Labour concerning the strike at the CBC. Does the decision that the strike must remain exclusively the concern of the CBC represent the federal government's position, or is the government willing to set a date after which it will take its own responsibilities to provide the services of the CBC to the people in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the right. hon. gentleman is well aware of the jurisdictional limitation of my department. It is the role of the Department of Labour to mediate and to provide circumstances through which parties are able to come to an agreement.

The question as to whether any specific direction should, by government policy, be given to the CBC, is a question which would have to be directed elsewhere.

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, perhaps I could direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister, if there is one. I would like to know whether the government has decided as a matter of policy that the strike must remain exclusively the concern of the CBC or whether the federal government might intervene in the national interest.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Acting Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I shall have to take this question as notice and submit it to the Prime Minister at the first opportunity.

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance my question is for the Minister of State for Finance. He will know that the Minister of Finance said, as reported in Hansard at page 6449:

> The Canada Savings Bond has certain features which no other instrument has. For that reason, in addition to the interest rate, these other features, which are attractive to subscribers,—

The interest rate for Canada Savings Bonds was raised by 2.25 per cent ten days after the minister made that statement. Is it the minister's view at the present time that Canada Savings Bonds do not have that attractiveness, or is it his view that the government has to pay more interest than people are receiving on their savings accounts in banks, or from guaranteed investment certificates issued by trust companies, in order to attract funds to the government?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, in his question, the hon. member quoted a reply from the Minister of Finance. As I recall, this answer was in reply to a question asking the Minister of Finance to increase the interest rates on Canada Savings Bonds. The Minister of Finance has decided to increase the rates for certain blocks of bonds during a certain period. In view of the present situation of fluctuating interest rates, of which the hon. member is well aware, this increase will provide a more equitable yield for those who have purchased Canada Savings Bonds, while not being too costly for the taxpayers.

● (1500)

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: I appreciate that the minister realizes we have been asking for an increase to a reasonable limit on Canada Savings Bonds for some period of time. The minister will know that if he had increased the rate on those bonds back in January to 12.5 per cent as he should have done, he would not have had a loss of over $1.5 billion from the Treasury on redemption of those bonds. When he increased the rate to 13.75 per cent, what he did was create a minimum lending rate. He has raised the rate that all trust companies and insurance companies will have to pay.

Madam Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member ask his question.

Mr. Blenkarn: Is it the minister's view that interest rates have to be in excess of 13.5 per cent or 14 per cent for trust companies now so that trust companies can borrow money on the market to put into the mortgage industry?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I believe that anyone who made a serious analysis of the question asked by the hon. member would realize that I do not even need to reply to it, as he is not comparing savings instruments of the same nature. He should compare the same type of savings instruments before drawing any conclusions. One cannot infer the colour of a pumpkin from that of an apple, an orange or a cucumber.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. DESMARAIS—CORRECTION OF ANSWER GIVEN ON FRIDAY MARCH 13

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, when I replied to the question of the member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) last Friday, I failed to draw a parallel between his question and my reply and I do not want the House to believe that I tried to mislead him. The blackmail to which the member referred is closely connected with the strike of 180 CBC newspapermen in view of the fact that the strikers themselves have obtained the consent of the Quebec provincial parties to boycott the CBC public affairs programs.

At the same time, Madam Speaker, I mentioned that the CBC was negotiating with five unions representing over 7,000 employees and that, in two of those negotiations, the federal mediator had drafted his reports which were delivered to the interested parties last Friday. Finally, I want to say that the boycotting and the blackmail to which he referred—

PRIVILEGE

MR. FULTON—RESPONSE OF MR. LeBLANC DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In the response by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), the minister made the statement, as I wrote it down, that if the only source of information the hon. member is using is that provided by the hon. member for Skeena, the hon. member had better check. In this situation, referring to the Amax issue, the hon. member for Vancouver South clearly, in my view, used accurate information. I think the minister should rise in his place—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member is entering into debate. This is not a question of privilege and therefore I cannot allow him to pursue it.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I would like to complete an answer to the hon. member and tell her that I have appointed five women judges in the last six months.

Madam Speaker: Order. The minister knows he cannot complete answers after question period is finished.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,583, 1,587, 2,046, 2,088, 2,134 and 2,136.

SECURITY REVIEW—DORCHESTER PENITENTIARY, N.B.

Question No. 1,583—Mr. Howie:

Was a major review of security carried out at Dorchester Penitentiary, New Brunswick in relation to identifying the principal reasons for escapes, disturbances, demonstrations and unrest and, if so (a) what are the reasons (b) will or have steps been taken to rectify the situation and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Yes, there was a major security review undertaken by senior officials at Dorchester Penitentiary, resulting in a general lockup of all inmates, and the development of an implementation plan for reopening later in the fall of 1980.

(a) Some of the factors contributing to the unrest at Dorchester Penitentiary appear to be (i) the settling of accounts amongst inmates, (ii) brew-making by inmates, and the resultant widespread intoxication, and (iii) the need for strengthened management and discipline within the institution.

(b) The phased implementation plan for rectifying the situation consists of conducting an intensive, detailed search of the entire penitentiary, including cell blocks, shops and recreation areas; defining and implementing immediately-required physical security changes, including the reviewing of operational procedures and making amendments as required. In addition, a newly-strengthened management team has been put in place.

DISTURBANCE AT DORCHESTER PENITENTIARY, N.B.

Question No. 1,587—Mr. Howie:

Was it necessary to initiate action by an emergency response team to break up a disturbance at Dorchester Penitentiary, New Brunswick, in the month of May, 1980, and, if so, what was the cause of the disturbance?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Yes, the institutional emergency response team was deployed to break up a disturbance on May 27, 1980, which had started on one range and quickly spread to another range. The administration had unsuccessfully tried to convince the inmates to return to their cells; however, when the inmates refused, it was considered that positive action was necessary before the situation became uncontrollable. When the institutional emergency response team were seen by the inmates, they returned to their cells peacefully. No injuries were sustained by staff or inmates.

The cause of this disturbance was a show of support and unity with four inmates, two of whom were protesting the fact that they were not returned to their regular cells after being released from dissociation, and two others who were dissatisfied because they had not been included in an interregional transfer which was taking place that day.

DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION AUDIT—ONTARIO REGION

Question No. 2,046—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is an audit team presently conducting a special audit or an audit of any kind whatsoever within the Ontario region of the Department of Employment and Immigration and, if so, was it ordered by Mr. David Scott, Director of Finance and, if not, who ordered it and for what reasons?

2. Is Mr. Dan Yanaky, Chief of Internal Control, in charge of the audit and, if not, who is in charge?

3. Is the audit in any way in part due to a suspected misappropriation of funds by public servants or others with particular reference to purchases allegedly made for goods and materials to assist refugees from such places as Vietnam?

4. Was evidence uncovered of financial "kick-backs" to persons in the department or others and, if so, what are all the details?

5. Is the investigation completed and, if not, on what date is it expected that it will be completed?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. There is an Internal Audit Team currently in the Ontario region of CEIC. It was not ordered by Mr. David Scott, Director of Finance. This audit is a routine, planned internal audit that was part of the audit plan for the year 1980-81.

2. No, Mr. N. Nanda from Internal Audit Bureau of the CEIC is in charge of the audit.

3. No.

4. No.

5. The planned internal audit is scheduled to be completed on or about Monday, March 16, 1981.

DND—ACQUISITION OF LAND

Question No. 2,088—Mr. Herbert:

During the past ten years, by province, what is the value of any land that did not already belong to the Crown that was acquired for use by the Department of National Defence?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): The value of lands that did not already belong to the Crown and was acquired for use by the Department of National Defence for the period January 1, 1971, to December 31, 1980, is as follows:

	Cost
Newfoundland	$ 1,291,666.00*
Prince Edward Island	5,000.00
Nova Scotia	43,490.00
New Brunswick	Nil
Quebec	219,765.00
Ontario	115,203.00
Manitoba	36,052.00
Saskatchewan	3,700.00
Alberta	40,807.66
British Columbia	1,174,356.00
Northwest Territories	49,000.00
	$ 2,979,039.66

* The purchase in Newfoundland included 156 permanent married quarters.

BILINGUALISM—PUBLIC SERVICE

Question No. 2,134—Mr. Herbert:

Does the government consider that a unilingual person occupying a designated bilingual position has an indefinite protection in that position and (a) if not, under what conditions can the employee be transferred (b) if so, what alternative means are utilized to ensure an adequate service in both official languages?

The Constitution

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): As provided for in the official languages policies and confirmed in the Public Service Official Languages Exclusion Order to the Public Service Employment Act, unilingual incumbents of positions which are re-identified from unilingual to bilingual during their incumbency may remain in the position without meeting the required proficiency in their second official language. All such employees may, however, elect to undertake language training in order to meet the language proficiency of the position or may request a transfer to a unilingual position for which they are qualified.

Where the official languages policies allow employees to remain in bilingual positions without meeting the required second language proficiency, departments and agencies are required to make alternative administrative arrangements to cover off the linguistic obligations of the positions involved, usually by an internal rearrangement of duties among employees.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL

Question No. 2,136—Mr. McKinnon:

As of February 18, 1981, how many (a) lieutenant generals (b) major generals, were there in the Canadian Armed Forces?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): As of February 18, 1981: (a) 7; (b) 22.

[English]

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, in my comments on Friday, when I made the bulk of my contribution to this debate, I mentioned that I was not totally happy with the package before us. It does not provide the kind of base upon which to build the Canada I would like to see. I also mentioned that I am not entirely happy with the process we have followed. I do not speak necessarily of unilateral action. I have been a bit unhappy with the lack of honesty of many of the people involved in this process of Constitution-making. I also pointed out that there are some things in this package which I consider to be of great importance. For those reasons I said that, although I was not entirely happy, I was prepared to support this document, and I will be proud of it when it becomes part of Canadian law.

In my concluding remarks on Friday, I referred specifically to the equalization clause and resource management clause in the Constitution. I pointed out that I consider these to be of great importance to the future of Canada.

I now want to return to my comments and say that the one thing in this document that is most important for me personally is the inclusion of the charter of rights. I have long believed that an entrenched charter of rights was very important for Canada. I have long been a champion of human rights for Canadians and, indeed, for all people of the world.

I have long been horrified by many of the violations of human rights committed throughout the history of Canada. One of the most famous has been quoted often in the last few months, namely the treatment of Japanese Canadians throughout our history, not only during the Second World War. Japanese Canadians lived in this country for three generations before being given the vote.

There have been other violations of human rights, such as the padlock laws of Quebec, the attempt to muzzle the press in Alberta, the many instances of unjustified strikes breaking throughout Canada, the IWA in Newfoundland, the Weyburn strike of the late thirties, the Winnipeg strike of 1919 and the Fleck strike in Centralia a year or so ago. Then, of course, there was the famous instance of the War Measures Act of 1970 when some 450 Quebecers were held without just cause, and the shameful abuse of that act's terms carried on by the then mayor of Vancouver, Tom Campbell, who used the act to rid the city of unemployed young people whom he simply disliked.

I ask myself over the years: This is happening in my country, my Canada? I just cannot believe it. It is for this reason that I believe we must entrench human rights. These rights must be protected by the law and courts of this country; it is not something that can be left to the legislatures of Canada. I need only refer to the padlock laws and instances involving the press. As my colleague, the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), said in his speech in this debate:

The time has come to recognize that Canadians all over the land have fundamental rights and freedoms which no government can arbitrarily take away.

I might point out, as others in my caucus have done, that the CCF and NDP have long been champions of human rights. Indeed, in the Regina Manifesto of 1933, the twelfth and thirteenth policy proposals called for freedom and social justice. It was the CCF government under Tommy Douglas which in 1947 legislated the first bill of rights in Saskatchewan. Over the years the Canadian Labour Congress, and such outstanding Canadian democratic socialists as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and F. R. Scott, have fought for human rights in this country.

It is my firm belief, Mr. Speaker, that a charter of rights must be entrenched now, before patriation. If not, I think it likely that we would never get such a charter. Why do I say this? Because, frankly and with all due respect, I do not trust some of our premiers. I need only to refer to the Premier of my province, Sterling Lyon. As I said on Friday, as a Manitoban I am somewhat ashamed of his stance on this package. His main and often only point of contention with the package has been the entrenched bill of rights. One is sometimes led to believe that the soon to be former Premier of Manitoba does not believe that Canadians are entitled to the enjoyment of fundamental rights. Mr. Lyon has been described by a leading Canadian journalist as "the reincarnation of a seventeenth century village reeve."

An hon. Member: That is an insult to the reeves.

Mr. Sargeant: At no time has this been truer than in his approach to the charter. My hon. friend from Burnaby said in his speech on February 23, 1981, as reported at page 7596 of Hansard:

> We know where the premiers stand. We know where Sterling Lyon, the Premier of Manitoba, stands on the charter of rights. He said that we have not: "... had the experience of significant rights, entrenched in the Constitution, inhibiting the development of new rights, such as the rights of handicapped people, or the right to privacy".
> In other words, we should not be putting the rights of the handicapped in the Constitution because we have no experience with them. Mr. Lyon says it is not the Canadian way to give Canadians fundamental rights and that:
> "Manitoba's position was broadly supported by a majority of the provinces".
> He says that entrenchment of rights is contrary to traditional and successful parliamentary government and that:
> "There is no historical justification for the entrenchment of a charter of rights—".

I would like to repeat the question asked that day by the hon. member for Burnaby.

> What evidence does he have that Premier Lyon is prepared to change his mind today?
> —prepared to allow the hopes and aspirations of the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are handicapped, and the aboriginal peoples, women's groups and others to depend on the whims of Premier Lyon of Manitoba? I say no. I say we should move on this charter today, and move with pride.

I recognize and welcome some of the very important changes that have guaranteed basic rights for handicapped persons, for multicultural groups and my French-speaking brothers and sisters across this land, and for women. Some of these rights were granted immediately, without a fight; others had to be fought for. Some, such as women's rights, could with some slight changes be greatly strengthened, but the issue upon which my support turned was the matter of native rights. Given my continued discomfort at supporting a Liberal document, I would have found it almost impossible to support had native rights not been entrenched.

I lived and worked with native Canadians for many years in a community in northern Manitoba. In my constituency there are 11 Indian reserves and many more Métis communities. I have seen first hand, too often, the disgraceful living conditions to which we whites, newcomers to this land, have relegated our natives. Once again, I do not find the native rights amendment to be ideal; it could be much stronger. Indeed, I hope to see accepted an amendment put forward by this party that will strengthen the native and aboriginal rights clause.

As well, I was somewhat displeased with the process followed here. I was at the dinner of the First Nation's Conference here in Ottawa last spring. I heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promise the Indian people a full role in the development of our Constitution. I then saw him completely renege on this promise and I would like to know why.

I was displeased with a second aspect of the struggle for entrenchment of these rights. As I said earlier, I question the intellectual honesty of most of the participants in this whole constitution process. Why was the inclusion of native and aboriginal rights not automatic? Should the need for such a guarantee not have been self-evident and not merely granted to secure my vote and those of my colleagues? Is this Constitution writing or political gamesmanship?

Let me tell the House that nevertheless I was one very pleased and proud person when I learned we had finally won the battle to have these rights entrenched. I share the belief of my caucus colleagues and native groups across the country that if we did not get these rights guaranteed now we would have lost the fight forever. We simply could not have relied on the provinces to add these rights at a later date; to have lost these rights would have been to betray the trust of the native and aboriginal peoples of Canada. I believe this victory of including these rights to be of profound historical importance, that it will become the single most important clause in this package, and for that reason alone the package is worth supporting. After 114 years as a nation we are finally admitting that the people who inhabited this land for thousands of years before we came do have some rights. As my friend, the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar), said on February 18 in this House, as reported at page 7448 of Hansard:

> The recognition and affirmation of aboriginal rights at the constitutional level provides protection against the erosion of these rights. It means that federal government lawyers can never again argue against the existence of aboriginal rights, as they did in court—

But—and unfortunately, there always seem to be "but's" to Liberal proposals—these rights, now constitutionally guaranteed, must be lived up to. The government must not think that now that they have entrenched these rights they can go back to their old ways of dealing with our native peoples. Indians, Inuit and Métis are going to expect and demand drastic changes. Many of these changes will be attitudinal and constitutional, many merely technical, but they must be brought about and brought about now.

In his speech my friend the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly), my party's native affairs critic, issued challenges to the government to prove by action how serious it is about the recognition of these rights. I want to add a warning to that challenge. There are 32 New Democrats in this corner of the House and thousands more across the land who are going to be hounding the government constantly to ensure that this guarantee of rights is turned into meaningful action and does not become merely words on paper.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Verchères): Mr. Speaker, the speeches delivered in the House by hon. members surely attest to the historical significance of the majority report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, this debate is all about our country, its independence and the political shape it will take. It is all about the future of Canadians and the protection of individual citizens in our society. Of course we do have immediate economic, social and cultural needs which Parliament should be tackling. The government is busy governing, whereas Parliament affects the course of the nation's ship by steering to port or to starboard. Right now, Mr. Speaker, the House is looking after a review of the orders for the captain and his crew.

When the Dominion of Canada was created by the proclamation of the British North America Act in 1867, the deciding vote was prompted by the desire to attain security, well-being and prosperity. The charter served us well over a century which was highlighted by unprecedented festivities centred in Montreal during the centennial year. Nonetheless, throughout the second half of that century Canadians were increasingly concerned as they felt the need to improve the political structure of the young federation and to strengthen the essential foundation of an independent federative country.

The Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took the opportunity to enter politics to help the Canadian nation grow and to serve Canadians. With utmost patience this statesman, regardless of what may be said, worked in the national political system for 12-odd years to plan, refine, negotiate, coax, adjust, push and yield so as to reach an agreement on the subject of a Constitution, of an amending formula and of a charter of rights and freedoms, for our Prime Minister considered that the first step in politics is to seek the support of the majority of our people.

Mr. Speaker, as a member fulfilling in this House a national commitment toward all Canadians, I am proud to be able to offer my support and, in addition, as spokesman for the riding of Verchères, to voice my approval for the task which the Prime Minister began anew and which was changed and modified during the negotiations with the provinces, the opposition parties and the people that appeared before the joint committee of the House and the Senate. Far from procrastinating still more, Mr. Speaker, time has come for us to get down to brass tacks and to assume our responsibilities. We must decide what we want, yet leaving ourselves enough elbow room to make constitutional changes in the future. Time has come for us to give clear orders to the current and future leaders of the national ship, a precise direction and course as well as political parameters tailored to contemporary realities in a shrunken and politically unstable world. I have in mind the problems of the major political forces, the so-called North-South difficulties, the religious upheavals, the disparities between economically strong and weak regions. In that context we would be better advised to stop promising to do something later. We must act now to reinforce the vested rights of every Canadian which are protected by a strong political regime in an independent, well balanced and just country.

A host of historic reasons require that we act now. During these debates we have heard many times that for 54 years we have been seeking the perfect solution acceptable to one and all. Alas, there is no perfection in this world, certainly not in the political actualities where we must assume and discharge the responsibility to act according to the best criteria available. However, so that we will act more confidently this time, I would like to make a brief survey of the reasons for our failures in past constitutional discussions. The problem stems originally from the constitutional fault which the Fathers of Confederation did not detect in the 1867 British North America pact. The impasse in the Canadian federalism of which we must break out today is the result of its historic evolution based on that text. Indeed half a century of discussions among specialists and politicians is implied in this debate. Mr. Speaker, to highlight the reason for the federal pact and not a strict piece of legislation of 1867, I take as witness a respected authority of those days, the Hon. J. Brown, who on February 28, 1865, said in the debate leading to confederation, and I quote:

> There is another reason why the union cannot be legislative: it would have been impossible to have it adopted. It was simply a matter of either accepting a federal union or ending negotiations. Not only were our friends from Lower Canada against it, but so were the delegates from the maritime provinces as well. We had no choice, it was going to be a federal union or nothing at all.

The long-awaited birth of our country was not easy and, Canadians being traditionally cautious, we decided to Canadianize our constitution in the 1931 Statute of Westminster. Although we had the ideal opportunity to take charge of our own affairs, our political prudence made us miss out on an appropriate amending formula. Under the provisions of that legislation the British parliament kept very limited powers: it could legislate on behalf of Canada, but our country remained free to accept that legislation.

It could amend the Canadian Constitution but only at Canada's request and Canada would thereafter have full and complete authority to legislate in matters of international scope. Britain agreed to the requests made by Canada at the Imperial conferences of 1926 and 1930, and Canada thereby became a free and independent nation in control of its destiny. That is clearly stated in the Balfour report where it defines the Commonwealth with respect to Canada, Australia, South Africa and New Zealand. They are, it says, independent and equal communities within the British empire. They are in no way subjugated to one another. Unfortunately, since we missed out on the amending formula, we were still not completely free from London. That is why a third attempt was made at the 1935 federal-provincial conference. It was recommended that a task force be set up to consider the best way of amending the Constitution. Despite 11 sittings, the task force did not come up with an adequate amending formula. Pursuant to a request made in 1949 by the Canadian Parliament to the British parliament, the British North America act was amended to allow the Canadian Parliament to amend the act in matters not coming under the jurisdiction of the provinces. In that case, Ottawa acted unilaterally without provincial consent.

The following year, under the government of Louis St. Laurent, a federal-provincial conference was called to come up with an amending formula of concern to provincial as well as federal governments. No agreement came out of that conference either and especially, no important decision was reached in order to overcome this obstacle, the main reason being that the different parties were still concerned about their vested rights. A royal commission of inquiry was then set up and the Tremblay report, published in 1956, stated the provinces' opposition to the central government. A mere four years later, another attempt was made at patriation starting with the federal-provincial conference of July 1960. This time it was not a Liberal government which failed but the government of John Diefenbaker, with its Fulton formula. That amendment and patriation formula did receive almost total support from the various parties once again without the consensus required by the existing political rules.

After this sixth national attempt by justice ministers, the possibility of ever reaching full consensus was being seriously questioned. Responding to public opinion at that time, the Diefenbaker government managed to have the Canadian Bill of Rights passed unanimously. But Mr. Diefenbaker, faced with the political fact that the provinces could not reach agreement, did not enshrine the bill in the Constitution. At that time, Jean Lesage was Premier of Quebec and to help advance the constitutional debate he called for an interprovincial conference in Quebec City. Yet, by 1962, the Diefenbaker minority government abandoned the proposed legislation for lack of consensus. Two years later, the federal and provincial officials had gone further than ever before in reaching an agreement on an amending formula. On August 3, 1964, in Jasper, the provincial attorneys general reached an agreement and on October 14, recommended that the first ministers accept the new Fulton-Favreau formula which was afterwards approved by nine provinces. In its throne speech of January 21, 1965, the Lesage government announced its intention of recommending to the National Assembly approval of the Fulton-Favreau formula. We were on the verge of a solution. We were about to enter the promised land, but with the foundation of the RIN, separatism became institutionalized in Quebec. Under the pressure exerted, among others, by Jacques-Yvan Morin, Lesage, a year after stating that he would make the Fulton-Favreau go through, refused to consider it any longer.

A year later, in a supposed last ditch attempt, and riding the crest of the centennial celebrations, the Premier of Ontario, John Robarts, called for an interprovincial conference in Toronto. It became obvious that Quebec had quickly relinquished any national approach. Daniel Johnson demanded control of his province's relations with certain countries or international agencies, and he demanded also that residual powers be provincial and that the federal government's disowning and declaratory powers be repealed. The constitutional pendulum had just swung to the other side. I should perhaps also remind hon. members that 1967 was the year when a French president visited Canada and did not behave quite like the other heads of state who came to mark our centennial. And in spite of his popular and public statement which was, to say the least, controversial, during that same year, the courts added a dash of seasoning to the sauce by ruling that the federal government had exclusive jurisdiction over offshore mineral resources on the Pacific coast, on the basis of the national application of residuary powers and international implications.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, an eighth attempt was made, namely, the constitutional review process of 1967-71. The right hon. Prime Minister was in some ways the major architect of this process. After six meetings of the premiers, 26 meetings of ministers and numerous meetings of federal and provincial officials, this process finally led to the Victoria charter. Meetings became the order of the day. They were nearly a separate industry. The Canadian government and eight provincial governments agreed to this charter on June 16, 1971. But it was with some reluctance I must say, since I followed those events closely at the time, that the Quebec government, after an animated debate in the National Assembly under the government of Robert Bourassa, rejected the Victoria charter, giving as its official reason that section 94A was too vague. The province wanted extended powers in the fields of communications, immigration and external relations, and paramountcy in the field of social policy. In view of the position taken by the Quebec government, the newly elected government in Saskatchewan decided not to take a stand on this issue.

With the best will in the world, in a climate of nationalism resulting from the centennial celebrations and in spite of much patience and technical ability, the unanimous agreement required by the purists slipped away from the politicians, first because of the claims made by one province, and then because of the inexperience of a newly elected provincial government. However, no one wanted to give up, and a ninth attempt was made at the federal-provincial conference of 1975 where the Prime Minister of Canada suggested a more limited approach than that used in the 1971 process. The Right Hon. Prime Minister suggested that an attempt be made first of all to agree on an amending formula and certain guarantees for linguistic rights. The premiers discussed this proposal at two meetings, and on October 14, 1976, they informed the federal government that they could not agree to patriate the Constitution without a more extended constitutional reform involving transfers of federal jurisdictions to the provinces.

A tenth attempt was made at the federal-provincial conference of first ministers in October 1978, following the introduction in the Canadian Parliament of Bill C-60. The standing committee of ministers was then established by the premiers. Three meetings were held and the ministers involved reported to their premier. There was still no agreement. Last June, and this was after the referendum and in a climate of urgency, the premiers instructed their ministers to proceed to a complete review of the Constitution and to discuss 12 points, including patriation and the amending formula. Once again last summer, Mr. Speaker, it was impossible to reach a consensus. All these facts, Mr. Speaker, are well known to historians and Members of Parliament. I wanted to have them put on record once again to remind the House, the media and the Canadian people that the efforts made by the Liberal government come within well-known, well-tried and well-analysed historical, political and constitutional parameters both on the federal and on the provincial side. Mr. Speaker, last September, following the failure of the negotiations held during the summer barely a few months after the Quebec referendum which shook the entire country, we were forced once again to recognize that we had failed and had reached a deadlock.

Our 11 first ministers were unable to reach an agreement in spite of a climate of urgency. If the premiers had shown a firm determination to find a solution when the negotiations opened in June, they quickly reverted to their former tactics and strategies of haggling over the price of their support. They surely were aware of the yearning of Canadians for the last step toward total sovereignty which patriation represents, but they allowed their own respective regional interests to outweigh Canada's national interests.

By doing so, they played into the hands of separatist René Lévesque, this new self-appointed champion of federalism. In September, therefore, we were compelled to face this deadlock as well as the need for urgent action, for it is clear that in the eighties and the decades thereafter, a major political action will be needed to stand the enormous pressure resulting from the economic concentration of national and multinational corporations, the expansion of communication medias and the realization of the global village.

The world energy crisis, a very good example of things to come, has made us realize the need to consolidate the sovereign power of the Canadian state on the one hand, and to protect the fundamental rights of the individuals within a strong and independent state on the other. More than ever before there is need to co-ordinate our actions. The present calls for it, the past demonstrates it and reason requires it. Mr. Speaker, it was in that context that we, the federal members of the House of Commons, decided last September on a new course of action. Sure enough, the decision was not an easy one to make and there were indeed very few options. Either we would move into a twelfth round with these partners of ours who cannot even agree among themselves, as was confirmed by Premier Blakeney when he appeared before the Joint Committee in December, 1980, or we would proceed unilaterally.

Mr. Speaker, the constitutional history we have lived over the past half century clearly demonstrates that a consensus among our 11 first ministers is something that is impossible. This concept was but a dream and we must now recognize it as such. A great many Canadian politicians and journalists have already reached that conclusion. As a matter of fact, Charles Lynch had this to say last February—he is probably a non-Conservative Alberta-born Canadian, therefore an enemy of the Progressive Conservative Party: "Everybody agrees on the need to patriate the Canadian Constitution, but not on the way to do so. In my opinion, the only person who can manage that and get away with it is certainly Pierre Trudeau. On the strength of a fourth mandate, with all the advantages of his wisdom and experience, he is taking a chance no prime minister before him has ever dared to take and none after him will ever dare to take. If we do not patriate the Canadian Constitution now, we will never do it."

Mr. Speaker, unilateral action being the only alternative to this dead end, we needed only to answer these two very simple questions: First, do we have the right to take unilateral action, and second, if we do have this right, what should be the nature of our action? Looking into the first question, we suddenly realized—with astonishment, I must confess—that the federal government now has the necessary power to amend the Canadian Constitution in every respect without the consent of the provinces. There is nothing to it, really: as long as our Constitution remains in London, all the federal government needs to do is to have a resolution requesting this or that amendment passed by a majority of the House and the Senate. Once the resolution has reached London, the British government has no choice, on the basis of the law, tradition and custom, but to comply with the wishes of both these Houses.

That is the situation which caused Viscount Bennett to make the following statement while adressing the House of Lords in Westminster in 1946:

> Of all the dominions, only Canada may with a majority vote of its parties amend its constitution. They cannot do so directly, but certainly they can do so indirectly, as we have agreed to pass all the legislation they would care to pass.

This power of the federal government to amend unilaterally our constitutional rules was also recognized by a number of provincial premiers and especially during the federal-provincial conference of 1950. At the conference, the Premier of New Brunswick, Mr. McNair, expressed the following opinion unequivocally: "In the final analysis, the provinces are not sure of having their say with regard to constitutional amendment, even when these are closely related to their interests. Consequently, this is the situation in which the provinces now find themselves, according to me, at this stage in our constitutional reform. First, with regard to constitutional change, the Parliament of Canada is in fact the judge, and the only judge, in the matter of knowing whether or not the rights and privileges of the provinces will be affected. Second, as a consequence, the sole protector the provinces have today against the arbitrary invasion of their rights, powers and jurisdictions is the Parliament of Canada itself."

Finally, Mr. Speaker, as I do not want to use up too much of the time allotted me for my speech dealing with the legality of the unilateral move of the federal government, I refer you to the excellent accounts given by my colleague from Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal) and Senator Lamontagne in the Senate: they will convince you of its legality and will make you understand that the unilateral decision of the federal government is in fact legal. So, Mr. Speaker, though unilateral action may be undesirable politically, its legality is demonstrated, and that approach seems to us to be the only one possible to break the deadlock. We must then reflect upon the substance of such action. In that regard, I feel today, as I did last September, first, that patriation cannot take place without an amending formula being provided; to do otherwise would be to enshrine the deadlock, the status quo. Second, that a charter of rights and freedoms should be entrenched in our new Constitution provided, however, the provisions of such a charter have at some time or other in our history, our discussions in Canada, met with the approval of a majority of Canadians.

Let us examine together, Mr. Speaker, what this resolution provides with regard to the amending formula. Basically, one could say it falls under three headings. First, the rule of unanimity continues to apply for the next two years; second, if seven provinces representing 80 per cent of the population agree during those two years on any other amending formula, one of two things can happen: the government either accepts the formula of the provinces or it turns it down, in which case the people of Canada, from whom every government in this country holds its authority and legitimacy, will have to choose either the formula of the provinces or that of the federal government. Third, if the provinces fail to come up with an amending formula in that two-year period, the so-called Victoria formula will then become the official amending formula of Canada.

Those then are the possible scenarios but, underlying them all, and this is of prime importance, is the fact that henceforth the federal government will no longer be able to change the Constitution unilaterally. Mr. Speaker, those who would cry rape can see at least that in so doing, the federal government gives up a power, a prerogative, a privilege that no province endowed with it would agree to renounce on its own initiative. What we are dealing with here is not federal intervention in provincial jurisdiction but the official recognition of the role of the provinces in the constitutional process; some centralization indeed, Mr. Speaker!

Finally, like my colleague the hon. member for Rosemont (Mr. Lachance), I admit the Victoria formula may have its weaknesses, but I dare hope we can come up with a better one in the next two years. Otherwise, how could I, as a francophone, a Quebecer, oppose the Victoria formula which gives Quebec the right of veto forever? It would mean that henceforth no constitutional change can be made in Canada without Quebec agreeing to it. What more could one want? I admit readily that the right of veto granted Quebec may annoy or, to say the least, intrigue or worry hon. members from the other provinces. Might I remind them, however, that, at least with regard to linguistic and cultural rights, it is imperative that Quebec have that right of veto; without it the social and political order in this country would be potentially threatened. Mr. Speaker, that right of veto is a major gain for Quebec and all francophones in this country.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there is the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. What may one think of it? First, that it is imperfect? Second, incomplete? Third, unfinished? But I think it is at least a step in the right direction.

What is to be found in that Machiavellian proposal? In section 1, we have a statement of the rights and freedoms. The following sections deal with fundamental freedoms, democratic rights, mobility rights, legal rights, equality rights, the official languages of Canada, minority language educational rights, rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada, and finally, with the principle of equalization and regional disparities. This package also deals with a referendum, a constitutional deadlock-breaking mechanism, with an opting in formula for the provinces who would like to implement institutional bilingualism, and finally a greater recognition of provincial rights on natural resources.

Mr. Speaker, who is really opposed to that in Canada? This charter takes powers away, but not from the provinces for the benefit of the federal government. That charter takes away powers both from the federal government and the provinces to give them to the citizens. Any man, any woman in this country will feel secure knowing that no government, regardless of the political or economic situation at any time, will be able to invade his or her private life. One only has to remember the padlock law in Quebec or the law against western Asiatics to appreciate that such things did not only happen on other continents but that they are the least glorious pages in our history.

Mr. Speaker, since time does not allow me to deal with every single provision of the charter, I shall only discuss those provisions concerning educational rights, institutional bilingualism, and refer briefly to mobility rights.

Section 23 which gives francophone minorities outside Quebec the right to have their children educated in French is, in my opinion, the most essential requirement to promote the French fact in Canada. I deeply regret that it was not possible to include institutional bilingualism in this charter and I regret even more the attitude of Bill Davis on this matter. Any Ontario premier is duty bound and has the clear obligation to grant the French-speaking people of his province this elementary right which is institutional bilingualism, namely, the use of both official languages in the provincial legislatures and in the provincial courts. It is a shame to see Mr. Davis wavering on this issue. And to those who ask why we do not force Ontario, my answer is, first, that we strongly feel inclined to do so, but if we were to force bilingualism on Ontario, I suggest that under this same principle, all the other provinces should be treated equally. Yet it is an illusion to believe that even technically every one of them would be able to comply with such an obligation.

What is even sadder for a francophone is to recall the debates held on bilingualism in Canada since 1969, especially in this House, and on the promotion of the French language. One must exercise some measure of pragmatism because one can easily understand that a twofold intervention in education and institutional bilingualism would jeopardize the very implementation of Section 23. But this is, in my opinion, an essential and basic requirement of our French-speaking countrymen in other provinces.

However, I cannot help but remind my Progressive Conservative friends that it is also their duty, their responsibility to help foster a proper climate and prepare the minds so that from now on, generously and openly, we may proceed with all the necessary reforms for the promotion of French throughout Canada. I suggest that the first step on their part would be to publicly and strongly denounce the racist remarks made recently in this House by some of their colleagues.

Finally Mr. Speaker, I want to denounce with the same vigour the Quebec separatists who claim that the implementation of Section 23 will restore in Quebec the same situation that existed before the enactment of Bill 22. Such a statement not only smells of demagogy but is utterly false. However, it shows so shamefully how little confidence those separatists have in the francophone Quebecers. Mr. Speaker, the French fact in Quebec is no longer at the survival stage, it is an established fact, a reality which day in and day out is confirmed and reaffirmed: we need only look at the number of francophone Quebecers in top management and in command of the major economic tools both in Quebec and in Canada to be reassured about our state of health.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the provisions dealing with mobility rights, I do hope that we will bring about an improvement quickly, and move further on because there are already too many economic obstacles within Canada. As the hon. member for Rosemont pointed out, despite our federal framework, economic integration in Canada is in many respects still falling short of whatever economic integration there is within the Common Market. Mr. Speaker, this is the result of decisions reflecting too short a vision, an outdated regionalism, and a lack of knowledge and confidence in this country. There is also reflected some kind of suspicion on the part of one province toward all the others. To go on in that direction and to give in to an intensification of such decisions in the future would jeopardize our collective and individual well-being.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, after due analysis, I am convinced that this charter, even though it is not perfect, will be a very significant asset for all Canadians and will beget the envy of the whole world which has been concernedly monitoring the efforts we have made in this field for half a century. This is not the first crisis Canada has had to undergo. This time, our country intends to take a step further toward its full independence. One only has to recall the debates that preceded the passing of the Canadian citizenship bill. Also to be recalled is the storm which brewed—stirred by John Diefenbaker's own personality—when Canadians most legitimately decided to adopt a symbol of their own, namely a Canadian flag. Now, they want a Constitution of their own and they want it here, in Canada, so that they will never again have to ask a foreign country, however friendly, to amend the laws that govern us. By this process, we are completing the work that began more than half a century ago and we are doing it in a modern way, in the same spirit that guided our forefathers and founders and in circumstances as conflicting as the ones which then prevailed.

Mr. Speaker, we must eagerly support this resolution because the desire of the Canadian people is clear. An absolute consensus is an impossible thing to achieve and it is historically urgent to take conclusive action. It is our duty as Canadians to do so.

To conclude my remarks, I shall quote from a speech made in 1935 by the hon. member for Trois-Rivières—a region which is dear to the heart of our Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien)—when the Statute of Westminster was passed. This is what he said:

> This is the final step in our great march toward progress, civilization, freedom and world status.

And this is to be done, Mr. Speaker, without haste or violence. This is a wonderful example of the primacy of patience over impulsiveness, of pragmatism over theories, of evolution over revolutions. This is what the people from Verchères think.

[English]

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Loiselle), who has just finished speaking, called in the latter part of his speech upon members of this party to denounce members on this side who had supposedly made racist remarks in terms of the French fact. I remind the hon. member, who should know, that a few years ago the denunciations of members opposite were being directed at the then member for Crowfoot. Jack Horner was epitomized as the red-neck, anti-French, Conservative westerner. Yet that did not prevent the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), this hypocritical Prime Minister of that hypocritical party, from buying him off. It did not prevent the hon. member for Verchères from being Mr. Horner's parliamentary secretary when he was the minister of industry, trade and commerce.

[Translation]

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Verchères on a point of order.

Mr. Loiselle: I wish to remind this member from Alberta that I was proud and honored to act as parliamentary secretary to Mr. Jack Horner, but I remind him as well that before Mr. Horner crossed the aisle, I had read his speech and he, at least, had not indulged in racist remarks.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary Centre has the floor.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member opposite had his 40 minutes. I just wanted to remind him of the hypocrisy of the statement he made earlier accusing members on this side of the House of being racist or bigots. He should look at members of his own party and the ministers he has served.

I for one will never forget, during the election of 1974, the ads in French, in Quebec, which read "Qui? M. Trudeau ou Mr. Stanfield?" That was blatant racism in the ads run by that party, and for you to stand up now and lecture this side of the House is more than I am prepared to endure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is aware that his remarks should be addressed to the Chair.

Mr. Andre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I commence my remarks at this stage of this historical debate, let me join those others who have complimented the joint committee on the work it performed and the manner in which it operated. In particular, I want to compliment the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal) for the excellent way in which he co-chaired the committee. Later in my remarks I will have less complimentary things to say about that member's position on this immoral, if not illegal, constitutional proposal which the Prime Minister is attempting to jam down the throats of Canadians.

Mr. Sargeant: The referendum.

Mr. Andre: I hear the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant) interrupting. I wonder if there is any limit to the hypocrisy of the New Democratic Party. The member stood up this afternoon and in his remarks said that he was voting for this proposal because of the charter of rights. Why? Because he does not trust the premiers, he says. He does not trust the premiers! Apparently he does not trust the Premier of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Sargeant: I said "some of them".

Mr. Andre: What he is saying, Mr. Speaker, is that he does not trust the people of Manitoba. If he is so right and the Premier of Manitoba is so wrong, and if he is so confident, then let the people of Manitoba decide.

Miss Jewett: They will be deciding.

Mr. Andre: I would like to remind the hon. member of the position taken by the government of Saskatchewan and the New Democratic Premier of Saskatchewan. The premier said:

> Many of you will know that I have opposed in principle the constitutional entrenchment of the charter of rights.

The hypocrisy of the New Democrats exceeds only the stupidity of the Liberals—some of them.

Miss Jewett: Talk about your own hypocrisy for a while.

Mr. Andre: This is the first opportunity I have had, Mr. Speaker, to speak in this debate. This is not by choice. Last October when the Prime Minister first introduced this abomination, debate was cut off prematurely and ruthlessly by closure—a brutal silencing of the minority parties in this House by the majority party, all in the name of expediting a constitutional proposal which purports, among other things, to protect minorities.

Within hours of an exchange of letters, which placed the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) securely in the Prime Minister's pocket, the Prime Minister brought down the guillotine to cut off debate lest Canadians became too fully aware of what he was proposing. It is worth reminding the House of the smug and jubilant attitude of the New Democratic Party's leader after he received the Prime Minister's letter. He crowed to the press that he had secured from the Prime Minister a commitment on an amendment that would assuage the concerns of the western provinces about resource ownership and, thus, make the package acceptable to the west, and in particular to the province of Saskatchewan. How stupid that statement from the member for Oshawa looks today when Roy Romanow, the attorney general for Saskatchewan, is now in London saying that nothing could be further from the truth.

• (1600)

The Liberals deserve the anger and bitterness directed at them for the use of closure. The NDP deserve the contempt and jeers directed at them for making it possible for the Prime Minister to use closure. One wonders how long it will take the NDP to learn they cannot keep getting in bed with the Liberals and continue to claim to be virtuous.

The NDP paid dearly for the pact that David Lewis made with the Liberals in 1972 to 1974. They shall pay dearly again for the pact the hon. member for Oshawa has made. The people of the west who voted NDP at the last election did not do so in order that their interests would be sold out by a misguided NDP leadership. The behaviour of the New Democratic Party since October 2, last year, is perplexing in some ways. The charitable explanation is that on October 2, with the very short notice that all opposition parties were given—unlike my leader, who immediately saw the danger and folly of the Prime Minister's proposals—the Leader of the New Democratic Party erroneously decided that the constitutional proposals would be popular and therefore he would support them. It soon became evident that he was mistaken, and he attempted to become the champion of western discontent by negotiating with the Prime Minister on resource control. This earned him only contempt; first, for negotiating with the Prime Minister and, second, for settling next to nothing, whereas he could have bargained for much more.

Having gone this far and gained nothing but more problems, his choice was to drop support for the Prime Minister's package or convince an increasingly restless caucus that the least damaging posture would be to stick to the original position of supporting the Prime Minister. He chose the latter, mistakenly believing that there would be less damage to his party sticking to his guns rather than doing the right thing for the country. Four of his members said no, and in the weeks ahead many more of his members will wish they had said no.

The last charitable explanation of the NDP behaviour is that the Prime Minister and the Leader of the New Democratic Party have a private deal, and that the New Democratic Party leader will be looked after at a later date. When Patrick Watson, on national television, asked the hon. member for Oshawa whether or not this was true, the NDP leader said no; but the look on his face was rather like that of a small child with crumbs on his chin when asked by his mother whether he had been into the cookie jar.

Whatever the explanation for the behaviour of the NDP, next to Canada itself they are the big losers in this constitutional debate; and the longer the debate, the more the pain. Thus we have the unseemly behaviour of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) openly co-operative with the government House leader in attempts to limit and curtail the debate. This is very unseemly behaviour for one who purports to be the great defender of the role and rights of Parliament.

NDP support and chicanery notwithstanding, the fact is that the Prime Minister has no mandate and no moral justification for what he is doing. In the election of last year, the Prime Minister was mute on the constitutional question, as he was mute on most other questions. Never did he tell Canadians that if he were elected he would impose this abomination on the country. The sad fact that Canadians are now only beginning to realize is that on February 18, 1980, Canada elected the least responsible and most powerful Prime Minister the country has ever had.

There are essentially no countervailing forces or balances or checks on prime ministerial power. Having once retired, the Prime Minister has little concern for his prospects of re-election, and thus the check that that concern would have placed on his exercise of power is gone. He has never really been a Liberal Party partisan and is in no way tempered by the fact that he is destroying the Liberal Party's prospects in western Canada for at least a generation; and thus, that check on his exercise of power is also gone.

Virtually his first act as Prime Minister in 1969 was to change the House rules—by closure, incidentally—to make it impossible for the opposition to hold him to account for his actions; therefore that check on his power is also gone. Then after 12 years of culling he removed from his caucus any and all members who had enough personal political strength to stand up and oppose this mad scheme.

An hon. Member: Name them.

Mr. Andre: With a few notable exceptions—and if it pleases them, look in the mirror and they will be the exceptions—the Liberal caucus today consists of a mediocre group of sheep drooling, if not slobbering, in anticipation of perquisites the Prime Minister can give his blindly loyal supporters.

That is the sad state of democracy in Canada today. Opposed by eight provinces, opposed by the official opposition, opposed by the vast majority of what might be referred to as the cognoscenti of Canada, and opposed by the majority of Canadians, the Prime Minister nevertheless blasts ahead describing the wounds and divisions he leaves as exhilarating.

The only explanation given for this perverse, if not mad, behaviour is the claim that he made a promise to the people of Quebec during the referendum. The thing I find amazing is how many of his sheeplike followers keep repeating the justification in spite of the fact that every political party in Quebec—including the Liberal Party and its leader, the chairman of the No forces—virtually every newspaper and, according to Gallup, the majority of the population opposes this package. In essence, they are saying to Quebecers, "We made a promise and now we are going to keep it, even if we have to jam this Constitution down your throats."

Mr. Speaker, as the member for Montmorency-Orléans (Mr. Duclos) stated in his excellent address to this House on March 12, had the people of Quebec known at the time what the Prime Minister had in mind, they might well have voted Yes in far greater numbers than was the case. But the fact is that no such promise was made by the Prime Minister during the referendum campaign. As pointed out by Ian MacDonald in a column in the Montreal Gazette, the Prime Minister mentioned constitutional reform only six days before the end of the referendum campaign, after the victory of the No forces was assured. As Ian MacDonald stated in his column:

He seized on the event as a pretext achieving his obsessive goal of patriation and a bill of rights. As one Trudeau aide later put it, "He sees the referendum not as an end in itself, but as a means to an end." In a sense, what Trudeau is in the process of doing now is keeping the promise he made to himself, not to Quebec on behalf of the country.

There is absolutely no way that a fair-minded person can conclude anything but that the Prime Minister has no mandate whatsoever for what he is doing. The process he has embarked on is absolutely illegitimate, if not illegal. The legality of what the Prime Minister is attempting to do is certainly a moot question. The Manitoba Appeal Court produced a split decision. The Quebec and Newfoundland courts are still to be heard from, and so is the Supreme Court of Canada. Newspapers and magazines are literally filled with essays and articles by experts on constitutional law who question the legality of this procedure.

Under these circumstances, reasonable behaviour by a reasonable person would be to await final adjudication as to the legality before proceeding, but as we know from that infamous leaked Privy Council document of last summer, the government feels there is a strategic advantage to blasting ahead prior to the courts being allowed to make a decision. This is shameful behaviour at any time, Mr. Speaker, but in regard to a constitution the legality and legitimacy of which should be beyond question, this behaviour is, as the Hon. Robert Stanfield described it recently, essentially a coup d'état.

One thing that can be said with certainty is that even if this procedure is legal, then it is legal only because of a loophole in the law. Mr. Justice O'Sullivan, one of the dissenting judges in the Manitoba case, said that, if this procedure is legal:

The Attorney General of Canada ends up in the proposition that a political party, if it forms the majority of both Houses of the Canadian Parliament, has the power to amend the Constitution of our country as it pleases.

Only in totalitarian states—such as, most recently, Chile, and before that Cuba and the Soviet Union—do you have circumstances where the party in power, by itself, writes the constitution of a country. Nowhere in the democratic world is there an example of one party with a transient majority having written and imposed a constitution that lasts when faced with the kind of overwhelming opposition this constitutional proposal faces.

Furthermore, in regard to constitutional change the real question is not the legality of the procedure but the legitimacy of the procedure, legitimacy being that unspoken consensus which allows governments to rule without having to resort to fear or force. This constitutional proposal lacks that legitimacy. It lacks that broad-based consensus which is absolutely vital if the Constitution is to work and to inspire respect and adherence without the threat of force.

Using his transient majority of 144 trained seals, as one reporter called them, to have the British force this package on Canadians will not give us a true Constitution; it will only create division and, I fear, could cause irreparable harm.

The Prime Minister, as my leader once observed in this House, has only the Criminal Code as his moral code. In other words, if it is legal, it is moral. One would have hoped that the Leader of our Government had a higher standard. The renowned Soviet dissident, Alexander Solzhenitsyn, in his 1978 book called "The Decline of Courage", wrote:

The rule of law in itself is too cold and too formal an instrument to exercise a beneficial influence on society. When life is wholly permeated with legal decision, an atmosphere of moral mediocrity is then created which stifles the best inspirations of man and in the face of the trying time ahead of us legal criteria will be of no avail to make people stand upright.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) laughs. I suggest that the writings of Solzhenitsyn would make excellent reading for him, and they are in printed form.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: You should read your speech before coming into the House.

Mr. Andre: If the Minister of Justice is like his leader, probably he prefers the writings of Fidel to those of Solzhenitsyn.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: The only way the Constitution can gain the acceptance, the respect, or, in other words, the legitimacy it must have to work is if that Constitution is made here in Canada by Canadians employing a process acceptable to a clear consensus of the Canadian population. There is no need for the Prime Minister to proceed in the way he is. He could, if he put his responsibilities and supposed love of his country ahead of his pride, accept the suggestion made by my leader and the constitutional spokesman from my party, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp)—

Mr. Chrétien: Where is he now?

Mr. Kempling: That is a low blow.

Mr. Andre: —and at this time simply ask the British to patriate the Constitution with the Vancouver amending formula, and let us make all future amendments here in Canada by Canadians.

Mr. Nowlan: You have been sick a couple of times. That is really low of you.

An hon. Member: Remember, you were in hospital.

Mr. Chrétien: I was not in South Africa.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) has the floor.

Mr. Andre: The Minister of Justice is simply hurting in recognition that he is not half the man the hon. member for Provencher is—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I don't go to South Africa.

Mr. Andre: —when it comes to integrity and honesty, qualities which most Canadians hold in high esteem.

Mr. Chrétien: I don't go to South Africa.

Mr. Andre: No one who has any understanding of the Canada of today could possibly believe that constitutional change made in Britain, by the British, on our behalf could be conceived by the majority of Canadians as being anything else but illegitimate. A made-in-Britain constitution will never be accepted by Canadians.

Several speakers on behalf of the government position have taken a very critical view of the so-called Vancouver amending formula, claiming that it would impose or lead to a checkerboard or patchwork crazy-quilt pattern in Canada. As my colleague the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) pointed out in his speech of February 18, 1981, that observation is simply nonsensical. As the member for Rosedale indicated in his speech, we already have a patchwork or a checkerboard system in Canada. In 1867 the British North America Act established a checkerboard pattern. Section 92 of the BNA Act laid out provincial powers and provided that the provinces could do with them as they saw fit. In other words, the provinces could create a checkerboard pattern, and that has been the pattern in Canada for 114 years. Section 133 imposed conditions on Quebec by which other provinces were not affected. This proposal is a patchwork. We have been a checkerboard or patchwork quilt since confederation. Far from weakening Canada, this has contributed to uniting the country and making it strong.

Perhaps the most maddening aspect of this non-thinking criticism of the Vancouver formula is the fundamental dishonesty of the government's position, since the very proposal that it is now attempting to force upon the country will itself create a checkerboard. Whereas heretofore, at least since 1930, every province in Canada was equal, under the Victoria formula proposed by the government there will be perhaps as many as four classes of provinces, certainly three. This is a concept wholly unacceptable to those lower-class provinces and clearly unacceptable to the vast majority of fair-minded Canadians.

It is the contention of the Prime Minister's apologists that a provision allowing provinces to opt out of constitutional amendments unacceptable to a province will somehow, through this patchwork or crazy-quilt pattern which might result, end up in Canada being a lesser country. In proposing that position, these apologists show an abysmal ignorance both of the nature of Canada and of the nature of federal democratic countries around the world.

Is Switzerland any less a united federal state because it has five official languages and because the cantons or provinces are autonomous to the point that citizenship itself is actually granted by the canton and not by the central government? Is West Germany any less a united federal state because the border guards are members of the lander or provincial police forces rather than officers of the central government? Is the United States any less united as a result of the patchwork which results from each state having a different criminal code?

Is it not just possible that this patchwork in virtually every other federal democratic state on this planet is the very characteristic that creates unity in those federal countries as opposed to disunity? Even unitary states, such as the United Kingdom, have a wide variety of different regional or local governments and laws. The Isle of Man, which has been part of the United Kingdom for centuries, has its own separate parliament totally different from Westminster and totally different in character from the parliament of Northern Ireland and the parliaments of Scotland and Wales. The civil code in Scotland is different from that in England. Evidence from around the world overwhelmingly points to the fact that a patchwork or a crazy-quilt pattern, to use the government's phrase, is not only common but may be essential to the maintenance of a unified country.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, in comparing Canada to other federal states in the democratic world, the distinguishing feature about Canada is not that there is a crazy-quilt or checkerboard pattern but that there is very little or comparatively little difference across the country. The most serious difference and the difference which I think contributes most to the disunity of the country is that Canada alone among the federal states lacks any provincial or regional representation in the central government. Canada alone is attempting to maintain a national or federal government that is unitary in nature.

That is the real tragedy of what the Prime Minister is doing. The over-all thrust of the constitutional proposal is to make our government even more unitary in nature than it already is, whereas the crying need is for constitutional amendments that will recognize the federal nature of the country. It is interesting and sad to note that the one member of the cabinet who recognizes this fact through his chairmanship of the task force on national unity, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), has been utterly excluded from any participation in the current debate.

The Prime Minister simply does not know this country. He views Canada as Peter Newman, the editor of Maclean's, once observed, as basically consisting of Upper Canada, Lower Canada and outer Canada. He views Canada as a family formed by the marriage of Upper and Lower Canada, with the remaining provinces being the progeny or children of the marriage. To him we are all a family, but the parents must remain dominant and the children subservient or second class. What the Prime Minister does not recognize is that that model does not and will not fit Canada. It will never be accepted by outer Canadians. Canadians in my province and in the other western provinces are saying, "Please let us be first-class Canadians; let us count to the same extent as other Canadians."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: That is what is wrong with the government's proposed Victoria formula. It would encase in a Constitution, in perpetuity, a second-class status, if not a third-class status, for my province and for other provinces that make up outer Canada. I plead with the members of the government to stop and consider what they might be doing. To paraphrase Sir John A. Macdonald, if you treat people with respect, they will act as free people generally do; call them a faction and they will become factious. Impose this totally unacceptable amending formula on Canadians and you will weaken forever their commitment to Canada.

● (1620)

One of the personal disappointments to me in this constitutional debate has been the attitude and position taken by members of the government party who represent francophone constituencies. On many occasions since I have been a member I have heard francophone members pleading in this House, not in a subservient way but in a plaintive way, for an understanding of the fears and aspirations of Canada's French-speaking citizens. Many times I have heard members saying, in essence, that what they wanted was changes in Canada's federation that would give French-speaking Canadians the dignity, the opportunity and the respect due a first-class citizen.

I remember in particular the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve not too many years ago arguing on behalf of French-speaking air traffic controllers that they be allowed to use their language and that French-speaking Canadians be allowed to fly aeroplanes and communicate with the ground in their language, because as Canadians they felt that they had a right to the same privileges, the same courtesies, the same status, as English-speaking Canadians.

One would like to think that people who have gone through that kind of personal experience would therefore be sensitive to, and aware of, similar calls for respect and equality from other Canadians. Yet today, with western Canadians in the thousands turning out to West-Fed and other meetings making basically the same plea, for understanding and for first-class status, these members turn a deaf ear. It is particularly disappointing that the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve should adopt that attitude since I was led to believe he was more sensitive and more principled. It is sad to see members opposite, who have gone through what at times must have been a humiliating experience trying to get first-class status for their constituents and other French-speaking Canadians, turn around and be so damned insensitive to similar concerns for first-class status from other Canadians, be they from the west or the Atlantic region.

Perhaps I am being naive in assuming that fair play or sensitivity to the aspirations of fellow Canadians matter a whit. Perhaps all that matters is power, and since fate or the unfolding universe has given the Prime Minister the power he now possesses, that he will use that power to impose his model of Canada on the nation no matter that that model does not fit.

Even more disturbing to fair-minded Canadians than the Victoria formula is the provision for constitutional amendment by so-called referendum. The use of referenda is provided for in the constitutions of a number of democratic federal states, such as Switzerland and the United States. In both of these countries the axiom is that sovereign power rests ultimately with the people, and because of this the initiation of a referendum is built into their federalisms. In both of these federal states referenda can be initiated by either the state or the people and the results are binding.

As George Woodcock points out in a November, 1980, article in Saturday Night magazine:

> This is quite different from our (Canadian) politicians' gambits which are really plebiscites such as Lévesque's referendum on sovereignty-association or Trudeau's proposed vote on the Constitution, devised merely to gain endorsement from what the leaders have devised. (Hitler was an expert on this kind of popular vote.)

As Mr. Woodcock has accurately observed, this referendum proposal is nothing more or less than a tool whereby the Prime Minister could impose constitutional change upon the country. With the right of initiation resting with government, with the ability to state the question and to set the rules, the cards are clearly overwhelmingly stacked in favour of the federal government, or, in other words, the Prime Minister. What George Woodcock points out is more closely analogous to the procedures in Hitler's Germany than to the referendum procedures in truly democratic federal states.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: If members opposite find George Woodcock's words unacceptable, I might refer them to an article by Michael Valpy in the October 8 Vancouver Sun where he examined the use of referenda similar to this in other countries. He stated:

> In France in 1958, against a backdrop of political stalemate and unstable government, a referendum gave Charles de Gaulle the powers of a near-dictator.

Is it a coincidence that in late November, 1979, after announcing his retirement, the Prime Minister should give a speech to the University of Montreal saying that his preference for Canada is a presidential system based on the French model? Is that just a coincidence? Mr. Valpy continued:

> In Germany in 1934, against a backdrop of Nazi-fostered fear, severe economic disorder, and street fighting between political extremists, a referendum gave Adolf Hitler unchecked executive power.
> In Canada in 1944, against a backdrop of sincere and principled political division between Canadians over overseas war service, a referendum—backed in English Canada, rejected in French Canada—gave a timid central government the courage to impose conscription. It also left a legacy of hate and bigotry that might have been avoided by a political act of leadership that sidestepped spelling out the nation's naked differences—

Backed by Martin Goldfarb and millions of advertising dollars, it would give Ottawa an incredible whiphand.

A government that was truly democratic and that understood the federal nature of this country would not put forward referenda procedures of this sort, the type used by Hitler and de Gaulle. If it was interested in referenda, it would put forward the sort employed by other democracies, such as Switzerland and the United States. I might also point out to the House that, while not using the same dramatic analogies as Mr. Valpy or Mr. Woodcock, Mr. Gordon Robertson, former clerk of the privy council and an adviser to the Prime Minister on the Constitution, has made the same observation about Section 42 of the proposed Constitution.

I have not in my remarks directed much attention to the proposed charter of rights, not because I do not believe it is important but rather because many other speakers on our side, and in particular the hon. member for Provencher, have made excellent and perceptive observations in regard to it. I would only say that, along with the vast majority in the House, I believe the addition of the charter of rights to the Canadian Constitution would be a positive step. But along with the vast majority of fair-minded Canadians, I also strongly believe that it is absolutely immoral to have the British impose this charter of rights. A charter of rights should be examined here in Canada by Canadians, and it should only be after the very closest of examination and only after very, very extensive public debate here in Canada that a charter should be put into the Constitution. This proposed charter is at the moment very imperfect in many ways, and we would be doing the country a great disservice if we locked in this imperfect charter.

In committee the members of the New Democratic Party moved 43 amendments. They found 43 things wrong with this charter of rights. Two of the amendments were passed, which means they still find 41 things wrong. Why are they so quick to vote for this charter which to their minds is so imperfect?

It seems so fundamental that it is almost trite to say this, but it must be said because of its omission from the charter of rights. A charter, to mean anything, must contain an acknowledgement of the supremacy of God in order to demonstrate that rights do not come from man or from some leader; rights are ours because we are human beings created in the image of God. For the government not to accept that particular amendment is, to me, a glaring and unacceptable omission.

A charter of rights without property rights is absurd. Property rights are absolutely fundamental to human rights. My family background is not dissimilar to that of a lot of western Canadians. My grandparents came to this country from eastern Europe prior to the turn of the last century. Then, as now, the state owned and controlled all land and property, and by that simple expedient controlled all rights; individuals had none. My grandparents came to this country because of the opportunity to own land, to have the economic freedom that comes from that, because all other rights are meaningless without economic rights. Without property rights, economic rights can never be assured. How anybody could propose a charter of rights without property rights is beyond me. The socialists obviously do not believe in property rights because they do not believe in that kind of freedom.

Let us have a charter of rights, Mr. Speaker, but one made in Canada by Canadians, including the acknowledgement of the supremacy of God and property rights. It is hard to pick up a magazine or newspaper that does not have an observation by someone whose opinion should be respected, pointing out some imperfection in these rights. How can we so quickly and glibly jam through this clearly imperfect proposal and hustle it off to Britain to have it imposed on us by the British? This charter, Mr. Speaker, was basically designed on the back of an envelope by various special interest groups who came before the committee and bargained for support with the minister.

I conclude by saying that I am extremely concerned about the impact of this proposal on my part of Canada. The people in western Canada want to be first-class Canadians but they feel they are being forced into a second-class status in perpetuity by the headlong push of this government. Unless stopped, this government and their sheep will be doing irreparable damage to this country.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I, too, welcome this opportunity to add my comments on the constitutional proposals before the House. Before I get into the main part of my speech, I want to comment on some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) during his 40-minute discussion of constitutional reform.

Not only members of the opposition but constituents of mine want to understand why we are, in 1981, about to embark on this path of constitutional reform. I have been here only one year and some days, but I think it is safe to say that for all of us the results of the referendum last May 20 were gratifying, regardless of party affiliation. When someone says to me, as did the hon. member for Calgary Centre, that according to a Gallup poll 64 per cent of Canadians are against unilateral patriation, you could put the same question, if you worded it in the way Gallup did, to the members on this side of the House and probably have 64 per cent of us say that we do not want to move in a unilateral way. But that is not the simple issue involved here.

Last June, when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) began the summer trial with his provincial counterparts in preparation for the September conference, we all wished in our hearts that the conference would work. It would have been much better had the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) been able to arrive at a package for constitutional reform by consensus, but that is not the way it was to be. As was evident in the September conference, there was a breakdown and that left the government in the position of having to decide how best to go about constitutional reform and how best to achieve support for this package.

I think it is fair to say that the joint committee proposal before us represents to the best of our ability as parliamentarians a charter of rights, a statement of belief in the need for patriation with an amending formula, one that is as acceptable as it can be to a majority of Canadians. The government has gone completely out of its way to accommodate everybody in the sense that there were 12 items under discussion at the September conference. The government made a conscious decision to go with the least number of proposals that would antagonize the least number of Canadians.

That is the proposal we gave to the joint committee in October of last year, and to have the hon. member for Calgary Centre say at this late stage in the debate that we are attempting to jam down the throats of Canadians a Constitution that nobody else wants I think belies the fact that a great deal of work was done by the joint committee, by all members of this House for five long months. I commend them for their work in that committee, and I think, quite frankly, we have before us proposals that will go a long way toward addressing the problems that have existed here in Canada since 1867.

That brings me, Mr. Speaker, to the main point of my address. I want to come back to this theme throughout, and that is that we are about to embark upon a path that began in 1867 and along which there is still unfinished business to attend to. I would like to point out that when this House passes the joint resolution and presents it to Westminster, it does not mean that the process has ended. It is the beginnning of a new constitutional process; there is still unfinished business to attend to in this nation.

The year 1867 saw the birth of a new nation, a northern nationality, and as history recorded 50 years later war gave us an identity. Nova Scotians and Albertans, the soldiers of 1914, came home in 1919 as Canadians. In 1931, through the passage of the Statute of Westminster, we secured tangible autonomy in that no statute or law of Canada could be ruled invalid simply because it was repugnant to the law of the United Kingdom, save and except with regard to the BNA Act. I repeat, save and except the BNA Act. That is why I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this House that there is unfinished business to attend to.

I call to the attention of all members the words of one of Montreal's great men of letters, F. R. Scott, who said:

We have a rendez-vous with the BNA Act. It's going to come some day.

Well, it is now 1981 and this is the prophesied day. We have at this time reflected on and debated at length our constitutional future. We must now act to bring the Constitution home, secure in the knowledge that our children and their children will enjoy their country in the future, safe in the fact that no other nation or state has the power or legislative authority to change our fundamental laws.

That is what is ultimately meant by the term "responsible self-government", and it is long overdue, too long unfinished. Never before have we had so clearly the opportunity, albeit moved by its own passions and standards, to advance the civic culture of Canada, to unveil to the world what the ideals of Canadian society stand for, but most importantly, to decide for ourselves what it means to be Canadian.

If the process to date has been difficult—and perhaps it will become more difficult yet—that is as it should be. All great social reform requires it. This government believes that it must now, in 1981, move on constitutional reform, not because some constituent assembly has ordained it, not because some community of communities commands it and not because some premiers have made deals, but because Canadians will always feel inadequate and unsure of their identity until someone determines for their well-being a definition of what it means to be a Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Frith: We will act because this government knows that Canadians have that capacity. We have been disabled far too long. For ourselves and for Canada let us decide to throw away the crutch and stand on guard for our country, able at last, but by no means least, to amend our own Constitution.

Detractors of all varieties would have us believe that Canada is about to be rent apart by actions of this government to patriate our Constitution and by refusing, as the Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has suggested, to take into account the larger interests of Canada. I do not know anything of these larger interests to which the right hon. member refers. If there is some kind of other directed national interest, then we in the government believe, even at this late stage, that the right hon. member is again afforded another opportunity to share his views with his fellow Canadians. We look forward to the right hon. member's positive recommendations, not to thwart constitutional evolution in this country, but to participate affirmatively in its making. We recognize the right to oppose. Constructive criticisms are the energizing force in this debate. We are thankful to the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) who, I am sure, shares the conviction, which transcends politics, that we must all get on with the job.

The age of technology presents us with the reality that we are all participators in the cult of innovation. This technological imperative alone dictates that our fundamental law must change. Because of this debate and the constitutional process the law itself is being changed. Great new institutions are being founded privately, and whole new networks of existing contractual relations are being renewed in a thousand ways.

The legislative reform this government is proposing is embedded in these broader, voluntary and private formal and informal modifications of Canadian society which our new Constitution will serve to consolidate and provide a new framework for Canada for ever new departures. In short, we have the opportunity to enjoy the change that constitutional reform can bring.

Mr. Speaker, if some members do not feel it advisable to have a Constitution which may be amended in Canada, then we must recognize that our cultural policy is threatened. I personally consider Canada to be a nation-state made up of various cultural and language groups, and which expects to find in the Constitution a definition of the rights and powers of individuals and of political institutions. If that aim is overshadowed by other considerations, it means that we do not have the collective will to assume our responsibilities and control our destiny. I, for one, Mr. Speaker, believe that after 54 years of unsuccessful attempts, it is high time we patriated our Constitution.

[English]

Not all constitutional benchmarks in democratic history are the product of seemingly endless negotiations. This begs the question so adroitly raised by the Prime Minister: If Parliament's decisions must be negotiated, how can they be decisions? Do they not simply become negotiating positions?

Some benchmarks are accomplished by deliberate action supported by the greatest number of people of good will. The BNA Act was the result of such an affirmation. Its concluding chapter can be as well. The opportunity cost of such unfinished business is too great. I for one do not wish to be associated any longer with Canada's constitutional predicament—our inability to amend, on our own recognizance, our basic laws. That fate leaves an aversionary taste. Not to respond at this juncture in our history to the imperative before us suggests a profound cynicism about our own competence. It attracts and invites mastheads in our national and local papers which predisposes or forces some members of this House to talk of political warfare.

I believe, as do a great many Canadians, that nothing could be further from the truth. The only reason for discord is that we simply have not been able to agree on a method to be written into our documentary Constitution which allows full expression to the term "sovereignty of Canada". In short, we shall not be fully sovereign or fulfilled as Canadians until the parliament of the United Kingdom is no longer the only recourse for amending the Constitution.

I have heard this often from speakers who have spoken before me in this debate. The hon. member for Calgary Centre spoke about the need for some further perfection of the charter of rights which is presently before this House. This is the same member who six months ago stood up in this House and said that Canadians simply wanted their Constitution patriated. He was totally against having an amending formula. Now I hear discussions about what kind of an amending formula it should be. Now I hear from hon. members opposite that we have not gone far enough in certain areas of the charter of rights.

Mr. Blenkarn: Weren't you here on October 22?

Mr. Chénier: Don't worry about him.

Mr. Frith: I am not worried about the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). Now I hear from other hon. members on the benches opposite that certain rights in the charter of rights do not go far enough. There has been quite a change in the last six months.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre also said that there are certain inalienable rights every Canadian should enjoy. Yet his own party says that the charter of rights should have an opting out formula. He properly pointed out that under the existing BNA Act there has been some checkerboard effect in this country. We have allowed the provinces to opt out with respect to certain taxation powers. We have always had that flexibility in our Constitution, but can we afford to allow provinces to opt out with respect to the inalienable rights of our citizens? Either there will be basic rights enjoyed by every citizen in this country regardless of his place of residence, or we no longer will have a nation by anyone's definition. If there are to be basic rights, they belong to all Canadians, and provinces should not be allowed to opt out of the principles expressed in the charter of rights.

While we all recognize that words are sometimes inadequate vehicles to convey ideas and that intensity of feeling rather than substance is the order of the day, I believe we have dwelt too much upon the process of constitutional reform and have not addressed ourselves enough to the content of constitutional reform.

I do not wish to dwell at length on the issue of the amending formula, save to say that without one which is fair and equitable, both rigid and flexible, and cognizant of our federal character, our definition of a truly federal state falls short of the mark. All constitutional authorities agree that the provincial legislatures have the right to amend their constitution as it affects them, save with regard to the offices of lieutenant governors. Yet Canada's national legislature cannot do so at its own discretion without the consent of the parliament of Great Britain. Thus, Canada is relegated to being the only free nation in the world which is not at liberty to change its Constitution without the consent of another sovereign state. For any province, court of appeal or person to suggest that this government's proposed Canada Act, Constitution Act and the patriation instruments are in themselves unconstitutional is inappropriate, in that such a view or judgment serves only to suborn the right of this central government to act.

I need not remind the House that those who argue for unanimity on the issue of patriation of the Constitution do not and cannot guarantee the perfection of what will be achieved. I suggest that even if all 11 governments were to concur in the method of patriation at this time, there is no guarantee that a perfect instrument will be obtained. This is why our resolution calls for an amending formula and a method to find one to assure that our system of government will be based on a set of laws and not on the whims of men. No member of this House has higher authority than that which is transferred by the electorate.

The puppet on the provincial shoestring approach of the official opposition, which argues for opting out and against a national referendum for breaking a deadlock should no amending protocol be found, is, to me, lamentable. The important and, indeed, crucial test of the legitimacy of this government's actions will be determined by what we do with the Constitution when we get it back. If an amending formula is not achieved, the federal government reserves the exclusive right to take the issue of a formula to the people in the form of a national referendum.

I, for one, must believe that the wit, the intelligence and the desire of the premiers and the Prime Minister to build an amending formula worthy of the status of Canada can be accomplished within two years. That is the challenge before us. It seems only logical that if we, as legislators here and in the provinces, cannot resolve this impasse at the end of 24 months of concerted effort, recourse to the population at large is the only solution. I cannot see how some hon. members in the opposition benches can argue that a referendum will thwart the democratic process. At the very least, the opportunity for the people of Canada to decide is not only the opportunity to renew the social contract but to exercise the highest privilege democracy affords.

● (1650)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We have never argued against that.

Mr. Frith: The hon. member for Calgary Centre said just now that a referendum would tear this country apart.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You misunderstood his remark.

Mr. Frith: You are misunderstanding mine.

I would remind the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues that when politicians fail to break an impasse, it is best to go to the people, because then we have recourse to our biggest resource, what prime minister Sir Robert Borden once referred to as "the commonplace quality of common sense." It therefore strikes me that any legislation must absolutely exercise and preserve a balance between complexity and conscience. I believe that principle is clearly contained in this government's constitutional proposals.

The federal government holds relentlessly to the conviction that there are certain basic rights inherent in and crucial to Canadian citizenship and Canadians' way of life. That is why we maintain that these rights must be entrenched in the Constitution as a charter of rights. Because of the virtue of these rights, the positive and negative notions of freedoms—freedom to and freedom from—would be standardized and universally applied, and once entrenched would make Canada a free, model society for the rest of the world to emulate. That is why we argue for constitutional provisions to prohibit provincial or federal government interference, as this is necessary to guarantee the privacy of individual rights.

I too, like Gordon Fairweather, our Human Rights Commissioner, am anxious for an entrenched bill of rights. While it is certain that some rights require more protection, it is not this aspect which I personally find exciting. An entrenched charter of rights and freedoms is much more—it is a testament to the human spirit, a guide on how to live and grow in our humanity. All manners of excellence that we accept for our guidance, and all obligations to which we grant jurisdiction over us, can be defined by our respect for human greatness. As a statement of objects of our respect, a charter of rights and freedoms allows us to pass on continuously a rich inheritance for the as yet unborn Canadians for all time. In essence, such a charter codifies a standard of conduct between all men. A charter of rights is a statement of universal intent. The proposed charter will serve to make Canadians understood as a people and as a nation which realizes that the freedom of the subjective person to do as he pleases is overruled by the freedom of the responsible person to act as he or she must.

Even the most intimate rights of the individual Canadian cannot be enforced against the state without the corresponding judicial protection that entrenching in the Constitution would provide. It is the view of this government that the Constitution is the best place in which to provide for the protection of our freedoms. The members of this government concur with the thinking that civilization in part is measured by the willingness of those who have power to yield it up to third parties for adjudication.

The charter will accomplish much for us, but it will also tell us how others see and understand Canadians. In short, it will do much to reinforce our sense of national identity. I know one myth that it will dispel forever: never again will confederation be called the graveyard of minorities.

I return to my theme of unfinished business. I believe there are compelling reasons why we must move forward quickly at this stage of debate. I refer to a rather generally held belief, one held too long, that the present federal Constitution has much to do with the intractable problems of regional economic development and disparities. Surely all members of the House must realize that there is no alternative to our market system which can support our economic interests without threatening our personal freedom as individual Canadians. What is required is action by this government to establish and maintain an economic environment in which the market can best perform its essential function. Financial aggression on the part of one province which argues against mobility rights does nothing but serve to further institutionalize disparities in another province perhaps less fortunate in its natural endowments. The demand for greater provincial autonomy at this time only inhibits the development of a national economic strategy.

We are not proposing to put something over on the provinces. A statement made recently by my colleague, the Minister of Justice, offers instruction. He said:

> We do not want to restrict the ability of the provincial governments to deal with social, cultural and economic issues within their jurisdiction; but we want to ensure that the required laws, regulations and practices do not discriminate against Canadians from other provinces. Such discrimination goes against the principle of economic union and creates internal barriers which go against a fundamental principle of nationhood.

By entrenching such a value in the Constitution, we are not proposing change for the sake of change, nor imposing a value that is academic. Rather, we are saying to the average Canadian that she or he has a basic constitutional right to economic security wherever it may be obtained in this country.

The constitutional reform proposal before the House essentially addresses the question of sharing our wealth to make

Canada work as it can, for it is vital that all Canadians enjoy a national standard of material well-being. To that end, Mr. Speaker, Part I, Section 6 of the Constitution Act provides every citizen of Canada with three basic economic rights. These are, first, the right to enter, remain in, and leave Canada; second, that every citizen and every permanent resident of Canada have the right to move from province to province and to take up residence; and third, the right of every Canadian to seek gainful employment without hindrance. These rights cannot be conditional or discriminatory in relation to a person's previous province of residence. Anything less means that a Canadian citizen would have his basic citizenship right embargoed by the unilateral action of a province.

In the recent past we have seen examples of construction workers not being allowed to work in a province where work was to be found. The first premier of Newfoundland believed in the concept of mobility rights, but the present leadership in Newfoundland does not support it.

Entrenching mobility rights and ensuring the free flow of capital does nothing to ruin federalism, as some members of the opposition have argued. Rather, it actualizes the concept. Ill-conceived and poorly erected barriers do not make good neighbours. Instead, discriminatory practices only serve the creed of those who would beggar thy neighbour. Now more than ever before, Canada must strive to be a country without internal barriers if we are to ensure the prosperity of Canadians and sustain our economic growth.

Mobility rights are principally the cement that holds our economic union together. This is why, Mr. Speaker, the Pepin-Robarts report concluded that reform of the Constitution and of Canada's political institutions would be justified, even if the single purpose was to improve the ability of the Canadian public and private sectors to address themselves to the economic policy requirements of the future. Surely it is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that bargaining and negotiation with regard to these matters are rife with difficulties and significant costs.

This government believes that ample time has been provided to work out these issues, yet we have not been able to do so because of lack of agreement and the existence of more than one view of Canada. So in this session of Parliament in the spring of 1981, we have come to a constitutional crossroads. At this moment of history it is true that the Canadian caravan has travelled a long road to nationhood. Perhaps the will of this Parliament will provide us finally with a sovereign, constitutional democracy and, as some of us have longed for and hoped for, with a constitutional regime that can at last help us to cope with our problems and allow us to get on with our national life.

I thought Bruce Hutchinson said it best when he said:

After a hundred years of joint experience we are in a peril from no one but ourselves . . . and we hold in our keeping a trust much larger than we know.

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED TAX CREDITS FOR NORTHERN HUNTERS

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act to give income tax credits for the purchase of hunting implements to persons in the Northwest Territories, Labrador and Arctic Quebec who hunt in order to provide a substantial portion of their food supply and whose livelihood is hunting.

He said: Mr. Speaker, today I speak as a hunter and a trapper. I have very legitimate concerns about the financing of the vocations of hunters and trappers.

The outcome of this private member's motion is a foregone conclusion, considering the indication from across the way. However, I am glad to have raised this matter in the House.

Hunting is a legitimate occupation; not a residue of history or a sport. Government should encourage the maintenance of the hunting and trapping sector of our economy for a number of reasons.

First, in the Arctic regions, hunting and trapping make a significant contribution to the local food supply. The Lancaster Sound study of the communities in northern Baffin Island reports that the imputed value of country food available per year is between $568 and $2,173 per capita. The significance of this is exaggerated by the scarcity or non-existence and high cost of nutritionally valuable store-bought goods in northern communities.

Second, hunting and trapping are key factors in the development of a diversified northern economy. A strong renewable resource sector is essential to offset the worst consequences of boom-and-bust non-renewable resource development.

Third, hunting is essential to and is Inuit culture. Dr. Peter J. Usher wrote in an article entitled "Evaluating Country Food in the Northern Native Economy":

> Food preferences and habits are an important part of any cultural heritage, and are often very deep-rooted. In a society where hunting is a central tradition, foods have a richness of meaning which stems from their procurement, distribution and preparation, as well as their eating . . . Country food has nutritional, social and cultural values which cannot be replaced by any substitute and cannot be measured by market criteria or evaluated in cash.

Fourth, it is often assumed that the traditional economy is declining as participation in the wage economy increases, and that this pattern is inevitable and proper. However, hunting and trapping activities in the north are not dying out; their importance in the future economy must be recognized and considered. The maintenance and growth of a healthy and diversified northern economy is not possible without a strong, renewable resource base.

At present, the people of the north are forced into a position of participating in a weak wage economy so that they can afford to hunt. Hunting is so expensive that many people carry a heavy burden of debt throughout most of the year. But, of necessity and as value to their societies, people in Arctic regions are loath to give up this system of harvesting.

I should like to quote a few prices of hunting implements and equipment, since it is quite popular for southern people to quote prices. This information was received from people in Rankin Inlet and Whale Cove in the Keewatin region. For example, the capital cost of a snowmobile is at least $4,000. This is double the 1976 cost. A snowmobile hardly, if ever, lasts for more than one year. It is the best rough terrain vehicle in the world; however, it is the least efficient of gas consumption machines. The cost of material to build a sled in the north costs $400. This also never lasts more than a year. A canoe, which is essential for summer hunting, costs $3,000 including freight. I see on the canal in Ottawa people who have recreational vehicles which are four and five times the prices I am quoting because they are so much better equipment. Hunters in the north would like such equipment, but they cannot afford it.

An outboard motor in the north costs $2,500, that is a small machine, 40-horsepower. A cheap rifle costs $400. We see sports hunters coming from the United States with $2,000 rifles. The hunters in the north would like to own these rifles, but they cannot because they are far too expensive for our financial return. A rifle with a scope costs at least $600. Rope, which is essential to hunting, costs $160, and so on. The prices for all the equipment needed for hunting in the north are astronomical. They are three and four times what they would be in Ottawa, Winnipeg, Vancouver and so forth.

The prices of hunting equipment have risen astronomically in the last few years. As I said, the price of a snowmobile has doubled since 1976. Because they are in constant use under adverse conditions, a well-maintained snowmobile may last only a couple of seasons. In fact, most last only one season.

The hunter is caught in a vicious economic circle. The only source of monetary income in the traditional economy is derived from the sale of furs, but the price of furs is variable, uncertain, and therefore cannot be depended upon. Most hunters are forced to participate in the wage economy, at least seasonally or part-time, in order to provide the income required to subsidize hunting operations. This situation is complicated by the fact that jobs are not always available.

I would like to point out, as an aside, that while there are 7,000 employees in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, there are 22,000 Inuit. That is a ratio of one bureaucrat to three Inuit. This is pretty deplorable; that money could be usefully used elsewhere. If we consider that there are another 2,000 employees in the territorial government, it means the ratio is 1.5 Inuit to one bureaucrat.

The hunter increasingly finds himself in the position of being dependent upon an unstable wage economy in order to finance his hunting activities, although neither of these activities offers firm monetary rewards. Furthermore, time spent working for wages leaves less time available for hunting and, hence, nutrition.

The strengthening of the hunting and trapping economy in the north, including government recognition of this sector as viable and worthy of support, is necessary in order to break out of this circle of dependency. The cost of nutritionally valuable food in the north is notoriously high when available. As I said, in many communities it is not available. I do not consider dried-out or out-dated pork chops or canned goods as being nutritionally valuable. A reduction in hunting would lead to less nutritious diets and higher costs.

When a community is dependent upon the outside to provide food, it is in a very precarious social and economic position. The insecurity that such dependency breeds destroys the vitality of a community. Steps must be taken to ensure that the hunting economic is not crippled beyond recovery.

I should like to turn now to a brief examination of government support of other sectors of the economy which produce food for Canadian consumption. Tax expenditures on the farming and fishing sectors in 1980 totalled over $100 million. This is small compared to the billions spent on the oil and gas industry. I should like to quote from a document entitled "Government of Canada Tax Expenditure Account". Table 1 refers to the resource sector and reads as follows:

1. Fast write-off for Canadian exploration expenses.
2. Fast write-off for Canadian development expenses.
3. 33⅓ per cent earned depletion allowance.

This is a total of $1,250 million. However, farmers and fishermen are able to deduct expenses for tools under $200, gear, gasoline and oil for operating equipment. They are also able to claim a capital cost depreciation allowance on aircraft, automobiles, trucks, boats, outboard motors and sleighs. Hunters are not allowed to claim these expenses, although hunters in outpost camps—and there are very few, possibly three or four in the north—are subsidized by the government of the Northwest Territories. However, hunters in large communities do not have any program to assist them to defray hunting costs. Fishermen and farmers have these types of programs about which I am speaking.

Canada is a major fur-bearing nation. Between 1968 and 1978 our exports in fur products rose 258 per cent, from $35.8 million in 1968 to $128.2 million in 1978. During the same period the trade balance surplus in the fur industry rose from $19 million to $44.4 million. Thus, the export of fur products has increasingly achieved a trade balance surplus while the Canadian economy as a whole is plagued by import deficits in the balance of payments.

Hunters and trappers in the north face a situation where their traditional livelihood is becoming more expensive and difficult to maintain. Incomes received from hunting and trapping hardly reflect the valuable contribution which this sector makes to the Canadian balance of payments. In 1976 per capita income in smaller communities ranged as low as 81 per cent below the Canadian average. Imagine that! Try to buy a new Ski-Doo every year with that. Most northerners must work very hard to make ends meet. They have little disposal income to spend on anything but the barest necessities. Some 40 per cent of individuals filing 1978 income tax returns in settlements in Nunatsiaq, which is my riding, will not even earn enough money in one year to cover the cost of purchasing a $4,000 or $5,000 snowmobile—yet they must have one for hunting. Thus they incur a debt.

Hunters make an invaluable contribution to the health and well-being of their communities but they do not enjoy any tax benefits. In principle, they should be allowed to deduct expenses and claim capital depreciation allowances, just as individuals in the farming and fishing sectors do and, moreover, as the major oil companies do when they explore in the north for oil and gas. However, hunting is not a profit-making business since the meat product is rarely sold and the price of furs is minimal. I will add here that there is a study under way at the present time by the Inuit Development Corporation called the inter-settlement trade study in which the marketability of northern food is being examined to see whether it is marketable in the south and in other northern countries such as Greenland and Alaska.

Few people who are not employed full-time as wage-earners pay taxes. Therefore, a tax credit should be refundable—the base line is a tax credit.

Without going much further, I hope that the motion now before the House will receive the support of all three parties.

Mr. Ray Chénier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I must commend the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) for the very real concern he shows for the people in his riding and for the people of the north generally. I appreciate the motion put forward by the hon. member.

The federal government and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development particularly is indeed sensitive to the significance of renewable resources and the well-being of northerners. We are concerned about the high costs in the north. However, the motion does not appear to provide an answer to either problem. Obviously, the motion intends to resolve problems being encountered by northern residents who no doubt are in need of assistance of some type. After examining the motion, however, I have come to the conclusion that the proposed amendment to the Income Tax Act would do little, if anything, to assist the type of people who would be eligible.

The motion proposes to give income tax credits for the purchase of hunting implements to those persons who hunt to provide a substantial portion of their food supply and whose livelihood is hunting. The first question I would ask is why income tax credits should be allowed only to people located in the Northwest Territories, Labrador and Arctic Quebec? It seems to me that there must be residents in the Yukon, particularly natives, who have the same problem as do those living in the area included in the motion. For that matter, I am sure that the same can be said of the residents of the northern parts of the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario. The resolution should have been addressed to those people as well.

I do not wish to dwell any longer on the many obvious difficulties which would be encountered in determining the eligibility of applicants for the income tax credits that the hon. member for Nunatsiaq proposes. Adding to the confusion, would be the need for defining such terms as "a substantial portion" and "hunting implements". Then, there would be the problem of determining if an applicant did, in fact, depend on hunting for a substantial portion of his food supply. How and by whom would this be done? These are only a few of the problems which would be encountered in the operation of the proposed income tax credit program. Such a program could become an administrative nightmare. Surely we would not want to complicate the lives of northerners any more than we are now doing, as some members of the opposition have told us many times before.

As I said earlier, the intent of the motion is very praiseworthy but I would object to the proposed means, to the utilization of tax credits. This would do little, if anything, in the way of providing assistance to those with the greatest need.

Perhaps we should review the number of programs which provide assistance to trappers and hunters. I understand that at the territorial level, for example, the government of the Northwest Territories is implementing a program in 1981-82 which would provide grants to subsidize the cost of gasoline to trappers. Those hunters who also trap will benefit. As well, half a million dollars is being provided to assist groups and individuals who wish to live off the land under the outpost camp program of the territorial government.

Furthermore, in discussing northern concerns with the president of the Metis Association of the Northwest Territories, I was informed that there is no federal sales tax on gasoline which is used by hunters and trappers. There is also no sales tax on outboard motors. I suggest that these measures directly assist those whom the hon. member had in mind when he drafted his motion.

At the federal level, again, I point out that there are special ARDA programs geared specifically to Indians and Inuit individuals or groups which provide a large amount of financial assistance. For example, the Rae band received $125,000 assistance under this special program two years ago. I should add that all hunters and trappers associations can benefit from the special ARDA program of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The programs I have just mentioned are tailored to the particular needs of Canadians living in the north. If these programs are not functioning properly and if they are not benefiting those whom they should, then I suggest that we review them in order that we may improve on the delivery of the programs to all those who could take advantage of them.

My colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans), will no doubt address the matter of the remission order on the taxation of northern benefits, which has been extended throughout 1981, to allow the Department of Finance the opportunity to develop a reasonable policy on this very important matter. The member for Nunatsiaq may rightly point out that this remission order benefits only the white government employees who are given housing and transportations subsidies. However, I am certain the Department of Finance is examining the question with a view to providing a benefit which will be equitable for all northerners, white and native alike. I further encourage the member for Nunatsiaq to make his views on this policy known to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen).

In conclusion, we feel the intent of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Nunatsiaq has very good merit. However, we do feel that the method suggested would be far too cumbersome and involved, in terms of developing definitions of who should benefit and who depends on hunting for his or her food supply. Again I would ask, to what parts of Canada would the proposal apply? Should it be limited to the areas he has mentioned, or should it be enlarged to apply to all of the country?

We believe that what should be done is to examine in detail the existing programs and try to improve delivery, and if necessary expand the base of funding so that all people who should benefit from those programs receive those benefits.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I welcome any opportunity which presents itself in the House to discuss this crucial important question of the hardship of the northern people, as highlighted in the motion of the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar). I naturally speak in support of the motion. I want to congratulate him for taking the initiative of adding this component to the debate, namely, the prospect of providing tax benefits for the purchase and use of hunting implements, hunting being such an important industry, not only to individual families in the north, but also to the economy in general.

I listened with keen interest and some surprise—although one should not be surprised—to the comments of the official speaker of the government in response to this motion. He said that the government is sensitive to the needs of the north and is very much concerned with the high cost of living in the north. This is true. As has been pointed out, there are many federal civil servants living in the north. In fact, there is one federal civil servant for every three northerners.

The government has recognized that there are difficulties in the north and that it is costly to live there, but these difficulties are only recognized when they affect civil servants who are working for the federal government. They have not been recognized in relation to anyone else.

The hon. member made reference to the concern of the government regarding these northern benefits which are only paid to people who happen to work for the federal government. Some large corporations also must pay northern benefits in order to attract people, because it is simply not possible to live and work in the north without some kind of tax relief or subsidy. That is what the government is sensitive about and understand—that it is difficult for bureaucrats to go north, particularly when they can obtain postings elsewhere in Canada. If it is costly and difficult for bureaucrats who work for the federal government, to live in the north, would hon. members not agree that it is equally costly for every other Canadian who lives there?

I published a report just a couple of months ago which points out that if you used no other criteria to help northerners cope with the high cost of living, the difficulties associated with transportation, isolation and so on than those already used by the federal government to compensate its civil servants, it can be established that northerners—and I am including the north of the mid-Canada section of the province—pay $470 million too much in income tax every year. There is no provision in the Income Tax Act to allow for the taxable earnings of these northern benefits. The government has sort of overlooked that.

During the short period of time there was a Conservative government, bureaucrats decided that it would be a good time to tax these northern benefits. Then it was decided that there should be a remission order for a year. This has now been extended, as the hon. member rightly says, to 1981 during which time the government intends to take a very serious look at amending the Income Tax Act to deal adequately with these northern benefits.

I expect there will be a change in the Income Tax Act which will allow for tax free earnings of certain benefits in the north.

What that will mean is that tax credits will only accrue to those people in the north who happen to work for large and rich mining companies, or in the lucrative energy sector, or who are federal buraucrats; the rest of the northerners will continue to be second-class citizens. That is simply not good enough.

The Income Tax Act is basically arranged so that every citizen contributes to the economy and operation of this country in accordance with his ability. In other words, one pays income tax in accordance with one's ability to pay. As the hon. member for Nunatsiaq correctly pointed out, people living north of 60 and in the northern part of the provinces pay much less income tax than anyone else in Canada.

The hon. member referred to the price of some of these implements. In some cases, northerners probably pay double what the average Canadian would pay for a Ski-Doo or for a rifle because of freight and delivery costs added to goods shipped to northern consumers. It is common to pay $2 for a gallon of gasoline even in the northern part of the province. I know a place in British Columbia where a gallon of gasoline costs $5. The native people that I represent here use these implements to go out and earn their livelihood, because, as the hon. member said, they cannot buy sufficient and adequate nutritious food for their children.

When I raised this question in the House with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), he asked me to give him names. I would have no difficulty compiling a list of names of people I know who live in my constituency in the province of British Columbia and find it difficult to feed their children and must supplement their food by hunting.

It is generally understood that any money required to buy food, shelter and clothing should not be taxable. That is why we have personal exemptions. However, to a northerner, purchase of these hunting implements is essential because they hunt to provide food, and make clothing from pelts.

A litre of milk in Pond Inlet costs $3.60. In early February this year, two kilograms of sugar cost $6.13 in Pelly Bay. A can of apple juice sold for $4.69. A can of apple sauce costs 49 cents in Edmonton but $1.74 in this northern community. The manager of the only store in that community estimated that it now costs $1,526.70 to provide balanced meals for a family of seven for just one month. It is no wonder that those northerners must supplement their foodstuffs by hunting. This becomes even more difficult as they must purchase these implements. As well, they must pay for gasoline and repairs, to maintain them.

The government says it is sensitive to and understands the problems in the north. The parliamentary secretary criticizes the hon. member for Nunatsiaq for not including the Yukon and the northern parts of the provinces in this motion. I would like to do this as well and bring a more universal approach in helping northerners. Even a small step such as the hon. member for Nunatsiaq has suggested would help.

I would like a universal program such as that found in Australia, where there are three different tax zones and a high cost of living; the living differentials are considered. If I could again use the criteria the federal government uses to compensate its civil servants, people north of 60 would not pay any income tax up to an income of $30,000; and I dare say there are hardly any native people in the north who earn that income. That would be a more universal approach. As well, it would be an incentive which would accrue not only to federal civil servants or employees of large corporations but to all northerners.

This debate is not about my tax proposal, which ministers over there keep telling me is part of a study going on right now in the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Finance and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, it is about a proposal which the hon. member for Nunatsiaq has laid before us.

I would strongly urge all members in this House to give this matter serious consideration and approval. It is a small step toward what I consider is a more universal approach. It will certainly go a long way toward helping some of those people to whom the hon. member for Nunatsiaq made reference, those who have to supplement their own food needs and incomes by hunting so as to overcome some of the incredible burdens placed on northerners as a result of isolation and a harsh environment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, the tax benefit proposed by the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) in his motion would have a very limited impact. In fact, only full-time hunters would stand to gain anything. According to the motion, those are the people "who hunt in order to provide a substantial portion of their food supply and whose livelihood is hunting." So this would apply only to full-time hunters in the north, namely the Northwest Territories, Labrador and Arctic Quebec. Therefore, hunters residing elsewhere in Canada are not included. In other words, all other hunters in the rest of Canada would be eliminated, leaving only those in the areas I have just mentioned.

Mr. Speaker, that exclusion may be quite justified if we bear in mind the exceptional living conditions of northern residents, and you can be sure that I do not envy them. Still I find it hard to understand why other northern residents would be excluded under this measure, those who earn a living otherwise than by hunting. Most of the other people who live in the north are affected as well by the high cost of living due to the economic difficulties resulting from remoteness, the extremely cold climate, the high cost of transportation and all the other economic problems related to life in the north. I will come back to that question a little bit later, but for now I would like to speak about the income tax issue raised in the motion.

First, I wonder if the existing provisions of the Income Tax Act are not adequate under the circumstances. The motion relates to people who hunt for a living and earn enough money to have to file an income tax return. Mr. Speaker, the existing income tax legislation allows those hunters to deduct not only the cost of hunting gear but other expenditures as well, such as ammunition, fuel and special equipment necessary to live off hunting. Naturally, it does not apply to people who now and then go hunting in their leisure time, or who want to taste venison. I do not believe either that it was the suggestion of the hon. member for Nunatsiaq. As things now stand, Mr. Speaker, hunters are allowed to deduct their expenses much in the same way as other self-employed Canadians, including farmers, fishermen and others in various professions. However, the motion refers to income tax credits rather than a simple tax deduction for the cost of hunting implements. I entertain serious doubts as to whether income tax credits would be the correct approach under such circumstances.

First of all, excluding the child income tax credit, tax credits are especially appropriate for industrial development; thanks to them, a taxpayer can offset in part or in whole his investment expenditures and his tax obligations. It is indeed through tax credits that the federal treasury provides direct assistance to spur investments in plants and equipment with a view to promoting industrial growth, creating new jobs, improving efficiency and boosting productivity. I do not think that hunting can be included in that type of industrial activity.

Mr. Speaker, before supporting a tax credit for hunting implements we should perhaps recognize that such a measure would lead to an increase in hunting. Now is that what we want? Is that what Inuit and Indians in the north really want? Could the wildlife in that area sustain such an increase in hunting? Mr. Speaker, as I said before, this proposal would benefit only one category of northerners, hunters. While recognizing the importance of hunting, especially as an essential part of the livelihood of northerners, I think we must also consider the situation which confronts other residents in the area.

The specific economic hardships that are a fact of life in the north necessarily increase the cost of living for all people in that area. I think we should consider more general approaches that the government could take to ease the economic and social conditions in which those people work and live. I am thinking, for example, Mr. Speaker, of the important role the government plays in providing such services as transportation, communication, health care, environmental protection, housing and social services, to name but a few.

We are all aware of the cutbacks the government was forced to make, but if there were some additional funds to be allocated to northern development, would it not be better to try to improve general services rather than to provide the type of tax incentive suggested in this motion? Mr. Speaker, we should also mention that northerners in general can take advantage of some work related tax breaks; for example, the housing subsidies that some northern employers provide their employees with. Under the Income Tax Act, such special benefits and allowances would be taxable, which means that this rule is intended to prevent income tax evasion. However, in northern Canada, such allowances are said to be essential to attract workers.

Because of this, Mr. Speaker, the government passed last June a rebate order to exempt for income tax purposes subsidized houses, low-cost housing, as well as travel assistance granted by northern employers for holiday purposes or medical reasons. This debate order which dates back to 1978 will remain in effect until 1981. It is a temporary measure which will give enough time to the government to develop a policy aimed at bringing about a reasonable solution to this difficult and complex problem. Mr. Speaker, we should be considering more important matters, such as the extent and impact of government programs and services in northern Canada and the effect of certain taxation policies. These are the matters which will have the greatest long-term effect on social and economic northern development. In these circumstances, I cannot support such a motion even though the motives of the hon. member are very laudable in view of the very hard and difficult life of the people in northern Canada. Once again, and for these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this motion.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my support to this motion. I find it difficult to follow the arguments coming from the government side. The last speaker mentioned that this would benefit certain groups. The Income Tax Act is full of benefits for certain groups. Therefore, this will not be a precedent.

Insurance agents are part of a special group. They can deduct their expenses for business trips, office equipment and entertainment from their profits. It is quite legal. Farmers are also part of a special group. They can depreciate, over a number of years, the cost of a combine and, in fact, a home which they may build. Therefore, I do not accept the argument that this will benefit a special group.

A few years ago, it was said it would be too difficult to handle a tax credit for children. It has turned out not to be difficult at all. All one has to do is prove that he has children. I have never received an objection from a constituent complaining that he must prove he has children in order to get the tax credit.

Bachelors are not part of that special group and, quite properly, cannot apply for the tax credit. It is only for those who have children, have had to pay the cost of raising them, who get the special tax credit. I commend the government for that type of legislation because the future of this country depends on our boys and girls.

I suggest that those in the north who earn the major part of their living do so under the most adverse conditions. It would not be difficult for a northern hunter to prove he has purchased a rifle. He could produce it if necessary. The same applies to a snowmobile or proper clothing. These are essentials. A hunter adds to the net worth of this country. He is producing, not taking away. If we would only accept the idea that those who produce should be encouraged, we would have a lot more production and fewer unemployed.

We hear a lot of talk about inflation and rising interest rates, which puts people out of work. Increasing production would be a better way of fighting inflation. The more production, the less inflation because inflation is too many dollars chasing too few goods. We always attack the problem from one end. Let us increase production which would increase the net worth of this country.

Other people in that category include those in the coal or ore mines. I was raised in a coalmining town. My father and brothers were miners. I saw the toll it takes in human life, working in the bosom of the earth, with no sunshine, sometimes on their hands and knees lifting the coal in smoky conditions. They are paid by the ton.

I can take you to coal mining towns in Alberta, and others can probably do the same in Ontario and the maritimes, and show you how the health of the people has deteriorated after having spent their lives producing coal, lead, zinc or whatever the ore happened to be. We should find ways and means to help increase the production and thus fight inflation.

When we have this type of motion which encourages production and asks for an incentive, an encouragement, we should not say it cannot be done, but look to see how we can assist. This bill should be sent to committee, where we could hear from experts on the north, including the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar). We could find ways and means to help them and increase production. That is why we were elected to this place.

Rather than looking for reasons why we should not do something, we should change our attitude to one that is more positive. I urge members on the government side to not defeat this because of one or two obstacles. It will not cost the government anything to send this to committee where it can be considered. If sound reasons are advanced why this cannot be done, I am sure the hon. member for Nunatsiaq would be the first to accept that.

I am satisfied that we can find ways to increase the production and therefore the wealth of this country. It would give those people doing this type of work, under conditions most people would not even consider, some encouragement and incentive to continue. I urge hon. members to send this to committee where it can be discussed in detail. If there are sound reasons why it cannot be done, it can be defeated there. Let us not throw it out here because there may be one or two obstacles in the way of what we want to do.

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) for introducing this motion to the House. It is one that I basically support. There is no question that the people not only living in the two territories but in the areas close to the territorial boundaries in the provinces are in need of every possible break from the income tax people, every possible fiscal break we can give them.

We think costs have been escalating in the south. This afternoon we heard the hon. member for Nunatsiaq indicate the astronomical increases there have been in the cost of living for those in the territories and the northern parts of many of our provinces. We should do our best to give them the tax advantages that will allow them to make a dent in the continually increasing cost of living which, while we are all subjected to it, seems to affect them in an even more severe way. The idea of giving income tax credits on the purchase of hunting implements may well be a means whereby this can be achieved. There may be other methods as well, and it seems to me we should be looking at this entire question carefully. How can we make aspects of northern livelihood a more important part of the economy up there; how we can encourage, for example, not only by these methods but by others having to do with conservation and a better organization of the management of animal life in these territories, how can we encourage a more effective harvesting of the animal life for the benefit of the people living in those areas.

In parts of the north there is literally a tremendous potential for an increase in the animal harvest. The Lancaster Sound area the hon. member for Nunatsiaq referred to has the potential to become almost a granary of the north because it has such a rich marine life base and the land animals associated with this bountiful marine life are rich in number and potential as well. These rich pockets of animal life in the north, and I understand there are several of them, have the potential to be exploited for the benefit of the local population and we should be doing our best to encourage that, both by setting up the kind of conservation framework that will allow for proper management and more effective harvesting. With proper planning I am convinced this can be done.

I would suggest there are perhaps other methods of bringing the costs of some of these items down for people living in the north. I know the co-operative movement is active in the north but it seems to me there must be better ways of reducing the cost of these items by using better purchasing methods down here or having some sort of centralized purchasing mechanism here that will allow people in the north to benefit from the lowest possible prices instead of having several middlemen along the way taking a percentage, with the result that prices are two or three times as high as we have to pay.

I am a member of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development and I would support an effort to have the subject matter of this motion referred to that committee. It seems to me that by such a reference our committee could look at not only what the hon. member is proposing, but also at some of the other items I mentioned, at what we can do to reduce costs for the people living there and achieve a more useful utilization of the marine and animal resources of the north, for the people concerned.

I am convinced there is a method of combining capacity with conservation which will result in a maximum harvest and sensible conservation, and do this in a way that will benefit primarily the people of the north, by referring this matter to committee we can look at the question of tax credits as part of the broader question of helping the people of the north and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Nunatsiaq would agree that this suggestion makes sense.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I am very interested, Mr. Speaker, in these recommendations or suggestions made by the hon. member for Châteauguay (Mr. Watson), that we ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to refer the issue of northern living allowances to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I think that approach would be preferable to the passage of this particular motion because, as have others who have spoken here today, I find I have difficulty with the narrowness of the motion. It would seem to me to be far better to look at the general question of living allowances or the cost of living in a way that we can improve the standard of living of people living in the north, especially the aboriginal people.

I know the question before us relates only to a tax benefit for hunters or people who earn their livelihood from hunting in the Northwest Territories, Labrador and the Arctic, and I note that the Yukon, for example, would be omitted. I would expect there are remote areas in Canada where similar problems are encountered by the people who live and work there. The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) I believe has indicated that perhaps some general latitudinal demarcation for tax purposes generally might be an approach. I was quite interested in what he had to say and I would like to consider that more fully.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) indicated that this particular motion would not be a problem because it would apply, as do many other tax measures, to individuals or groups within the tax system. I would question some of the examples he used because the principles he was espousing apply to all people and would apply in fact to the groups we address here if they had the income from which to deduct those expenses.

People who make a living from hunting can deduct the cost of their equipment and deduct the costs they incur in that undertaking, and that would apply to depreciating equipment such as snowmobiles which, as the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) indicated, are expensive and have a short life because of the extreme temperatures. I would think that in any such situation perhaps there could be some form of accelerated depreciation on equipment that has such a short life, equipment operating north of say the 60th parallel. The depreciation schedules could perhaps be altered to take that into consideration so that northern residents who make their living by working with this equipment could depreciate it faster than normal and we would as a result more clearly take into consideration the real life of the asset as opposed to what we in the south assume it to be.

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the schedule consequential thereto.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon my colleague the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) developed a theme which I should like to underscore once again, especially for the benefit of hon. members opposite, especially those from what is known as central Canada, and even more specifically those from the province of Quebec. I have been sitting in this House for a very long time now, one could say that I have heard a real litany of appeals from the representatives of the various ridings in Quebec asking other regions of the country to lend a sympathetic ear to their claims as francophone members from Quebec. Matters of culture, matters of language, they asked for our sympathy and they got it, not only that of the Members of Parliament but also that of the people, the country generally. Still, at this time, it seems to me I must point out the extraordinary deafness of a good number of my hon. colleagues concerning the claims of the people of Alberta. We are, above everyone all, the target of government policy here advocated. But, oh no! the hon. members from Quebec tell us, this is for the good of the country, when in fact an attempt is being made to exploit the whole energy situation for the benefit of central Canada.

[English]

That lies ill in the mouths of members from central Canada and the people of central Canada, who last year for purely selfish motives would not accept a certain policy with regard to petroleum products. They insisted they should consume, consume and consume, all based on a subsidy, at ridiculous prices. But no one would suggest that any product from any province in central Canada should be sold at a very favourable price—at 40 per cent of its market value—to the people of the producing provinces. I refer to the iron ore of Ontario, the gold of Quebec and all the riches and natural resources of central Canada. It has suddenly come about that energy petroleum shall be a common resource. I am asking for comprehension and understanding, not an insistence on this foolhardy policy. All those members opposite who are interjecting have to go out and see the results of this policy of public brigandage, this national energy policy, which has been inflicted on the country by the present administration.

● (2010)

An hon. Member: That is not what we are debating.

Mr. Lambert: I invite the hon. member to rise to his feet and make his speech. I am talking about comprehension. There are devices within this package which, if used by unscrupulous leaders, can rob—and I use that Anglo-Saxon term deliberately—the people in the producing provinces of their resources. No one else dares do it. It is done under the guise of "for the benefit of Canada as a whole." This is what we want those people, the very ones who reacted to my words, to understand.

I have seen stories appear in the press as a result of interviews with Members of Parliament from central Canada in which they said that the western provinces owe this as a matter of tribute to central Canada. That is why there is this ferocious opposition to the proposals contained in this resolution. There are no two ways about it, Mr. Speaker. The people in my part of the country understand them to be tied together because that is the way the design has been drawn.

I do not want tonight, Mr. Speaker, to go into the contents of this resolution. Rather, I should like to develop a scenario leading up to this resolution. As was pointed out time and time again, the governing party had nothing to say about the Constitution in its last election platform. It is only as a result of the intervention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the referendum campaign and during the winter election campaign that the issue was brought out. There was no indication when the referendum campaign would come, what would be the nature of the question, or what would be the nature of the debate in the province of Quebec, but there was this intervention. As the rest of the country also understood it, the people of Quebec expressed their concern about their place in the national framework and about the fact that the constitutional powers as they existed, particularly as to language and culture and a few other matters, were not adequate to meet the aspirations of the people of Quebec.

We heard the Prime Minister saying something will be done about it; suddenly that becomes an undertaking on behalf of the whole country. What that something was, was never spelled out. It was developed during the summer as a result of the ideas of one man and his advisers, not the Members of Parliament—they made no contribution to it at all. That participation in the Quebec referendum seems to have given the Prime Minister and many of his supporting members in the House the idea that they won the referendum campaign. Yet there was a hard working captain of the No forces who was the leader of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec. He worked the trenches far more than the others, but he was dismissed because of his idea, and we know——and the hon. members from Quebec know that the beige paper of Mr. Ryan and the Quebec Liberal party does not agree with the principles of this resolution. In the matter of the Constitution and its amendment, the beige paper and the Quebec Liberal party are completely ignored. So, who speaks for Quebec? The Right Hon. Prime Minister and his members? The Liberal members? The newspapers are against, public opinion is against, the Quebec government is against, the Quebec Liberal party is against, but here in the House with a majority of the hon. members coming from central Canada, an attempt is being made at imposing amendments to the Constitution, changes in powers.

[English]

One must understand, Mr. Speaker, it is not only the question of the patriation of the Constitution with an amending formula that is at issue. There has to be a charter of rights. Who devised the charter of rights; the people who are affected by those rights, the people whose rights they are? They are the last ones to be considered. Mr. Speaker, that is contrary to the legal principles which govern the fashioning and the definition of the Constitution which, according to my understanding of the law, is that body of laws coming from a people that are given to a government for the better governing of that people. There has to be consent to that rule of conduct. Is there consent to this? That is the last thing that seems to worry the Prime Minister and the supporters of this resolution. Eight of the provinces whose powers are affected are against this unilateral patriation with the amending formula as devised and with the charter of rights. How does this in any way square with the definition of a constitution? On the contrary, in the minds of the Prime Minister and his advisers this law shall be imposed upon the people. There have been repeated speeches and statements by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), the Prime Minister and supporting members that the people will have to accept this; that this will win and be imposed upon the people. It is a complete denial of the rights of man as a composite of society in this country. It is one of the great tragedies of today.

This whole matter started off on the wrong foot. For a long time I have been an opponent of the idea of first ministers' conferences which come to conclusions and binding agreements without the sanctions of the legislatures beforehand. These depend upon personalities and are subject to the stress and strain of the relationship of 11 men. The present premiers and the Prime Minister are not the first persons to have held these views. These first ministers' conferences make a nonsense of this body, of provincial legislatures and of people who may have opposing views.

There were negotiations during the summer culminating in the September conference. I can readily understand why some of the premiers could not agree. It was because they knew the people behind them in their provinces did not share their views. They did not represent the constitutional views of their people. The premiers of provinces leading minority administrations—even those who hold narrow majorities, including the Prime Minister—do not have the majority of the views of the people backing them. There was not a constitutional debate in the House to see what ideas would come forward, so that they would be adequately presented to the Leader of the Government. Several provincial premiers from time to time have had resolutions debated in their houses before coming to federal-provincial conferences. It would have been better if all premiers had followed such a step prior to the September conference. My comments include the Prime Minister. The Constitution represents or governs all people; all people from various walks of life are entitled to be heard.

Certainly in my book there should have been a constituent assembly. I know some members of the press ridiculed this idea, but it is an honest and proper one.

Mr. Collenette: Parliament is a constituent assembly.

Mr. Lambert: In so far as the people of Canada are concerned, this Parliament does not represent their views regarding a Constitution for this country.

Mr. Collenette: You are insulting yourself.

Mr. Lambert: There is no way that the hon. member opposite represents the supporters on the provincial side of this federation in his province. There are separate powers in a federation. We are not a unitary state. Some members opposite behave as though they are swashbucklers, that everything will fall in behind them, that the provincial houses do not matter, that the provincial houses do not have any real powers, that they are only hangers-on or something to handle the periphery; but that is not so. Under the British North America Act provinces have exclusive powers.

Mr. Chénier: We have not touched them.

Mr. Lambert: I hear the hon. member. The federal government has shoved its nose for years into the field of education. The federal government deliberately grabs. I call it public brigandage, especially with regard to petroleum products.

Mr. Blais: Read the resolution.

Mr. Chénier: You are mixed up.

Mr. Lambert: Hon. members opposite are starting to sense that something is wrong.

Mr. Chénier: We are trying to help you.

Mr. Lambert: I know the superior intellect of the hon. member is hard at work on this subject. He thinks he has come up with the blueprint. All he is prepared to say is, "Ready, aye ready; how high can I jump; how many times shall I vote?"

Mr. Chénier: At least I have read the resolution.

Mr. Lambert: In this country, as in all countries, there are many other people aside from parliamentarians who have a contribution to make to the writing of the Constitution. That should have been the plan. It is easy for the first ministers to meet and to devise a plan for the calling of a constituent assembly representing academic and third parties. For instance, in my province one party has a huge majority, the federal government party has zilch to contribute in so far as the legislature is concerned, and the third party has one man. The third party in my province is the NDP. Its leader has dissociated himself from his national leader. He will not go along with the present proposed arrangements. Also the government of Saskatchewan has dissociated itself. This indicates that there is a diversity of views and that there is no way, in so far as a Constitution is concerned, that they will paint the country the same bland colour with the same broad brush. That is precisely what we were told this afternoon we should do; it should apply to all people across the country in the same way and that there should not be any recognition of any regional diversity. In other words, we were told we should not recognize there is a diversity with regard to language and culture in the province of Quebec. This should apply right across the board. The Atlantic provinces should be handled in the same way as the prairie provinces. Newfoundland, the newest recruit to the Canadian family of provinces, should be squeezed, moulded, pressed and ejected just like any other sausage. That is not Canada. It is only those people who want to bury their heads in the sand in central Canada who will insist upon this.

• (2030)

The government thinks what is good for central Canada, what is good for Quebec and Ontario, shall be good for the rest of the country. That is why we are getting this strong feeling. I must warn hon. members across the floor that the feeling is far more serious than they would believe. They may think I am just crying the blues but, Mr. Speaker, my public life has given me, I hope, some knowledge. As a bilingual Canadian from western Canada, understanding as I do, in part, the feelings of my colleagues in Quebec, I find it extraordinary that there is not that same exchange or that same comprehension of the problems and the aspirations of western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert: I thoroughly reject any suggestion by the Prime Minister to anyone who is not prepared to go along with this type of patriation in the Constitution, regardless of how it is done that, the end will always justify the means, but so say the Liberals. That is commandment number one in their lexicon. The public want a Constitution in Canada, as long as it is a Constitution made in Canada, and that should satisfy them. That is not so. We found in the referendum campaign an example of the end justifying the means.

As you know, members of this house have the privileges of distributing householder mailings at public expense. Just prior to the calling of the referendum campaign there was issued from the facilities in this House a householder mailing limited to the province of Quebec. A uniform householder mailing, in the name of a person other than the one who represented the constituency, was circulated. The three commissioners who were selected by the Prime Minister, before Madam Speaker was elected, authorized and approved the nature of the document. It did not conform to the guidelines for printing documents in this House. In addition to that, it was not printed by the facilities of this House but was farmed out to some outside contractor without any submissions. By the time the Post Office costs had been calculated into the total cost it was estimated that this mailing cost something over $600,000. The cost to the House was buried in the supplementary estimates over which the guillotine fell. I queried it but the guillotine fell when I was absent from the country. I raised the question earlier with respect to this matter but the answers have not been forthcoming. But, Mr. Speaker, they will.

What I mean is that certain Quebec members can get together in a common effort toward the Quebec referendum campaign. This does not excuse letting that job out to a favourite Montreal printer without any submissions. Five semi-trailer trucks pulled in behind the Confederation Building and bundles of printed matter were distributed through this institution.

Mr. Collenette: When will you talk about the Constitution?

Mr. Lambert: I am talking about the ends justifying the means. It is the same with this Constitution. The Prime Minister says the British government must accept the resolution regardless of its nature. He says it has been done in the past, in some cases. Never has it been done with the opposition of the provinces, as he is to do it now.

I would like to point out to hon. members, some of whom have perhaps never taken their law, that under the common law the theory of a trust has been developed. They do not know what trusts are in civil law. For them, they do not exist. But the trustee has an obligation toward all parties and all beneficiaries under a trust. When the Statute of Westminster was amended, at the request of the federal government and the provinces, the question of the amendments affecting the powers was deliberately left within the Statute of Westminster. They could not agree on the amending formula. The government trots out this 54 years of trial; that is a lot of malarkey. There have only been a few attempts at reaching agreement on an amending formula. There has not been a constant struggle. That struggle is in the imaginations of a few people. Now, because there is a document before us, and the other place, which has an amending formula that is unfair to some provinces does not matter. The provinces' rights and consent to the administration of this trust shall be overridden at the behest of one of the parties to the trust. Since when is that legal? It never has been.

Mr. Collenette: The Manitoba Court of Appeal says so.

Mr. Lambert: It never has been legal and the British certainly will not think it is. The British do not think it right and they are the ones who will have to act. The idea that the British will have to hold their noses as they vote in favour of it, again, is an exemplification of the end justifying the means. The end is merely the patriation of a Constitution in order to have it in Canada regardless of how it protects the rights of the people. I find this to be totally incomprehensible. As far as one can ascertain, a substantial majority of people are against the unilateral patriation with the charter as devised. Eight out of ten provincial administrations say it is wrong. The majority of newspapers in this country, regardless—

• (2040)

An hon. Member: Where do they stand in the polls?

An hon. Member: That means we are right.

Mr. Lambert: It is only those who have closed minds who would dare disregard the opinions of others. Might is right in the eyes of the hon. member. There is another saying that there is nothing so tyrannical as a temporary majority. The epitome of that saying is the tyranny of this situation at the present time; the desire, yes, the insistence upon going to Westminster before the Supreme Court of Canada shall have ruled on the question.

Just imagine the sort of a result that would be; for the Prime Minister of Canada to request the government at Westminster to pass this resolution to amend Canada's Constitution, on the unilateral request of the Parliament of Canada, containing amendments which the Supreme Court of Canada—not the Privy Council—would rule were beyond the powers of the Parliament of Canada. What sort of a horse's neck situation would that be? I am only using the polite end of the horse.

Again, the end would justify the means, disregarding that in this House the majority of the support for the resolution is not wide; nor is it in the other place. That should give hon. members pause.

I will admit some hon. members are opposed to the resolution for differing reasons, but that is only part and parcel of the whole situation. For instance, we cannot accept a charter of rights which denies the right to property, and the lawful use of that property. That is fundamental to all of us.

My colleague, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) talked about his grandparents coming to this country before the turn of the century so they might own property.

This is the dream of all men. I can go up and down the rows on this side and on that side of the House, and I will see post-generations of people who did the same thing, who came from Europe because they could own land in Canada. Have any of the members from the metro area ever inquired of their Italian friends why they came to this country? Having dealt with Italian immigrants for decades, I know their dream was to own property, which they could not own in their own country. Economic conditions would not prevent them from owning property. Let us look at those countries that are being collectivized. Let us look at all those tens of thousands of people who have come to us from China. People have come from all parts of the world.

Like many of the hon. members on the other side, my first male ancestor came to this country in the mid-seventeenth century. These people were peasants from France who could not own land. At that time the system did not permit the ordinary man to own land, so they came out to colonize. They were given grants of land. The first record of my male ancestor is the notarial act granting him land in Lotbinière county in the province of Quebec in 1670.

On my mother's side, prior to 1910, my grandfather, who was a tradesman, a machinist, and later a hardware man, came to this country to take a homestead. He did so because he could own land. Will we deny to our fellow Canadians, through the Constitution, that they shall have a right of property?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Never!

Mr. Lambert: That is a denial, of the most fundamental nature, of a principle injustice in that charter of rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, some eight years ago, during one of my first speeches in the House of Commons, I said, "It is time for Canada to hear the voice of the new west. We want justice for ourselves, just as we are ready to do our part to obtain justice for all." I called for "a new harvest of national unity in which the rights of all Canadians would be protected and fostered." Today, in this historic debate, I return to my central theme of justice for all Canadians; and, even more, faithfulness to the integrity of Canada itself.

I have not come here today to be partisan or to indulge in personal attacks on anyone. I appeal to members opposite, who have the same love of country which has brought me here, to listen to a voice from the new west. I speak to you as one who was born in Montreal, grew up in Ottawa, sat in the galleries of this House for hours upon hours as a student, lived in the United States, and travelled the world, and now proudly claims Alberta as my home, a province where all my children have been educated in the French language and are fully bilingual.

Let me start by saying what I stand for on behalf of my constituents in Edmonton South. I want a Canadian Constitution that is made in Canada. I want our Constitution, the British North America Act, brought home from Britain, and any and all changes in it made here in Canada by Canadians. I want reforms that strengthen Canadian federalism not destroy it.

What will the proposed resolution do if passed? Instead of a new Constitution made in Canada, we would have one made in Britain. Instead of changes being made by Canadians, we would have the fundamental federalist nature of Canada radically altered by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. Instead of reforms which would strengthen Canadian federalism, we would institutionalize and perpetuate a second-class citizenship for the province of Alberta.

I cannot believe that members who take their responsibilities seriously to the history and to the future of Canada would ever pass such a resolution. Members must understand the gravity of what lies before us. For the federal government to unilaterally force Westminster to violate the federal basis of the Canadian union would lead to the breakup of Canada.

This is not a flag debate revolving around the emotions evoked by symbolism. This is a constitutional debate which will change the balance of power under which all Canadians are governed.

We must keep our eyes squarely on this issue.

The resolution before us does violence to the basic tenets of a federal state in which the rights and responsibilities of the federal and provincial levels of government have just claim to equal recognition and respect. The resolution does violence to this principle because it proposes an amending formula which would give two provinces, Ontario and Quebec, a permanent veto over any constitutional change. This would clearly make the Canadians I represent second-class citizens in their own country. Note well, Ontario and Quebec would always have a veto, no matter what population shifts occur in Canada. Alberta and the other provinces would not have a veto as individual provinces unless they comprise 25 per cent of the population. Right now Alberta has 8 per cent of the population of Canada. We are rightly concerned that under this resolution a future amendment could take away Alberta's rights to its natural resources. The resolution does even more violence because it would give the federal government unilateral power to use a referendum to make constitutional changes without any reference whatever to the elected provincial governments and legislatures.

To serve some unspecified goal, the federal government has torn up its own white paper on the Constitution written in 1965, which reads:

> The Canadian Parliament will not request an amendment directly affecting federal-provincial relationships without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces.

The reason the Progressive Conservative Party is fighting this resolution with all its strength is because we recognize that it would end completely the partnership of Canadian federalism. That is why my party overwhelmingly supports the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) to delete the referendum section from this resolution.

My colleagues and I did not come to Parliament to rip apart the very fabric which has made our country great. It is impossible for successful constitutional revision to emerge out of a process which is unilaterally forced and inherently divisive. That is the essence of the message we must go on repeating. Of all those who are fighting this attack on the Canadian system, one man has stood out as a champion of a united Canada, namely, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark)—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: —who instinctively recognized the grave dangers in the resolution when it was unfolded by the Prime Minister before the Canadian people on television last fall, and who immediately opposed it at a time when public opinion appeared to favour the Prime Minister. It is the Leader of the Opposition who deserves the credit for awakening our country to a full realization of what this resolution contains.

Let us look for a moment at the record of opposition throughout Canada and Westminster to this proposal. Sixty-four per cent of Canadians, with a majority in every region, disapprove of the federal government's unilateral action. Only 22 per cent approve. Eight of the ten provinces are against this action. Six provinces have taken the government to court. Both Quebec Premier René Lévesque and Liberal leader, Claude Ryan, are totally opposed to this proposal as are the major editorialists in that province, despite the Prime Minister's claim that his resolution is a positive response to the Quebec referendum.

The provincial NDP has publicly opposed this resolution in Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba and Quebec. Four New Democratic Members of Parliament have broken with their leader on this issue. So far, three Liberal senators have spoken against the proposal in the Senate. Last Thursday, in the House, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Duclos) gave a very important and moving address recording his opposition. Maxwell Cohen, one of the Liberal government's expert witnesses before the constitutional committee, and Gordon Robertson, former secretary to the cabinet for federal-provincial relations, have both opposed the referendum provision.

The inter-party committee of the British House of Commons, headed by Sir Anthony Kershaw, has raised serious questions about the ability of Westminster to properly respond to a constitutional demand by Canada which lacks the kind of provincial government support but would henceforth be written into an amending formula.

In addition to this diverse and widespread opposition, we are just beginning to hear from the courts. Although the Manitoba Court of Appeal rendered a split decision in the government's favour, I believe the opinion of Mr. Justice O'Sullivan will turn out to have wide support from among the judiciary elsewhere. Mr. Justice O'Sullivan said:

> Each province has entered confederation on the understanding that our country is a federal state, a federal union. Its fundamental terms cannot be changed without unanimous agreement, because such a change in a fundamental term would change the very nature of the federal union.

Mr. Justice O'Sullivan went on to say:

> This does not mean that every amendment which affects dominion-provincial relationships requires unanimous consent, but only those amendments which affect fundamental terms of the union.

Surely it stands to reason that constitutional change, as Senator Manning, the distinguished former premier of Alberta, has argued:

> —should not be the first but the last step in any constructive process to implement such changes as are not only desirable but acceptable to the people and governments concerned.

Senator Manning concludes:

> A successful revision of the Constitution of this or any other democratic country will not be the reward of those prepared to tear the country apart to gain their own ends, but of those who by wise, patient, constructive leadership have first guided the nation into an era of mutual trust, willing co-operation, and national goodwill.

Trust, co-operation and good will are desperately needed on all sides if we are to hold this country together. In my home province of Alberta the seeds of frustration and alienation, so long in the ground, have become a shoot of separatism.

No one can deny the anger that prevades my province as a result of the government's constitutional and energy policies which manifestly discriminate against us. You can be sure that every responsible politician in Alberta at both the federal and provincial levels is trying to stamp out separatism, but separatism will grow unless the constitutional and energy questions, which are clearly interrelated in Alberta, are resolved with a sense of justice for all.

The new west has economic strength and it will never stand for second-class citizenship or policies which take unfair advantage of our resources just to build the political popularity of the government in heavily populated central Canada. In Alberta, we are not asking for special treatment, we are asking for fair treatment. When the fires of separatism were burning brightly in Quebec, the federal government went out of its way to develop policies designed to show the people of Quebec why they should stay in Canada. Now when some Albertans feel provoked enough to consider separatism, the federal government seems bent on policies that encourage the separation argument. I call on the federal government to show in Alberta today the same concern for national unity that it demonstrated in Quebec.

In the 1970s, the people of Alberta came to understand, and be sensitive to, the problems of Quebec. Before the Quebec referendum there was an outpouring of support in Alberta for a better deal for the people of Quebec in a renewed federalism. In my own constituency, I held a national unity rally—in order to send a message to Quebec—that was one of the most successful political events I have ever held.

Out west, we care about people throughout our country because we intuitively understand it is the combined strength of all the regions, each with its own characteristics and integrity, that gives Canada its over-all strength. Out west we do not regard the provinces as appendages of our federation, we regard them as integral. Just as we in Alberta expanded our view of Quebec, now I ask particularly the Quebec members of Parliament to enlarge their view of the true new west, the real Alberta of hopes and fears and dreams that I and my colleagues represent. When the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) goes out west, stumping for this resolution, he says he is selling Canada. But we do not need to be "sold" Canada. We want to play a stronger part in Canada, not pushed off into a corner.

We listened in Alberta when the question was asked, "What does Quebec want?" Now we ask for Parliament's response when the new question is asked: "What does Alberta want?"

Alberta wants a strong central government, balanced by strong provincial governments. We believe provincial governments provide an important "check and balance" in Canada's federal system. In 1978 Alberta released a position paper on the Constitution, "Harmony in Diversity", which made 29 recommendations for constitutional change. We support the proposed amending formula known as the "Vancouver consensus", because under its terms all provinces would have equal constitutional and legal status.

I said a moment ago that in Alberta the constitutional and energy issues are interrelated. In fact, an Edmonton Journal-Calgary Herald poll published over the week end shows that 68 per cent of Albertans disapprove of the federal government's unilateral move on the Constitution and 79 per cent disapprove of the government's energy policies. Just as the constitutional resolution would make Ottawa more dominant, the National Energy Program reflects a desire to further centralize authority in Ottawa. The present energy policy is an unprecedented attack on provincially-owned resources.

Members from central Canada must understand that resources, as Premier Lougheed puts it, "are the passport to the west." We do not have the potential in manufacturing that central Canada does. We are a long way from markets. We have high transportation costs. We are not on tide water. The only way we can have jobs at home is to have a strong resource industry and then work to process that industry.

Let me pause to note that one of the greatest political leaders in the entire history of Canada is Peter Lougheed. The reason he is so firmly supported by Albertans is that, in strongly defending the rights and aspirations of our province, people recognize the Lougheed way is the only way to a strong and truly united Canada from sea to sea. I might add, the fact that Alberta is the only province of the ten where the government's share of the economy has shrunk in the past decade, has not hurt him.

It is said that the Alberta heritage savings trust fund is making us inordinately rich. But this fund, which is built from a rapidly depleting oil reserve, represents just eight weeks of federal government spending. It is said that Alberta must share the benefits of our resources with our fellow Canadians, which is a not too subtle way of saying we are selfish. But Alberta has already contributed $35 billion to our fellow Canadians since 1973 by selling our oil at less than we could have received in the marketplace. We are not asking to be canonized for this contribution, but is it right that we should be portrayed as self-serving when we want to develop our resources in order to make Canada self-sufficient in energy and thus continue to make a major contribution to the national Canadian interest?

Alberta is prepared to charge only 75 per cent of the U.S. price for our oil, and for natural gas 85 per cent of the price of oil. In Quebec, the price of natural gas would be as low as 65 per cent of the price of oil. This would be a four-year contribution of $24,000 per Albertan. Moreover, Alberta is committed to $7 billion for an all-out effort to develop the Alberta oil sands.

What are Alberta's conditions? First, no punitive taxation of the industry, and, second, respect for provincial ownership by having no export tax or wellhead tax which would invade provincial jurisdiction. Instead, the National Energy Program proposes a lower price for natural gas, an oil price that will be less in real terms than the already low 40 per cent of actual value, and taxes which can be described in no other way than as a federal royalty on a provincial resource. As a result of a taxing regime which has created chaos in the conventional industry so vital to the economies of the producing provinces, there is now taking place an alarming exodus from Canada of drilling rigs, the result of which will be 140,000 lost Canadian jobs in not only the energy industry, but steel, housing and other principal industries in central Canada.

When the people of Alberta see energy production halted because of wrong-headed federal government policies, when they see jobs lost not only in the west but in central Canada as a result of these policies, when they see a deadlock in negotiations, when they see us blithely spending $5.2 billion a year to buy offshore oil from countries such as Mexico and Saudi Arabia at world prices without the money coming back to benefit Canada, when they see a federal government determined to force constitutional changes which will further reduce provincial strength; in short, when Albertans see our part of Canada weakened and impeded in trying to play our role in strengthening the whole of Canada, this fuels the fires of anger, and if this situation continues it will force a breakup of our union.

I say to my colleagues: It is time for the members of Parliament from Quebec to look seriously at what is happening in the new west. It is time for the Liberal Party to take stock of the present situation and to contemplate the future of that historic party which has given our country Laurier, St. Laurent and Pearson. It is time for the business community of central Canada to raise its voice of protest and be heard in the corridors of power in Ottawa. This debate can truly save our country. Or, if one listens, it can be but a footnote in the historians' analysis of the Canada that was.

I have tried to make it clear that the amending formula and the divisive referendum are at the heart of my opposition to this resolution. There is, however, one other matter that deeply disturbs me and that is the form of the charter of rights. I cannot ignore in this, my major contribution to the debate, what is wrong in the charter.

First of all, the right of the provinces to give their assent to human rights provisions that fall within their jurisdiction has flowed from the nature of our federation. Surely even the most superficial reading of our history makes that clear. The federal government itself underscored the point in the 1970 Foreign Policy Review when it recognized that not even United Nations conventions on human rights could be ratified by this country until those provisions that fall within provincial jurisdiction had been supported by the provinces. The convention on racial discrimination and the convention on civil and political rights were specifically mentioned. The review even urged the development of effective procedures to consult with the provinces on a "more extensive and meaningful scale."

Ten years ago the government upheld provincial consultation as the route to entrenching human rights; today it acts unilaterally. Throughout our history, Section 92 of the BNA Act has protected provincial sovereignty in such fields as education; today the government would violate those rights by forcing Westminster to pass a new charter of rights that the provinces do not accept. Hardly an auspicious beginning to the so-called new era of rights.

In looking at the charter we again see before us the heart of the matter. The federal government is determined to force Westminster to violate the trusteeship of our federation which Ottawa and the provinces asked Britain to hold in the first place. What might otherwise be declared illegal by our courts will become legal through the legislative intervention of the British parliament. And the federal government dares to assert that something good will come out of this immoral, illegitimate process.

This charter is even more reprehensible.

Mr. Irwin: Which sections are you against?

Mr. Roche: It would have us believe that rights are conferred on people by their governments. This is quite the reverse of reality. In fact, human rights are inherent in human beings.

An hon. Member: And that is how it is drafted if you read it properly.

Mr. Roche: Everyone's civil, political, economic and social development rights are protected, not given, by governments. Whether a charter exists or not, every person, everywhere, has the right to life, to bodily integrity, to food, shelter, medical care and employment. Every person has the right to freedom in searching for truth, the right to a basic education and to be informed truthfully about public events. Everyone has the right to a just and sufficient wage, the right to private property with its accompanying social duties, the right to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. Minister for the Department of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) on a point of order.

Mr. Blais: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. gentleman would simply pay attention to the text of the resolution he would see that the rights are declaratory; the drafting is declaratory. Human rights are not granted, it is a process of recognition of the human rights that the hon. gentleman cherishes and I wish he would make that particular distinction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: To continue, everyone has the right to membership in the human family, the right to physical security and to live in peace.

These rights exist because they are implanted in every human being by God, the Creator of life. How ironical that not only does the charter ignore this, it even ignores the pre-eminence of God.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roche: The preamble in the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights declared that every human being created in the image of God has certain inalienable rights. Who dared to erase that preamble?

The Progressive Conservative Party moved an amendment in committee:

> Affirming that the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free individuals and free institutions.
> Affirming also that individuals and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law—

This amendment was rejected by the government. I wonder why? In rejecting a recognition of the supremacy of God the government has offended countless Canadians who want the spiritual values we inherited to be passed on to our children. This is not a Godless society; woe to the government that tries to make us one.

Moreover, we look in vain in this charter for a recognition of the special place of the family in our society, the right to the enjoyment of property, to protection from unreasonable interference with privacy, and to access to information.

As to the language provisions of the charter, I point out to members that in Alberta we already have a system of education which provides a tax supported full education program in the French language from kindergarten to college. No one had to force Alberta to do this. It has come about because there is in our province support for minorities and a desire to be fair to all. Those who argue that the implementation of rights is best left in the hands of legislators, sensitive to changing public needs, rather than the fixed view of courts, can find in Alberta much substance for their view.

I come now to the very difficult question of abortion as it will be affected by the charter. The government has said that the charter will not affect the abortion situation. I submit that that view is entirely wrong. In fact, one of the results of this charter, little discussed as yet, will be the entrenchment of abortion.

We should not be fooled by the opening words of section 7: "Everyone has the right to life . . ." The courts have ruled that a fetus must be born to assert rights. The legal opinion submitted to all Members of Parliament by Stephens, French and McKeown, emphasizes that this charter gives rights only to persons who have been born.

Medical evidence today that a fetus is indeed human is overwhelming. I believe the unborn child has the right to life and, of course, that the mother has her right to life. When these rights come into conflict, as they do in rare medical cases, then one right must give way to another. Hence, our law permits abortion when the life or health of the mother is in danger. This law is grossly abused. It is impossible to believe that the 65,000 abortions annually in Canada are caused by medical problems. Many people want the present law tightened, but that is a matter for debate by itself. We leave that alone for now.

What I am stating here is that if the present charter is passed confirming that a fetus has no rights, then the age of abortion on demand will have arrived. I do not think hon. members want this to happen. The government could eliminate any ambiguity by specifying in Section 7 that the right to life begins at conception, and such action would not interfere with a mother's legitimate right to abortion. I say very seriously that it would be a sacrilege if, in the name of human rights, this charter denies the right to life of the unborn.

To sum up, I support, as our party has all along, the patriation of our Constitution with the Vancouver amending formula. That would be a positive, constructive action for the government to take and would end this debate instantly. In such an atmosphere of renewed good will, politicians at all levels would be under great pressure to agree on a charter of rights made in Canada which would be acceptable to the widest number of people. Then we would be able to get on with the pressing work of Parliament; the solving of our increasing economic, energy and social problems. We would then be able to turn our attention to the world outside Canada, which is in great conflict. The economic, social and political problems of the world are alarming, and Canada is not playing its full role because so much of the time and energy of government and Parliament is taken up by our internal preoccupations.

Let the federal and provincial governments get back to the bargaining table. That is what Canadians want. Failing that, I must continue to oppose the unilateral and divisive action of the federal government.

In my speech eight years ago, to which I referred, at the opening of my remarks I said of the new west:

> We have no time for narrow fixations or old battles. We want to spend our energies solving the economic and social problems facing us. In the west we have brains, energy and goodwill, and we will not be deflected from our task.

To all hon. members I say, let us get on with the job of helping all Canadians achieve their levels of greatness.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in discussing the motion and amendment before us I would like to begin by saying that I support the motion and reject the amendment currently before the House.

I would like to make the observation that there was a mood among the Canadian people across the country which reached its peak, I believe, during the last two winter campaigns. I ask hon. members to reflect on that mood. The mood was sparked by months and months of high profile squabbling prior to both the 1979 and 1980 elections. As I read it, and as many others, including many in the media, read it, the mood of the people at that time was: for God's sake, stop being so partisan; stop beating each other over the head; stop reducing political debate to negative commercials with slow-motion hockey, card tricks and shell games; stop making politics a joke; stop being negative; stop being critical; and start co-operating together to solve some of the country's problems. They were saying basically: If the idea is good, support it; if the idea is bad, reject it; try to improve things, regardless of labels and regardless of party.

I told the people in the constituency of Kootenay West, and NDP candidates right across Canada told the people of this country, that if elected—and a number of us were—we as Members of Parliament and as New Democrats would strive to be constructive, not negative, and to judge policies presented by whatever government should be in office on their merits regardless of the source. We further pledged that we would work together with all members of all parties in an attempt to come to grips with all the problems, structural, social and economic, which face us as a people and as a nation.

I am proud to say that the NDP as a party and, in all humility, I believe I as an individual member, have done just that during this debate, during the House consideration of the entire constitutional resolution and all of the proceedings which preceded the presentation of the resolution. We have kept our word, and we will continue to keep faith with those who sent us here in the spirit of the commitments we made at that time. That is why the NDP and I support this motion.

What does the motion do? We are bringing our Constitution home. Everyone knows that. Everyone apparently agrees on that, although one would have to wonder, with some of the discussion which takes place.

Second, we are providing an amending formula which can work. It has a built-in mechanism for providing a more broadly acceptable formula over the next two years with a deadline and a fair deadlock-breaking mechanism. There is no arbitrary action there. Some of my colleagues, those to my right in particular, have been saying that we ought to have another go-around with the premiers. That is in the package; it is in the resolution. There will be another go-around, and perhaps several. That is built into that two-year period. There is simply a deadline for reaching an agreement.

If I may say so, all of my experience, all the experience of millions of other Canadians in the Canadian labour force who are members of Canadian trade unions and the experience of thousands of others throughout industry, has been that when you are bargaining about sharing money, power and authority every year, as those people do, negotiations without deadlines cannot and will never bear fruit; they never, never do. Agreements just do not happen that way. This may work in some armchair academic debating society, but it does not happen that way in real life. When real power, real authority, real dollars and real interests are at stake, that is simply the way it is. Frankly, I am rather dismayed when members of this House show such little knowledge of the realities of political life and power-sharing that they cling to such kindergarten level dreams as unanimous agreement on formulae for nation-building.

I would like to get back to what the motion is about and to what we are doing.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is a good idea.

Mr. Kristiansen: The third point is that we are establishing a charter of rights with new clarifications and judicial protection for women, for the disabled and for such national minorities as those who, in the experience of many members of this House and certainly thousands outside, had the experience of being in internment camps during the Second World War. Many of these people are still resident in my constituency. We are finally providing such people with protection.

There is not a written law anywhere in the world which can stop fools from behaving like damned fools. If governments insist on acting arbitrarily, as ours did in this country with citizens of Japanese descent, and if we should again go through another aberration of the misuse of power and authority, as happened in 1970 with the War Measures Act in the province of Quebec—and the hindsight around here is tremendous—then nothing will stop the initial brunt of that kind of brute force. But there can be redress, and, to the extent it is possible for a judicial and legal system to provide protection for people, that is what this charter attempts to do.

This is not a perfect document. I do not think any of us are so enamoured of ourselves that we think we are capable of perfection, but we strive for it and that is what life is all about. According to Gordon Fairweather, a former leading member of the Conservative Party, now head of the Human Rights Commission—a man for whom I have the highest personal regard and with whom I have worked on matters of race relations—this charter is one of the best charters in the world, if not the best. This has been stated now by hundreds of other organizations which have contributed to the building of this charter.

People say that the charter is not being written in Canada. My God, I cannot think of any other single piece of legislation during my 25 years of active political life in which I have seen so many people involved in the drafting. We have had some 300 contributions from organizations, each of which has involved thousands more Canadians, and in some cases hundreds of thousands more Canadians, who have had meaningful and direct input into the drafting of that charter. For some people to suggest that we should cast that aside simply boggles the mind.

There is also the matter of the entrenchment of the important recognition of aboriginal and treaty rights for the first time in this land in a Canadian document. To those who say there should be unanimous agreement among the provinces on this, let me say that the way I read Canadian history and political life, I doubt that the provinces would ever agree to the entrenchment of those rights. We will certainly not castigate people of other parties necessarily. There have been provincial jurisdictions and provincial governments in this land composed basically of people of my own political persuasion, and our record in the past in that regard is not the best. But provincial governments and provincial legislatures guard some of those rights very carefully, and for us to suggest that we can have our cake and eat it too, that we can provide rights and still have unanimous agreement within the next few months, is really kidding somebody. Certainly the people who advocate that idea are, I suggest, only kidding themselves.

In the matter of the charter of rights, it has been argued by some that it is not couched in soulful terms, that it is not a beautifully written document. They ask why we cannot have something more similar to the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights, something as profoundly worded as the American Bill of Rights or the Declaration of Independence or like some other historic documents which have been written in flowery language.

Mr. Blenkarn: Something we can be proud of.

Mr. Kristiansen: Those people who make that criticism suggest that, at the same time, it is not written in sufficiently tight language. I suggest if you want a document which will stand up technically and properly in law, you have to forgive the fact sometimes that it does not use the most beautiful wording in the world. The two things do not necessarily go together.

Mr. Blenkarn: You cannot even be proud of this document.

Mr. Kristiansen: Is the hon. member saying he cannot be proud of it because it does not do the job or because it does not read well? One necessitates the other.

Mr. Blenkarn: It does not read well, and we cannot be proud of it.

Mr. Kristiansen: If the gentleman would prefer to have a document that reads well but provides no protection, that of course is his option, and it may very well be the option that has been taken by the Conservative Party during the entire debate.

There are others in the land who have said they reject the document because the process itself has been divisive. That is why they reject the proposition which, some of them admit, is good in substance. I am afraid I do not have much sympathy with that kind of argument. Some of these people remind me of those happy warriors who, as soon as enemy reinforcements come to the scene of battle, leave the flanks or the rear of their allies unguarded because, suddenly, the process has become divisive.

If we look back on Canadian history, we see that the battle for hospital insurance in the province of Saskatchewan was not exactly peaceful, that the fight to protect farmland in British Columbia was not all peaches and cream, and that the fight for medicare in the province of Saskatchewan was no piece of cake. In fact, anyone who looks at history, either in this country or anywhere around the world, would have to say that the struggle for social progress, human rights and societal change is, by definition, divisive, and if people cannot stand the heat, they had better get out of the kitchen. It is as simple as that. I find it almost inconceivable that serious people who really want change cannot, for some reason, accept the fact that once in a while the process becomes divisive.

There are others in this land who say their big problem is that now the Senate can veto constitutional reform. That is another red herring which has been thrown into the debate on the Constitution. These people mistakenly believe that it is something new. Constitutional change in this country, even when it has been rooted in the BNA Act, has always necessitated Senate agreement, and there has always been a Senate veto.

A colleague of mine, who is not here this evening, the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse), was recently asked to sum up the argument of those who insist that we have now lost the chance we once had for Senate reform. My colleague, in his rather folksy but usually rather accurate manner, responded by saying: "I think the argument goes something like this," and it is not one with which he agreed: "If you get the pig into the shute on the way to the pen and it gets away on you, it is harder to get it back in the second time around." That, to me, is a rather specious argument for rejecting a process and a resolution which, in substance, offers much of that for which progressive-thinking Canadians have been fighting for years and years.

I would say again that the argument that somehow we are making the provinces weaker by this process amazes me. What is happening is that we have a federal government using its unilateral power, which is recognized politically, and now recognized legally, to ensure that we will never have federal unilateral power again. It is reduced to as simple an argument as that. How this action can be imagined by anyone of good faith and good will to be creating some kind of centralist state with dictatorial powers in Ottawa simply boggles the mind, not only mine but that of hundred of thousands of Canadians across the country.

In addition to using its unilateral power to ensure that it will never again have that power, there is also provision within the motion before us not only to recognize certain rights of resource ownership, resource management and indirect taxation and to reconfirm rights which provinces, prior to the court battles of the mid-1970s, thought they had, but there are additional powers of indirect taxation such as would provide, for instance, almost $600 million, at a minimum, to the province of Alberta alone. Those are new powers to the provinces; plus confirmations of previous powers that were taken away.

Again, there is no strengthening at the centre, but central authority and power is being used in order to ensure that the process of constitutional change is the one which has been demanded for years and years in this country. This process was promised during the referendum campaign in the province of Quebec in May of 1980, not only by many politicians and others, but by the leaders of all three federal political parties. At that time we promised that substantive changes would be made and that we would embark upon that course of action soon. It is the keeping of a commitment; it is the beginning of the road. It will provide what was pledged to the people of that province at that time. That is one of the reasons there is some sense of urgency.

I should like to comment for a moment on some rights which do not appear in the charter. There are those in the country who have suggested they cannot support the charter because it does not include the long list of so-called new social and economic rights which many people believe should be embedded in some form in Canadian statutes or hopefully in a Canadian Constitution. For instance, there is the right to collective bargaining; the right to withdraw one's labour which was granted as "No man shall be forced to build bridges" as far back as Magna Carta. It is not as important to spell out in any charter the collective rights of groups in society which have some power, albeit a negative power, and to protect their basic rights, as it is to protect individuals who have no clout or muscle of their own.

As I have always understood it, the first purpose of law is to give protection to those who are defenceless and do not have the means to protect themselves. As a Canadian worker and as a trade unionist, I have been able, together with my peers, to exercise a certain negative power to protect my fundamental collective rights. People who do not have the benefit of such organization are unable to do so. But there is another reason why some of us are not even eager to have them recognized within the Constitution.

For instance, the collective right to organize, to bargain and to withold labour was not first established by law. It was established because thousands of working men and women in Canada and elsewhere throughout the world collectively claimed it and exercised it. When government gave legal recognition to that right, it was limited thereby. There were many more severe limitations imposed than existed prior to its legal recognition. Certainly there are penalties and dangers inherent in defining and legally recognizing the rights of people who have some clout to defend themselves. When we weighs the two issues in balance it does not make many of us unhappy that those rights have been left out. Our experience with law has not always been a loving relationship.

In the time remaining I should like to say a few words about a few other subjects which have been raised. This has been a very emotional debate in some areas around the country. Oft times contributions were very far from accurate, not only in the argumentative sense but in the factual sense as well. I must say I was puzzled by some of the comments a few moments ago by, I believe, the member who immediately preceded me, that somehow abortion was being ruled out totally by the Constitution. It was not long ago that a former member of the House—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Ruled in.

Mr. Kristiansen: Fine, I stand corrected, I appear to have misstated something. But, the argument was that abortion was made legal by this Constitution and that it was now impossible to make political decisions in Canada to reverse that.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is correct.

Mr. Kristiansen: That was simply an opinion, not a ruling. Not long ago a former member of the House, the previous member for Kootenay West, visited my constituency and said the exact opposite. He said that because of the wording of this Constitution, it might now be possible—and it might be ruled by the courts in the future—that "the right to life" would become a fact of life, and the advocates of that campaign would have their way. People cannot have it both ways. This is simply one small example of the duplicity which has characterized so much of this debate around the country. I hesitate to use the word "duplicity", but I cannot think of another one.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney) was in my constituency not long ago stating very clearly in the press, before reporters and audiences, in order to discredit some of those who supported this resolution and this process, that this party and its members had supported closure in the House of Commons.

Mr. Blenkarn: You did.

Mr. Kristiansen: That is a lie; that statement is a lie. If that member or any other member wishes to raise that point, so be it. She was here a moment ago, but she seems to have left; perhaps she is behind the curtains.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Perhaps I did not fully understand the hon. member, but was he attributing to another hon. member of this House the statement that that hon. member had lied?

Mr. Kristiansen: Shall I stand, Sir, and reply?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I ask the hon. member to assist the Chair. I will put it in the form of a statement rather than a question. If the hon. member was indicating that another hon. member had lied, then it is the obligation of the Chair, pursuant to the rules of debate, to ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement. But, I am not sure I understood the hon. member perfectly; accordingly, I ask him to clarify his position.

Mr. Kristiansen: Sir, you may not have understood me perfectly. I said that it was reported in the press in my constituency and by people who attended a meeting addressed by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that she said the members of this party in the House of Commons during the process of this debate had voted for closure. What I said is that that statement, if made, was a lie. I did not call the hon. member a liar. She may still choose to raise that question in her own way.

Mr. Knowles: The statement was incorrect.

Mr. Kristiansen: It was grossly incorrect.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I want to deal with that particular manner of debate. Whatever may be said from time to time of those who occupy the chair, there is one matter which presents a problem particular to me as one individual who occupies that position. I do not think what our standing rules prohibit directly ought to be permitted to be understood or accepted indirectly. I am not sure whether the hon. member is in fact attempting to attribute the characteristic of lying to another hon. member. But I do not intend to enter a splitting of hairs with any hon. member in this place. While I occupy the chair, if any hon. member directly or indirectly attributes that characteristic to another hon. member I will ask the hon. member who makes the accusation, directly or indirectly, to withdraw. I want to be clear about that so that any hon. member, not just from the far corner but from every side of the House, understands me perfectly. The next hon. member who goes against what I have just said will be called to order by me and I will proceed, as I ought to, in the most rigorous sense. There are enough characteristics of debate which can give it heat and quality without resorting to that type of thing. I am not suggesting the hon. member has moved to one side or the other, I just want to take this occasion to make it clear that this officer of the chair will not have it, whether directly or indirectly.

• (2150)

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, to make it clear, I did not suggest that the hon. member was a liar or had lied. I did not do this by inference. I did not say that and it was not my intention. But the statement which was reported in the press was untrue. The public and hon. members of this House can draw their own conclusions. At some point the hon. member may wish to clarify her statement. This is simply one issue which has caused some problems for many Canadian citizens who have been trying to follow the debate and who have been trying to make up their minds on the basis of fact.

I had the privilege one night last week to listen to the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko). I would like to briefly quote some of his words. They are found at page 8107 of Hansard. He said:

However, I am distressed over accusations in the debate in regard to the inclusion of a reference to God in the Constitution. My belief in God is secure; it does not need to be enshrined in secular documents. It is now enshrined in the greatest of all constitutions—the Good Book. I wholeheartedly accept its inclusion in the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights and I would be delighted to see God enshrined in the preamble to the Constitution. What distresses me is the postulate that somehow we on this side are somehow more godly than members on the other side of the House, or that they are more godly than we, or that one person here in his or her judgment is somehow more godly than someone else in the House. Time will bring forth a constitutional preamble and God will be in it, if He so wills it to be.

I would recommend to some hon. members to my right the reading of that passage again and again, morning, noon and night. They would do well to learn a little humility from one of their colleagues, whom I certainly admire for his intestinal fortitude.

Another question which has been raised during the process of this debate, at least since a certain amendment was proposed by the government, and then withdrawn by it, has been the question relating to property rights. A number of people have been running back and forth across the country suggesting we were about to take everyone's toothbrush away, seize their homes or steal their rolls of toilet tissue since we did not include a section on property rights in the charter within this Constitution. The opposition to the inclusion of property rights is rather widespread, not only among us evil socialists, as some would say, but among many Conservatives and provincial governments from one end of the country to the other. I therefore find that argument more than a little hypocritical.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kristiansen: I find it more than a little hypocritical for those selfsame advocates of unanimity and provincial rights to suggest at the same time that we should be putting property rights within the charter in the Constitution. That would do more to take away from provincial powers and authority than almost anything else which could be included in this document.

What would we say to people in the West Kootenays, the Okanagan, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan or British Columbia who believe they must do something to stop foreign ownership of lakeshore land and of waterfront land on both our coasts? What would we say to those who want to do something about preserving farmland and forest land in Canada? It is a direct infringement of provincial rights. Again, I would suggest that some of my friends to my right would do well to consult with some of their provincial colleagues to get their act in order before harping on that issue much longer.

It is not only my experience but the experience of many working people in this country and throughout the world that human rights are a relatively new invention on this planet. It is only recently that human rights have been protected by the state in almost any country. It is very recent in terms of human history. Property rights are so entrenched in the common law that they are in no danger. If we are ever to see a society in which human rights receive equitable treatment before the law with rights of property, then I suggest it is not a bad idea to entrench many individual human rights within this charter while leaving property rights to the protection of the common law. Those rights have certainly been well protected throughout the history of this country.

The section on multiculturalism provides some new protection here as well. Recently in the state of Texas an employee was fired for speaking to a fellow employee in a language other than English. The Supreme Court of the United States rejected the appeal. Some might ask why? It is because of the right of an employer, under property and management rights, to tell his employees what language they can speak, not to customers but to each other. It just may be that with the language we have and have not put into this charter of rights, plus the section on multiculturalism, we may in fact be able to prohibit that kind of unacceptable action against minority language groups in this country.

If people think that kind of action does not take place in real life in the industrial world, then they know nothing of labour relations, and they know nothing of life on the floor of an industrial plant in many of our far-flung, single resource communities. Actions are taken in those places every day by employers which academics, lawyers and doctors simply would not either appreciate or believe. These actions are accepted because property and management rights are sacred. Very often individual human beings have nothing to go on except the collective strength of their fellows. Often the laws in place in this country make these people powerless. They are only able to act illegally in order to defend the basic human rights which should be granted to every individual throughout this land.

I simply say in conclusion that I and my party are proud to support the resolution before us. Many parts of this resolution have been amongst our party's policies dating back to our predecessor party, the CCF, and to its founding convention in 1933. Certainly the call for a charter of rights in the Constitution was included then. That is one of the reasons we felt honour-bound to accept in principle the proposal before us. We have attempted to take a constructive attitude toward it.

I would finally conclude with a very short piece of prose—perhaps poetry—which I wrote when I was about the age of 17, which I entitled, "My Only Demands". We are talking about rights. Some of us prefer to use other words. It is:

Give me the right and the opportunity to love;
but also, and equally as important, give me the right and the opportunity to challenge and to vanquish all that would destroy that which I do love.

That is why I am here. There are many thousands of Canadians who share similar sentiments. We are proud to take our place in this debate on an historical challenge and an historic occasion for Canada. We only hope the partriation of our Constitution and the divisive role which has been necessitated by the kind of debate which is giving birth to it will perhaps set a new era in place across this country, so that Canada may find itself able to take some of the other, sometimes uncomfortable decisions that must be made if we are not only to patriate our Constitution but to repatriate our economy, and to take some of those crunch decisions necessary if we are to build a better country and fulfil the faith Canadians have on so many occasions shown; a faith not only in this country, but also a faith in those they continue to send to this place.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIR TRANSPORT—DIRECT AIR SERVICE BETWEEN OTTAWA AND NEW YORK

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael) in his place, because he and I know that the subject matter of this debate is an important matter for the national capital region. Indeed, it is important for Ottawa-Carleton, and it is rather important for the country, as well. It has to do with the provision of direct air service between the Ottawa International Airport—I suppose it would come from there—and the City of New York.

On March 13, last, I asked a question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), which reads this way, and this is the gist of the matter:

In view of this development, and it seems to be a new development, would the minister undertake to expedite negotiations with respect to changes that may be needed in the bilateral arrangements between Canada and the United States so that such a service can be provided as is desired by every responsible group in Canada?

The Minister of Transport answered that question in part, indicating to me that his first step was to see if some American airline would like to operate under the present agreement; that is, a single route, New York/Montreal/Ottawa, Ottawa/New York/Montreal. He admitted there was some difficulty in finding an airline, and he went on to say this:

If we do not find an American company willing to use this approach, then we will fall back on the regulatory approach—

In the course of the next question, I expressed incredulity at the remark. I could not believe that to be the case. I said:

—he is looking for an American carrier to provide the service between Ottawa and New York.

I could not believe that. In the answer to the subsequent question, he said:

I am not looking for Americans, but it seems to me that this is the first way to go.

He is really looking for Americans, first of all, to do it. I must ask myself as a member of this House what kind of Canadian policy this is, that a minister of transport in discussing the importance of such a service should look to Americans first? Why is a Canadian minister running around looking for an American airline to perform a service for which two Canadian airlines, First Air and Air Atonabee, are vying or will soon be vying before the Canadian Transport Commission?

The idea of a direct air service from Ottawa to New York has the support of every municipality in the Ottawa-Carleton region, and it has the support of the region. There are two air carriers which have flown test flights to New York. I was privileged to be on one of them. A direct air service has the backing of the business community as it is represented in any configuration one would want. These demonstration flights have proved this service to be a useful concept. For me as a Member of Parliament a service such as this is most advantageous. I was able to visit the Canadian Consulate in New York and I called on the Canadian ambassador to the United Nations when I went to New York. Public servants go back and forth to New York but to get there, it takes three and a half hours via Toronto or Montreal. Time is of the essence to most people.

I have to congratulate the Ottawa Citizen for the public interest that paper displayed in this matter. We have to widen the assessment base in our group of municipalities. If we can do that by promoting new industry in this area, we will not only widen but we will diversify the employment base and bring a new kind of prosperity to the area at a time when government seems to be levelling off from its untrammelled growth.

This service is just as important to the local area as is special education which would supply men and women with training to work in the new industries settling in the western part of the national capital region, particularly in the city of Kanata and the city of Nepean. Local government cannot do it alone; the provincial government cannot do it alone. It requires a kind of commitment from the federal government. It requires the kind of commitment which the Minister of Transport did not demonstrate in his response to my question. The federal government has a role to play. It has to play it with courage, with determination and it has to deal with the United States in as firm a manner as possible.

Air Canada has now stepped aside from its wish to provide this service. I think the time has come for the Minister of Transport to move. No U.S. carrier wants to serve this route, and no Canadian carrier wants to serve this route because their jets are too large for the service required. This route is ideal for a regional airline. It is ideal because of the capacity and willingness regional carriers have shown.

I think the time has come for the minister to speak up for Canada. I think it is time for the minister to speak up for his own constituency. I believe it is time for the minister to speak up on behalf of those governmental, business, professional and other organizations who can see nothing but good in this service. Because there is this interest, I think I have a right to expect that the minister's assistant will say he will move to change the agreement if it is necessary, and he will press upon the people in the United States the importance of allowing Canadians to compete for that right. I hope that will be the answer I shall receive from his parliamentary secretary. I look forward to it tonight with hopeful expectation.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) pointed out in the House on March 13, this issue cannot be answered as though there were no air transport agreement between Canada and the United States. The agreement exists, and it gives the United States certain rights which we have to respect, in the same way as we expect the United States to respect Canada's rights. In particular, the agreement gives a U.S. carrier the right to operate between New York and Ottawa.

On this basis, it is difficult to see why the United States would agree to allow a Canadian carrier to operate this route until it had been shown that no U.S. carrier is interested. Expressed in a different way, the U.S. has first right of refusal to that route.

Recognizing this reality, the minister urged the U.S. authorities to determine as quickly as possible whether there was, in fact, any U.S. carrier interested in serving the route. If not, then there would be a strong presumption that the U.S. would agree to a Canadian carrier being granted the right to operate an Ottawa to New York service. In that case, if the CTC saw fit to licence either First Air or Air Atonabee, that carrier would be free, immediately thereafter, to seek the same authority from the U.S. Civil Aeronautics Board, which it must do before it can begin service.

The approach the minister has been following is the only practical one, given Canada's legal obligations. It certainly promises faster results than any approach, such as the one apparently being suggested by the hon. member which would ignore these obligations.

RAILWAYS—ROLE OF CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, on January 20 last I raised a matter with respect to the Grange commission report which had been delivered to hon. members the day before, January 19. The report was a result of a train accident which took place in the city of Mississauga on November 10, 1979, at 10.15 p.m. wherein a CPR train travelling on the main CPR line through Mississauga at 50 or 60 miles an hour derailed because of a hot box.

The commission to look into that accident was formulated as a result of a unanimous motion in this House on November 12 which was followed up by questions in the transport committee on November 13. On November 13 the Canadian Transport Commission said it would inquire into its own faults. As a result of that hearing before the transport committee, it became apparent that the CTC had been acting as a sleeping policeman.

The CTC had been involved in a similar inquiry in 1971. In that inquiry a number of recommendations were made with respect to safety and the carriage of dangerous goods. Being a sleeping policeman, the CTC went back to sleep and did nothing.

If the Canadian Transport Commission had not gone back to sleep the evacuation of the city of Mississauga would not have occurred. Indeed, the accident probably would not have occurred. As the minister suggested in a response to me, the CTC was very interested in relation to the economic viability in connection with the existing considerations. He said maybe the time had come to change that view of economic considerations.

The accident in Mississauga occurred partly and perhaps largely because the Canadian Transport Commission, which is in charge of rail safety under the Railway Act, was a sleeping policeman. It refused to recognize that chlorine was a dangerous substance, more than just a compressed gas, and refused to recognize the explosive properties of propane. It refused to understand the dangerous properties of caustic soda.

The train which sped through Mississauga at 10.15 p.m. November 10 developed a hot box, another subject of CTC inquiries dating back many years. In particular, the 1971 inquiry was not looked at. When you look at the recommendations of Mr. Justice Grange you will see it says: The CTC or Transport Canada shall; the CTC should require; the CTC should require an immediate trial by railways of the following; the CTC should implement its intention expressed in Glacier, British Columbia. Recommendation after recommendation says the CTC should have done, it should have acquired, it should have performed.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), defender of bureaucracy, defender of ineptitude, sits back and says: Well, these things happen; perhaps it was a question of the times, but refuses to come to grips with the problems of rail safety. All of my constituents, residents of Mississauga, were evacuated, most for an entire seven days, and the CTC was partly, indeed largely, responsible. Had the organization we entrusted in the Railway Act defended rail safety, brought the red book up to snuff, a book containing a set of rules prepared by the American Railway Association back in 1919 and hardly amended since, had they paid attention to the security of people in built-up areas, then perhaps the Mississauga derailment might not have occurred. The Grange Commission points that out seriously. We have not yet had action by this minister even though he had the report from the Grange Commission at least six weeks before it was in the hands of Members of Parliament. The replies I received from the minister on January 20, sir, indicate a Minister of Transport who is not prepared to do his job.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be afforded the opportunity to inform the House of the recent initiatives of the Canadian Transport Commission in the field of rail safety.

I would particularly like to highlight recent CTC activities in five major areas related to the movement of dangerous goods.

First, on November 27, 1979, an order was issued to each railway company under the committee's jurisdiction requiring that tank car shipments be marshalled so that flammable compressed gases are separated from tank car shipments of chlorine, anhydrous ammonia or sulphur dioxide by at least five rail cars containing no dangerous commodities. Second, two years ago, CTC instigated a tank car retrofit program that is still in progress. Equipment to be retrofitted includes double shelf couplers, head shields, bottom fitting protection, and thermal protection, precisely the equipment recommended by Judge Grange in his recent report. Third, the commission has intensified its inspection program for dangerous commodity storage facilities located on railway rights of way. As a direct result of this program, two such storage installations in Alberta have been closed in the last year. Fourth, the CTC has instigated a review of dangerous commodity movements in various sections of the country. Last, the commission has issued a series of regulations affecting the "red book" regulations, life saving devices, the contents of shipping documents, and tank car outage requirements.

The CTC also upgraded its response to rail accidents in three specific ways. First, the railways have been required to instigate a telephone alert system to ensure that all major accidents are immediately reported to the commission. Second, the CTC has appointed a commissioner to investigate major accidents on site, to recommend interim and long-term measures which would enhance safety, and to hold public inquiries when warranted, in the aftermath of accidents. Third, the commission is now purchasing protective clothing and updated hazard-detecting equipment for its staff for use at accident scenes.

Judge Grange restricted his inquiry, according to his mandate, to "the lessons from Mississauga". The Canadian Transport Commission obviously cannot take such a limited view. To respond to the need for greater safety we cannot afford to focus all our attention on Mississauga or any other single accident to the exclusion of other equally important safety factors.

Finally, I should like to address the question of resources available to the commission. A submission is now at Treasury Board seeking an additional 31 person-years in respect of rail safety. I trust that Treasury Board will view this submission favourably so that Canadian Transport Commission rail safety responsibilities may be enhanced to a greater degree.

These points demonstrate that the Canadian Transport Commission is taking its rail safety responsibilities seriously and that the existing programs, combined with the response to the Grange inquiry, will ensure that Canadians continue to have a safe and efficient rail transportation system.

THE ENVIRONMENT—SUGGESTED DISCUSSION OF ACID RAIN PRECIPITATION IN CANADA-UNITED STATES TALKS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, last week I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) what specific proposals he would be making to President Reagan concerning the acid rain crisis while the latter was visiting Ottawa. The Prime Minister responded that the issue would be discussed but that he would not use any threat in order to conclude an agreement on trans-boundary air pollution.

In his remarks the President of the United States alluded only briefly to the acid rain problem, and to this date there have been no specific concrete proposals made by either country as the result of the President's visit. In other words, we will apparently continue to discuss, to debate, to study and to procrastinate while the most critical environmental hazard continues to destroy our lakes and rivers, our crops and our forests.

Acid precipitation is produced in both Canada and the United States, but the United States dumps four times as much SO_2 on Canada as we dump on the United States. In Canada, fairly successful attempts have been made to reduce acid rain in recent years. For example, in the Sudbury basin Inco Metals Limited, the largest single acid rain polluter in North America, has reduced its emissions by 80 per cent in the last ten years. Ontario Hydro has been ordered to reduce its fallout by 50 per cent. Steps are being taken in Alberta to prevent acid rain from becoming an environmental problem.

In the United States, regrettably, the picture is very different. To date there has been no appreciable reduction in acid rain whatsoever. Worse still, with the vast conversion in that country to coal-fired electrical generating plants in the northeast, acid rain will increase substantially in the near future, further damaging Canada's environment, particularly in Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes.

Ontario has already lost or is about to lose 4,000 lakes, and within ten years, we are told by the scientific community, some 45,000 lakes in Ontario will die if nothing is done now. We cannot afford to wait while an anti-environmentalist U.S. President dithers.

We cannot afford to continue to be polite and continue to negotiate as friends and neighbours if those friends are ignorant and complacent and for political reasons their government has committed itself to go easy on environmental issues for purely economic reasons.

We have a fairly good idea of the cost of cleaning up trans-boundary pollution. It is in the billions of dollars. But to wait will cost infinitely more, and if we wait too long no amount of money will repair the damage.

In my remarks to the Prime Minister last week I suggested that if the United States could not be persuaded to conclude a treaty to reduce and eliminate acid rain precipitation, then Canada should threaten to cut off hydroelectric power to that country. This would be a very drastic measure to take, and I admit that, but I am convinced this kind of threat is the only effective way to get action on this political issue. How else does one convince an ignorant and apathetic people and its foot-dragging President to resolve an issue of this magnitude?

The province of Ontario recently launched a legal suit against some 18 power plants in the United States which are converting to coal from oil. This is a long and costly process. What is needed at this time is political action. We already have a memorandum of intent, signed on August 5, 1980. We must proceed to a strong treaty immediately.

There is already overwhelming scientific evidence concerning the critical damage caused by acid rain. There is also well documented evidence as to its sources. We also have the technological know-how to stop it. What we do not have is a Prime Minister with the courage to tell the U.S. that enough is enough. In other words, we do not have a prime minister with the courage to tell President Reagan that his country has to stop killing ours.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first of all let me thank my good friend, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), for allowing this opportunity to have this rather urgent subject aired once again. I believe, as I understand he believes, that a good part of the acid rain issue, both in the United States and in Canada, is the lack of awareness and public profile it commands at present. That is especially true in the United States. I share his concern and I welcome the opportunity to endorse the sentiments he has expressed in so far as those sentiments relate to the depth of his concern. I do not share his sentiments as to the strategies which he has advocated, and I shall take a moment of the time of the House to indicate why I do not share his proposed strategies.

Last week, when the President of the U.S. was here, Mr. Reagan, the Prime Minister, (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) took advantage of the opportunity to state very clearly our concerns here in Canada over acid rain and the need for continued co-operation and progress under the memorandum of intent to which the hon. member for Brant has referred this evening. President Reagan gave his assurance at those meetings last week to the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Environment that his administration will continue to support the activities of the Canada-U.S. work groups which were formed under the annex to the memorandum of intent last August. Indeed, the interim report of these groups was released on February 13, and further reports can be expected in mid-1981 and early 1982. The reports of these work groups will be the foundation for the negotiation which we hope will begin within the next few months, by June of this year it is hoped.

The forecast of increased emissions of sulphur dioxide in the United States, referred to by the hon. member for Brant in an earlier question on this subject, is speculative at this point. It is speculative in the sense that it assumes no control action will be taken by the United States government in respect of existing sources, nor for those thermal power plants which are slated to be converted from oil to coal. I believe it would be counterproductive for us to enter into negotiations with the U.S. on the basis of such an assumption. It would be equally inopportune, I submit, to begin brandishing the threat of sanctions against the United States before the negotiations even begin.

Finally, contrary to what the hon. member has suggested, we have no indication at this time that the U.S. cannot be persuaded to conclude an agreement. Indeed, the indications right now are quite to the contrary. They are pursuing, in good faith, their work jointly with us in the Canada-U.S. work groups.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted and, accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 10.29 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the former B.C. Liberal leader has now firmly and publicly rejected the Liberal government's constitutional proposal when he said, "The current approach to patriation is unilateral partisan confrontation, without any regional consensus and making quite improper use of vestigial colonial ties" and in view of the news report in British Columbia indicating that the Liberal government feels that Dave Barrett's support is more important than Gordon Gibson's, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney):

That the Minister of Justice make a statement on motions indicating whether the Liberal government has now rejected all western Liberal Party leaders and that the Prime Minister indicate in the same way whether or not he values western NDP support more than western Liberal support.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

PROGRAMS APPLICABLE TO NEW BRUNSWICK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Due to the fact that the ministers responsible for the distribution of government funding for programs such as the manufacturing tax incentive program and the Canada community development program refuse to recognize that all citizens of New Brunswick should be equal rather than just those in constituencies represented by Liberals, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That the political minister responsible for New Brunswick, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, intercede with his cabinet colleagues and advise them that New Brunswickers living in ridings represented by Conservatives are in fact not second-class citizens.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO SETTLE DISPUTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of pressing and urgent necessity.

Since the CBC dispute has been dragging on far too long, and since this intolerable situation is due to the management's refusal to make reasonable offers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the federal government take all necessary steps to urge the CBC management to bargain in good faith and be in a position to make serious proposals.

Madam Speaker: Order. The presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ENERGY

NON-IMPLEMENTATION OF ENERGY TAX CREDIT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The Liberal government was elected in February, 1980—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McMillan: —largely on a promise to keep down consumer energy prices. In view of the fact that since then the price of regular and unleaded gasoline in the Atlantic provinces has soared by about 41 cents a gallon, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That this House condemns the government for breaking its major election promise, and in particular for not introducing an energy tax credit to cushion the effects of those increases on low and middle-income Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROVINCIAL EXPENDITURE OF FEDERAL FUNDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Chénier (Timmins-Chapleau): Madam Speaker, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau):

That this House commend the announcement by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who has served notice that the provinces must spend money voted by this Parliament as enacted and urges the government to pursue this policy in its federal-provincial financial negotiations in the next year.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

MARINE TRANSPORT

TWO-PRICE SYSTEM FOR MARINE FUELS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I have a motion of some urgency to move under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It will be of interest to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and, I hope, the whole House generally.

While recognizing the need for the government to prevent foreign flag ships from taking advantage of the low domestic price for fuel in Canada, this policy has, as the minister is aware, singled out DMA members who are registered Canadian companies as the lone segment of Canadian industry required to pay world fuel prices for international trade. This will result in an additional $30 million in costs, encouraging our shippers to use less fuel-efficient modes of transport and having a detrimental impact particularly on the Quebec-Labrador mining industry, as well as forcing grain cargo route diversions.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this House urge the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to introduce a two-price fuel system for Bunker C and diesel fuels which would not violate international agreements relating to marine transportation and would provide equity to the Canadian marine industry.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF BUDGET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The annual report for 1980 of the Bank of Canada indicates that the deficit for the Government of Canada is uncomfortably large. That is one of the reasons offered for the monetary policy followed by the bank not working to control inflation. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That in view of the escalating inflation rate and the fact that the government's fiscal policy is not appropriate for reducing inflation, the government forthwith present to this House a new budget and file in this House new estimates reducing the over-all level of government expense in order to deal realistically with inflation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

RIGHTS OF MEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. As the Tory critic responsible for the status of men, I am appalled by the failure of the Liberal government to ensure that men will be offered equality under the proposed charter of rights. Since women already have the protection of the courts, which have ruled that women are equal persons, and since men have never been awarded similar protection as persons, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That this House instruct the government to amend the proposed charter of rights to state that the provisions of the charter apply equally to women and men and thus ensure that the rights of this important minority group are enshrined in the Canadian Constitution.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement for this motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

COMBINES

SUGGESTED ADVANCE NOTICE OF COMPANY MERGERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. There has been a rapidly increasing number of mergers going on within the Canadian economy. It was in the order of one thousand over the last three years. That is grossly underestimated in terms of the assets and the numbers involved, because the government obtains its information only by clipping files out of the newspapers. This country more and more is beginning to resemble a banana republic in which the economy is concentrated in the hands of a small number of families, such as the Bronfmans, the Irvings, the Westons, and so forth.

I move:

That the minister urge the government to pass regulations requiring any person wishing to proceed with a merger or takeover of a Canadian business to give the government written notice in advance of his intentions in these matters.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

BANK OF CANADA

STATEMENTS IN ANNUAL REPORT RESPECTING GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, but first I will say "top o' the afternoon" to him, or "top o' the gallows"—one or the other—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The annual report of the Bank of Canada for 1980 was made public yesterday. It reviews the experience of the last five years in fighting inflation in Canada and concludes by saying "we have made only limited progress". The report concludes that the lack of success was not due to the fact that the government's anti-inflationary fiscal or financial policies were ill conceived, but rather because they were pursued with gradualism. My question to the minister is this. The bank says it will continue these policies, which will mean high interest rates and tight money over the next five years, presumably with his approval. Likely this will mean that inflation and high interest rates will continue, unless there is a new fiscal approach by the government, because until now the minister's approach has been one of gradualism. Will the minister adopt a new fiscal approach to correspond with the approach of the Bank of Canada and, if so, what will that approach be?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if I understood the comments of the Governor of the Bank of Canada when he spoke about gradualism, he was speaking about the application of monetary policy. What I have laid out in the budget is an approach which will reduce the budget over time, and that is the policy I propose to follow. I would draw to the attention of the hon. member that the governor himself said in his annual report that he was pleased that in the last budget the government recognized the need to reduce its over-all deficit in the years ahead. I find that support from the Governor encouraging. I wish it were equally strong from all sections of the House of Commons.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the governor is certainly an optimist if he is pleased with that pious expression of the minister's. It is the action that counts, not the pious expression of principle.

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR HOME OWNERS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Interest rates are 3 per cent higher than they were in March of last year. The minister made this promise last year:

The federal government will consider special assistance to home owners if interest rates soar under the new floating rate approach.

They have soared; they are over 3 per cent higher. In November of 1979 the finance critic, the minister's colleague, said that the Liberals wanted action to prevent the hardship which the high interest policy was creating for millions of Canadians and their families. In view of the fact that interest rates are over 3 per cent higher, is the minister now going to introduce a policy to help alleviate the hardship which these higher interest rates are creating for millions of Canadians? I am not referring to the old age assistance supplement—we know that was increased. I am referring to the home owner, the potential home owner, and the consumer hurt by these high rates.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I believe the hon. member in his two questions identified the flaw in his approach to this question of inflation. On the one hand he encourages the government to reduce its deficit over time, and in the next question he asks me to bring in a new spending program in order to help a particular group in the community. It is quite impossible for the government to follow restraint in government spending, to control expenditure and to reduce deficit over time, and at the same time to launch new spending programs. There is no magic. The hon. member discovered that when he was minister of finance. That lack of magic is still a fact, even on St. Patrick's Day, when I reciprocate and offer the hon. member "the top o' the night".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: If the minister was so concerned about expenditure restraint, why did he and his colleagues make these promises? Why did he make his promise of March, 1980, that if interest rates rose higher he would offer special assistance to home owners? The home owners of this country are getting tired of this minister's blarney, not just today which is St. Patrick's Day, but every day of the year.

● (1420)

When will the minister carry out his commitments and reduce expenditures elsewhere? There are many other areas in which to make reductions—ministerial salaries, for example. The deputy governor of the bank is not prepared to forecast future rates of inflation, the value of the Canadian dollar, or whither we are headed. Will the minister now give us a forecast? What is the minister's new forecast of the inflation rate this year, of the Canadian dollar this year, and whether or not these policies will be successful? The deputy governor will not even forecast if they are going to be successful. Will the minister do that? Will he let Canadian people in on it? Does he have faith in these policies? What are his forecasts?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, in the budget of last October I attempted the risky business of forecasting.

Mr. Crosbie: You sure did.

Miss MacDonald: And you were all wrong.

Mr. MacEachen: Like my hon. friend in his effort at forecasting, I proved not to be 100 per cent correct.

Mr. Crosbie: You were not correct at all.

Mr. MacEachen: In fact there was a margin of error in the forecasting, because for 1981 I called for an inflation rate of 10.2 per cent. It is obvious, since developments of that time, that the inflation rate will be higher in 1981. We had one year-to-year average a month ago, and the rate was about 12 per cent. So, it is obvious to the hon. member that the inflation rate will be higher than projected in the budget. At the same time I can tell the hon. member that, because of the strong performance of the economy, the unemployment rate is likely to be less in 1981 than was forecast in the budget. These are the two trends I would like to indicate to the hon. member. I do not intend, like the deputy governor of the bank who has a lot of experience in these matters, to make a precise forecast for 1981 at this stage.

CRITICISM OF GOVERNMENT DEFICIT

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I remind the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance that the deputy governor of the bank also said that procrastination will make matters worse.

In his annual report the Governor of the Bank of Canada observed that, besides gradualism, the large deficit run up by the government is a major contributor to the failure of the bank's monetary policies to control inflation. While praising the provincial governments for their restraint, the governor observed the following:

> The Government of Canada, however, has experienced a large and growing over-all deficit—

He went on to say:

> From the point of view of dealing with inflation, this was an uncomfortably large deficit—

Does the minister accept that view of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, and, if so, why is he not doing something about it? Why is he not dramatically and immediately reducing expenditures and the deficit, rather than carrying on this failure of a gradualist approach?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is correct in citing the comment of the Governor of the bank about the deficits which have been in operation over the last few years. As the hon. member pointed out, the Governor went on to say:

> From the point of view of dealing with inflation, this was an uncomfortably large deficit for the Government of Canada to have.

I believe this is the key point—when the level of economic activity relative to the economy's demonstrated capacity was as high as it was then. Looking in retrospect, probably there would be no difficulty in agreeing with that judgment, though at the time the forecasting probably with respect to the rate of economic activity could be as uncertain as we have proved it to be or shown it to be in the last year.

The hon. member referred to that citation. Then he failed to read on when the Governor of the bank went on to congratulate the government by saying he was pleased that in the last budget the government recognized the need to reduce its over-all deficit in the years ahead. That is the policy which is being followed, to reduce the deficit substantially over the next several years.

Miss MacDonald: It is St. Patrick's Day, not April Fool's.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. As the minister may be aware, one of his Liberal predecessors, the Hon. Donald Macdonald, said in his budget of March 31, 1977, "The deficit will be reduced—". His immediate Liberal predecessor, the current Minister of Justice, said in his budget of November 16, 1978, "Significant reductions in the deficit can be expected—"

● (1425)

My question for the minister is very simple. Could he please explain to the House, barring any firm evidence, why we should give his word any more credence than the word of his predecessor was obviously worth, which is absolutely nothing?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member will have to wait and see, and he will have to live long enough, to see that the expenditure plan laid out in the budget will be followed and the deficit reductions proposed in the budget will be followed over the next several years. If he is here three years from now he will be up on St. Patrick's Day probably talking about another subject rather than the deficit.

HEALTH CARE

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO BAN EXTRA BILLING BY DOCTORS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

[English]

In view of the reports which claim, to no one's surprise in the New Democratic Party, that the Canadian public is paying some $56 million extra for health care than they should be, as a result of extra billing, can the minister tell us whether she is now prepared to bring in amendments to the Medical Care Act as recommended by Mr. Justice Hall, to ban extra billing before a bad situation becomes worse and medicare, as we have come to know it, goes down the drain?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am not ready to recommend that course of action to the government at this point in time.

I am pleased to have a chance to state very clearly our position on extra billing. It is no news to Canadians that this government is opposed to any form of extra billing. However, it is a much more difficult thing to reach enough of a consensus between the players to permit them to ban extra billing directly where jurisdiction lies first, which is at the provincial level. If the federal government were to ban extra billing right away, it might easily be challenged in the courts, which would not assist anyone in restoring full integrity to medicare.

I agreed with the provincial ministers to work with them toward a consensus with a view for some of them to be able to ban extra billing without losing their doctors to neighbouring provinces, and then for the federal government eventually to include a ban on extra billing in our renegotiation of EPF.

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF FUNDING FROM CERTAIN PROVINCES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, the minister's passion for consultation and long answers is well known. But it has now been six months since the Hall report was tabled and no action has been taken at all. The federal-provincial health ministers' conference has been postponed. In the meantime Alberta has passed legislation legitimizing extra billing. British Columbia will be heavily into balance billing as of April 1, and Ontario people continue to be ill-informed about who has opted out and who has not.

Some hon. Members: What about Saskatchewan?

Mr. Blaikie: How long will the minister procrastinate while medicare suffocates from the violation of its basic principles? Will the minister consider putting her money where her mouth was in two successive election campaigns and threaten in this House, not in the media, to withdraw funding from delinquent provinces? And will she table the documents which support the $56 million claim?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I regret that the relatively new hon. member to this House was absent during the debate—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Miss Bégin: —in March, 1979, when we started fighting for medicare in this House of Commons. He is very late in his judgment. He has not realized that we are improving medicare and that the terrifying description which he has just given is about one year old right now. In this year we have witnessed one province backtracking completely and cancelling all user fees which it had imposed on its population through a budget. That province was New Brunswick.

We have witnessed a number of doctors in Ontario opting into the medicare system again. We are building a consensus toward a common understanding of all the partners, that no extra billing will be acceptable in this country.

● (1430)

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I may be new here, but the judgment of my colleagues here at the time was right on the mark. We predicted exactly what was going to happen.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blaikie: I am tempted to get up and say, "Thank you, mother", for the lecture.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blaikie: The problem is particularly bad in Ontario. Some 71 per cent of the $56 million that we are talking about was spent in Ontario as a result of extra billing. It is now almost impossible to have an operation in Ontario—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask the question?

Mr. Blaikie: I want to ask the minister, in view of the fact that it is almost impossible to have an operation in Ontario without paying money to some specialist or other, and in view of the fact that premiums continue—

Madam Speaker: Order. That was not a question. I just want to remind the hon. member that when the Chair asks the member to go on with a question, that is exactly what the Chair means. This is not the opportunity for the hon. member to continue with a long preamble. Let us have the question now.

Mr. Blaikie: Will the minister tell us what she intends to do about premiums, about the recommendation in the Hall report that premiums be abolished, or does she still hold to the safe and comfortable view that this is strictly a provincial concern and not a concern of national health care standards?

Miss Bégin: The hon. member started his line of questioning by asking about the most important problem facing medicare today, namely, extra billing. I suggest that we do not discuss the problem of premiums now, but continue to speak of extra billing.

An hon. Member: You can't even handle the first one.

Miss Bégin: The hon. member is probably afraid to face the reality, and still wants a flamboyant answer to a subtle situation. What can the minister of health for Saskatchewan who is faced with, if I remember correctly, over $2 million in extra billing, do to ban extra billing if he loses all his doctors and specialists to the neighbouring province that does not want to ban extra billing? That is the problem.

We are facing a problem where Canada, because of its geographic entities, should act as one, moving toward a common front to save medicare for all Canadians. We are working towards that, and will succeed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

FISHING VESSEL CONSTRUCTION SUBSIDY PROGRAM

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, but in his absence I would direct it to the parliamentary secretary. It concerns fishing vessel subsidies. I have been informed that three 65-foot vessels are being built in Caraquet, New Brunswick, for New Brunswick fishermen, at the approximate cost of $900,000 each. Thirty-five per cent, or $945,000 of the cost of these vessels, is being paid by the federal government through its vessel subsidy program. Can the parliamentary secretary confirm whether or not this is true?

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I am not familiar with those three specific vessels that the hon. member brings to the attention of the House. I will check into it. I presume that vessels up to 65 feet in length are eligible for vessel subsidy, and I presume that there will be nothing wrong in subsidizing three vessels in New Brunswick—

An hon. Member: The fishermen don't get anything—

Mr. Henderson: There will be nothing wrong with subsidizing three vessels in northern New Brunswick, or three vessels in Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, or P.E.I.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Malpeque has the floor.

Mr. Gass: The parliamentary secretary knows that the minister tries to portray himself as the champion of the inshore fishermen.

Some hon. Members: He is!

Mr. Gass: $945,000 would have provided funding for about 80 inshore fishing boats for the small fishermen. It is quite apparent to me that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is more concerned about himself and his own area than he is about the other—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gass: My supplementary question is directed to the same parliamentary secretary. What are the department's plans for the vessel subsidy program for the up and coming year, and specifically, how much money will be provided in the budget for the smaller boats for the inshore fishermen?

Mr. Henderson: The hon. member for Malpeque should have shown the same concern when his government was in power, because there were very few vessel subsidies given out—

An hon. Member: Answer the question, George.

Mr. Henderson: I think about $2 million was in the budget which we inherited last year, and through a number of omnibus bills, and one thing and another, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, who is the champion of the inshore fishermen—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Henderson: —was able to secure more funds for the subsidy program in the last fiscal year.

As I understand it, the minister is reviewing the proposed vessel subsidy program for the coming year, and when that review is complete it will become public information for all members of the House of Commons.

CONSTRUCTION OF VETERINARY COLLEGE IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Since, as he will know, all four Atlantic provinces have agreed to participate in the establishment of an Atlantic regional veterinary college, will the Prime Minister tell the House whether, for its part, the federal government will contribute its share of the capital cost of that important project which is badly needed because of the dire shortage of veterinarians, not only in the Atlantic provinces, but right across Canada as well?

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): As it happened, Madam Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture visited the Atlantic provinces last week. He had a meeting with the Prince Edward Island premier who submitted a project which is now under review, and within a few days the Minister of Agriculture ought to be in a position to make his views known about that study.

[English]

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the acting minister of agriculture in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture. When I asked the Prime Minister whether the government supported the college, he replied that the federal government is ready to support the college if the Atlantic provinces are in agreement with the establishment of the institution.

Now that the four Atlantic provinces have in fact agreed to participate in the establishment of a fourth veterinary college for Canada in the Atlantic region, and in light of the firm commitment we were given by the Prime Minister, will the government honour that commitment and support the college to the tune of something like 50 per cent of the capital cost, an example that was set with the other veterinary colleges across Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Ostiguy: Madam Speaker, I might say to the hon. member opposite that the Government of Canada is prepared to support the construction of a fourth veterinary college, in accordance with the Howell report. Of course, construction has yet to begin simply owing to a misunderstanding among the four Atlantic provinces as to where the college ought to be built.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—INFLOW OF ARMS TO REBEL FORCES—STATEMENT BY UNITED STATES SECRETARY OF STATE

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that U.S. Secretary of State Haig admitted to reporters in Washington on Friday last that the rebel forces in El Salvador were "running out of ammunition," and that he was not as concerned about arms flow via Nicaragua, which he described as having slowed down, can the Prime Minister explain why the Secretary of State for External Affairs, just two days before, bought so completely the argument then being made by Secretary Haig that there was a "massive influx of Cuban and Soviet arms" into El Salvador, creating a "huge imbalance of forces" there?

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think that the explanation is quite obvious. When they met, Mr. Haig, the American Secretary of State, took that opportunity to brief the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the new situation.

• (1440)

[English]

Miss Jewett: There were two day's difference, Madam Speaker. I should like to ask the Prime Minister how he can explain there having been a huge imbalance of forces, presumably on the Soviet side, in El Salvador on a Wednesday, and no imbalance of forces on a Friday? Will he assure the House that he will now raise his voice against the increasing U.S. military build-up in El Salvador, since if there is any imbalance of forces it is on the U.S. side? Or does the Prime Minister intend to have the Secretary of State for External Affairs continue to be the United States administration's favourite mouthpiece?

[Translation]

Mr. Duclos: Madam Speaker, I believe the hon. member is referring to a period of two days. During his visit to Ottawa last week, the American Secretary of State very simply wanted to indicate that in the previous week—

[English]

Miss Jewett: He doesn't give a damn.

[Translation]

Mr. Duclos: Madam Speaker, he very simply wanted to indicate that as far as he knew, arms shipments from Cuba through the Nicaraguan territory had been reduced in the preceding days.

TRANSPORT

AGREEMENT ON HIGHWAY STRENGTHENING PROGRAM

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The agreement between the Atlantic provinces and the federal government with regard to the primary highway strengthening program was terminated in 1980 for Nova Scotia, and will terminate at the end of this month for Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Newfoundland. Has the minister any plans in progress to renegotiate a further agreement to continue the program?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this is very much the subject of study by the committee on economic affairs of the government at this time.

Mr. Corbett: Madam Speaker, as the minister is aware, it is written in the present program that at completion it will be determined whether or not the program is to be continued and whether the federal government will continue to participate. Has the minister conducted an economic viability study and an evaluation of the past program in order to determine future participation and, when it is completed, will the minister table the results in the House?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, my department has analysed the previous use of this program and, generally speaking, has found that the projects that were developed under the program were extremely worthwhile. The provincial departments in the Atlantic provinces have now presented a whole series of new projects, and my department is quite impressed by the quality of these. It is a matter of money, really, and I am finding out if this is available.

PROVINCIAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROGRAM

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Minister of Transport. If the minister renews these highway strengthening agreements with the provinces, will he make sure that the federal money will not be used as an excuse by the provinces not to expend a fair share of the provincial budgets on the highways in those areas?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will be speaking in the debate this afternoon on this particular subject. The recent studies which have come from the Atlantic provinces, for example from both Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, indicate that the priority given to transportation has been going down. In other words, when they look for industrial development, for example, it is considered now, in the studies that I am referring to, that transportation is not a major issue.

An hon. Member: Why don't you twin it, like the Prime Minister says?

SHIPPING

PROVISION OF SAFETY TRAINING COURSES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I, too, wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Some facts have been revealed about the training, or lack of training, by the recent inquiry into the sinking of the scallop dragger Margaret Jane, with the loss of four men when it was involved in a collision with the stern troller Cape Beaver, a few miles outside Lunenburg, Nova Scotia. I should like to ask the minister what steps he is planning to take to ensure that proper training is provided to the captains and crews in the use of navigational aids such as radar, mandatory safety drills on board ship during a voyage, as well as ensuring that in future there will be an adequate compliance by masters and mates with the basic rules of the sea?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I must admit that I have not seen the result of that inquiry. Usually when such an inquiry is conducted, there are a number of recommendations by the judge or whoever is in charge of it. I will see what the recommendations were, and I am sure that my department will want to comply with them.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Speaker, it would appear that I am ahead of the minister, because his department has already provided me with the results of that inquiry. I want to thank the minister for sending me the report because it was very helpful.

With Loran C coming into general use this year, will special stress be placed on training masters and mates of our offshore, mid-water and inshore fleet in its technical fine points? This is something that could be done during refit periods. Will steps be taken to upgrade the requirements for a master's certificate, and will the safety equipment on board ship be inspected more frequently by officials than once a year?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I am convinced that the hon. member is deeply interested in these matters, and so am I. Unfortunately I do not have this information at my fingertips. I shall ask for the report from my department and will communicate it to him in the spirit of generosity and friendliness in which I always communicate with the hon. member.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PORTS

WITHDRAWAL OF DART CONTAINERLINE SERVICES FROM HALIFAX—STUDY OF FREIGHT RATE STRUCTURES

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I must say that I appreciate that the handclapping is in honour of my patron saint who was named after me, rather than the other way around. In that spirit of generosity, recognizing that there are leprechauns around the world, and perhaps even between the treasury benches and the opposition benches, perhaps I may be able to get the Prime Minister's ear, since he is paying some respect to the patron saint of Ireland.

In view of the controversy over the unilateral move of the Dart Containerline facility from Halifax to Montreal, and the involvement of the CN, a Crown corporation in that move, and in order to amplify what I understood the Minister of Transport to say outside the House, would the Prime Minister direct the Canadian Transport Commission to commence a study now into the imbalance in freight rate structures that, in effect, aggravate this type of situation, so that Atlantic Canada may know that it is being treated fairly, certainly as between the ports of Halifax, Saint John, and other ports in Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will be discussing this very issue this afternoon because there is a motion before the House on that subject put down by the opposition. The Premier of Nova Scotia has three opportunities to bring this subject forward in the coming months. First, he can ask for an inquiry by the Canadian Transport Commission under section 23 of the act; second, he can participate in an inquiry which is bound to take place on the acquisition by CP ships of part of the Dart company, under section 27 of the act, and third, should CN decide to increase its share ownership of Dart in coming months, CN will have to go to CTC under section 27 also. So there are two and possibly three opportunities for the Premier of Nova Scotia or his government to bring the subject of freight rates to the attention of Canada.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, I appreciate, in part, the answer of the minister, since the Prime Minister did not answer a general policy question. That is fine as far as the Premier of Nova Scotia is concerned. But my question is directed to the government and to the minister. Regardless of what avenue the Premier of Nova Scotia takes in this very controversial matter, will the minister lend the weight of his good offices or those of the government, to commencing a study? Will the minister ensure that the appropriate authorities within the scope of the national government have input into that study so that in terms of regulation and policy there is no discrimination as a result of this very unfortunate situation?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, other hon. members, including the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, have raised this question before. The hon. member wants us to make sure that justice is not only done but appears to be done, and that there is no discrimination against the port of Halifax in matters of freight or general charges. I will be dealing with this question in my speech this afternoon. I promised the premier of Nova Scotia that I would give him a number of statistics and other information, the purpose of which would be to establish a non-discriminatory system of freight rates and port charges.

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM—QUERY RESPECTING CRITERIA AND FUTURE PLANNING

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in his capacity as minister responsible for the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Agency, and it relates to the herd maintenance program. Given that the minister has been approached by the appeal board and a number of farmers with appeals, as well as some rural organizations and provincial governments, regarding the herd maintenance program, can he give some indication of the improvements to the program that PFRA is prepared to consider and undertake, to do something about the 12,000 appeal applicants? Will he ensure that they will receive some compensation for the huge feed bills to which they have committed themselves, and for which compensation has been rejected?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is referring to the criteria of the herd maintenance assistance program. I would first point out that the herd maintenance program has been a tremendous success.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. De Bané: We were attempting to help the farmers keep their herds, and we managed in that regard. Over 80 per cent of all applicants will be paid.

Mr. McKnight: When?

Mr. De Bané: Between now and the end of March, within two weeks. Second, the criteria were set after extensive consultation with producer associations. I listened very attentively to all sides before deciding on the criteria. Therefore, I would ask the hon. member not to misrepresent the figures, as did an hon. member the other day when he wanted an emergency discussion under Standing Order 43 with regard to those who were asked to return their cheques. Not more than six people out of more than 20,000 who received cheques were asked to return them because there had been a mistake. Therefore, please do not overplay this matter.

Mr. Hovdebo: The program is very successful for those farmers who have received payment. However, the 12,000 who have not received payment think otherwise. Some of them live right across the road from persons who have received payment.

Madam Speaker: Order. We would rather have a question than an enumeration of all those who did not receive their money.

Mr. Hovdebo: Will the minister give us a specific undertaking that those 12,000 people will be considered and that the criteria, which to some extent are based on rainfall and crops, will be eliminated? Further, since the messy administration of this program is a result of the inability of the agency to handle it, will some preparation be made for next year in case the same kind of situation develops?

Mr. De Bané: With regard to the last part of the question, Madam Speaker, I have already instructed my officials to make preparations in case there is another crisis. With regard to the first part of the hon. member's question, that we discard the precipitation criteria, I fail to see the logic in that request when we have been dealing with a drought situation. In order to put everything into perspective, let us not forget one thing. The federal government has opted to alleviate this crisis with four different programs totalling $67 million. The government of Saskatchewan has adopted programs totalling less than $600,000.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

MODERNIZATION OF COMMUTER TRAINS IN MONTREAL—INQUIRY WHETHER PRELIMINARY AGREEMENT SIGNED WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Verchères): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Last September 12, the minister agreed with his Quebec counterpart to share financially in the upgrading of commuter trains in the Montreal area. Can the Minister of Transport tell us, first of all, whether the memorandum of agreement has indeed been signed, and second, whether the federal share of $80 million is conditional upon the three lines being updated?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the federal contribution of $80 million is indeed conditional upon the three lines involved being upgraded. As for the agreement itself, it is now in the hands of the provincial transport minister, and there does not seem to be any reason for delaying the signing of this agreement by both of us.

TWO-PRICE SYSTEM FOR MARINE FUELS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on a subject in which the Minister of Transport and others in this chamber are very interested. It has to do with the government's imposition of a bunker and diesel fuel surcharge with regard to Canadian shipping. Is the minister in a position to respond to the very urgent request of the Dominion Marine Association, which represents about 95 per cent of the Canadian merchant marine, to exempt Canadian registered ships from the world price principle, whatever percentage that might happen to be? Is the minister in a position to respond to that request and give some indication to the Canadian shipping community that those charges will not apply to Canadian owned and crewed Canadian registered ships operating in Canadian waters in the export trade?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that question is very much before the Department of Finance at the present time. I am having consultations with various ministers, including the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, I am pleased that the matter is now before the Minister of Finance. Can we ascertain from the minister whether the imposition of this surcharge on Canadian registered ships engaged in domestic and foreign trade was a mistake, and the government is now attempting to devise a two-price formula which will exempt Canadian ships from this onerous charge and put them on an equal footing with other modes of transportation, such as highway trucking?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the decision to impose this charge or to take this particular action was not a mistake. It was not done without careful consideration. However, representations are being made by interested parties and it may be that new facts or considerations will bear upon the subject. That is what we are trying to do at the present time.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ELZINGA—S.O. 43 MOTION OF MR. SCHRODER

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, this is a follow-up to the matter I raised with you last week in regard to a Standing Order 43 which two members opposite raised in the House of Commons on March 10. The reason I rise on a question of privilege in this regard is that I believe the implication of this Standing Order 43 reflects upon my role and effectiveness as a Member of Parliament representing my home province of Alberta. The motion attempts to muzzle a free, democratic and responsible press from reporting the reality of what is happening in Alberta.

The stupidity of this motion is what I object to because the newspapers of my region are not stirring up dissension; rather, they are simply reporting the dissension that exists in western Canada. If the members opposite are ignorant of that dissension, I suggest they resign from office because they are not fulfilling their mandate of representing all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Elzinga: Madam Speaker, this dissension is a result of the constitutional and energy proposals brought forward—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Madam Speaker: I do have to interrupt the hon. member. From the notice he gave me I was not quite sure that he had a question of privilege. I warned the hon. member of the reasons why I thought so. He is not now developing any new arguments and is really entering into debate on a motion on which the House has passed judgment. If he had wanted to debate the Standing Order 43 motion, it was possible for him to do so then.

Now, I know he was not in the House on that day but there is a saying:

[Translation]

—to the effect that the absent are always in the wrong.

[English]

Quite possibly the hon. member is not to blame because he was probably attending other important duties elsewhere in connection with his role as a Member of Parliament, but when these motions are put to the House, the rules do provide for debate at certain times. Therefore, I must apply those rules. The hon. member had an opportunity to debate the motion at that time, but unfortunately he was not here. He should use some other way of bringing this matter, which obviously concerns him very much, before the House, but not by means of a question of privilege.

[Text]

DEPARTMENTAL POSTAL SERVICE RATES

Question No. 1,873—Mr. Herbert:

Has the office of the Secretary of State or the department determined that other departments shall have access to postal services at rates less than those applicable to the public sector and, if so, which departments are affected and what was the estimated cost of this subsidy in each of the past three years?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the reply to the above question is as follows: the only program of reduced postal rates involving the Secretary of State is that covered by the memorandum of understanding with the Postmaster General, which has now been transferred to the Minister of Communications. The major categories of mail included are second-class publications and third-class publishers' books. Federal government departments receive no special privileges which are not offered to the public sector under the same terms and conditions in any of these reduced rate categories.

INCARCERATION UNDER LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR WARRANTS—BY PROVINCE

Question No. 2,010—Mr. Young:

1. In the province of Newfoundland, how many persons are presently incarcerated under Lieutenant Governor warrants and, in each case (a) what is the age of the person (b) for how long has he/she been incarcerated (c) for what offence?

2. How many of the total being held are mentally disabled?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): There are no federal penitentiaries located in the province of Newfoundland. If the hon. member wishes to obtain information about persons incarcerated under Lieutenant Governor warrants in provincial prisons, he should communicate with the attorney general of that province.

Question No. 2,011—Mr. Young:

1. In the province of Prince Edward Island, how many persons are presently incarcerated under Lieutenant Governor warrants and, in each case (a) what is the age of the person (b) for how long has he/she been incarcerated (c) for what offence?

2. How many of the total being held are mentally disabled?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): There are no federal penitentiaries located in the province of Prince Edward Island. If the hon. member wishes to obtain information about persons incarcerated under Lieutenant Governor warrants in provincial prisons, he should communicate with the attorney general of that province.

Question No. 2,012—Mr. Young:

1. In the province of New Brunswick, how many persons are presently incarcerated under Lieutenant Governor warrants and, in each case (a) what is the age of the person (b) for how long has he/she been incarcerated (c) for what offence?

2. How many of the total being held are mentally disabled?

Hon. BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED GOVERNMENT FAILURE TO DEAL ADEQUATELY WITH NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION PROBLEMS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East) moved:

That this House condemns the failure of the government to deal adequately with national transportation problems, and specifically condemns the Minister of Transport for:

1. abandoning the use of transportation as a tool of national and regional economic development;

2. allowing Canadian National Railways to totally disregard legitimate maritime business needs and close CN Express offices without adequate financial justification;

3. permitting CN Marine to impose excessive increases in ferry rates for 1981 after showing an $8 million profit last year;

4. failing to ensure an adequate supply of reefer cars or to recognize the growing requirement for farm door "piggy back" trailer service, particularly in Prince Edward Island;

5. failing to initiate changes designed to speed up the "appeal" system under the CTC regulatory process, causing substantial dollar losses to Atlantic transportation users;

6. allowing a serious deterioration in freight rate structures, leading to a loss of the traditional parity between river and coastal ports;

7. failing to bring before the House acceptable legislation dealing with a new national transportation act, ports policy, the Maritime Code, or coastal shipping;

8. permitting unconscionable delays in providing a new air terminal in Charlottetown; and

9. allowing undue delays in the construction of the St. John's syncro-lift facility.

He said: Madam Speaker, part of the purpose of my motion today is to try to bring to the attention of government supporters opposite some of the very pressing and historic problems that Atlantic Canadians face in the area of general transportation. Earlier this afternoon the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) indicated to the House that as time goes by transportation is becoming less and less important to people in Atlantic Canada. Well, obviously the minister was speaking on the advice of others, not from any personal knowledge, or he would never have made that comment, particularly in the context in which he made it.

For over 115 years the central government has caused problems in this area, to the serious economic, social and cultural disadvantage of the people of Atlantic Canada. The suggestion that everything is fine there with respect to transportation, that it is going along great and that we do not consider it a problem, is utter nonsense and should be rejected out of hand.

My motion, Mr. Speaker, ranges from freight rate structures to the fiasco involving the syncro-lift facility in the port of St. John's. We have seen the abandonment by CN of the rail line along Nova Scotia's eastern shore at a point in time when that province had just started construction of an industrial park based on the presence of that rail line. We have witnessed inexplicable delays in the construction of a new air terminal at Charlottetown, in the works for five years. We learned today it is another two to three years down the road. It was promised five years ago! We are now looking at a seven-year fiasco.

There has been continued procrastination by this government with respect to the gradual redevelopment of the Canadian deep sea fleet. There has been a thoughtless approach in implementing fuel surcharges. I just raised this subject with hon. members on the treasury benches. Surcharges on shipping fuel lump foreign and Canadian ships into one discriminatory basket. There are a dozen and one other very clear examples which we will attempt this afternoon to bring forcibly to the minister's attention. There continue to be marine transportation and general transportation problems for us in Atlantic Canada.

The motion cites nine basic reasons. We talk firstly about abandoning the use of transportation as a deliberate tool of national and regional economic development. For years Treasury Board officials and former ministers of transport right up to the last minister of transport committed themselves to the deliberate use of transport as a tool of development, but government, if for no other reason than the three or four examples I cited just a moment ago, has in fact not used transport as a tool of development.

There are contradictions. The left hand does not know what the right hand is doing. Facilities have been built; federal assistance has been sought; there has been some degree of approval; but then the Ministry of Transport allows Canadian National to tear up lines intended to service the industrial sector. We are not deliberately using transport as a tool, when it could be the most useful tool we have available to us.

We have allowed Canadian National Railways to disregard totally legitimate maritime business needs. CN Express offices have been closed without adequate financial justification. The Standing Committee on Transport dealt with this issue some weeks ago. Just a number of days ago the report of the Standing Committee on Transport was concurred in by the House of Commons. That report called on the minister to use his offices to direct Canadian National to maintain express service at the 1979 level. We hope that during the course of the debate this afternoon the Minister of Transport or others on his side of the House who speak will be pleased to indicate to us just how the minister intends to react to that direct request of this House. Will he accede to the wishes of the House, or will he ignore them? We will be interested in hearing about that later on.

With respect to CN Marine ferry rates, we understand there is a proposition before the government which would reorder the terms of reference within which CN Marine and the regulatory agencies arrive at formulae for increasing rates. This will be dealt with in greater depth by one of my colleagues later on. However, we wonder what the minister will have to say about putting in place new terms of reference and setting new directions with respect to CN Marine ferry rates. That august agency made for itself $8 million or $10 million profit last year.

In our motion we have touched on the historic numeric inadequacies of reefer cars for potato producers in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. In the 15 or 16 years I have been in this House I have not once gone through a year in which western grain producers were not howling about boxcars and hopper cars. Over that same period Atlantic potato producers and other horticultural producers experienced the same desperate need for reefer cars and other means to get their produce to market. This is what we are concerned about. The problem is chronic, and it is real. The minister suggests that it is other than that, but that merely indicates to the people of Atlantic Canada that he has not bothered to take a close look at this himself.

Some years ago there was a movement on the part of the government to examine closely the Canadian Transport Commission, which regulates transportation. Out of that came some thoughts about breaking down the CTC and establishing in western Canada a regional office which would give western producers and western transportation people geographically and psychologically closer access to their regulatory agency, the CTC. When the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) became minister of transport, he picked that idea up and carried the ball. There now is in operation in western Canada a branch office, so to speak, of the CTC.

Aside from the generally beneficial effect of decentralization in these matters, the purpose of the CTC is to reflect realities and respond more adequately to the needs of Canada's regions. Westerners no longer have to deal with Ottawa either in terms of geography or the psychology which comes about with respect to distance every time they need new licences, renewals or rulings or every time they wish to state grievances regarding rulings. But lo and behold, not only do we in Atlantic Canada not yet have this facility; there is no indication we will ever get it. That is again another prime example of ignoring the legitimate needs of eastern Canadians.

There should be established in eastern Canada an office of that regulatory agency which is accessible to eastern users of transport and those directly involved in transportation as an industry. The delay is inexcusable. Eastern Canada should be treated at least on an equal basis. There should also be the recognition that, like Ontarians and Quebecers, we too are Canadians.

We have taken a run at the minister for something which is historical and runs a little deeper than some of us in Atlantic Canada care to see continue happening. It is manifested by the apparent deterioration in the competitive position of eastern producers as a result of inadequate control and monitoring of freight rate structures. There is developing in eastern Canada a growing sense of mistrust of Canadian National Railways. CN is our lifeblood. God knows that except for the port of Saint John all of us are captive to the CN. We know what the CN has done in recent years in relation to general freight rate structures. We know its attitude with respect to the closing of its express offices. We know about its involvement in CAST, which is the most damnable involvement any minister of transport could permit of a Crown agency. Crown agencies must act in contemplation of good business practices and in contemplation of profit.

Mr. Pepin: That was done in 1975.

Mr. Forrestall: However, that should not lead to a growing appearance of conflict of interest which Canadian National is beginning to enjoy now in the eyes of Atlantic Canadians. There may not be conflict of interest today, nor was there four or five years ago when the minister's predecessor once removed allowed Canadian National to involve itself in CAST steamships, but that potential conflict of interest is rearing its ugly head in the port of Halifax today. I suggest to the minister that he is not so naive as not to know that there is some grain of truth in what I am saying and some reason for me and others on the east coast to worry. At some point in the not too distant future, that conflict of interest could result in a disastrous rate war between shipping lines servicing the ports of Halifax, Nova Scotia, and Saint John, New Brunswick, and shipping lines servicing ports from Quebec City to Montreal. We condemn the minister for having allowed this to happen.

The former minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville, did much in his short time in office to correct and stem this disastrous trend. In the past, the minister has not seen fit to pick up and carry on where his predecessor left off. They were good programs, the programs I mentioned. I say to the minister: give us an eastern office of the Canadian Transport Commission. It was a good idea, and let him not reject it just because it came from this side of the chamber. If it is a good idea, let him use it. We welcome the positive and beneficial initiatives of the Minister of Transport and his colleagues on the treasury benches.

I will give an example of that, Mr. Speaker. A prime example is the Ocean Industries agreement which has been ready for signature for over a year. Where is it now? It is not in the office of the responsible minister, not in the Treasury Board nor in cabinet. It sits on the desk of the political minister for Nova Scotia, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen). And why will he not approve it? He will not approve it because the minister of industry and development in the province of Nova Scotia said to a reporter one day: "The details of the agreement are included, and we have agreement". That was months and months ago. The Deputy Prime Minister said to himself: "I will teach that whipper-snapper a lesson; you people in Nova Scotia will not get your Ocean Industries agreement until I am ready to approve it". I wish that distinguished Cape Bretoner were in the House because I would like to say to his face that we do not appreciate that. That is just an example, and I will not dwell on it any further.

How have all these things happened? We could go on and on about this if the minister would listen this afternoon. Probably it has happened because the present National Transportation Act in this country is 14 years old. It reflects the thinking of 15, 16, 18 years ago. In the early 1960s we were drafting the act which ostensibly governs the development of transportation policies in this country. The transportation policy dreamt up and prepared in the early 1960s does not adequately meet the demands of that sector in the 1980s; it is long past due.

When will the minister and the government address themselves to the problems of putting a clear statement of philosophy and principle in front of the Canadian people from which can flow the essential transportation policy and legislation which is required to sort out the mess in transportation, not only in eastern Canada but in Canada generally? I think probably that is at the root: we have no philosophy to which we can attune a port policy or a coastal shipping policy. We have no standard against which we can measure the desirability of the gradual development of a Canadian deep sea fleet, although failure to do so is costing us about $4 billion annually. We have no statement from this government, nor have we had a statement from any government for some 12 or 14 years now, on what the essence of transport and transport legislation is and should be in this country. In front of us we have 15 or 20 carts, but we do not have a horse to push them—the old one is 12 or 14 years now and he was put out to pasture two or three ministers of transport ago.

Nobody, apart from the former minister of transport, has given any public indication of the desirability and necessity of bringing forward a new National Transportation Act. We need a new act. We need a new ports policy, and we need to complete the five books of the Maritime Code. We have to resolve the coastal shipping program. We have to resolve the fuel surcharge problem or we will drive users of water-borne vehicles, the most efficient mode of transport, to using less efficient modes of transport which do not have to pay the surcharge, which is discriminatory in itself.

I referred to the air terminal at Charlottetown. It was somewhat alarming for us to learn earlier today that a study, which we thought had been completed in the minister's department some months ago, is just now at the point where yet a further study can be undertaken with respect to the provision of new air terminal facilities at Charlottetown. We learned quite by accident earlier today—although probably it had been known—that in place of a new air terminal they are going to add 15 feet on to the luggage handling section of the airport at Charlottetown right on the eve of the 1981 tourist season in that province. It is mind boggling!

The purpose of today's debate is to draw to the attention of the minister and his parliamentary secretary—both of whom we are very pleased to see in the chamber—as well as the other members of the Standing Committee on Transport, selected topics, by no means all-inclusive, and examples of the concerns of transportation users in Atlantic Canada.

I have not even touched upon rail passenger service, the difficulties at the Halifax International Airport or the continuing difficulties with air connections in and out of Fredericton, New Brunswick. I have not talked about the regional air carrier policy or the need for much closer, effective working arrangements between Air Canada and the regional air carrier. The list is somewhat exhaustive.

Over the course of the next two or three hours, the House will hear from my colleagues from St. John's West, Malpeque, Carleton-Charlotte, Hillsborough and Annapolis Valley-Hants about these and other problems which confront the people of Atlantic Canada.

I close by reiterating my concern that some ministerial adviser got to the Minister of Transport and said to him: "Do not worry about transport in Atlantic Canada; our best advice to you is that they no longer consider it important". As long as this government is in office, I do not ever expect to know one Atlantic Canadian who will not, at the drop of a hat, give me 101 reasons why the government should resign or 1,001 reasons why the Minister of Transport should resign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate. Transportation in Canada needs much more attention than it has been receiving. At the outset I want to say that we have carefully read the motion of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) on behalf of the official opposition and we agree with the motion proposed by the hon. member.

His motion starts off by condemning the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) for abandoning the use of transportation as a tool of national and regional economic development. We agree that a national transportation policy should be used as an active instrument to encourage regional growth, but successive federal governments have not done this. Instead, they have treated transportation in isolation.

Prior to confederation, Atlantic Canada had a prosperous trade up and down the east coast of the United States. When it was decided to develop Canada as a country independent of the United States, confederation encouraged east-west trade by building the Intercolonial railway. Thus, the deal was a national policy of relatively low-cost east-west transportation to the maritimes and protection of central Canadian industry. Now the problem is that Atlantic Canada is not provided with low-cost, efficient east-west transportation. This situation must be changed if our country is to grow stronger, particularly in Atlantic Canada. Poor east-west transportation will continue to balkanize our regions and encourage them to do more north-south trade because transportation costs may be cheaper or more convenient.

The second paragraph of the motion condemns the minister for allowing CN Express to pull out of Atlantic Canada as well as other parts of the country. I thank the members of the Standing Committee on Transport from both the other parties for supporting my motion to which the House unanimously agreed last week. How can the minister and his government accept a motion which asks the government to consider doing a certain thing regarding CN Express and not take some action on it? He cannot use the excuse that CN must make these corporate decisions independently. I could recite a motion which was accepted in the House in 1970 or 1971 on CN pensions which CN chose to ignore. The minister of that day got in touch with CN and let them know that they had darned well better do it. He can do the same thing now.

Point three condemns the minister for allowing CN Marine to impose ferry rate increases. We believe that the national government, in concert with the provinces, should treat our ferries and coastal services as an integral part of our rail and highway systems. There should be nominal tolls and, in some instances, there should be no tolls. Certainly there should be no increases. They should be funded as our highway systems are funded. At least 21 new vessels should be built for ferry and coastal services for Atlantic Canada alone.

The fourth point condemns the record on potato movement. Since 1968 the transport committee was in Atlantic Canada three times, and the same problem was presented on every occasion; there is nothing new about it. It is not only the supply of reefer cars for potato movement; the railroads have never provided sufficient accommodation to handle the traffic in almost every commodity for shipment out of Atlantic Canada, western Canada and some parts of central Canada, as is required under Section 262 of the Railway Act. There is a shortage of stock cars, cars to move fruit and vegetables, cars to move potatoes, cars to move grain and so on.

The fifth point condemns the slow appeal system of the CTC. We agree that the Railway Act and the National Transportation Act should be amended to protect shippers and to speed up the process.

Point six condemns the freight rate structures. A railway consultant recently said that CN rates on containers are double the cost of providing service. In fact, the consultant said that CN could cut its rate on containers from Halifax to Montreal by half and still make a profit. Those high costs hurt maritime ports.

The entire matter of rates has been a chronic problem in Atlantic Canada as well as western Canada. There are still anomalies which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and previous ministers of transport agreed should be corrected. For example, in 1977 it cost 2.8 cents per tonne mile to haul fish 800 miles from central Canada to Atlantic Canada, but it cost nearly double that amount, or 5.29 cents per tonne mile to haul fish from Atlantic Canada to central Canada. There are problems with the steel industry in Cape Breton. In 1979 it cost 71 cents per hundred pounds to ship steel billets 375 miles from Hamilton to montreal, but it cost $2.84 to ship a hundred pounds of steel billets 354 miles from Sydney to Moncton. Nothing has been done about those rate anomalies, to put it mildly.

The seventh point condemns the minister for his failure to bring in amendments to the National Transportation Act, the Maritime Code or bring in a policy on coastal shipping. The National Transportation Act should be amended to give regional development priority over profits. The shipping legislation needs to be updated. The hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) will deal with that later. The Minister of Transport has implemented a new ports policy without consulting Parliament. He approved Treasury Board action which forgave interest payments on $300 million of National Harbours Board debt but opposed the marching orders from Ottawa that all NHB ports are on their own and must be profitable.

I was glad to see the change of heart by the official opposition. On September 26, 1979, the then minister of transport had his National Harbours Board chairman telex every port commissioner in Canada asking for a business plan which would make each port self-financing within three years. The telex read:

Would you please review all of your port's tariffs and submit a plan for proposed increases up to 1982, which will result in revenues equal to or greater than—

He was referring to the cost of operating the ports. I am glad that there has been a change of heart since in Halifax there has been, for example, a 400 per cent increase in rental fees per square foot used for containers. No wonder containers go to Montreal instead of Halifax. It is the principle of user-pay; the port must break even or make a profit.

The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East mentioned the delay in building a new air terminal at Charlottetown. I want to tell him that we fully agree and sympathize with him over that delay. But he should take a look at what has been happening in Regina—or, rather, what has not been happening in Regina. Five years ago the deputy minister of air administration told me in the transport committee that the construction of an air terminal in Regina would be completed within three years. That was five years ago and it has not even been started yet. In fact, plans are being drawn again and the time-frame for completion is now 1985 or 1986. We outgrew our airport terminal about eight or ten years ago. So, the situation is not just peculiar to Charlottetown. I submit that places like Regina, St. John's and Moncton are in a similar category.

There has been no action on the synchrolift facility at St. John's. The construction of that facility would add 150 jobs to that shipyard and would increase its capacity.

Mr. Crosbie: Two hundred jobs.

Mr. Benjamin: The hon. member says 200 jobs, which is all the better. The capacity of every shipyard in Canada should be increased. Government should adopt a policy to create a Canadian merchant marine and encourage Canadian shipbuilding.

The motion presented by the official opposition today, Mr. Speaker, is one that we can support. We want to add three more points to it which we believe will be acceptable to my colleagues to my right and, hopefully, to the government.

I suppose that the motion is somewhat hard on the present minister. At the moment I am not about to ask him for his resignation, although if he will clean up his act and implement a large number of measures which members from parties on this side of the House have been suggesting and urging these many years, he would not have to suffer the slings and arrows of opposition motions and questions.

The three items which we think should be added to the motion are as follows. We think the government should be persuaded or should agree to give up profit and user-pay priority over service to shippers and the travelling public in Atlantic Canada—for that matter, in all of Canada. Because of our climate and geography it is inevitable that all Canadians must equitably share the costs of transportation. That is particularly important for development in the Atlantic region, as well as in the west and the north. Confederation was not built on user-pay, and our climate and geography has not changed since then.

User-pay goes back to the MacPherson royal commission of 1961, which treated the concept of transport for development purposes as outdated. Some 20 years later every day in all regions of Canada we see how outdated the recommendation of the MacPherson report is. If we were to follow that policy through to its logical conclusion, it might also be possible to shrink Canada from 4,000 miles to 400 miles. It might also be possible to level the Rocky Mountains. That policy of user-pay and profitability taking priority over the provision of adequate transportation services to all regions of this country is doomed to fail. If it does succeed it is doomed to do irrevocable harm to our unity, more so than even the present debate on the Constitution.

I do not believe that it was appropriate for the previous Conservative government to send a directive calling for increases in port fees because that was simply carrying on at all costs the policy of user-pay profit which had been introduced by the previous Liberal government under a former minister of transport whom the voters finally caught up with.

The government should develop an industrial strategy providing Atlantic Canadian employment in building a modern and updated transportation system. There should be public investment to upgrade railways right across Canada. Rail steel is produced at Sydney, Nova Scotia and freight cars are produced at Trenton, Nova Scotia. I am happy to say that Saskatchewan, other provinces and the federal government bought many of the hopper cars from Trenton. But what about reefer cars for the movement of potatoes? The Newfoundland railway should be converted to standard gauge and curves should be straightened. This alone would consume enough steel to keep production at Sydney going for at least six months.

We need 21 vessels for CN Marine coastal and ferry services. We need a policy to create a merchant marine, support the Canadian shipbuilding industry and use short take-off and landing aircraft to serve coastal and northern communities. We do not need an elitist STOL service to handle business executives, MPs and deputy ministers between Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa; they can take the train.

We need public investment in urban transit in all cities in Atlantic Canada. We need multimodal stations to reduce terminal costs so that buses, railways and airlines can combine their operations, thus reducing costs to the travelling public. We need a more modernized VIA Rail service. This requires a higher priority from the national government.

Before I run out of time, Mr. Speaker, I would like to move an amendment to the main motion and continue my remarks for as long as you and the members of the House are prepared to allow me. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River:

> That the motion be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a semi-colon, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:
> "10. putting profits and user-pay ahead of service to Atlantic Canada;
> 11. failing to develop an industrial strategy to create employment in Atlantic Canada by building a modern transportation system; and
> 12. failing to modernize rail passenger service in Atlantic Canada."

I believe that my amendment is relevant to, and a suitable addition to, the main motion proposed by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East. I hope it is acceptable not only to him and his colleagues, but also to the minister.

In the building of an industrial strategy or in the building of a strong economy, to use the words of some government cabinet ministers, transportation is an essential foundation to the success of an industrial strategy, a growing economy and full employment. Unless we can move goods and people fairly as well as efficiently, then any economic plans, private, public or governmental, cannot succeed. We should also have a policy in place which quits discriminating against people and their goods in this country because of where they happen to live or are located.

The Minister of Transport could set an example and lead the way in co-operating with the provinces and the territories for a system of equalized and/or subsidized transportation costs, freight rates and fares. When it costs $2 or $3 for a quart of milk in the Arctic but only 75 cents or $1 down south, surely that is discrimination. It is strange how provinces can equalize the price of liquor—I have been known to take the odd drink. Provinces can equalize the price of liquor from one end of the province to the other but they cannot do it with milk, fresh fruit and vegetables, propane and heating oils, flour and sugar, all of which are essential goods. This could be done for people on the Atlantic coast, the Pacific coast and those in northern Canada. As long as this government, or any government, adheres to the principles and theories of the 1890s when it considers transportation matters, we will fail to do the kind of job we could be doing.

Atlantic Canada needs a rebuilding of its transportation system. It needs electrified rail lines, additional rolling stock, and improved ferry services provided at cost or less than cost. I would prefer the latter, because at cost fares would have to increase. That cost should be borne by the nation as a whole, whether the cost is incurred on the Atlantic coast or the Pacific coast.

These kinds of transportation services will provide the type of infrastructure and foundation which will allow Atlantic industry to sell and ship to central Canada, to the United States, or overseas, since there are not enough people in Atlantic Canada to provide a market for all its potential production capacities. These people have to move their goods out of Atlantic Canada. We have seen too many instances where home industries in Atlantic Canada went bankrupt because they could not compete due to transportation costs and inadequacies, or compete with goods coming into central Canada from other parts of the world or the United States.

I hope the House will support our amendment and the motion of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I will read the motion. Moved by the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly):

That the motion be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a semi-colon, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"10. putting profits and user-pay ahead of service to Atlantic Canada;

11. failing to develop an industrial strategy to create employment in Atlantic Canada by building a modern transportation system;

12. failing to modernize rail passenger service in Atlantic Canada."

The Chair finds the motion to be in order, relevant and debatable.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Today, Mr. Speaker, the Progressive Conservative opposition is moving a motion condemning the policy of the government and particularly the conduct of the Minister of Transport on nine issues which, of course, have to do with transportation, particularly as it affects the Atlantic provinces. And just now the spokesman for the New Democratic Party has raised three more issues. I am pleased with the somewhat academic tone of the debate so far because I too am interested in giving hon. members as much information as possible so that the public at large will be in a better position to see what is going on.

Since we now have twelve topics, I will not be able to cover them all. For my part, I will speak to paragraph 1 concerning the use of transportation as a tool of national and regional development which, it is said here has been abandoned. Then I will go on to paragraph 6 of the motion which states that there has been a serious deterioration in freight rate structures, and paragraph 7 concerning the legislation which deals with ports, the Maritime Code and coastal shipping and which, according to the hon. member who moved this motion, has not been introduced in the House. And, as in his case, my colleagues will deal with the other topics. My colleagues from Moncton (Mr. McCauley), Egmont (Mr. Henderson), Restigouche (Mr. Harquail), Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons), Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. MacLellan) and Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) will deal with the other topics, namely the CN Express offices, CN Marine and its ferries, the Charlottetown airport, the St. John's syncro-lift facility, certain types of railroad cars, and potatoes of course. They will address themselves to all those subjects and this evening, probably around 9.30 p.m., the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael), whom I am pleased to have as parliamentary secretary, will gather all questions left unanswered and clean up the whole slate. This way, Mr. Speaker, we hope to answer the numerous questions raised in this motion. Before going any further—

[English]

—I would like to say that the department and the minister have not neglected consulting with the governments and people of the Atlantic provinces. This subject was mentioned by the mover of the motion. I want to assure the House that the mechanism of consultation between governments has been reactivated. It has been pretty slow in recent times. In the last years, particularly in Newfoundland, a federal-provincial committee of Atlantic region transportation officials has been meeting quite regularly. As a matter of fact, it is meeting today in Ottawa.

I may add that I have had discussions with all my provincial counterparts in their own capitals, and in Ottawa and Toronto in the last year. I am going to St. John's, Newfoundland, at the end of this month for purposes of negotiation. There will probably be announcements of major importance, particularly with respect to the Newfoundland railway.

On the first point, the national transportation policy, there is action. The motion says that the minister has been abandoning the use of transportation as a tool of national and regional economic development. I am quite surprised by this perception because my impression is that we have been adding to it. In my view, the federal government, through Transport Canada particularly, is very much present in the transportation systems of the provinces; all $564 million worth of presence, if one counts in dollars, and a much higher per capita presence—$252—than anywhere else in Canada. That presence is recognized in all modes of transportation: railways, ferries, coastal services, search and rescue, urban transportation, airports, highways, etc.

The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) regrets that the National Transportation Act does not make specific reference to the objective of regional development. He knows better than I do that previous attempts at legislating this particular preoccupation have failed. There is no time to bring in a bill on that subject now. It would be damaging and sad if the government—this one and previous ones—did not give quite a lot of attention to the use of transportation as an instrument of regional development.

What about the impact of improvement ports on regional development? Consider what took place in Halifax, for example, concerning the building of the Fairview Cove at the second terminal. There is the proposal to build a potash facility at Saint John. There is also the matter of improved air facilities and services within as well as to and from the region.

● (1600)

At the time, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East approved the government's decision to allow EPA instead of CP Air to fly direct from Halifax to Toronto as a way of strengthening the economic base of EPA. He must be even more pleased now because Halifax is also being served by CP Air from Montreal and other points, with the exception of Toronto. Yesterday I heard that Air Canada had announced a non-stop Calgary-Halifax route for the coming months. I am sure his colleagues from Newfoundland rejoice in the new airport facilities on the Labrador coast. There are four of them and more to come. A new service facility is being built at Gander. I could go on and illustrate the impact of ferry subsidies and the improved services.

A moment ago the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) told us that the government should ignore profits when setting its transportation policies in Canada as a whole, and in the Atlantic provinces in particular. Most of us know that the rate of subsidization of ferries in the Atlantic area is considerable. In the last ten years, cost recovery has been reduced from 23 per cent to 20 per cent. If that is not the abandonment of profit for the purpose of regional development, I wonder what is. The same applies to the impact of the freight subsidy and the impact of federally-supported highway construction on cutting down distances and linking various centres in the Atlantic provinces.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, I fail to see that the use of transportation and transportation policies to support economic, national and regional development has been weakened in any way. As a matter of fact, I think it has been strengthened and this will be demonstrated in the coming months.

Paragraph 6 of the motion states that freight rate structures have experienced serious deterioration and claims that there has been a "loss of the traditional parity between river and coastal ports". I have notes enough here for the next three hours, Mr. Speaker, but that would be a Castro-type speech!

The first point I want to deal with under this heading concerns rail freight rates. There are numerous studies available dealing with freight rates in the Atlantic provinces. They conclude that freight rates in the Atlantic region are higher than the national average. This is a fact and it can be explained by what is referred to as the "commodity mix". That is, the mix of density of traffic, length of hauls, nature of the goods being transported and so on. It would take too much time to explain how that works and it is not peculiar to the Atlantic provinces; it is a national and international phenomenon. The same situation is experienced all over the world.

The difference between Atlantic rates and national rates reflects the relatively low rates in western Canada for such long haul commodities as coal and grain and the relatively short haul rates for Atlantic region commodities.

In the Atlantic provinces 80 per cent of rail traffic is in manufactured goods which originate or terminate there. The traffic is mostly short haul and, for obvious reasons, short haul is more expensive than long haul. However, Atlantic region freight rates compare favourably with those in Quebec and Ontario where most of its competition is. If hon. members would care for more information on this subject, I would be glad to send them notes that I have used today. I do not see how we can speak of "serious deterioration" when this phenomenon has been constant in the history of Canadian transportation.

As was indicated in question period today, the difference in freight rates has been identified by Premier Buchanan in recent days as one of the reasons for the Dart Containerline company moving from Halifax to Montreal. As I said in question period, there will be many opportunities in the coming months for that point to be proved. Until now, I have not seen much evidence of it. As a matter of fact, the president of Dart and the president of Halterm, the operator of Terminal I at Halifax which is partly owned by the government of Nova Scotia, has said very clearly that freight rates, or the position of CN in CAST, has not been a factor in that decision. He called it a straight "business decision", justified by the particular circumstances of a number of shipping companies. In the opinion of the experts with whom I have talked, the rail rates in Halifax are fair and equitable now. Of course, there could be any number of debates about what is fair and equitable. I have asked my experts—compared to what? They gave me a stock of comparisons.

Rail freight rates between Halifax and central Canada, particularly Montreal, have gone up 177 per cent in the last ten years. Compare that to the freight rate increase between Montreal and Toronto of 220 per cent; compare it to the consumer price index which is 216 per cent; compare it to the shipping rates across the Atlantic which are 425 per cent. That is about all one can produce in terms of estimating what is fair.

My friends on the other side should also be aware, as I am sure they are, that CN has equalized its rates with the port of Saint John in New Brunswick, which gives the port of Halifax 200 miles of free transportation.

So much for freight rates, Mr. Speaker. The other point that I wish to develop is what my friend the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East called "a loss of the traditional parity between river and coastal ports". I have investigated that matter with the help of my specialists. As far as I can see there are three factors that could change that "parity between river and coastal ports".

The first one could be the higher charges levied by the National Harbours Board. I have asked the National Harbours Board to do some research and give me the figures. I find, as a result, that harbour dues are charged on the gross registered tonnage of the vessel are the same for all east coast ports—Halifax, Saint John and Quebec. So there is no discrimination in the matter of harbour dues. Berthage dues, money paid on the movement of ships at the dock, is the same throughout all eastern Canadian ports, so there is no discrimination there either. These are the facts and if hon. members want to challenge them, they should bring forward some evidence.

Then there is the wharfage charge on the cargo. This is on the basis of $1.78 per metric ton for containers, throughout east coast ports. However, Halterm, operating out of Terminal No. I in Halifax, enjoys a 50 per cent rebate on all wharfage charges. No other port in Canada enjoys this special arrangement. It represents a degree of subsidization on the part of the National Harbours Board which in 1980 was estimated at $1.8 million. If one wants to talk about discrimination being exercised against Halifax, one must bring up contrary facts to those I am now placing before hon. members.

The next point is with reference to rental and the National Harbours Board. This was alluded to in today's question period. The fact is that for the first ten years Halterm was given a development contract of 15 cents per square foot. I repeat, this was for a period of ten years. After the ten years, an assessment was made of the fair market value and it indicated that an increase was called for, I think last December, from $388,000 to $1.76 million, a pretty big jump. This was referred to in question period today.

The National Harbours Board has known all about this. This increase was fairly assessed by two experts and the lower of the two assessments was chosen. Other contracts signed with lessees at the port of Halifax in recent months have been at the same level. Halterm is entitled to appeal, and it is doing that through the Federal Court.

On the general subject of the situation in the port of Halifax, there are a number of people with more optimistic views than those expressed regarding the Dart move. Again, the move will not take place before the end of the year, as was mentioned by the Dart people. Yesterday Gary Blaikie, the executive director of the Halifax-Dartmouth Port Commission, made a speech in Halifax. He looked at the good side of things when analysing the development of containerization in the world today. He said that developments are taking place in the Caribbean, India, East Africa and so on. He saw Halifax, being in proximity to New York, as one of the prime locations for Canadian traffic. In a more positive and concrete way, he referred to a number of things that have taken place recently. For example, there is the contract that Ceres, which operates Terminal II at Fairview Cove, has with a Polish line and Soviet line representing 17,500 containers per year.

There is another piece of interesting news; I do not know whether my friends from the Atlantic have seen it. A news item of today states that 100,000 tons of flour will be shipped to the Soviet Union this year from Canada, most of which will be moved through Halifax, beginning next month. Are members opposite aware of that? The flour order is expected to provide steady work in Halifax for 300 longshoremen during the next four months.

I come back to my theme. If there is, as the mover of the motion says, a loss of traditional parity between river and coastal ports, my advice is that this is not caused by the National Harbours Board.

Another factor of disparity could be the Atlantic shipping rates which are determined by shipping conferences. As members know, these conferences are exempted from the rules of competition under the Shipping Conference Exemption Act of 1979. This is for the sake of stability and regularity of service. I understand that shipping conferences can equalize the cost of shipping from point x in Europe to Halifax or Montreal. This is often a subject of debate in Canada. The exemption is valid from 1979 on for five years. Two years ago the CTC inquired into this subject. I tabled the CTC report on the operation of the shipping conferences yesterday. One can read in it that there has been no complaint about the operation of these conferences in Canada. Nevertheless, this is a subject of debate with arguments both for and against.

Another factor which might influence the traditional parity between river and coastal ports is the cost recovery by Transport Canada of navigational services. This was raised in the debate recently when some people said that the expenditure of the department on icebreaking in the St. Lawrence was "unfair competition" against the interests of the port of Halifax.

The subject is difficult because icebreaking is done for purposes other than navigation, such as the control of floods. There are other navigational aids to commercial transportation than icebreaking, so why choose this one and not others? There are also other ports in the Atlantic provinces which experience icing and come under the icebreaking program of the department. Be that as it may, it is estimated that the cost of icebreaking on the St. Lawrence and in the gulf is about $17 million. When that is divided by the commercial tonnage on the St. Lawrence and in the gulf, icebreaking aid can be assessed at the maximum, at $1.60 per ton, on the total cost of transportation. Experts say it is immaterial. So much for my analysis of freight rates, shipping rates and St. Lawrence rates.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Now let's deal with the motion.

Mr. Pepin: In the next five mintues I will try to answer some of the questions raised by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East. He asked about our coastal trade policy. He knows better than I that earlier legislation on the subject was opposed by the Atlantic provinces and others. A team from Transport Canada has had extensive consultations on the subject. I know the hon. member speaks regularly with the officials of Transport Canada to keep in touch with developments in the world of transportation. He may realize that coastal trade is not the issue he thought it might be when he first became interested in it. I understand that 95 per cent of the coastal trade in Canada is done in Canadian bottoms. That eliminates the subject as a dramatic issue.

On the second subject, that of a deep sea fleet, the hon. member knows of the deep, deep division on this among Canadian public opinion. I have been exposed to this reality at a number of meetings, for example with the forest industry of British Columbia. Reconciliation efforts are being made. I have had meetings with people on both sides of the issue. My predecessor did not exactly move the world on this issue either. He knows that shippers are afraid that sooner or later the government might force them to use Canadian registered ships. He knows also that Canadian shippers are afraid of what happened on the union side.

On the Maritime Code question the situation is that because of the degree of urgency, amendments to the Canada Shipping Act were passed by cabinet last December and we hope they will come to the House for implementation next fall. These amendments will be to complete the revision of part XX of that act regarding liability and compensation for pollution.

With respect to the totality, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) would say of the Maritime Code, my officials expect that cabinet will receive it by August, 1981, which indicates that it might come to the House for legislative action in the fall of 1982. So progress is being made.

We may be closer to success with regard to port policy. During the summer, and more recently, I regularly met with groups and members of port authorities. The marine administrator of my department has done a tremendous amount of work in recent months on this subject, and there is a paper coming to cabinet in the coming days. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East is aware of the gist of the legislation that might develop from that paper. The general idea would be the creation of a national ports corporation, a maxi-corporation, as I call it, with much broader regional representation, and a number of mini-corporations in the different ports—Halifax, Montreal and Vancouver—with a much higher degree of management autonomy given to the local adminitrators. This is going to be very practical, down to earth and realistic, as the Minister of Transport is, and consequently I think it will have a good chance of being approved by Parliament.

Finally, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East said there was not enough philosophy, objectives, planning or sense of orientation in matters of transport at this time in Canada. I would just like to put my two bits in. It is not a magnificent idea but one borrowed from others, like all ideas—no one has ever invented one—and I am trying to push it as hard as I can now because I think it makes sense.

Often enough today, I and others have referred to amounts of money the federal government is spending on transportation in the Atlantic provinces. Speaking very frankly, I am not at all sure that this money is always spent in the most worthwhile fashion. One of the reasons for this is the lack of planning and co-ordination between the interested parties. Another reason is the fear the provinces have of not getting all the help they can from the central government in each mode separately. I have been impressed by that. They tend to look at railways, ferries, air transportation and highways separately because in each case they feel they are in a better position in bargaining with the federal government.

To obviate that, and borrowing a chapter or two from the Sullivan report, we have offered to the Atlantic provinces in recent months a new approach which can be described in three words—multimodal, envelope and trade-off. Multimodal simply means that rail, highway, air transport and ferries will be looked upon together instead of in isolation. The envelope concept simply means that the money not spent in one province will not be returned to the Receiver General; it will be put in an envelope. The third word is trade-off. In that envelope it can be shifted from one mode to the other.

Now, I repeat, it is an idea that is not new at all but it makes sense, and personally I found it very well developed in the Sullivan report. So if the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East was looking for a philosophy, for a direction, there is one that he could accept. This is the sort of deal we expect to strike with Newfoundland in the coming days.

As for the railways, maybe yes, maybe no; we would like to include them in that approach. It is quite possible that the provinces will want to treat them separately; but on other matters that I am not at liberty to reveal today, this approach will be taken. Premier Peckford and Mr. Brett, who is the Newfoundland minister of transport, have given approval in their own assembly recently. We hope to carry the same approach to other Atlantic provinces. That is about all I wanted to say.

An hon. Member: Tell us about Charlottetown airport.

Mr. Pepin: Others will do that. I could only take one third of the 12 points where members of the opposition do not agree with what I have done. I hope I have given a lot of information, although some of the points raised were not really objective in the sense they did not correspond to reality. In the case of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, I think I have answered a great number of his questions which tended to indicate that no action was taking place; my answers, I think, tend to indicate the opposite.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to point out that the only reason transportation is being discussed in this chamber today is that my party has some priorities that come ahead of the Constitution. I would like to point out that if the Constitution went to England tomorrow and every change the government proposed was adopted, we would not be one bit further ahead in solving the transportation problems of Canada than we are right now.

What this government is doing, Mr. Speaker, is slumbering while the Constitution constipates the government. There is no movement in transportation, in economic development, in the economy or in housing. Why not? Because of the Constitution. We have had it for 114 years but that is all this government can think about.

An hon. Member: Vote on it.

Mr. Crosbie: Vote on it? We are not going to accept this load of garbage you are handing us; we will vote on it when we are ready and after it has been amply discussed. The government could postpone this debate and bring before this House the things they should be bringing forward on the economy, inflation, transportation and the like.

The minister just tolled the death knell for the hopes of Newfoundland for economic development, and that just fits in with the first clause of our non-confidence motion. We are censuring the government for abandoning the principle of the use of transportation as a tool of national and regional economic development. That is just what he said. He has come up with a new magic formula. It has to be one that is multimodal when he deals with the provinces. There is a certain envelope of spending and you will not get any more than that.

Then there are trade-offs. Well, how can there be trade-offs in the economic development of a region or province? How can you trade off a railway against decent road transportation? How can you trade off decent rail transportation against decent shipping transportation? Why should a region be expected to do that?

Central Canada has had all of these transportation modes for the last 114 years, but other areas of the country, like the Altantic provinces, have not. Why should we now be told to trade off? That is one of the three great points of this minister's policy. He is going to Newfoundland and saying: "Under the terms of union of 1949 we had to subsidize your ferry service across the gulf. We are going to take the amount of money that is costing us today and put it in your envelope, so there is $50 million or $60 million that you cannot have for other transportation needs in Newfoundland as a result of this alleged trade-off." That is not a trade-off; it was a constitutional right given to Newfoundland in 1949 and should not be in the envelope at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: So it is the death knell. This minister has been in office now for 13 months. He has been short-taken now for 13 months. What has he done? He has been looking, hesitating, obfuscating, bewailing, excusing and hand-wringing. He has been sighing. He has been crying. He is not doing, and he has been double-crossing.

• (1630)

What did he do? Where was his double-crossing? If the minister wants to know where he did the double-crossing, he did his double-crossing in Newfoundland when he changed the water transportation assistance directorate that his government promised it would move down to Newfoundland. He announced last year that the water transportation assistance directorate was no longer going to be transferred to Newfoundland, that he was reversing that policy because now there are more important policies. It was not going through. That was a commitment made in two elections, a solemn promise made to some of the employees transferred to Newfoundland, and the minister reversed that decision. He has been busy double-crossing, but he has not been acting.

Where are his transportation improvements? There have been very precious few that I can see. He did make one good decision, and that was on the route for EPA from Halifax to Toronto. I have to give the minister credit for that. He did the right thing there.

However, in area after area this government has no transportation policy. Its only policy is to squeeze the provinces, squeeze the regions, squeeze them till their pips squeak, give them the old talk about multimodal, give them the old talk about the famous envelope, give them the old talk about trade-offs till there is nothing left and no way for them to build up their economic development. I suggest that what we need here are six ministers to replace the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). We could have a minister of state for water transport, a minister of state for air transport, a minister of state for ground transport, a minister of state for Atlantic transport, a minister of state for western transport and a minister of state for excuses. All six of those together might be able to do a job which this minister certainly is not doing today. We need a minister whose whole time is devoted to excuses.

In my own province of Newfoundland the Trans-Canada Highway agreement terminates on March 31, 1981. This is March 17, St. Patrick's Day, and in 14 days' time this agreement expires. The minister has not concluded a new agreement with the government of Newfoundland. He has not told them what money is available. They are looking for $75 million in another three-year agreement. Just two weeks before this agreement expires there is no decision reached. We have the most miserable, spavined Trans-Canada highway in the whole country. It is a narrow, double-laned highway badly needing upgrading and repairing. It is the main route through Newfoundland and there are no trade-offs. That highway has to be strengthened and improved, or transportation comes to a halt in Newfoundland, but the minister has not yet entered into an agreement. It should be a 90 per cent federal and 10 per cent provincial agreement, not 50-50. That is one priority the minister should have, and he has apparently been doing nothing about it.

There has been only one DREE agreement signed since the present government took office and we had the forestry agreement in January. They are still waiting to sign a coastal Labrador agreement. Although the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) represents Labrador, he is doing nothing to expedite that agreement. He should be ashamed of himself. That is the only proposed DREE agreement which has any funding in it for roads. The Straits road in coastal Labrador badly needs repair, but the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will no longer spend any funds on roads in Newfoundland. The Witless Bay line in my own district is very important for economic development in the region and for transportation of products from fish plants. The road from Trepassey to Peter's River in my own district of St. John's West badly needs reconstruction and paving to enable fishery products to be taken out and transported in, workers to get to their jobs and the like. Nothing has been done. The government will not have anything to do with roads under DREE agreements.

Then there is the Newfoundland government's study on the Newfoundland railway; the minister has announced no decisions on that. The minister is going to Newfoundland at the end of the month to announce a new containerization plan for the Newfoundland railway. They are going to attempt to go to containerization to help save that railway or to see if it can become economic. But I am concerned, as are the people of Newfoundland, about the 300 jobs that are now redundant and the additional jobs that may become redundant under that agreement. So I hope when the minister goes to Newfoundland he will deal adequately with that problem and see that these people get generous treatment, retraining, other jobs, early generous pensions or whatever is necessary.

With regard to the Deer Lake and Stephenville airports, I hope the minister—the member for that district has said this, and I hope he is correct—is going to keep both those airports operating as well as the airport in St. Anthony. I hope the minister is also going to start spending some money on the airport at St. John's. We have a major airport at St. John's which this government has always been prejudiced against. That airport handled 580,000 passengers in 1980, but a 100 per cent increase in air traffic volume in St. John's is expected in the next ten years due to the oil and gas development off the coast of Newfoundland. A 100 per cent increase in the next ten years, yet this government does nothing. It is not even improving the instrument landing system, as it is at other Canadian airports. I quote a release dated March 9:

> Present planning calls for replacement of ILS at the following airports: Windsor, Whitehorse, Frobisher, Terrace, Moncton, Dorval, Sault Ste. Marie, Churchill, Thompson, Sudbury, Toronto, Halifax, Yellowknife, Stephenville, Hamilton, Fort St. John, Abbotsford, Edmonton, Sandspit and Lethbridge.

Sandspit comes ahead of St. John's airport which handled 580,000 passengers last year, with a 100 per cent increase in the next five to ten years anticipated. Yet this government will not even instal, a first-class ILS at St. John's airport. These are the kinds of things the minister should be giving his attention to. Never mind the multi-modal excuses. Never mind the envelope. Never mind the trade-offs. There can be no trade-offs for proper transportation services in the more remote areas of Canada.

What about the patronage aspect? Patronage is overloading the whole transportation system. This minister is up to his ankles, up to his knees, he is approaching his chest in patronage. Here is one examples. The minister was written to on February 19 by the Newfoundland Shipowners, Agents and Brokers Association of St. John's—they represent Newfoundland shipowners—about a complaint concerning Canadian National and their tender operations in connection with services to Labrador. Their complaint to the minister went in almost a month ago. There has been no reply yet. Their complaint was that on January 7, 1980, CN Marine advertised a tender call for an ISU container-carrying vessel. The specifications for that vessel referred particularly in specification 5, to the vessel having derricks or cranes capable of handling safe-working loads of 22.5 tons specification, implying that the vessel had to be used in small ports. I have the specifications here. "Vessels should preferably be equipped with bow thrusters for requirement of operating in smaller coastal ports". Derricks or cranes were required.

The people who belong to the Newfoundland Shipowners, Agents and Brokers Association tendered for this vessel on the basis of these specifications. They located a suitable vessel that would meet those specifications. Tenders closed, and after tenders closed, lo and behold, the final announcement is made by CN on February 10 that they have awarded a contract for this vessel to Coastal Shipping Limited, but not for the kind of boat that they specified in their tender call. It is for a new roll-on, roll-off container shipping service between St. John's and Goose Bay, Labrador, only. The vessel does not have to go into small coastal ports. The vessel does not have to have derricks or cranes capable of handling 22½-ton loads.

CN called a tender for one kind of vessel, publicized it and only allowed 23 days to put a bid in. The people who were not on the inside, knowing nothing about the fact that they wanted some other kind of vessel, located the kind of vessel that was specified, and then they were told that their vessel was not suitable, that the lowest tender was submitted by Coastal Shipping Limited, who tendered for a roll-on, roll-off vessel. Who is Coastal Shipping Limited? Coastal Shipping Limited is Mr. Mel Woodward, the biggest Liberal in the Happy Valley-Goose Bay area, a man heart to heart, brain to brain and toe to toe, with the Minister of National Revenue. This cries out for an investigation. Why was this method used? On page 2 of their letter to the minister, they asked why the time permitted for tendering was limited to 23 days—> —in light of the fact that the service was not scheduled to commence for some four months;

> Why did the specifications require a vessel equipped with derricks or cranes when presumably roll-on, roll-off was acceptable and indeed now appears to be preferable for the service intended;
> Why was there a reference in Specification 8 to "smaller coastal ports" when the service is actually St. John's to Goose Bay?

They were going to make this same Mr. Melvin Woodward a director of Petro-Canada until they found out that he represented Imperial Oil Limited up in Goose Bay and all along the coast of Labrador. What are they going to do with him now? They are going to make him a director of the Bank of Canada, I hear. He is going to replace Spencer Lake. So, Mr. Minister, let us have a quick investigation. It was only a month ago that it was brought to the minister's attention. This situation cries out for investigation into the reasons that CN adopted this peculiar procedure. The whole transportation area is rife with this kind of, let us call it suspicious circumstance that requires explanation, particularly when you find that the Coastal Shipping company have the preferred deal. They must have had inside information as they happen to be also connected with one of the most prominent Liberals in Newfoundland, a man who was a member of the House of Assembly for that district at one time.

So do not talk to us about multimodal, do not talk to us about envelopes and do not talk to us about trade-offs. We have seen the trade-offs; Mr. Woodward just got a trade-off. What he got for the trade-off I do not know, but we got a trade-off. As long as the minister is in that portfolio, he will learn.

With regard to the syncro-lift facility, one of the most dastardly deeds ever done by the Government of Canada was to stop construction of the synchrolift for the CN dockyard in St. John's West, in my district, last fall. At page 2340 of the estimates of the Department of Public Works for 1981-82 we find: "St. John's syncro-lift dry-docking facility, $11,500,000". All that work has been stopped. The Minister of National Revenue was asked why, and I am told that on the air the other day he said: "We could not go ahead in our first year in office and spend money in a district that was held by the opposition". Imagine, Mr. Speaker, he candidly admitted that this was the basis on which the decision was made!

Economic development and the creation of 200 jobs in Newfoundland at the dockyard—one of the most sensible propositions that was ever made—does not matter to this government. All that matters to this government is the most odious kind of patronage. It reeks of it. The government is up to its knees in it; it is up to its nose in patronage practice; it is over its nose in it so it cannot even smell it.

What has happened to syncro-lift now, Mr. Speaker? The Newfoundland government, the second poorest government in Canada at this time, is providing the money to Canadian National so that they will go ahead with syncro-lift. The province is putting up $10 million for the project; $6.5 million alone to be repaid from hoped for profits, and the rest from subsidy and interest costs. The province is forced to do that because the Government of Canada, which owns that dockyard and which has CN operate it for them, through political spite, through political meanness, through political chicanery, through political treachery and trickery of the worst type, cancelled a project which they had promised before the election of 1979 and again promised through their candidate in 1980 because it was in a district held by a Conservative. Well, that will be a district held by a Conservative for 100 years to come at the minimum, or even for 114 years, longer than the Constitution we have today, because the people down there will never forget the odious betrayal of that project.

The minister has not disclosed the spending envelope for Newfoundland; that is to be a secret. He does not want to tell us this when he is discussing his multimodal, his envelopes and his trade-offs. He does not even want to tell us what is in the envelope. Come on, Mr. Minister, tell us what is in it. Is it $100 million, $200 million, $500 million or $50 million? Does he include the channel or ferry subsidy and the coastal Newfoundland and Labrador shipping service? Let us know what is in that envelope, what are the trade-offs that had to be made, and what are the multimodals that had to be modulated, or whatever the right word is—these multimodal-nadals or multinadal-modals, whatever the new buzz word is. Otto Lang used to talk about user-pay; we know where Otto Lang is now. The minister is now talking about multimodals, and we know where you are going to be, Mr. Minister, after the next election. You had better hold tight in Ottawa. There is not another part of the country in which you are safe. Do not move out of your seat. Once my French is improved, I am going to run against you in Quebec. I will challenge you to run down there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: However, I want my French to be considerably improved before that time comes!

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is the matter of the St. John's harbour, which is right off these two huge oil fields, the Hibernia, and the Hebron which has just been discovered. We are into big time down there, whether it is federally or provincially owned, and we have a port which does not even have a tug that can be used outside the narrows. There is no fire tug, no fire protection.

What can the government do about these problems? I know the minister is not made of money, but some initiative must be taken. Today, this port is not self-sustaining. What will happen to the facilities there? The longshoremen in the port are exercising their right to go to the Liberal members of the House of Assembly. They went to the federal Minister of National Revenue about the problem there with containerization, the fact that shed No. 1 might be removed, and there is a hope that it could be used for the reefer freezing proposal.

I wrote the minister on February 18. I would hate to have the minister's portfolio. I like the minister, although I have to criticize him. I know he has tremendous problems. You need six ministers there. The longshoremen wrote him on February 18 and contacted the Liberal members in the House of Assembly in Newfoundland, among them one Stephen Neary, or "Foghorn Neary" because you can hear him from St. John's to Vancouver when he is speaking in the House of Assembly. They contacted also the federal Minister of National Revenue. What will happen as a result of that? That was almost a month ago. My constituents are used to hearing from me promptly. They are not used to the fact that I have to deal with dilatory ministers from whom I cannot get answers.

I think my time is running out, Mr. Speaker. We have multidimensional, multimodal, multitudinous problems. In our region, the Atlantic region, economic development still has to be the main purpose of transportation activity. The hard-hearted minister here, who already has a deficit of $13.7 billion, should be encouraged to stop putting $3.8 million into a subsidy on incoming oil, and so on. He should have a sensible policy on that and devote half of that $3.8 million to the Atlantic provinces and their transportation needs. He should forget the envelope, forget multimodal, and forget the trade-offs; there are none, and we cannot afford them.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Here comes the killer!

Mr. Simmons: —they are all in a very lively mood this afternoon after that brilliant speech from my good friend the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). It was short on facts and long on brilliance.

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Simmons: I say to him: welcome back to the House. We missed him during the last month or two. It is nice to have him back in the chamber. We might not agree with all he says, but it is always good to sit back and listen to him. He is always entertaining, although not terribly factual. Welcome back to the House, John.

Mr. Crosbie: It is very multimodal of you.

Mr. Simmons: The hon. member spoke about his party having priorities other than the Constitution. Well, I am glad he told us because, judging by his party's performance in the House during the past few months, one has to wonder if they have any priority except holding us down forever on the Constitution. I hope that with the new insight he shared with the House today, he will talk to his caucus tomorrow morning and persuade his members of the value of getting off this constitutional filibuster, this foolish kick they are on these days, and get on with the business of the House so we can bring in some other subjects for debate, such as transportation, a priority with this government.

An hon. Member: Talk to your own House leader.

Mr. Simmons: It is very much up to the Tories at this point whether we debate the constitutional issue for the next month, two months or three months. The hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) knows that I have spoken to my House leader and we are heart to heart on this one. We know exactly where we are going. We know how we are going to vote. We know we are going to vote that way on the Constitution because it is going to be a wise decision, a decision for which this country, and even the member for St. John's West, will thank us in years to come. As soon as they allow us to do it, we will get on with it. So I ask him to persuade his colleagues to get off that filibuster as soon as they can.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before I get to the substance of what I want to say this afternoon, there is another item which really needs a response, an item which the hon. member for St. John's West raised. He spoke about my hon. friend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) having been in his portfolio for 13 months, and he asked what he had done in that time. I believe the Minister of Transport gave a very good account of himself in the limited time he had this afternoon in terms of what he had done in that 13 months. It is a pretty fair record.

I will tell the House and the hon. member for St. John's West that one thing the minister has not done in the last 13 months is that he has not participated in a cabinet decision to freeze all fisheries projects in Atlantic Canada. I say that because it is one of the things the hon. member for St. John's West did in his nine months in cabinet. He participated in a cabinet decision to freeze every wharf and small craft harbours project in Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order and also on a question of privilege. The parliamentary secretary is saying an untruth. If he continues to say it, he will be saying an untruth knowingly, which would be a lie. There was no such decision made by our cabinet. If there had been such a decision, I would not have remained in the cabinet. It would have been the most stupid decision I had ever heard of. So he is incorrect.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. That sounds very much like debate. I think the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons) should continue his remarks.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member for St. John's West cannot help but be tender on this particular issue. I can document it for him, if he wants it documented. He does not want it documented, of course; it is the last thing he wants. I can get all kinds of documentation on this particular point. I can go to almost every community in my riding of Burin-St. George's for starters. I can go to places where projects were already approved, ready to go, the funding had been set aside, and then the Tories came along and every project, without exception—

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The parliamentary secretary made the statement, first, that when I was in cabinet a decision was made by cabinet to stop every fishery project in eastern Canada or in Newfoundland; that was the statement. It was not that there were some projects in Burin-St. George's that were stopped or not stopped. There was a statement made that our cabinet, our government, made a decision to stop spending on all fishery projects. I say that is not correct; there is not a word of truth in it. I deny it absolutely. Therefore, the member either has to withdraw that statement or back it up; he must do one or the other.

That is my question of privilege. If he does not do that, then I will be calling him other names which will bring this to an issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. It is my understanding of privilege that the hon. member's rights are being affected; but my appreciation of the hon. member's remarks is that this is response to debate and I must treat it as such. I appreciate the fact that the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) may not accept what the hon. member for Burin-St. George's is saying, but this is the cut and thrust of debate, and I must see it as such.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of the cut and thrust of debate. This is a statement made by one member, the truth of which is categorically denied by another member. If this question of privilege is not dealt with now, I will give notice that it will be brought up tomorrow when we have today's record.

The parliamentary secretary made a statement which I say is false; it is not true. This is not a matter of the cut and thrust of debate. I am not allowed to lie about something in this House or tell an untruth, and the other hon. member is not allowed to do it either. I am categorically denying the statement that the Conservative government, under the Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), froze all fishery projects in eastern Canada. This is just not true. The hon. member should either withdraw that statement or back it up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's West keeps debating the point.

Mr. Crosbie: I am not debating.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I am afraid that it will continue and continue. The Chair has made a ruling. Of course, the hon. member cannot appeal that ruling. The debate must continue, and I recognize the hon. member for Burin-St. George's.

Mr. Crosbie: I will bring it up tomorrow.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to point out that when a member makes a statement in the House, another member must accept that statement and not continue saying something that is wrong. That is an ordinary, every day parliamentary rule.

I think Your Honour should order the member on the Liberal side who is speaking to stop making a statement the truth of which has already been denied by another member. That is just ordinary parliamentary courtesy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): That may be legitimately raised as a point of order, but I must insist on recognizing the hon. member for Burin-St. George's.

Mr. Crosbie: He should back up his statement.

Mr. Simmons: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I also thank the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) for his "Taylor" rules of procedure. I am sure we would not find anything in Bourinot, Beauchesne or Erskine May to back up what he said, but that is another issue.

Mr. Taylor: It is ordinary common sense and good manners.

Mr. Simmons: Part of the ordinary common sense and good manners about which the hon. member for Bow River is concerned, although he keeps interrupting me—

Mr. Taylor: It is ordinary common sense.

Mr. Simmons: Perhaps what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

Mr. Taylor: Tell the truth.

Mr. Simmons: First, I say that I intend to tell the truth. I have already told the truth on the issue and I shall continue to do so, if the hon. member for Bow River will give me the opportunity. I listened to him courteously and in silence. I did not agree with what he was saying. I did not think, under the circumstances, that it made a terrible amount of sense, but I listened to him.

To respond to the hon. member for Bow River first of all, it seems to me, if we accept his newly-devised rule that one member has always to accept the word of another, that we will be in one awful hassle in this House. As soon as someone stands up and says, "This is not true for these reasons", then someone else has to bow to him and say, "I bow to your good judgment." On this one, it is not a question of bowing to the good judgment of the hon. member for St. John's West; it is a case of being able to say, with truth and with complete conviction, that the Tories froze the fisheries projects. That is what I said and that is what I stand by. It is his privilege to raise the issue at the appropriate time.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Burin-St. George's said that I personally participated in a cabinet decision by the Tory government to freeze all fishing projects. He has changed his wording now; he is saying that it was to freeze fishing projects—

Mr. Simmons: I am elaborating.

Mr. Crosbie: He alleged that there was a cabinet decision by the Tory government to freeze all fishing projects in eastern Canada or in Newfoundland. We will have the exact words in Hansard.

Now, I say that is wrong; it is not true; it is untrue. If the hon. member continues to make that statement, I further say that he is deliberately making an untrue statement and he is an unmitigated liar.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I am afraid the hon. member for St. John's West is using unparliamentary language. It is incumbent upon the Chair to draw that to his attention at this time.

Mr. Simmons: Withdraw!

Mr. Crosbie: Draw it to the attention of the hon. member for Burin-St. George's.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I invite the hon. member for St. John's West to withdraw the unparliamentary language he just used.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, not to put you in an embarrassing position, I will withdraw the statement, but this matter will be carried further tomorrow. I am giving notice now of a definite question of privilege; written notice will be given tomorrow. I am not going to countenance this kind of chicanery and fabrication in the chamber. Since I cannot call the member that, I will withdraw it; but as soon as I get outside the House I will tell the world what I think he is.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, perhaps when the hon. member for St. John's West does what he has undertaken to do, he might also do the House the honour of telling it about any fisheries project his administration allowed to go ahead. There was not one; they froze every last project during their entire nine months in office. Let him contradict the truth of that statement, Mr. Speaker. They froze every last project.

I do not know where he was when the decision was made. Perhaps he was in South Africa somewhere. I do not know where he was. All I know is that the decision was taken and acted upon. The result was that every small craft harbour project in my riding, and many other ridings I could name if I had the time, was frozen during the period of that administration. If that irks him, Mr. Speaker, I am glad it does. Perhaps he has learned his lesson. Perhaps he has realized that they did the wrong thing by socking it to the fishermen on the south coast of Newfoundland. Perhaps they got that message at long last.

Mr. Crosbie: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I said that the Conservative government did not freeze all those projects. I have to say, Mr. Speaker, that prevarication of this type is not often heard in this chamber. It is pure fabrication. It is multimodal in its dimensions. It is Manchausen. The gentleman's nose will reach across the chamber soon, if he continues these whoppers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Again I must rule that it is not a point of order. I once more recognize the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons).

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, let there be no misunderstanding. What the argument here is about, and what the hon. member for St. John's West and I disagree on, is that I say he, his administration and his colleague for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), persuaded the administration not to go ahead with one of the fisheries projects, even those which had been put in place and for which funding had been made available. They arranged to have a complete freeze on them.

I am not surprised that the hon. member leaves the chamber at this particular time. It must be absolute shame which motivates him, now that he is reminded about this dastardly thing which he perpetrated on the fishermen of Atlantic Canada a year or so ago when he briefly sat in office.

He has decided to return, Mr. Speaker. While he is here let me turn to another issue which he raised. He talked about this administration doing some things for Liberals. I want him to know that it is difficult not to do things for Liberals, since there are so many of them in this country. It would be difficult to avoid doing things for them.

Mr. Mayer: Tell us how many there are in western Canada.

Mr. Simmons: The larger question is: What has he got against Liberals? He was one for years. He even wanted to be the leader of all the Liberals in Newfoundland and Labrador at one point, until they rejected him. He even participated in the choice of my present leader. He was there, as I was. I was there at that 1968 convention when he proudly waved the banner for the present leader of the Liberal Party in Canada.

Mr. Crosbie: I have repented since.

Mr. Simmons: What has he suddenly got against Liberals, Mr. Speaker? Is his memory on this subject as short as it was on the small craft harbour projects a few moments ago?

Mr. Mazankowski: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I respect the hon. member who is speaking, but I wonder if you would remind him, Mr. Speaker, of the content of the motion before the House for debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I thank the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) for his observations. The Chair was, in fact, about to ask the hon. member for Burin-St. George's to stick to the subject matter at hand.

Mr. Simmons: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I had strayed in the sense that I had assumed that in responding to the irrelevancies of the hon. member for St. John's West I was thereby being no more irrelevant. But I take direction from the Chair.

I was wanting to make in passing a quick plea to the hon. member, since during the course of his speech he did attack rather viciously an individual who is not a member of this chamber and one who cannot protect himself. He cannot come here and defend himself against the allegations and innuendoes that the gentleman from St. John's West raised against him. I think that is very unfortunate and very unbecoming of any member of this chamber. I hoped that he would have avoided doing that, but instead he went on and attacked rather viciously a gentleman who happens to live in Labrador, in the province of Newfoundland. He attacked him by name again and again with the most vicious and low innuendo. It is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, and it should not have happened.

The hon. member also talks about the Trans-Canada highway agreement which has not been signed. He is right on that particular point. But, as usual, as often is the case, he is right for the wrong reasons. Had he listened to the Minister of Transport, he would have heard, as the rest of us did, just a few minutes before he made the charge about the TCH agreement, exactly why the agreement has not been signed. He would also have heard him say, as I and others in this chamber did, that he is going next week to meet, in what has become a continuing series of meetings, with the Premier of Newfoundland and the minister of transport, Mr. Brett, on this very subject and other subjects as well. This federal administration has made proposals to the government of Newfoundland on this and other subjects. We have been waiting for a response from them. It does take two to make an agreement. Hopefully in the next week or so, when the Minister of Transport of Canada meets with his counterpart at the provincial level in Newfoundland, we will see this matter, among others, ironed out.

The member for St. John's West also rails on about what this government is not doing for airports. Again, why does he not just listen a little? Only in the last few days there has been an announcement, and my good friend from Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin) has a particular interest in this one. Indeed, he participated in the announcement that this administration is spending $1.7 million in Stephenville and $1.2 million in Deer Lake this year. The member for St. John's West implies that we have not made up our mind with respect to those airports. We have done so and we are very much in favour of keeping both airports open. That announcement was made publicly. We are committed to keeping both airports open. The hon. member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe is to be particularly congratulated for his efforts in this respect. He has delivered.

Indeed, he has delivered to a larger degree, I must say, than the provincial minister of transport has delivered on this issue. Only this week he literally gave up the ghost, threw up his hands and said that if that is what Mr. Steele wants to do, then we will have to go along with it. We do not have to go along with it. I appeal to the minister of transport in Newfoundland to get some fight in him and to put the case for the two airports at Stephenville and Deer Lake. If we had the minister of transport for Newfoundland on our side on this one, perhaps, at least, we would have an extra ally; and perhaps we would have more of a chance to save Mr. Steele and others who are involved in the decision from reneging on this issue and to keep the two services operating.

I realize my time is nearing an end. There was one other issue, which is the issue of the St. John's syncro-lift, about which I would like to speak. I find it regrettable that I have had to use most of my time to respond to inaccuracies put before the House by the hon. member for St. John's West. He rails on about our role with respect to the syncro-lift. He was the minister in the federal cabinet representing Newfoundland for nine months. During those nine months he did not lift one single finger to move the St. John's syncro-lift proposal forward. He never lifted a single finger. It is all very nice to get out and make pompous statements in the press about what the government should be doing, but when he was part of the government, Mr. Speaker, the question is: What did he do? He never lifted one single finger to advance the cause of the St. John's syncro-lift. For the entire nine months that gentleman, whose riding is close to where this facility is, failed to lift one finger. Let him call that an untruth.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, it is a complete untruth.

Mr. Simmons: He knows the difference, Mr. Speaker. He knows very well that if his record with respect to this synchrolift is scrutinized carefully, he will not come out very much on top of this one. The people of his riding will realize what we in this chamber already realize, and that is that he has been big on talk when it comes to the synchrolift but very short on delivery.

I see my time has expired, Mr. Speaker. I hope my few comments will have contributed to the debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate condemning the failure of the government to deal adequately with national transportation matters, and specifically condemning the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin).

Transportation issues are a matter of vital importance to the whole of this vast country. I would like to spend the next few minutes emphasizing the importance of a strong, functional and efficient transportation system to my province of Prince Edward Island, a province which, like many others, has been sorely neglected by the federal Department of Transport.

Over 100 years ago, in 1873, Prince Edward Island entered confederation. One of the conditions upon which it joined this country was that the federal government should establish and maintain transportation links between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of Canada. I quote:

● (1710)

> Federal authorities agreed to take over the railway guarantee and establish and maintain efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers . . . between the Island and the mainland of the dominion, winter and summer—

In 1873, as today, it is vital that Prince Edward Island have an efficient, functional transportation system. It is unfortunate that the federal government has seen fit to renege on its transportation commitments to Prince Edward Island. In all facets of Island transportation—rail service, shipping by water, air transportation, highway development and car ferry services—the federal government has failed to live up to its promises to provide and maintain efficient service for Islanders.

In order for our agricultural and fisheries industries to remain viable, an upgrading of the systems that transport their products to market must take place. The tourism industry also depends heavily on how efficiently the transportation service to and on Prince Edward Island is operating. We need better roads, better port facilities, an improved ferry and rail service and an overhaul of air service. We need the assistance of the federal Department of Transport, assistance which has been sadly lacking.

Transportation

One of the Island's main transportation worries is the need for rail improvements. There is a definite need to upgrade and maintain rail lines, and a need for research and development on improving rail service. In recent years there has been a trend toward shipping by road rather than by rail. Islanders feel strongly that rail service will always be needed, and therefore it should be properly maintained and its efficiency increased.

In the present situation where eastern Canada is completely dependent upon its offshore petroleum supplies, it is only prudent to achieve fuel conservation by carrying more of our goods by rail and less by truck. Truck freighting also places a heavy burden on the provincial department of highways, because due to our soil conditions and unavailability of suitable road-building materials, coupled with our climate, it is almost impossible, without prohibitive expense, to try to maintain roads to carry a large volume of heavy trucks. Owing to the increased tractor-trailer truck traffic over Prince Edward Island highways, the roads are deteriorating rapidly, and this is in part due to the reduction in proper rail service.

The way Canadian National has neglected the rail system on Prince Edward Island is deplorable. Canadian National is even considering abandoning 80 miles of Prince Edward Island's total of 275 miles of rail line. Prince Edward Island needs its rail system and everything possible should be done to retain it. The federal government must consider, as a high priority, action to have Canadian National rebuild its railway lines in Prince Edward Island, and otherwise increase its efficiency to reverse the present trend toward road freighting.

The present condition of the Prince Edward Island railbed and level of service has made it difficult for Island shippers to meet their objectives. Prince Edward Island potato growers have to use obsolete rail cars and face inadequate or wrongly placed storage capacity, and misunderstandings over costs, which have produced an unsatisfactory transportation system. Given the nature of the highly competitive potato industry, which I am sure hon. members are aware is a major contributor to the Prince Edward Island economy, it is essential that Island shippers are able to meet stringent market demands in terms of quality of product and delivery time. Island shippers have been experiencing difficulty in obtaining sufficient equipment, both insulated boxcars and piggyback units. The potato industry is most optimistic this year, after three disastrous years, and early movements, particularly by rail, attest to this fact.

It is essential that Canadian National provide the Island, this year and in the future, with sufficient equipment to move the potato crop. The federal government cannot afford to neglect this important aspect of Prince Edward Island's transportation and economy.

I want to touch briefly on a matter which I have already mentioned in reference to rail service, and it is with regard to the highways on Prince Edward Island and in the other two maritime provinces. As a means of achieving greater uniformity in trucking regulations, Transport Canada and the Atlantic provinces undertook a cost-shared, primary highway upgrading in 1977. The first phase of this program was completed over a period of three years, and the maritime provinces—Newfoundland is negotiating separately—are seeking federal funding to proceed on the same cost-sharing basis with phase 2 of the program.

To further the federal objective of achieving greater uniformity of trucking regulations, it is necessary that the federal government and the Department of Transport continue cost-sharing the highway strengthening program begun in 1977 with the maritime provinces. The minister should take immediate steps to provide funding for the second phase of this vitally important program so that the maritime provinces can resume construction.

The quality of transportation within Prince Edward Island is an important factor in determining whether Islanders are willing and able to live in the rural areas of the province. The importance of the paving and maintenance of Island roads cannot be too strongly emphasized. Prince Edward Island depends on the cost-sharing arrangement with the federal government so that its roads can continue to be reconstructed and upgraded. I hope the federal government will choose not to disappoint us in this respect, as it has on other transportation issues.

I would like to dwell on an aspect of the marine transport system which affects Prince Edward Island greatly, and that is the ferry service linking the Island to the mainland of Canada. The ferry system provides a vital link to Prince Edward Island. Ferry travel should cost no more than travel over a similar distance on the Trans-Canada highway. The cost of travelling on the ferries should be the same as it would cost an ordinary person to travel nine miles by car on a section of the Trans-Canada highway. Therefore, it appalls me to think that right now Treasury Board is considering a Transport Canada recommendation to increase most maritime ferry fares by an average of 12.5 per cent. I am even more appalled by the fact that neither the provincial government of Prince Edward Island nor any interested Island organizations were given the opportunity to review the Canadian Transport Commission recommendations and decision concerning ferry rate increases.

Many Island industries and Islanders depend entirely for their livelihood on the marine transportation links to Prince Edward Island. Prince Edward Island's tourism industry, in particular, is directly affected by ferry rate increases; in excess of 50 per cent of the visitors to Prince Edward Island come from the Atlantic region. Any additional ferry rate increase at this time would make travel to Prince Edward Island an additional hardship within a region of Canada that now has more than its share of regional economic disparities.

The tourism industry is a major one in Prince Edward Island, and about half of the traffic that comes to the Island comes by ferry. Tourism has received inequitable treatment over the past years relative to ferry rates when compared with other segments of Prince Edward Island's economy, and any unilateral rate increases at this time would further compound the inequities. Tourism is a major industry on Prince Edward Island and is labour-intensive, which is the type of industry the Island and Canada need because of the major unemployment problem throughout the country today. Increasing ferry rates would do a great injustice to the economy of Prince Edward Island as it would have an inflationary effect which would hurt all sectors of the Island economy.

I have in my hand a telex, dated today, which was sent to the Minister of Transport. It is from Don Reid, the president of the Tourism Industry Association of P.E.I. He starts out by saying:

Dear Mr. Minister:

Your telex of March 13, 1981, leaves little doubt that it is the intention of Transport Canada to proceed with ferry rate increases not having truly taken into consideration the strong objections of the members of this major industry in Prince Edward Island.

He goes on:

To say it is regrettable that rate changes could not be dealt with earlier is somewhat absurd, considering the fact that CN Marine had submitted rate proposals as early as July 1980, and no consultative action was taken with this major industry and, to the best of our knowledge little if any consultation was conducted with the provincial government or CN Marine—

To say that bus tours or the distribution of schedules would not be unduly affected is as good as calling the major bus carriers and CN Marine fly-by-nite operators who do not have to budget for their operations.

The telex is rather long. I will dispense with reading all of it, and go to the last paragraph:

We again urge you and your colleagues to forgo the application of any changes in ferry rates to P.E.I. and immediately commence serious discussions with the appropriate government departments, carriers and industries for the 1982 season and beyond.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gass: If the federal government insists on going ahead with ferry rate increases, it could at least afford affected parties an opportunity to discuss, negotiate and present objective concerns. There must be consultation between the federal government, tourist operators and others affected by an increase in ferry rates. But then again, this government does not place a very high priority on consultation, does it? I hope the Minister of Transport will ensure that ferry rates do not increase until such time as a complete review has taken place, and all sectors of the Island economy are afforded ample opportunity to present their views on the matter.

Before I leave the question of ferries, I would like to comment on another aspect of the Prince Edward Island ferry system where the federal government is again dragging its heels. The report of Transport Canada's Prince Edward Island-mainland transportation study, released in 1976, recommended that a new 150-car vessel be placed in service between Wood Island, Prince Edward Island, and Caribou, Nova Scotia, by 1979. The proposed vessel would greatly reduce the intolerable congestion at the ferry terminals and thus would help eliminate one of the worst barriers to the continued development of the Island's basic industries. It would also substantially increase the efficiency of the Wood Island-Caribou ferry operation as the ratio of vehicle capacity to crew members would more than double. It is now 1981 and there is no new ferry. When will the minister heed the recommendation of his department and proceed with the construction of the required new ferry?

Prince Edward Island's other link to the mainland is through its air service. At this time we who live on the Island are waiting for the start of construction of a new terminal building for the Charlottetown airport, and we have been waiting for a very long time. The Charlottetown airport redevelopment has become a matter of considerable concern to Prince Edward Island. There have been conflicting reports and controversy regarding this project, as well as a lack of good communications.

Three years ago, the federal and provincial governments reached an agreement on the building of a new airport for Prince Edward Island. Construction of a new terminal and related projects was to begin in September, 1978, at a cost of $21.5 million. Shortly after this agreement was reached, Treasury Board ordered that the size of the proposed airport terminal be reduced, to save $1.5 million. The federal government then proceeded with plans to design a scaled-down airport terminal building, with a second and separate control tower. The airport was to be expandable as the need might arise.

The people of Prince Edward Island have waited long enough for their badly-needed new airport terminal building. The prolonged delay in the construction of the new terminal building since the federal-provincial agreement was reached, not to mention the additional cost of the redesign ordered by the Treasury Board, has actually increased the cost of the project rather than reduced it. In the past, the Liberal government wasted hundreds of thousands of dollars on a constant patching up and extension of the present terminal facilities. This is another indication of the inefficiency of the Department of Transport. In the meantime, the deplorable congestion at the old terminal has worsened to the point that the airport can no longer meet current needs, much less keep up with the increase in passenger usage and cargo handling which is projected for the future.

As the gateway to Prince Edward Island for many visitors, the existing wartime-vintage airport is nothing less than a disgrace to our province. I sincerely mean that. Municipal airports in many small communities across Canada provide better facilities than our own on Prince Edward Island. Yet our airport is required to serve an entire province, not just one municipality. The continued postponement and delay in proceeding with the terminal building component of the Charlottetown airport redevelopment project has inconvenienced the travelling public; it has prolonged the uncertainty with respect to transportation planning in Prince Edward Island; it has added greatly to the frustration of Islanders with respect to federal projects; and it has increased the cost to the taxpayer beyond what would have been the original cost had the project been pursued with dispatch.

There is also concern about the fact that Charlottetown is the only provincial capital that does not have provision for customs clearance at its airport, and there are no plans for such provision in the proposed new airport terminal building. This means that flights from outside the country, including charters from the United States, cannot land at Charlottetown. Prince Edward Island is losing potential tourists and tourist dollars because of this fact. Because there is no customs clearance in Charlottetown airport, Islanders who want to go out of the country cannot go directly from Charlottetown but have to go to Halifax, Montreal or Toronto for customs clearance.

We in Prince Edward Island should not have to settle for such second-class treatment at the hands of the federal government. Transport Canada should proceed without further delay with the construction of a new air terminal building. The Department of Transport should proceed in accordance with the design that was completed and agreed to in 1977. We on the Island need a well-equipped air terminal which will meet our needs for the foreseeable future and which will be a credit to our province, not a disgrace.

At noon today we met with Mr. Bill Rowe of Air Canada. He advised us that Air Canada will spend $68,000 on the terminal at Charlottetown as it is in such deplorable condition.

There is another issue with which I should like to deal briefly in the time remaining to me, Mr. Speaker. It concerns the reduction in the number of CN Express offices in Charlottetown. On January 30 I put a question to the Minister of Transport which is reported at page 6735 of Hansard as follows:

> My question to the minister is: will he now tell this House if the Express offices in Charlottetown and some other maritime centres will remain open and what level of service can be expected?

My supplementary question was as follows:

> —I would like to ask the minister how many of the 41 employees in Charlottetown will be allowed to retain their jobs.

The minister responded by saying that the figures would be repeated on Monday. On Monday nothing happened. Five days later, on February 4, my colleague the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan) asked the following question of the same minister:

> Will the minister tell the House how many CN Express employees will be kept in the two centres? Could he also tell the House what level of service will be maintained in those two Express terminals—

The minister's answer, in part, was as follows:

> The employment level will be at about half what it is now, that is 19 people in Charlottetown—

I have before me, Mr. Speaker, the contents of a letter which were related to me by telephone. On March 16, Mr. R. O. Waterton, the regional manager of CN Express in Moncton, sent a letter to Mr. MacPherson, the manager of CN Express in Charlottetown. A copy of the letter was sent to Mr. J. L. Diorio, general manager of operations for CN Express in Montreal. Mr. Waterton's interpretation of the agreement at CN Express Charlottetown is that it provides for about 19 jobs, consisting of the 14 established positions, including the manager, with five spare and relief. The five spare and relief are to cover all operations under the union agreement, including the Servo-Centre, the Enter-Model, which is piggyback, and the maintenance shop. It would therefore appear that there are not 19 positions, since 14 is not 19. The minister has not fulfilled his commitment made in this House on February 4, 1981, as recorded at page 6874 of Hansard, when he said that there would be 19 positions in Charlottetown.

I conclude by saying that the people in P.E.I. and the people at CN Express are terribly disappointed that the minister has not fulfilled his promise.

• (1730)

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I want to express my congratulations to you on being elevated to the Chair. By way of explanation, this is my first opportunity to do so. As a colleague from the province of New Brunswick, I am delighted in the choice and I wish you well.

[Translation]

I want to extend my congratulations to you and to wish you well in the discharge of your duties.

[English]

I wish to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) who I am sure laboured long hours to prepare this list of nine detailed and complex items relating to transportation, specifically in Atlantic Canada. It affords me an opportunity to speak at length with regard to all aspects of transportation, not only in the Atlantic region, and to refer specifically to problems in the northern part of New Brunswick.

Before dealing with some of those problems, I want to respond to some of the remarks by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass). While we have only had the opportunity of observing that member in recent times, I found it strange that he was not thankful for the funds directed to his province by the federal government which, on close examination, are substantial. That province with a population of 120,000 enjoys approximately 80 cents on the dollar of federal money transferred to it for all its operations, not to mention the dollars spent by Transport Canada and CN Marine which provide first class ferry service, comparable to that anywhere in Canada and in many other countries.

On many occasions I have used that service to take my family for our annual vacation to beautiful Prince Edward Island. I have personally utilized the ferry service from Tormentine to Borden. The equipment and the service provided cannot be criticized. I realize the hon. member for Malpeque is from that province and was expressing his concerns, but I should point out the seriousness on the part of this administration in putting a substantial number of federal dollars into the CN ferry service between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Another point that could be flagged is the fact that the hon. member for Malpeque did not enlighten us as to why all these things were not done when his party was in government. There was equal opportunity at that time for the then minister of transport and his cabinet colleagues to do what he complained of this afternoon. I did not think it wise to allow those comments to go by without referring to the fact that the present administration has consistently placed high priority on the matter of transportation.

Where would Atlantic Canada be without Transport Canada? I am sure the hon. member who introduced this motion on behalf of the official opposition has thought over this question for many years. He is one of the benefactors of the many millions of dollars transferred to the Atlantic region in one form or another, whether in the general transfer payments, contained in the main estimates in transport or in some other way.

I agree we cannot expect to have progress without a positive policy to develop all aspects of transportation in Atlantic Canada. We certainly have not reached the time when we can move away from that position and turn our backs on transportation. The Atlantic region is still in the very important developing stage.

In relation to the first item in the motion regarding regional development, I wholeheartedly endorse the need to continuously allocate funds within the budget to developing transportation, surface, water and air. We are no different from any other part of Canada; we are no different than any other region when it comes to those needs.

In the province of New Brunswick we have had a sad experience with the present provincial administration regarding the fairness of planning, the strategy of developing priorities and allocating funds to this very important matter. That administration cannot expect the handout of federal funds forever. If they have not already received the message, let me make it clear this afternoon. If they do not mature in their thinking and realize that this cannot be permitted to continue in the fashion it has over the years, they might well find themselves in the position of having to find other ways and means to prop up and finance some of their pet projects in that province.

If the Premier of New Brunswick and the transportation minister there do not soon get their act together, they will not only be behind the eight ball, but they will be so far out of touch with reality in this country in terms of transportation it will not be funny. I know of what I speak. We have been dillied and dallied and nickeled and dimed to death by the premier and his advisers and those responsible for transportation with regard to building the important section of Route 11, not to mention highway No. 17.

Mr. Forrestall: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As has been necessary once before today, I might remind the Chair that there is such a thing as relevancy. We are not debating the merits or otherwise of the government of Richard Hatfield. We are dealing with federal policies and actions respecting transportation in Atlantic Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) has made his point. The Chair was listening attentively to the remarks of the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail). Although he may have been stretching the rule of relevancy to its greatest extent, it is the Chair's opinion it was done within the wide confines of this subject matter. Having heard the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, the hon. member for Restigouche should attempt to return to the central subject being discussed today.

Mr. Harquail: Of course, Mr. Speaker, you have just justified my congratulations to you in demonstrating your ability in the chair, but let me remind the hon. member through you that he placed it as item number one in his preamble leading into the motion we are considering today. What could be more pertinent to the subject we are debating.

Item one talked about regional economic development and that is what I am speaking about, at this particular moment, in relation to the dastardly attitude of the present administration of that province who, on the one hand, are very happy to come, on some occasions hat in hand, asking for these millions of dollars through DREE, through transportation policies, for the strengthening of highways, yet the minute they get the money in their grubby little hands you cannot find them or see what they are doing. They are so far away from the agreements, I can only re-emphasize the seriousness of it, that I wonder just exactly what decisions would flow from a serious investigation into where these funds have gone over the last ten or 15 years.

When I talk about funds, I am talking about over $100 million of taxpayers' money which has gone into that particular province, yet the job is far from finished. I am sure you will understand and appreciate why I take a moment to touch on this question. I am also taking advantage of this opportunity, as it is my responsibility representing as I do the constituency of Restigouche in this House, to say something regarding my dissatisfaction with the way those funds have been handled in the past and about my concern as to the way they will be handled in the future.

I do not know about others, but I am personally convinced by what I have said this afternoon that I have made the point quite clear so I will not spend too much more time on that. While I could probably speak for an hour to an hour and a half on the sad tales of woe regarding the negligent administration, as I call it, of those funds we have been so generous in transferring to that particular province, all I am going to say now is that I want to see that section of Route 11 between Belledune and Charlo complete without any more hanky-panky. I want to see the completion of that important sector of route 17 from St. Léonard down through Campbellton which has also been fiddled and nickeled and dimed and played with for the last ten to 15 years. The people are just simply fed up with it and through you, Mr. Speaker, I am going to invite and enjoin the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to personally look into this and apprise himself and his officials of what has happened in the past with the hope that when we negotiate strengthening of highways and the matter of new construction and consideration of the general development agreement and any other subagreement relating to highways, or any other development money from the national government to that province, he will watch that development with a very close eye. I would like to seek his assurance that he will personally take a hand in making sure that these funds will be spent where they are specifically allocated.

Having remarked on the question of highways, I want to now turn to the question of ports. As I mentioned earlier, I do not know what we would do in Atlantic Canada without Transport Canada and I like to say thank you when it is due. I want to express words of appreciation to the minister for all that has been done for us in recent years, specifically since he has become the minister, in terms of his personal concern. This is not only a verbal concern, for I know the work he is putting into this problem, on all aspects of transportation in that region; but I am also convinced it is almost a monumental task for one man to try and find the answers to all of these questions. To be able to negotiate the funds from the treasury benches and his colleagues in cabinet is no small task and I want to publicly assure the minister of my support for the negotiations that will have to go on until we find all those dollars so vitally necessary for us to even say we have arrived at a point where we can come to a fair comparison of what is going on in central Canada and, indeed, in western Canada.

Just to comment, Mr. Speaker, when you hear what I would call in some cases foolish talk about the attitude in western Canada, we know it is a very small percentage of people who are playing the Lougheed game of more gain for that particular province. When you look at the budget and see the commitment of this government, the billions of dollars that are going to be spent out there, a large part of it with respect to transportation, I do not think they have anything to cry about at all, especially when you consider some of the problems we have in the Atlantic area. If we could just get a balance in the money spent in the west with that spent in the Atlantic provinces, I would say we would be a pretty fair distance down the road of not only addressing our problems but, indeed, of solving some of them.

When I look at the figure of $2,252,000 in National Harbours Board for the very important port of Belledune in my constituency, and I look at the $231 million being spent in Montreal, and there are others such as Vancouver and Churchill, I think that very rapidly makes my point about equality and balancing in the budget, and about finding the necessary dollars to put into facilities and equipment in order to keep up with the modern demands on a port such as Belledune.

Now, these things do not happen by themselves. Not too long ago I had a meeting with the president of that "C" class corporation, Pierre Franche, and others, who have given me a breath of hope. We are talking about the whole question of ports policy raised by the hon. member in this motion today, the need to get on with the ports policy and all the rest of it. There is no question about that, and we know some of the positive effects that will come from the opportunity to debate this in the House, because the fragmented legislation and inconsistent administration in each of the existing situations inhibits the development of a national and regional ports policy and planning, and prevents local participation in the operation and management of national harbours boards. Certainly we want to clear that up as quickly as possible, get the input of local people, address the problems and get on with solving them.

There is no question in my mind that we must have co-operation in this House in order that we can bring forward appropriate legislation, when the minister has the opportunity, to put in place a modern approach to finding solutions to these problems. However I want to make it clear about the facilities at Belledune which has sometimes been referred to as a port that has ice problems; certainly in the last five to eight years that has not been so. I would term it as an ice-free port and it needs, and I underline "needs", more funds if it is to be utilized to its maximum. Of course, we all await the study that is coming out on the ports of Dalhousie and Belledune, which we hope will bring forward the appropriate recommendations to substantiate our case regarding the funds needed to develop both those important deep water ports; in the case of Dalhousie, some 36-foot draft, in Belledune's case some 30-foot draft, and in recent times being used more and more each year. But that is not enough. We must be aware of the increasing demands which are being made on those ports. We must make our case well if we are to get funds.

In the short time available today I hope there will be an opportunity to discuss questions respecting CN and the whole matter of CN Express, about which Your Honour and the minister will know I am not happy. I am not happy about lay-offs and the cutting back of that service in my constituency. I hope subsequent reports brought forward by the Standing Committee on Transport will be concurred in so that we might debate the global, comprehensive and complex question of the present situation regarding CN and where CN will be going over the next five or ten years.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, when I came to this House initially at the pleasure of my constituency, I had hoped it would be my pleasure to find that Atlantic provinces members, and particularly New Brunswick members, would serve their province and their region in a fashion comparable to the way in which the west has been accustomed to being served by its members. With a degree of unanimity there has been a common presentation of western requirements by all parties in that region of Canada. I find it most disappointing to have listened to my colleague from New Brunswick saying little, if anything, for Atlantic Canada and virtually nothing for New Brunswick. As he arrived at the close of his remarks he did become somewhat sympathetic to Belledune, and he mentioned a very pertinent figure, namely, that $200 million were to be spent at the port of Montreal. I think the hon. member himself has put the emphasis on the problem which Atlantic transportation has experienced, and for that I thank him.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I did not quote a figure of $200 million to be spent. To clarify for the hon. member and for the record, I was referring to financial operations as per Treasury Board expenditures at various ports, and I did mention that the total figure was $231,157,000 relating to the operations over a period of time at the Montreal airport, but I certainly was not, as the hon. member suggested, announcing—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. I should remind the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) that that, of course, is debate.

Mr. McCain: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I thought I was listening quite attentively, and if I misheard the hon. member, I apologize. However, he was talking in terms of hundreds of millions of dollars which are to be spent.

Now we come down to the situation in Atlantic Canada where we find that the port of Saint John is being advised that it must operate on a user-pay basis. We are also advised that the port of Montreal can never exist on a user-pay basis and that with the present amount of expenditure at that port they cannot see the day when user-pay can ever be applied in Montreal.

I appeal to members from New Brunswick to say to this government that it is this government's responsibility not to put user-pay in the port of Saint John, the port of Halifax or any other port until all ports in Canada are capable of operating under that principle.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has not said the port of Montreal will not be on a user-pay basis, but I think he will agree with me that he has been advised by the officials of that port that there is no foreseeable date upon which the facilities at the port of Montreal can operate on a user-pay basis without serious detriment to the trade which would accrue to that port.

Mr. Pepin: It already does.

Mr. McCain: Under circumstances which apply to no other port in Canada it appears to do so. It appears to do so. By virtue of sale of lands and accumulation of other assets, that no other port in the history of Canada has experienced, it has a cash backlog from which it can draw, and on that basis it appears to be operating on a user-pay basis, but on the actual cost of the facilities at the port of Montreal it is not. Each and every report of the Harbours Board of Canada illustrates that in the actual tonnage handled, if charged to the capital cost of the port of Montreal, it is not operating on a break-even or anything like a break-even basis. The port of Saint John, the port of Halifax and the port of Belledune have no other structure under which to operate and, therefore, when we compare the port of Montreal with these ports we are not comparing equivalents.

However, there was one single item in the news not too long ago illustrating that a $30 million federal expenditure was to be undertaken at the port of Montreal. I appeal to the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) and the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne). This is in sharp contrast with the operational situation with respect to other ports in Atlantic Canada today. Provincial moneys are poured in to do this development; they are not poured in in the province of Quebec, and I ask for the support of hon. members. This should be turned around, and the facilities that are required should be supplied by the National Harbours Board through the Government of Canada.

Let me give one example of what has happened. The facilities at the port of Saint John were so overloaded that the Trucking Association of Atlantic Canada imposed a double charge because of delay in unloading caused by the facilities there not being able to handle the traffic Saint John can get. More facilities are needed for our trucking industry, for our lumber industry, for our agricultural industry, for our mining industry and across the board. We in Atlantic Canada want the same terms today that are being followed up the St. Lawrence River. We do not need any icebreakers. Give us the cost of icebreaking in Atlantic Canada on an annual basis and put some of it in Belledune. Put some of it in Dalhousie, some in Saint John and Halifax or wherever you like. If the Atlantic ports, including Belledune, had that money alone, they would be more than competitive with any structure which can be built in the St. Lawrence River fully at government expense. That is what I want by way of support from Atlantic members. You are complaining about spending $4 billion in the west for a multitude of purposes, including transportation. Why did you not as New Brunswick members extract—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. I must remind the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) that as an experienced parliamentarian he should address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. McCain: Through the Chair, why did these members from the province of New Brunswick not object to those expenditures then and extract something for New Brunswick?

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I did not interrupt the hon. member. If he has points of order or questions to ask in my limited time, why does he not be patient?

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I certainly defer to the hon. member's years of experience in the House, but he knows full well that during a debate if a comment is made to which an hon. member takes exception, that hon. member raises a point of order, and I want to correct what he said. I did not say I was complaining about the money being spent. I said that if we could just get a fair share of those dollars, we would appreciate it.

While I am on my feet, I want to thank the hon. member for his support of Belledune and Dalhousie.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): That again is debate, and I should remind hon. members not to unduly interrupt hon. members who have the floor.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, my statement stands. If the hon. member did not complain, why did he not get something? Why did members from Atlantic Canada not look after Atlantic Canada? Instead of referring to what is being done elsewhere, if hon. members opposite could not complain, could they not at least have put in a word?

I plead with all hon. members of this House to take cognizance of what the situation is in Atlantic Canada. Like many other commitments, one of the commitments prior to confederation was that the markets of Canada would be available to Atlantic Canada under competitive circumstances. That was part of the terms of confederation. That, of course, included transportation. Again I say that Atlantic Canada members should put their pressure together and exert it as a political force on this or any other government. There would be much more productivity in the field of transportation if the problem were recognized and addressed by all of us.

May I call six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. When the House rose at 6 p.m., the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) had the floor.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, in closing I should like to say the following respecting ports in eastern Canada. There has very obviously been an element of lack of consideration of the well-being of these ports. For instance, there has recently been a suggestion that an additional $1.66 should be charged as a new through-put charge in the port of Saint John, that it will apply at a latter date in the port of Halifax, and there is no indication as to whether or not it will ever apply in the port of Montreal. The policy does not reveal that this is discrimination.

I speak, Mr. Speaker, in a parochial sense, and I have to agree to that, but the year round ports of Canada should be considered to be the gateways of Canada to the world and planned for accordingly. They are gateways which Canada needs, and they must receive proper attention, whether they be in the north or the south of New Brunswick, whether they be in Nova Scotia or in Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: They are our gateways and they need the concern of the Minister of Transport. They should be given an equal break.

One other item to which I should like to refer is that mentioned by the hon. member for Restigouche when he referred to the slow progress in the construction of route No. 11. I ask him to make another speech at a later date, after he has read the initial agreement for the construction of route No. 11 undertaken jointly by the Government of Canada and the government of New Brunswick, and after he has read the revised agreement and the reduction in the cost shared by the federal government, so that he will understand, in part at least, why that road has not progressed at the speed he would desire. The reason is the sharp reduction in the cost-sharing responsibility of the Government of Canada.

The number of ways in which transportation serves Atlantic Canada is so great it is impossible to mention them all. I want to mention the town of McAdam. The town of McAdam had a veneer mill established with DREE money. That mill found it could not ship its product by rail to destinations in Canada for two reasons: uncertainty of delivery—and I would like the minister to hear this—and the excessive damage caused in transit. Neither the manufacturer nor the receiver could accept the damage. Why was that damage occurring? It was occurring because regulations have been ignored by the Department of Transport, shunting practices have changed on the railroad at the various new humpyards which are there, and the speed with which cars connect is excessive; so damage occurs. Therefore they were forced, whether they wished or not, to go to the road for transportation. This is rather ridiculous, especially when one is sitting in a railroad centre. It increased the cost of transportation, and it is one of the reasons the veneer mill, which was built at considerable expense to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, is very apt to close its doors on a permanent basis. That is how important transportation can be. What factor does it play? Are we in fact given the access to Canadian markets which confederation promised in 1867? The answer is: no, we are not.

Let me take a look at the potato industry. Some hon. members of the House are extremely familiar with the impact of transportation costs on that industry. It hits them in two ways. It hits them on the incoming costs of the requirements of the industry, whether it be fertilizer, machinery or repairs, and the service from that transportation industry is downgraded from what it was 40 years ago. The cost of the production of potatoes has very seriously increased. For instance, the massive increase in fertilizer freight rates had a major impact upon the cost of production.

Historically the soil of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island produced potatoes at a cost which made them competitive even in distant markets. They were competitive with the production of potatoes in central Canada. They were no more than competitive, but they were in the business. The increment in freight costs have been such that they have been removed, to an important degree, from being in a competitive position, in spite of land costs, skills, etc. This is not in conformity with the intention of confederation. Why can we not take a look at that?

I submit that the lumber, fishing and agricultural industries have been hurt seriously. If one picks up the paper, one sees where fresh fish marketing is impaired, where CN and CP Express are withdrawing and people are now removed 30, 40 or 50 miles from initial points of delivery of express and LCL freight terminals. This is an inconvenience; this is not the intention of the rail system. If one happens to have drag with a trucking company, one might get a package delivered quickly. But if one does not, and if one required a part in order to repair a piece of machinery in the county of Charlotte or the county of Carleton today, one would get into one's car or half-ton truck and go to Montreal to get it. One does not wait for today's transportation system to make the delivery. This is inconvenience which is certainly not in the best interests of Atlantic Canada or Canada as a whole.

I should like to turn to another item respecting ports. This affects the minister and his bailiwick of Quebec. Today the Government of Canada is dealing with a trade pact in the Pacific rim. It is negotiating a certain agreement that if a ship arrives at a Canadian port as the first port of call, then there will be a certain duty applied to the product being imported into Canada. But, if that ship makes a foreign port of call prior to its port of call in Canada, a higher rate of duty will apply. The Government of Canada is now negotiating to give away the first port of call priority. If this happens, the imports from Australia and New Zealand will probably take place on the Pacific coast or the Atlantic coast of the United States. Those imports will not be handled by our port crews on the east and west coasts of Canada, and, in turn, the exports will probably come down to that ship on one truck with the imports going back on the same truck to their destination in Canada. This represents an intrusion into the market opportunities of Canadian agriculturalists. We are talking of letting food in to take automobile parts out. I am told that is what the deal is all about. Not only will the farmer be hit with lower cost imports, they will be brought in through an American port, rather than Montreal, Saint John, Halifax or Vancouver. This is a very serious threat, not only to the farmer because of the threatened reduction in tariff on imported food, but to the port worker and people all over the country.

It is thoroughly and completely impossible to discuss all the items which need to be discussed with respect to this subject matter as far as Atlantic Canada is concerned. I suggest to the minister we should have a House committee which would have an opportunity to give some serious consideration to the representations of Atlantic Canadian people on behalf of the best interests of Atlantic Canada, its region and the nation of which it is proud. It cannot be done in any other way. How can any group of people properly discuss lumber, potatoes, fish, express, highway, trucking, sea and ports transportation in one day in the House of Commons?

There are people who are studying the problem at the moment. They are prepared to make presentations to the minister. In fact, they are coming to see the minister responsible for DREE, because there are threats to federal investment and to jobs in Atlantic Canada. There is a waste of federal money because of transportation policies which do not add to the developmental opportunities and leadership the government could offer to Atlantic Canada. We need that study in the worst way. I do not know for how long the committee could sit, but it should have the element of time and breadth of interest which would allow it to see what can be done. Can we develop the port, the drydocks, the harbour and shipping in Saint John? What about Halifax harbour, Belledune and Chatham? All these items are of major significance to eastern Canada. They cannot be discussed here, nor can the proper input be made.

I should like to refer to one personal example. Shortly after World War II, I built a little plant. I could not get the necessary machinery in New Brunswick, so I was advised to get it in Montreal or in the west. The reason was that there would be no parts for my machines in New Brunswick; they would have to come from Montreal or perhaps from the west. Up until 1960 to 1965, if a breakdown in the plant occurred, I could phone the supplier of that machinery in order to have that part delivered by rail. If I called as late as five o'clock in the afternoon it would be in my office at one o'clock the next afternoon. But if I owned that plant today and if a machinery breakdown occurred, my only hope of receiving the part in those hours would be to send my own vehicle or a specially-hired vehicle to St. Hyacinthe, Montreal or wherever the point may be, in order to get my plant back into business. I cannot, nor can anyone in New Brunswick, depend upon CP, CN, highway or any other transportation system to deliver as they used to deliver 20, 30 or 40 years ago.

This is what the debate is all about—excessive rates, discrimination against our ports, and failure to keep the agreement of confederation that the markets of Canada should be available at competitive prices to the products of Atlantic Canada. This is what the debate is all about. This is where the government has failed, and it is where maritime members have failed their regions. They will not support Atlantic Canada in an attack on the government to get the things they proclaim they want. We will help them.

• (2020)

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour, of course, at any time to participate in a debate in this House. I do so with a bit of sadness, particularly in view of the closing remarks of the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), wherein he suggested a committee be set up to study certain aspects of transportation in Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Forrestall: Use the Standing Committee on Transport!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I was just about to say that we have a standing committee of this House which, in my view, is ideally suited to study just that sort of matter. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that is probably what we should have been doing today instead of being involved in this debate, since we had a full day of meetings scheduled when suddenly there was to be a debate on transportation in the House. Thus, we are not in committee doing a detailed study of transportation.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The committee system of the House of Commons in its present session on estimates does not fit. I plead with the hon. member to let us have a session of the committee with time, not five minute sessions which will not do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): That, of course, is not a point of order, but a point of debate.

Mr. McCain: I agree.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte is anxious to continue this debate. I am also glad he is making a suggestion to make the committees of this House more effective. I am all for that. I think the committee is probably capable of accomplishing more, in terms of detailed work and detailed studies on transportation, fisheries, justice and whatever department you wish to take, than we are capable of doing as a whole House. We just do not have the time in the House to go into detail, nor can we call witnesses before the House as we can before the committee. I am all for making the committees effective. I hope we will see the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte from time to time in the transport committee to give us the benefit of his experience there.

I also want to comment on a couple of other points suggested by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte. I like his remark that we should all work together to develop certain items in Atlantic Canada. At first I thought he was serious but then he went on and I realized again it was political. He talked about the port of Saint John and the port of Halifax and how they are being discriminated against by the department and the government in relation to the port of Montreal. I think it is important to set the record straight. I think that what he was talking about, although I am not sure, was the announcement by the minister not too long ago that the federal government has taken a major step toward ensuring the growth of the port of Montreal by approving, in principle, the forgiveness of $133 million in principal and $98 million in interest arrears, being a total of $231 million.

What he failed to tell the House was that this was only part of a $475 million Canada-wide forgiveness of repayment of loans and interest in arrears for the National Harbours Board. At the time of his announcement the minister added that a consultant was being selected to prepare a master plan study for the port of Montreal to be decided upon soon by Treasury Board.

The hon. member also failed to mention that in that same announcement there was announced the forgiveness of $65 million for the port of Halifax, $45 million for the port of Saint John and $2.5 million for the port of Belledune. The ports of Vancouver and Montreal are capable of financing new capital projects from their own returned earnings, which makes them quite different from the remaining ports in the National Harbours Board system, for instance, Prince Rupert, Churchill, Quebec, Trois Rivières, Port Colborne and especially the port of St. John's. Halifax, Saint John and Belledune are able to go to the federal government for financing of special projects. In very recent times, for instance, the port of Halifax received about $29 million for the new Fairview Cove terminal. The port of Saint John will receive about $23 million in federal financing for the new potash terminal. One can see that it makes a difference when you present all the facts and not just selective ones.

I would also tell the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte that I am prepared to work with him toward the development of ports in New Brunswick, or for any project in New Brunswick, whenever I hear that he is willing to work with us on this side of the House for the development of the other half of New Brunswick, that half of New Brunswick to which the government of New Brunswick does not attach much priority. For instance, will the hon. member support us in persuading the government of New Brunswick to spend the provincial budget fairly? I am surprised he had the nerve to comment on route 11 and to ask my colleague, the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail), to look at the original agreement for the construction of Route 11. That is the federal-provincial agreement and the present day agreement where he said we would find the cost shared by the federal goverment much less than that in the original agreement.

Let me tell you a little bit about that original agreement, Mr. Speaker. It was a very generous one, indeed, since the federal government was paying 100 per cent of the construction cost of Route 11 in the original statements. That was not the only matter, it was paying an additional 10 per cent of construction costs for engineering and the right-of-way purchase.

Mr. Forrestall: Do not tell me nonsense.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if Nova Scotia ever received a deal like that one, but New Brunswick did.

Mr. Forrestall: No, we did not.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): In fact, the government of New Brunswick was so little interested in getting that highway constructed it could not even do the engineering and design work fast enough to spend the money the federal government had designated. The federal government in the subsequent agreement, naturally, cut the cost-sharing because there was not any sharing before. It was just a give-away to the province. I did not object to that until the province started to play pretty blatant patronage with federal funds. Even defeated provincial Tory candidates could decide who was to do the work on those stretches of highway which were being built, despite the fact that the agreement stated hiring had to be done through manpower centres. The manpower centres were being ignored totally. In fact, in at least one case I know the manager of a manpower centre was threatened if he dared to interfere. The subsequent agreement called for an 80-20 split in the financing with the federal government still providing 80 per cent of the costs. I thought this was still a pretty generous gift from the Government of Canada to the government of New Brunswick. Of course this was done by the federal government since it recognized that transportation is a tool of economic development, despite what the motion before us today says. That was the only reason the federal government became involved with that highway. The latter agreements were reduced to a 75-25 split. The lion's share again coming from the federal government. I repeat, this was for a totally provincial responsibility.

How did the province of New Brunswick show its gratitude for receiving these funds? It diverted almost all provincial transportation funds away from that part of New Brunswick into other parts of the province. The minister of transportation for New Brunswick had the unmitigated nerve to tell a delegation from my riding—in fact he has told several delegations but I will only speak of one since I was a member of it—that if we wanted roads in our part of New Brunswick we had better get federal funding for it. He said he had no funds to make available.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Who said that?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Bishop said that, in my presence. That is the way the federal government was repaid for its efforts to construct reasonable highways which it saw as a tool of economic development for the northeast region of New Brunswick.

• (2030)

I am prepared to work with the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte for the development of New Brunswick when I see that he is committed to urge the Government, of which he was once a supporter, to treat all parts of the province fairly with provincial funds.

Surely if there is any validity to equalization in this country, if we are committed to that goal, and if the Government of Canada will give the government of New Brunswick large sums of money every year to equalize services and rates of taxation to a reasonable level in this country, then the wealthier parts of New Brunswick have some obligation to the poorer parts just as surely as the government of New Brunswick has an obligation to every part of that province, not only to those parts of the province from which it has elected members. I will fight for federal funds for any project in New Brunswick when I am convinced that the government of New Brunswick will apply those funds fairly.

Indeed, just last Friday morning I participated in the signing of an agreement for $37.5 million, which was a joint federal-provincial agreement for forestry development in New Brunswick.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What did you do at the ceremony?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I did enough. Thirty million dollars of that $37 million came from the federal government. That was a fairly generous agreement, but it does not come under the topic of transport, so I will not dwell on it.

There are a couple of other points in this motion I want to deal with, but I want to say that the first part which condemns the government and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) for abandoning the use of transportation as the tool of national and regional economic development is patently not correct.

The Department of Transport is a big department and a rather cumbersome monster, as I am sure the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) would admit. However, I am aware of various instances when the Department of Transport did respond with some alacrity and sympathy in situations that were critical. I have seen it happen under this minister and under the hon. member for Vegreville. In one case in my riding which dealt with the wharf at Chatham, the minister did act very quickly and I now thank him for this publicly. I do not believe the Department of Transport or the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) always deserve all of the criticism they receive.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): MacEachen should get a bit, too!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): They seem to be everyone's whipping boy.

Let me move on to some of the other areas I want to touch on today. We have been asked to bring in additional legislation in this motion. I am very much in favour of that, particularly as it would relate to a maritime code, the new ports policy, and other aspects of marine transport such as coastal shipping. I would like to see that legislation before the House. I know some of it is ready and that other parts are in the preparation stage. But as long as we have a filibuster in this House on the resolution which is now before it, we will not be able to deal with those other pieces of legislation. Therefore I would urge my colleagues, particularly the official opposition, to abandon its filibuster in the House, to abandon this delay of legislation. Let us get on with the job of dealing with the necessary pieces of legislation from Transport, from Justice, from Finance, from Health and Welfare, from Energy, Mines and Resources, from most other departments, as well as from Environment, which is another very important department. We have a very drastic need, in this country, for some of those pieces of legislation, but they are all being delayed because of a filibuster.

We heard from the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass) a little earlier who described the awful situation in P.E.I regarding ferry service and transportation in that province. I was glad my colleague, the hon. member for Restigouche pointed out that the ferry service to P.E.I is actually very good, having improved very markedly in the last few years. My good friend, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) spoke of the profit CN Marine trade is making. Last year it had a book profit of some $8 million. However, that profit was as a result of revenue amounting to $25,137,000 in subsidy alone granted to the ferry service to Prince Edward Island. Altogether, in 1980, ferry services received $136,431,000 from the federal treasury. Without that, there would have been a rather huge deficit. With all of the doom and gloom we have heard here today, the federal government is doing quite a lot for the united provinces.

From time to time I complain to the department and to the minister, but sometimes when a government or a minister is doing something good we should say so. If we are always going to cry "wolf", we may turn into wolves.

As I said, the ferry service alone received over $12 million in federal subsidy in 1980. That is about $235 for every man, woman and child on Prince Edward Island. I am not suggesting it is only the residents of Prince Edward Island who use that ferry service; it is not. There are other residents of Canada and other countries who use it. It is certainly the road link to the nation and plays a very important part. It must be maintained and improved whenever there are opportunities to improve it. It is a good service and we should continue to improve it, not just knock it.

I would now like to discuss regional air carrier services. There is a bit of fetish in this country which leads one to believe that unless one is flying by jet, one really is not flying. As I know the minister is interested in regional air carrier service, I would urge him to seek a rationalization of the regional air carrier policy in this country, particularly as it applies to Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You can't fly on one wing.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): We have a good carrier in Atlantic Canada, Eastern Provincial Airways. Of course it has a problem with cash flow, and of not having sufficient equipment. The difficulty is we do not have good rationalization of routes. We have routes such as the one to northeastern New Brunswick, which might be termed a dead end route, as it flies Montreal-Charlo-Chatham-Montreal; and if you want to fly to Halifax from Charlo or Chatham you must first fly to Montreal. That is not very satisfactory service. I would urge upon the government and the minister to get after the Canadian Transport Commission to come up with a rational plan for regional air carrier service.

We need intercity service, but we do not need 737s or DC-9s flying from Moncton to Halifax, from Halifax to Charlottetown, or from Charlo to Fredericton or to Saint John. We need smaller aircraft with more frequent flights so that the air service will, in fact, be a service to the people of the Atlantic provinces making interprovincial communication by air possible and readily available to the people of Atlantic Canada.

● (2040)

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to speak tonight of all nights. I do not want to trespass too far on the patron saint whose name I bear—

Mr. Knowles: I thought you were St. Patrick himself!

Mr. Nowlan: I am very saintly anyway, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) reminds me. I do not want to get into the total philosophy of the saint from the emerald isle tonight, however.

I listened with interest to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) this afternoon, Mr. Speaker. I believe he is a very humble man, and certainly in terms of transportation policy he has much to be humble about. He is also a decent, philosophical person.

I had intended to speak later tonight, Mr. Speaker; I thought I might be the garbageman who would clean up, if I were called upon. What disturbed me most about the summary the Minister of Transport gave of the motion presented by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), was the lack of any zest, energy, enthusiasm, or challenge about something that is of fundamental importance to those of us who are on the periphery, especially those of us from the Atlantic region, from the northern part of the country or from the west.

The motion quite property zeroed in on the problems of Atlantic Canada. I give some credit to the minister and the government, because, after all, no one government has all the answers. As one federal minister of transport said not too long ago, transportation is in a mess. The very structure of our country has been based on transportation. As the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) said, perhaps we are overdealing with constitutionalitis to the point that in many areas of endeavour there is a form of governmental constipation because of that constitutionalitis and we are not directing our attention to the many factors and areas in this country which need attention. The government is aware of that; it sets the agenda. The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) was government House leader not too long ago and he knows from his experience that the government lays its agenda on the table of this House and the opposition responds to it. If there is a constitutional resolution before the House and the government insists that debate carry on day after day, then naturally it will.

There are other items of importance in the country, however. That is why we in the opposition have taken the opportunity today in this limited type of debate, which fortunately ends in a vote tonight, to focus attention on something that is of fundamental importance. Without getting into the Latin, the reason this is a country from sea to sea is that the CPR formed the western link that made us an entity from sea to sea.

If this matter were not so serious I might use a stronger word than ironic, and say it is rather paradoxical that as we contemplate our navels to determine what we are and where we are going as a nation in terms of the Constitution, the factors that helped make this country great, such as transportation, go for naught. They get shifted aside.

That is what disappointed me when I listened as objectively as I could to the Minister of Transport this afternoon. Point by point he answered the matters raised in the resolution presented by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East. I will not make a rebuttal to his reply because that is not my point at the moment. My point is that I cannot think of any more exhilarating challenge in government than to be minister of transport in the country at this time. Instead of using statistics to show that so many dollars were spent here and some work was done on a seaport there, I had expected something more like a vision. I know the Deputy Prime Minister has heard about visions before, from the late right hon. member for Prince Albert so he may be a little gun-shy of visions. But perhaps we do not talk enough about visions in this House and maybe the night of St. Patrick is not a bad time to talk about them. I do not mean the visions that cause all the problems in Ireland, but rather, visions for this country.

We need a larger vision than was evident in the minister's remarks today. His recital was pedantic, mechanical and, for him, unemotional. Any minister worth his salt, and this minister used to have salt, would get very emotional about this subject.

The minister was right in some of the things he said about Air Canada. We do have different planes now. I can remember, as I am sure the Deputy Prime Minister can, when we used to take the Viscount from the maritimes to Ottawa. The Deputy Prime Minister will remember that to get off the island of Cape Breton, before the causeway was built it was almost necessary to row a boat across the strait to the mainland. Then it took eight or ten hours to fly from Halifax to Ottawa. Now we have the benefits of modern technology and jet planes. Of course, the Minister of Transport does not take credit for all of this. We still cannot fly to New York direct from Ottawa. I am really speaking now about Atlantic area transportation and certainly we can fly much more easily today from Ottawa to Halifax than in the old days. That is to the credit of everyone concerned. But all the problems of this new advancing age have not been solved. The government does not like to admit that there is something called oil and gas. That is dirty stuff developed by these penurious selfish companies which are bleeding Canadian taxpayers to death.

I was very interested this afternoon when the minister rationalized about the icebreaking service and told us to worry about icebreaking on the St. Lawrence and the Gulf because all his experts say the cost of $17 million breaks down to $1.60 per ton and, really, that is not so much. I think the minister should ask his colleagues in cabinet, especially the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), to look into this matter a little further. In that most slanted seven-volume report, published after an eight or ten-year study of the oil and gas industry, there is mention of extra charges over a period of ten-years amounting to $12 billion. Yet apparently the government cannot lay charges against the industry. I am informed by people who know the industry better than I that on the basis of the 35 gallon barrel, taking a ten-year period, the overcharging could be broken down to something like one-third of a cent per gallon.

When the minister tries to rationalize the cost of icebreaking services in the Gulf, I should like him to remember what the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said about the oil companies.

In his own inimitable way the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) justified what the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) said, that in terms of Atlantic Canada—and hon. members from Atlantic Canada including yourself Mr. Speaker, will appreciate this—unless we become more strongly Atlantic Canadians rather than partisan politicians, some of the basic problems which have existed almost since confederation will not be resolved. The Minister of Transport gave us a recital of statistics this afternoon. To give him his due, certain things have improved but I think he must accept the challenges that lie on the threshold and he must talk about them.

I am not happy to listen to the statistics of the past when I know that in the future Dome Petroleum will go offshore to buy the new icebreaking barges to go into the north, and those jobs and that industry will go to Korea or Japan. As an Atlantic Canadian, regardless of how you rationalize it, we thought part of our future was container ports. Almost overnight it is unilaterally being shifted in large measure from Halifax to Montreal. I do not have anything against Montreal, but when the history of this time is written, and this comes very close to the background and heritage of the Deputy Prime Minister, it will be said that Atlantic Canadians were not small Canadians when the seaway was to be built. We knew it was in the best interests of the country even though there would be some problems.

Once the decision was made by the government, and it happened to have the same label of government that is now in power, problems started with Sydney Steel. The iron ore came from Sept Îles, Ungava and the heartland, and there was not a refitting of the steel mill in Sydney. Some of my predecessors on this side said that was the demarcation of the decline of Sydney Steel. In like fashion we on this side are concerned when we see the Dart Containerline traffic that was supposed to be the base of the new Halifax port activity, unilaterally shifted to Montreal with a tangled corporate web involving Crown corporations and/or federal help in order to keep the St. Lawrence seaway open. That does not make us happy.

When we look to the future there is something else we talk about in this House. The Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance was supposed to help with the financing, but so far there has been no commitment whatsoever in terms of the future of Atlantic Canada. I refer to the pipeline extension east of Quebec City. This will come back to haunt the Minister of Finance. It will come back to haunt the Minister of Finance that Atlantic Canadians did not have the opportunity to make a bid on the LNG project between Gros Cacouna and the Strait of Canso, in the backyard of the Minister of Finance. It does not give us much hope for the future when the Minister of Finance is not prepared to exercise the weight of his office to get the National Energy Board to move on the whole operation. The Minister of Finance can smile, but I suggest it will be the smile of the proverbial cat that gave you parliamentary indigestion.

Mr. MacEachen: The minister is smiling because you are attacking him rather than the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Nowlan: I find it much easier to attack the Minister of Finance. Perhaps it is because we are compatriots from the old sod. Why I bring my colleague in indirectly, a man I get along with very well outside the House—obviously we have to object in the House from time to time—is because we are talking about Atlantic area problems.

We are not talking about transportation of the old days, the horse and buggy, the steam engine and the days of sail. Those days have gone out the window. We are talking about the new world and the new challenges which should excite the Minister of Transport, coming back to him; the new challenges that should give us real hope in Atlantic Canada. Quite frankly, we in that "have not" area are on the threshold of a real "have" situation if governments of all political labels, federal and provincial, will move in the right direction.

I repeat, the Dart situation came about overnight. We did not have a decision on the pipeline extension other than what was in the budget. It is supposed to be a committee of government. The government is not ensuring that the National Energy Board move on the whole hearing. To be fair, the federal government is not the only one at fault on the pipeline extension. I do not mind saying in this House I am not happy with the Premier of New Brunswick and the caveats he files on the extension of the pipeline. Let us not worry about the problems of nuclear energy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: My friend from Northumberland-Miramichi has croaked. I will be candid and admit that all the blame is not in one corner. If we in Atlantic Canada do not speak with a common voice about our common problems, we will be doing a disservice to those we represent, those who sent us here to represent them, regardless of party affiliation.

In the years I have been in this House it has bothered me that we do not have an all-party Atlantic caucus to deal with common problems. We cannot always agree. I realize the problems of government. In the brief time we were in government I did not agree with everything that was done. However, I think it is political negligence that we from Atlantic Canada do not meet once a year to discuss our common problems.

As a result of the fine work of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East we on this side have an Atlantic caucus which meets once a week. I do not know whether the same is true on the government side. We know they travelled around Atlantic Canada once about five years ago. As far as I am aware, that is the only time the government Atlantic caucus has ever met in Atlantic Canada to talk about the problems there.

An hon. Member: How about the west?

Mr. Nowlan: Well, they are twinning the west. Regardless of whether I sit on this side or the side of the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi, I am deeply concerned, when gas is in surplus and offshore oil is costing more every day, that we are not moving as a geographic entity, regardless of political stripe, to make sure the pipeline is extended. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised that in the 1979 campaign, although he did not say much about it in 1980, the pipeline should extend from coast to coast the same as the great transportation link which joined us together after 1867. That is what we are talking about.

Every member from Atlantic Canada should be disturbed about the bureaucratic mishmash and innate foot dragging there is in government, and I say "government" in the apolitical sense. Members are elected to stick pins in the backsides of bureaucrats, to get them off dead centre, off their seats. We try to get them to hold hearings, and not just in Ottawa. The National Energy Board now travels.

I do not accept the report of the National Energy Board. Members of Atlantic Canada should not accept the NEB report which tries to justify why it did not approve the extension of the pipeline. They said it was because of environmental studies and the fact that we might find gas off the Atlantic shore. Should those two reasons justify not going ahead with a link from coast to coast? If we do discover oil offshore, it will help central Canada. Some people might say I am attacking the National Energy Board. I will attack it when its report is before the proper committee. How can it say environmental studies are necessary in the area from Quebec to Halifax when there were no studies between Montreal and Quebec, yet it approved that extension? And I do not accept that double dealing and I must say that I did not appreciate—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order.

Mr. Nowlan: In conclusion I am glad to have had the few moments, too few, to bring some of these problems forward. I hope Atlantic Canadians will talk with one voice on common problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I certainly felt there could have been a few more minutes to wrap it all up, but it has been a very interesting evening so far, and I guess some of the very interesting comments were made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne). I particularly noted his comment on patronage, and from his remarks tonight I was very optimistic that recognition might be the first step to a cure.

There were comments tonight on the committee system as an appropriate method of dealing with transportation issues. I think a great many people in this House are finding that the committee system is not an effective way to deal with some of the problems that face this nation, particularly with the spending of billions of dollars in departmental estimates, or even in dealing with programs—some certainly have more success than others. I think by and large, however, with some of the reforms of the committee system suggested we may see a better transportation system in the country. I think there is an even greater potential for reform. In watching passage of this particular motion through the House tonight, I think the whole question of how we approach opposition days may be worth looking at.

The motion before us starts out by condemning the government and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), and then itemizes some very serious concerns affecting everyone in this House. I have spoken to government members, members of the official opposition and our own party who are concerned about many of the items. Unfortunately these motions are always condemned to defeat in advance. There are positive statements in this motion, but they are couched in such a way it can never succeed. That is unfortunate because I think some of the government members recognize many of the problems, and support some of the suggested solutions.

Although I suppose we are going to support this motion, I am reluctant to join in condemning the Minister of Transport. I may have felt a little differently early in my term, but I have found he is a person who is at least open and willing to discuss problems, in some cases more so than other members of the government. I certainly appreciate some of the things he has done there.

The point I am making is we had a very interesting debate on El Salvador and Central America Monday last, and I think many members of the official opposition, although they had difficulty supporting the motion the way it was drafted, supported the concept. I guess I am saying the same thing tonight. I wish the motion was couched in such a way that a positive outcome was possible with regard to the common problems we recognize.

With those comments I should like to move on to one aspect of transportation that concerns me, an aspect I think it is of vital concern to all Canadians.

I have spoken on this many times in the House and I know many others are vitally concerned with it. I refer to the whole area of marine transportation. Many people in this House recognize that the Department of Transport is a monster, containing as it does the air, marine and surface administrations. Basically it is so vital and so large there is a feeling that the department should be divided. On a number of occasions I have placed a number of questions and suggestions on the order paper that we appoint a minister of marine transportation. The other day in response to a question the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said he would give that concept consideration. I would like to make some arguments this evening as to why that should be done and done very quickly.

The issue of a Canadian merchant fleet has been debated many times in this House. Many members of the government, the loyal opposition, and the New Democratic Party, have on many occasions indicated support for this. If we look back we will see that Canada is about the tenth largest trading nation in the world. The goods we exported and imported in 1979 amounted to about $38 billion, of which 10 per cent, roughly $4 billion, can be related to the freight bill. In coming years we will be looking at increasing wheat shipments, but as the world converts from more expensive petroleum fuels to coal, we are going to see a massive development of marine transportation to haul that coal to those nations short of it from those that have it in abundance. Ports will have to be developed and, in short, billions and billions of dollars will have to be spent on marine transportation development.

After the world coal report was produced someone made the statement that there were not enough shipyards in the world to build quickly enough the vessels required to carry the volume of coal when we really begin to make that conversion by the end of the century. A Canadian merchant fleet is going to be a very important aspect of our marine transportation system. It is going to provide jobs for Canadians through crewing these vessels, jobs in building them and in allied industries, and it is going to place in Canada a technology that will, if we take the opportunity, make us world traders in ships and marine facilities. Basically what we have to do is look seriously at bringing a Canadian merchant fleet onstream very soon.

It is interesting to note the arguments, and there have been ten to 20 years of studies, as to why we do not have a merchant fleet. The government's policy for years has been that there is a large pool of surplus shipping in the world; it provides a cheap source of transport for Canadian goods on these flags of convenience ships using cheap labour, with very low safety standards and a variety of other cost-cutting methods, and that it has been a boon to Canada in supplying cheap transportation. However, I would submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is a hook in that and a very dangerous one. Shipyards in Canada are no longer capable, I would suggest, of building the kinds of vessels that would put Canada out front in carrying her own resources around the world, or at least a share of those resources. The capability is not there and what we have done by this very pennywise and pound foolish policy is place ourselves in very great jeopardy for the next few decades; maybe forever. I suggest, therefore, it is unfortunate that the resolution tonight was not couched in such a way as to make a positive statement about the development of a Canadian merchant fleet.

Another aspect of this suggestion about the appointment of a minister for marine transportation, given the task of developing a marine force for Canada and co-ordinating the efforts of government and industry to bring about this marine strategy in a way that would provide maximum benefits for Canada, is the business of offshore and Arctic development. The oil companies are now coming before the national resources and public works committee talking about their plans in the Canada lands area of Hibernia, off Sable Island, the Labrador shelf, the Beaufort Sea and the Arctic islands, and they are using some interesting figures. Dome talks about spending $40 billion on platforms for exploration, production and transportation of supplies in and the resource out. Mobil Oil was talking the other day about their activities off the east coast and it presented some rough and dirty figures. It was talking about $5 billion for marine platforms. Mobil is working with semi-submersible rigs and developing platforms to work on the sea bottom. When Mobil get into production they plan to spend roughly $5 billion over the next decade.

With respect to the offshore role of Gulf Resources of Canada, Gulf officials spoke the other day about approximately $5 billion for marine platforms. Gulf had not yet decided on technology; whether it would dredge up islands and plant their production facilities on those islands or go with more conventional marine platforms. However, they spoke about a quick $5 billion figure.

Officials of PanArctic Resources were here today. They are working in a number of areas, some of them on land. They are beginning to work offshore in very deep waters. One particular oil strike was at 1,100 feet. With respect to the projects in which PanArctic is involved with other companies, they are talking about $40 billion to $50 billion. This is projected between now and the 1990s. Some things are on the drawing board; some things are a reality. Dome Petroleum is considering delivering gas to Japan by 1986. It is considering delivering gas out of the Arctic pilot project by 1985. That is just a very short few years away.

The oil companies to which I have referred were asked what impediments they see to Canadians participating in building platforms for exploration, for production and for transportation. Every one of them indicated that there is a serious problem. First, the resource industry, government and the manufacturing industry which will be involved in providing maximization of benefits for Canadians, are not talking on a formal, regular basis to see that those works come to Canadian shipyards and allied industries. That is the first problem.

There seems to be a problem within the government itself. Various government departments seem to be developing a fragmented approach or are actually working at times at cross purposes. When there is an order of roughly $60 billion to $100 billion, we as Canadians cannot afford that kind of impediment.

The other impediment is that Canadian shipyards are not in a position to deliver. Let us go back for a moment to the case of Mobil Oil. Mobil went offshore for a drilling rig. It went to Canadian shipyards and said, "Can you build it?" Those shipyards said, "Sorry, we cannot; we are not set up to do it". A specific delivery date was specified, and Canadian shipyards could not do it. Work valued at $300 million went offshore.

Dome Petroleum entered into an agreement just a week and a half or two weeks ago. Dome Petroleum wants to spend $200 million on a barge. The barge is to be a floating drydock to work in the Arctic. Dome went to every Canadian shipyard and asked if this barge it wanted, made from 7,500 tons of steel, could be built in Canada. That would have been a very large project. Roughly 150 to 200 jobs would have been involved. Every Canadian shipyard was asked if there could be a delivery by June 1 because the Arctic window opens for only a short period of time. It is only open from roughly July 15 to September 15. If the barge does not go in then, it must wait a year. Some projects tie up $1 million a day for a year, and that money cannot be wasted. The Canadian shipyards invited to participate were asked for a June 1 delivery date. None of them could meet that date. Dome went offshore and found that no foreign supplier could do it, so the date was moved to September 1. Canadian shipbuilders still could not meet the date, but one offshore shipyard could. That barge is now being built in Japan.

Dome had the same problem with supply vessels for the Beaufort Sea. They are built in Louisiana. Apparently they have a very special design. There now is a need to acquire an icebreaking tug; a very large and powerful machine. This is on the drawing board. Strengthened hulls and huge motors are required, but delivering the motors at the time the hulls are built will require a two-year delay. This equipment is needed in the Arctic when the window is open. If Canadians cannot build it, that tug will be built offshore.

The moral of the story is that resource companies are not talking seriously enough with the shipbuilding companies. Government is not giving adequate or co-ordinated attention to the development of Canadian shipyards. Government is not facilitating developments in the Arctic.

Perhaps a way out of this particular dilemma would be to appoint a minister of marine transportation and to give such minister the task of developing a marine industrial strategy which would have the resources to co-ordinate and make sure that Canadians cash in as much as possible on that $60 billion to $100 billion Arctic development.

Who knows what merchant fleet development there might be when we start moving large quantities of coal out of this country? But without the necessary co-ordination many of these developments will go offshore. We will be supplying only the nuts and bolts for these massive platforms being built offshore.

There are other aspects of this which seem somewhat strange to someone standing outside and watching. It must certainly seem strange to some government members that the government uses a large number of marine platforms. The government spends a tremendous amount of money. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans is spending roughly $90 million on a new fishing vessel acquisition program. The RCMP has a fleet of vessels it uses in the delivery of law enforcement services at sea. The Department of Transport provides search and rescue services through the coastguard as well as icebreaking services and a host of other things. That department has a very large fleet. The Department of National Defence is developing a new frigate program as well as a destroyer life extension program.

From the information we have it appears to someone from the outside that there is a great deal of fragmentation in the way we are obtaining marine platforms. Each department has its own vessels. Each is building its own empire. This has created a great deal of fragmentation.

It strikes me that if the government is building all those vessels, whether they be new frigates for the armed forces, whether they be under a destroyer life extension program, whether they be fisheries vessels or RCMP vessels or whether money is spent on coastguard repair work or new construction, it should all be co-ordinated, not by way of awarding contracts to the lowest bidders, but through the development and enhancement of a Canadian marine industrial strategy.

Bill C-48 really is not strong enough to demand Canadian content, but subsidization and tax programs should all be brought together under a minister of marine transportation in order to create a marine industrial strategy for Canadians. This would be a tremendous project, and there is tremendous potential. That makes a great deal of sense to me and to many with whom I have spoken. We should not fail to do this. Mobil has already done it, Dome has already done it and every shipping company listed here and every carrier has done it.

I would like to run through some figures. They are not particularly important, but in 1976 roughly 100,000 tonnes of Canadian shipping were built offshore. In 1977, 164,000 tonnes were built offshore. In 1978, 67,000 tonnes were built offshore. In short, a tremendous amount of our shipping capability is being lost to other countries. Many of these ships are registered in other countries, and repaired in other countries.

I have dealt with our opportunities in the Arctic. I have dealt with the problems faced by companies which want to build their vessels in Canada. They cannot get Canadian shipyards to handle the work, so other countries are providing their ships. In the Arctic the Offshore Supply Association—which is a wholly-owned subsidiary of a German company, Preussag of Bremen—intends to register six of its 92 vessels in Canada so that they can work in the Arctic. I submit that those should not be supplied from West Germany, with returns going back to West Germany. Those vessels should be produced by Canadians in Canadian shipyards supplied by many other Canadian allied industries. This would provide an additional benefit.

I would like to complete my contribution to this debate tonight. I strongly suggest to the Minister of Transport and members of the government who are vitally concerned about this, whether they be from Atlantic Canada, from Quebec, from Sorel, from Lévis or from Montreal, that we need a minister of marine transportation. We need a marine industrial strategy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by saying how delighted I am to participate in this debate on a motion moved by the Progressive Conservative Party which calls on this House to condemn the failure of the government to deal adequately with national transportation problems. In our motion, we condemn my good friend, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), in particular, for:

1. abandoning the use of transportation as a tool of national and regional economic development;

2. allowing Canadian National Railways to totally disregard legitimate maritime business needs and close CN Express offices without adequate financial justification—

7. failing to bring before the House acceptable legislation dealing with a new national transportation act, ports policy, the maritime code, or coastal shipping;

There are other grievances.

My colleagues have contributed usefully to this debate on a variety of subjects. I am particularly glad my colleague from Prince Edward Island, the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass), has been able to participate and to deal with a number of issues of special import to my province and to the region in general.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I intend to focus almost exclusively on rail transportation, including all the various operations of Canadian National. I do so, not because I think air transport, shipping or highways are not important—in fact they are—but I think by concentrating on rail transportation I will be able to illustrate more clearly than in any other fashion two broad points. The first is that the government is almost totally insensitive to the problems and concerns of the Atlantic provinces, and the second is that the government is especially unaware of the importance of transportation to the economy of the region and to the quality of life there.

It must be remembered that the Atlantic provinces were not always poor, disadvantaged and destitute. At the time of confederation we were a fairly prosperous region. We were approaching a degree of self-sufficiency with strong trade ties, for example, with the northeastern tier states of our southern neighbours. In the 1860s, our region had a well-developed maritime shipping industry. Ours ranked fourth among the great merchant marines of the world, and this sort of enterprise spawned all kinds of industries beyond those particular ones, including a significant financial system which included about a dozen banks, two of which were the most substantial and stable in all of North America, not to mention insurance and marine companies.

Soon after confederation the situation turned dramatically for the worse. I would be the last member of the House to argue that confederation has not been good for the Atlantic provinces or for my province in particular. That is not the point of my message. I am saying, however, that despite many social and economic benefits from confederation, the policies of successive federal governments, particularly Liberal governments, consciously or subconsciously have favoured other regions of Canada at the expense of our own, especially central Canada. I might mention, for instance, the fact that high tariffs have consistently favoured the industrial heartland of the country, southern Quebec and Ontario, a policy which, whatever its merits in terms of developing the national economy as an independent force, involved the Atlantic region paying a very high price indeed. The national policy, as it was called, was begun in the early part of our history and was followed to the present. It is not an isolated example.

Nowhere is such a bias in favour of the central part of the country more true than in transportation. I think in that regard a historical perspective is vital to an understanding of the importance of transportation to the region and of the failure of national transportation policies to serve the region.

I want to skim over the history very briefly. But in doing so I stress, in particular, that Prince Edward Island entered confederation because of the firm commitment made by Canada—as it then was—to complete the P.E.I. railroad and to maintain it forever and a day. I have in front of me the Terms of Union between Prince Edward Island and the rest of Canada. They stress:

Efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers to be established and maintained between the Island and the mainland of the Dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion.

That was a firm commitment by Canada to provide P.E.I. with continuous rail service—not only to complete the P.E.I. railway but to maintain it. It was an article of faith as far as Islanders were concerned. The continued existence of the railway was something akin to an inalienable right.

After the P.E.I. railway was completed and, eventually, after the Intercolonial Railway in the Atlantic region was completed in the 1870s, the two railways were meshed and incorporated into the Canadian National Railways system around 1919. But, even though changes were made to the specifics of the arrangements so far as the railways were concerned, the fact remains that the commitment continues to this very day.

It is interesting to note that in August, 1973, there was a strike on Prince Edward Island in CN marine service, which effectively cut P.E.I. off from the rest of Canada for a period of time, to the great detriment of the local economy. P.E.I. then took the federal government to court, even as far as the Supreme Court of Canada, because it considered that strike to be a breach of the Terms of Union of Prince Edward Island in confederation. I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that P.E.I. won its case, which further confirms the very strong commitment the federal government has to our island province to maintain the railway connection. That commitment extends to the region as a whole, because the Intercolonial Railway was completed as a term of entry for the other maritime provinces into confederation. It was part of their confederation bargain. The Intercolonial was not set up as a profit-making enterprise; it was set up for the better interests of the region as a whole, even though that particular facility might incur a loss.

When the Canadian National Railways took over the Intercolonial Railway, as it did other parts of the railway system in Canada, to provide a country-wide system, such a commitment to continue railway service—and a minimal service at that, below which the region would not be allowed to fall—has never, so far as the courts have been concerned, been removed. The commitment continues to the present.

I want to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that while this commitment stands, the federal government, almost since the time of the collapse of the Intercolonial Railway—or since its absorbtion by CN—has pursued a steady, programmed effort to downgrade the railway throughout the Atlantic region. The most recent example, of course, is Canadian National Express. I want to dwell on it for a couple of minutes, by way of illustration only.

My colleagues have demonstrated very adequately this afternoon and evening the importance of that vital service. It is important to business people, to farmers, to fishermen and, indeed, to the general public. It is an essential tool of commerce for the whole area. I am talking about the general field of small parcel delivery and service.

In 1976 there were 19 CN Express terminals in the maritimes. That figure was later reduced to 15. In 1981 there was a plan to slash the number to five, a reduction of something like 76 per cent. At one point Prince Edward Island was to be denied locally-supplied CN service; to the extent it would be allowed to continue, the whole shebang was to be turned over to profit-oriented trucking companies. I cannot stress strongly enough the inadequacy of such an arrangement.

I have nothing against trucking companies, but I regret very much that the trucking companies which would have taken over this service on P.E.I. were off-island. Trucking companies, just as with any other profit-oriented enterprise, are not designed essentially to provide a public service in the way CN was set up to do. If the express service were turned over to trucking companies it would be reduced and provided on the terms of the trucking companies which are not always in the public interest. Trucking companies do not have a national network such as CN's. They are profit-oriented and do not have a public mandate as CN does. Nor do they have the expertise to assist their patrons, the people who use express service, with packaging, advice on the proper mode of transport, or the identification of individual parcels which are lost. Trucking companies do not have that expertise, and they have no particular interest in developing it. Moreover, when two or three carriers get into the act, add-on charges are involved. So, the eventual cost to consumers would be very much higher than if the existing CN service were continued.

Largely because of pressure from myself, the government of Prince Edward Island, the CN employees involved and the public at large, the minister undertook to be in touch with Dr. Bandeen, the president of Canadian National, to have Prince Edward Island exempted from the scheduled ten CN Express office closures. I welcome that and congratulate the minister for taking the initiative. But the fact remains that the number of employees has been reduced from 41 to 19, and the service has been substantially truncated. It will be basically restricted to within Charlottetown, and between Charlottetown and other off-island centres. Most of the connections between Charlottetown and other communities within the island will be severed. Apparently the figure of 19 employees includes one manager, but that was not my understanding of the commitment that CN Express would maintain 19 full-time employees on P.E.I. In addition, CN officials, perhaps unbeknownst to the minister, have been fiddling with the numbers to the extent of threatening to keep only 11, 12 or 13 full-time employees, with the others only on a part-time or relief basis, to be called into service at the discretion of CN.

I know the minister would not breach the commitment he gave in the House on February 4 and February 24 to maintain CN Express services on the island at 19 full-time employees, or in that vicinity. I will hold him to his commitment. I am sure, because he is an honourable man, that he will live up to it. Also, I congratulate him for keeping the Sydney office open on the grounds that that particular community is in a low employment area and thus needs special consideration.

In my remaining minutes, I want to stress that the CN Express situation is only an illustration. I appreciate the argument made sometimes by CN that it was losing money with the service, something like $50 million in 1979. But one wonders how hard CN tried to turn a profit. I suspect it did the same thing with CN Express as it did with CN passenger service. The company created a situation which caused people not to use the service, so that it could use the non-use of the service as a rationale for abolishing it, when the real reason had nothing to do with whether or not the service was being used by the public. I find it hard to believe that CN cannot compete with private couriers and similar specialized operators who are often proceeding on a shoestring. In any event, the CN Express on P.E.I. was operating at near-peak capacity. I am told by people who have looked very closely at the figures that over a period of time the CN Express terminal on Prince Edward Island consistently operated at 95 per cent capacity, by CN's own standards. It is, therefore, beyond my understanding how CN could threaten to abolish that service on the grounds that it was being underused.

The profit of Canadian National Railways in 1979 was $208 million, up $72.1 million from 1978. It is clear that CN is hell-bent on making a profit at the expense of providing services, at the expense of its public mandate, and at the expense of the terms of entry into confederation by Prince Edward Island and the other Atlantic provinces. It is operating like a private corporation. It is no different from Canadan Pacific or, for that matter, Eastern Provincial Airways. It has set upon a course which emphasizes consolidation, bigness and concentrating on key market centres, major metropolitan market centres such as Montreal and Toronto. By definition that almost excludes the Atlantic provinces. This emphasis will have various consequences in terms of our prospects for regional development and alleviating the economic disparities we suffer.

Other examples could be cited of the steady withdrawal of Canadian National from the Atlantic region. In Prince Edward Island there was the removal of passenger service; the efforts of CN, some of them successful, to abandon important rail lines; and the threat to the carload centre, the major office for the movement of heavy freight to and from the province and within it. Most recently there was the threat to the rail car service centre which provides emergency and routine services to the cars; it has been moved practically holus-bolus to another, off-island centre. Finally there is the example of CN Express cited earlier. They are all part of a pattern of programmed erosion of the operations of Canadian National on Prince Edward Island.

This is most regrettable. The P.E.I, case parallels other horror stories to which some of my colleagues have addressed themselves; including the downplaying of the Halifax harbour and in particular the Dart Containerline crisis in Halifax. It is a truly tragic situation to which Canadian National is a party.

We must appreciate that transportation is not a luxury. It is not only important; it is essential to the region. It is a vital tool for economic development. We in the Atlantic region have particular requirements by virtue of the fact that we are far from our markets and are also often far from our sources of supply. We need in Canada a total look at the federal government's plans for transportation in the region over the next five years. In particular we must look at the special role of Canadian National in those plans. We must look at the role of air and other modes of transportation in that over-all scheme. It is because the federal government has failed miserably to sustain a regionally-sensitive transportation policy that I call upon all members of the House to condemn the government and the record of the Minister of Transport. The government does not appreciate the objectives of a regionally-sensitive transportation policy, the realization of which was one of the terms of entry into confederation by the maritime provinces.

• (2140)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

If the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport wishes to be recognized he must be in his place.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the minister and the members on this side of the House have shown that the government is not neglecting the Atlantic provinces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bockstael: In fact, the opposite is true. This government is committed to, and deeply involved in, every mode of transport. It is promoting regional development in the Atlantic provinces, and on a per capita basis the Atlantic provinces are in the enviable position of receiving twice the national average—

An hon. Member: How come things are in such a mess?

Mr. Bockstael: The member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) brought up the matter of the Newfoundland railways. A labour agreement was reached between this government and the union in February. The entire program is being accepted, since it is being made possible through federal assistance. The syncro-lift in St. John's has been approved by the minister. He agreed to the joint venture between the CNR and the province. He assured the exchange of land. Now that the design is completed, tenders will be called in the very near future on a $21.5 million syncro-lift. The St. John's airport already has ILS service and there is an additional ILS runway being installed which will be completed this year. St. John's airport will receive $4.3 million in capital improvements in 1981-82.

The hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass) says there is no consultation with the provinces. In August and September, 1980, the provincial government, the tourist industry, the trucking industry and the Atlantic provinces transportation committee were consulted on ferries. The previous Tory government approved a 10 per cent increase in ferry rates. We are doing the same thing to meet inflation. We should note that through our constitutional link with the Atlantic provinces this government is providing $4.6 million to the Northumberland ferries and $9 million to Borden-Tormentine ferries, which represents 80 per cent of their budget and costs.

This government is supporting the Saint John potash terminal with $23 million and the Halifax-Fairview terminal with $29 million. There really is no discrimination against the Atlantic provinces. We have presented facts which show that the Atlantic provinces are the beneficiary of extensive federal assistance. The minister has described how, through consultation and with the support of the provinces, ever more effective programs are now under way.

This motion presented by the opposition should be voted down, along with the amendment thereto by the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: It is time the opposition focused its attention on something new and quit resuscitating and dredging up old and untrue myths.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Do not use the word "dredging"!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The word "dredging" is a no-no, it is unparliamentary!

Mr. Bockstael: The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) says in his motion that transportation is still a major problem. Unfortunately, he does not seem to be aware of his own provincial government's green paper issued by the department of development entitled "Toward an Economic Development Strategy for Nova Scotia". This paper states, in part:

> Transportation costs, as a proportion of the final costs of manufactured goods sold, have decreased—and now account for 2 to 3 per cent of the cost of goods sold by Nova Scotia firms. Compared to labour, raw materials and financial expenditures, transportation is of a second order of significance—important, but certainly not large enough to be an overriding factor in the development of the region.

This government is committed to look after the transportation of the entire nation and the region, and it will continue to do so efficiently and effectively.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the supply proceedings now before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 58(9).

The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin).

All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than 5 members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

ENERGY

SUGGESTED NEW PRICING REGIME—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43. The resumption of energy pricing meetings with the producing provinces is welcome. In support of the success of such meetings I move, seconded by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announce prior to the meetings a revised comprehensive pricing regime for conventional oil production, oil sands production, heavy oil production, tertiary oil production and offshore and frontier oil production as the basis for successful negotiations with the producing provinces, thereby providing for Canadian oil self-sufficiency during this decade.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF BUDGET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, the base rate of inflation excluding food and fuel is at a new high of 10.2 per cent over a year ago. The increase in the price of food and fuel is not the prime cause of inflation. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That in view of the fact that the government's fiscal stance, criticized by the Bank of Canada and castigated by almost every economic group in Canada, is clearly wrong and proven to be inept, the Minister of Finance forthwith introduce a new budget and new estimates to be presented to this House changing the direction of government policy, to come to grips with inflation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HEALTH CARE

EXTRA BILLING BY DOCTORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that in the view of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) there is an emerging consensus across Canada that no extra billing will be acceptable in this country and that such a consensus should be reflected in the upcoming renegotiation of EPF and in view of the fact that in the meantime Canadians continue to be unfairly burdened by extra billing, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare be instructed by this House that leadership be shown on this issue through the implementation of Mr. Justice Hall's recommendation that the federal Medical Care Act "be revised" by the federal government, as only it can, "to provide that extra billing by physicians inhibits reasonable access to services and is contrary to the intent and purpose of the act" in the hope that this will put moral pressure on the provinces to act now in the interests of Canadians and not wait for renegotiation of EPF, as extra billing should not be a negotiable item in the first place.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PASSAGE OF CONSTITUTIONAL RESOLUTION—EXTENSION OF SITTING HOURS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the obvious filibuster now being conducted by the Conservative opposition on the Constitution, and in view of the fact that this is preventing the government from dealing with important economic issues and important energy issues, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Bossy):

That this House extend its sitting hours until all questions can be put on the constitutional resolution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

SUGGESTED MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER OF SASKATCHEWAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, the 8 per cent tax levy of the federal government has had a very serious effect on oil production in Saskatchewan. It is more serious there than in any place in Canada. Oil production was shut down earlier this year in southwestern Saskatchewan. As of March 1, 50 per cent of light crude production has been shut in, in southeastern Saskatchewan, affecting over 900 oil wells. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the Right Hon. Prime Minister meet immediately with Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan to deal with and resolve the very serious situation which exists with regard to oil production in Saskatchewan.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—REVIEW OF PRODUCTION CONTRACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of some urgency, under the provisions of Standing Order 43. An F-18 fighter aircraft was badly damaged Monday when the main landing gear collapsed during test procedures held in the United States. One of the reasons the government selected this plane is that it is supposedly capable of hard landings on aircraft carriers—even though Canada has none—on the basis that most Canadian military pilots were bounce-landers, a strengthened undercarriage would last longer, and the replacement savings would more than compensate for additional weight and fuel penalties. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That the Minister of National Defence abandon his obviously misguided optimism regarding the contract for the entire F-18 program and reveal to this House the details of the serious design and performance deficiencies of the plane, and what measures his department plans to take to ensure the aircraft delivered to Canada will be capable of operating within specified and desired requirements, and how much in the way of industrial benefits we will lose because of the cutbacks in orders by the U.S. navy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BROADCASTING

COMMUNITY OWNED STATION IN TUKTOYAKTUK—FUNDS FOR OPERATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. According to recent reports, a CBC radio affiliate in Tuktoyaktuk in the Northwest Territories is so financially strapped for funds that the community-owned station has been depending on bingo profits to keep it on the air.

Recently this station, and at least one other in northern Canada, received, from Radio-Moscow, an unsolicited offer to provide five hours per month in English of such program delights as "Moscow Mailbag", "Life in the Soviet Union", and "Soviet-American Relations". Apparently there is no Canadian law to stop these broadcasts if CFCT, the station in Tuktoyaktuk, accepts the Soviet offer. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That since the station in Tuktoyaktuk is the only source of CBC broadcasting for 5,000 people in the area, this House urge CBC to grant the station enough funds to continue its community based operation, while retaining local control, so that this and other northern stations will not be tempted to accept free Soviet program packages.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

PROCESSING OF DISABILITY PENSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Canadians suffering from a terminal illness such as cancer are naturally very concerned about the financial well-being of their families. The greatest enemy of these people is time. Canada Pension Plan disability procedures are not set up to give any consideration to the severe problems these people face. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That this House instruct the Minister of National Health and Welfare to study the possibility of setting up priority processing of disability pensions for Canadians suffering from a terminal illness.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL PENSIONS CONFERENCE

PARTICIPATION OF CANADIAN LONG SERVICE MILITARY ANNUITANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that Mr. Guy Fortier, conference co-ordinator for the National Pensions Conference, has refused to allow delegate participation by the Canadian Long Service Military Annuitants at the pensions conference to be held in Ottawa two weeks from now, and whereas CLSMA represents some 12,000 Armed Forces veterans and pensioners who have served their country well, I therefore move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare be directed to recognize the very valuable work of the CLSMA in regard to the pension needs of Canadian veterans and their widows, by granting that organization full delegate status at the National Pensions Conference.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SOCIAL SECURITY

CANADA-UNITED STATES RECIPROCAL AGREEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller), I move:

That this House welcomes last week's signing of a reciprocal agreement on social security between Canada and the United States, under which there will be improvements for pensioners who have lived their working lives partly in one country and partly in the other, and urges that every effort be made to bring this agreement into effect with the least possible delay; and that this House urges also that renewed efforts be made to achieve reciprocal agreements on social security with other countries, particularly the United Kingdom, for the sake of the many United Kingdom pensioners now living in Canada who are in serious need of increases in their pensions.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO DEAL WITH INFLATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, perhaps I can be forgiven for noting that when the House leader of the New Democratic Party rose to talk about President Reagan's visit, he was not wearing a black arm band on this occasion.

My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. Everyday he is seeing, as is the country, new evidence of the failure of the government's policy to deal with inflation. Yesterday the annual report of the Bank of Canada indicated that very little progress had been made by the policy the government seems intent on following. Today the consumer price index indicates that inflation has now reached a 12.2 per cent rate this year, which is the highest annual rate of inflation since December of 1974, and the second highest this country has faced since the Korean war. In light of this evidence of failure to deal with inflation, will the Minister of Finance tell the House of Commons whether he intends any changes in the economic stance and policy of his government to deal more effectively with inflation in Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member referred to the annual report of the Governor of the Bank of Canada in which the Governor described the performance of the monetary policy he administered. He said that it had not accomplished as much as he expected, but that he was intending to continue and persevere, and that he had established new monetary targets. It seems to me that what the Governor of the bank is recommending in the field of monetary policy is appropriate at the present time and is fully supported by the government.

I wonder whether the Leader of the Opposition is recommending that the Governor of the bank apply an even stricter monetary policy which would involve higher interest rates and further decreases in the money supply. That is not my view at the present time.

Mr. Crosbie: That was not the question. Answer the question.

Mr. MacEachen: I believe the monetary policy of the Governor is appropriate.

Mr. Crosbie: It is your policy.

Mr. Andre: Answer the question.

Mr. MacEachen: Hon. members have said that I am not answering the question. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition asked whether I was contemplating or recommending any changes in current policy. He began his questioning by referring to the report of the Bank of Canada released earlier this week. So, I am attempting to reply directly to that aspect of the question.

QUERY RESPECTING INTENTIONS OF GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister referred very selectively to the report of the Bank of Canada. He made no reference at all to its recommendations regarding fiscal policy, and he made no reference at all to the question which indicated that day after day—yesterday from the Bank of Canada; today from the CPI—there is new evidence that the government's policy, if it has one, to fight inflation, simply is not working.

Yesterday the minister admitted that his own inflation forecasts of less than half a year ago were wrong, perhaps even significantly wrong. He cannot give us a new inflation forecast. Presumably the policy in that so-called budget brought in five months ago was based upon forecasts. The forecasts are wrong. Does the government intend to change the policy to take into account the fact that his forecasts were wrong?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it would probably be a good idea at some point in our discussion on the orders of the day to recognize that forecasts are exactly that. They are based on assumptions and information available at the time of the projection, and oftentimes they are wrong. I am the first to admit that some of the projections included in the October budget were, with the passage of time, proven to be incorrect.

I must say, Madam Speaker, I do not intend to go around striking my breast about that, unless the hon. member for St. John's West is ready to join me and we both strike our breasts, since in his budget of December, 1979, in his projections for inflation, he overestimated the projected inflation for 1980 and he underestimated the likely inflation for 1981. That is the nature of projections. Let us not make too much fuss about them; they do not solve very many problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ASSISTANCE FOR LOW-INCOME GROUPS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister celebrates how frequently he is wrong. That could be a constant celebration in this House. But it is not a celebration in which the people of Canada join with much gratitude or with much heart, since they are suffering and paying the price for the failure of the economic policy of this government.

The government indicates that even though the basis on which it decides policy is wrong, in the minister's own words, it does not intend to change that policy. Will the minister then consider bringing some comfort to the victims of his policy, to the victims of inflation? Will he tell the House whether he intends to take any measures to help low-income Canadians, particularly, who are faced most seriously with dealing with the problem of inflation? What measures does he intend to take? Does he simply intend to say to the people of Canada, "Sit back and suffer. I am wrong, but I intend to do nothing about it"? What does the minister intend to do to help low-income Canadians?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the Leader of the Opposition believes that the way to fight inflation is to protect every sector in the economy against inflation. If the right hon. gentleman read the report of the Governor of the bank, he would have noticed that the Governor found that a very bad policy for the country and that all it led to was additional inflation, further inflationary expectations, and continuous price instability.

In order to protect the neediest segments of the population, what we decided to do was to increase the guaranteed income supplement at a very early date in our mandate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: The guaranteed income supplement is fully indexed and it, along with the old age security and war veterans allowance, provides full protection against inflation for the neediest people in the community. In view of our budgetary situation it is not possible to provide an over-all protection against inflation for every group in the economy, even if it were desirable economically, which it is not.

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF CONSTITUTIONAL RESOLUTION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, not everyone in Canada who needs assistance is over 60, what with real wages going down for the fourth year in a row. What Governor Bouey has said is that he is getting no assistance from the Minister of Finance in his fight against inflation.

My suggestion to the Prime Minister is that if Canada had a new and perfect constitution it would not do a thing to affect the 12.2 per cent inflation rate; it would not do anything to help the Canadian dollar; it would not do anything to bring down interest rates; it would not put any one of the 928,000 unemployed back to work, or any one of the 348,000 hidden unemployed back to work. Will the Prime Minister now put aside this fetish of his about the Constitution and bring in new economic policies to this Parliament, dealing with anti-inflation moves, unemployment, inflation, and the weak Canadian dollar? Will he direct his minister to do that, or ask him to clear out of the way and let someone else do it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I completely agree with the hon. member. I remind him of the position of his own party, as stated by the hon. member for Provencher to the effect—

● (1425)

Mr. Lalonde: When he was here.

Mr. Trudeau: —when he was here, that the people of—

Mr. Clark: You should talk!

An hon. Member: That's why you'll never make a deal with Alberta, Lalonde.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Clark: I guess his illness has gone to his head.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the position, as stated by the hon. member for Provencher, is to the effect that it is the popular will of Canadians that we have a Constitution, that it have an amending formula, and that we have a bill of rights. This being the case, and it being agreed that we should be getting on to dealing with economic subjects, I just put a question to the hon. member. Why does he not influence his leader in his caucus to have a vote? We have heard 140 speakers in this House—

Mr. Clark: Where are your economic measures?

An hon. Member: You don't look like an Arab.

Mr. Trudeau: —and many others in the Senate. We have heard all of these speakers; some for and some against. It seems that the democratic process itself—

An hon. Member: No, you haven't.

Mr. Trudeau: Then I appeal to the member for St. John's. The hon. members behind him are saying that they have not had time to speak yet. Do they want to speak? Do they think it is an important subject, or not? If they think it is an important subject, then the hon. member should not argue that we get on to other things. If it is not an important subject, why must we have more than 140 speakers on the same topic?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Provencher is not in Lech, Austria, when he should be travelling to Algeria. He is having a well-deserved rest. He is not flying at the expense of the Government of Canada, either, on his holiday.

Canada already has a Constitution. It has had it for 114 years. We are not going to agree in a wrong process, no matter what you do. You decide the timetable of this House, and the decision is up to you.

Having dealt with your silly reply, can I ask you a supplementary question?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: While the Canadian people suffer the factuous asses here—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member need not deal with the replies. His role is to ask questions, and he should be asking questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: My supplementary question is this—and the Prime Minister is not prepared to set aside the constitutional proposals for a month or two. We had three years of wage and price controls imposed in 1975 when the inflation rate had gone to 10.8 per cent, the CPI. Nothing was done to solve the fundamental problems of inflation of the Canadian economy during those three years.

Will the Prime Minister give the House his assurance that he will not resort to that expedient again when the Canadian people go berserk over his lack of action in dealing with the economy, that he will not reimpose wage and price controls which proved ineffective before? Will he assure us that he will direct the Minister of Finance to take some other action to avoid those controls which did not do us any good in the three years we had them? Would he at least do that, if he will not set aside the constitutional proposals now for a month or two?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for St. John's, presumably while addressing the Chair, though he should know the rules, talked about "your silly replies". Madam Speaker, I do not think this is the proper way of addressing the Chair.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap.

An hon. Member: Don't be testy.

Mr. Crosbie: Stand up like a man. Don't hide behind the Speaker's skirt.

REQUEST FOR ADVICE FROM PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I have a very serious question which I would like to place before the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: Good luck!

Mr. Riis: I think we all recognize that we have a cost of living crisis in Canada. I suspect that this is just the beginning, with the price of petroleum to impact on Canadians starting March 1. Literally, Canadian families and Canadian businessmen have their backs to the wall. Some time ago the Prime Minister suggested that people must adjust to these high inflationary rates by changing their priorities. What advice would he have for Canadians who are today caught in what is perhaps the most crucial inflation squeeze in recent times?

• (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, my advice would be to have Canadians urge their members to permit the measures before the House to come to a vote—

Mr. Clark: What economic measures? You have no economic plan.

Mr. Trudeau: —so that we could deal urgently with other economic matters such as the energy policy and other economic policies.

Mr. Malone: Table your economic program.

Mr. Riis: Previously the Prime Minister was more interested in having Canadians rearrange their priorities.

REQUEST FOR RESIGNATION OF GOVERNOR BOUEY AND ROLL BACK OF INTEREST RATES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my next question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In recognition of the fact that Governor Bouey has failed the government and failed Canadians in not coming to grips with inflation, I should like to ask the minister if he would consider asking for Governor Bouey's resignation, and also if he would consider bringing in a budget that would deal effectively with the concerns that face consumers across this country. Will the minister explain why he is prepared to accept the high interest rates we have today? Why is he not prepared to roll those interest rates back when they are the second highest of all industrialized nations, with one exception?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks why we will not roll back interest rates. That sounds like a wonderful solution, but it is a dangerous one because the only way, to my knowledge or my understanding, that the Governor of the Bank of Canada could reduce interest rates would be to increase the money supply. We must ask what that would do to inflationary expectations. We might have a short-term breathing space with a very long-term increased inflation pressure. That is the answer to that question.

REQUEST FOR SUBSTANTIAL INCREASE IN OLD AGE PENSIONS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, may I address a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? In view of the fact that today's terribly high cost of living hits particularly hard at senior citizens; in view of the fact that the $35 increase of a few months ago, even when indexed, still leaves most senior citizens living below the poverty line; and in view of the fact that as cautious a firm as William M. Mercer Ltd. has recommended that there be an immediate increase of $100 per month in the basic old age security pension, will the minister do her best, in this period when we are going to get at important issues, to bring a measure before the House to provide for a substantial increase in old age pensions across the board, to help those who are hit so hard by today's high cost of living?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I reject completely the William M. Mercer proposal to increase the OAS by $100, as was suggested about a week ago. It would, of course, cost the country billions of dollars, because this is a universal program. Even with the maximum tax paid on that by rich seniors, it would still leave them with pretty good additional money that I just do not see that they need.

Our objective is to take the seniors in need, and in particular those who are single, unattached persons, separated, divorced, etc.—and the fact is they are slightly more numerous than couples—over the poverty line. For that we still need money. That is the first priority of my department and of the government, as soon as the economy permits it. The individuals who receive the supplement will be taken over the proverty line. I have often repeated, to make sure that all of us remember our commitment, that we will need money as soon as the economy permits, for the seniors who are alone and need the GIS, to take them above the proverty line. Right now the indexation every three months helps tremendously to catch up with the difficult time of inflation.

JUSTIFICATION FOR RATE OF INFLATION

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance and it also deals with the runaway inflation rate which is causing so many Canadians such despair. Since the Conference Board of Canada is forecasting average weekly wage increases of only 10.5 per cent for 1981, how can the minister justify a 12.2 per cent inflation rate? This will outstrip average wage increases for the fourth consecutive year, as was pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West, and is the worst track record since the government started keeping wage statistics 42 years ago. Since we started collecting statistics, there has never been a four-year period where workers' wages were being stripped of purchasing power by inflation.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks me to justify the rate of inflation. No one finds the rate of inflation more disturbing than I, and no one in the country ought to be satisfied with the current rate of inflation. No one in the country ought to believe for a moment that the actions of the government alone will reduce inflationary expectations and pressures in the country.

Inasmuch as hon. members opposite have quoted so extensively from the annual report of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, they should look at the paragraph where the governor suggested that all groups, organized labour, organized business and individuals, take into account the effect of their behaviour on total inflation in the country. Let me tell you, Madam Speaker, that this is the number one question which is facing the country and it has to be solved by the government—

Mr. Clark: The do-nothing minister.

Mr. MacEachen: —which is following its policy, and by all other groups in the community as well.

PENSION INDEX FOR SENIOR CITIZENS

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also addressed to the Minister of Finance. I should like to point out to him that there have only been two other years when the rate of inflation outstripped wage increases, and those were the post-war years of 1946 and 1948. This proves that the present administration is the most incompetent in the last 33 years.

The Minister of Finance has repeatedly claimed, as he did again today, that senior citizens who receive old age pensions are protected from inflation because their pensions are fully indexed. Since seniors spend most of their pensions on the necessities of life, food, shelter, transportation, and since the price of food for home consumption is up 15.5 per cent over a year ago, the price of utilities is up 21 per cent, and transportation is up 16.6 per cent, how can the minister justify limiting old age pension increases to the over-all cost of living index which is much less than the price increases they are facing? Why does the minister not develop a senior citizens' pension index which would give seniors real protection from the ravages of his economic policies?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, perhaps the question ought to be more properly addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I would remind the hon. member that the cost of living index includes all the elements that go into a basket that provides for the daily necessities of individuals in this country. That is fully indexed on a quarterly basis. In fact recipients of old age pensions in this country are protected against the impact of inflation. The only study that I know of which was produced by the Economic Council of Canada shows quite conclusively that the indexing provisions, not only of the social security programs but also of the income tax system, do an effective job of protecting, in particular, the low-income groups.

I mentioned earlier, and it is important to repeat it, that for 1980 alone, through these systems of indexation that are found in the tax system and the social security system, a total amount of $3 billion in protection is offered to the low-income groups of this country. I doubt if any country in the world does as good a job as Canada in that respect.

Oral Questions

HOUSING

EFFECT OF INTEREST RATES ON HOME OWNERS

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works who is responsible for housing. Inflation is running at 12.2 per cent, the highest level since December, 1974. Specifically, the cost of home heating oil has gone up 36.7 per cent since your government took office. All of this is aggravated by the sustained high interest rates which every Canadian faces. The Minister of Finance has indicated that he does not make much fuss about this kind of thing. I ask the minister responsible for housing what plans do you have—what plans does the minister have, Madam Speaker—

● (1440)

Madam Speaker: I know that it is difficult to speak in the third person and it is rather unnatural, but the rule is there for some purpose, probably to temper the enthusiasm in the House. I would ask the hon. member to try to remember that.

Mr. Clark: He corrected himself.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, what plans does the government have to address this problem on behalf of Canadian home owners?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Through you, Madam Speaker, to the hon. gentleman opposite, I thank him for his question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Watch how it is done.

Mr. Cosgrove: I would like to remind the hon. gentleman that the Minister of Finance has already addressed the question in part through the inclusion of the MURB provision in the budget of October last.

It is interesting to note that the development industry in metropolitan Toronto, calculated by the province of Ontario, shows that initiative taken in combination with the province of Ontario's follow-up initiative will result in some 10,000 additional starts directed toward low and medium-income people this year.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I would remind the hon. minister opposite that CMHC officials have indicated that high interest rates will wipe out those 10,000 starts.

As the steady reduction in housing starts will further contract the number of houses available for Canadians and inflate the cost of housing, that is, the cost of owning a new home, what plans does the government have to assist new Canadian home owners?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, with respect, I cannot accept the assumption and opening remarks in prelude to the question asked by the hon. gentleman. In fact statistics show that, notwithstanding the forecasts by CMHC for this year, starts during the month of February over the month of January increased. Although the projections were made by CMHC at the beginning of the year, the 10,000-unit projection to which I referred was made this week based on statistics of an actual record of starts which are onstream and have come onstream in metropolitan Toronto in the last few weeks.

I have indicated the steps already taken by the government in an open market in its social unit allocation last year, and with an additional 5,000 now coming onstream I think the picture has improved considerably.

COMBINES

RECOMMENDATION TO PROHIBIT OWNERSHIP OF PIPELINES BY OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The investigation by the Combines branch into the state of competition in the Canadian petroleum industry recommended that no major oil company be permitted to acquire a controlling interest in any pipeline that is subject to federal jurisdiction. Imperial Oil has a controlling interest in the Norman Wells pipeline presently being considered by the National Energy Board. Will the minister guarantee to the House that he will follow recommendations in the combines report and not permit Imperial Oil to proceed with the Norman Wells pipeline?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the recommendations of the combines investigation branch are the subject of examination by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the government. In due time recommendations will be brought before cabinet and an announcement will be made.

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, those recommendations were made after an exhaustive study, and I think there is a good basis for them.

I point out to the minister that any pipeline will have a very negative impact on the Dene people and on their land claims. Will the minister guarantee to the House that cabinet will make no decision on any pipeline in the Northwest Territories until there has been a full debate in the House of Commons?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, there are numerous opposition days available to opposition parties. Subjects of concern can be brought before the House on those days.

Mr. Clark: That is great leadership.

Mr. Lalonde: If my hon. friend feels strongly about this subject, I invite him to use one of the allotted opposition days to put that subject on the agenda for debate.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF SPECIAL PROGRAM FOR NORTH SHORE, TRACY AND SOREL, P.Q.

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce of Canada. Much like the people in Sorel and Tracy, the North Shore residents, particularly in Port-Cartier and Sept-Îles, greeted with enthusiasm the $350 million special program announced last Monday. First, keeping in mind the complexity of the program, I should like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce what exactly are the measures which will affect the workers and those which relate to the industries in the designated areas, and second, I should like to know when the minister intends to confirm the decision concerning the special committees which will be established to carry out this special program of his department.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we intend to confirm the status of the community development committees as soon as our officials have completed the necessary consultations. The program we announced a few days ago has two main features. The components of the manpower restructuration program include higher incentives for individual training, transferable salary grants, a component of community job creation, the updating of mobility incentive measures, and financial benefits for early retirement. The industries in designated communities are eligible for a 5 per cent refundable subsidy for industrial capital projects. This is a very significant program for the designated communities and for our entire economy, Madam Speaker.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REMOVAL OF "E" DIVISON FROM VICTORIA TO VANCOUVER

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In announcing the decision to move "E" Division RCMP headquarters from Victoria to Vancouver, at a news conference held at the University of Victoria, the Solicitor General said:

I am confident it won't harm the local economy.

Would the Solicitor General explain the reason for his confidence when he has admitted there have been no economic and social impact studies completed on the move and when it is acknowledged that the city of Victoria will be losing a $5 million annual payroll?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, what I had in mind was that the move would be phased in over a three-year period—

Mr. Malone: So they won't notice it.

Mr. Kaplan: —that there would be normal attrition and transfers during that period, and that all of the officials working in the program who wanted to do so would have a priority for transferring to other federal jobs available in the Vancouver area.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, the fact is when the $5 million payroll is gone, it is gone.

The Solicitor General also claims there has been full consultation with the B.C. government concerning the RCMP headquarters move. On Monday he told reporters:

They were fully consulted about it during the last two years of planning.

However, the Hon. Allan Williams, attorney general of B.C., stated today:

To suggest that we have been consulted is inaccurate and misleading. This is a callous and insensitive move and I oppose it until it is supported by an economic and social impact study.

Concerning this difference could the Solicitor General explain what transpired between himself and the government of British Columbia? Will he now guarantee there will be no move without an economic and social impact study?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I had a telephone call from Allan Williams just before coming into the House. I discussed with him his concerns about the move. I am aware that during the considerable length of time this move was being planned there was full consultation between senior members of the RCMP and officials in the Attorney General's office about it. From everything we knew, the British Columbia government was supportive, or at least not objecting to the move. No doubt it is a matter of the force's internal management. It is not one to be decided by a province but one which, by tradition, is the responsibility of the federal government.

FOOD AND DRUGS

IMPORTATION OF CANNED MUSHROOMS FROM CHINA

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the minister knows, last August 20,000 cases of Narcissus brand mushrooms imported from mainland China were found to be contaminated and were recalled. Similarly, about five weeks ago, there was a general recall issued for Ma Ling mushrooms, also imported from China. Fear of contamination of other canned mushrooms led to an investigation of Four Star, Success and Steakhouse brands, and resulted in a freeze on the distribution of these products to retail shelves. That freeze lasted only two weeks and now these goods are back in distribution across Canada.

● (1450)

My question to the minister is whether she will verify that officials of her department met with officials of the Chinese government trade mission on an almost daily basis for the past three weeks, that one of the officials of the Chinese delegation was the gentleman who successfully negotiated the wheat deal a few years ago, and that as a result of representations the Department of National Health and Welfare relaxed—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member has been going on for quite a while and we have not seen the light of a question.

Mr. Friesen: I was in the middle of the question, Madam Speaker. As a result of pressure from ITC officials, the Department of National Health and Welfare standards were reduced from 6.5 defects per thousand to 100 per thousand. Will the minister verify the fact that these negotiations have been going on and explain why her department has been willing to jeopardize the health of Canadians in this way in order to maintain a better balance of trade with mainland China?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I would like to state quite clearly that neither myself nor my department have ever reduced our standards concerning the health of Canadians as the hon. member dares to suggest in this House. I have received a weekly, daily if necessary, report on that particular dossier in which I received the co-operation of the industry, first on a voluntary basis, and now on a common understanding, so that we will not have in Canada the problems related to poor canning techniques.

A team of experts from China came to Canada to exchange information, discuss with us and, I suppose, learn the techniques of canning according to our standards. I can assure Canadians that there is no case of poisoning caused by canned mushrooms from China in this country. If the member has particular cases he wants to bring up, it would be appropriate to supply me in writing immediately with names, addresses and other relevant data that he has of specific situations.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORTS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Would the minister be kind enough to table in the House all the relevant material in the reports that I take it have been compiled on this issue, and I would ask the minister, since the information I have received indicated the standards were reduced, whether she says they were, or not? I understand that 30 per cent of the stock of those mushrooms had to be returned to China after the investigation, so will she ensure through legislation, rather than through departmental regulations, which can be changed at the whim or caprice of departmental officials, the enforcement of standards imposed on imports of that kind of product into Canada?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): To my knowledge, Madam Speaker, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I can assure Canadians that I have all the tools necessary to control the quality of food offered to Canadians, and in the case of these canned mushrooms I do not know of any difficulties created by the regulations, nor do I know of the supposed discretionary power that officials have according to the hon. member. This is not the situation, and decisions on that matter are made directly by me after listening to all the representations of the experts.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

SAFEGUARDS RESPECTING SALES OF NUCLEAR REACTORS

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I will direct this question to the parliamentary secretary. Sales of Candu reactors have been reduced drastically by Canada's strict adherence to the nuclear safeguard code without similar commitments by other nuclear exporting countries. What steps is Canada taking through the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna to upgrade international standards to those of Canada in ensuring that sales be used for peaceful purposes only, thereby giving Canada a more competitive position of Candu sales?

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, since the early seventies Canada has tried to convince all nuclear technology supplier countries to set identical requirements for nuclear technology importing countries. Indeed our efforts proved successful in January, 1978, when the 15 leading countries agreed on a safeguard code to be enforced when that technology is exported to non-nuclear nations. It must be admitted, however, that those standards are not quite as stringent as those required by countries such as Canada, Sweden, Australia, the United States and the Netherlands, so there are differences from one supplier country to another.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

FORGIVENESS OF DEBT—GOVERNMENT PLANS FOR HEAVY WATER PLANTS

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, concerning Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and the fact they are indebted to the tune of $1.2 billion and they currently appear before the public accounts committee to ask for forgiveness of some $893 million. These figures differ from newspaper reports in the amount that actually was forgiven.

In light of the fact that the minister is increasing their capital budget for 1981-82 by about 93 per cent and there are no safeguards in place to prevent them from getting into that position of indebtedness again, I would like to ask the minister what safeguards have been imposed to assure the Canadian public that AECL will not get into this same position again, and further to that, what warrants such a huge increase in their 1981-82 budget?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I will be appearing tomorrow before the Committee on National Resources and Public Works. Representatives of AECL will also be present and we will be very happy to provide the hon. member and Parliament with all the information in answer to the various points raised by him, which I am afraid I could not cover in the time allocated in question period.

Mr. Anguish: Madam Speaker, I prefer to have the minister answer those questions today in the House where the press have a much better opportunity of covering a scandalous situation that exists within AECL right now. And I would like to have him comment on the question just asked, and further to that, I would like to ask what plans you have in light of the fact there are no foreseeable markets for heavy water?

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Anguish: I would like to know what your plans as a government are for the heavy water plant mothballed at La Prade which is partially completed and never to be utilized, and also the utilization of the Port Hawkesbury plant at Glace Bay where they have no markets but are still in production?

Mr. Lalonde: I do not think anyone else in this House could have made the point better than the hon. member to the effect this is not the type of question I can answer within the confines of question period. I am appearing for three hours tomorrow before the committee with officials of AECL and they will be very happy to provide the hon. member with very elaborate and extensive answers to the questions he raised today and any others he may have in mind, but surely this is not the type of question to which I can give an answer in 30 seconds, or even one minute.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—REVIEW OF PROGRAM CONTRACT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): My question is to the Minister of National Defence. He is no doubt aware of the incident in the United States on Monday when an F-18 fighter aircraft was damaged as a result of failure of the main landing gear during flight test procedures.

Given the fact this government chose a plane with a carrier-strengthened undercarriage, disregarding extra weight and resultant fuel penalties, and given the continual performance problems with the plane and the recent news that the only two other customers for the place, the United States navy and marine corps, are reducing the numbers each will purchase, will the minister explain to the members of this House and to the Canadian taxpayers, who are footing the $4-billion cost of the Canadian purchase, why he and his government have remained the only steadfast, loyal and uncritical supporters of the plane? And will he take immediate steps to halt this purchase until the performance and contract problems have been resolved, and will he set in motion plans for alternative options?

● (1500)

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, that is quite a question. I remind the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka that the F-18 is exactly the same plane his government was about to choose when it was defeated.

I am well aware of the collapse of the landing gear of the F-18 on one of the test planes when the landing gear itself was being tested. The exact purpose of the 11 F-18 planes is to test whatever weaknesses there might be before normal flights start. When rate of climb, speed and landing gear are being tested, it is no surprise when there are failures. I repeat that that is the purpose of testing. An accident like that does not mean that this is not a good plane.

I am not aware that the United States navy will reduce the number of planes it has ordered. If I read the same article the hon. member read in one of the newspapers, the words used were "may reduce". No decision has been taken and, according to the latest information I have from the United States, no change in this program is in view.

CANADIAN SPIN-OFF BENEFITS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. McDonnell Douglas, the prime contractor for the CF-18, recently released a report stating that the firm had placed $470 million worth of business in Canada from March of 1977 through December, 1980, reputedly doubling its industrial offset goal for that period. The report was apparently released prior to official approval and confirmation by the department, a fact which apparently angered certain individuals.

Would the minister tell the House just how many of the McDonnell Douglas offset claims will be evaluated for veracity and accuracy, how long such an evaluation will take and whether the department has sufficient staff to ensure a complete evaluation of all claims, and not just those selected on a random basis?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, it is my understanding that all claims will be checked for veracity, although I will certainly look into that further.

As far as I am concerned, we must have procedures in place, including necessary staff, to make sure that we can confirm to the Canadian public that McDonnell Douglas is living up to its responsibilities and commitments under the contract to the fullest degree.

PORTS

APPOINTMENT OF SAFETY OFFICER FOR SAINT JOHN, N.B.

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that the Department of Labour commenced an in-depth study into the possibility of appointing a full-time safety officer for the port of Saint John, when the Hon. Martin O'Connell was the minister of labour, is the present minister in a position to make a progress report?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing to the attention of the House a matter of some local concern. Unfortunately, the amount of resources available would not make it possible to establish a full-time safety officer at each port. That perhaps is the essence of the concern of the hon. member, but the regional director has now been asked to get together with the union, to look into the matter and to try to find a solution which will be satisfactory and which will reassure members of the union that sufficient safety inspections are taking place.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I wish to advise you of an agreement reached by party representatives. It deals with motions Nos. 38 and 39 on the order paper for the setting up of a sub-committee to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. It is agreed that both those motions be passed without debate. May I add, however, that motion No. 39 should be completed by the addition of the second paragraph of motion No. 38.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, our party has agreed to this proposal, with the stipulation, as pointed out by the President of the Privy Council, that the committee be empowered to retain advisers. With that addition we are quite in agreement and prepared to consent to the proposal made by the government House leader.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, yes, we agree to these two motions, with the second one having the same second paragraph as the first one. It was the hope of our members that the subcommittees might be given authority to travel if necessary, but we are prepared to let that be considered by the committees. If they wish to do so, they can request it.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to adopt both motions, motion No. 39 having been amended as suggested by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), since the two other speakers seem to agree?

PRIVILEGE

MR. BLACKBURN—GRANT OF PUBLIC FUNDS IN BRANTFORD, ONT.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege under Standing Order 17(2) on a matter which has just come to my attention and which I strongly feel infringes on my privileges as a member of this House and specifically as the Member of Parliament for Brant.

I have just learned that several weeks ago a person in my constituency representing a volunteer social agency received a phone call from the office of a local lawyer asking her to come to his office to pick up a cheque for the funding of a program under the auspices of the Department of the Secretary of State.

Upon further investigation I learned that the cheque in question issued by the Department of the Secretary of State was first sent to the constituency office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) in Windsor, Ontario and then forwarded to the lawyer's office in Brantford, Ontario. The lawyer was then to present the cheque to the applicant. It turned out that the lawyer in question is none other than the president of the local Liberal association.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Orlikow: Surprise, surprise!

Mr. Blackburn: It is also a known fact, thanks to the intervention of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) several days ago on a related question of privilege concerning cheap, pork-barrel Liberal politics involving another minister, the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is none other than my "guardian financial agent" in Brant.

My question of privilege is this. In view of the fact that I am the Member of Parliament for Brant, in view of the fact that at no time was I apprised of this transaction and in view of the fact that neither I nor the applicant for this grant wished in any way to politicize this particular government funding, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has deliberately and without any political or moral judgment attempted to make the granting of this money a partisan political transaction.

This blatant disrespect of my rights as a parliamentarian by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and his patronage approach to the handing out of federal government grants to a non-political, non-partisan, volunteer social service group in Brantford have embarrassed the recipients of the grant, and, further, demoralized the civil servants at the regional office of the Department of the Secretary of State in Hamilton, who scrupulously award grants of government funds based on the merits of individual applicants without any political partisan influence or consideration.

In my opinion, my question of privilege is an even more dramatic example of this Liberal government's political partisanship in the granting of public funds than was the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood a couple of weeks ago. No cabinet minister has the right or privilege to provide political ammunition to local Liberal associations when government funds, financed by all the taxpayers of Canada, are being awarded to any group.

I respectfully submit, therefore, that my rights and privileges as a Member of Parliament have been infringed upon and that my position as a public servant to the people of Brant has been placed in jeopardy.

• (1510)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I submit that this is not a question of privilege, based on the fact that a similar question of privilege, alluded to by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) and brought forward by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), was dismissed by the Chair a few weeks ago. The arguments were long and so was the discussion, and you found, Madam Speaker, that there was no question of privilege involved.

Second, in the name of courtesy the hon. member should have at least waited until the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) was in the House. He is away on government business.

Third, this is a matter of debate about government policy and in no way infringes upon the rights of any member of the House.

Some hon. Members: It does.

Madam Speaker: It is obvious to everyone in the House that the case which the hon. member has brought to the attention of the House is quite similar to the one which was brought forward by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). I ruled on that matter on March 10 last. I said on that occasion that the matter does not really come under the purview of the rules of the House, nor is it my responsibility to rule on such matters. It is a political matter rather than a procedural one.

In the words of the hon. member, the awarding of certain grants has been politicized. This has to refer to rules and conduct matters, which are entirely in the hands of the government and for which it stands accountable. Therefore, I have to rule that the matter does not fall under the purview of what one would call privilege in this House and I do not find a prima facie case.

CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development) moved that the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry be concurred in.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, there have been consultations between the parliamentary secretary and myself as acting House leader for our party, and I should like to indicate that we concur with this motion without further debate on it. It is the product of members from all parties during the deliberations of the committee.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We also agree, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

POSTAL DELIVERY BETWEEN OTTAWA AND BROCKVILLE

Question No. 1,948—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Will the Postmaster General investigate the length of time taken for mail to pass between Ottawa and Brockville, Ontario?

2. Is the minister aware of the recent case where first-class mail from the House of Commons Post Office took over five weeks to reach its Brockville destination and, if so, is the problem in the Ottawa Alta Vista main postal station or in the House of Commons Post Office?

3. Is the minister aware that all mail passing through the Brockville post office is received and dispatched rapidly?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General: 1. Mail between Ottawa and Brockville, Ontario, usually receives next day delivery or two days at the most.

2. No, Canada Post is not aware of the case referred to and since dates of mailing on envelopes are not provided, it is difficult to determine if there was a problem and where it would be.

3. See 1 above.

PENSIONS—RETIRED PUBLIC SERVANTS

Question No. 1,972—Mr. Knowles:

1. Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. 31.

REPORT OF FACT-FINDING TEAM SENT TO CHILE

Motion No. 31—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of the report of the fact-finding team which was sent to Chile, at the request of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, to investigate the need for Chile to be placed back on the list of countries which are visa exempt.

[Translation]

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as a member of the fact-finding team sent to Chile to investigate the matter of refugees and the visas required for them, I must advise the House that, following our meeting in Santiago, with officials of the Canadian embassy and other embassies, as well as with Chilean officials and members of the opposition, we have decided to maintain the decision made by the previous government, and we do not intend to rescind the decision concerning visas for Chilean residents. I must advise the House that this report was made orally to the minister. I therefore ask the hon. member if he would withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I am not very happy with what we were told, but if it was only an oral report, obviously it cannot be tabled and I agree to withdraw the motion.

Madam Speaker: The motion is withdrawn.

Motion (Mr. Orlikow) withdrawn.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, with regard to Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers Nos. 42 and 43, I have drawn to the attention of the parliamentary secretary that they were filed two months ago. The reason I raise today the motions for documents respecting Amax, Limited at Alice Arm is that the mine will start dumping on the west coast of British Columbia on April 1. I think it is therefore important, since these requests for the production of papers have been on the Order Paper for two months, for the parliamentary secretary to give some indication to the House whether or not he is willing to have these documents presented before April 1.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I have undertaken to have these papers produced in the House as soon as possible. I wish to note that this matter is now being debated in the House. It is certainly very topical. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) has spoken at length on this subject, and I hope that this will in some way help answer the query of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton); but I will do my best to obtain the papers as soon as possible.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to address this honourable House as we embark upon the long and difficult road toward a truly Canadian Constitution, a road with an absence of signposts to give us the assurance at every turn that the direction in which we are heading is the proper one.

In the past, because of this difficulty of which I speak, because of lack of direction and resolve and because of lack of unanimity among all the parties involved in the constitutional scenario, we opted to do nothing. That itself was an option, the worst option of all. The luxury of continuing that option is no longer open to us. This is the time for change, the time for renewal, the time for faith in our people and the time to lay a new foundation for this country. This is a time which may not come our way again.

We ought not to delude ourselves as to why we find ourselves here today grappling with the problem of attempting to put in place in this country a truly Canadian Constitution. It may very well be that there are some people who feel our first legislative priorities at this time should be inflation, unemployment and energy. This is understandable.

We as members of this particular Parliament of Canada do not enjoy the luxury of that option. Each and every one of us sat in this very chamber less than a year ago and said, or stood by as our colleagues, said, to the people of Quebec in their hour of decision, "Separatism is not the answer; change can come about; it will come about; we can have our own Constitution; we can make it all happen." That is what we as members of Parliament said to the people of Quebec only a few months ago. The ink on the pages of Hansard which record for posterity those commitments to the people in every corner of the province of Quebec is barely dry. Those are the commitments we made. That is why we are engaged in a constitutional debate here today. That is why all of us must work together until the new Constitution is a reality.

The good work of the joint committee is over. We have before us the product of their months of labour. We are all indebted to the members of the joint committee for their contribution to Canada at this difficult time in her history. The resolution of this House which was referred to the joint committee was returned to us with due dispatch and many improvements. It remains for us now to carry on where they left off.

The committee's report to this House was another signal to the people of Quebec that our commitments to them were made in good faith and that the Parliament of Canada is fully capable of bringing those commitments to fruition. No one anywhere in this country at this time should be labouring under any delusion on this point.

The commitments of which I have spoken were the solemn commitments of this Parliament, given with the full support of the people of Canada, and they will be honoured. It must also be remembered that these commitments were not given to the government of the province of Quebec or any other province. The commitments were to the people of Quebec in particular, and to the people of Canada in general. This is a very significant point which ought not to be overlooked.

It is a fair question to ask: What was the general nature of the initial commitments made to the people of Quebec and Canada? The Speech from the Throne explained as follows:

Because my government wants to strengthen the spirit of Canadian unity and nurture the seeds of renewal, it promises to interpret a vote of "no" to sovereignty-association as a vote for the rebuilding of the Canadian federation. My government also promises to give effect to a "no" vote by mobilizing all the forces at its command in order to ensure the renewal of the federation in a spirit of respect and justice for all.

Using these words as a reminder, we must remember that all Canadians promised constitutional renewal without delay if Quebecers voted "no" in the May 20 referendum.

It is also fair to set out in general terms some of the things to which we did not commit ourselves in the spring of 1980. We did not commit ourselves to increasing the power of the provinces in the areas into which some of them would now like to venture. We did not commit ourselves to strengthening the provinces vis-à-vis the central government. We certainly did not commit ourselves to 50 more years of colonialism if some of the provincial governments, for their own reasons, attempted to block constitutional reform.

We all fully appreciate that debates pertaining to constitutions, jurisdictional powers and national symbols become very emotional, especially as between the participants. Once outside the forum for such debates, the emotion generated is usually more temperate and subdued.

I offer in support of this proposition the Canadian flag debate. Many of the present members of the House were actual participants therein. To the participants, those debates were highly emotional. To outsiders like myself at the time, they could be aptly and less emotionally described as "the pits", as our young people say. We ought not to take ourselves too seriously and attempt to generate a lot of steam when there is no turbine that requires it.

While the constitutional problems of this country have top priority because of the commitments we made, we must all co-operate to permit the essential day-to-day work of Parliament to proceed and to keep the constitutional debate in proper perspective.

While the people of my riding expect me to participate in the furtherance of the commitments of Parliament to constitutional reform, I would be misleading the House were I to leave the impression that they perceive the issue with the same emotion and importance some members may be tempted to ascribe to it in the heat of debate. Nothing could be further from the truth. They want the constitutional debate kept in its proper perspective.

As I have indicated, we must not permit the separatist Premier of Quebec, Mr. Lévesque, to lead us to a dead end. We must not permit him to lead us and the premiers who follow him blindly to default on our commitments to the people of Quebec. As I said, our commitments were not to the separatist government of Quebec but to the people of Quebec. Of course, that is a real distinction. Mr. Lévesque never had a mandate for separation from the people of Quebec. On his ego trip to become its president, he forgot that the people of Quebec, like the people of British Columbia, Alberta, Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, for example, are first and foremost Canadians. This is their country, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, regardless of the province in which they may happen to reside. We will not bargain away at any price their right to live and to work in the province or territory of their choice.

It has been said, with some accuracy, that politicians make strange bedfellows. Such was certainly the case during the constitutional debate. The Premiers of British Columbia, Alberta, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, for example, were in bed with René Lévesque. He is a man whose personal ambitions prevented him from seeing the vision of a great nation from sea to sea, a vision for which the great Canadians who reside in the province of Quebec opted on May 20, 1980. In the year 2000 what will historians say about that unholy alliance? It was an alliance led by a man whose vision of Canada was confined to the boundaries of Quebec, a man hell-bent for election to destroy this country and from whom Canadian history will soon reserve only a footnote. The premiers of those provinces to which I have alluded will find out what René Lévesque did on May 20, 1980. They are leading, but no one is following.

Mr. Speaker, seldom in a federal state is the process of putting a constitution in place an easy one. For more than 50 years we in Canada have been unsuccessful in this regard. In recent years the growth in the political and economic powers of the provinces has tended to make the process even more difficult. In some provinces, principles which were universally accepted ever since confederation were suddenly put in issue. It became obvious to the federal government that the views of Canada as a nation, as expressed by certain premiers, were contrary to the views commonly held by most Canadians. There was a move on behalf of the premiers of certain provinces—not only Quebec—to delay the process of constitutional development in an effort to destroy or weaken the position of the federal government in its efforts to act aggressively in the national interest when circumstances warranted such action. Thus, it soon became obvious to those watching the scene closely that the breakdown in the process was being caused by the different view of Canada taken by some provincial premiers.

It is perhaps understandable if provinces tend to act independently in their own self-interest. It may even be normal for provinces to pursue additional powers to protect what they perceive as their own regional interest. However, over and above the regional interest is the national interest; and where regional interest conflicts with national interest, the national interest must prevail. If that is a principle which a particular premier cannot accept, then it is obvious that the concept of a true Canadian nation will not be acceptable to him. If a nation cannot insist that the national interest must prevail in a time of regional conflict, then it will soon disappear.

The legitimate interests of all the people of Canada from sea to sea must be the concern of the federal government at all times. Some of the premiers want a loose association of provinces, free from the ties of a national economic fabric, free from a dedication to sharing, and without a strong, viable and caring national government. This they are not entitled to in constitutional law. This the people of Canada will not permit us to surrender to them. This they will never enjoy. To reach unanimity we will not barter the fundamental rights and freedoms of the people of Canada.

Our rights and freedoms are not the produce of the marketplace. Our perception of the willingness of the Canadian people to accept the practice of sharing is unbecoming the agenda of a federal-provincial conference. Our independence as a nation with our own Constitution is a commitment to Canadians which calls upon all of us to act now. The time for bargaining is long past.

It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that politics is the art of the possible. As a politician, I am prepared to accept that our legislative handiwork is subject to this limitation. With our legislative enactments, the dream becomes the reality of the times; the perfect clause become the consensus clause; and the ultimate statute is the one which survives the process.

With this particular resolution before the House one might ask the question: What is possible at this time in our development? Everyone will have his or her answer to this question. The witnesses who appeared before the joint committee tended to express the opinion that the resolution was not wide enough. As a result, certain wide-ranging amendments were made during the committee stage. It therefore appears possible at this time for Canada to have the following: patriation of her Constitution; her own made-in-Canada Constitution with a charter of rights and fundamental freedoms enshrined therein, an amending formula, language rights, women's rights, native peoples' rights, rights for the disabled, the right of residents to work in any province or territory, recognition of the multicultural heritage of Canadians, and a commitment by the federal government and the provinces to sharing among the provinces, to ensure that all provinces are able to provide their residents with essential services at a cost they can afford. In broad terms, Mr. Speaker, that is what is now possible. It is the minimum. History will judge us harshly if we deliver less. To deliver much more at this point in time may be impossible.

I want to conclude by referring to the historic proceedings of the joint committee of January 30, 1981. That is a day to remember in the history of our country. That is the day we laid the foundation for a new beginning in Canada. I appreciate that every Canadian will find a specific provision in our new Constitution which to him or her will be the cornerstone. That is understandable. For many, Part III of the Constitution pertaining to equalization and regional disparities will be the key provisions. Still others will discover their own preferences; for example, women's rights, the rights of the disabled and the like. All will understand that the new Constitution is only the foundation for the new beginning of which I have spoken. Much work remains to be done. Still, it will give us a firm foundation on which to build a better Canada.

To the nation builders of the future we will leave a strong foundation; but still the task will not be easy. There will be times in the future when some members will stand in this very House and say that the members of the Thirty-second Parliament were dreamers, that we gave them goals impossible to achieve. To those future members of this House who will be troubled because of the magnitude of what is expected of them—I would like to say, through the pages of Hansard, that while we gave them a foundation for a magnificent edifice, we were also careful to ensure that they had the necessary human and natural resources.

If shared, the natural resource base in this country is adequate to complete the task—and we have not really begun to use our human resources to the fullest. We ask the future nation builders to give to women full and equal opportunity in the true sense and meaning of those words. We also invite them in future to look to our native peoples and the disabled for strength, guidance and wisdom. These reservoirs of human resources have been almost totally ignored in the past. They have been ignored not only to the detriment of women, native peoples and the disabled, but to the detriment of our country in general. If this and future generations fail to make full use of the human resources to which I have just referred, then truly the goals that we in the Thirty-second Parliament set will, in fact, be impossible to achieve.

I am sure that on January 30, 1981, the distinguished member of the New Democratic Party for the Northwest Territories also had these untapped human resources in mind when the joint committee voted to include the rights of the aboriginal peoples in the Constitution, and when he said these historic words: "Together we will build a great nation."

Mr. Lorne McCuish (Prince George-Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a great day in my life to have the opportunity now to speak in this House on the Constitution of Canada. The Constitution is not just a symbol of the country, it should also be the working document which would be used to define the relationship between the federal and provincial partners in confederation.

As I rise in my place, I stand to make an appeal to those Canadians who truly believe in our parliamentary system of government and the workings of our truly unique democracy. However, I feel that this democracy is in jeopardy.

Although I represent but a small part of the country, I should not be considered to be any less a Canadian than other representatives in this chamber. I have a great sadness in my heart because this resolution will ultimately cause me to be less a Canadian due to the amending formula therein. Should this resolution become law, British Columbians would become second-class citizens.

I also have a sense of sadness because some time soon, when I rise to participate in any debate in this House, I could well be representing a province which has been given a status much less meaningful than Ontario or Quebec, for example. That status would hurt me and millions of western Canadians who believe in a federal state. Tradition will be changed, convention will be changed, and these qualities will no longer be prevalent in Canada.

Putting political affiliation aside, if we are able to bring our Constitution home and make changes for the good of the people by patriating the BNA Act, there should be no change in the status of Canadians simply because they may live in a certain region. Every Canadian should feel that his or her representative in Parliament has an equal voice and an equal vote in the House of Commons. If this resolution is accepted without amendment, the equality respected by all of Canada will no longer exist because this House is being overshadowed by the singular view of a singular individual who has decided that this is the way it will be done, and he will let no one else try to influence his vision. He says, "We will play my game until I decide the game will finish." Canadians do not wish to play games with their future or their Constitution.

When one speaks of credibility, one should look at the last federal election. During the 1980 election campaign, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made five basic commitments to the Canadian people on which he sought re-election. First, he promised better management of the finances of the nation. Second, the Prime Minister promised energy security and fair prices for oil. Third, he promised to develop an industrial strategy which would provide jobs, spur growth, and increase Canadian ownership and control. Fourth, he promised a government which would realize the aspirations of the provinces and the economic contributions and potential of each region. His fifth promise was to enhance the security of individuals by helping those who most needed assistance.

If the Liberals were returned to power, the Prime Minister promised an economic package which would bring Canada out of its present recession. There was no mention of patriating the Constitution. The Prime Minister was given no mandate from the people to proceed with unilateral action. Mr. Speaker, would you buy a used car from that man?

This status hurts me. I am glad to see that a few of the hon. members of the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party have decided to support the official opposition in objecting to the Prime Minister's attempt to singularly seduce Canada. We witness the workings of a man who, through his manipulative manoeuvres in this Parliament, has made a mockery of this House. Respect for Parliament and its tradition has been permanently damaged and is now forever mangy. Decisions are no longer made here in Canada, and Canada has lost a place where its interests are protected.

I fear that my words and the words of my colleagues will go unnoticed by the Prime Minister. That is one of the most unfortunate realities fo this debate. This government is insensitive to the needs of Canadians. It is a government which refuses to recognize that we are headed for a destiny of complete and ultimate destruction as a nation.

The Prime Minister must dream about the Constitution when he sleeps at night. He must dream about his place in history. He must dream about Canadians flocking behind him, as he has trained his flock of sheep across the floor. However, the Prime Minister's dream will soon become a nightmare for every Canadian and for generations of future Canadians. I stand here with heavy heart to appeal to those who have unconsciously accepted the dream of the Prime Minister. Members opposite should take a sober look at what may happen to this country.

I would like to quote the point made recently by Manitoba MLA, Sydney Green. He states:

> The question now in dispute is whether we are going to continue to enjoy parliamentary democracy as we know it, which presumes that legislators do not confer rights either by stating them or declaring them. According to the common law principles under which we operate, the citizen has every right except that which has been expressly taken away by Parliament.
> We are being asked to change to a system whereby Parliament declares rights, and then these rights are not interpreted by Parliament, but are interpreted by an appointed judiciary, which is not responsible to the public, and which, for the future, in the absence of a constitutional amendment—and we know how difficult that is to obtain—has these matters under its jurisdiction.

On that fateful day in December, 1979, when the Conservative government was defeated in this House, hon. members of the New Democratic Party demonstrated their total lack of any semblance of intestinal fortitude. At that time they dismissed out of hand any wish or will to experience short-term pain for long-term gain. Small wonder, then, that just one year later, after a sordid display of political prostitution, they leaped on the Liberals' three-wheel bandwagon which called for short-term gain for long-term pain—short-term gain for them and long-term pain for the people of Canada. They did this solely to bask in the sordid limelight of the Prime Minister's constitutional proposals.

Before coming to this House I had a degree of respect for the New Democratic Party. While I did not agree with its socialistic philosophies, I gave it credit for being principled. How naive I was! The little red rump has displayed many traits in my presence in this House, but not one of them is based on principle. This has proven to me that its members, are nothing more than Liberals lap dogs. It is time we supplied Members of Parliament with uniforms, for how else can we distinguish the NDP from the Liberals? Time and time again we have seen the NDP barter here and bicker there, selling their principles for some paltry political gain. But they say that that is part of the game; that that is what politics is all about. That is fine. Let them indulge in their puny political pastimes with other forms of legislation, but not with our Constitution, our rights, our freedoms or our very future.

Fortunately, there are a few hon. members to my left, and many across the floor, who recognize the fine distinction between the enshrining and entombing of our rights. Fortunately, these members have the courage and forethought to break with their leaders, recognizing that our Constitution should be the product of our people, not the passing fancies and whims of political autocrats.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, before this resolution comes to a vote in this House, other members opposite and to my left will regain their pride and draw courage from the stand taken by their colleagues. Surely they will realize that their constituents, not their leaders, sent them here, and sent them here to represent the electors.

Let me ask you, Mr. Speaker, will we as Canadians be proud of our new Constitution once it becomes totally Canadian? Will we be proud of the fact that there is so much opposition to this resolution? Will we feel comfortable once we see a new and patriated Constitution as law? Can every member in the House say with sincerity that this is a Constitution based on the input and co-operation of all Canadians and elected bodies?

Obviously, the answer to all those questions is an emphatic No! No, this Constitution will not be the result of consultation and co-operation. Canadians will not decide how it is to be done. Unilateralism and the guillotine style of debate has formed our Constitution. Parliament has been left out of the process. This debate is just a formality in the eyes of the Prime Minister. Once this debate comes to an end, the Prime Minister will have his way and will be happy. He will be able to walk away knowing full well that he again overstepped his boundaries, continuing his manifestation of supremacy. Is that democracy?

For a moment, Mr. Speaker, allow me to comment on three attitudes which speckle—like fly specks—this constitutional resolution. These attitudes are arrogance, duplicity and incredibility.

Arrogance is not something you are born with, it is something that grows on you, like a big, green wart! The author and mover of this constitutional nightmare has a real doozie of a dose of arrogance. The Prime Minister, determined above all else to go down in Canadian history as the midwife of patriation, will do or say anything to force his will on this wonderful country and to hit high "C" in his swan song to the Canadian political scene.

Try on some of these incredible quotes for size, Mr. Speaker. As we all know, the Prime Minister loves to create adversity. He has stated in the past: "The kind of opposition we bring against ourselves, I find invigorating." Or: "Yes, we are being divisive." Or: "I must have had a hell of a tongue in cheek." Or: "I'll put in any amendment you want, so long as you pass the package." In another quote, Mr. Speaker, listing his priorities, he said: "The Queen falls somewhere after skiing and avocados." The Prime Minister has the gall to say that "Until God comes in and does it, we have to believe in a sovereign people." The Prime Minister insults our belief in God and says he believes in the sovereignty of the people. Why, then, does he not permit the people to participate and decide how this constitutional question should be handled? The Prime Minister puts the cap on it when he insults our belief in the supremacy of God.

A constitution should be the seed of national harmony, not the funeral rites of respect and understanding. A constitution should have heritage for its father and inspiration for its mother.

Mr. Speaker, let me speak about credibility—credibility in the eyes and ears of the public. Let me just demonstrate with some crystal clear evidence that the public is not so easily duped as the Prime Minister believes.

We talk of human rights. Is the Prime Minister violating human rights by expounding this resolution to us? He choked and will continue to choke the right of representatives to contribute and involve themselves in this debate. He ignores the premiers; he moves into provincial territory and revokes their constitutional rights.

When we speak of fundamental rights and freedoms, it is important for Canadians to know how they may be affected when this resolution becomes law. I firmly believe that Canadians will lose basic rights if this charter is accepted. The first right is the individual enjoyment of property without fear of confiscation by the government. Mr. Speaker, this right is no longer protected.

If we look back in history, the right to own property has always been protected in Canada; it is a right stemming from the Magna Carta. It has been upheld in Canada's courts and statute law. It was reconfirmed in the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights and is protected internationally through the United Nations Charter of Human Rights. The Prime Minister has sold Canadians down the river for the support of the NDP. The Prime Minister has sold the property rights of the people for the sake of NDP support.

Canadians may believe that once they own property the government will never attempt to confiscate that property. That is not true. There is a provision within the proposed charter which makes all previous laws protecting property completely void. Therefore, rights given under past laws that are not included in this Constitution are overridden.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the question of equalization arises. Again, tucked away within the resolution is the provision that the central government has given itself the right to do what it pleases under the so-called equalization scheme.

Should this resolution pass into law, the Government of Canada could redistribute provincial revenue without the consent or co-operation of any province. The federal government could walk into my province of British Columbia and redirect resource revenue for the sake of central Canada. Equalization can be beneficial only if it is carried out in a manner which benefits everyone. The present plan will give the central government the right to take without justification.

Not only property rights are omitted from the Constitution. By omission we will also lose the ancient, democratic right of trial before a court that is independent from government interference. Even the infamous War Measures Act is incorporated in the new Constitution. Under that provision, the government can send anyone to prison for mere political agitation. One need not break the law; if one even apprehends insurrection, the government can act.

Even if a person is accused of an unproven crime, the right to a quick and lawful trial is no longer guaranteed. Habeas corpus, the ancient guarantee of trial, is gone and is replaced by Section 11(b). The government may now decide what is a "reasonable" time to bring about a trial.

Nor can one count on being humanely treated in prison. The term "cruel and unusual treatment" contained in Section 12 is very ambiguous. A daily beating is not considered "cruel and unusual" in many countries.

The loss of those vitally important rights that have been enjoyed in this democracy will be disastrous for all Canadians. However, western Canadians will suffer much worse results. Western Canada will become the colony of central Canada. The amending formula gives Ontario and Quebec a permanent veto over the wishes of the rest of Canada. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that permanent agitation between the west and the east will prove to be the most destructive element of the Prime Minister's resolution.

There is not a totalitarian country in the world which allows property rights; there is not a free country in the world which does not allow property rights.

These are but a few of my concerns, but they point to the grave dangers of entrenchment. A government which would damn the torpedoes and ram this horrendous piece of legislation down the throats of Canadians would use a Model T Ford plan for a moon shot.

Let me illustrate the fallacies contained in this constitutional package. We have witnessed a major confrontation over the control of resources which were retained by the province of British Columbia 110 years ago when it became a full partner in confederation. In 1867, the provinces retained control of their natural resources under Section 109 of the British North America Act. In addition, the Constitution further provided that those resources belonging to the provinces were not liable to taxation. Provincial control made good sense then and it makes good sense now. The federal government now appears to be saying that our resource revenues should be pre-empted in the national interest. The problem is the difficulty in understanding their definition of the national interest.

• (1600)

Canada is a diverse partnership of peoples with linguistic, cultural and regional interests. The survival of that partnership is now being subjected to considerable strain because of the absence of economic, political and legal recognition of those interests.

When we talk about introducing a charter of rights, we should remember that one of the most basic rights in a federation is for the component parts to participate in any change. The provinces are part of the Canadian democracy. To reject their views in the ultimate decision is a fundamental breach of a democratic right.

A serious problem is bound to occur where provincial legislation will be invalidated under the proposed charter of rights. If such a provision is tested, will the courts find that the federal government succeeded in unilaterally altering the basic law affecting property and civil rights, or of any rights of any province without the consent of the provincial government which is required by convention? That is unlikely. Do we accept the view of the current Minister of Justice of Canada (Mr. Chrétien), who does not wish to refer the issue to our Supreme Court "because the Supreme Court is very unreliable—?"

Being supportive of provincial rights is part of being a Canadian. Our nation is composed of both federal and provincial governments. Indeed, the provincial contributions have been an integral part of making our country what it is today. I take exception to being the target of those who wrap their policy and political acts in the flag of our country and, by implication, demean members who were elected to speak on behalf of a federal state within the confederation of Canada. My objective and duty is also to defend those rights retained by our province as a term and condition of entering confederation.

The political reality in Canada is that our federal government is elected or defeated east of the Manitoba border. The western provinces, in the national context, are in a political wilderness.

Since the Prime Minister failed to secure even a majority consensus in Canada, he now asks the British members of parliament to interfere in the internal affairs of Canada by amending our federal Constitution without agreement of the partners in our confederation.

How can one who is prepared to sacrifice provincial rights be a Canadian federalist? Where is the massive public acceptance of the Prime Minister's initiative?

We must remind ourselves that for a Constitution to endure it must be built on the broadest possible consensus. Confederation was framed accordingly. Further, it has been built on trust, equity and fairness. The Prime Minister cannot prosper in the absence of an atmosphere of strife and bickering. Does he have in mind the same polarization in the west that was authored in Quebec? The question really is: Are the western provinces to be full partners in a federal state or are they to be reduced to quasi-municipal status effectively controlled by the government in Ottawa?

The combination of no federal representation on the government side from the three most western provinces and no participation by those same provinces in formulating either a national energy policy or constitutional changes results in these provinces effectively being left out of Canada. It seems so strange that our federal government, a regional government electorally, would precipitate such a move. In the three most western provinces there is not one member of Parliament elected on the government side. Why is that? The answer may be that the federal government espouses a centralist policy which consistently imposes tariffs to protect industry in central Canada, subsidizes production and finances exports of products manufactured in central Canada, imposes import quotas on western Canada, and continually frustrates expansion of a transportation network.

The resolution places importance on fundamental freedoms and human rights. I am the first to accept their importance but I must raise a major issue with their concept because they may well be infringing on the rights of citizens in the west by the introduction of a discriminatory tax on western resources.

I have some difficulty in drawing a distinction between natural gas and oil in British Columbia and Alberta, potash and uranium in Saskatchewan, and iron ore and nickel in central Canada. Petroleum products are not different from mineral products other than in their physical characteristics. How do you reconcile differences of such magnitude?

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister, whether he has given sufficient consideration to what he may well precipitate? Consider the scholarly opinion that——it would be unwise to proceed with patriation of the Canadian Constitution in the absence of agreement on an amending procedure.

Consider the judicial opinion that the Constitution——embodies a compromise under which the original provinces agree to federate. As the years go on legislation and court decisions ought not to be allowed to dim or whittle down the provisions of the original contract upon which the federation was founded.

I was truly impressed with the thoughtfulness of the 1972 Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, which held the view that patriation without provincial consent would be most unwise. The authors of that report were further compelled to express——the fear, on the other hand, that, if it was not so grounded, there might be a legal gap which might conceivably lead to a court's invalidating the whole new Constitution.

One of the joint chairmen of this report was the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan), a legal scholar, the man who led the Canadian delegation to London to seek unilateral patriation with a federally imposed amending formula.

The Prime Minister seeks to persuade us that the economic pie is larger and that the western provinces are greedy not to share. The fact is that the economic pie is exactly the same size, but the federal government wants a larger piece. This is a power struggle and a struggle for economic control. We are foolish if we let it appear to be an exercise in national unity with the west being fractious rebels. The west need not apologize. British Columbia and Alberta are the major contributors to equalization. We share our prosperity with our partners in confederation.

British Columbians alone now pay $1 billion annually in protective tariffs toward eastern manufactured producs, textiles and footwear, not to mention additional consumer costs attributable to import quotas. Alberta is subsidizing the industrial base of central Canada with oil at less than one half the world price.

I raise these constitutional policy concerns to emphasize the need to return to the bargaining table. It is like a work stoppage in an essential public service. The best solution to prevent public harm is an agreement between the parties who, when they come together and reason together, always find a solution. The package which the Prime Minister seeks to impose unilaterally will lock in all governments forever more. It can only be undone by his self-imposed amending formula.

It troubles me deeply to say what I have said, but then we all know how forceful are honest words. The federal policies are a bitter pill for me to swallow because I, for one, will not support any movement to divide my country.

I am no constitutional expert, I am a Canadian. I can only speak from my heart. My heart tells me that this country will not be the same as it was prior to the Prime Minister's vision. One must look to the heart for guidance. Somehow I believe the Liberals have not searched their hearts and their consciences to find the true definition of Canada.

● (1610)

The Prime Minister addressed students at Osgoode Hall in Toronto a while ago. I was shocked when he said:

If the people of Canada are not prepared to assume their burden and duty in speaking their will over the heads of their elected premiers, I say they are not a nation.

That makes my blood boil, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister suggesting by that statement that Canadians should ignore their elected public leaders and heed only his own personal view? What will happen? Will the Prime Minister abolish the municipal, regional and provincial governments? Are we really on our way to a singular form of government? It was stated in an editorial in the Edmonton Journal that, as he has before, the Prime Minister had admitted his willingness to barter away principles to achieve his own end. He has said, "I am a political realist, it is as simple as that." If that is political realism, the Prime Minister would sell his soul to be remembered as a great Canadian. I assure him that we will remember him but we will not forgive or forget.

The Prime Minister has launched an attack on the Prime Minister of Great Britain and suggested that the British are interfering in our affairs. Mr. Speaker, the government is asking another government to rubber stamp legislation that has no public support in Canada. If Britain passes this resolution unchallenged and forces us to accept its action in the knowledge that the majority of Canadians are not in favour of such legislation, then I would say that Britain is interfering in our affairs.

Britain will have a say in the matter whether the Prime Minister likes it or not. However, I feel it is wrong for the government to thrust a resolution on to the British parliament and ask it to rubber stamp his request simply because he has decided that he wishes it to be done that way. Britain should not decide what should happen to our Constitution. We want to patriate it, so let us do it. The only request that should be made of Britain is: Send our Constitution to Canada and let Canadians include whatever changes they want. Let Canadians decide how they will form their future. It is our Constitution and we should treat it as such.

I pray to God that this government will realize the mistake it intends to make. However, Mr. Speaker, this government will not accept God.

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the schedule consequential thereto.

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour and privilege to rise and take part in this historic debate concerning the proposed resolution for a joint address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada. I would like to say how much I enjoyed the experience and challenge as a member of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada and I, too, Mr. Speaker, would like to add my congratulations to the joint chairmen on a job well done.

I know all Canadians feel strongly that we must have our own Constitution here in Canada and that we must patriate the British North America Act. I also know that there has been unanimous agreement in this House on the need for patriation with an amending formula. That is why I doubt that any Canadian would say no when asked whether or not the BNA Act should be patriated. I feel equally certain that no Canadian would say we should patriate without an amending formula.

What is this proposed resolution that we have been discussing and debating in committee and in the House for the last five months? What are we asking the British parliament to do? First, we are asking them to patriate the BNA Act. Second, we have the amending formula and, third, the charter of rights and freedoms as well as equalization. We will be asking them to pass a package called the Canada Act. They do not have to discuss the substance; all we want is for them to return our Constitution with the right to amend it here.

For many years now the federal government and provinces have been studying the various amending formulae. The proposed resolution contains the government's position on the Victoria formula. Dr. La Forest, who appeared before our committee, headed a study group which, after four years of searching and studying, came up with this formula. It was accepted and agreed to by the ten provinces and the federal government at the 1971 federal-provincial conference as being the best formula. What does the Victoria formula provide? It provides, Mr. Speaker, that six provinces—two in the Atlantic region, Quebec, Ontario, and two western provinces representing 50 per cent of the population of the west—must agree in order to pass a constitutional amendment. That is the Victoria formula.

The opposition has wanted from the very beginning patriation and an amending formula. The government does not differ with them on what we want from the British parliament. However, they say we should use the Vancouver formula. Well, what is the Vancouver formula? There must be the agreement of seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population.

The opposition is beginning to find out that this formula is not too popular. Why? Because the provinces only last summer reached consensus on further study of the Vancouver formula. Why? Because in that formula, Mr. Speaker, there is a provision that a province which does not agree with an amendment may opt out. In other words, not all provinces of Canada will be the same. What about the Supreme Court? How would they interpret the rights of one province compared to another? Where is equality of rights across Canada if the provinces can opt out?

Let us compare the two formulae as they relate to the Atlantic provinces. Under the Victoria formula three provinces from the Atlantic area may veto an amendment. Under the Vancouver formula four provinces, all the Atlantic provinces, would be required to agree in order to veto an amendment. I say that that is a poor position in which to put the Atlantic provinces.

I would also like to point out that under the proposed resolution of the government there is a two-year period for the provinces to come up with an alternative formula. If there is disagreement between the parties at that time, a referendum will be held to break the deadlock on an amending formula. Ultimately the people will have to decide if the provinces and the federal government cannot agree on an amending formula. There is nothing wrong in this. Why should the people not break the deadlock of their governments? In my view we must proceed with the Victoria formula.

Recently when the minority report was submitted the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said that he would accept a one-year period to work out the difficulties in the Vancouver formula. I have already demonstrated that those difficulties exist, and I am sure there are many others of which we are not aware because of lack of study. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition now realizes that there are many unresolved problems with respect to the Vancouver formula.

But who will decide the deadlock after one year has elapsed? Under the Vancouver formula the people will not. Thus the question is whether a province can opt out of an amending formula if it does not like it.

If the Leader of the Opposition and the Conservative Party had not made this constitutional proposal into a political issue but, rather like the New Democratic Party, tried to attain the best proposed resolution, I am sure we would have seen Parliament at its best, with the true concerns of all Canadians at heart, bringing our Constitution to Canada with an amending formula and thus standing firm for a strong central government and strong provinces. This is not a matter on which there should be so much disagreement among national parties.

Let me turn now to the other area which is in this proposed resolution, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and equalization. It was in this area that I feel the committee was most effective in its work. The committee was faced with a document which the government had prepared in an attempt to meet the concerns of the provinces. The committee listened to the many witnesses who appeared before it. Revisions were made and the document before us represents some 60 major amendments—not technical amendments, but major amendments—which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) accepted.

The vast majority of the witnesses who came before us from all parts of Canada favoured an entrenched charter of rights and freedoms. They proposed amendments and at times asked the committee to go further than the proposed Charter of Rights and Freedoms went. They asked that it be entrenched because they felt that after patriation and an amending formula there would never be an opportunity again to put into place a charter of rights and freedoms which would express the basic rights of all Canadians.

The official opposition would now like to see a charter of rights, but only after patriation and an amending formula have been returned from the British Parliament. But how can we entrench a charter with the Vancouver formula, which allows for opting out?

The committee heard witnesses from across Canada. They were representatives of the Canadian public. They were Canadians who demonstrated their interest by coming to the committee or writing to the committee. These representations enabled the parliamentarians of Canada to respond and to improve the charter. The demand of the official opposition today is to do away with all that and to start all over again. That would be a regressive step. It would take away from the public the process which was so effective before our committee. It would leave rights and freedoms in the hands of the provinces to barter and trade them off behind closed doors.

What we have accomplished is a charter made in Canada incorporating the basic rights that belong to the people in every part of Canada. They are not to be denied by any legislature unless a court deems that such legislature has shown a justified reason promoting the greater good. In fact, one of the greatest accomplishments of the committee was the changing of clause 1, which gave power to the courts—and not to Parliament or the legislatures—to define or make rulings with respect to the rights of Canadians. I will read Clause 1 into the record again today:

> The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

I return again to the idea of this Charter of Rights and Freedoms having been made in Canada. We have the Official Languages Act now. We have equalization. We have a bill of rights. Unfortunately, the clause I have just read is not in that bill of rights, which renders it ineffective in overcoming Parliament's intentions with respect to other acts.

We have human rights legislation. There should be mobility rights for all Canadians. Only recently have Canadians been stopped from working in a province because they did not reside in that province. Again I say that this charter has been made in Canada. All we are asking is that when an amending formula is being passed in the proposed Canada Act, we entrench these basic rights as well as the amending formula.

Let me once again review these basic rights and freedoms which the charter guarantees to all Canadians. There are the fundamental freedoms, which include freedom of conscience and religion, freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, freedom of the press and other media of information and freedom of peaceful assembly and association. We have democratic rights which ensure the continuation of elections and that every person has the right to vote in an election. We have mobility rights which enshrine the right of every Canadian to move freely from one province to another, to establish a residence, to seek a job anywhere in Canada as well as to enter, remain in or leave the country. We have minority language educational rights which provide that citizens of the English-speaking or French-speaking minority of a province have the right to educate their children in that minority language wherever numbers warrant.

Official language rights will be entrenched, which will provide for the right to use English or French in Parliament, in federal courts and in communications with any head or central office of the Government of Canada. We have legal rights, among them the right to life, liberty and security and the right to equality before the law. We have non-discrimination rights, Clause 15, which has been called the "equal rights" clause. It protects citizens from discrimination on the basis of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex or physical or mental disability.

I would like at this time to take a few moments to talk about the question of sex and Clause 15. I think I put my views forward as many times as possible to all the groups which came before us. My preference would have been the specific recommendation put forward by the Human Rights Commission, which was to add a subclause to Clause 1 of the proposal which would have provided that this charter guarantees the equal right of men and women to enjoy the rights and freedoms set out in the charter. I felt we would have come a long way if we had accepted that type of statement without having to put it into the equal rights clause, Clause 15. I felt that would be a broader way of registering rights for all men and women. However, many of the groups which came before us—the Advisory Council on the Status of Women and some of the others—felt that Clause 15 was a more plausible approach.

I would also like to say that had that recommendation been accepted, we would not have to wait three years before stopping any infringement of the rights of women. That provision would have become effective immediately. I say that because I have an interest in that area.

● (1630)

The next area has to do with the handicapped, and again the provision dealing with the handicapped was shown to be truly effective. The groups which came before us all thought the handicapped in Canada should have their rights included in the charter of rights, and that physical and mental disabilities should be included in the provision on equality rights in Section 15.

The committee also decided to add to the charter a provision having to do with the multiculturalism heritage of Canada. The provision states that the charter shall be interpreted in such a manner as to give consideration to the preservation and enhancement of the multiculturalism of the people of Canada.

Finally, although this item is last on the list it is probably one of the most effective provisions of the committee. I wish to refer to the fine work done by the native people of Canada in their presentation to the committee and to parliamentarians who were not members of the committee. They asked that recognition of aboriginal and treaty rights of the Indian, Inuit and Metis people of Canada be included in the charter.

The next matter to which I should like to refer deals with equalization payments. It goes without saying that the Parliament and the Government of Canada are committed to the principle of making equalization payments to the poorer provinces. We call them the "have-not" provinces. I come from one of those provinces and I can say we have benefited greatly from the whole process of equalization. The provision states that both orders of government will be committed to prompting equal opportunities for Canadians, furthering economic development to reduce disparities, and providing essential public services at a reasonable level to all Canadians. This was the best draft agreed to by the provinces in September, 1980.

The resolution before us, Mr. Speaker, gives rights to the people of Canada. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms takes rights from the legislatures and Parliament, and gives them to the people. In my opinion, these rights and the amending formula cannot be bartered for. They are areas which concern all Canadians and they must be incorporated in the Constitution so that neither the weak nor the strong areas in Canada need compete for those things which should be basic rights and privileges for all Canadians.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, may I leave you with one thought. There is a consensus across Canada that constitutional change should be made. This is the first step and there will be many more in the future of Canada, but there is consensus on patriation with an amending formula and a charter of rights and freedoms. Once we have achieved a workable amending formula, we will be able to tackle some of the problems involved in the redistribution of the powers between the federal and provincial governments, without taking away basic rights that belong to the Canadian people. This could include redistribution in areas such as communications, where there is almost an agreement between the federal government and the provinces, and in the area of family law. If we had an amending formula, we would not have to go back to the British parliament to amend our family law, or provisions regarding communications in the British North America Act. All we are doing is taking the first step. We are making it possible for future amendments to our Constitution to be made in Canada.

Inevitably there are differences as to the substance of these changes, but there is also a great deal of harmony of thought. We as Canadians have to start this process of change. As Disraeli said, "Change is inevitable in a progressive country, change is constant."

I am pleased to have been part of this process of change, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in this immortal debate on the Constitution on behalf of my constituents in Fundy-Royal. Before starting my comments, I should like to congratulate, the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish) for his fine presentation this afternoon on this vital issue, and for his representations on behalf of his constituents. I should also like to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. McBain), and the hon. member for South West Nova (Miss Campbell), both of whom did a creditable job of putting forth their points of view. Unfortunately, I believe they are misdirected and misguided. However, they spoke with sincerity and with the wish to serve the interests of this nation.

I was interested this afternoon to hear the motion put forward under Standing Order 43 by the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang) that this House extend its hours of sitting so we could conclude the debate on the Constitution. Unfortunately, it is only too obvious to Canadians and to those of us who serve on this side of the House that the government would like nothing better than to conclude the debate on the Constitution. I can tell the hon. member for Kitchener that one of the ways in which the government could settle this issue once and for all is by holding a referendum in Canada now; a referendum which would make clear what should be written into the Constitution. But, of course, the government will not do that. I will go further, Mr. Speaker, and challenge the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government to call an election on this vital and important issue. But of course that will not happen either.

An hon. Member: Chickens.

Mr. Corbett: They are aware that the position they have taken is extremely unpopular in the constituency of Canada, and that they would not stand a chance of winning an election were they to go to the people on this vital issue. There is no question in my mind, nor is there one in the minds of the majority of Canadians, that if an election were called on this issue the Progressive Conservative Party would win it and would form a government under the leadership of the hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark). The reason the government will not call an election is simply that the name of the game is power. The goal of the Prime Minister is, first, to obtain power for himself, and second, to obtain power for the government.

In starting my remarks on this constitutional issue I should like to read an unsolicited song that was sent to me by a very important constituent of mine in Fundy-Royal, a girl in grade 11 whom I have never met. She wrote:

Canada, my homeland fair,
I'd give my life for thee,
If by my humble death I'd save
Our country's liberty,
Canada, with hand on heart,
We list to hear thy call,
We'll serve thee, faithful to the end,
We shall not let thee fall.

Canada, my Canada,
United as one we stand,
As thou wast found so thou shalt remain—
Give us thy command.
Canada my native land,
With freedom, rights for all,
We'll serve thee, faithful to the end,
We shall not let thee fall.

Shelly Tucker wrote:

I may only be 16, but I'm very much concerned with the welfare of my country. I feel people must be more patriotic toward their homeland, and appreciate it more. This song simply expresses my love for my country.

Shelly Tucker
1980

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Corbett: It is to people of this country like Shelly Tucker that we owe our debt, our allegiance, and our determination to make Canada a better place in which to live. Unfortunately, it is unlikely that will be the case, should this constitutional package be passed.

● (1640)

Let me review briefly how this confederation all came about. The country of Canada is a federal state. It is a federation which is controlled and has been controlled since 1867 by the British North America Act. This act was designed for Canadians by Canadians. It outlined the responsibilities of the central government, as opposed to the responsibilities of the provincial governments. It fulfilled a necessity within our federated system. It dictated that divisions beyond reach or easy access to consensus of opinion would not alter the way the country was designed to be run.

There were some very good reasons why the British North America Act was designed in that fashion: So there would be control, and so that not one of the 11 involved governments would be able to act unilaterally to change the direction and the intent of the BNA Act. It ensured that one government would not be predominant in all things. The decision was a Canadian decision, and it was respected by the British parliament.

Discussions began to take place as to how we might better control our destiny. This has been discussed for a good many years. Discussions which took place in which Canada played a major role, this being the senior dominion, and the Statute of Westminster became a reality. It was written in that statute that the British parliament would henceforth have no further direct control over the "Dominions" included in that statute. Canada was a motivating force in the writing of the Statute of Westminster and, interestingly enough, Canada was to be the only exception.

It is pertinent to ask ourselves as Canadians: Why was Canada, at Canada's request, the only exception to this rule? The answer is, quite simply, we were concerned in that day and age, just as we should be today, that no single government would have the opportunity to override the jurisdiction of another. Much to the chagrin and the sorrow of Great Britain, we insisted that Canada be made an exception to the Statute of Westminster and that we continue with the jurisdiction given under the British North America Act. Because of a lack of agreement among Canadians themselves and the various levels of government in Canada at that time we were unable to see our way clear to cutting the colonial cord. Without the protection of, or the resource to the United Kingdom, some Canadians were concerned that their federal government or various provincial governments would have difficulties coming to agreement and, indeed, that something disastrous might happen to the country as a result.

However, progress was made and, as time went by, we recognized it would be a good thing for Canada if we were able to bring our Constitution home, but there was a mechanical difficulty as to how that would come about. I think there is certain validity to the arguments that the current system serves Canada well, that there is no reason why we should bring the Constitution home, and that the British North America Act has served the country well for the 114 years it has been in effect. But, that is not my position, nor is it the position of the Progressive Conservative Party. It is important for Canadians to recognize that certainly all members who sit in this House of Commons now agree the time has come to bring the Constitution home to Canada, but we decidedly disagree that it should be on the terms of the Prime Minister alone. Trudeau—the Prime Minister wishes—

[Translation]

Mr. Cousineau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If at all possible, I would prefer that the Chair ask the hon. member to respect the customs and traditions of the House, and to refer to the title of the Right Hon. Prime Minister and not to his family name.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): The hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau) raised the point that the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) should be addressed by his title, but I thought I heard the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett) correct himself.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He corrected himself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): The point has been made. I recognize the hon. member for Fundy-Royal.

Mr. Corbett: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I respect the position of the Prime Minister, even if I have questions about the validity of the present person. If the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau) was paying closer attention to the substance of my remarks rather than being picky, he would have recognized that I withdrew my reference to the Prime Minister's surname.

The Prime Minister proposes, among other things, to allow changes by referenda, yet he will not take advantage of the present opportunity to go to the people with a referendum and ask them if, indeed, this is the way they want to see their Constitution brought home. This referendum proposal would only allow changes proposed by Ottawa to be put to a referendum call. Obviously this is designed to allow the power to remain with the federal government. Only the federal government would have the right to call for a referendum. Under this proposal, rights could be written in or written out. Rights have always been present to protect the minority, but if we put a question designed to meet the desires and architectural requirements of the federal government, what chance would the minorities of the country have to voice their opinions in such a referendum? The proposition in the referendum would be written and financed by Ottawa; it would be financed by the taxpayers of this nation. The provincial governments would not be required to ratify any amendments which might be made.

I should like to refer briefly to a speech made by a prominent Canadian back in November, 1980. In part it read:

> Referendums don't work too well in a parliamentary democracy, particularly in a federal state—
> —The referendum procedure undermines representative democracy under which we elect men and women to study these questions and decide them for us . . . If an issue is important enough, the will of the people can be tested at any time in a general election—

● (1650)

This is why I put the challenge to the Prime Minister to call an election on this issue. Those words were spoken by John Turner in his address to the annual dinner of the Administration Society, University of Regina. I am certain the words of John Turner were well taken by hon. members opposite.

The question of the Victoria formula, as opposed to the Vancouver formula, is also extremely important. I would like to comment briefly on this subject. Under the formula suggested by the government, Ontario and Quebec must be supportive of any changes to be made to the Constitution. In effect, this gives them a virtual veto. With all due respect to those two provinces, I fail to realize why they should be given the powers of a veto in perpetuity, since indeed this is what it would be. This would be the case regardless of any future movement of the population, either west or east, and despite the fact that those provinces at some future date may lose their position of power, as far as population is concerned. Those two provinces would be forever given the power of a veto. I believe that smacks of discrimination to the rest of Canada. I believe Canadians generally disgree with that proposal.

Our party, and most of the provinces, support the Vancouver consensus in which Parliament and seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population have the opportunity to change the Constitution, if that is the will of the people involved. In the Vancouver formula there is an opting-out provision. I think that is only fair since the provinces have historical rights under the British North America Act, which this government should not have the right to unilaterally take from them. Those provisions set out the powers and rights of the legislatures, ownership of natural resources and the property of the provinces.

The debate this government is so anxious to terminate involves the most important issue which has been debated in this House since confederation. Any unilateral action which this government will perpetrate on the rest of Canada will only create dissension and hostilities among all Canadians. It is these people who must accept the responsibility.

Mr. Laniel: What about the flag debate?

Mr. Corbett: When the unilateral action was taken at the time of the flag debate there was no thought in this House that a matter of that magnitude would dare be presented to the people of this nation in such a blatant and arrogant fashion. No doubt at that time there was no other issue which could evoke as much feeling as did the flag debate. But that flag debate is behind us and we are dealing now with a matter which affects all Canadians. They will have to live with it, as will their children's children and the children of those children for years to come.

The action taken by the federal government will ensure for some time to come that this Constitution will not serve in the best interests of national unity. Indeed, there will be more divisiveness than positive effects. But, Mr. Speaker, we will have it, since the government will invoke closure. The debate will be terminated, and I can only hope the majority of people who sit in this House have the opportunity before that happens to express the viewpoints of their constituents, as I am doing today.

In my constituency the matter of closure is something which is not taken lightly. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in a recent poll I conducted in my constituency 78 per cent said "No" to the question:

Do you feel the government should have the right to invoke closure on any matter it wishes to terminate parliamentary discussion on?

I suggest that 78 per cent is a representative figure from across this nation. At any rate, it is a fact in Fundy-Royal. The purpose of the Constitution is to establish the game rules, the framework from which we can enjoy freedoms which will become an integral part of our democracy. If it is to work, the Constitution must be the result of honest communication and an honest attempt to reach an agreement amongst all the partners of Confederation, not just between one man and the party he leads. This resolution should not proceed until we have the word from Canadians as to whether or not this is, indeed, the way they want to see the future of this country formed.

Again, speaking for the people of Fundy Royal, I can tell you that 72 per cent of the people replied "No" to the question:

Do you agree that the federal government should move unilaterally to patriate the Constitution?

An overwhelming 72 per cent replied "No", Mr. Speaker. That is indicative of the beliefs of the people who live in this nation of Canada.

The British have a responsibility, whether or not the members of the government want to realize it. Their responsibility is under the Statute of Westminster. I suspect the British parliament wishes it did not have that responsibility, but it does. The problems now are the same as they were back then when we decided it would be in the best interests of the people to leave the British North America Act intact. The problems are the same now as they were then. The government's determination to move unilaterally and to ram it down the throats of all Canadians just exemplifies that very fact.

Let us look to see what this action will mean to us as Canadians. What is it that the Prime Minister wants the British parliament to do which he knows he cannot get this Parliament to do? He knows he could not get this done here in Canada. There is no overwhelming argument which validly says we need the amendments the Prime Minister is suggesting. We have always been able to solve our problems here at home through compromise, consultation and agreement. What is the Prime Minister's purpose and reason? I say they must be suspect. This is the Prime Minister who has created crisis after crisis to serve his own purpose and to determine his own course. I can cite the War Measures Act as an example of what I am talking about. It should be pointed out that this measure will be included in the Constitution, should it pass. The Prime Minister utilized the War Measures Act and said he would justify that action at a later date. That justification has never come. This is the individual who, over the serious objections of many conscientious people, implemented the gun control provisions. For what reason, I would ask? Flies do not create garbage. Those guns he wants so dearly to control are still in the constituency. The difference now is that people who were under his direction have access to them without having to take the proper procedures through the courts of this land. It was wrong to implement that particular piece of legislation in the manner in which he did, and it should be withdrawn.

This is the same Prime Minister who campaigned on an anti-wage and price control issue back in 1974, but, as soon as he was elected went on his merry way and implemented wage and price controls. This is the man who, as head of the government party, insinuated there would be no increase in gasoline prices if that party was elected in 1980. The facts speak for themselves.

There are many suspect matters respecting the motives of the present government and its leader. It is known that his preference is to have a republic rather than a monarchy. We know his attitude regarding the role of the Queen, and the sort of disrespect which he has shown on past occasions.

An hon. Member: When was that?

Mr. Corbett: This charter will do nothing for the rights of Canadians. It will do nothing toward enshrining rights for people. It will enshrine rights for the government only.

There is an unequal application of various proposals across the country. Why is it that the Prime Minister and his government refuse to incorporate the very basic right to the ownership of property, the right of an individual to work for a piece of land so he can have a home in which he can house and shelter his family? What is wrong in our society with having something as substantial and as basic as the right to property written into the Constitution? We have not had a satisfactory answer; we have had no answer at all, and we are not apt to ever have one.

What is wrong with the basic premise that God should be respected and written into our Constitution, as He has always been an inspiration in our society? Why is it that God, the cornerstone of our heritage, has been so blatantly left out? The founders of this country fell down on their knees and praised God for helping them find the land, and they thanked God for all the bountiful gifts He bestowed on them. What is now wrong with referring to the role which God plays in the lives of Canadians?

An hon. Member: Communists do not accept the concept.

Mr. Corbett: What about the rights of the elderly in this country? Why have we not made some allusion to them, particularly the rights of the elderly poor? Why can we not pay some attention to these people who so desperately need help as a result of the mismanagement of funds, the fiscal fiascos this government has perpetuated upon them, inflation and their inability to cope with it? What is wrong with writing in the dignity we have or should have in this country for our elders, the people who laid the foundations of this great nation? They have been left out, just as it is obvious that the rights of those who are yet unborn in this country have been left out. I speak about those people who will not be born in this country because of a very serious lack of appreciation of the basic component of life itself, something these people seem to be so determined to overlook and forget.

What about the rights of the unborn children who will never see this country and will never have the opportunity to participate as we do? There is no one but God—whom they refuse to recognize—who should have the right to take an innocent life, whether it is in the womb or outside of the womb. The fact that this charter of rights does not recognize the right to life and the right of the unborn child is a very serious shortcoming.

We can look back upon and be proud of many things in this country, including the heritage of the two founding people whose forefathers came from France and Britain. But for some reason or another, we cannot agree that one should be as equal to the other. I find it strange that all the efforts which have been made in one direction do not seem to be applicable when we ask for the same rights in the other direction.

For instance, why is it necessary to change the name of Dominion Day to Canada Day? What does that particular piece of wisdom emulate? I suspect it is to try to satiate the insatiable appetites of the minority of people in this country. That bothers me because, if that is not the case, certainly that group is being tabbed with the responsibility, and this cannot have gone unnoticed. Why can we not have an explanation?

The present government seems to feed and thrive on the alienation of this country, the alienation of the French against the English, the alienation of the English against the French, the alienation of the west against the east; it goes on and on.

How is our Constitution to be determined? How is it to be designed? The powers of this House of Commons are to be diluted. The powers of the provincial legislatures are to be diluted. It will be determined by the courts of this land which will be staffed by federal judges appointed by the government. One person will have the opportunity to lend the most weight as to who will make the decisions that will affect the lives of Canadians. The government will decide the role of judges and who the judges will be. It will control the referendum process, and even Parliament will be set aside.

Dealing briefly with that, I want to allude to the responsibility of those who create, or who will have created such a system in Canada. I refer to all those government members, including those who would like to do differently—and there are several over there—but cannot because they are being directed and orchestrated by their leader. The responsibility must also fall upon the shoulders of members of the New Democratic Party who chided, but lined up so willingly behind the government. There are obviously some dissenters in the New Democratic Party. Those people are to be credited, because in a party of 28—

An hon. Member: Thirty-two.

Mr. Corbett: —thirty-two, there were four who had the courage of conviction to stand behind what they know to be right. However, on the government side of the House there is only one man with enough courage and conviction to vote in a way which will provide the future of this country as it should be. I am not surprised these people have taken the direction they have taken. Some of them have shown their arrogance, and it certainly has been significant enough to be noticeable.

• (1710)

When the President of the United States was in this chamber not too long ago the performance of a number of the members of the New Democratic Party was shameful. The way they displayed their arrogance and intolerance for a man who leads the most powerful nation on the face of this earth, not even standing up and giving polite applause, was a disgrace. Their mentor, the ambassador from the U.S.S.R., had the common decency to stand in his place in the gallery when the President of the United States walked into this chamber.

That was a despicable display of arrogance and ignorance by an undisciplined gaggle of nincompoops.

This nation and its future should be determined by harmony, not discord; it should be determined by co-operation, not confrontation; it should be determined by understanding, not bull-headed determination. The future of this nation should be based on patience, not pressure; it should be based on good will, not suspicion and it should be based on thoughtfulness, not deceit. Most of all, it should be based on compassion and thoughtfulness for all Canadians.

I started my speech with a song presented to me by a student, a girl in grade 11 from Hampton, New Brunswick. In closing I would like to read into the record a short essay presented to me by a grade 8 student from Norton in my constituency. It is entitled "I Love Canada" and reads as follows:

Have you ever stopped to realize how beautiful a country Canada is? The picturesque fishing villages, golden plains of wheat, small villages nestled between the high Rockies and the frostbitten regions north of the Canadian Shield exemplify the true beauty. This is one reason why I love my country. I think that Canada deserves our love and patriotism for many reasons.

Canada is a free country. We are not under communist or tyrannical rule. Canadians can choose their own religions, are not restricted by the government in any illogical way and have a right to say what they feel.

Canada has become a new home for many immigrants who have found a better life here. These immigrants have brought their customs and languages making Canada a colourful country.

We in Canada also have the privilege of a public education and a chance at a good job which we should really be thankful for. Canada is a rich country. We have wheat and other produce, oil, wood, and ⅓ of the world's pure water.

I think that what I love best about Canada is that it is a paradox. So many of Canada's features contradict each other. The mountain regions of the west differ from the flat prairies. Languages are different also. Contrasts in population are also evident. Large cities such as Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal differ from the sparsely populated cities in the Northwest and Yukon territories.

Canada is a wonderful, beautiful country. The last two lines of our national anthem is my prayer for our great nation;

"God keep our land glorious and free

O Canada, we stand on guard for thee"

Mr. Speaker, we all should dedicate ourselves to Veronica Barton.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity today to speak in this constitutional debate. Last May 22, I took advantage of a similar debate, which my party initiated two days after the Quebec referendum, to say some things about Canada's past and its future. The motion before the House that day was as follows:

That this House welcomes the result of the referendum in Quebec and pledges itself to interpret that vote as a clear call for constitutional change.

That motion was endorsed by the speeches of members from all parties in this House. Many of those speeches called for the government and others to make sure we grasped the opportunity to change our Constitution and to make use of the good will there was throughout Canada at that time. I should like to quote something the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) said, as reported at page 1315 of Hansard as follows:

So at this time of good will we also face a serious peril—a real threat that disappointment and anger can replace this good will if we fritter away our opportunities. All of us recognize how quickly good will can be replaced by anger and accusations. We must avoid giving any comfort to the separatists, wherever they may be, to conduct our activities in such a way that the talks would not lead to new satisfactory arrangements. There are obviously people in this country who are hoping that these talks will end in failure. This cannot happen. The talks must be real and they must bear results.

Note the phrase used by the hon. member for Provencher, Mr. Speaker, "fritter away". There is a real danger that this is exactly what we will allow to happen, but, Mr. Speaker, we must not. I am not trying to lay the blame on one doorstep. In reality, that blame must be shared by many across the land, by some in this House and in the Senate.

Last spring, I followed the Liberal government's attempts to negotiate a new Constitution. I listened to the premiers at their conference in the summer and I watched the federal-provincial conference in the early fall. I could hear, feel and see that the good will generated by the vote in the Quebec referendum was dissipated. As these events and the backroom manoeuvring that accompanied them occurred, Canadians lost faith in their politicians. These actions by so many of the major actors on the federal and provincial scene gave many Canadians a feeling of disgust. As a history teacher, when I sit back and think about Canadian history, I realize this has always been the case. It is something we do not brag about and it is something we do not clarify when we talk about our past. We cannot clarify it now.

I would ask all Canadians throughout the country to move forward despite the regretful actions of those who have acted in such a petty manner and so selfishly. We must work together regardless of the process through which some people have dragged us. I should like to quote my own words if I may, Mr. Speaker. On May 22, 1980, as reported at page 1317 of Hansard, I said:

This opportunity is also a challenge, because if we do not make significant headway now the negative feelings the previous speaker mentioned, which are real, and the feeling of hopelessness on constitutional talks, will be felt not only by the Quebecois but by all Canadians. There is presently a hope in our ability to overcome the obstacles which have created roadblocks in the past and that we now must meet in order to face the challenge we have as a nation.

I now read from page 1319 as follows:

In this respect I would like to remind hon. members that historically what has been called English Canada has always been a generation behind French Canadians in determining its own aspirations.

At the beginning of this century Henri Bourassa, as an MP in this House, rose to call for a Canadian identity. He was rebuked by those who wished to remain part of the British Empire. Twenty years later we accepted the wisdom of Bourassa's remarks. When Quebec premiers called out for the strengthening of the role of the provinces within confederation, the rest of the country ignored them and was appalled at the thought. A generation later we heard the same call coming from each and every region of this country. In the sixties when Quebec was asking to be maître chez nous or master of their own destiny, the rest of Canada was accepting increased foreign control of our resources, our industry and our future. It has often been said that Quebec wants too much independence and that English Canada wants none. We are now in the 1980s and another generation has passed by. It is time for all Canadians to be asking to be masters of their own destiny.

● (1720)

At the bottom of page 1319 of Hansard, I said:

The mood of the country is open to changes in the constitution, especially after the decision of Tuesday night. This openness to change, however, might well dissipate if all points of view are not aired in an open and non-partisan manner.

Unfortunately, when I said those words last May I did not expect to be a prophet. No politician should ever claim to be a prophet, but that is exactly what happened.

Talks on the Constitution were held between the premiers and the federal government. Politicians from all parties held discussions. But these discussions certainly were in a partisan manner. People did not want to overcome their own political selfishness, no matter who they were, to work toward a Canadian future. I regret this partisan approach we have had in the last ten months. As I said earlier, it is not just the Tories—but all people—whether they are Liberals, premiers, interest groups or even, on occasion, members of our own party—have not acted in a non-partisan manner.

Many of the speeches in this House have been deplorable. Many of the speeches made outside this House have been just as bad. As in cases of war, people have tried to bring God in on their side. People have brought in regional hatred and all sorts of divisive forces to justify their own partisan needs. I would like to use just one example to prove this point. Like other Canadians, I am aware of many examples that prove we have not handled this situation in the manner in which we should. I refer particularly to the Conservative ad which appeared in many western newspapers.

Mr. McMillan: It was a good ad.

Mr. Murphy: It reads:

Broadbent just gave your vote to Trudeau.

The Liberal-NDP deal will make westerners second-class citizens.

Then there is a little "Pierre" with an "X" beside it. The ad continues:

If your riding elected an NDP Member of Parliament to fight for your interests in Ottawa, you've been betrayed. Instead of fighting for you, he—

They forget there are women in the House. The ad continues:

—has sold you out to Pierre Trudeau.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Read it again.

Mr. Murphy: That is the whole problem. The Conservatives in this House are proud of that ad and yet it appeals to all the prejudices. By its very nature it is calling for more hatred, for more regional division and more separatist sentiment in this country. It is a disgusting, a partisan and a small-minded effort. Conservatives who disagree with the constitutional proposals have every right to do so. They have every right to speak out on the issue. They have every right to advertise their position. But, really, members, can you honestly say this ad addresses issues instead of prejudice?

Mr. Beatty: Yes.

Mr. Murphy: Can you honestly say it dealt with difficulties rather than personalities—

Mr. Beatty: Yes.

Mr. Murphy: —or that Canadian unity was asked for rather than regional alienation?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

An hon. Member: You are learning.

Mr. Beatty: Listen to your constituents.

Mr. Murphy: Hon. members convict themselves. I do not have to say any more. They used a stupid, narrow-minded ad which they brag and gloat about. It is the worst advertising anyone could ever promote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murphy: It does everything possible to work against Canadian unity, and they wonder why they are losing the respect of all Canadians. They do it to themselves.

Mr. Beatty: What do your constituents say?

An hon. Member: Read the polls.

Mr. Murphy: One of the hon. separatists asks what do my constituents say. I have a two-two vote. Two for the issue and two against. I have talked to people throughout my constituency. They have not felt the need to have a big letter-writing campaign. As I said, I have two letters for the issue and two letters against.

Most people would like us to bring the Constitution home and to work toward our future, not build more hatred.

An hon. Member: You are not getting your mail.

Mr. Murphy: It is not just the Tories who have taken the narrow and low path in this debate. Many others have done so. The most forceful arguments made against these proposals usually relate to unilateral action. There is no doubt in my mind this is basically a unilateral decision. I face that fact and I accept it. I do not like it. I recognize that most Canadians do not like it. Yet, I have not seen any willingness on the part of provincial or federal politicians to work this out.

An hon. Member: Do you include Saskatchewan?

Mr. Murphy: The record of the provinces and the federal government is one of failure. Neither Canadian history, Canadian or British law, nor the interpretation of that law give us answers how to proceed to amend our Constitution. Because of that there is a deadlock. Needless to say there are antagonists on both sides of the question who will and do quote from different legal opinions and different legal precedents to justify their own position. But our Constitution, as it presently stands, and the Statute of Westminster are silent on how to amend this Constitution. This was deliberately the case. We as Canadians then and we as Canadians now have not found an amending formula satisfactory to everybody. It is an unfortunate situation, but that is the situation we face.

Premier Lyon of Manitoba who occasionally parades himself as the leader of the premiers, has gone to Britain to suggest his own unilateral action. A press release put out by his own government's news service on February 6, 1981 reads:

> He suggested the U.K. parliament consider relieving itself—in accordance with accepted constitutional practice—of the trust relationship with Canada by divesting itself of its power to amend the BNA Act and by recognizing the present constitutional requirement that amendments affecting the powers of the two levels of Canadian government be made only with the unanimous consent of the provinces and the Canadian Parliament.

In other words, Premier Lyon's unilateral action is that the British throw the whole thing back in our face and that each province should have a veto over any future amendments to the Constitution. That unilateral action suggested by the Premier of Manitoba is no different to the package which is being proposed here. Certainly there is different substance but the method of how they want to change our Constitution is the same. It was not only the Premier of Manitoba but others, representing both sides of the argument, who have gone to England asking basically for their own unilateral package. People forget that. What Premier Lyon is asking for is just as unilateral and just as much a change to our Constitution as the package which is before this House. Any Constitution which comes back to Canada and gives each and every province a veto will never be changed because no province will ever willingly give up that power of veto. It will not happen and it will not work. If the British were to accept Premier Lyon's unilateral action, we would never be able to amend this Constitution no matter how needed or how valuable an amendment would be.

That is not the only provincial suggestion as to how to amend the Constitution. There is the opt-out Vancouver formula which would allow each province to more or less make up its mind what it wants in Canada. In other words, some will add civil rights to a charter, others will not. Some will have resource control, others will not. Some will work toward the future of the country, others will not. When you get right down to it, despite the glossiness of the Vancouver formula, that is what it is all about. It says that we as Manitobans, as Albertans, as people from any province, will decide our options within confederation, we will decide to what extent we want to help other provinces or regions.

An hon. member has called it a drop-out formula. It is not only that, Mr. Speaker, it is a formula which will automatically create a breakdown in the unity of Canada because no part of the country is going to stand by and watch another province say: I am sorry, but I am not going to contribute to medicare; you cannot use our resources; we do not believe in a charter of rights or that your pension plans are not applicable in my part of the country, because that type of unilateral action by a province can only create more divisiveness, disunity and confusion as we progress as a nation.

There were a number of other points raised in the attack on the present procedures, one of which was alluded to in that infamous Tory ad, which suggest that somehow western Canadians become second-class citizens under this formula. Yet what it does is give each region and the federal government a veto, but, because of the differences that exist within this country now, the veto works differently.

Ontario is a region, therefore it has a veto. Quebec is the same. For historic reasons we are giving Prince Edward Island a bit more power in the Atlantic region, but basically there must be agreement of two provinces out of the four before there can be an amendment. It is a bit different in the west again, but basically there must be agreement of two provinces with 50 per cent of the population before there can be any change. They must agree before there can be any change in the Constitution, and that is a pretty substantial veto by any region, which makes it very difficult for anyone to ram an amendment through. There must be this agreement, therefore, the people of those provinces still have protection.

The argument that it is not fair has been made about each and every amending formula presented to us. There will always be someone who says: Oh, that is not quite as fair to me as it is to him or her. There will always be some province or region that says: It could be better for me. However, I hope we are going to get through this time, and whatever future we have as a country, with a less selfish attitude.

As I said earlier, the Tory ads play on regional separatism, alienation, small-mindedness and prejudice, but if that is to be the attitude taken in the future by any political party, then we are going to have trouble developing our future as a nation. We must work together, we must have a willingness to accept others views, and when we disagree it is better to take the high road, talking about the substance of our disagreement, rather than picking on one or another region of the country.

In the charter of rights we add something new to our Constitution, something that many of the provinces do not want, but something wanted by many Canadians. We will for the first time have civil rights in a charter. We have had civil rights in the past but we have also had examples, and we are not going to go through the list again, of how they can be ignored by governments, whether provincial or federal.

We will have a better, but not perfect, recognition of native rights. That is important to my constituency. It will recognize equality of men and women; again, it is not perfect but it is better than what we have at the present time. There are other groups such as the handicapped who will for the first time have recognition in a Constitution. This might be the best package that exists at the present time, but it is still not perfect and there are interest groups in this country who want changes. They have a legitimate right to work toward those changes, but because every interest group is not satisfied now is no reason not to go forward. We cannot even satisfy every province so how do we satisfy every interest group?

So we should not, to use the expression of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), hold our noses and pass it; we should look at the substance, at what we see as a reasonable charter, a reasonable amending formula, a reasonable constitutional package and accept that. To do otherwise is to be unfaithful to Canada's future because a Constitution sets the groundwork for where we go as a country. It recognizes our past, the significant events in our history, and our geography. It recognizes that we have to work within that framework, we have to recognize regional and ethnic differences, the different economic aspects and needs of our nation. We do that through resources, equalization and taxing formulae. That just sets a framework, because what happens in the country is based only on the Constitution. A Constitution cannot force a country to take hold of its future, force a government to pass good laws, or force the provinces to respect everyone. It can, through appeal to the courts, force them to respect human rights, but it does not guarantee they are going to offer the educational, medical and social service facilities that will enable every Canadian to live a successful and happy life. It may not do that, but it does set that framework. It is a framework which we can use only if the provinces and the federal government are willing to take hold of it, pass the laws and take the actions which will lead to a greater future. Our future depends on something else. It depends on good will. It depends on honest efforts. It depends on people being willing to work together to try to solve the problems we face.

Earlier I said the process we have gone through has not enjoyed that good will. There has not been honest effort. I also mentioned that this is not something unique in the last ten months since the May referendum. That has been the situation through every generation of our history. It was the situation prior to the BNA Act being accepted. There were separatists then. There were people with regional differences then. There were politicians who played on those regional differences then. Throughout our history we have had those problems. Throughout our history Canadians have not always taken the high road. That is the situation again now, but I hope people in this House and throughout the country will feel the package is good as far as it goes and that while some Canadians may not like everything in the package, if it passes we will have to live and work with it within the Constitution. We should do everything we can to make our country the greatest it can become, and to make sure it respects the rights of individuals to the greatest extent possible. If we do not do that, then it does not matter what is on paper. Everything really depends on good will and the proper exercise by governments of their powers, whether those governments be provincial or federal. They should do all they can to help Canadians in every walk of life.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in this constitutional debate not only to my colleagues on all sides of this House, not only through television and Hansard to the country and to all Canadians wherever they may be, but to speak on behalf of our children and grandchildren. If the Lord be willing down the path of time my grandchildren will ask me where I stood and what I said when I held the floor on an issue which may substantially alter their lives and their country. I want them to know that at least I tried and that my party made every effort to speak out and persuade the members of the government party that what they were doing was wrong and would have implications far beyond their narrow thinking at the moment.

I speak from the heart. I wish to express my fears and reservations about a Constitution which will divide us, not unite us, a Constitution with built-in conflicts which can lead to chaos and a Constitution which easily may lead to the end of Canada and possibly the birth of several smaller, independent nations in what should and could be a far greater nation.

I first ask whether the people are in favour of this document. Do Canadians from coast to coast endorse it? Is this what Canadians want? Let us examine the score card at the present time.

The last Gallup poll on the subject showed that 64 per cent of Canadians disapproved of the government's unilateral action in trying to bring an amended Constitution to Canada from Britain. Only 22 per cent approved. Eight of ten provinces—Ontario and New Brunswick being the two exceptions—are against this action. Six of the ten provinces are fighting this action in the courts. Quebec Liberal leader Claude Ryan is totally opposed, as is the present Quebec premier. The NDP provincial parties in Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba and Quebec have publicly spoken against it. Four NDP Members of Parliament have broken with their party leader and have stated they will vote against the Liberal package in the House of Commons. The Ottawa West NDP riding association has called on the federal party to withdraw all support for the Liberal package. Four Liberal senators—the hon. senators for Lauzon, Dovercourt, Harbour Grace and, most recently, the hon. senator for the Ottawa Valley—so far have spoken against the Trudeau proposal in the Senate.

Two Liberal members of Parliament, the hon. member for Montmorency-Orléans (Mr. Duclos) and the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), spoke out at the constitutional committee hearings against parts of the package. Gordon Robertson, former secretary to the cabinet for federal-provincial relations and for many years Trudeau's top constitutional adviser—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cook: —has spoken out against the referendum.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I hate to raise this at this late date, but the hon. member has been using unparliamentary language. He may be quoting from a newspaper or other documents, but I would advise Your Honour, and we have done a bit of work on this, that Beauchesne's fourth edition Citation 175 states in part:

> It is out of order to read extracts in a debate if they . . . contain unparliamentary expressions, as no language can be heard in quotation if it would be disorderly if spoken—

I ask Your Honour to admonish the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook) for trying to get around the rules in this manner.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, but I was discussing something with the Clerk at the time and the expression used by the hon. member escaped me. The parliamentary secretary is right in saying that hon. members cannot do indirectly what is not allowed directly. That must mean that if there is a word which is unparliamentary, the hon. member cannot use it even if he is quoting from an article or from something else.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I think in all fairness, and I understand that Your Honour was discussing a matter with the Clerk, it might be worth while for Your Honour to read the transcript before making a final decision. It strikes me that there may be a number of occasions when it would be appropriate and quite permissible for a member to read from a transcript, to make a point. We have to look at the context within which that is done. I think it would be appropriate that the hon. member be allowed to continue with his speech and, possibly tomorrow, we can at more leisure consider the point of order raised by the parliamentary secretary.

Madam Speaker: I have to say in response, that hon. members cannot use words which are unparliamentary just because they are quoting. If the words were unparliamentary, they must be withdrawn. I did not hear them, and I am sorry, but if the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook) feels he has probably gone beyond what he wanted to say or what he meant to say, perhaps he could withdraw now and the incident will be closed.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, the word in question was "Trudeau". If that is unparliamentary, I apologize, but I do not think that particular word is unparliamentary.

Mr. Cousineau: We know what you are trying to do.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, we have sat here patiently through the last five weeks. We have seen the rules of debate transgressed by members of the Conservative Party, and I think it is time we put a stop to it. No member may refer to another member by his name. We must refer to hon. members either by their titles as ministers, such as the Prime Minister, or by their constituencies. This transgression has taken place for the last four or five weeks, and I wanted to bring it to Your Honour's attention. Your Honour usually does not sit in the chair during the normal debates because of other duties. I know Your Honour is here because of royal assent, and I wanted to bring to Your Honour's attention that this has been going on. I respectfully ask that the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby refrain from using the unparliamentary practice of calling the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) by his name. That is not permitted in debates.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He was reading from a transcript.

Mr. Collenette: Same thing.

Mr. Cook: Madam Speaker, I have been reviewing my notes thoroughly, and I did not refer to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The only name I have used in my comments to this point is the name Gordon Robertson, and I do not believe he is a member of this House.

Mr. Collenette: Trudeau.

Mr. Cook: I will have to see the blues before I am prepared to withdraw because I do not believe I said that.

Madam Speaker: Since there is a divergence of opinion as to what was said, I suppose the only recourse we have is to wait for the blues.

Mr. Beatty: I don't think anybody should mention Trudeau's name either.

Mr. Cook: Madam Speaker—

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Mr. Cook: I will wait for a decision tomorrow as to whether unparliamentary language was used. If there was, it was not intended.

• (1750)

The people of Canada are having a great deal of difficulty understanding this constitutional reform package now before Parliament. This may be because of the persistent campaign of innuendo and false rhetoric about what is proposed and how the Constitution is going to work.

The most outrageous statement being made is that our Constitution will be patriated to Canada. In a statement released on October 2, 1980, the Prime Minister said that the resolution proposes first that the Constitution be brought home. At long last, he said, we will have a Constitution truly our own. Freed of the paralysis of the past, with our Constitution home, with our independence beyond question, with our rights and freedoms guaranteed, the process of reform and renewal can truly proceed, the Prime Minister said.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) said, "I am proud to have the opportunity of introducing a motion in the House of Commons which will be able to bring the Constitution home. After 113 years of nationhood, Canada at last will be able to bring its Constitution home."

In addition, we are being brainwashed with our own tax moneys. Accompanying a copy of the resolution, are two government published pamphlets entitled respectively "Highlights of a Proposed Resolution Respecting the Constitution of Canada" and "An Explanation of a Proposed Resolution Respecting the Constitution of Canada". The first contains the following statement: "Canadians are now witnessing a truly historic event as Parliament is being asked to take steps to patriate Canada's Constitution. The Government of Canada has placed before Parliament a proposed resolution to bring the Constitution home."

The second is even more enthusiastic in its misstatements. It says, "In view of the fact that there is now a widespread belief that patriation has become essential for reasons of both national pride and practicality, the Government of Canada has laid before Parliament a proposed resolution designed to bring about the patriation of the Constitution. When these proposals come into effect, they will signify the passing of the last vestige of Canada's former colonial status."

These statements, Madam Speaker, are not true. There is not a clause, a sentence, a word, a period, a comma or a semicolon in the resolution which can be construed as establishing a Canadian Constitution at home in Canada. Our Constitution will continue to be a collection of acts of the British parliament, and it must not be forgotten that what a Parliament enacts it always has the power to repeal.

This government's suggested creation of a Canadian Constitution, by a British act, will still be capable of repeal by the British Parliament. There is no provision whatever for the establishment of a Canadian-based Constitution, and anyone who says otherwise has not read or understood the resolution, or is attempting to deceive.

Let us turn to the so-called Victoria amending formula. This method of amending the Constitution which in perpetuity gives the right to Ontario and Quebec to individually block any constitutional amendment—

An hon. Member: The messenger is knocking.

Mr. Cook: I am a westerner and I say this is totally unacceptable to the west. It is a continuation of the domination by the central provinces over other rapidly growing, expanding and vibrant regions of this country.

Mr. Knowles: The Tories have no respect for the Crown.

Mr. Cook: Population is important, but the rights of the minorities—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I believe we have a message from the other place.

FUNDS FOR HOBBEMA, ALTA. SCHOOL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, because of the urgency of immediately upgrading the standards at the Hobbema school in Alberta by transferring its control to the Indians themselves, and because the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) promised last September to provide $96,000 to the bands to aid in that task, yet has now reneged on that promise, I move, under Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development cure himself of his habit of making promises he cannot keep and immediately provide the Four Bands Reserve with the moneys promised.

NATIONAL PENSIONS CONFERENCE

SUGGESTED ATTENDANCE OF CNR AND CPR REPRESENTATIVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that both CNR and CPR have, for many years, failed to provide adequate increases to their pensioners so that they can even hope to cover a part of the ravages created by inflation, which is now in double-digit figures, and in view of the fact that concerns expressed by the Canadian Railways Employees Pension Association that the CNR may have manipulated figures to reduce its financial obligation to the pension fund by hundreds of millions of dollars, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That this House call upon the minister to request that both the CNR and CPR appear at the National Pensions Conference planned for the end of March to provide complete details and all relevant documents, to answer any charges and clear up all misunderstandings and, further, to indicate how in the future these corporations will meet their moral obligations in providing to their former employees more reasonable pension increases in the face of double-digit inflation.

ADVISORY COUNCIL ON STATUS OF MEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43. As critic responsible for the status of men I deplore the continuing discrimination, particularly by this government, against the male minority, which does not enjoy rights granted to the female majority, which has its own advisory council and its own minister. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That this House instruct the government to establish an advisory council on the status of men reporting directly to Parliament and, further, since membership in the Advisory Council on the Status of Women is composed of women Liberals, that membership of the men's council be drawn from male members of the opposition parties.

WATERFOWL DEPREDATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the current waterfowl depredation program, which does not provide adequate compensation for producers, is negotiated annually between the federal and provincial governments, and since the government of the United States does not accept its responsibility of participating in this program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo):

That when negotiations start on the waterfowl depredation program for the coming year the American government be asked to participate in the negotiations and that these negotiations focus on an ongoing program that will adequately compensate producers.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL RESOLUTION—EXTENSION OF SITTING HOURS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Gingras (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I seek the unanimous consent of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion relating to an urgent and important question.

Considering that since the beginning of the constitutional debate the House has listened to more than 170 speeches on that topic and that, as the debate progresses, we do not seem to be hearing new and valid arguments, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant):

That the official opposition agree to extend the sitting hours until midnight, if need be and if they still have something to say on the subject, so that the House may go on to other equally important problems facing Canadians, such as inflation, unemployment and economic issues.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

DROUGHT PLAN ASSISTANCE TO CATTLE PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to 8,000 western cattle producers who have not received assistance from the federal government drought plan announced last year. By the way, it was breeding time when the plan was announced last year. It is now calving time. The program has a longer gestation period than that of a cow. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That this House instruct the federal government to establish a method of appeal for the 20 per cent, or 8,000 cattle producers, the minister responsible for the program has said would not receive payment before the March 31 expiry of the program.

Mr. Nelson A. Since in its piecemeal attempt at tax review, the government has levied a new sales tax on small businesses, businesses which will now be classified as manufacturers for tax purposes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish):

That these same businesses now be considered eligible for federal enterprise development programs designed for manufacturers.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, whereas the government has unilaterally cancelled the very worth-while native sport and recreation program which provides jobs and much needed fitness and health programs to native people all across Canada, particularly in isolated regions, and whereas this program has proven extremely successful in combating many health and social problems which native communities often encounter, and whereas the government has provided nothing to replace this valuable program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That this House direct the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to act immediately to provide interim funding so this program may continue through the summer and establish a study committee in consultation with native people to determine how best these program objectives can be maintained in the long term.

SUGGESTED IMMEDIATE INCREASE IN OLD AGE PENSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell), I move:

That this House recognizes that couples 65 years of age or over have to spend one fifth of their income on food, and that food prices are rising at the rate of 16 or 18 per cent, which means that the present system of indexing falls far short of enabling senior citizens to maintain an adequate standard of living, or even to remain above the poverty line, and this House therefore calls on the government to implement its promise to provide help where help is needed by making an immediate increase in the rate of the pension paid to Canada's senior citizens.

is considered to be fully defensible in law, and by virtue of the fact that many salmon caught off the Alaska panhandle are spawned in Canadian waters, I move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That in future boundary negotiations with the United States, the Canadian government shall insist on a seaward fishing boundary proceeding in a north-westerly direction from Cape Muzon, and not more than 12 miles from the coastline of the Alaska panhandle.

PROVISION OF SERVICES IN ONTARIO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter which is not only urgent but, literally, a life and death situation. I am seeking the unanimous consent of the House on this motion, and hence am presenting it after the election campaign in Ontario but before the new government takes office. It concerns the quality of health care in the province of Ontario which is funded by the federal government to the tune of many billions of dollars. Mr. Lang: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki):

SETTLEMENT OF EAST COAST MARITIME BOUNDARY BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES—NEED FOR FISHERIES CONSERVATION AGREEMENT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans I will direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, simply because the questions overlap.

Yesterday an official of the United States state department stated that no negotiations on an east coast fisheries treaty between the United States and Canada will begin until the maritime boundary dispute between the two countries is settled by the International Court of Justice at the Hague, an action which I submit will take at least four or five years. Is it the intention of the present government to continue its conservation quotas for Canadians in this area until the boundary dispute is settled?

Will the government persecute the crews of nine scallop draggers, which were raided yesterday in my home town of Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, for allegedly catching undersized scallops, when Americans catch and market the same size scallops, or will an attempt be made to secure an interim conservation agreement with the United States for the benefit of the fishermen of both countries?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think I should leave it to my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, to answer part of that question on a subsequent occasion. But with respect to the international aspect of it, let me say that it is very important to distinguish between a fisheries agreement, even an interim fisheries agreement, and a conservation plan.

As I understood the comment made yesterday before the United States Senate committee by a U.S. government official, he was talking about a full interim fisheries arrangement. I think we would have to say that we sadly regard the fisheries arrangement in the form of a treaty as no longer possible of attainment until the boundary question is settled. But with respect to conservation measures, we stated very forcefully to the Americans last week, during their visit, that we not only expected to be fully consulted on a conservation measure which they would bring into force, but that we expected a conservation measure to be put into effect. Of course, that is also the position we would prefer to continue with our own fishermen.

REQUEST THAT CANADIAN DELEGATION VISIT WASHINGTON

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. In light of the position stated yesterday by an official of the United States state department before its Senate foreign relations committee that recall of the fisheries treaty is "total", and that no negotiations can begin, even on an interim solution, until the maritime boundary question is settled and, as I said a moment ago, in light of the present overfishing by Americans in this area and the potential for complete destruction of the stocks if this action continues indefinitely, will the minister take the initiative to put together a delegation led by himself, consisting of officials of his department, Members of Parliament from all parties who are interested, and fishing groups, to approach the United States government in an attempt to persuade it to modify its position on this important matter?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am not sure we have to persuade the United States administration to modify its position, because it wants a conservation measure as much as we do. It may well be difficult to set it up with the co-operation of the fishermen of the United States.

Certainly I appreciate the fact that there is good will on all sides of the House with respect to this, and that we all have a common interest in putting forward a strong position vis-à-vis the United States government, particularly the United States Congress. I will certainly discuss with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans the hon. member's suggestion about the appropriate forms of representation, including a delegation.

QUOTAS ALLOCATED TO EUROPEAN FISHING FLEETS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. I can assure him that we are endeavouring to be helpful and will concur in any genuine effort which is made to try to come to some form of agreement.

Since we are obviously facing an impasse on fisheries problems between our two countries, has the minister considered discussing with his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, revising the fishing quotas allocated to European-based fishing fleets within our 200-mile limit, and using those stocks as a bargaining chip to induce the American government to take a more enlightened position on the fisheries management treaty, since at present there is no quid pro quo for Canada on these fishing quotas now being allocated to European-based fleets?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, with respect to any existing arrangements by which we are bound with European countries, I think we would not be at liberty to depart from those. In fact, we are in the process of negotiating a new arrangement with the European Economic Community. At the moment it seems that it will not be very easily negotiated. Perhaps in light of that fact there may be, indeed, additional fish and additional fishing quotas about which the hon. member and I could talk.

NEGOTIATION OF WEST COAST FISHING BOUNDARY

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On March 9 in this House the Secretary of State undertook to raise west coast boundary and fisheries treaty matters on the occasion of the visit of the President of the United States. I would like to ask the minister if press reports are correct to the effect that Canada has reached a tentative agreement, not merely at the officials level but at the political level, on either the west coast fisheries salmon treaty or the boundaries issue? If not, what progress has been made in recent days as a consequence of the recent visit by the President of the United States?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, there has been considerable progress made with respect to the tuna fishery on the west coast, but with respect to the salmon and boundaries questions, those are at an earlier stage.

However, our negotiators report that they have achieved significant advances in the talks. Therefore, in the near future cabinet will have to decide whether or not to go on with the negotiations and, of course, the terms on which the negotiations should continue.

BRITISH COLUMBIA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to hear that. In the same vein, then, I would like to ask either the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, who has just taken his seat, or the Secretary of State for External Affairs, what specific boundaries on the west coast the government is prepared to advance on behalf of Canada? I ask this in light of recent submissions and resolutions passed by the British Columbia Chamber of Commerce which suggest that Canada stand firm on the traditional A-B boundary line in Dixon Entrance, insist on redrawing the fisheries boundary off the coast of the Alaska panhandle to reflect better the traditional fishing access of Canadian fishing vessels and, finally, that the federal government reflect the proposal of the provincial government that, in the San Juan extension, the southern fishery boundary follow the San Juan Canyon route rather than the equidistant line.

Will the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans or the Secretary of State tell the House if the Government of Canada will follow these recommendations of the B.C. Chamber of Commerce and British Columbia fishermen? If these matters cannot be resolved by bilateral discussion, may the House be informed as to whether they also could be submitted to the international tribunal, should that initiative be required with respect to east coast boundaries matters?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we will take very seriously the representations both of the hon. gentleman and of his province. I think I should distinguish between the two issues. On the salmon issue, the negotiations have made great progress and are far advanced. The boundaries issue is not at that stage at this time. As I said, we will very seriously consider this point of view.

REQUEST THAT DOCTORS EXERCISE RESTRAINT IN FEE NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday the minister offered voluntary restraint by organized labour, organized business and individuals as his flimsy solution to the problems of a 12.2 per cent inflation rate. Wage increases have fallen behind the cost of living for the fourth year in a row.

• (1425)

Since the doctors of Manitoba are demanding 49 per cent fee increases, B.C. doctors are demanding a 44 per cent hike, and the Ontario doctors just turned down a 15 per cent offer, does the minister intend to call in the heads of the provincial medical associations and ask the doctors of Canada to restrain their excessively inflationary demands before our medicare scheme is wrecked?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it would be more appropriate for provincial ministers to deal with the question of rising costs in provinces. As the hon. member may recall, the last time we had a very serious increase in wage rates in Canada the provincial premiers themselves met together and requested the federal government to take action in the way of wage and price controls. It seems to me that it would be appropriate, at an early stage, for all levels of government to take into account the impact of excessive wage settlements or wage demands in the current inflationary environment. I appreciate the interest of the hon. member in drawing this very important matter to our attention.

REQUEST THAT OIL COMPANIES FREEZE PRICES TEMPORARILY

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Passing the buck to the provincial ministers may be all well and good, but in this case let us examine the oil companies, those dandy corporate citizens, whose profits are up 40 per cent over the last year, and just got caught with their arm in the cookie jar for another $12 billion; $175 million on inventory mark-ups—a big cookie jar—with six cents a gallon on oil, piggybacked on the March 1 price increase.

I would like the minister to call in those oil maggots, just for a little friendly discussion, and examine with them the effect of their behaviour on inflation rates in Canada, and to ask these high rollers to set an example for the rest of the country by freezing the price of oil, at least for a while.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): All along, the government has resisted the requests of the oil industry to move up oil prices to the world level. We have taken quite a different view in that respect than the industry itself because we understand the impact which accelerating energy prices does have and is having, and which, if moved to the world level, would be even greater. For example, in the last year energy prices increased 24 per cent. We believe that is considerable. I want to assure the hon. member that that particular point has been taken into account.

In addition to that, I remind him that in the budget I did levy additional taxes on the oil and gas industry. In all honesty, I am somewhat disappointed by the lack of enthusiasm of the New Democratic Party for these additional taxes on the oil and gas industry.

PROFITS MADE BY CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): The minister, in his obfuscation, neglected to mention the profits and the excessive gouging. That is really what my question was about. Let us take the chartered banks. We have here—

Madam Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member just ask the question?

An hon. Member: Just ask the question, Madam Speaker said. You are not Ed Broadbent.

Mr. Rose: I want to ask whether the minister will call into his office the heads of the chartered banks, who have similarly been profiteering, to talk to them about the spread between the interest rates on money which is on deposit and the interest rates which they charge for mortgages and loans. If the minister cannot bring the chartered banks into his office and ask them for help, will he take a stroll down to the Senate where all the board members of the chartered banks sit?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): A stroll to the Senate seems more inviting than to call in the presidents of the banks. But let me—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Let me tell the hon. member that it is true that the profitability of the banks, as has been discussed in the House already, has been somewhat healthy in the last period. I have asked the House to take a look at the profitability of the banks over the preceding several quarters and over the preceding year to see whether, on the basis of a fairly extended period of time, a claim can be made that profits are excessive. It is for that reason that I have asked the House to take a longer view, not only of the past period but the current period and some months into the future, and at that time make up its mind whether, in fact, there have been excessive profits. In the meantime I intend to monitor the situation, and if action is required I will be prepared to consider it.

• (1430)

PROTECTION FOR SENIOR CITIZENS AGAINST INFLATION

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Minister of Finance who yesterday told this House that the Economic Council of Canada concurred with his view that Canada's old age pensioners are "fully protected" from inflation by the present system of indexing. Since the Economic Council of Canada said no such thing in its report on pensions, and since some preliminary estimates by former council staff indicate that pensioners are being short-changed by about $50 million to $60 million per year, will the minister either stop the sham of insisting that pensioners are being protected through indexing, or will he put some truth into the statement by returning that $50 million to $60 million to Canada's senior citizens?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I disagree totally with the premise of the hon. member's question. I disagree totally and completely because the Canadian pension system—the guaranteed income supplement, the old age security—both systems, are fully guaranteed and adjusted quarterly, not bi-annually as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

PENSION PRICE INDEX FOR SENIOR CITIZENS

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to see that the minister has such an open mind on this subject. I should like to point out to him that the estimated spread between the cost of living index and a pension price index is in the order of 4 per cent, which means that pensioners today are facing 16 per cent inflation rather than the 12.2 per cent that has been indicated.

Will the minister at least re-examine an indexing system which pays pensions according to data which is seven years out of date and which does not reflect the spending habits of senior citizens or will he use his considerable influence in the government to ensure that necessary studies on a pension price index will take place?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the constructive tone of the question and the constructive intention. I will be glad, as I have begun already, to discuss the matter further with the Minister of National Health and Welfare. My understanding is that if a basket of necessities commonly used by senior citizens or pensioners were put together as a basis for a cost of living index, it would not provide a significant improvement to the pensioners as compared with the current cost of living index. But I would be quite prepared to look at the studies upon which the current index is based to see whether it could be improved. My current information is that there is no appreciable improvement that could be reached through a change in the basket of necessities.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ACTIVITIES OF FORMER BRITISH HIGH COMMISSIONER IN CANADA—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Can he indicate to the House whether the government was aware of the activities alleged to have been indulged in by the former British High Commissioner to Canada, Sir Peter Hayman and, if so, what action has been taken, or what action does the government plan to take?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, the RCMP were not aware of the matters to which the hon. member refers. We do not propose an investigation into them. If the matter requires the attention of anyone, which is not for us to say, it would be a matter for British authorities.

Mr. Elzinga: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Solicitor General. In view of the fact that there are alleged overtones of sexual involvement with children, and in view of the fact that the High Commissioner had close links with the intelligence community in Canada, does the government not think that this warrants an investigation in order to clear the air in Canada, since he was High Commissioner for that period of time?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, any improper or illegal activities that might have involved children, as the hon. member knows, would be a matter for municipal police forces or provincial police forces and would not fall within the federal policing program of the RCMP.

So far as the national security interest is involved, we are not aware of any national security interest that was prejudiced by any of these alleged acts.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—REPORTED RE-EVALUATION OF PRODUCTION PROGRAM IN UNITED STATES

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Reports from Washington this morning indicate that two days ago the Defence Systems Acquisition Review Council at a meeting which was to have given the go-ahead for production of the fighter version of the F-18, decided instead to re-examine the entire program critically. Would the minister confirm the accuracy of these reports and, if they are correct, could he tell us what implications they have for the Canadian fighter purchase?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, it just happens that I had a conversation with the Canadian ambassador to Washington a few moments ago to check on these rumours and allegations that I have heard from that side of the House. The ambassador told me that there was no such rumour in Washington and that there was no question of reducing the F-18 program at the moment. No decision has been taken, and GAO report is still under consideration and a decision will be taken in due time.

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker, the minister did not really reply to the question that I asked. I referred to a DSARC recommendation that came out two days ago which says that instead of going ahead with full production, the program will be critically re-examined. This will delay it further.

I would submit to the minister that if these reports are true, that this information, coupled with all the other information about the failings of the fighter, including the most recent recommendation of the United States chief of navy materiel that the program be cancelled, indicates that the program has serious problems in the United States. That being the case, has the minister or his department any plans to cut Canada's losses now while we have the opportunity, or is he still prepared to let our armed forces be saddled with a $4 billion white elephant?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I do not know what the aim of the hon. member is in regard to the F-18. He should know, because he probably reads all the reports I get from most of the program managers, that in 1979 811 F-18 aircraft were planned. That was raised later to 1,377. Every year they review the program to see how, year by year, the United States Defence Department and the navy have performed. I would ask the hon. member to stop these rumours and allegations and to stick to the full report that he receives regularly, even from my department.

INQUIRY RESPECTING QUEBEC PARTICIPATION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and it relates to the participation of the provincial governments in the forthcoming national conference on pensions which, to my mind, will be very significant for the well-being of present and future pensioners. I would like to know if Mr. Lévesque's PQ government has responded positively to the Canadian government's invitation to attend or have they behaved like a separatist party by refusing to take part in the conference?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I can confirm to the House that eight provinces and two territories have accepted the invitation to attend the National Conference on Pensions and that I have every reason to believe that Ontario will be there as well. We will know that for sure within a few days. Unfortunately Quebec is the only province which turned down the invitation. It did so in a letter from Premier Lévesque himself, a letter in which he refused to send observers or officials to our national conference on the reform of private company pensions. What makes it even more unfortunate is the fact that it will not be a federal-provincial conference but indeed a national conference where all participants, especially spokesmen for private industry, will come to tell us what they are prepared to do to improve the lot of pensioners. I therefore regret very much the attitude of Mr. Lévesque.

MINING

QUERY RESPECTING CANADIANIZATION POLICY

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Mines. Can the minister advise this House whether the government has under consideration or is working on a Canadianization policy or program for selected segments of the mining and mineral industry and, if so, when does the government intend to announce such a program?

● (1440)

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Madam Speaker, the answer is no, with the exception of uranium.

Mr. Yurko: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question, with a little longer preamble this time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is not allowed a long preamble at any time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Yurko: Madam Speaker, the extent of the Canadianization program in energy, and the massive requirement for capital in that project, will cause the other industries in Canada, many of them, including the mining industry, to seek capital on the international market. Because of the very high interest rate on debt capital, they will be seeking equity capital. Because it is expected that the mining industry needs some $50 billion to $70 billion of capital in the next ten years, I submit—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has gone on with his preamble. I asked him not to do that. I am afraid I will not allow his question now.

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, without preamble, my question is for the Prime Minister. It relates to the western development fund. There is much curiosity in western Canada because this fund seems to have slipped the level of consciousness on the part of the government. The Minister of Finance indicated last week that there have been no consultations with provinces or anyone—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Enough.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —and there have been no priorities established. My question is a very simple one for the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister have any deadline with respect to consultations taking place in western Canada, and when will he announce the details of the western development fund?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member understands that this western development fund was part of the energy package. As he knows, this energy package has not yet had the wholehearted support of the Conservative party or of some of the western provinces. Therefore, it is obvious that we cannot spend the fund before the energy package is accepted by this House.

We have, however, had consultations informally. We are anxious to draw in the best possible ideas so that this fund, when it is assembled, will be spent for the benefit of western Canadians.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I think the Prime Minister is mistaken because the federal government has unilaterally moved with respect to taxation on the resource industry in western Canada. This whole program is indeed a fraud. It is taking $38 billion out of western Canada and putting back $2 billion in a pork-barrel handout system. Has the Prime Minister set any deadline as to when the priorities of this government respecting reinvestment of this money in western Canada will be established? Do we have to wait for this as long as we have waited for double-tracking?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member describes this as pork-barrelling. He will recall the government, of which he was a member, in the budget presented by the hon. member for St. John's West was proposing a scheme of things where there would be some $40 billion spent in the four western provinces over a period of three and a half years, that is to the end of 1983. We are attempting to match that figure to ensure that that amount would be spent in the west, much as the hon. member's party was doing, except we do not call it pork-barrelling. We say we want to do it in the interests of western Canadians.

An hon. Member: You take it out first.

QUEBEC REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING CONSTITUTIONAL RESOLUTION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. He will recall that Mr. Claude Ryan, leader of the Liberal party in Quebec, speaking shortly after the announcement of the election date in Quebec and talking about the Constitution said that the first thing a provincial Liberal government would do, the day after the election, would be to communicate with the Liberal government and its head to invite them to resume reasonable negotiations and discussions on the Constitution.

Is it the position of the Government of Canada that any government elected in Quebec on April 13 would have the right to make representations on the federal government's constitutional package before the resolution was passed by Parliament and sent to Britain?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, not only every government but every leader of the opposition in this country at every provincial level has found himself quite free to make representations. I believe it is known that several leaders of the opposition did directly or indirectly make representations before the standing committee. Nothing will be changed in that sense by the date of the provincial election, any more than anything will be changed tonight by the election of the new government of Ontario, whatever it is.

Representations have been going on. As was pointed out by one of our hon. members before orders of the day were called, members of this House have made many representations. During the last part of the constitutional debate some 170 speeches have been delivered. This procedure will go on as long as this House does not decide that is time to bring the matter to a vote.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, as the Prime Minister knows, whatever he might wish, one thing which might change in the province of Quebec after the election of April 13 is that there might be a new government which might be headed by Mr. Ryan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert: Then you will be in for it.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Ryan has made it very clear that he would want to have the opportunity, as the head of a new government, to discuss the constitutional package in Canada rather than be faced with a decision which had been taken by this Parliament to send Canadian business to Britain.

Is it the position of the Government of Canada that any government which would be elected in the province of Quebec on April 13 should have the right to make representations, as a government, to the Government of Canada, and to the Parliament of Canada regarding the joint resolution now before this House of Commons, and that it should not be denied that right by having this government act in a way which would send Canada's business to Britain before the people of Quebec have a right to make a decision on April 13?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, we are happy that the Leader of the Opposition recognizes that the next government of Quebec will likely be a Liberal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am surprised to hear that concession so early in the election campaign—

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: —particularly since his former seatmate, the former member for Joliette, is now leading the Union Nationale Party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I do not think the question can be answered as an absolute. If the Leader of the Opposition is arguing that all future governments to be elected in any province of Canada would have to be heard before the resolution goes to London, the answer is obviously no. If he is arguing that that should be done only for the Quebec election, then I wonder why he is discriminating against all of the other provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

VISIT OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE TO BRITAIN

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, we all know that Quebec is in rather a special situation in this case because, of the elected members of that province who are sitting in this House, only one has had the courage to speak for his province against his party on the constitutional question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: You use Quebec as your rationalization.

Mr. Clark: To remind the Prime Minister of one of his own phrases, in which he indicated it would not be dignified for the Government of Canada to be sending representatives to lobby British Members of Parliament prior to the emergence from the Parliament of Canada of the joint resolution on the Consitution, does the Prime Minister continue to hold the view that it would not be dignified for the Canadian government to be indulging in that practice? If he does, can he tell us whether the deputy minister of justice, Mr. Tassé, is now in Britain lobbying British Members of Parliament?

Can he tell us whether it is the intention of the present Minister of Justice to be in Britain next Wednesday to speak to the foreign affairs committee of the parliamentary Labour party, to lobby, in an undignified way, those Members of Parliament in relation to a matter which will still be before the House of Commons of Canada?

● (1450)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, you recognize that there are many questions involved in that.

An hon. Member: Answer them all.

Mr. Trudeau: I will indeed try to answer every one of them if I can have the indulgence of members opposite. I must say that I find it rather strange for the leader of a party in this House to suggest that members elected from a province do not speak for that province. Surely that is the job of every member in this House, to speak for Canada and to speak for the province in which he was elected. To make the kind of suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition seems to me like throwing stones when you live in a glass house, because I could have clearly argued on the same basis that there is only one member of his party who has the courage to speak for Alberta in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert: What tripe!

Mr. Trudeau: That is not how we view the role of members in this House. They have been elected on both sides to speak for their constituents as they see it in their conscience to do. One member on this side has disagreed with our government policy, but I think it is quite obvious to the Leader of the Opposition that one member on his side has done the same.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We did not sic Jacques Olivier on him.

Mr. Trudeau: I hear about Jacques Olivier. I am not sure of what the relevance of that is.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Neither is Jacques.

Mr. Trudeau: As to the presence in London of the Minister of Justice, it is true he agreed quite some time ago to speak to the members of the Canadian Club in London next week. We hope he will be able to keep that engagement. It will, of course, depend on events in this House. We hope we have the co-operation of the Leader of the Opposition to permit the Minister of Justice to go there and keep that engagement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

INDUSTRIAL RESTRUCTURING AND LABOUR RETRAINING

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. A few days ago the minister announced that the communities of Windsor, Sept-Îles, and Sydney were among the first to qualify for the new program of industrial restructuring and labour retraining. When the announcement was first made about this program, the minister indicated there would be community committees to administer the program, on which there would be labour and business representation. Have labour and business groups in these communities been consulted yet, and have discussions been held with them regarding the role they will play? If not, why not?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, just to give an additional piece of information to the House, the community of Sorel was one of the communities beyond the three that were mentioned. In each of those instances a member of the cabinet went to the communities to make an announcement, meet with local leaders, and discuss the development with local community committees. Those are now being established. We expect that the chair persons of those committees, plus the membership, will be announced within a week or two. Then we will get on to the second round of assessment of other communities that are eligible for this very important and very innovative new program.

Mr. Orlikow: Madam Speaker, I have had an opportunity to speak with people in the steelworkers' union and the auto workers' union. I have not yet had an opportunity to talk to the paper workers. They tell me there have been no discussions with them as yet, as to their role. They are wondering if they will just be pro forma members of a large committee in which the usual government bureaucrats will be running the whole show. They wonder what has happened to the government's promise that they would be consulted in a real sense.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I am not sure exactly whom the hon. member spoke to, but I can give him and other members of this House every assurance that the whole basis of the program depends on full participation of business, labour, and the municipal governments of those communities, as well as the federal government. We see it as an opportunity to provide for a very constructive partnership. I can assure the hon. member there will be full consultation and involvement of all the key sectors to make this program work.

IMMIGRATION

CANADIAN PLANS TO HELP EL SALVADORAN REFUGEES

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

[English]

In view of the current situation in El Salvador, is the Canadian government considering any special measures to alleviate the plight of the people caught in that country?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): As members of this House will recognize, Madam Speaker, the civil strife has caused a serious disruption and there are now an estimated 50,000 to 60,000 refugees on the border of El Salvador. I asked the officials to investigate the situation and work with the United Nations.

The United Nations High Commissioner has requested that there be no major movement of refugees at the present time. In the meantime, we are undertaking certain special measures such as those relating to Salvadorians in Canada now on business permits. They will be landed here if they are sponsored by relatives, or will be given minister's permits to provide for employment while they are here. After six months we will review their case with a view toward landing them. As well, those in Canada can sponsor relatives who have had to flee El Salvador because of reasons of strife. Those are intermediate measures. We will continue to monitor the situation and provide whatever relief this country can, within the tradition that we have already established.

ENERGY

APPLICATION OF ENERGY CONVERSION PROGRAM TO NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the minister taken a decision on whether New Brunswickers who switch from oil to electricity for home heating can qualify for the $800 grant program? If not, will he take a decision before April 1?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I expect to take a decision before April 1. However, I am still waiting for a commitment from the government of New Brunswick about the conversion of the Coleson Cove generating station away from oil to other fuels. As soon as I have this firm confirmation and commitment from the government of New Brunswick, I will be happy to approve the conversion to electricity as well as the conversion to other forms of energy away from oil.

POLITICAL PARTIES

LIBERAL PARTY FUND RAISING SCHEME

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who has responsibility for ensuring that Canadians are not overcharged for shoddy goods. In view of newspaper reports this week which refer to a "Rent-a-Liberal" scheme, whereby contributors to the Liberal Party who give $150 will be invited to a party with six Liberal cabinet ministers, including the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, will the minister put an end to this scam to ensure that these people are not ripped off?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I think it is a very, very good bargain, much better than some fund raising operations of my friends on the opposite side.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): But we raise more money.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, may I ask the minister exactly what these individuals purchase for their $150?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SALE OF INSURANCE POLICIES AT CANADIAN FORCES BASE, COLD LAKE, ALTA.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Canadian Forces Base Cold Lake constitutes a very sizeable community of service and non-service personnel. It has been drawn to my attention recently that insurance agents in towns bordering on the base are not allowed to go on base to sell property or auto insurance, yet a company, Gold Circle Insurance, has been allowed exclusive access to the base. Why has the Gold Circle Insurance company been granted such a privileged monopoly which puts local independent agents at a great disadvantage? Does the monopoly apply to all Canadian Forces Bases? Also, can the minister name the Liberals who own Gold Circle Insurance Company?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, the question requires a lot of answers. I think it would be better to give them to the hon. member in writing. However, I can assure him that there is no question of privilege to anyone and that the company is run very equitably. There have been a lot of complaints similar to his. Each time we have inquired and found that everything was being done equitably.

● (1500)

Mr. Shields: There is absolutely no competition for Gold Circle Insurance Company at Canadian Forces Base Cold Lake. All independent agents living in the towns of Bonnyville, Cold Lake and Grand Centre, are barred access and may not even advertise in the Cold Lake newspaper. I show the minister an advertisement by Gold Circle that says, "Additional information may be obtained from the base exchange officer". Is this not a monopolistic practice?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I will investigate and see what kind of an answer I can give the hon. member.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO ISLAND AIRPORT FACILITIES FOR USE BY STOL AIRCRAFT SERVICE

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that he is reported to have stated in a letter to Mayor Eggleton of Toronto in January that:

> ... If the city of Toronto agrees to the use of Toronto Island Airport for STOL operations under the conditions suggested, Transport Canada is willing to seek Treasury Board funding approval for the provision of the necessary airport facilities.

Will he advise the extent and cost of these necessary airport facilities?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, a few weeks ago I made an offer to the City of Toronto in which I stated a number of principles and practices that Transport Canada would follow should the city council revise its position and vote in favour of STOL facilities. They answered by adding new conditions to the set I had laid down. My deputy is in Toronto this afternoon discussing the matter with the mayor. Part of our offer will be to build facilities at the Toronto Island Airport for general aviation and some facilities for STOL, but the latter would be built on a cost recovery basis.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the government House leader his intentions for House business tomorrow and into next week, and would he be able to confirm that Wednesday, March 25, is in fact to be an allotted day?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, that is right; next Wednesday will be the seventh and last allotted day of this period of supply.

[Translation]

Today, we shall debate constitutional issues. Tomorrow, we shall proceed to the report stage of the bill to provide borrowing authority to the government. It has been agreed by the House leaders that should a vote be necessary, it would be deferred to next Wednesday at six o'clock. We hope that this will happen tomorrow so that we can at least dispose of the report stage of this urgent bill tomorrow afternoon.

As for the business of the House next week, I repeat that Wednesday will be an opposition day, and during the rest of the week, we shall be debating constitutional matters.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, in the event that we deal with the report stage amendment on the borrowing bill before the end of the day tomorrow, would it be the intention of the government House leader to continue with the constitutional debate for the balance of that day?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: That is a possibility that I am willing to seriously consider, but I would rather wait to see whether this occurs, and after Oral Question Period tomorrow I shall be able to confirm to my learned colleague whether we might attempt to proceed with the third reading of the bill. I would prefer this, but if we fail to agree, we shall probably carry on with the constitutional debate.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, may I ask the government House leader whether he has any recent word from the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs about the legislation we trust he is preparing to present to Parliament at this session?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I have heard the very honest and generous answers provided to the hon. member by the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs, and I wish to assure the hon. member that the minister is dealing seriously with this matter, and that as soon as there are further developments, he will immediately inform the hon. member for Winnipeg-North-Centre (Mr. Knowles).

[English]

Mr. Hargrave: Madam Speaker, I would just remind the government House leader once again that he would always find a ready reception on this side of the House if he were to bring in the meat import law for quick passage so we can get into committee.

Mr. Pinard: My colleague talks about "meat". I will try to "meet" his request.

ENERGY

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS RESPECTING DEVELOPMENT OF COAL RESOURCES IN NORTHEAST BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, on February 24, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) requested the government to release documents in its possession with respect to the northeast British Columbia coal discussions. After consultation with the Minister of State for Economic Development, I am pleased to table a number of documents relating to these negotiations.

In addition, I might mention that we can also table a list of over 100 studies on the project conducted by DREE and the B.C. government. They are available upon request from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

There are also a number of other documents dealing with exchanges between our government, the government of British Columbia and our embassy in Tokyo, various internal memoranda and exchanges with the coal companies, which will not be released because they fall under the exemption clauses of the access to information legislation now before Parliament.

RESEARCH EXPENDITURES—ANNUAL INCREASES IN PRICE INDICES

Question No. 409—Mr. Orlikow:

What were the actual or estimated annual increases in the price indices from 1969-70 to 1978-79 for the (a) National Research Council—Research Expenditures using 1969-70 as a base year (b) Medical Research Council—Research Expenditures using 1969-70 as a base year (c) Science Expenditures Price Index using 1969-70 as a base year (d) Implicit Price Index of the Gross National Product using 1969 as a base year (e) Consumer Price Index using 1969 as a base year?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): In so far as the Ministry of State for Science and Technology is concerned: the problem of developing an adequate index to reflect the impact of inflation on R and D costs is a very difficult one, to which no completely satisfactory solution has been found. The federal government uses the IPI-GNP as a deflater of science expenditures in Canada, consistent with the practice of other member countries of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. Moreover, since our R and D target is stated in terms of the Gross National Product, the IPI-GNP is an appropriate index for R and D planning purposes.

However, a number of separate indices have been developed by some departments and agencies to reflect their assessments of how inflation has affected them. The following tables set out the indices referred to by the hon. member—for the years 1969 to 1978, or 1969-70 to 1978-79 as appropriate—and the annual changes in each index.

The indices are: (a) an index developed by the National Research Council, the NRC-RE index; (b) an index which the Medical Research Council (MRC) has devised; (c) the Science Expenditures Price Index (SEPI) proposed by the Science Council; (d) the Implicit Price Index of the Gross National Product (IPI-GNP); and (e) the Consumer Price Index.

The hon. member's question indicates his awareness of the fact that some of those indices refer to fiscal years and some to calendar years. The tables respond to his question as posed except that the MRC index is given for calendar years, since the council calculates it in this way.

1. Has PetroCan bought, leased, contracted for or in any way whatsoever been involved with Challenger Jet aircraft or any other type of aircraft and (a) if not, does it propose to do so (b) if so, is the number of aircraft involved ten and, if not, what is the number?

2. What are all the details of any such situation that exists including costs?

3. Have any negotiations, conversations or anything of any kind whatsoever taken place on this subject on behalf of PetroCan, directly or indirectly and, if so, by whom?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Petro-Canada reports as follows: 1. Yes. (a) Not applicable. (b) One Challenger 46.

2 and 3. Petro-Canada has placed an order for one Challenger 46 at a cost of $7 million with expected delivery in early 1982. Because of the lengthy delivery time involved, Petro-Canada has also obtained a position in line for the longer-range Challenger E in the event that future operations require that type of aircraft.

Question No. 1,718—Mr. Cossitt:

Does PetroCan own, have an interest in or is it in any way involved with the usuage of aircraft at the present time, directly or indirectly and, if so, what are all the details?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Petro-Canada reports as follows: Petro-Canada owns and operates six (6) aircraft for operational purposes. These aircraft include: two Twin Otters, one Beechcraft 100 King Air, one Grumman Gulfstream 1, one Hawker Siddeley 125, one Britten Norman Islander.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): The table below shows the sequence of forecasts in regards to funds for the main contract and the project support elements identified in total program requirements but which are not part of the main contract with McDonnell Douglas.

THISTLE REPORT ON EASTERN NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERY

Question No. 2,094—Mr. McGrath:

1. Will the government release the findings of an inquiry into the herring and queen crab fishery in eastern Newfoundland and, if so, on what date?

2. For what reason was the report not made public?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): 1. Yes. The department will release the findings of the Thistle report. However, the date of release has not been determined.

2. My officials are currently developing long-term management plans for both the herring and crab fisheries. The recommendations made by the Thistle report are being evaluated for inclusion into the long-term management plans for Atlantic Canada. Once the review process has been completed, some time within the next few months, the report will be released.

GROUNDFISH LICENSING PROGRAM

Question No. 2,095—Mr. McGrath:

1. Under the government's new groundfish licencing program, how many (a) full-time (b) part-time fishermen will be licensed in the four Atlantic provinces and Quebec?

2. Has this information been made available to provincial governments and, if not, for what reason?

3. Are there appeal procedures for the licensing program and, if so (a) what are they (b) how many appeal boards have been established and who are the members?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): 1. The initial categorization of fishermen was as follows:

(a) Newfoundland: 11,500
Maritimes: 10,000

(b) Newfoundland: 23,500
Maritimes: 9,800

These figures are subject to change in accordance with the appeal procedures outlined in 3. (a).

Note: Under an agreement between the federal government and the government of Quebec, the province licences small boat fishermen. The province has had in place for a number of years a similar program of issuing licences to full-time or "professional" fishermen.

2. The number of fishermen assigned to each category is a matter of public record.

3. (a) The initial categorization of fishermen is subject to appeal to local committees consisting of fishermen, representatives of the community and departmental officials. Fishermen have the right to appear before these committees and the right to be represented.

Any individual who is dissatisfied with the results of the first level may appeal to a second regional appeal board consisting of persons not engaged in the fishery. There is a final level of appeal to the minister.

(b) Eighteen appeal committees have been established in Newfoundland. Each committee consists of four fishermen, one person from the community not engaged in the fishery and one departmental official.

In the maritimes, committees are presently being established. It is anticipated that there will be about 25 such committees. Their membership will be similar to the committees in Newfoundland.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule

B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Madam Speaker, continuing on from the interruption yesterday, let us consider the so-called Victoria amending formula, which is a method of amending the Constitution which in perpetuity would give the right to Ontario and/or Quebec individually to block constitutional amendments. I am a westerner, and this is totally unacceptable to the west. It is a continuation of a domination of the central provinces over the other rapidly-expanding, growing and vibrant regions of the country. Population is important, but the rights of the minorities in other provinces must be protected.

This amending formula will cause resentment. It will give sustenance to those who wish this country to break up and each region to go its own way. Let us imagine a situation in which nine provinces agree to amend but one province, either Quebec or Ontario, says no. Does this lead to national unity, or does it sow seeds of secession? A Constitution must be a matter of accommodation and concession by all in the interests of all. I see little concession by either Ontario or Quebec in this amending formula.

Let us take the worst case scenario one step further. Let us say that all provinces are agreed but the federal government will not agree. The proposal then calls for a national referendum to break a deadlock. Let us presume—and it certainly is not beyond the realm of possibility—that the deadlock is caused by an authoritarian federal government wishing to enhance its powers. Indeed, these very proposals are such a power grab. The federal government, and only the federal government, may call a national referendum. It picks the time. It picks the simplistic questions, and it has the power to spend millions of tax dollars on advocacy advertising in an attempt to sell its point of view to all Canadians. The provincial governments have no say in this. Indeed, if they wish a referendum on an issue, they cannot demand one. Only the federal government can do so.

Mr. Laniel: You have two years to change it.

Mr. Cook: This is giving awesome power to a centralist government. This is the beginning of a unitary state. This could be the end of provincial powers and the end of confederation.

Mr. Laniel: Because of the provinces.

Mr. Cook: For its own power-grabbing purposes the federal government decides that the questions of civil rights and property are now so important that it must have complete jurisdictional power.

Let us consider another case. Suppose it is alleged that the natural resources of all provinces, including the mines and hydro of Ontario and Quebec and the oil of Atlantic Canada and the west, will better serve all Canadians if there is total control by the federal government. Or let us say it is said that, perhaps for the sake of uniformity and efficiency, all education must be controlled and operated by the federal government on a national basis. All of these items are, of course, basic in provincial rights and powers. However, with a national referendum and millions spent on advertising by a federal government, can we really be sure that such a federal power grab would fail? How can we be sure? To be honest, we cannot. It could happen in the future, and the conversion of provinces and regions into a totally monolithic, federal, unitary state would begin.

However, it is my belief that long before such changes could take place there would be separation. Conceivably there could be civil war before the people of any region would allow a power-mad federal government to do legally through referendum what could not be done any other way. Do we want to have such a stacked deck in favour of the federal government, or do we prefer the system of separation of powers and the confederation which has basically served Canada so well for 114 years?

There are checks and balances in our system. Our system requires compromise, not authoritarianism. It has worked in the past. A typical example of this is unemployment insurance. Confederation can, with men of good will, continue to work in the future, but through these constitutional proposals the federal government indicates it wants more power and not co-operative federalism.

For a country to work, it must have checks and balances of power built into the system. In Canada the Fathers of Confederation designed these checks and balances. Among others, such checks and balances are Section 91 and Section 92 of the BNA Act. Now we have a subtle, insidious proposal for national plebiscites in this country which allows one partner in confederation, the federal government, to make major changes legally in the balance of power in Canada.

What this House has before it is an amending formula which is unfair to many parts of Canada and a provision for a referendum to override the wishes of the provinces. These two things are wrong in justice, wrong in freedom and wrong in the interests of all the people of Canada. These proposals are the initial steps to a unitary state and to an electorate carefully controlled and disciplined by the federal powers. These proposals are the beginning of the end of Canada as we have known it.

I would like to refer to the proposed charter of rights. Most Canadians want a charter of rights guaranteeing certain human rights which have always existed in Canada. Again I say that the charter is badly drafted, hastily thrown together and certainly does not achieve what many people think is being achieved.

It is not necessary to go through the entire document. It has pretensions to being noble, yet there is no preamble, no mention of God or family and no guarantee of property rights. I want a charter of rights, but not this hodge-podge of ill-conceived words.

I will give examples of what I mean. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) told a group of native people in Vancouver that the new Constitution would continue the protection of native rights which already exists in the BNA Act. The BNA Act says nothing about native rights. The only reference to Indians is in Section 91(24), which gives Parliament exclusive legislative jurisdiction over Indians and lands reserved for Indians.

At the time the minister spoke the resolution did not even mention native people, and the amendment subsequently made in committee merely states that the aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples in Canada are recognized and affirmed. But the native peoples of Canada have never been able to establish any enforcible legal rights with respect to their land claims, and for the Constitution to affirm unproveable and undefined rights is simply another trick to fool them and us.

What about fighting back against Quebec's Bill 101, which would make that province a francophone island in an anglophone sea? We have been told many times that the separatist option in the Quebec referendum was defeated because of the promise of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other members of his government that constitutional changes would be made to protect language rights. The brave new Constitution refers to the fundamental right to have one's children educated in their minority language provided they reside in an area in which the number of children is sufficient to warrant the provision, out of public funds, of minority language educational facilities. No area sizes are prescribed. No population numbers are spelled out. No one is empowered to determine these points, and there is no provision whatever except an appeal to the courts to overcome a refusal by Quebec or any other province to comply with this section.

Mobility rights are said to be guaranteed in the new Constitution, and upon a quick and careless reading this appears to be right. Section 6 (2) of the Constitution Act says that every citizen and permanent resident of Canada has the right to move to, reside and work in any province. Unfortunately, the section makes this right subject to its being overriden by any laws or practices of general application in force in a province so long as they do not discriminate primarily on the basis of province of previous residence. For example, if B. C. were to pass a law establishing a quota and permit system for people wanting to move into the province, the law would be perfectly valid under the new Constitution so long as it did not set quotas according to provincial origin. Thus, mobility rights are not guaranteed at all.

There is one problem not addressed by these constitutional proposals that, from a westerner's point of view, may be the ultimate problem for the future of Canada. I speak of representation by population without a counterbalance to ensure that the central provinces cannot overwhelm and legislate in their own best interests at the expense of the rest of Canada. Indeed, many fellow westerners and maritimers consider this to have been done over the past 100 years. I do not wish to speak of the alleged abuses of the past; I speak only of the future, and the hopes and aspirations of Canadians not only for justice to be done, but also to appear to be done.

As long as Canada uses representation by population as the sole criterion for voting purposes in this House of Commons, the 75-95 syndrome will not only offend and alienate but cause the regions outside of central Canada to consider themselves second-class citizens. Some way must be found to balance the 75 seats of Quebec and the 95 seats of Ontario in this House. It is simple to say, as population moves westward, that more seats and better balance in voting will naturally occur. I do not believe we can wait that long before an explosive resentment takes place.

The constitutional proposals have done nothing to attempt to change the Senate. Yet that is where the most rapid bringing together of this country could take place. A Senate composed of an equal number of senators from each province could provide the balance wheel against exploitation that does not now exist.

The genius of the American republic has been their Senate, where tiny Rhode Island has the same number of voting senators as the great states of New York or California. Rhode Island feels equal, feels part of the decision-making process in the American Senate. I doubt the Prince Edward Islander feels that sense of participation with a mere four seats out of 282 in this House of Commons, and three senators out of 104. Unless central Canada is prepared to share power, and share it equally, with the other regions of Canada, this country is on a collision course toward disaster. Where are the provisions in this Constitution to redress the balance and truly make Canadians equal, not only by population but by geography and region? Unfortunately, there is none, and to me it is a colossal blunder to avoid the one subject that could bring this country together as nothing has in the past. I would warn central Canada: unless it is prepared to offer equality and influence in the power and forces that shape this country, it will see the western region take the power to which it is entitled in a united country, even at the risk of breaking up the nation.

The matter of the 75-95 syndrome must be considered and solved to the satisfaction of all, or any constitutional proposals will be whistling in the wind. It is a problem that cries out for negotiation and solution while there is still time and good feelings between regions. This must be part of any future constitutional discussion.

I must say a lawyer's word about the draftsmanship of the new Constitution. In the history of mankind, no nation on earth has produced such an inept, confusing, conflicting mess as is proposed for us. It will make Canada the laughing stock of students of constitutional law throughout the world.

I urge hon. members opposite, I beseech them, to look to their conscience, to consider the overwhelming weight of evidence and testimony that this is a hastily thrown together patchwork that can tear this country apart.

What must be done, carefully and with great deliberation, is to begin anew and with good people—not all of them politicians—to design and create a fair and just Constitution for Canada. Once that is done, let us ask the British parliament to do only one thing, that is, to repeal the BNA Act. Then let us proclaim our own Constitution, made in Canada for Canadians by Canadians.

Countries all over the world have been able to create their own constitutions, even out of the chaos and confusion of revolution. After 1776, the American colonies sent delegates to a continental congress in Philadelphia to draft the United States constitution, and they succeeded in doing so, amending formula and all, in two years.

In 1782, George Washington wrote to representatives of the 13 colonies who were arguing over the terms of their constitution as follows:

> What is needed is a sacred regard to public justice and the prevalence of that friendly disposition among the people . . . which will induce them to forget their local prejudices and policies, to make mutual concessions to the general prosperity, and in some instances to sacrifice their individual advantages to the interest of the community.

Five years later, in a letter to James Madison, he urged:

> Let prejudices, unreasonable jealousies and local interest yield to reason and liberality. Let us look to our national character and to things beyond the present period . . . wisdom and good examples are necessary at this time to rescue the political machine from the impending storm.

Almost 200 years later, Washington's words are as apt and meaningful to Canadians today as they were to him and his countrymen in their time.

I urge upon this House to set this bad package aside. Let us have a constituent assembly. Let a group of good Canadians, with all deliberate speed, correct the massive inadequacies of these proposals before Parliament. Let them design a Constitution that will bind us together, not increase the alienation and separation of regions and provinces.

That is my plea, Mr. Speaker. May my grandchildren find I was helpful in the process of Parliament which may lead to changes in this grab bag of future disaster for my country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, although I deplore the fact that the hon. member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Ethier) is ill, I would be remiss if I did not congratulate the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) on his recent appointment, and I am convinced that he will discharge his responsibilities with great competence. Mr. Speaker, as I take the floor to join in this debate I am certain that I will not come up with anything new, let alone spectacular. Still I believe that my first responsibility is to take part in this parliamentary debate, and the aim of my speech is threefold. First, I want to keep a promise I made to my constituents when I committed myself to let them know how the situation would evolve and explain to them the very significant decision I will soon have to make.

• (1530)

Second, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the role of a federal member is to enlighten the people on the true meaning of the proposal we are debating in the House, of the courses it advocates, and of the interpretation it can be given with respect to the genuine interest of the people and the protection of all citizens, particularly those who are of French extraction and whom it is my duty and first responsibility to represent and defend. Third, Mr. Speaker, I will take the liberty of appealing to the common sense and the spirit of co-operation of all members, of provincial premiers and of Canadians generally so that a loyal and sincere effort be made with a view to trying these constitutional proposals in the honest hope of strengthening and uniting our great country, a hope we all share.

Mr. Speaker, it is an open secret that the progress of my thoughts in this debate has not been easy. It has been agonizing at times because I do not belong to that category of citizens who believe they hold a monopoly over truth and who remain insensitive to a resolution whose aftermath will be so important for the future of the country and of all Canadians. I have tried to marshall my thoughts in light of what is my first responsibility, that of a federal member of the Canadian Parliament. Mr. Speaker, I must confess to you and to hon. members of the House that during this debate as well as in the preceding weeks and months I had mixed feelings at times thinking on the one hand about what I consider my country, that piece of land where I live with my family and where I can try to be fulfilled with my language and my culture and with all the other riches left to me by my ancestors.

On the other hand, however, behind my nationalism which I do not deny there is also a deeply anchored desire to be a Canadian and, as a francophone, to enjoy my rights not only in Quebec but throughout Canada as well. I deeply believe in Canada, in its historical continuity, in its well-known generosity toward those who come to share our territory and our history. I believe that Canada is made up of people who trace their origins back to Amerindian, British and French founding nations and who, over the years, formed two distinct societies.

Ethnic groups other than English and French came to join this first component of our historic duality. Canada has acknowledged the presence and the coexistence of those two groups; I must admit there has been a lot of progress in that field, Mr. Speaker, but we still have a long way to go. I believe that the sooner those two societies or groups are recognized, which have not become solely French or English entities but rather gatherings of people who speak French or English and who are deeply scarred compared to one another, the better will be the social balance we have been seeking for over a century.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that federalism is tailored to the diversity of our people and that it can absorb without diluting the multicultural wealth for which our country stands so proud. Although I think that federalism rests on patient and generous negotiations rather than confrontation, I also think that all good things must come to an end and that the public interest will force us in time to make a decision. The time for speeches is nearly over, the time for action will soon be upon us. Of course at certain times we have heard from both sides very challenging and very constructive arguments. However, the time has now come to make a decision.

Canada has existed for 113 years, but it retains a last link with the colonialist era. Mr. Speaker, I think that it is healthy and not an act of disloyalty to state our differences in an attempt to find areas of agreement. Mr. Speaker, during this debate, I did not conceal my misgivings in two areas. I would like to summarize them briefly and say that I am not yet convinced that the changes that should have been made in this constitutional package would have provided a greater flexibility and made it more acceptable.

First, Mr. Speaker, and I am not the only one to share that view, even though very few have stated it publicly, I would like to deal with the application of clause 133 to Ontario. My position is simple, clear and specific. The present Constitution requires the Quebec and Manitoba governments to be bilingual at the legislative and judiciary levels, and the proposal now before us does not change anything in this connection. However, Mr. Speaker, the province of Ontario, for reasons which I consider unacceptable and inexplicable, has not seen fit to become institutionally bilingual in all areas and, contrary to New Brunswick, it refused to be realistic and show some sense by asking that clause 133 apply to Ontario so that it would not become officially bilingual in all areas but only in those where already two provinces are bilingual under the Constitution, that is Manitoba and Quebec, while New Brunswick has done much more than what was requested of the Ontario government.

Mr. Speaker, today being election day, I express the wish that the new Ontario government, whatever party is elected, realizes that it is of paramount importance that the province of Ontario, which has been a leader and which has benefited most from confederation, should make up its mind now that it no longer has to take political and electoral considerations into account. I do not mean to say that its citizens never had to work hard to benefit from confederation, but the fact remains that the system has brought them where they are today, living in a strong, rich and developed province which must now lead the way not only in the economic field but in the linguistic and cultural fields as well.

The federal government has been blamed for not enforcing section 133. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that at first I found this approach interesting and that I was attracted to it for a long time. But on the other hand, one must be fair and recognize that a decision made in that area by the federal government would have infringed on a provincial jurisdiction, and considering that the leaders of Ontario or Quebec not only never asked for the enforcement of Section 133 but in fact asked the federal government to disregard it, the situation was a difficult one. I think that the only way Section 133 could have been enforced by the federal government is through a joint resolution during a session of the joint committee when all the parties in the House would have risen above political partisanship and asked the Ontario government to enforce section 133 in its own province. Unfortunately, this was not possible because the official opposition was against it. Mr. Speaker, there remains—and that is my argument—an element of justice. I do not see why there should be a double standard: that Quebec and Manitoba should be required to be bilingual in their legislatures and courts, while Ontario is not.

My second point, Mr. Speaker, concerns Section 23 which requires English-speaking immigrants to Quebec—I should not say "requires" because there is a choice—after three years to join either the French or the English system. I feel that an immigrant to Quebec should be aware of these conditions and requirements and learn to live with them. I would have preferred that this aspect of Bill 101 providing that any immigrant to Quebec must adopt the language and culture of the majority had been left out of this constitutional proposal. I am told that Bill 101 actually provides for some flexibility and that the Quebec government apparently recognizes a special status to anglophones coming to Quebec, although there is no mention of this in the act. Therefore, it is a question of principle. I, for one, consider that immigrants to Quebec, whatever language they may speak, should adopt the French language, while maintaining their own language and traditions.

However, the Canada provision which is found in the proposed Constitution puts on an equal footing the people from Quebec who move to other parts of Canada and the people from other provinces who move to Quebec. I feel, therefore, that this provision is acceptable in the present context since we insist on equal rights for all Canadians wherever they live.

Mr. Speaker, my position on the three points now being discussed, namely patriation, the amending formula and the charter of rights, is as follows: to my mind, patriation is a neutral act. It does not imply any redistribution of powers and, as such, it is a step ordinary Canadians clamour for every day. But an attempt is being made at equating patriation with a redistribution of powers, and on that score the provinces have erred. In a way, they are to be blamed for the deadlock in which the federal government has been placed and which has forced us to propose a constitutional package that is unilateral.

Naturally, that is the type of wording the media spread around when, in fact, it is totally inaccurate, because unilateral patriation would imply patriation with the sole consent or on the sole initiative of the federal government; this is totally contrary to facts, as we know. We have the support of Ontario and New Brunswick: Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia are non-committal or have more or less given their formal acquiescence, and a very important party in this House of Commons, the NDP is on our side generally with just a few exceptions.

So, patriation should really not be criticized since it does not alter jurisdictions. It even goes further than the status quo. In fact, it takes away some of the powers of the federal government. It denies the federal government the authority to change the Constitution, which it now has. So, not only does patriation not strip the provinces of any powers but it removes some from the federal government, which, when the package is accepted, will be bound by the law of unanimity for two years and, if no other formula is found, by the Victoria formula. Therefore, to my mind, patriation should be done quickly and should not lead to this carping at the amending formula.

As some hon. members have already done, I immediately gave up on the law of unanimity. We have been seeking that desirable unanimity since 1927. We might have achieved it in 1971 at the Victoria conference, had it not been for the adviser to the then Quebec Premier, Mr. Bourassa, the notorious Claude Morin, the current Quebec minister of intergovernmental affairs, whose option we all are too well aware of. Without his intervention, we may have attained our goal and, although I am not passing final judgment, I venture to say that we made a mistake in 1971. We should have intervened then and patriated the Constitution as we had intended to because, at that time, we had the support of several provinces.

Naturally, some will argue that, by a weird coincidence, Mr. Thatcher was a Liberal in Alberta at that time. It was sheer coincidence that Mr. Smallwood happened to be then Premier of Newfoundland, that Mr. Regan was the Premier of Nova Scotia during that period; strange coincidence all around, but be that as it may, let us not forget that Mr. Robarts was the Premier of Ontario and Mr. Campbell that of another province. So there was a consensus. But we wanted unanimity and, in my view we waited too long; if we wait much longer now, I am afraid the impasse might become total and permanent; that is why I feel we must act without further delay.

An amending formula calls for the participation of four regions, and I suggest that as far as the amending formula is concerned, one must avoid considering provinces as such. Four regions are mentioned: Ontario, Quebec, the East and the West. Of course, we still have two years to agree on a new and more acceptable formula, but in case we could not find a better one than the so-called Victoria formula, the latter will be enforced. What does this Victoria formula say? It goes like this: Quebec, Ontario, eastern Canada and western Canada will decide not as small entities, not as provinces, but rather as areas and regions. A moment ago, I listened to the previous speaker who said that western development is being overlooked. Quite the contrary, given the fast growth of the west, particularly in Alberta, is it not quite possible that in a few years from now, Alberta will reach the 25 per cent figure and thus have a veto?

However, it should be kept in mind, Mr. Speaker, that much has been made of the Quebec veto, it is true. I think all members agree that because of its position, being the main centre of French-speaking Canadians, Quebec deserves, I would not say a special status, but a status of equality with the other provinces and regions. In my view, the fact is that there are four regions, one of them being mostly French-speaking and the other three mostly English-speaking. Hence, one must consider the matter on a regional basis and I, for one, find acceptable this formula that the Parti Québécois refuses to talk about, because I listened to a program in which Mr. Morin, dealing with the constitutional package, took pains not to mention that federal Members of Parliament, who are taken to task here, were the first to stand for the rights of all Canadians, including Quebecers.

However, other formulas should not be left out, and I do not agree with those who say that we should retain that formula. We have two years to find another one. I believe the one proposed is acceptable. Indeed, it was accepted in 1971, but one should keep an open mind about such considerations. So, failing an agreement on another formula, I believe this one is acceptable and should remain in force.

The charter of rights, Mr. Speaker, appears to be the most sensitive subject before this House. First of all, I would have liked, and it may not be too late to come up with this idea because I have not heard it suggested during this debate, as I was saying Mr. Speaker, I would have liked the charter of rights, as is the case with the amending formula, not to be implemented before a two-year waiting period had lapsed. The provinces would then have two years to try to find satisfactory compromises and it would have, at least I think so, resulted in a better dialogue.

I still wish it could be so. Such a solution might be seen as a kind of compromise which would make the package more acceptable. Since we are looking for solutions, I did not want to merely criticize but to introduce a positive element in this debate. That being said, the charter of rights still guarantees several fundamental freedoms, such as freedom of conscience and religion, freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication, freedom of peaceful assembly, and freedom of association.

In fact, this charter of rights provides a series of guarantees for citizens which is far from insignificant. However, as I have said before, there is also clause 23 and the matter of linguistic rights on which I do not agree completely concerning the matter of immigrants and the opting out of Ontario. It still remains, Mr. Speaker, that this charter guarantees certain basic rights and the protection of educational rights of all Canadians, whether anglophone or francophone. This is one of the reasons why I entered politics, Mr. Speaker, so that Canadians who live in Quebec can have rights as francophones, not only in Ottawa, but throughout the country. This principle will therefore be entrenched in the Constitution. We have been criticized for having included this principle, but it still reflects word for word what the premiers agreed to. We have been told that the phrase "wherever the number is sufficient to warrant it" could cause problems. This might be, but it will be up to the provinces to prove their good faith. They will have to prove whether this country should break up, as certain people have said, or whether it should stay united. However, to stay united, it is essential that the rights of francophones be recognized not only in Quebec, but throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to close by simply saying that what has brought me to support, not blindly but rationally the whole package in spite of my reservations, is that I consider it a means of putting an end to separatism. Obviously, if, to put an end to separatism, the resolution suggested that the rights of francophones be jeopardized, I would not accept it. For the moment, I must give the benefit of the doubt to those who have proposed this resolution, and I would like at this time to underline the extraordinary work of our Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), who have not spared their efforts in developing and promoting this proposal.

An hon. Member: And also the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde)!

Mr. Marceau: And also the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). But he has enough energy for many things besides this resolution. Mr. Speaker, if I have a few minutes left, I would like to quote a few words by Gaston Miron, the separatist poet, who confirmed my own conviction by saying a few months ago: It is imperative that the constitutional package proposed by Ottawa should not come about, otherwise the autonomy of Canada will be ensured and it will mean the end of Quebec independence.

If a separatist sees our constitutional procedure as a means to prevent him from achieving his goal, we must admit that it would be rather difficult for a federalist, or for someone who believes or states to be one, not to support it and not to put his trust in those who have developed this proposal, who defend it and who want it to be implemented. Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Jonquière I don't carry much weight in this House, but as a member of a team who has chosen the path of democracy, I have fought as hard as I could so that this proposed resolution might be improved and become more acceptable. Within my group, both among my colleagues and among my voters, there have been consultations and I have been told: The hon. member for Jonquière does not have the right to harm his constituents by a personal decision which would go against the wishes of the majority of his supporters and his colleagues. So in a spirit of co-operation I will support the proposed resolution but under the following condition: that this proposed resolution be only a beginning, the start of bigger things to come.

Everybody on both sides of this House, Mr. Speaker, as well as the premiers will have to realize that the time has now come when we must all sit at the bargaining table and genuinely try, through the adoption of a whole series of measures, to develop and improve what is now only an embryo into a country where Canadians can live in happiness. But we must not delude ourselves. When the Constitution has been patriated, it will have to be amended and we must not forget, in keeping with the preamble, we will have to implement the tenet of the recognition of the two linguistic groups, anglophones and francophones, as well as the cultural contribution of the other ethnic groups. That is the price we must pay to keep our country united and I am confident that we will all choose to.

• (1600)

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, in joining in this debate today, I must first of all say how humbled and thankful I am that our illustrious emperor, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), has permitted debate to go on long enough this time, to allow me to say some words on behalf of my constituents. As you know, Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that I have had the opportunity to speak on this constitutional resolution either in committee or in this House. I intended to speak on the matter originally when it was first brought before us, but the brutal majority of the government in power was used to deny me that right. The use of closure at that time prevented me from speaking as I had intended at that stage of debate.

Having said that, I should add that I was very surprised today to hear the tone of the exchange between the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Prime Minister with respect to the simple request of my leader to the Prime Minister that he consider delaying consideration of this resolution until a sufficient time after the Quebec election to ensure that the new leader, whoever it may be, would have an opportunity to reconsider the province's position with respect to the resolution. Presumably whoever is chosen leader in the province of Ontario today would also have a chance to reconsider Ontario's position on the resolution.

I was quite startled and surprised at the Prime Minister's offhand remark that, somehow or other, leaders of opposition always have the right to speak and that in any event there is no need to delay. I do not think that is satisfactory. I think it shows that an errant, arrogant, high-handed attitude is prevalent in this government under the leadership of this present emperor.

Mr. Mazankowski: Aided and abetted by the energy czar.

Mr. Stevens: Having said that, I would hasten to add that in considering the resolution before us, I think it is important that we also consider the amendment of my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) to amend the main motion by deleting Clause 46 in Schedule B in the proposed resolution and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule. I shall come back to this point later, Mr. Speaker.

I was surprised that the hon. member who spoke before me and who is now leaving the House never even referred to the matter before the House today, the question whether or not Clause 46, which deals with the amending formula proposed by the government, should remain in the resolution. That is a very key question in this whole matter. This clause covers the question of the form of the referendum that the Prime Minister proposes. If you analyse the concerns of Canadians, of provincial governments, of many members of this House, you will find that they centre on the question of the amending formula that the Prime Minister suggests we should accept.

Coming from the province of Ontario, perhaps I can say that we do not have as much to fear from this formula as do some other provinces. In the wisdom of the Prime Minister we have been given a possible veto; likewise the province of Quebec. But yesterday I was in Alberta, Mr. Speaker, and I can tell you that people there are concerned about this matter. I think they have cause to be concerned at the prospect that the Constitution could be amended in the future against their wishes and certainly against any veto that they might care to cast—because they will not have that power.

Mr. Campbell: Good.

Mr. Stevens: For the record, I think it should be reported that a very prominent member of the government has said it is good that the province of Alberta would not have the same veto as the province of Ontario or the province of Quebec. Perhaps inadvertently that hon. member has shown the true colours of the government on the resolution before us.

That is one question, Mr. Speaker. There is also the question of the amending formula and, if I may, I will come back to it later.

What I have found most strange in this debate is that the Prime Minister wants to foist on the people of Canada, against their will, an amending formula that will provide for referenda in future years, presumably at the request of the federal government as is spelled out in the resolution, but he says no to consulting the Canadian people by referendum prior to this resolution being confirmed.

Does it make any sense that we have a Prime Minister who says, "In the future let's consult the public through a referendum process, but today, no". He knows why. He knows why he would not test this resolution by holding a referendum in the country: it would not carry. Being the true emperor that he is, he does not like to consult his subjects in case those subjects deny him some of the rights he has grown to love.

When we touch on this question of the charter of rights and the whole concept of writing into some type of code—a new "code Trudeau" if you like, because that is what we are considering here—I think we must first of all look at how sincere this government is when talking about rights.

I was elected in 1972, Mr. Speaker, and almost since that time this House has had before it the question of the uranium cartel. You recall that cartel, Mr. Speaker. It is the one that was involved when the government got into bed with the conspirators. They decided to rig prices. They decided to raise the price of uranium from $6 per pound to over $40 per pound. You recall that not only did they do that, but when the knowledge of this cartel became public—not in Canada but first of all in Australia and then in other foreign countries—this government was so terrified that its role in the cartel would be exposed, that it passed that infamous uranium information security regulation that denied every member of this House and every citizen of Canada the right to hold, much less speak about, the documents relating to the uranium cartel.

The regulation I have in my hand is still law. It is not law directly because of any act passed in this House; it is a regulation passed by order in council by the Trudeau Liberal government. In part, it reads:

> No person who has in his possession or under his control any note, document or other written or printed material in any way related to conversations, discussions or meetings that took place between January 1, 1972 and December 31, 1975 involving that person or any other person in relation to the exporting from Canada or marketing for use outside Canada of uranium or its derivatives or compounds shall
> (a) release any such note, document or material, or disclose or communicate—

And so on. They shall not, it continues:

> (b) fail to guard against or take reasonable care to prevent the unauthorized release of any such note, document or material or the disclosure or communication of the contents thereof.

Anybody who broke that regulation could end up in jail for five years.

Mr. Neil: Just like Nazi Germany.

Mr. Stevens: Where are our rights? Here we have an emperor saying that he wants to give the people of Canada a new charter of rights, yet he was instrumental in taking fundamental rights away from every Canadian citizen.

Mr. McKnight: Not once, but twice.

Mr. Stevens: Speaking of cartels, I have another illustration of how absolutely inconsistent this government can be. We know the tremendous disclosure made only a few days ago concerning what the government claimed to be a massive rigging of prices within the petroleum industry. I do not know whether those who have been active in the petroleum industry have been unfair in their pricing or whether they have fixed prices but, that is why we have a combines investigation branch. What I do know is that we have certain rights in this land granted by common law. We have a certain court system which, up until now, guaranteed people reasonable protection against unfair allegations and charges.

When we read Clause 11 of this so-called charter of rights proposal and then take a look at what this very same government did with respect to certain members of the petroleum industry, we will see how totally inconsistent the government is in its position. Let me refresh members' minds about what clause 11 says. It reads:

> Anyone charged with an offence has the right
> (a) to be informed promptly of the specific offence;
> (b) to be tried within a reasonable time;
>
> (c) to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal;
> (e) not to be found guilty on account of any act or omission that at the time of the act or omission did not constitute an offence;

I put those points on the record because hon. members should think about what this government did with respect to the petroleum industry.

As we know, that industry has been under continuing review since 1973, a period of eight years. I ask hon. members this question: Is it trying a person within a reasonable time to have something pending since 1973? But, most important, the government came to the conclusion that whatever came out of the investigation there was insufficient evidence to charge anybody. Therefore, in open defiance of Clause 11, which the government now proposes for our new charter of rights, the government took the alternative course of saying: "We are going to open up the information, make it public and drag the whole matter through a new public inquiry over another two years."

I am sorry that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has left the House. Surely even he would agree that what is alleged is grossly unfair. For example, it is stated that the director of investigation estimated there were excess costs totalling some $12 billion in 1980 currency involved in overcharges. He said that had these funds otherwise been invested in the years when the unwarranted charges occurred, there would not have been the present loss of more than $89 billion. Do hon. members know where the investigation branch got that trash from? If we read the seven volumes of so-called evidence, we see that the investigators went through various dealings and found instances of where a spot price was below a price at which foreign crude was purchased. They asked why the crude was not purchased at the spot price, totally ignoring the fact that is not how the market works. They took that figure, which in the aggregate is less than $4 billion, and multiplied it by their created inflation factor to bring it up to 1980 dollars. That is where the first $12 billion came from. They said that if the original $4 billion, which can be challenged, had been suitably invested it would now be worth $89 billion. I do not know what they mean by "suitably invested"; I am sure their investment counsel would have done very well by them.

Talking of rights, how would any member of this House feel on picking up a parking ticket if he were told by the local municipality he would not be fined but that there would be an inquiry as to what happened? In this inquiry, the policeman would tell his story. If the member wanted to tell his story, fine; but the matter would never be brought before a judge where he could say whether or not the member was guilty. Yet that is exactly what this government is doing.

The government is proceeding this way because it is part of the nationalization of the oil industry scheme. It is all part of the socialization under way in Canada today. It is all part of a government working to rally the public mood against the petroleum industry in the earnest desire of eventually nationalizing—

Mr. Neil: As ordered by the NDP.

Mr. Stevens: Let us make one thing clear. My party and I have nothing but good to say about getting more Canadian content into the oil and gas industry in Canada. That does not mean that Canadianization has to be nationalization.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: It does not mean that what has been built up as a common law right—that is, the right to be dealt with fairly and if a person has broken the law, to be suitably charged, to be taken to court to let the judge and jury decide his guilt—is to be set aside either.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that when we consider this resolution before us we bear in mind it is being put forth by a very untrustworthy, insincere government indeed. The government's proposed constitutional reform package contains some forty new or changed rights, freedoms or limitations of our freedom. Once it has been debated in this Parliament, it may be referred to Westminster for what the Prime Minister hopes will be a rubber-stamp approval. I also suggest that this would be against the wishes of most provincial government and, according to the polls, even against the wishes of the majority of Canadians.

On this important issue there will be one voice only in Canada. Our Prime Minister, however, has no qualms about his determination to amend unilaterally the Constitution. In fact, once the proposed constitutional package is put into effect, the Prime Minister will have succeeded in strengthening the ability of the federal government to act in a similar arbitrary fashion.

Clause 46 of the resolution before us proposes that our Constitution be amendable by holding a referendum to determine the views of Canadian citizens. Such a referendum will be held at the discretion of the federal government, which will also establish the rules and procedures and set the question. It does not take much imagination to envision the ways in which this vote can be manipulated.

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I have given you two examples of how this goverment chooses to manipulate. They are mind-benders par excellence. That is the one thing they understand.

The recent referendum vote in Quebec gives an adequate indication of how this whole question of process in referenda can be treated on all sides. Moreover, the federal government will be able, if this resolution should go through and be confirmed, to use its immense presence and budget to launch a massive advertising campaign in order to stir up emotions and influence the ultimate outcome of the referendum.

In that connection, I think we are perhaps aware that the estimates now before us contemplate this government spending almost $70 million in federal government advertising in the coming year alone. That makes them by a long shot the number one advertiser in Canada. The runner-up spends $25 million. The federal government is number one by far when it comes to spending advertising dollars.

What are they doing? They are basically spending that money to tell the Canadian public what a good job they think they are doing. When it comes to federal advertising, we in Canada are number one. The United States federal government is number 30 in that country as far as advertising is concerned.

When you bear that in mind, Mr. Speaker, and see how this government likes to manipulate through such things as massive advertising, can Canadians be at ease if we permit the government to bring in this referendum formula which my colleague is proposing be deleted from this resolution?

The important point is that the Prime Minister is proposing an amending formula which will allow the federal government to bypass the provincial legislatures and instead ask the Canadian public to make a decision in the heat of the moment. Giving the federal government such a unilateral privilege in the Constitution threatens the very basis upon which our very federation is founded. The ultimate result will be that Ottawa will always have the final voice in deciding constitutional change.

By now it should be clear to Canadians that there is a considerable difference between the Progressive Conservative and the Liberal approach to constitutional reform. Our party is in favour of bringing the Constitution home with a built-in amending formula that is suitable to the provinces. We are anxious that the Constitution be quickly patriated so that any further or more substantive changes can be made here in Canada by Canadians. Above all, we are concerned that amendments to the Constitution should not be imposed unilaterally by the federal government but should reflect a broad consensus of the Canadian population.

The Grits, on the other hand, would like to have entrenched in the Constitution a charter of rights before patriation takes place and before an amending formula has been decided on. They have persisted in this ambition even though the majority of Canadians are opposed.

In effect, the Prime Minister hopes to take advantage of the present ties still binding us to Westminster in order to bypass the will of the Canadian people. The Prime Minister wants Westminster to make our laws for us. This is extremely ironic in view of his continuing regret over Canada's lack of independence, as he puts it.

Let me read some statements made by the Prime Minister in Quebec City in 1976 before the annual meeting of the Liberal Party. At that time the great emperor said, and I quote:

—basically, what we want to do is take away from England, from the United Kingdom, we want to take away from this foreign country, friendly country, the right to make laws for Canadians; it shouldn't be very difficult to agree on that.

He went on to say:

For a hundred years now we haven't been able to agree to tell the British: please stop making laws for us. All the other Commonwealth countries have done so, all of them. In 1931, when the Statute of Westminster was adopted in England, it said exactly this. It said: from now on the British empire has ceased to exist in . . . the five dominions of the Commonwealth, we will not make laws for them . . . You are adults now, you can make your own laws yourselves. The Canadians said: No, no, we aren't able to do it.

That is the emperor speaking, our present Prime Minister. A little further on he stated:

Let's agree to patriate that Constitution, let's do it without discussing the division of powers, we can always fight afterwards, we don't need the Queen as arbitrator, nor Harold Wilson as arbitrator; if we don't agree, we don't agree, we won't agree; if we agree, we'll agree; we won't need the Pope either, for that matter; we can do that among ourselves.

Talk about a flip-flop! That is what he said in 1976 in Quebec City when he thought it served his purpose. I suggest those statements of the Prime Minister reflect a totally inconsistent position to what we are now asked to pass in this House. He is presently saying, "Your Majesty and Mrs. Thatcher, we would like to have our Constitution brought home, but for me, please make certain legislative changes because, frankly, I do not think I will be able to get the provinces to agree to them, and I cannot trust my subjects to understand what I want passed". Clearly the Prime Minister does not object to behaving in a colonial fashion when it suits his own interests.

Some have dwelt on the actual provisions of the British North America Act and the provisions of the Statute of Westminster. I will not read them into the record again, but clearly it was contemplated at the time the Statute of Westminster was passed that we should virtually be cut off from England at that point. However, for purely technical reasons the Canadian government asked that this power of amendment remain with Westminster. That is what is now being taken advantage of at the present time.

I could touch on the question of rights and what jurists have said as to enshrining of rights, whether it is good or bad. There are arguments on both sides. Frankly, I believe that every time you start codifying, you run the risk of limiting people's rights. I believe that is being overlooked by most people, who say without question that they accept the emperor's charter of rights proposal.

I suggest that if hon. members want to be specific, it is very interesting to look at some of the clauses we have to deal with in the resolution. Clause 12, for example, in one sense looks very innocent. It reads:

Everyone has the right not to be subjected to any cruel and unusual treatment or punishment.

There is no qualification. Not even Parliament can override this privilege which is found in our present bill of rights. As hon. members know, the American constitution has a similar clause. The result has been endless litigation in their courts on the question whether it is legal for a state to maintain capital punishment on its statute books or pass a new statute. If Clause 12 becomes entrenched, we may face the same dilemma in Canada. However, our dilemma is going to be much more complicated than that of the United States, as capital punishment is a national and not a provincial matter.

• (1630)

The Prime Minister knows that any attempt to restore capital punishment through a vote in the House, then ratified by the Senate, would be challenged as being contrary to the Constitution, if he has his way and this resolution becomes part of the Canadian Constitution. Notwithstanding the Prime Minister's attitude toward Britain, he now proposes that Westminster should pass a measure which would make Canada an abolitionist state virtually for all time. Mr. Speaker, that worries me. Now, granted I voted in favour of capital punishment and I think I voted the way that perhaps 70 per cent or 80 per cent of Canadians would have had they had the privilege, as I did, to vote on that question. However, as we know, through manipulation this Prime Minister bound his cabinet to support his abolitionist move, he whipped his caucus into line and in a trumped-up, so-called free vote forced us into an abolitionist state. And now, by a constitutional resolution, he is trying to write it into law so that future Parliaments cannot change what this emperor deemed to be in the best interests of Canada.

An hon. Member: Your leader voted for abolition.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I notice these flapping penguins over here who call themselves Grits.

An hon. Member: Sheep.

Mr. Stevens: And sheep. I know something about sheep, although most are more useful. Clearly, Mr. Speaker, you can always judge in this House when you have hit a point. The question is: Will they have the gumption to stand up when a vote is called in this House and, if they believe that this country should not necessarily be an abolitionist state for all time, demonstrate that belief by voting against the government when this resolution is considered?

There are other changes, though. The proposed charter provides that everyone has the right to life. The effect of Clause 7 will be to strengthen the hand of the pro-abortionist faction. Let me explain. To date the Canadian courts have determined that the words "person" and "human being" do not include the unborn child, with the result that a child must be born before it can assert rights. The proposed charter reaffirms this interpretation by not explicitly providing for the right to life of the unborn child. Because of this omission, the right to an abortion will be virtually entrenched in our Constitution.

Good arguments can be made for or against an entrenched charter of rights. The point is that Canadians should be given more of an opportunity to examine these arguments. Let us face this question of abortion, call it the way it is. We now have a Prime Minister who is going to try to control his caucus, first to put us under closure, ram this resolution through and virtually entrench the right to an abortion in our Constitution.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having said that, bear in mind that this is the same person who, as minister of justice, amended the Criminal Code that ushered in the predicament we are now in with respect to abortions. When are we Canadians going to stand up and say we have had enough? How many tens of thousands of abortions should be performed before not only members on the Liberal side vote according to their conscience, but the Canadian public get aroused about one of the most brutal things that could occur in any country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Touching on the question of property rights, all of us here are aware that the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) proposed in committee an amendment to the charter providing for the right to the enjoyment of property. Let me review the odd sequence of events that occurred. We find that the Acting Minister of Justice said in committee that if such an amendment was put forward by the Progressive Conservative Party, it would be accepted by the government. The following day, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre), speaking on behalf of the government members of the committee, said:

I think that Mr. Beatty has clearly demonstrated that property rights should be included in the new Constitution. Since I am the same man I was yesterday, the same man who made a commitment to his colleague opposite, I am still willing to go along with their suggestion . . . property rights have intrinsic value in Canada and we are prepared to go ahead with this.

However, what we all overlooked was "Little Eddie". Little Eddie, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), happened to be down in Montreal and said he did not like that because he thought it meant in future they could not nationalize, they could not take over private property, and he was going to withdraw his support from Mr. Trudeau if he dared to persist on that amendment. And Mr. Trudeau, being the socialist that he is, quickly agreed.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to something that happened yesterday when Madam Speaker was in her chair and I objected to language being used by one of the hon. member's colleagues. It concerns using the proper name of a member of this House. As you know, the Standing Orders require that we refer to members by their constituency or by their office, be they the Prime Minister or a minister. There is ample precedent both in Beauchesne's fourth edition and in Bourinot that such a reference by name cannot be done even indirectly. In other words, if the hon. member is quoting someone else and still using an unparliamentary expression—that is, referring to someone by their proper name—then this is not permitted. Yesterday Madam Speaker said, just before royal assent at six o'clock, as reported on page 8396 of Hansard:

The parliamentary secretary is right in saying that hon. members cannot do indirectly what is not allowed directly. That must mean that if there is a word which is unparliamentary, the hon. member cannot use it even if he is quoting from an article or from something else.

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, in the future, to see that hon. members of the Conservative party obey the rules of this House, which are for the benefit of all members.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member calls the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a socialist, I object. I think it gives socialism a bad name to refer to someone who is a non-socialist as a socialist, particularly the Prime Minister. I would ask the hon. member to state the facts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) has raised a legitimate point of order. We have had previous occurrences of the naming of members. It is the practice under our rules to refer to hon. members by their constituencies, to ministers by the portfolio they occupy and to other hon. members by their title, as in the case of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I would ask the hon. member to adhere to that wise parliamentary practice.

Mr. Stevens: As you know, Mr. Speaker, I originally referred to the hon. gentleman as "emperor". If that is a more acceptable term, then I have absolutely no objection.

I would like to emphasize that the present Parliament is not a consensus institution on constitutional questions. We certainly were not elected in the 1980 election to do what we are considering today. We were not elected to amend the Constitution of Canada; we were elected to work within the Constitution of Canada. This chamber was created by the British North America Act, and here we are studying a resolution that is opposed by eight of the ten provinces in Canada. We say that by sending this resolution to Westminster we can amend the very Constitution under which we are created.

I mentioned earlier that I was in Calgary yesterday. Naturally one runs into people in that area who have many frustrations. One gentleman I had never met before came to me and said, "Do you know what you are living with in Ottawa?" I said, "I have heard it called many things; what is the name you give it?" He said, "You are living with a parliamentary dictatorship." In my own riding citizens have often told me that we have an elected dictatorship down here. I think both these observations are correct. This House and the other place are dominated by a government formed from a majority Liberal caucus which, in turn, gets the majority of its members from Quebec.

It is a regrettable fact of Liberal life that Liberals were able to elect only two members west of Ontario. In terms of the popular vote not only did the Liberals not receive a majority vote in the last election nationally, but also provincially they did not carry by a majority one single province or territory other than the province of Quebec. Yet the Liberal caucus will have the final say in Canada on the constitutional reforms being debated at the present time.

There is an even more fundamental issue at stake here, and that is whether it should be possible for any federal government to alter radically the nature of confederation by winning a simple majority in Parliament. In my opinion, it is totally inconceivable that Parliament, which was created by the British North America Act, should now set about to alter substantially that act without the support of the provinces of Canada. Surely our Constitution should take precedence over all other legislation and should be more difficult to amend than ordinary laws.

We have heard of the great objections raised by many of the premiers, but in concluding I would simply like to put two contrasting statements on the record because I think this point is often overlooked. In an address to the Empire Club in 1966, Premier Lougheed, who was then the leader of the opposition in Alberta, made the following comment:

We need in Canada a halt to the growing regionalism in this country—a return to a strong central government... We need an awareness by the provinces of their responsibilities to support the central government—an attitude which has been effectively stated by the prime minister of Ontario.

Speaking to exactly the same club subsequently—this was just recently—the premier said, and I quote:

I am not overstating the case to say that if the federal government's budget next fall brings in the natural gas export tax it will be considered like a declaration of war by Ottawa against western Canada and will be so resisted.

What has gone wrong in this country that premiers, who at one time spoke so favourably, should resort to using words such as "war"? Clearly it is the Trudeau Liberal government which has brought that about.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I will recognize the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), but I should say that the occupants of the chair have to be consistent. I noted that the previous occupant of the chair warned the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) that the use of a personal name is not acceptable.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak this afternoon on the resolution concerning the patriation of Canada's Constitution. This debate will be very significant in our history. I understand over 170 speeches on this resolution have been made by hon. members.

The importance of patriation will be seen in the future in how we view ourselves as an independent nation, how we see ourselves as one nation and one people and not just ten feuding provinces. Equally important will be the formal mechanism which will exist between the federal and provincial governments for further modernizing and adjusting our Constitution to meet the changing circumstances and times of the last two decades of this century.

Although we have failed as a nation many times over the past 54 years to reach agreement on the substance and the method of constitutional patriation, it is essential that we succeed this time if we are to become a truly independent country. The lack of success in patriating the Constitution with an amending formula has been not only a symbolic shortcoming in our nationhood but also a continuing, divisive force used by people who wish to divide our country and promote regionalism.

I have been a member of this chamber for nearly 13 years, and during that time this issue has come forward repeatedly over the years in the House of Commons, in the Senate and in the provincial legislatures across the country. The matter has been studied more than any other issue by federal-provincial conferences, royal commissions, task forces and Senate, House of Commons and legislature committees. Never in the history of our country has that activity been greater than in the last year. The federal and provincial ministers of justice and intergovernmental affairs ministers worked at a fever pitch all last summer on a list of a dozen items of constitutional concern. Everything from a preamble to an amending formula, fisheries, communications and family law was on their agenda.

The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) and the premiers tackled the subject last September in a televised conference, but to no avail. The agreement which has alluded prime ministers and premiers since 1927 was not to be found.

This resolution does not change the balance of powers between federal and provincial governments except to give greater powers to the provincial governments in the field of resources. Any other changes as to powers between the two levels of government will have to await further negotiations between the two levels of government after patriation. This is really a first step in the constitutional renewal which is needed.

The resolution before us today is a modest one compared with the long list of proposals facing the Prime Minister and the premiers last September at their conference here in Ottawa. It seeks to do four main things. It seeks to patriate the Constitution with an amending procedure, to entrench a charter of rights and freedoms, to entrench provisions respecting equalization and to grant new powers to the provinces in the field of resources.

I have been impressed by the tremendous amount of work done by the special Senate and House of Commons committee. There were hundreds of hours of work and long hearings over a three-month period. The committee heard over 300 witnesses and 100 groups from all over Canada. This has resulted in improvements to the resolution and especially to the charter of rights as it affects the equality of Canadians.

Gandhi once said: "Man becomes great directly in proportion to the extent to which he dedicates himself to the well-being of his fellow men". The Members of Parliament and senators on the special committee have dedicated themselves wholeheartedly for the past three months and done a great job for all Canadians in ensuring that we have the strongest Charter of Rights and Freedoms in existence today.

Some will say that the Constitution is not a burning issue on the main streets of Canada today. What is exciting politicians, premiers and constitutional experts is not the hottest topic in the local barbershops and coffee shops across our country. However, I believe that the principles of the resolution to be directed to Her Majesty are very important to Canadians, and they tell us so in our quiet conversations with them. They say: Yes, we should have our own Constitution in Canada like all other independent nations of the world; yes, we should have the ability to amend our own Constitution here in Canada without reference to the British parliament; yes, we should have the principle of equalization of opportunity entrenched in our Constitution, ensuring that geography will not condemn people to vastly inferior government services because they were born in parts of Canada less developed than other, richer parts; yes, our native people should have their treaty rights entrenched in the Constitution; yes, we should have a Canadian charter of rights and freedoms entrenched in our Constitution.

I say that if the people of Canada want these basic rights and freedoms entrenched in our Constitution, now is the moment in history to grasp the opportunity that is before us today. Otherwise we may wait many, many decades until another opportunity occurs.

A year ago we went through the trauma of the Quebec referendum on independence. A commitment was made at that time by most of the first ministers of the country that we would get on with constitutional reform if the people of Quebec opted for Canada. They did, and therefore we must move now if we want to grasp the opportunity which exists. It is time we were totally independent of Great Britian, able to amend our Constitution in Canada. Then we will be able to work together at further modernization of our Constitution to make it meet the challenges of the 1980s and 1990s that are already upon us.

No section of the constitutional resolution finds more favour in my constituency than part III relating to equalization and regional disparity, because our area is at once a donor and a recipient in this concept. Northern Ontario is a have-not region in the have province of Ontario. However, I cannot recall any of my constituents complaining about the contribution Ontario has made over the years to the have not provinces in other regions of our country. Thus we see that the concept of equalization of opportunity between regions and the sharing by the rich with the poor is a tradition in Canada. Likewise Algoma, which is in a slow-growth area, has been eligible for greater support from the government to help equalize the opportunities in our communities. Entrenching the concept of equalization and regional disparity into our Constitution recognizes an attitude that finds favour with the vast majority of Canadians.

A few years ago I visited an outport on Fogo Island in Newfoundland with the regional development committee of this House. We met with the community leaders to discuss their economic development problems. When we were about to leave, the clerk of the hamlet said to me: "You won't forget us when you're sharing out the money in Ottawa, will you?" Mr. Speaker, this amendment to our Constitution is designed to ensure that no region of our country is forgotten when Parliament is sharing out the resources of this nation.

The charter also provides that we will be guaranteed mobility rights, so we can move freely from province to province in our country and work in any province we choose. This would stop the practice which has been occurring in a number of provinces whereby workers from other areas are denied the opportunity to seek a job. Ontario has not blocked workers from other provinces from coming to work in the province, nor should it. Without the thousands of workers from Quebec and Atlantic Canada, the rich resources of our north would not have been developed. This clause guarantees open borders in the future for those seeking work.

Another important aspect of this resolution to people in my constituency is the proposal to entrench in the Constitution the aboriginal and treaty rights of the Indian people. This was lacking in the original resolution and was of concern to many of the chiefs of the Indian bands in the dozen reserves throughout my constituency. This entrenchment was surely a dramatic breakthrough for the special committee on the Constitution and represents a considerable step forward in the guaranteeing of those rights and treaties.

Some chiefs have indicated that they would like to see more details of their rights spelled out in the charter, but most agree that a good start has been made in enshrining aboriginal and treaty rights for the aboriginal peoples of Canada in the amendments adopted.

The charter of rights and freedoms would guarantee to Canadians for the first time in our Constitution fundamental rights, democratic rights and legal rights. It would be binding on all levels of government. At a time when there is more and more government by regulation, orders in council and ministerial orders, this will be an effective way to protect citizens from abuses of power.

The existence of these entrenched rights—which will mean that both federal and provincial governments and every minister who makes laws and regulations that affect people's lives will have to conform to the charter of rights—will ensure that these laws or regulations cannot be struck down by a court. It recognizes for the first time in our Constitution the multicultural nature of our country and ensures that the charter is interpreted in a manner to preserve and enhance this heritage, a heritage which applies to almost one third of our population and is cherished by us all.

The charter will guarantee minority language education rights for our two official languages where numbers warrant the establishment of schools for minority language groups. This recognizes the agreement of the provincial premiers, in St. Andrews in 1977 and in Montreal in 1978, to provide such a right. Under the charter, citizens will be guaranteed equality before and under the law, regardless of race, nationality or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

The inclusion of equal rights for the disabled is a tribute to the work of the Constitution committee and the special committee on the handicapped which studied this problem during the past year. A society can be judged by the manner in which it treats its disadvantaged members. The inclusion of the disabled in our charter of rights is a just and bold step to right the injustices of the past toward these citizens of our country.

Most of the people of this land want these rights put in our Constitution; they want the Constitution brought home to Canada in a way that will provide these rights for all of the citizens of Canada. They do not want the checkerboard approach of the Conservative Party where provinces could opt into the provisions of the charter at will; where native people would have aboriginal rights in one province but not in another; where the handicapped would be guaranteed equality in one province but not in another; where freedom to seek a job would be guaranteed in one area of the country but not in another.

This country is too fragmented already, Mr. Speaker. The Tory concept of patriating the Constitution would exacerbate and increase this trend towards fragmentation. We do not want a checkerboard of rights and freedoms across this great land. We want one Constitution that applies in every province from sea to sea.

We also want to see an end to the stalemate on an amending formula and a procedure to end the stalemate. The Conservative Party's proposals would guarantee constitutional stalemate for probably another 54 years. We must seize this opportunity to move forward and patriate our Constitution with an amending procedure and a charter of rights.

One of the arguments used against the constitutional resolution is that the amendments are not being made in Canada. This must be one of the weakest arguments I have ever heard. Because that is exactly what we have been doing for almost six months now—preparing amendments to the Constitution of Canada, here in the Parliament of Canada, in the special committee, and in the discussions and negotiations between the federal and provincial governments across the country. The people have been able to watch the committee hearings on television and the debates in the House. Thousands of them have communicated with their Members of Parliament and the government.

We will be asking the British parliament to pass the resolution from the Parliament of Canada, just as they have passed every other constitutional amendment put before them for the last 114 years. Only this time it will be for the last time. This resolution, when passed here, will be supported by a majority of the members of the Senate and House of Commons of the Parliament of Canada.

Lord Acton once said:

Our political ideals are never realized, but the pursuit of them determines history.

The resolution before us today represents a tremendous amount of work and effort on the part of many people over many years. It also represents an important step toward the realization of the ideals of many Canadians—our own Constitution in Canada at last, with an amending procedure and a charter of rights and freedoms. Surely we must move forward with this resolution now if we want to make this a better country. By doing this, we will be not only realizing the ideals of many Canadians but determining our own history.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) would like me to sit down before I say anything. This might be the only time I might oblige him since it is virtually five o'clock now, but I will have something to say later about how he tears at this country and gnaws away at it.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski)—Fitness and Amateur Sport—Termination of native sport and recreation program; the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer)—Transport—Appointment of grain transportation co-ordinator; the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight)—Energy—Forecast of reduction in cash flows of oil companies.

Does the House agree to stand all items under the heading of notices of motions (papers)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): There being no items on the Order Paper under the heading of private bills, the House will proceed to the consideration of public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

BANK OF CANADA ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING BRAILLE NUMBERING OF BANK NOTE DENOMINATIONS

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette) moved that Bill C-235, respecting legal tender (braille numbers), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to discuss Bill C-235 for a few minutes this afternoon during private members' hour. It is a very simple and straightforward bill. I think all of us have had opportunities at various times to see some of the sad situations and problems which arise when people who are either blind or visually handicapped handle paper money. The purpose of this bill is to make it easier for these people to handle paper money with certainty, so that they are not concerned about being gypped. I propose in the bill to print paper money with Braille numbers. This is something which was done in The Netherlands some ten years ago, although admittedly not with as much success as anticipated. I have had discussions with some of the people at the embassy of The Netherlands, and my understanding is that systems are now available, through advances in technology, which in fact would make Braille numbering more suitable, more reliable, and, therefore, more useful as far as the purposes of this bill are concerned.

I am not in any way hung up on the fact that Braille numbers are the only way of assisting the visually handicapped in using bank notes. There are other ways in which paper money could be marked so that it will not present a problem to people who are unfortunately either blind or visually handicapped. I believe in England paper money is printed in different sizes so that it can be easily identified.

Before referring to one of the recommendations in the report of the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped, I should like to compliment those who were members of that committee. I see two of them present in the House this afternoon, the hon. member for Saint-Michel (Mrs. Killens) and the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang). I think it is an excellent report. As well there were two very good people from my party who were part of that committee, the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) and the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale).

I should like also to comment on the format of this report. It is one of the easiest reports I have seen since becoming a member of the House. Not only are the contents excellent, but I think the format in which the committee presented its report is excellent as well.

I should like to refer to recommendation No. 64 which is on page 71 of the report. The purpose of this recommendation is to produce paper currency identifiable by visually-impaired persons. Recommendation 64 reads:

Legal Tender for the Blind

That the federal government instruct the Bank of Canada to announce, before the end of 1981, its intention to begin production of paper currency identifiable by blind or visually-impaired persons.

Certainly this recommendation is in line with the intentions of my bill.

On two occasions in the past—once in Saskatoon and once in Winnipeg—I had the unfortunate experience of standing in line at an CNIB booth when I saw the person in charge of the booth being deliberately gypped out of money that changed hands as a result of a transaction. All of us would find such a situation completely deplorable and unacceptable. In fact, it is hard to understand why people would behave in such a fashion. The purpose of this bill is to eliminate that kind of situation.

We all know of some of the things blind people have to do with paper money in order to keep track of it and know the denomination of the bills. They fold paper money in different fashions; they fold a $1 bill in a different method than they would fold $2 or $5 bills. At best, that is a makeshift arrangement. I see no reason why we cannot do something along the lines of the recommendation of the special committee to prevent such a thing being necessary and enable blind people to carry out normal business transactions.

Also I was struck by the comments of Denise Beaudry, a young woman from Montreal, which appeared in the task force report. She said, in part:

Except for the fear that sighted people have in my presence, I would forget that I am blind.

That is a very interesting comment on the way those of us who are fortunate enough to have our sight behave toward the blind, especially when we consider that it was made by a woman who is actually blind.

As I said, I will certainly not speak very long on this bill. I have spoken to some members in the other parties and I think there is agreement that at least the subject matter of Bill C-235 should be referred to committee. If the government is not prepared to accept the bill as such, I hope it will see fit at least to refer the subject matter to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, so that it can have a fair hearing and we can call witnesses to find out whether it is possible and practical to print paper money with Braille numbers. If not, certainly we should be looking at printing paper money of different sizes according to the denomination of the bill. In other words, a $1 bill would be a slightly different size from a $2 bill or $5 bill, and so on.

In closing, I feel this bill deserves consideration. If the government is not prepared to accept Bill C-235 as such, I hope it will be in favour of accepting the subject matter and referring it to the appropriate committee, so that we can comply with the recommendation in the report of the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped by ensuring that action is taken on this very important matter by the end of 1981.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jack Masters (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, I think it is apparent that there is a good deal of sentiment, both in Parliament and in society in general, in favour of doing a great deal more than we are to overcome problems facing disabled persons. This is not just a passing sentiment related to this year's observance of the International Year of the Disabled; our awareness of the handicaps which society creates for the disabled has been growing for some years.

The House can be especially grateful for the work of the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped. Its hearings across the country and the report which it published on February 16 have done a great deal to increase public awareness and understanding of the needs of disabled persons and to suggest ways of improving their situation.

The question of paper currency and what might be done to help blind persons identify the various denominations is just one of the many issues which have been raised and must be faced. The bill before us proposes the use of Braille markings to differentiate between different values of bank notes. There are differing views as to whether Braille is the best identification method, but there will be general agreement that there is a problem for blind persons in dealing with our paper currency. Some blind people have adopted special ways of folding their paper money to permit quick identification when they pay bills. Whether or not they do this, they must still rely on sighted persons at some stage to sort out the currency for them.

I should like to say at the outset that this question has been and is under careful consideration by the Bank of Canada. Officials of the bank have been in consultation with the Canadian National Institute for the Blind and the Canadian Council of the Blind. They have also studied approaches to the problem which have been adopted in other countries.

The use of Braille on banknotes is not supported by either of the two organizations, the CNIB or the Canadian Council of the Blind, which is an association of blind persons. There are two main reasons given for this. First, the raised dots of Braille can become flattened and indistinct as a banknote becomes worn. Second, only a small portion of blind persons—perhaps 5 per cent or 6 per cent of the 33,500 blind persons who are registered with the CNIB—use Braille regularly.

There are, however, other approaches which can be considered. Those who are registered as blind have less than 10 per cent of their vision. But not all of these are totally blind; perhaps 80 per cent or more of them have what is termed "guiding vision". For example, many of them can read the numerals on bank notes if they are sufficiently large and in contrasting colours or shades of black and white.

Another approach which has been under consideration involves differing sizes of bank notes for the various denominations. This is the approach recommended a few years ago in a report called "Vision Canada", which was commissioned by the CNIB in co-operation with the Department of National Health and Welfare. This is the approach which the CNIB has tended to favour.

The recent report by the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped urged that action be taken soon to make our currency more easily identifiable by blind or visionally impaired persons. Although that committee did not recommend any specific method, it did mention that other countries use different sizes of currency. There are quite a few countries outside North America which have currency of various sizes, depending on denomination. I suspect that this developed historically, for reasons other than to assist the blind. But it could be an obvious aid to a blind person provided there is a sufficient difference in size to make the different denominations readily distinguishable. That is the case in Britain, which has three main bank notes, the one, five and ten pound note, with marked differences in size. On the other hand, Canada has six main denominations ranging from one dollar to 50 dollars. I am not sure whether the six bank notes could be adequately differentiated in size without creating an oversize bill.

One other approach which has been adopted by a few countries is to use a system of tactile codes to identify the different bank notes. These involve raised dots, circles or other markings which are a good deal larger than the Braille dots. The codes are simple and easily learned. These codes are now in use on the bank notes of The Netherlands, Belgium, Switzerland and Israel, all countries which also have varying sizes of currency. Several other countries are considering adopting a similar approach.

I suggest that from the evidence available there are several approaches which should be considered in trying to meet the goal in this bill put forward by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer). Since there are some concerns about the effectiveness of using Braille, as proposed in this bill, I suggest we should not give it second reading. However, I believe we should refer the subject matter to committee, and I understand the government is prepared to do just that.

I should also like to mention that the matter is under careful consideration by the Bank of Canada, and I feel confident that today's debate will help in reaching a decision on this very important question.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) on the introduction of Bill C-235. In doing that, although I am a couple of elections late I would like to welcome him to this House. I do so on a personal basis. He represents a constituency in which I lived for a while, on a farm, about 55 years ago. He farms near the farm on which I lived. I am happy to welcome the hon. member to this House. As I said, I am two elections late, since he came here in 1979 and back again in 1980. In any case, I commend him on introducing this bill.

As we have just heard, there are problems to be faced in deciding in what way to make our paper money such that blind persons can distinguish the denominations, but at least the idea of doing something along this line is one that should be considered. I am pleased to learn that the government is prepared to have the subject matter of this bill referred to a committee. I think it is appropriate, in conjunction with our concern for handicapped persons, that we do something about this.

I am prepared to support wholeheartedly the amendment, which I assume will come a little later on, that the subject matter be referred to the committee.

I note from what has just been said that consideration has been given to various ideas. I have wondered whether there could not be added to the different suggestions we have had the printing of money on different grades or textures of paper. We who are sighted may not notice it, but if I may refer again to my past as an old printer, by feel we can tell the difference in paper, and blind people are so sensitive in terms of touch that they might do so as well. I am not moving any amendment, I am just adding one more suggestion. I think all of these ideas, the thought of Braille, or special larger dots, or of large printing for those whose blindness is not extreme or total, are all ideas to be considered.

I am glad that the hon. member has brought this bill forward. I am very pleased that the government will not talk it out, but that it will let the subject matter be referred to committee. I hope that that committee will come up with a solution and bring a measure back to the House, where we will be glad to support it.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks in this debate. First, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) for having brought this bill forward.

I have a number of friends who are either blind or visually impaired, and I can appreciate the problems they face on a daily basis when dealing with currency. The member for Portage-Marquette has indicated problems that he has seen, for example, where a blind person, because of his inability to identify currency, was gypped out of money.

I do not know what the cost would be with respect to putting braille on currency or making a change to it. We in this country spend a great deal of money in a manner which I consider very foolish. We spend many millions of dollars on advertising. We have many programs which I think do not serve any real purpose.

I am encouraged by the hon. member opposite who says that the government will refer the subject matter of this bill to committee for consideration. I hope that in referring the subject matter to committee the study will take place very quickly.

We have been a country for over a hundred years. We have had currency for over a hundred years. It seems to me that at this point in time we should do our utmost to make certain that necessary changes are made in the currency to assist the blind and the visually impaired.

It gives me a great deal of pleasure to lend my support to this bill, I am happy that the government is not planning to talk it out but, in effect, will accept it in principle.

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I too want to commend the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) on his initiative. In our report we asked that everything be done before December, 1981. Of course we are aware that implementing the recommendations of the Obstacle report will probably take ten years or so. Committee members are realistic enough to know that no one can expect those recommendations to be acted upon during the International Year of the Handicapped.

Very briefly I would like to say that we already have enough problems. The handicapped experience difficulties when seeking employment, looking for housing, travelling and trying to gain access to public buildings, so for them to be able to identify currency may be a minor point. In my opinion, however, it is not a minor consideration for the blind. We have to go beyond the suggestion made in Bill C-235. We should also be able to identify coins, not only paper currency. I am pleased to see that the government is prepared to refer the bill to committee because the proposal of the hon. member for Portage-Marquette can certainly be improved in several respects. Fair enough. It is a beginning and I am sure that all parties in the House are unanimous and I am glad of that. Of course several amendments will have to be made if we are to meet the real needs of the handicapped. I would go even further and say that the committee responsible for studying such a bill ought to ask the blind to appear as witnesses. We heard a great many witnesses, we gathered evidence and put it on record. We are barely broaching the subject because we want to satisfy the clientele. When the committee gets the bill it will simply have to call witnesses who will be able to help us make a decision so that in the future it will be easier for them to identify currency. I am very glad that the government has agreed to refer it to committee.

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to congratulate the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) for introducing this bill. I think we all know from hearing hon. members of all parties here that there is support for the bill in the House. I and other members of the special committee on the disabled travelled across Canada to hearings in all the provinces and the Northwest Territories as well. We are well aware that there is popular support for this kind of bill.

The blind really should not have to rely on sighted people in order to manage their financial affairs. This is almost a civil rights issue. This is why we made the recommendation in our report that currency be made accessible to blind people, and made accessible in such a way that blind people can distinguish different denominations of notes.

The second reason I want to see the problem resolved this year, in 1981, the Interntional Year of the Disabled, is that I want the public to be aware of the situation. If the currency is changed, it will have an impact on all Canadians. They will have an increased awareness of the problems not only of the blind but of all disabled persons.

It is really with great pleasure that I join other members of our party in the House in supporting the principle of this bill. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Michel (Mrs. Killens):

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:

"Bill C-235, an act respecting legal tender (Braille numbers), be not now read a second time but that the order be discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I raise a very small point of order. I do not like to be technical, but I believe that the hon. member for Saint-Michel (Mrs. Killens), having already spoken in the debate, is ineligible to be named as the seconder. It is too bad, as I think it is appropriate for her to do it; but either there should be unanimous consent, or someone else should do it.

Some hon. Members: Agreed, unanimous consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): First, the Chair thanks the hon. member for drawing this error to the attention of the Chair and the House.

Second, the hon. member has proposed a manner in which the hon. member for Saint-Michel (Mrs. Killens) may be afforded the pleasure of seconding the amendment. The Chair will therefore determine from the House whether there is unanimous consent that the hon. member for Saint-Michel second the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Lang) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Shall the motion, as amended, carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Accordingly, the order is discharged, the bill withdrawn, and the subject matter referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Is it the disposition of the House to call it six o'clock or to seek further business?

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): By unanimous consent I call it six o'clock, and I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 5.28 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to share some thoughts with you this evening, particularly as I am a Member of Parliament from one of the western provinces, the province of Alberta, which at this time in our history feels quite aggrieved by the actions of the federal government. It feels that way in two areas, first of all about the Constitution and then with respect to energy pricing. The anger flowing through my region is doubly felt to the extent that I doubt very much if the Liberal members of this House recognize the seriousness of what is happening among people in another part of the country.

I want you to know, Mr. Speaker, that while all political parties will conduct polls from time to time—and I know there have been polls conducted in western Canada to see whether there is a mood to trigger western separation, which have indicated such is not the view of western Canadians—I want you to know that this government has embarked upon a very dangerous course if it assumes that separation is the only thing it has to guard against.

These people, by and large, have already been separated for a long time from the style of government of the party opposite. They are separating from a group of people who will not allow two aspects of their aspirations to come to pass; that is, a sense of equality of treatment, and participation in the Canadian family. That is clearly demonstrated by the clandestine way the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has attempted to turn the rest of Canada against the province of Alberta. The truth of the matter is that not only would western Canada grow and develop to match its aspirations but, within central Canada in particular, there would be an enormous boom and growth of opportunity, jobs and increasing wealth. It is that atmosphere, in which the Liberal government has marinated the minds of Canadians in the poison of their own thoughts, and in which we are now debating the Constitution of Canada—a Constitution that by the written word gives the opportunity to the federal government to hold a referendum to resolve what it might see as an impasse in future deliberations.

At this time we are talking about an amendment to strike from the proposed Constitution a clause respecting the referendum.

Before I go on to that I want to make two things clear. The first is that this party, the New Democratic Party to my left—I might say to my far left—the Liberal Party and the majority of Canadians, all want the Constitution of Canada brought home to Canada. That is not the problem. It is also fair to say that this proposed Constitution is a far better Constitution than that which was proposed on October 2. While the Liberals will chastise us for the time we have taken in debate, Canadians should be proud of that achievement having a far better Constitution than that which was proposed on October 2; by the admission of the Liberals as well as the NDP and this party.

I will single out tonight about five or six fundamental reasons why this Constitution should not go forward. It is dangerous and, irrespective of polls at this moment, it still has the potential literally to tear our country apart and the potential through the clandestine policies of this government to destroy this most blessed and fortunate people in all the world with an inheritance to the greatest nation on earth. For its own purposes it wants to ram a Constitution through, regardless of the fact that the major opposition party is opposed to it, or that there is some dissent within the New Democratic Party. Even one government member is opposed to this procedure. There is some dissent in Liberal ranks in the other place.

According to a recent pool, 64 per cent of Canadians are also opposed. Eight provinces say the method is not right. Six of them believe that to the extent they are taking the matter to court. Yet against that milieu and background, the government is running off with the Constitution of Canada as if it were its own. I ask on what basis can the government do this. Can it do it on the basis of a majority government elected in February, 1980, although it was never once mentioned during the campaign that that was the issue at hand?

We had an 18-cent election. We had an election on the basis of what the price of gasoline would be. We know what happened. People voted for cheaper gasoline and they got nine increases. But the people never voted for anything respecting a Constitution.

If this Constitution goes through, if this majority government can give us a new Constitution, what is going to be the position of any future majority government? It may presume it has the power to change the Constitution willy-nilly, irrespective of the will of Canadians. This is a dangerous precedent.

I do not believe there is any mandate whatever to give these people representing Canadians in every region of Canada, the majority of whom by a recent poll, are opposed to what the government is doing, any right to do what they are doing. We, as members of Parliament are here for the purpose of representing them.

Let me take a look at some of the specifics of what I believe is wrong with this legislation. First, there is the unilateral nature of what is taking place, and the single-handedness of the federal government in changing the Constitution in a federal system which has both provinces and federal governments. In this case there are eleven governments, all with equal power although differently and separately defined. One of the eleven players is saying the Constitution is his and he will change it. I could accept that if the changes being made were only those changes which affected the federal government, but they are not. This government is making changes which change the powers of the provinces. I simply do not believe the government has the legality to go ahead and change the Constitution. This is analogous to one player making changes devising a whole new game and forcing all other players to play. The federal system itself is therefore destroyed. This government destroys by absorbing power, and then takes the position that it is the dominant power and the provinces are subservient. As soon as the government takes that position we no longer have a federal system. We are now moving on a track toward a unitary system, something with which I cannot agree.

To be clear, I want hon. members to know that I have no objection to the principles of unitary governments. If they work in Belgium, Holland or England, that is understandable because of the geography and the size of those lands. However, Canada stretches from Victoria B.C. to St. John's, Newfoundland, and is populated by a ribbon of people scarcely more than 100 miles from the United States border. We have a central government which separates east and west by the Canadian Shield. This gives the people of central Canada a geographical opportunity to travel south to Vermont to ski, to New York to ship or to Florida for the sun. In western Canada people go to "lost wages", Nevada, to lose their money or off to Hawaii for the sun. For the most part Canadians do not travel east and west.

A unitary government will not work. The style of government which will result from this Constitution, will lead us in future years to central power in Ottawa being dominant over the rest of the country. People at the grass roots level will have neither an association nor an affiliation with the central system because they will have more trust in their provincial government, if for no other reason than proximity, or that they cross paths with their MLAs more frequently than with their Members of Parliament.

I go now to another aspect, that of the amending formula. The amending formula is one which defies the aspirations of the lesser populated provinces. It puts provinces, such as New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia, and others, into a secondary class to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

We cannot continue with peace and harmony within the federal system when two provinces have been granted in perpetuity the right of veto which enables them to out-vote and even outcast other provinces. That part of the amending formula is absolutely wrong. If there is no agreement on an amendment among the provinces and the federal government, the federal government then has the right to resort to a referendum. Some people might ask why that is so wrong. Why is it wrong that we could use what would appear to be a very democratic process in making a decision, the people's vote? It is wrong because the federal government will have all the control relating to that referendum. As it took place in Quebec, it will take place federally—

Mr. MacBain: Quebec lost on it.

Mr. Malone: —with the government having control on the timing, on the advertising and how the question is worded. If in the federal system there is to be a referendum situation, a procedure I do not like, then surely the mechanism for a referendum should be the provision that if seven provinces agree they could also trigger a referendum. But this government has said we will have a federal system in which only one player can trigger the referendum mechanism. That is not a federal system. We would no longer be like West Germany, Australia or other federal systems. We will have changed to where we have a dominant superpower with subordinate provinces.

I suggest that changes Canada in an unacceptable way. People in this country will not tolerate, nor will they accept dominance. There are players in Canada who want to be good members of the family. They want to co-operate with all Canadians, but they are being bullied by a government which gets its popular vote from two provinces. It writes off the rest of Canada.

I disapprove of the manner in which this government is moving to patriate the Constitution. The nature of the request by the Canadian government is to give us colonial status. I have heard voices from the other side saying we are making the amendments here and just sending them to Britain for Westminster to ratify. The last stage of ratification is by Members of Parliament from another country, elected by other members outside Canada representing British citizens. These people sit in the British House of Commons, and vote on British legislation. They are the ones who would be casting the last decision on our Constitution. It is this Canadian government which has asked Great Britain to make the decisions for Canada.

The Canadian government has asked that we accept colonial status. That is unacceptable and wrong. All it had to do was ask Great Britain to return the British North America Act with or without an amending formula, then Canadians and Canadian councils and chambers such as this one could have made the decisions affecting Canadians.

The leaked document of September 8 last indicated the motives behind the government's desire to have Great Britain handle this. The advisers to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) warned that if he did not get his wishes through Great Britain, Westminster and the British parliament and only got the British North America Act, if he tried to implement those changes here and the provinces did not like them, they could challenge them through the court system all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada. The courts might rule that the act is unacceptable in the context of our present situation. Therefore, the Prime Minister's advisers told him to try to get the British to pass what he wanted passed because the Canadian courts have no jurisdiction over British law.

Those on the other side choose to hide behind the skirts of England, and Canadians should be aware of their reasons. They want to avoid a test in court, and they know that our courts have no control over British law.

Colonial status is utterly demeaning to Canada and her citizens. It belittles this government. Canadians should rise up with the greatest strength and ask this government to ask only for the return of our Constitution. The rest of the work can be done in the Parliament of Canada by those who are elected here.

I want to talk about another reason the Constitution should not come home in its present form. It deals with the charter of rights. I suppose at first blush what I will say next will sound to many new Canadians and young Canadians as a statement that is wrong. I do not believe in charters of rights because they follow upon the Napoleonic code. He enumerated all the rights of the people. He told them they had the right to freedom along with some others.

That makes the presumption that all power is vested in government and the government has the privilege of saying what is right. That is not the Canadian way. We follow the British model. In the early history of that country the people had no power whatsoever. The king was almighty; he had all power. The people were not even called citizens, they were called subjects.

That lasted until King John wanted to build a new castle. In order to do that he had to tax the people more. They revolted, took away the power from the king, and made him sign the Magna Carta which gave all the power to the people. In that Magna Carta the people said they would have a Parliament and a House of Commons so that common people could sit there and represent the people. For almost 725 years all the power has been vested in the people of that land. They changed all of the laws.

Mr. Kelly: Wasn't that a charter of rights?

Mr. Malone: Yes it was a charter of rights, but it said the people have all the power whereas this charter of rights takes that away and gives it to government and delineates—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Malone: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is laughing. He does that because he is nervous. He did not have the courage to put into the charter the right to ownership of property. He followed exactly what they have in the communist countries and the military dictatorships of Africa.

An hon. Member: He has no guts.

Mr. Malone: I heard that last heckle. I defy anyone to say I have no guts.

If we were to lock a random group of Canadian citizens into a room and give them copies of constitutions from around the world, it would not surprise me one bit if they chose as their favourite constitution that of the Soviet Union. It is a guarantee of an extended set of rights that is unparalleled by any other nation in the world. The Cuban constitution is similar as are those of most of the military dictatorships of Africa and Latin America.

The principle in every one of those dictatorships is the fact that property rights are not included in their bills of rights. That is extremely fundamental. It means that communist countries can give you all the rights they want because they know if you own nothing, nothing else matters. What use is freedom of assembly when the government owns every place you can assemble? I quote from page 114 of the communist manifesto:

> In this sense, the theory of the communists may be summed up in the single sentence: Abolition of private property.

Some members opposite say we need a charter of rights because of the horrible thing that was done to our Japanese brothers and sisters on the west coast during World War II. They give other examples of why they think we need a charter of rights. However, in every example they give the changes have already been made. The people of this country made them through their House of Commons.

Had we had a charter of rights in 1867, we may not today even be considering women as persons, or as being able to vote or sit in this chamber. I would ask why? It is because the courts of the land interpret charters, not politicians.

Mr. Orlikow: What about the United States?

Mr. Malone: The people of the United States do not want busing in their education system. They have it because their courts are powerful. Their elected representatives cannot change this because the courts made those decisions.

Canadians should know that when decisions are made in the courts, when there is a charter of rights, power is stripped from the people. Members of Parliament can say what they want, this will not be changed because the courts will have become all powerful. This institution will be less valuable in serving democracy.

The courts become more powerful as they adjudicate the rights of people, as shown by the United States which has a charter of rights. Little children are bused 30 or 35 miles in one direction while children of another race are moving in the other direction in order to achieve some racial equality in the schools. The people of those communities do not want nor do they see any purpose in having their young children travelling that distance on buses. They have complained and complained to their elected representatives, but it is the courts which make the decisions. This government is asking that Canada adopt such a system. I tell you, sir, it defies democracy.

For over 700 years, since the signing of the Magna Carta, all rights in our democratic system have been presumed. What this government is trying to do is pluck out certain rights and say: These will be yours. And the people will look at them and say: Gee, those are great; we have the right to assemble. They do not recognize that when you start to codify rights, when the government pretends it is all powerful and gives you rights, you only have the rights it extends, not those left off the list.

Going down this long list we ask: What about the handicapped; what about the right to a job; what about the question of presumed rights? Obviously they cannot be put in a charter of rights so the only way it can be handled is to give them back to the people and leave the concept of the charter of rights.

The other aspect we should bear in mind, sir, is that a charter of rights will hinder us in those areas where we want to be selective. I come from a province where, in the town of Fort McMurray, more native people are hired than would be the case if this was done on the order of application or by random choice. That is positive discrimination. In this city, Canada's capital, the federal government will hire more females in the upper echelons of the civil service than might otherwise be the case because they have a policy to do so. But, if we introduce a charter of rights, then that is discriminatory. So I say to you there is some inherent danger in not having a situation where you can move in a very positive and equitable way.

Moving then to the mobility clause of this charter, I can appreciate that we should be able to move freely across this country and be able to get a job in any part of Canada. By and large we do that now. There are places such as Newfoundland where, I believe as a western Canadian, there is some legitimate reason why that province should have a selective policy. Newfoundland generally has had a lower per capita income than other provinces in recent years. If oil is struck in Hibernia that province should not give just those people trained in the industry in the west or the head office cities of Toronto or Montreal, the first chance at those jobs. I believe that province has a legitimate purpose in saying: We will give our people preference in job hiring. I also think they have the right to promote this, because in a democratic system we trust this principle will not be abused. It takes place only in those provinces that by and large have been in a disadvantaged position over the years and are trying to catch up, whether it be in the economy, language or whatever.

I believe this country is at a crossroads. I see the people in Central Canada coming to different conclusions on major issues than do people in other regions. At one time I thought that was because they were somehow unique. I do not believe that now. The reason we come to different conclusions is that we are fed different information in different parts of Canada. There is a great misunderstanding today concerning energy because what the people in western Canada think about energy and their role in Canada is quite different from what they are hearing in central Canada.

I note that the city of Toronto is the headquarters for CTV and CBC news, for CHUM Radio, which owns stations all across Canada, Maclean's magazine and others, and it literally has become the information dissemination centre for all of Canada. There are those in the national media who believe that somehow the central perspective is gospel, but the regional carriers of information living in a different milieu, or environment, are recording information different to that fed to the central regions of the country. What we end up with is a country which has national news made in Toronto but with very little regional news coming back. We then have this great myth that somewhere in western Canada there are greedy people, and that is dead wrong.

That is why the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources can develop a policy which fits into this Constitution. It fits in with the anger of the moment. He is unwilling to pay more than $17.75 for western sweet crude but will pay the Mexicans the world price for their oil in spite of the fact it is Maya crude, a heavy sludge oil for which we have not enough refinery capacity and which takes a barrel and a half to equal the amount of gasoline from a barrel of Alberta sweet crude. For that reason we can argue that a barrel of Mexican crude costs upwards of $60 to $70. In addition, Mexico, for whatever reason, says their oil cannot be passed through to any other country, but must be refined in Canada. It must be refined in a heavy oil refinery, so we ship it to the Saskatchewan refineries. Because of overloading there we have to ship Saskatchewan oil to the U.S. for refining and bring the fuel products back. When you put all these transportation costs together, knowledge of which central Canadians basically did not have, we are not paying something near world price, we are paying almost 50 per cent more. Yet at the same time, for some reason, some are trying to make the people of central Canada believe that western Canada is greedy.

I will tell you just the opposite. If this government did not have the attitude it does with respect to the development of the west, if it were not so afraid of western Canada's present success, and if it had allowed them to go ahead with the kind of pricing regime they were looking for, which is well below world prices, there would be two tar sands plants on stream today. Central Canadians should know that the 25-year lifespan of one tar sands plant will result in direct spending of $108 billion in the province of Ontario. That is made up, in part, sir, by the expenditure of $800 million for iron and steel development; $370 million for metal fabrication; $325 million for transportation equipment; $740 million for manufacturing and processing; $370 million for financing; and $750 million for other trades and services. So multiply $108 billion over 25 years by eight or nine, and you come up with an amount pouring into this country and into this province of Ontario that is absolutely enormous.

Let us look at it in other ways. If we are not sending $4 billion to Mexico, Venezuela or the Middle East but keeping $8 billion in Canada, that money helps reduce our deficit. That money stays in Canada. It means we do not have to tax our people or borrow more money to pay interest. For every four tax dollars we collect, one is used to pay foreign debt. We could keep that money at home and build Canada. There are 110 million people in Japan. The only resources there are fish and tin, but what an economy they have! Germany is one of the leading nations of the world with respect to economic strength. When world oil prices started to go up in 1971 Germany adapted and charged world oil prices. Did that hurt the German automotive industry? It did not? Germany is one of the leaders in the auto industry today.

This government chose to intervene and "protect" our industries. What are we doing now? We are bailing out Chrysler Corporation because that corporation continued to make 14-foot long Chryslers. Then all of a sudden the shock came. The government would not allow sudden increases in fuel prices, but its protectionist policy worked against it. On the one hand this government will not allow jobs to be created in Ontario, and on the other hand it is killing and stifling the initiative of the industries which are already here. That policy is wrong.

We have a clandestine government causing deep anger. That anger runs deep in the citizens of my region. West-Fed meetings are being held all over western Canada. That makes me bitter and angry with those people opposite. They force me to go home to my constituency, a good part of this country, to face people who say: "What the heck, why do I have to stay with this any longer when this government will not hear about western aspirations?" West-Fed has now held about four or five meetings in my riding. I have received many letters. One writer wrote the following:

As a westerner I have adopted a "helpless and hopeless" attitude toward our federal government. I feel we really have no voice and no artillery to fight the Trudeau Machine, but that is no reason to give up the fight.

Another person wrote, and I quote:

Myself like thousands of others have joined West-Fed as a last hope.

The important words are "last hope". They have given up on the Government of Canada, and they have done that because of this government's energy pricing and Constitution policies, which will make my province a second-class province in this country. The letter goes on to say:

With Trudeau in the saddle the western provinces stand as much hope as a snowflake in hell.

An hon. Member: Watch your language.

The Constitution

Mr. Malone: Another person wrote to me and said the following:

I am deeply concerned with the way the constitutional issue is being handled by the federal government.

Then in a later paragraph he said:

For that reason and because of the way the west is being treated generally by the central Canada dominated federal government I am prepared to vote to separate if asked this question in a provincial referendum.

These letters document the fact that this government is callous, cruel, fails to understand and does not govern Canada.

I come from a province in which 21 Members of Parliament are elected. The Liberal Party which forms the federal government today holds only 21 seats from eight of the provinces and two territories. All the rest of the power of this government comes from Quebec and Ontario. Hon. members opposite do not represent Canada. There is room for my region in this country. It is a good member of the Canadian family, but when those bastards on the other side—

An hon. Member: Watch your language.

Mr. Cousineau: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) has definitely used unparliamentary language, and I ask him to withdraw those words.

Mr. MacBain: Be a gentleman for a change.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I am willing to withdraw. I am not sure what I have done is wrong. I have made reference to these people and the way in which I believe they are bastardizing the nation, which I think is wrong. They are very much the cause of this nation being in the situation it is in. We have a phony government, and it is that phoniness to which I am referring.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I regret to inform the hon. member that the time allotted for his speech has elapsed. He can continue if he seeks the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. MacBain: No bloody way. He is a separatist.

Mr. Mayer: Shape up, MacBain.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak on this very important issue tonight because I was one of the Members of Parliament denied that right by the government's imposition of closure last winter.

Before I get to the issues I would like to praise the efforts of the special committee on the Constitution. That committee laboured long and mightily to improve the document put before it. Many members from all parties immersed themselves heart and soul and ate, lived and breathed this Constitution for a good long time.

I would like to single out for particular praise the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), whose contribution to this entire process cannot be overestimated. The chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal), impressed everyone with his fair-minded, even-handed treatment of what sometimes evolved into raucous debate. The commitment and the enthusiasm of the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) were inspirational to many.

There were differences of ideology, but the way the committee functioned and the suggested amendments that were accepted serve to show us as Members of Parliament how a committee can and should function.

For example, all parties moved amendments to the resolution. We did not get all we wanted, but some of our efforts were successful. The people of Canada were able to watch the daily proceedings of the committee and were able to learn and understand better how Parliament works.

The Progressive Conservatives moved an amendment of which I am proud. That is the amendment which deals with denominational schools. In my riding, as in other ridings across Canada, there exist a number of Christian schools. Many of these schools expressed the fear that they would no longer be able to function in the way to which they had long been accustomed. They were afraid that their special status would be denied them, but we intervened and their rights were specifically outlined and protected in the proposed charter.

The Progressive Conservatives were equally successful in ensuring that those who suffer from mental or physical disability were granted equal protection and equal benefit under the law without discrimination. This is a major step forward, and it echoes my party's commitment to the handicapped in this Year of the Handicapped.

However, despite our successes, there were battles we fought in vain. Sometimes alone, and sometimes in conjunction with their friends in the NDP, government members saw fit to defeat amendments which could have gone further in protecting the rights of individual Canadians. Our amendment respecting the right to own property was one of those with which we could see no problem. After all, there are more than 30 countries in the world which include the right to own property as one of their fundamental constitutional rights. The government in the person of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), who was pinch-hitting for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), agreed with us. Who are we to doubt the word of a cabinet minister? We soon found the answer to that. In a move which perfectly illustrated the lack of good faith typified by this government, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), after consulting with the leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent), coldbloodedly withdrew the support of the government for our amendment.

There was no principle involved in his decision; it was political expediency, pure and simple. It was a case of "scratch my back, and I'll scratch yours". The Solicitor General was tossed unceremoniously to the wolves, repudiated by his own leader in a cynical, dispassionate attempt to purchase Mr. Blakeney's support. Alas for the Prime Minister, his ploy did not work. Alas for Canadians, for they now have not the right under this resolution to own property.

This is not a red herring. This right to own property should be the cornerstone, the fundamental linchpin of a renewed Constitution. Shelter is one of the basic needs of humankind. The urge to build a nest is deeply engrained in our psyche. Our language is full of references to the ancient need. "A man's home is his castle." We have all heard that, and we all know what it means. It means security, privacy and freedom to be one's own self, away from the judgmental eyes of strangers.

The purchase of a home is the single biggest purchase most people make. To buy one's home is a basic ambition and, as such, plays a large part in our economy. People work, strive and save to buy that little corner of earth they can call their own. And now this government says, "No, you do not have that right any more. We can take this away from you any time we deem it expedient."

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is this the kind of motivation that will send people out to work and encourage them to put their hard earned money into property? That is not likely, for why should people take the risk when that property can be taken away from them at the government's whim?

Our economy, which is already suffering from a severe drop in construction, will certainly not pick up and start booming under these circumstance. Perhaps this decision by the government will mean that even more people in the construction industry will be out of work.

The urge to own one's home is one of the factors that brought the settlers to Canada in the first place. I know that my own forefathers, who came from Pennsylvania in the year 1800 and settled on the shores of Lake Erie in what was then the township of Bertie, acquired land from the Crown and farmed. They came here because they wanted to have freedom of religion, because they wanted to farm on their own land, and they found that freedom here.

The homesteaders came and they developed this country. Their desires and the good of the country coincided. Now, with this right denied, where will the country go? Who will want to put their sweat into it when the government can snatch it away? No, Mr. Speaker, this denial of our amendment does not bode well for Canada, for its future, or for the future of its people.

Recently five members of our task force studying North-South relations were on a trip to Asia. We visited the Philippines, Bangladesh and Singapore. As I was travelling through the countryside in the Philippines I learned that many people are denied ownership of proprety, either for political reasons, because of poverty, or perhaps both. In Bangladesh also, to own property is an almost sacred right. Half the people in that country do not own land. If all the land in that country were evenly distributed, it would mean only three quarters of an acre per person. You see, Mr. Speaker, ownership of property is precious, so let us not take it for granted.

I should like to read into my speech a news release from the Ontario Real Estate Association under the dateline of January 27. It reads:

The 25,000 member Ontario Real Estate Association is appalled that the government has apparently reneged on its agreement to include property rights as part of the charter of rights in the constitutional process.

Maurice W. Park, president of the association, said in a telegram to Prime Minister Trudeau and other MPs that property rights are "basic to the freedoms of Canadians and are intrinsic to the freedom and growth of Canada."

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. The hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau) on a point of order.

Mr. Cousineau: I must rise once again, Mr. Speaker, to point out to the hon. member that he should respect the traditions and customs of the House by not referring to a member or a minister by his name, but rather by his title.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I understand the point raised by the hon. member for Gatineau. However, I was also listening carefully to the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz), and I heard that he was quoting from a text which referred to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The hon. member for Gatineau on a point of order.

Mr. Cousineau: I would not want to question your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to make a comment on a ruling made by the Chair last evening. I do not have before me the page to which I am referring, but the opinion was expressed that members should not quote from texts that contain unparliamentary expressions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please! I find it improper for a member to appeal a ruling of the Chair. It has been clearly established that the hon. member for Erie was quoting a text mentioning the person in question, and I must point out that this reference was quite proper. Obviously, a member who quotes a text associates himself with it in a way, and as he is taking for himself the text quoted, he must respect the spirit and the letter of our rules as much as possible. Having said this, I believe that the ruling I made earlier is in accordance with the tradition of the House, and I think that we should allow the hon. member for Erie to continue.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Hear, hear, Mr. Speaker, let the hon. member not waste our time any further.

Mr. Fretz: Mr. Speaker, apparently the hon. member cannot stand the truth. I should like to continue reading the news release as follows:

"Our society was built on the premise that ownership of private property is a freedom inherent in our society. Refusing those rights is, in effect, refusing part of our freedom."

He added: "Throughout the years, people have worked and saved with a view to eventually owning property. For in ownership of property lay the concept of being free, of being master of your own fate, of having a measure of control over your own destiny."

To deny that right as one of the basic rights of being a Canadian is to deny all that Canada has stood for in the past 114 years and to deny all that our forefathers strived for, Park said.

"We in the real estate industry deal closely with the public and with the land. We are the ones who bring buyer and seller together. We assist in the private ownership dream and we increasingly see the erosion of the right of property ownership in this land.

It is imperative, he added, "that those who are concerned with property rights and with the maintenance of a fair and just balance between private property rights and the public interest stand up and be heard. But the maintenance of the balance must include the entrenchment of property rights within the charter of rights."

The Ontario Real Estate Association is the largest provincial real estate association in Canada and represents 48 local real estate boards in cities and town across Ontario.

Our forefathers came to this country to seek land, to seek wealth, and to seek a new way of life. We know that first came the French, then the British who began to explore, to chart and then to govern this vast and unknown land. Across the conference table they combined their strengths, and an equal welcome was extended to all who came. Millions came from many parts of the world, people of varied racial origins. Now we possess this land in common under the Maple Leaf, the symbol of the great forests we have hewn together.

Historically, Canada's story has been a troubled one. It was put together following the colonial wars between Britain and France, which left us a legacy of distrust between the French and the English cultures and made nationhood even more difficult to attain.

We are now a nation of varying cultures and ethnic groups, British, French, German, Ukrainian, Scandinavian, Dutch, Chinese, Japanese, Italian, Dukhobor, Indian and Eskimo. All of these, while loyal to our country, have different backgrounds, cultures and ways of life.

As we read the records of the pre-confederation years, we come to realize that Canada became a nation because the confederating fathers had come to a point of mutual agreement where they were willing to set aside those things that divided them in favour of standing together on the basic areas of mutual concern and conviction.

• (2100)

For at least seven years before 1864, George Brown, the leader of the Liberals, and John A. Macdonald, the leader of the Conservatives, were not even on speaking terms with one another. Yet, in 1864 they came to an understanding which resulted in working together to bring about confederation. The confederating fathers agreed that the most important minority of all was the individual who, as a human being created in the image of God, should have those freedoms which in the past 100 years have been the basis of the Canadian way of life. They were utterly convinced that government had no right to assume it could grant or take away those freedoms. They dedicated themselves to the premise that it was the responsibility of government to protect and to perpetuate those freedoms which belonged by right to every individual and to every group of individuals, minorities or majorities. It was determined that Canada, in its destiny, must be a nation under God.

It was on October 16, 1864, that the decision was made to go ahead with the drafting of the constitution. Sir Leonard Tilley, reading his morning devotions, was impressed with the eighth verse of the seventy-second psalm. He became convinced that if they were to succeed in their objective, Canada would have to become a nation under God. When he arrived at the conference session that morning, he convinced his fellow politicians that the motto of this new nation should be: "He shall have dominion from sea to sea". Therefore, inscribed in the east arch of the Peace Tower of the Parliament Buildings were these words: "He shall have dominion from sea to sea", and over the west arch were these words: "Where there is no vision the people perish". This government needs a vision of what this country can become. The work that they accomplished has not perished, but the question we can ask ourselves tonight is: Will it survive?

I want to speak to another amendment which the Liberals saw fit to deny, the amendment whereby the Tories attempted to have the preamble to the Bill of Rights, written by Mr. Diefenbaker, included in the charter of rights of this resolution presently under discussion. I remind hon. members opposite of the wording passed by Mr. Diefenbaker's government in 1960. The following sentiments and thoughts were applicable then and, as far as I am concerned, they still are:

> Affirming that (a) the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person, and the position of the family in a society of free individuals and free institutions, and
> (b) individuals and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law.

For some inexplicable reason hon. members opposite saw fit to defeat this amendment. What could their reasons be? Is it because these words are the words of a man who was their political foe? No, I really cannot believe hon. members opposite are so petty. Is it because hon. members opposite are irreligous and deny God's existence? No, that cannot be either. Is it because they do not believe in the dignity and worth of the human person? No, for surely they are dignified and worthy persons opposite.

This is a mystery, but could there not be a simple explanation? Could it be that the Right Hon. Prime Minister has delusions of grandeur and does not wish to acknowledge that there is someone who is superior to him? After all, the charter of rights was his idea. He was the one who pushed and manipulated to have it included with the patriation of the Constitution. He is the one who forgot to tell Mrs. Thatcher that he would include it. He is the one who forgot to tell the premiers last September that he would do it. It was his idea, and he will not let us forget it. We might think that our rights come from God, but we all know they come from the Right Hon. Prime Minister!

The people of Canada know better. Even those who call God by another name know rights flow from something greater than a mere man. The government cannot dispense rights; rights are an intrinsic part of a human being.

We have heard of the phrase "the spirit of the law". What does it mean? It means more than the mere words, the dry legalities. It means the spirit in all people, all of us who recognize that there is someone or something greater than ourselves, that there is a higher authority than government. It is that greater power which awes, instructs and inspires man to be greater himself. This is what we want recognized, and the people of Canada know it. All members on all sides of the House have received letters, cards and telephone calls. Today I received another stack of letters, all indicating the same thing: "Do not leave God out of the Constitution—all rights and privileges flow from him; how can the government deny that?" The people do not understand; neither do I. It seems such a basic, fundamental premise that the people are mystified by the government's reluctance to include it.

The Prime Minister said he is willing to listen to suggestions so that he can get broader support for his resolution. I know a lot of his opposition out there in Canada would have been silenced had he accepted the Progressive Conservative amendment. I urge him most strongly to listen, not just for his own sake, for the sake of all people.

The proposed charter provides that "everyone has the right to life." The effect of this clause will be to strengthen the hand of the pro-abortionist faction. Let me explain. To date the Canadian courts have determined that the words "person" and "human being" do not include the unborn child, with the result that a child must be born before it can assert rights. The proposed charter reaffirms this interpretation by not explicitly providing for the right to life of the unborn child. Because of this omission, the right to an abortion will virtually be entrenched in our Constitution. Once the charter is in place, Canadians will be locked into rights and relationships permanently, far beyond what may be fully understood today.

In light of this, it is better the charter be amended specifically to deal with the rights of the unborn and the assertion of those rights prior to birth, rather than leave it to the courts only to find later that a constitutional amendment is required. Therefore, clause 7 might be amended to read as follows:

> Everyone, including the unborn, has the right to life, which life begins at conception and which right is assertable from conception. Everyone has the right to liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof, except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

It has been "noised about" that the Tories are against a charter of rights. This is not the truth. We are in favour of a charter of rights. In fact, the members of my party on the special committee worked hard to improve the charter originally suggested by the Minister of Justice. No, there are two reasons we have misgivings about the charter. Those reasons relate not to content, but to the method of imposing the charter on the provinces, and the fact that Parliament will no longer be the final arbiter in questions of human rights. That responsibility will be taken over by the Supreme Court.

Many things have been said about the charter and the concept of the charter. It is a noble and laudable goal. The sentiments and hopes expressed in the wording of the charter are ones which exemplify the Canadian attitude of fairness and justice. We will be the envy of many nations if the charter is realized.

But, will it be realized? Will its genesis, its form of coming into being, militate against its acceptance? In many cases the charter is seen to infringe upon provincial rights. The provinces will be less than ecstatic about implementing changes in their legislation, when those changes are perceived to have been imposed unilaterally by the federal government, against the will of the provinces and without prior consultation.

• (2110)

The atmosphere has been poisoned by the actions of the Prime Minister. Surely, if the charter is something he so very strongly believes in, it deserves the very best chance to be embraced by both levels of government. That chance could only be offered by both levels, had they the opportunity to fully discuss the charter, to make suggestions as to its improvement, to do a little horse trading or to do a bit of compromising.

I have said that the concept of the charter is a noble one. Indeed, it is a dream that has long sought reality. But, will that reality sully the dream? Will the hard feelings which have been engendered work to make the reality less than the dream? Will it be seen, like so many other things about this government, that the rhetoric far exceeds what eventually comes into being?

Although I have not been a member for long, sometimes it seems to me that discouragement could be the key note of the Hill. That discouragement, if it is real, is based on the disillusionment which comes with this place. So many wonderful causes have been espoused here in this place. So many people work so very hard, and in too many cases disappointment is the only crop harvested. The Prime Minister seems to have had a dream, but by his very own actions he has endangered that dream.

It is true, with his numerical strength, he can force the charter on the provinces. But I am sure if he does he will find it to be a hollow victory. If he truly wants to triumph, if he does not want to add to the long litany of failures and shattered hopes, it is up to him to change his course. It is up to him to choose the middle ground of conciliation, consultation and compromise. Surely, for something as important as the charter of rights, the Prime Minister can bend. Surely, he can try to work together with the premiers to achieve his own dream.

I would like to indulge in an hypothesis. Suppose that the Prime Minister goes ahead with the charter and imposes it on the provinces. Suppose that the people and the premiers soon forget the method of the charter's imposition, although I do not believe that could be true. What will happen then? Even if this turns out to be like the flag debate—all smoke and no fire—Canada will still be left with a charter of rights that can only be interpreted by the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court of Canada is an appointed body—appointed by the Prime Minister. I fear that if we let the Supreme Court be the final arbiter, we will be erasing some of the traditional separation between the legislature and the courts. The separation was devised for a purpose, and it will be blurred if the charter goes through as proposed.

The question we must ask ourselves is this: Do we, as Canadians, really want the court to play a significant role in policy-making? This is what the court will be doing if we leave the final interpretation of the charter to it. This is how matters have evolved in the American system. But, in the United States, appointments to the supreme court must be ratified by the members of the Senate. This is a safeguard which was built into the American constitution so that power would not be concentrated too much in the hands of one person—the person making the appointments. We have no such safeguard in our constitutional proposal. I think that we must consider very carefully just what we may be doing to the future of Canada, if we do not change the way that appointments are made to our Supreme Court, should this constitutional proposal go through.

Some of us in this House have come to Canada to escape despotism in other lands; and others of us have travelled enough throughout the world to see the ravages that unbridled power can bring to bear on a nation. What guarantees are there in this resolution which can allow us to relax and say, It cannot happen here? It has happened in other nations which were complacent, where democracy was wrenched from the people. Other people have said, We trust those we put in power to use that power wisely. They have our best interests at heart. To their grief, other people have learned that sometimes their interests and the interest of their rulers do not always overlap. But the rulers have had so much power invested in them, unchecked power, that the rulers were able to have their way over the wishes of the nation.

I cannot read the future, Mr. Speaker; none of us can, but I firmly believe that we, as the parliamentarians of Canada, have a great responsibility to the people of Canada, and we should consider the future realistically. Human nature is human nature, and where human nature is concerned we know that absolute power corrupts absolutely. Let us not look down the years with our vision obscured by wishful thinking. We would be abdicating our responsibility to the people who voted for us if we did not take a cold, hard look at the possible consequences of our actions on the lives of future generations. It is always better to be safe than sorry. That is why I would feel a lot better about this whole process if we could only go at it more slowly, before we commit ourselves to a regrettable and irreversible course.

I have used some words in my speech today that I would like to repeat. They are compromise, conciliation, and consultation. These words, for me, sum up what Canada is all about. We are a large, diverse nation, with conflicting goals and needs. Yet for over 113 years, these conflicts have been allayed by compromise, conciliation and consultation. Why, after all this time, when this approach has been successful, has the Prime Minister decided to go the unilateral route, with all the bitterness and hostility it will cause? The Prime Minister is well aware of the benefits which can accrue when parties with differing viewpoints get together to discuss their differences.

If this were not the case, why has he just agreed to have regular trilateral talks with the United States and Mexico? If he can see the wisdom of talking with our neighbours, why can he not see the wisdom of talking with his own people—

Canadians? Engaging in such a dialogue would surely be worth while, for the stakes are so high, and the cost of failure too abysmal to contemplate.

When 64 per cent of the population feels that the process is wrong, then that is the time to reconsider. The majority of the people are in favour of repatriating the Constitution, but the manner in which the Prime Minister is doing it sticks in their craw. It is unfortunate that an artificial, arbitrary deadline means more to the Prime Minister than the cries of outrage from the people of Canada. There is serious danger here, not only to Canada, but to the office of the Prime Minister. He has so upset the people that anything which emanates from the federal government, or which appears to have his approval, is viewed with a jaundiced eye. I am afraid the Prime Minister will find his actions ultimately counterproductive. Canadians will balk at anything he says. This reflects badly not only on the Prime Minister himself, but on the whole institution of government.

When the institution is scorned, where does that lead us?—to anarchy? People can be moved to take power into their own hands, or can become so apathetic they no longer take the responsibility to ensure that government is honest and truly representational. The pitfalls are numerous, yet the Prime Minister does not seem to care, or even to notice.

One of the items which outrages Canadians the most about this proposal is the insistence of the government on a referendum option, available only to the federal government. It would allow that government to unilaterally change the Constitution without the consent of the provincial governments. This is supposed to be applied only if there is a deadlock. Guess who decides if there is a deadlock? You guessed it—the federal government. This way it not only owns the ball, but it will make the rules, as well. It seems unfair to me, and that is exactly how the provincial governments view it as well. But the Prime Minister has an answer to that one, too.

An hon. Member: How about Bill Davis?

Mr. Fretz: Provincial intransigence is his excuse. Do hon. members not know that we have not been able to bring back our Constitution in 52 years of trying? Do they not remember how we could not sleep at night fretting over our Constitution being in Britain and not safe here in Ottawa? Do they not remember how many elections have been fought over the Constitution? Why, we could hardly hold our head up in the world community, so great was our shame!

I would like to point out to the Prime Minister that the matter of the Constitution has come up exactly 48 times in federal-provincial conferences. Forty-eight times in 53 years is less than once a year. That hardly seems to me like one long, unfulfilling and fruitless search for accommodation. However, if, in the Prime Minister's words, this is a record of failure, we all should know that the Prime Minister was the one who presided over the last 13 meetings.

One of the biggest bones of contention in this whole discussion centres around the amending formula suggested by the government. This is the so-called Victoria formula which, like so much else suggested by this government, is wildly inappropriate to the Canada of today. My party believes that the Vancouver consensus is more in tune with what Canadians want and need. However, before I go into that, I would like to point out the failings in the Victoria formula.

For one thing, and this is the most important, it is inequitable, unjust and unfair. Different provinces under this formula are treated differently. Different classes of provinces are created, because some will have a permanent veto over constitutional change, regardless of population, and the Atlantic provinces will be treated in a different manner than the western provinces.

The House and Senate are already set up as bodies that discriminate on the basis of the majority. Are we going to allow the amending formula to be set up this way too? My understanding was that a democracy was set up to protect the rights of the minority against the tyranny of the majority. This amending formula provides no protection for the minority. The formula will not work because it does not take into account the inevitable changes in population growth and distribution. It is a rigid formula which has not taken into account the inevitable provincehood of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Let us examine the details of the Victoria formula. It will require the consent of the province of Quebec, the consent of the province of Ontario, the consent of any two provinces in Atlantic Canada and the consent of two provinces in western Canada enjoying at least 50 per cent of the population in that region. Let us suppose, for a moment, that the proposed Constitution of the Government of Canada had been in place when Canadians were discussing medicare, or the Canada Pension Plan. Under the Victoria formula, both of those initiatives would have been defeated, for they were both rejected by Quebec. Canadians would have been denied the social benefits that have helped many live through the difficult economic times we have undergone for the last ten years.

The proposal my party puts forward is known as the Vancouver formula. This formula is one which found favour with the provinces, it was agreed to in principle, and a consensus could have been reached had the Prime Minister so desired. But he did not want it. The premiers all agreed, but the Prime Minister did not, so the proposal was thrown out. The Prime Minister is always talking about the curse of unanimity, yet here is an example of his actions under the unanimity rule, killing an idea that ten other people had reached agreement on.

The Vancouver formula has the prerequisites I outlined just a moment ago, for it recognizes the equality of the provinces, and does not promote divisiveness and envy. No province will retain a veto over constitutional changes under the Vancouver proposal. It is not inflexible or rigid, but it will provide significant safeguards for the rights and powers essential to the nature of the country, and especially the provinces. It is a simple formula, and its very simplicity makes it adaptable to the demographic changes that are inevitable in Canada. It is not a formula frozen at a moment in time, but an always evolving and responsive attempt to react to the reality of Canada today, and Canada in the future.

Canada, as has been said before, is a nation of diversity. We should recognize and appreciate the qualities that this diversity brings to this great nation of ours. We are not all the same; we do not want to be all the same. Our regions should be acknowledged for what they contribute to the greater good. The sum is greater than the whole of the parts. It is my belief that the Vancouver consensus protects us with a foundation that we can build and grow on as we move into the twenty-first century.

In my final words, I would like to leave a thought with the Prime Minister. We on this side of the House know, as do the people of Canada, that by sheer weight of numbers he can force his proposal through the House. But I would like to remind the Prime Minister what Edmund Burke said so long ago. His words were wise then, and they still have application now:

The use of force is temporary. It may subdue for a moment; but it does not remove the necessity of subduing again; and a nation is not governed which is perpetually to be conquered.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight with a great deal of apprehension because I realize the very serious nature of the topic to be discussed. I would first like to take the opportunity to thank our leader, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) for his very clear analysis of the present resolution before this House. I would also like to thank the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) and all the other members of the Constitution committee who worked so hard, long and diligently on behalf of their colleagues, but, more importantly, on behalf of all Canadians.

I want to discuss the fact that in the history of mankind, the occasion of reasonable people sitting down to draft their Constitution has been an occasion of adventure and joy, cause for pride and excitement, particularly for those involved directly in the drafting. I therefore find it difficult to understand why the recreating or the redrafting of the Canadian Constitution has not been done in a fashion to create, from coast to coast and from the border to the North Pole, a sense of celebration and a spirit of renewal at the rebirth of our nation under a new Constitution.

If the approach had been different, I wonder whether, on the day a repatriated Constitution physically arrived in Canada, we would put it on a train with flags flying and send it across Canada in a symbolic act of our unity and the shared excitement that we are one Canada with one Constitution. Instead, there is a sense of impending doom. People have the feeling that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the present government have broken faith with the Canadian people. This feeling has developed to such a point it has created division, hard feelings and animosity. Even as I stand in my place in this House of Commons I feel it has created animosity between hon. members on all sides. I find it incomprehensible that the Prime Minister and the Liberal Party have adopted an approach which creates distress and apprehension about building something so fundamental to the Canadian way of life as the Constitution. This animosity has reached the point that the patriotism and love of Canada of some members of the House has been questioned by other members. I hear that from all sides of the House, and I find it incomprehensible that reasonable men and women could allow it to happen.

● (2130)

Ortega once said, "True patriotism is criticizing the land of our fathers and constructing the land of our children". I will buy that, Mr. Speaker. The greatest expression of true love is the desire to help. We want to help. We want to create a better country for our children. Indeed, we want to create a better world for our children. I do not think anyone in this House would deny that. But are we creating a better world for our children or will we leave them a legacy of divisiveness? Is there such a lack of foresight in this country that it will eventually foster internal turmoil to such a degree that it will turn government against government—we see that happening already—turn neighbour against neighbour—and we see that happening now—will turn region against region, and we see that happening now as well? Are we creating a climate where hatreds, biases and prejudices will be nurtured instead of discouraged?

It is my feeling that before a Canadian Constitution can be built we must assess the foundation upon which it will be placed. If the foundation crumbles, so will the Constitution. If, for example, we agree that Canada will be a socialist state, then certain objectives must be stated in the Constitution; if we believe we want to build a totalitarian state, then clearly certain objectives should be stated in the Constitution as well. But it is my firm belief Canadians from coast to coast want a Constitution that recognizes the freedom of the individual, rewards the initiative of the individual, looks after those who cannot look after themselves, and a Constitution that prizes freedom of the individual above all else. We must begin the process by evaluating the foundation upon which such a Constitution will rest. It is my firm belief that the people of Canada believe, above all else, in the freedom of the individual, the supremacy of God, the sanctity of the family and the dignity of the individual.

Some may ask, what is a Canadian? We often hear that there is no particular concrete thing that identifies a Canadian. I take serious exception to that; I just do not agree. If we ask people who come to our shores from other countries what a Canadian is, they will tell us that a Canadian is tolerant, is friendly, is polite, respects individual freedoms, believes in justice, is unhurried, is thoughtful but, above all, is fair and co-operative.

The historian, Edgar McInnis, in defining the Canadian spirit which seeks moderation and co-operation to enable Canada to surmount each successive crisis said that it is "this sound sense of the possible".

All these things I have enumerated manifest themselves daily. If we line up for a movie we will notice that Canadians stand patiently and are friendly in the line. We do not see Canadians barging in and trying to get to the front of the line. In other countries when there is a lineup for an event, people will try to break in and get to the front. There is a certain fairness that runs through the Canadian character. If hon. members will remember the last time they went into a grocery store or a drugstore and waited in a line-up to be served, and perhaps the clerk came forward and offered to take someone out of turn, the person addressed likely said that someone else was there before him. That is what makes the Canadian character; that is something fundamental that runs through it, the sense of fairness. Every night I give thanks to God for that sense of fairness in the Canadian mentality.

How has this developed? It is my contention it developed because of the many and varied ethnic groups who came to our shores and became Canadians while, at the same time, they retained their culture. We see evidence of it every day in various activities and languages. They became Canadian but maintained their heritage and their culture.

Had we moved into this constitutional debate in the true and typical Canadian manner, we would be celebrating the participation of all our people from coast to coast in the repatriation of our Constitution. We would be negotiating, compromising, working out solutions as reasonable men and women, because the ingrained fairness of the Canadian mentality would have prevailed.

Another example of the fairness and moderation of the Canadian mentality is seen daily in this House of Commons during question period when the cut and thrust of debate and the heckling goes on. But no member may rise in his place and use unparliamentary language. Even though one member may have written proof that another has lied, he may not call the other a liar or he will be named, because that is not parliamentary. I have great pride in being a Canadian because I see this fairness and tolerance demonstrated every day.

In the book "A Guide to the Peaceable Kingdom" Douglas Le Pan, poet and essayist, in an essay entitled "In Frock Coat and Moccasins" wrote:

> Nor is it very difficult to understand why a Canadian passport should be so popular. Part of the explanation is that with it one can travel easily almost anywhere. Another reason for the popularity of the little blue booklet stamped in gold is that one can speak English or French or Ukrainian or Polish or Chinese and still be a Canadian. One can, in fact, be almost anyone and still be a Canadian; and to be a Canadian is to have a passport to the whole world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2140)

Mr. Shields: When I read that, I get a lump in my throat. I have great pride in that statement. We should be focusing on that. This diversity is an advantage Canada has that no other country in the world enjoys.

A Toronto writer, Arnold Edinborough, said some time ago, "Canada has never been a melting pot; more like a tossed salad."

With respect to the resolution before this House of Commons, can any thinking man truly say that the Victoria charter amending formula proposed is fair to all Canadians when it makes central Canada senior or first-class provinces? The residents of central Canada become senior or first-class citizens, but in the hinterland provinces in the west and in the east, they become second-class citizens. They are second-class provinces, so it follows they are second-class citizens. That is not the Canadian way. That is not the Canadian mentality. That is not the fairness, the moderation, the co-operation or the tolerance of Canadians. That is not the Canadian way of doing things. It is as simple as that. It is absolutely unfair.

In section 46 we find the referendum proposal. The federal government can trigger and control a referendum which will pit region against region and Canadian against Canadian. This is not for a moment in keeping with the tradition of fairness and moderation. Minorities always suffer as a result of a referendum. It is absolutely unfair.

In Sections 36 to 44 we find the interim amending formula. It gives us the illusion that the government is prepared to be flexible when it is actually building toward the referendum option. That is not in the Canadian tradition. That is not moderation nor co-operation. Where is the fairness in that?

The government refuses to include a preamble to the Constitution, covering the principles which form the bases on which Canadians have lived, have been born, under which immigrants have entered the country, have built their homes and have become Canadians. These principles acknowledge the supremacy of God in every religion. These principles acknowledge there is a supreme architect of the universe. These principles acknowledge the dignity and rights of the human being, the equality of the sexes, the very importance of the family unit and the fundamental right to own property.

I have a letter which I think is most apt. In part, this letter, written to me, reads:

> The individual who does not have the right to own property becomes, himself, the property of the state.

That is fundamental. It is not the Canadian way to exclude the right to own property. It is not the just way, nor can that be described as co-operation. I submit that if every Canadian were asked if they wanted those things I have mentioned included in the Constitution there would be a resounding yes from coast to coast. People want those principles recognized in any Constitution, not excluded.

I would now like to direct hon. members' attention to the resolution, including the charter of rights. I believe this resolution has been drafted in haste. I am positive there are members besides myself who have not made up their minds about the propriety of a charter of rights as a safeguard to human freedoms which are already upheld and protected in our existing common law, in our statutes, in our legal decisions, the current BNA Act, the Magna Carta and the Statutes of Westminster. It is not the Canadian way to force the entrenchment of a bill of rights until Canadians have had a chance for cautious deliberation. Canadians are just and reasonable people. Canadians must have a chance to reflect on the significance to our whole way of life of an entrenched charter of rights. There are arguments equally valid on either side. I cannot go on the record in this House of Commons at this time stating which would be the best. There are equally valid arguments on both sides. Forcing this Constitution through so it will be approved by Great Britain is not fair to the Canadian tradition. It negates all of the qualities I have been talking about which make up that Canadian character.

Is this fetish to entrench the charter of rights by the present Prime Minister truly a recognition of a need in Canada? I cannot remember a great hue and cry from across this country that people feared for their rights and were being treated unjustly or that their rights were in danger. Is there an underlying motive which the Prime Minister has in insisting on entrenchment? I submit to this chamber that there is an underlying motive. The Prime Minister of Canada is attempting to entrench language equality in the Canadian Constitution in such a way that future generations of Canadians will never be able to alter.

On page 37 of Hansard for October 12, 1978, the Prime Minister, referring to the Constitution, is reported as saying:

> It is vital to me that it does give protection to the kind of linguistic equality that this government has put into the statutes.

In other words, over two and a half years ago, the Prime Minister stated his very clear objective that he was going to entrench forever the concept of a Canada with two official languages. At least the Official Languages Act can be amended. This ability to amend gave the Canadian people the flexibility to change as the demography of our country changes, as it grows and progresses. But more important, it allows our children and our children's children if the need arises to change it 100 or 200 years from now when members of this House are nothing but a bad memory. The Prime Minister's objective is to protect his official language concept for all time. It is not fair. It is not fair to the people of Quebec either. It is not the Canadian way.

At the constitutional conference in September, 1980, Quebec firmly opposed the entrenchment of language rights. In its paper we read that the "very act of entrenching rights in the Constitution would freeze them for future generations." I submit to members of this House of Commons that the flexibility which has been so necessary for Canada to develop to the strong proud nation it is today will be gone forever.

Quebec's Bill 101 was very controversial but I did not hear a great hue and cry in my province that Bill 101 would destroy Canada because it declared that the business language in Quebec would be French. Why was Quebec allowed to pass that bill? I suggest it is because of the Canadian character to recognize, moderate and co-operate with French-speaking Canadians in Quebec who are a very strong majority in that province. Therefore, they have the right to insist that within their borders the language for business and institutions will be French. There was some flare-up, a little here and there. Some people discussed it and it was reported in the papers. However, in the end the Canadian character, fairness and justice prevailed. Canadians from coast to coast recognized that those in Quebec must protect the French language or it will die, because they are surrounded throughout the North American continent by English-speaking people.

The people of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Newfoundland are being forced in exactly the same way. We are undermining the province of Quebec by forcing equality of the English language in that province just as we are causing an injustice to the people of British Columbia and in other non-French-speaking areas by forcing the French language on them.

We are attempting to force entrenchment of the English language on Quebec. It will destroy that province. The Quebec government recognizes that French is a regional language. Statistics Canada confirms that. There is a small minority of French-speaking people in provinces other than Quebec and New Brunswick; 1½ per cent of the population in British Columbia and one-half of one per cent in Newfoundland.

It would be far better to allow the French language to flourish within Quebec and allow Bill 101 to stand. At the same time, those who desire can speak English. We must recognize that English is the unifying language of this country from Newfoundland to British Columbia. That does not show disrespect for the French language or for the rights of French-speaking people in Canada.

It is not in the Canadian personality to force two official languages on Canadians. Every reference to the two equal languages causes disunity in this country. There are two versions of the Constitution in two official languages. The Prime Minister says they have equal authority. Imagine all the problems of trying to decipher and compare the two.

Canada will be the only country in the world with two separate Constitutions. I find that unbelievable. We will build two countries with two differing peoples. We are dividing this country as sure as I am standing here. We will have two separate identities for all time, and that is not the Canadian way. We will be entrenching hyphenated Canadianism, the French-speaking Canadian with his Constitution and the English-speaking Canadian with his. We will be building into the Constitution a sense of division that hearkens back to the original struggle. Language was not the thing that made us Canadian. We must heed the clarion call of John Diefenbaker and eradicate hyphenated Canadianism. I quote from volume one of John Diefenbaker's memoires:

> I have always considered the official policy of separating our country into various racial groups to be a curse on the realization of a united Canada. One Canada, one nation, my Canada, your Canada, cannot be a hyphenated Canada.

If we want confirmation of this fact from another world statesman, let us look at the words of President Harry Truman, as they appeared in People magazine on February 16 of this year. These words came from his private papers. He said:

> I've no more use for Polish-Americans, Irish-Americans, Swedish-Americans or any other sort of hyphenate than I have for Communist-Americans. They all have some other loyalty than the one they should have.

One of the lasting curses on the unity of this nation has been the terminology of the B and B Commission that gave us "anglophone" and "francophone". The two terms attempt to define what is a Canadian, and that is wrong. Those words should be stricken from the Canadian vocabulary.

Prior to patriation, I urge that we sit down with the provinces in a Canadian, moderate, co-operative, tolerant way, work out an amending formula and then bring the Constitution home. Then in a reasonable way we can amend our Constitution as the need arises and the people of Canada could express their opinions. I plead with hon. members not to accept the dictatorial proposal of the Prime Minister and the Liberal government.

In conclusion, I want to quote from an open letter to the Prime Minister on the constitutional debate from J. Borowski. I quote:

> It is one thing to disregard the wishes, opinions or suggestions of your political opposition, but it is quite another matter when you arrogantly ignore the honestly and sincerely held views of a majority of your fellow Canadians.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in my place to take part in the debate on this resolution and the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). May I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT—TERMINATION OF NATIVE SPORT AND RECREATION PROGRAM

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Mr. Speaker, may I take the opportunity to congratulate Premier Bill Davis on his delightful victory in today's Ontario provincial election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: This may be a lesson for the Liberal government which does not take its role towards native people programs very seriously, and that is exactly what I am going to talk about today. I refer to a question on February 13, page 7215 of Hansard.

The whole issue of programs for our native peoples, in my opinion, is one which requires immediate and serious consideration. It is time to stop shunting them from one department to another with programs that attempt to solve problems only after they occur.

In this particular instance, the cancellation of the Indian sport and recreation program by the Department of Fitness and Amateur Sport, and the transfer of funds which were allocated for this program in the estimates to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, is a classic example of insensitivity and the lack of foresight on the part of this government in dealing with the people of this country. As I understand it, the money will now be used for health care programs. Whatever happened to the premise that "an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure"?

How long will it take the government to realize that sport and recreation programs are essential to the well-being of all Canadians, and this includes our native people? This government, which is willing at great expense to find out statistically how badly we as Canadians measure up in fitness tests, is not willing to fund the kind of programs which will improve this level of fitness. We might as well have had a royal commission, for all the good the results of the fitness tests will do us.

With the soaring costs of medical care, why can the government not see how much more logical it would be to fund programs which would improve the physical fitness of individuals, and thus reduce the need for medical care? This is not a new theory. The government has no need to check out the equation that fitness equals health. This has been done repeatedly by many qualified individuals and groups, and has been accepted by all.

The private sector is beginning to move in the direction of offering fitness programs for employees. The benefits of course are obvious; less absence from work, higher production levels and better working relations between individuals. These benefits, though not directly financial, are obvious enough to companies whose main purpose is to show profits at the end of their fiscal year. Although the Government of Canada is not geared toward this goal of financial gains, it is supposed to work for gains in the well-being of its citizens.

One of the major problems facing the native people today is the high incidence of arrests for various reasons. The majority of these stem from a lack of purpose or frustration in achieving goals. This leads to family problems, school drop-outs, alcoholism, drug addiction and a high rate of suicides. One of the major methods of combating these problems is the sport and recreation programs which have been set up in many of the native communities across the country. The Band leaders have realized that these programs are of the utmost importance in helping to occupy the time of native citizens, and in providing them with a sense of purpose, a forum for expression and a means of self-improvement.

The staging of athletic events by the various native communities is beneficial not only in the training of athletes, but also for all those in related fields. Managers, coaches and game officials are trained and developed. Sporting sites are constructed with facilities which remain at the host site for future use by the host community. The other aspects involve security preparations and maintenance, the feeding and housing of outside participants and the preparation and operation of first aid and sanitation facilities. All these aspects, along with the very important fund-raising activities, may take up to two years prior to the actual events.

From all the details given above, it is clearly evident that such a program of sport and recreation within the native communities has far-reaching and long-lasting benefits, the most important being the improved mental and physical health of the native population. How is it possible then that the government can cancel such a program without any prior consultation with the native organizations about the results of such a cancellation?

It is time for the Government of Canada to accept its responsibilities with respect to the native population on a mature and proper level. Their treatment as responsible citizens of this country is long overdue. They can no longer be considered as some distant and unwanted relatives to be pushed around from one department to another in the hope that the resulting confusion will erase the mismanagement and lack of commitment to Canada's first citizens.

I strongly urge the government to consider its decisions and to reinstate the very worth-while Indian sports and recreation program immediately. That program was devised and studied and would have been implemented had the Clark government still been in power.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the native sport and recreation program was initiated in 1972 for a five-year experimental period. The program was subsequently extended on a year to year basis, and in the current year a total of $1,092,000 has been shared among some thirty-three Inuit, status Indian, and non-status and Métis associations across the country. These contributions enabled the associations to employ recreation co-ordinators and to implement modest programs of sport, fitness, physical recreation and leadership development.

The decision to terminate the program was taken only after consideration of several alternatives in consultation with many of the recipient groups and other government departments. The Fitness and Amateur Sport is a relatively small organization without an extensive network of field offices, and the programs, taking place as they did in many locations, were difficult to monitor and evaluate. The Fitness and Amateur Sport's mandate is limited to support of programs of sport and physical recreation, leading to increased levels of sport excellence and fitness. However, many of the groups served saw as their first priority projects that were more in the area of cultural and community development. Fitness and Amateur Sport lacks expertise in dealing with the special and somewhat unique needs of native people and, as a result, many frustrations and administrative problems were encountered.

Despite these problems however, the program also met with a measure of success at the local level, and I have no doubt that in the absence of any alternative it will be missed.

An amount of money comparable to that provided this year has been placed in the social development envelope, and an exploration is currently taking place as to how it might best be administered so as to provide the most effective support for programs in the general field of health and an enhanced lifestyle for native people. Discussions are ensuing with other government departments in this regard.

Mr. Paproski: Are you going to give them the money?

TRANSPORT—APPOINTMENT OF GRAIN TRANSPORTATION CO-ORDINATOR

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to amplify some of the concerns I raised in a question on March 9 with respect to the future of the grain transportation authority in Winnipeg.

As some of us know, the Grain Transportation Authority has served a very valuable function in terms of increasing Canada's ability to export grain. We all know that we have unlimited capacity—or at least very large capacity—to produce grain. Our problem in the past number of years has been to get the grain, once it is produced, to the export position. This is why the Grain Transportation Authority was originally envisaged and set up by the previous government.

I point out, as I did in my question, that it took roughly five months from the time the previous government was elected until the terms of reference for the Grain Transportation Authority were established. This involved some elaborate and long negotiations. I see that my colleague, the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight), is in the House this evening. He was part of a group of members which took part in a study to bring about the formation of the Grain Transportation Authority. He, along with other hon. members, is well aware of some of the concerns and problems which were encountered in establishing the Grain Transportation Authority. It took roughly five months to get the Grain Transportation Authority guidelines negotiated with the Canadian Wheat Board and other parties concerned with grain transportation in western Canada. Once the guidelines were established a co-ordinator was appointed. That co-ordinator was Dr. Hugh Horner. I think his record speaks well of the choice made with respect to the grain transportation co-ordinator. It is a well recognized and applauded fact that in the crop year just concluded we increased exports of grain out of Canada by some 20 per cent, largely due to the catalyst that the Grain Transportation Authority provided to all parties involved with grain transportation in western Canada. In fact, not only did this appointment have the support of most of the industry in western Canada, it also had the support of some of the people who now sit on the government benches. I should like to quote the Minister of State for Trade (Mr. Lumley) when he appeared before the committee on transport. He said:

● (2210)

As you know, we heartily endorsed the appointment of Dr. Horner by the Minister of Transport and, as a matter of fact, we on this side would like to assist the minister in any way possible to give him back the kinds of legislative powers he thinks he needs to do the important job of moving grain in Canada.

Clearly the minister supported the concept of the Grain Transportation Authority.

The hon. member for La Prairie (Mr. Deniger), who is now a parliamentary secretary, also supported it. He said in the committee:

Among all the problems our grain exporters have had to face in Canada, there are the labour conflicts that have occurred either in the port of Montreal or in the port of Vancouver . . . In your job description—

Here he was speaking to Dr. Horner.

—I do not see where you are responsible or where you have authority in the case of labour disputes—

Clearly he also supported the concept of the Grain Transportation Authority, and clearly he was advocating that the authority be given some jurisdiction over labour disputes. So obviously we have had support for the concept of the Grain Transportation Authority from government members.

As I said in my question, the concern which I and many members have is that without a co-ordinator, effective performance in grain transportation is in jeopardy. We know we have limited amounts of facilities available to move grain. We hear criticisms continually from the government side that we in the opposition are speaking from both sides of our mouths. The government says that we in the opposition at one time advocate increases in government expenditures and at the same time show concern over rising deficits. Clearly this is not the case, and if the government were serious in some of the criticisms they level at the opposition it would appoint a grain transportation co-ordinator for the authority, because the job the authority did in the past crop year made very good use of the limited amount of transportation facilities we have in western Canada. This has helped to increase Canada's export of grain, thereby adding to our ability to earn foreign exchange, helping to maintain the value of our dollar, and generally assisting the whole economy of the country.

The Grain Transportation Authority is not an expensive operation, and the appointment of a co-ordinator is needed to see that it stays as functional and efficient as it has in the past.

Back in October, Dr. Horner resigned. At that time he recommended that his second in command, Doug Radke be appointed co-ordinator. The minister at that time said he intended to travel to Winnipeg within ten days to discuss with the grain industry whom he would appoint as a permanent replacement, and at that time he named Mr. Radke as interim co-ordinator. That is the situation today. What has happened in the interim five months—roughly the same time it took our government, of which I was proud to be a part, to set up the office of grain co-ordinator—is that this valuable tool in grain transportation in western Canada has been without a permanent co-ordinator.

It is no secret to those of us who are involved in grain transportation in western Canada that the morale of the officials of the authority has been low. Recently they lost one valuable member, namely, Bob Martinelli, and Jim Mantz has announced he will resign in June. The minister said in his answer he was looking for that pearl to replace Dr. Horner so he could get the job done. I hope the parliamentary secretary will tonight announce some kind of time-frame in which a co-ordinator will be appointed, because if they delay much longer—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

• (2215)

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) informed the House on numerous occasions of his support for the continuation of the grain transportation co-ordinator's office.

With respect to the appointment of a new co-ordinator, I do not have to inform my hon. friend about the minister's interest in finding a respected and capable individual to fulfil this important role. The record speaks for itself. On the very day of the previous co-ordinator's resignation, the minister met personally with ten prominent members of the grain trade and spoke with several more by telephone for the sole purpose of determining their views respecting the role of the co-ordinator's office, desirable attributes of a successor, and any names which they could suggest.

In the interim, while a successor is being sought, Mr. Doug Radke has been named as acting co-ordinator and, I might add, has done a very respectable job. This year's experience in exporting grain has not been without its problems; with a labour dispute at Revelstoke last fall and flooding in the Vancouver area around the beginning of this year. Notwithstanding these difficulties, the various parties have shown admirable co-operation in the movement of grain. Exports to date this year are some 4 per cent to 5 per cent above the level a year earlier, a year in which a record was set.

This situation has allowed the Canadian Wheat Board to assure producers that they will be able to deliver all the wheat and barley they wish by the end of the crop year. The acting co-ordinator, the trade and, in particular, the railways deserve a great deal of credit for this situation.

That is not to say problems do not occur. Certain areas of the prairies have experienced congested elevators resulting from the slowdown at Revelstoke last fall and the fact that deliveries to Thunder Bay have not yet geared up for the new shipping season.

More recently, ship arrivals have been slow resulting in a backlog of cars to be unloaded. Empty cars are at a premium back in the country. This situation highlights the importance of having all available railway cars allocated by a central body so these cars can be allocated to those grains most urgently needed to meet export commitments.

In summary, the system is working well at the moment. The acting co-ordinator is doing an effective job. This provides the luxury of a little extra time for the Minister of Transport to find the best individual available for this important job.

ENERGY—FORECAST OF REDUCTION IN CASH FLOWS OF OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I am taking part in the adjournment debate this evening because of a question I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) on February 5, 1981. I asked the minister if he agreed with the statement of Petro-Canada's vice-president of finance and planning, Mr. Joel Bell, as it was presented to the National Energy Board. Mr. Bell stated that cash flows of the oil companies this year would be reduced by 25 per cent from that of last year as a result of the government's National Energy Program. The minister answered my question by saying he had not read the statement, but that he would and get back to me.

That was six weeks ago, and I still have not heard from the minister of energy. I am quite confident that if I had not asked my question during the adjournment debate this evening, I would not have received a reply from the Minister of Energy. I hope I receive an adequate response from his parliamentary secretary.

The question deserves a reply because the vice-president of finance and planning for PetroCan said something very different than what the government indicated with respect to the effects of its National Energy Program. Specifically I refer to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the supplementary question I directed to him with respect to Mr. Bell's statement.

Petro-Canada indicated that cash flows will be reduced by 25 per cent in 1981. I should like to quote from the brief presented to the National Energy Board as follows:

> Cash flow available for reinvestment has been reduced by about 25 per cent in 1981 as a result of the fiscal measures contained in the National Energy Program.

● (2220)

Those were the words of Mr. Joel Bell of Petro-Canada.

The point to be made is that on January 22, the Minister of Finance said:

> —despite the National Energy Program the cash flow to the industry as a whole is very substantial. It is growing, and when we add the incentive payments, growth in the cash flow to the industry in 1980 and 1981 will be very substantial indeed.

The Minister of Finance went on further and said:

> —the cash flow of this industry in 1981, even without the incentive payments which are provided, will be 28 per cent higher than it was in 1979.

I repeat, "in 1979". Why the finance minister, this master of economics, chose to compare the percentages from two years ago—1979—is a secret that I await the answer to from the parliamentary secretary. On February 5, when I asked the minister a supplementary question, he said he stood by his statement. The government and Petro-Canada are saying two different things. Which statement is a reflection of government policy? How long does it take the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Finance to read the statement of Petro-Canada, made more than six weeks ago, before they can tell the country what is going on? Before they do read it, I would like to ask that the two ministers get their act together. I believe they are very confused. One thing is sure, the oil industry certainly is not confused. The cash flow is definitely declining. Petro-Canada admitted this when it purchased Petrofina. It asked the government to provide the $1.4 billion to purchase Petrofina. This was due to the government not having the money. Its cash flow had been reduced. The people of Canada were asked to purchase the equity in Petrofina, since there was no money under the government's National Energy Program.

There are other companies cutting back. Chevron announced a cutback of some $330 million in its exploration program. Mobil Oil is cutting back by $164 million—a reduction of 46 per cent. At least 60 per cent of United Canso's exploration budget will now be moved to the United States, even if Joel Bell of Petro-Canada does not underestimate the attractions of the U.S., where oil netbacks are three times what they are in Canada.

I invite both ministers to come to western Canada to see the drilling and service rigs heading south due to the lack of cash flow. These are miniature factories leaving Canada and taking jobs with them. Everyone but this government recognizes that the National Energy Program has not worked.

This is what the chairman and chief executive officer of the Royal Bank of Canada said about the National Energy Program:

> We'll see more jobs lost, the Canadian dollar fall still further, the price we pay for imports increase. The notion that foreign ownership is bad ownership, and that we can penalize it retroactively, as contained in the federal government's National Energy Program, is living dangerously. It is damaging Canada's reputation abroad, and is fomenting wasteful bickering at home, just when we should be pulling together. It must be changed.

The chairman and chief executive officer of the Royal Bank of Canada made that statement on January 8, 1981.

But, how does this government react? It reacts in the same way whenever its policies are criticized. It bullies and it accuses the people making those statements of being disloyal. Out west the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that if the oil companies and the banks criticized him then he must be doing something right. This government confronts and bullies, but it still refuses to consult and co-operate. It must show some good will if we are to get this country moving again.

I ask the government to clear up this anomaly with respect to government statements on cash flow. I urge ministers, when they meet with the Alberta government next month, to walk in with good will and flexibility for the benefit of the entire country.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, since the National Energy Program was announced, some representatives of the petroleum industry have speculated as to what cash flows under the old regime would have been in 1981 and the years beyond. Then, without any apparent assessment of the benefits and incentives available under the National Energy Program, they simply concluded that the new regime would be less favourable to the petroleum industry.

As set out in "The National Energy Program", the revenues available to the industry in 1981 will clearly be greater than in 1980. The program shows a 7 per cent increase in 1981 in estimated revenues in petroleum production. Since the announcement of the program, companies have indicated considerable interest in the petroleum incentives program, which will result in an increase in incentive funds made available to industry over and above those foreseen last October.

It now appears likely that revenues available to the industry from oil and gas production, having regard to increased incentive payments, will be in the order of 15 per cent above 1980 revenues. It is expected there will be new entrants into the industry, greater Canadianization, and increased exploration and development on Canada Lands. In total, these factors will result in increased benefits flowing to the oil and gas industry.

● (2225)

Mr. Speaker, since reference was made by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) to the statement of Petro-Canada to the National Energy Board in January, I would like to put on record what Mr. Bell then stated:

In 1981 our cash flow before income taxes will be reduced by approximately 12 per cent compared to our pre-NEP forecast—the main contributor to this reduction is the PGRT both on conventional production and on our share of Syncrude production. In terms of cash available for reinvestment after taking account of income taxes payable and before taking account of Petroleum Incentive Payments we anticipate a reduction of $115 million or 25 per cent from $470 million to $355 million.

That is the reference to the 25 per cent reduction in cash flow as referred to in the hon. member's previous statement. However, I shall quote further from Mr. Bell:

After Petroleum Incentive Payments, Petro-Canada's cash available for reinvestment in 1981 will increase by $103 million, from $470 million to $573 million; this is 22 per cent higher than our pre-NEP forecast compared to the 25 per cent reduction in cash available for reinvestment before consideration of PIP. Over the five-year period 1981-85, cash flow available for reinvestment before PIPs would be 13 per cent lower than our pre-NEP forecast but after PIPs would be 53 per cent higher.

DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED

EXEMPTION FROM PROVISIONS OF POST OFFICE CROWN CORPORATION LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. If Bill C-42 is passed without amendment to its monopoly provisions, serious harm will be done to organizations which provide meaningful and remunerative employment for the mentally retarded who have contracted with private business to hand deliver billings, an example of such organization being N-Tec in my riding. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That this House urge the government to provide an example and a symbol to all Canadians, in the Year of the Handicapped, by excluding groups such as N-Tec from the monopoly provisions of the bill, thereby allowing members of such groups to have a sense of worth and dignity too often denied them.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

RATIONALIZATION OF PRODUCTION OF RUBBER MANUFACTURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the government proceed immediately with discussions that will allow the Canadian rubber industry to rationalize production with all possible speed, so that markets can be secured in an increasingly competitive industry and the experienced labour force will not be dispersed by plant closures which are sure to follow if rationalization of production is not achieved.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

POSTPONEMENT OF DEBATE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RESOLUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, having regard to the government's plans to impose closure once again with respect to the constitutional debate presently before the House, and considering the fundamental importance of this debate to the future of our country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway):

That, in order to provide an opportunity not only for members of the House but for every Canadian to reflect soberly upon what has so far been said in the debate leading to changes in our Constitution and to free up time for the House to consider other important matters dealing with the economy, any further debate on the Constitution be postponed until such time as to allow the people of the province of Quebec to choose a new government, and to allow all Canadians to become sufficiently acquainted with all the facts connected to the proposal for constitutional reform before we arrive at a final decision.

ADDITIONAL COST OF SERVICE TO PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Liberal government proposed a massive increase in the provincial and municipal shares of the costs of RCMP contracts, an increase unanimously opposed by the eight attorneys general of the provinces involved, and that this increase, of over 100 per cent in some cases, represents an additional tax burden of over $2 million next year for the taxpayers of Burnaby alone, with no improved accountability, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

• (1110)

That this House condemn these massive additional costs for RCMP contract services being imposed upon eight provinces and hundreds of municipalities throughout Canada, and calls upon the government to reconsider this decision or, at the very least, to provide for a phasing in period to help the hard-pressed taxpayers of Burnaby and elsewhere absorb this further federal raid on their pocketbooks.

ASSURANCE SOUGHT RESPECTING QUEBEC PARTICIPATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Raymond Savard (Verdun-Saint Paul): Madam Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on an urgent matter of pressing necessity, that is, the refusal of the Quebec Premier, Mr. René Lévesque, to attend the national pensions conference which is designed to improve the lot of senior citizens and future pensioners.

In view of his thoughtlessness and his indifference toward Quebec pensioners, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart):

That steps be taken immediately in order to appeal to the better feelings of the PQ premier, so that senior citizens and pensioners in Quebec will not be penalized as a result of their government's absence from that conference.

NEW HORIZONS PROGRAM

FUNDING FOR TOWN OF MOUNT ROYAL, P.Q., COUNTRY CLUB—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing necessity. Whereas the town of Mount Royal, Quebec, is one of the most wealthy communities in Canada and which has a country club open only in the summer; and whereas the town of Mount Royal Country Club was given money under the federal government's New Horizons program, bearing in mind this government's policy of having members distribute cheques when ridings are represented by Liberals, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare make a public statement on her policy in allocating grants under the New Horizons program to the town of Mount Royal Country Club, including clarification on the monitoring and supervision standards by her department to ensure proper use of the taxpayers' money; and why Mr. Ed. Byrne, chairman of the New Horizons project for the Mount Royal Country Club, and Jeanne Davies, Montreal head of the New Horizons projects, both seem to be so very sensitive about having the federal government grant publicized.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker,—

Madam Speaker: The hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The mover of the motion has the right to speak.

Madam Speaker: I want to ascertain if there is a first right for the mover of the motion. I saw the hon. minister first; but I want to see if there is a first right for the mover of the motion.

The hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I should like to thank the Progressive Conservative opposition for giving us the opportunity to clarify an accusation I find very serious, which was published in the Montreal Gazette of March 18, a few days ago, and about which the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), I think, told the press he would put questions in this House, but unfortunately he did not do so. Obviously, I feel this is serious because it gives rise to innuendos which are prejudicial to the program and make taxpayers wonder whether it is worth while to grant moneys to New Horizons projects. Hon. members will recall that the New Horizons program was established in August, 1972, before myself and many other hon. members were elected to the House of Commons.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION RESPECTING CONSIDERATION AND PASSAGE OF CONSTITUTIONAL RESOLUTION

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the government House leader, and it relates to the motion which he tabled last night in the House, which reminded all of us, when we saw it, of something out of the Book of the Month Club. The minister is no doubt aware that there were no House leaders' meetings for two weeks until yesterday at 9.30 in the morning. There was a House business question at 3.15 in the afternoon, and during the period of that question he gave no indication of his intentions with respect to that matter.

Does the minister not have some reservations about his behaviour in this matter, in asking us to believe that this motion was prepared some time between 3.30 or 3.15 and the time it was tabled at six o'clock? Does the minister really believe that he is advancing his credibility as government House leader, and that that is a credible way to deal with the House of Commons? If he does believe that, would he tell the House about it?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I fail to understand why my learned colleague opposite is so upset. At the press conference last night I explained to the media the procedure we would be suggesting to hon. members, and both my colleague and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre were there. I clearly indicated to the public that I did not want to break the secrecy of parliamentary leaders' meetings. They appeared to approve that assertion.

In the preamble to his question the hon. member is suggesting that I refer to the meeting we held yesterday morning. Since he affords me that opportunity, I will refresh his memory. Yesterday morning I asked the House leader of the Progressive Conservative Party whether he had any kind of counterproposal to make on how to put an end to the third reading debate on the Constitution. I told him that since last October, we have been making suggestions to enable as many members as possible to join the debate. We have made suggestions so that the debate would be as democratic as possible, but never did the Progressive Conservative Party agree to yield one eighth or one sixteenth of an inch on any question whatsoever. I told him that every time the Progressive Conservative Party had made a request we had gone along with it all the way. Twice they asked that the committee be given more time, so we granted them the time extensions they were seeking. They asked that the debates be televised, and we agreed. So far we have been as flexible as we could be, and I told him I did not know what more I could offer him, "Please make me any kind of counterproposal, I am quite prepared to negotiate anything." I was told no, they were not in a position to make any suggestion whatsoever. That is the kind of debate you will have, Madam Speaker, that is the kind of approach which clearly shows that they are engaged in a filibuster and that they intend to force us to put an end to the debate.

[English]

QUERY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT COMMITMENTS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The minister knows full well that they had to be dragged, kicking and screaming, to an extension of the period of time for the House to consider the first motion. They had to be dragged, kicking and screaming, to television. They breached the undertaking given by the Prime Minister that all hon. members of this House would have a chance to speak, by closure in the first place—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They are breaching that undertaking again. I say to the Prime Minister, and to the government House leader, that there is a breach of the undertaking.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Given this flagrant, absolutely flagrant disregard of the way in which this House should operate, is it now the posture of the government that the government House leader will be just as careless with respect to the facts and to commitments which have been given as the Prime Minister has been, who admitted he spoke to the press with his tongue in cheek, spoke to Margaret Thatcher with tongue in cheek, and has now brought another form of closure before the House of Commons? Is that the way in which this House should operate?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order.

• (1120)

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I fail to understand why my hon. colleague is so upset this morning. It is very difficult for me to understand why he is frustrated when we are attempting to allow all members of this institution to be on the record. I fail to understand why the Tory party does not accept that we allow all of the members to speak until the end of the debate and, if it is not possible for them to speak because members who have already spoken want to speak again, the motion would allow members on all sides to be on the record by tabling a written speech. I fail to understand why they are so upset this morning. In reality I am tempted to believe that they are frustrated because we did not use closure yesterday.

An hon. Member: What do you call it?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please! Would the hon. minister please complete his answer?

Mr. Pinard: That is what they wanted us to do. Failing to understand that, Madam Speaker, all I can say is that what we are trying to do is to suggest a means that would allow this debate, that has lasted for almost six months, to come to an end and allow as many members as possible to participate. I call on the parliamentary spirit of my colleagues on the other side and on their good faith to consider this motion seriously, to look into it, and to sit around the table and negotiate in good faith.

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Parliamentary spirit, indeed, Madam Speaker! The minister does not realize that with respect to this he has just shoved the knife into Parliament in terms of closure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): And we are going to wait four more days to have it twisted! That is what the minister has done. This is the minister in charge of parliamentary reform—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Is it the intention of the minister to seek a pacified Parliament—a Parliament that will degrade now into tabling the speeches? Are we going to have tabled questions and tabled answers? Are we going to have planted questions? Is this the kind of parliamentary forum we are after? Would the minister—

Mr. Shields: That is—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order. Order, please. Has the hon. member finished phrasing his question? He was interrupted by someone else who was speaking quite loudly. I would ask him to finish it now.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I am going to say, Madam Speaker, that this debate has just begun with respect to this gagging of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I ask the minister right now if he will reconsider this, because I am telling him that what he is seeking here is unacceptable to any thoughtful person with respect to Parliament, and it ought to be unacceptable to him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, before drawing the conclusion that the Progressive Conservative Party is rejecting outright the proposal we are making, I would still like to hear the views of the hon. member for Provencher. After all, it has been over five weeks now since we began debating the amendment moved by the member for Provencher, and I would like to have the opportunity to speak to him and ask him why he is letting his amendment stand in the way of amendments which other members might want to move on other important issues. He is not here to reply, but I do hope that early next week we will be able to get together and negotiate. Madam Speaker, he will understand why we on this side want to find ways to enable not only all members to participate in the business of the House, but some of them as well to move amendments other than this one on which the Progressive Conservative Party is stalling and which they are outrageously filibustering.

[English]

POSITION TAKEN BY PROVINCIAL LIBERAL PARTY LEADER IN QUEBEC

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, the fact is that there has been no constraint on any speech in this House of Commons. No member has been called to order. They spoke on the full ambit of every aspect of the debate and every amendment on this particular motion. That is a specious argument that the minister puts forward.

The government came forward with this voluminous proposal just after the government House leader spoke on the question of business of the House in the afternoon. At seven o'clock, conveniently after the Ontario polls closed, the government brought in this double closure proposal. This is the first time in the history of Parliament when the rules have been changed with respect to a single debate. In other words, when the government is losing a debate, as it is in this instance, it changes the rules.

● (1125)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: When the government is losing, it changes the rules.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I must ask hon. members to ask questions instead of debating. There will be time at some point to debate this matter. But right now is the time to ask questions. The hon. member for Saskatoon West.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I apologize, Madam Speaker. I was carried away with the arrogance of the government.

I will ask my question now, and it is for the government House leader. The Prime Minister indicated that the matter of the constitutional debate had to be heard in response to the Quebec referendum. Now the leader of the No forces, the leader of the Quebec Liberal party, Claude Ryan, says he will be calling on the government following the provincial election to reopen discussions. Therefore, why is the government House leader rushing this matter through in direct confrontation with the position taken by the Liberal leader in the province of Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister had an opportunity yesterday to reply to the Leader of the Opposition on that subject. My learned colleague is concerned about the fact that at seven o'clock last night we deemed it appropriate to provide explanations on the notice of motion which appears on this morning's Order Paper. Again I wonder why he is so dead set against changes. Granted, this motion features new proposals. It is not in keeping with tradition, but it is not by any means an affront to the parliamentary spirit. The proposed changes which would affect our proceedings respect the parliamentary spirit in every aspect and they are quite simply intended to allow more members to participate and enable us to dispose of more than a single amendment.

Now then, since my colleague is worried about the procedural form, I can tell him that I gave some explanations on this subject last night precisely because I wanted the public to be well informed. I had absolutely no intention in mind other than making the public aware of a procedure which is quite normal and which respects the parliamentary spirit on all counts.

[English]

PARTICIPATION OF PRIME MINISTER IN DEBATE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, the government House leader will know that Parliament means to parley, that is, to have discussion, not to table documents. If that is his idea of debate, I am very sorry for the future of this Parliament.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Oshawa, indicated during the course of this debate that he would want to have a full and fair debate and not have closure imposed. The House leader for the New Democratic Party has indicated this proposed procedure in effect constitutes closure on this debate. A number of members have not had an opportunity to debate, including the four dissident members of the New Democratic Party. In fact the people of Canada are asking themselves why the person most interested in this whole debate, the Prime Minister, has not spoken in this debate.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Hold your breath.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I ask the government House leader why, in view of the fact that the Prime Minister of this country has not seen fit to participate in this debate, is he proceeding with this double closure? Why does the government House leader not allow the Prime Minister to stand up in his place for a change, so that he can participate in a debate in the House of Commons?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, so far in this debate we have let several government members have their say. Everybody is free to do so, and I fully respect the freedom of the Prime Minister to join the debate whenever it suits him. Of course, in some instances, we want to accommodate certain members so we agree to let them have the floor at one time rather than at another. As for the Prime Minister, I must confess that I am fully aware of his constricting schedule, and I will be pleased to give serious consideration to his request should he want to enter the debate.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INFORMATION ON HEALTH HAZARDS IN CHEMICALS AND PESTICIDES

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In a letter dated February 4, 1981, the minister wrote to the provincial ministers of health, environment and agriculture. The minister said information on faulty and fraudulent tests done by Industrial Biotest Laboratories on many chemicals used in Canada could not be released.

How does the minister expect provincial health and environmental officials to carry out their responsibilities to safeguard the health of Canadians and to safeguard the environment if she refuses to provide technical information critical in determining the safety of products used?

• (1130)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, according to the practices and responsibilities that I have under the act, I have made available, as I always do, to the relevant provincial ministers, including the health ministers and, according to the subject matter under discussion, provincial environmental and agricultural ministers, all the data I can release under the act. I met with some provincial ministers who wanted more technical information which, unfortunately, seemed to conflict with the protection of industrial data which we owe to the producers of some products. I sent my deputy minister and assistant deputy minister to discuss that very question this week. I expect to receive a report from them in the very near future on how we can best accommodate the request of the provinces.

ADDITIVES USED IN TOBACCO INDUSTRY

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. A similar shroud of secrecy covers the tobacco industry. The government is not able to provide the public with information about the additives which cigarette companies put into their cigarettes. Will the minister comment on the position of her department regarding the obvious conflict between public health and the so-called trade secrets of private industry, and how this conflict should be resolved?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, this matter was not brought to my attention. This is the first time I have heard of it. I would have appreciated receiving advance notice from the hon. member. I am therefore unable to comment at this time. I will have to discuss this with my department. I do not know on what problems the hon. member wants me to comment. I will comment later on the subject.

Mr. de Jong: Madam Speaker, my question essentially was with regard to the conflict between trade secrets and the right of the public to know. I was asking the minister the position of her department.

INVESTIGATION OF BIRTH DEFECTS IN BAY OF QUINTE, ONT.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, I have one last question concerning the public's right to know. I understand the minister's department is conducting a very important study in the Bay of Quinte in Ontario because of the high amount of dioxins found in the environment and natural life there. I understand the study is concerned about birth defects. Will the minister assure the House that when that study is completed it will be made public?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I will look into the matter and report to the House. I will judge whether it is appropriate to make it public.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PARTICIPATION OF PRIME MINISTER IN DEBATE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RESOLUTION

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister be contributing in the House to the constitutional debate, or will he be hiding behind his own direction for closure?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I did not know the opposition was so anxious the hear me speak. I will take it under consideration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, not only the opposition but I think all the people of Canada would like to hear what the Prime Minister has to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Shields: The people of Canada and we in the opposition would really like to hear what the Prime Minister has to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Shields: It would expose him for what he really is. When may we expect the Prime Minister to speak?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, this debate has sometimes been termed, I believe not euphemistically, by the opposition as "Trudeau's project", "Trudeau's pet peeve," "Trudeau's private project", and so on. I thought I would give all members of this House time to express their views and not identify myself with the resolution. However, if the opposition insists on hearing my point of view, I repeat that I will take it under very serious consideration.

HEALTH CARE

PROVISION OF SERVICES TO CREE INDIAN PEOPLE OF JAMES BAY

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Several weeks ago I rose in the House to ask her about the deplorable situation of the James Bay Cree, the health situation there, and the fact that ten small children died last summer due to gastroenteritis. Last week in Mistassini a village of some 2,000 people, a medical doctor discovered ten active cases of tuberculosis and said there are probably a lot more. In response to this, the minister has decided to suspend all health services to the Cree at the end of this month. Can she explain this action to the House?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, every fact and figure quoted by the hon. member in his question is wrong and untrue. I want to make that very clear. This is not a question that can be taken lightly. We are talking of the health and life of human beings. I would like the hon. member to be very serious and check his facts before talking about such a serious dossier.

The agreement with the James Bay Cree includes the transfer of federal health facilities and care to the Cree according to a calendar worked out with them which, by law, I must respect. According to that calendar, some transfers will be made in accordance with the continuity of the movement. They will take place before March 31. That is according to the agreement made by the Cree and I would like the hon. member to understand that. As to the health of the Cree, wherever we have the slightest responsibility, we fulfil it completely. I monitor that situation weekly.

Mr. Greenaway: Madam Speaker, I got these facts from the grand chief of the Cree, Billy Diamond. He will be here to appear next week before the standing committee. I will bring him to the minister's office to give her these facts. I remind the minister that these people are Canadians. I wonder what she would do if, in her riding, ten small children had died last summer and there were ten active cases of t.b. found. Is there a double standard for the people of this country?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I repeat that ten small children did not die last summer, as the hon. member indicated. That is completely untrue. I would like that made very clear in this House. Second, I would like hon. members to understand the difference between real health problems and situations that we are addressing in which I asked the minister in the province of Quebec, Dr. Denis Lazure, to do his job as well to ensure that everything is all right in terms of health for the Cree Indian. The legal fight which is going on does not have anything to do with health directly per se. By law I must transfer three communities, Great Whale, Waswanipi and Mistassini, by the end of this month. This will be done.

The lawyers for the Cree took out an injunction which was rejected. I can no longer comment on the legal procedures going on in which the federal government is playing a role. However, if the hon. member studies the case and talks with the chief, he will find that their main problem is with the government of Quebec.

ENERGY

ENVIRONMENTAL BAN ON WEST COAST EXPLORATION BY OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday the minister indicated that Petro-Canada will be spending tens of millions of dollars on offshore oil and gas exploration off the coast of British Columbia. That was further supplemented by statements yesterday by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The minister also indicated that a decision to lift the environmental moratorium on the B.C. coast will be made in the next couple of months. Will he give this House a date regarding the lifting of the moratorium?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member was in committee yesterday. I took great pains to explain to him that I knew of no plans of Petro-Canada to spend tens of millions of dollars, that if Petro-Canada had any plans to explore offshore British Columbia in the foreseeable future, they would be minimal. I knew of no such plans yesterday and I know of none today. I indicated to the hon. member in committee that I would have to reach a decision in the next few months as to whether we would lift the current ban on offshore exploration.

I also indicated that until now plans are only in the nature of seismic exploration in that area. There are several months to go. I cannot give a date when the government will reach a conclusion in that regard.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

CALLING OF WITNESSES BEFORE COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the Prime Minister. However, I would refer the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to yesterday's minutes of the Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

On January 12, 1981, the Deputy Prime Minister said with regard to the Canada lands legislation:

> Before the House today is the oil and gas energy legislation, which will go to committee where hon. members opposite may call all the witnesses they desire—

Is that still the position of the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not know what position is being discussed between the Deputy Prime Minister, the House leader, and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

LAW OF THE SEA

UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE—QUERY RESPECTING ANTICIPATED RESULT

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question is for the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Since the new American administration has asked for a complete review of the treaty proposal submitted at the United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, can the hon. Minister tell this House whether he is confident in the success of the negotiations at this United Nations session on the Law of the Sea?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we have noted the staff changes maybe by the United States government as well as its position reversal. In view of the situation, we cannot be too confident and we shall have to wait for the results.

PENSIONS

INQUIRY RESPECTING LEGISLATION TO IMPLEMENT AGREEMENT WITH WEST GERMANY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): My question is for the Minister of State for Finance and it follows up on a question I have asked a couple of times, the last time June 3, 1980, when he responded to my question on the reciprocal arrangement with respect to double taxation of pensions which discriminates against citizens who have earned certain pension rights in other countries.

He said that the agreements had been signed and a bill would be introduced in the House almost immediately. Sufficient time has now expired. Will the minister advise me today as to his intentions regarding this matter, particularly concerning citizens who have earned pension rights with the Federal Republic of West Germany, as this agreement is ready to go and requires government action?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is associating two different things, on the one hand the agreements on double taxation, and on the other hand the agreements concerning pension funds. The first item comes directly under the responsibility of the Department of Finance, while the second comes within the jurisdiction of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

As for the question of double taxation, the hon. member is well aware that these negotiations are ongoing. He also knows that this Parliament has succeeded in approving about 15 taxation agreements. I would also like to remind him that another bill concerning two double taxation agreements is now under consideration in the Senate. The negotiations with the Federal Republic of Germany are not yet completed, and I hope that when another group of bills is introduced to ratify double taxation agreements they will include the agreement with the Federal Republic of Germany.

[English]

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, it is known that the people dragging their feet with respect to this agreement are in the Department of Finance. I would ask, first of all, what is the difficulty with the West German agreement and when will he be ready to sign the agreement and place before the House the necessary bill for ratification, having regard to the fact that last June he figured it would be almost immediately and now he is more vague on this problem?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that, as to foot dragging, he should consult some of his colleagues who, as I was able to see for myself during consideration of the bill to ratify double taxation agreements with about 15 countries, proved to be champions when it comes to foot dragging and who, unfortunately, allowed this bill to remain in the committee for weeks and weeks, which meant that the officials responsible for negotiating these treaties were busy replying to the same questions day after day. Unfortunately the members in question understood nothing about such treaties. This is one of the reasons why the negotiations have dragged on.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO CUT RED TAPE

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. As he has been indicating for some time that he intends to introduce legislation cutting government regulations and red tape, which is vitally necessary for the improved health of the Canadian economy, when may we expect to see the introduction of such legislation which is now long overdue?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the question of de-regulation and regulatory reform is not only a matter of introducing the bill. I indicated earlier to the House that we would be preparing an omnibus bill to clean up existing legislation by removing obsolete provisions and statutes, basically cleaning up matters which are non-controversial and which should have been dealt with over a period of years. That bill is being prepared.

With respect to actual regulatory reform per se, we have introduced work programs across government, and I think it was several months ago I made a report to this House on the status of that program which is moving ahead across government. I can assure the hon. member that the commitment to regulatory reform is very firm indeed. We are also, of course, awaiting the final report of the Economic Council on economic reform, which I understand should be ready sometime this spring.

Mr. Hees: Madam Speaker, would the minister be good enough to give the House some sort of rough timetable so that business will know when to expect this matter to be cleared up and it may operate more effectively as a result?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I am not sure what the hon. member means by "cleared up", because this is an ongoing process. What we are essentially trying to do is improve the regulatory process. We have looked very carefully at the Peterson report—the hon. member will recall the special committee of this House—and we have moved ahead and accepted the majority of those recommendations. I think we are moving on all fronts with respect to specific legislation which will, as I said, clean up the existing situation in the form of an omnibus bill. To do that, an inventory has to be made of obsolete statutes and provisions of law, which is currently under way.

GRAIN

RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING RAPESEED ACREAGE

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board this week. Not too long ago that minister made his annual statement which did not include the initial price for grain next year, but did contain a suggestion as to the amount of acreage that farmers should plant, and specifically suggested they plant the same amount of rapeseed as last year. Sales of rapeseed are very slow, there is a large amount in the pipeline and on the farm, and there are transportation problems which the transportation agency is unable to handle. In those circumstances could the minister, or whoever speaks for him, justify why this recommendation was made?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): I have a hard time relating "recommendation" to the three or four items mentioned. But Senator Argue gave an explanation the other day of why he did not give an indication of initial prices in his pre-seeding announcement. This is all recorded in the Senate Hansard. At the same time he indicated, as the member intimates, that world grain prices were good, that he was looking forward to an increase of 10 per cent for wheat and barley, and so forth. He explained that the reason why he did not give the initial prices at this time was that last year he was accused of giving them too early, so this year he wanted to avoid the same accusation.

• (1150)

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INITIAL PRICES

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): That was not the question I asked, Madam Speaker, I asked why it was suggested that the planting level of the rapeseed this year was the same as last year. However, I appreciate the minister's answer. Following on it, as a supplementary question on the price of grain, I should like to ask the minister this. Since the senator did not state the initial price next year, most farmers are assuming that it will be the same as this year. My question is whether farmers can proceed with their planning for next year on that basis?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): That is exactly what I tried to answer. I said the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board did not give the initial prices. He said, however, that he expected the prices to be strong, to remain as they are now, which is an indication of his views on prices. Then, in two particular instances he said he was looking forward to an increase of 10 per cent in production. So obviously this is debatable but the minister gave a clear indication that he expects the situation to remain very solid indeed.

CHANGE IN POLICY ON TIMING OF ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport related to his reply to the first question of the hon. member for Prince Albert when he said the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board has been accused of making his announcement last year too soon. That was not the accusation. The accusation was that he made an inaccurate assumption. I should like to put the following question to the minister. In view of the statement, made in the House in 1971 by the minister's predecessor, Otto Lang, that he would announce the initial payments for the coming crop year so as to give the maximum amount of information to producers prior to seeding time, a practice which was carried out by the hon. member for Vegreville when he held that portfolio, why is there a change now in government policy?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am trying to indicate that this is a debatable point. The senator said that last year he had been accused of having made the announcement too early, and that is why it was inaccurate. So this year he wants to be accurate by announcing it later than he did last year.

HEALTH CARE

EXTRA BILLING BY DOCTORS—CO-OPERATION OF ONTARIO IN BANNING PRACTICE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of her indication that she wants to end extra billing under medicare, which costs Ontario residents $43 million a year, and in view of the strategic importance of Ontario in the whole national medicare program, can the minister say if she has any indication that the government of Ontario will be willing to co-operate in restoring medicare to its original concept of universality without any extra billing?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, in reaching a consensus across the country to ban extra billing under medicare, I think that Ontario, because of the size of its population, could take a positive lead, which I hope will happen. However, we have to wait for the appointment of the new Ontario cabinet. It is also a fact that, with its majority, the government of Ontario could do much to bring back integrity to medicare which is a very good program. They know now that the Ontario doctors have started opting back into the program, and I hope that will encourage them to ban extra billing.

AGRICULTURE

CANADIAN EGG MARKETING AGENCY—CONTROL OF SURPLUS PRODUCTION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture, if I may get his attention. The Canadian Egg Marketing Agency is experiencing the largest build-up of surplus eggs since CEMA was formed in 1972. The surplus is building up at a rate of between 80,000 and 100,000 boxes of 15 dozen eggs a week. Since the formation of CEMA back in 1972, there has never been a prolonged time when supply and demand has been in balance. I should like to ask the minister whether CEMA is contemplating any changes to ensure that the boom and bust cycles which have been characteristic of CEMA's operations over the past number of years will not keep occurring.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I disagree with the hon. member's statement about boom and bust cycles because there has hardly been another product that has had more stable prices, either for the consumer or for the producer, than eggs or any of the poultry products that are under marketing boards.

I met with the new chairman of CEMA yesterday, who is also a farmer, and with the new manager of CEMA whom they have hired, and they told me they have control of the surplus products and they will have control of production. They have made up their mind that at no time will we be importing eggs, such as was done, for instance, at Christmas time when we need more eggs for baking. Just as soon as Canagrex becomes law, we will be exporting eggs to many, many countries which, for instance, pay double the price we do in Canada. We believe there is a market there, and to supply it we feel farmers can actually increase production.

The hon. member knows that we have become so efficient that the hens are laying, on the average, 30 eggs more a year than they did before; they are living longer and laying more.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murta: I do not know what the Minister of Agriculture means when he says, "we have become so efficient."

The deputy minister of agriculture has indicated that CEMA is making mistakes by rushing into short-term deals "hatched in a hurry", he said, when surpluses are building to perilous levels. He said that one of the mistakes that was made was the recent shipment of eggs to Saudi Arabia with which some problems arose. Since this is a substantial surplus, I should like to ask the minister whether he can assure the House that there will not be any rotten eggs similar to what happened back in 1974 when CEMA had to deal with a surplus. Would he answer the question I asked in the first instance, that is, whether any changes are being contemplated to try to alleviate this kind of swing in egg marketing in Canada.

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that the National Farm Products Marketing Council, under the chairmanship of Mrs. Menzies, reports to me about once a week on what is going on in egg marketing in Canada.

There are representatives on that council from the farming sector, the consumers' sector, and the processing sector, and they make recommendations. They are concerned, as we are, about the production. Consumption is fairly stable but there is a slight overproduction. However, they have also assured me that there would be no waste of the commodity, that the commodity is being sold on world markets. But—and I want to make this clear—it is being funded by the producers who are levied 1.5 cents to put this product on world markets where it can be sold at present, where it will be some good for people in need of this high protein, nutritious product, one of the world's cheapest forms of protein.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

TIMING OF MOTION RESPECTING CONSIDERATION AND PASSAGE OF CONSTITUTIONAL RESOLUTION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that this Rube Goldberg closure device which has been put before Parliament is designed to cut off debate in the House of Commons just days before the Quebec election, does the Prime Minister not feel that he has an obligation to the people of Quebec to allow them to cast their votes first, particularly in light of the fact that Claude Ryan, leader of the No forces, has stated that, if elected premier, his very first act in office would be to call upon the Prime Minister to reopen negotiations on this very resolution?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I want to remind the hon. member that the purpose of the motion is essentially, as the House leader said, to permit the House to debate other things. It is surely obvious, even to the hon. member, that the House has been debating one amendment for the past five weeks. We know there are other members who want to move amendments to improve the resolution before the House. It does not seem unreasonable to suggest to members of the party opposite that they vote on their own amendment so that we can get on to other ways of improving the debate.

● (1200)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Tell us about Claude Ryan.

Mr. Beatty: Of course, Madam Speaker, that is not what this resolution does; the Prime Minister knows that full well. He chose not to answer my question about Mr. Ryan.

CHANGE IN RULES OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the government House leader. When was the last time in which the government introduced a special change to the rules of Parliament for one debate in order to cut the discussion short?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the procedure to allocate time periods for different debates is normal. We meet regularly at the House leaders' level, we come to an agreement on various pieces of legislation, various measures and, as a rule, I am happy to say this works well.

But in this case, as I mentioned earlier, from the start of the constitutional debate on October 6, 1980, it was clear the Progressive Conservative Party would never give in on anything nor come to an agreement on the debate to allow a greater number of members to be heard, shorter speeches, and a greater number of hours allotted.

Therefore, this procedure is not new. We should not oppose changes. The changes admittedly are innovative, but they are constructive and this institution can use them to become more efficient, more relevant and better respected by the Canadian public.

MARKET ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport who answers in this House for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board in the other place. The minister is probably aware that for the last several weeks members of the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee have been holding meetings throughout the prairies, flogging the so-called market assistance program which involves some fairly radical changes as far as grain handling and sales are concerned. Could the minister tell us whether or not it is the intention of the government to bring in legislation to cover MAP, or will it all be done under the regulations of the Canadian Wheat Board Act?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, my understanding of the subject of the market assistance program is that it is a discussion which is now being carried on in western Canada under the auspices of the Canadian Wheat Board. Following the consultation, a report will be made by the Wheat Board to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, and action will be decided then. I think it must be seen in the context of being consultation with interested parties.

Mr. Neil: Madam Speaker, the announcement indicates that the program will be put into effect for the 1981-82 crop year, so there is not very much time. It is very serious and quite a change in the marketing and handling of grain.

Is it the intention of the minister to bring the program before members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture so that they can discuss the program with him, and invite representatives of the farming community to consider the program before it is put into place?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I will have a discussion with my colleague in charge of that particular subject, and I will report accordingly. As far as I am involved in this matter, for the moment it is a consultative process and the decisions have not been made. It should be seen in that light.

Point of Order—Mr. W. Baker

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—S.O. 43 MOTION OF MR. McKNIGHT

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, with respect to a matter which occurred earlier, the government House leader indicated that his proposed reforms to rules of the House brought in by closure in 1969 were innovative and constructive. I just want him to know that anyone who is an observer of this place would not describe them as anything but sleazy and destructive of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He should know that. I am now coming to my point of order.

Madam Speaker: I do not feel this is a point of order. Is the hon. member seeking the floor on another point of order?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, that comment was just by way of preamble to a very serious matter.

My point of order concerns the motion made under the provisions of Standing Order 43 by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) and what occurred thereafter. I want Madam Speaker to understand that I cannot question and I am not questioning—

[Editor's note: At this point there was a disturbance in the public gallery.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am not questioning Your Honour's ruling because I cannot, but I rise to clarify a matter which arose earlier. As long as any one of us can remember, the practice of the House has been that when a motion is made to introduce a bill, when a party introduces a motion on an allotted day, or when the government moves a motion to have a bill approved on second reading, the mover of the motion is allowed to speak first.

Perhaps that is a custom, and if so, I say with respect that we ought not to depart from it. This practice may well be found in the Standing Orders. But I raise this matter because I am concerned. If a member of the New Democratic Party, for example the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), moved a motion in his name on an allotted day, and suddenly Your Honour recognized either a member of the government or a member of the official opposition as the first speaker, there would be no one to explain the motion.

I have not had an opportunity to look at the rules—Your Honour may have—but I wonder if there could be some clarification. I do not think there would be any objection to observing this custom, if it is only a custom.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I think my colleague should look up the rules. They are quite clear. I see you are ready to refer to it but the Chair recognizes the first member to rise. Allow me to point out that this is not a precedent. Not so long ago, when a member from this side proposed a motion under Standing Order 43, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) was given the floor while we were waiting to be recognized. Unfortunately, your attention was caught more quickly by the Leader of the Opposition. And today it is the opposite. There has been a precedent. There is nothing improper in all of this. As regards the preamble made by my colleague, out of respect for this institution I will refrain from commenting on it.

[English]

Madam Speaker: I remind the hon. member of the following rule which he knows very well:

When two or more members rise to speak, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who first rose in his place;—

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) attracted my attention first. I said that quite definitely before I checked on the ruling as to whether the member had priority if another member had risen to speak before that member.

It is a rule—it is not a custom—that the first member who rises on a motion under Standing Order 43 is allowed to speak. I remind the hon. member of a precedent during my time in the chair which I remember very well; a motion was moved under Standing Order 43 on the government side and the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) debated it. I saw him first and I gave him the floor.

I should like to read the rest of Standing Order 29:

—but a motion may be made that any member who has risen "be now heard", or "do now speak", which motion shall be forthwith put without debate.

Hon. members on my left did not afford themselves of that prerogative which was open to them; therefore, I gave the minister the floor. I think I did it in accordance with the rules and even in accordance with the customs and traditions of the House.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE FUND

Question No. 1,843—Mr. Blenkarn:

1. In (a) 1977 (b) 1978 (c) 1979, what amount was contributed to the Consolidated Revenue Fund by public servants through deductions from their wages at the source for their pension fund?

2. For the same years, what was the total amount paid from the fund to retired public servants?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): 1. In the fiscal years 1976-77, 1977-78, 1978-79 and 1979-80, the following amounts were contributed to the Public Service Superannuation Account and to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account by public servants and employees of Crown corporations subject to the public service pension plan.

	Public Service Superannuation Account	Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account
1976-77	$247.5 million	$26.7 million
1977-78	$285.2 million	$49.2 million
1978-79	$296.1 million	$51.0 million
1979-80	$314.9 million	$55.7 million

2. (a) In the same fiscal years the amounts paid to retired public servants or their surviving dependents who were entitled to annuities were as follows:

	Public Service Superannuation Account	Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account and Indexation Payments Charged directly to the Consolidated Revenue Fund

(b) In the same fiscal years, the total amounts* paid to former public servants or their surviving dependents were as follows:

	Public Service Superannuation Account	Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account and Indexation Payments Charged directly to the Consolidated Revenue Fund
1976-77	$280.4 million	$ 91.4 million
1977-78	$287.3 million	$116.3 million
1978-79	$344.2 million	$145.3 million
1979-80	$422.8 million	$187.0 million

* The total payments listed in 2(b) include amounts paid by way of both annuities and lump sum payments such as cash termination allowances, residual amounts, returns of contributions and transfers to other pension funds, whereas the payments listed in 2(a) reflect annuity expenditures only.

REPRESENTATIONS ON BEHALF OF CANADIAN REGISTERED SHIPS

Question No. 1,862—Mr. Forrestall:

1. (a) In each of the past five years, how many representations were made by the Export Development Corporation, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce or any other department or agency, to secure for Canadian registered ships, all or a portion of the cargo to be moved specifically, coal, grain, lumber, northern ore concentrate and with respect to importations, oil, bauxite and liner conference cargoes (b) what were the results of such representations?

2. Will the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce undertake a study to determine the net cost to Canadians for imports and exports, which Canada's dependency on foreign registered shipping has contributed towards, particularly in 1970 and 1975, as well as the best estimate for the current year and, if not, for what reason?

3. Will the government ascertain the tonnage by commodities, and the cost in dollars, of Canadian exports and imports through U.S. ports, as a result of Canada's dependency on foreign registered shipping?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Transport as follows: 1. (a) The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce advises that assistance is provided to Canadian-incorporated and based shipping companies without specifically requiring that companies utilize only Canadian registered vessels. Quite apart from referrals and the provision of market information, Industry, Trade and Commerce makes representations specifically at the request of, and in collaboration with, Canadian shipping companies and shippers. Requests for representations on behalf of Canadian registered ships exclusively are summarized:

	Commodity	Year	Requests for Government Representation	Representations Made
(i)	Grain, lumber, bauxite	1975-80	Nil	Nil
(ii)	Coal	1979	1	1
(iii)	Oil	1980	2	2
(iv)	Northern ore concentrate	1979	2	2
(v)	Liner conference cargo	1979	2	2
		1980	4	4

(b) The results of representations are:

(ii) Coal—coal sale did not materialize, consequently no opportunity for Canadian ships.

(iii) Oil—remains under commercial discussion and investigation with some prospect for participation by Canadian registered ship.

(iv) Northern ore concentrate: participation by Canadian registered ship.

(v) Liner conference cargo (1979): participation by Canadian registered ship.

Liner conference cargo (1980): in one instance participation by Canadian registered ship scheduled for early 1981; other three instances remain under commercial discussion and investigation with some prospect for participation by Canadian registered ship.

2. A study will be included in IT&C work program to estimate the net cost of using foreign registered shipping.

3. The routing of Canadian trade through U.S. ports and the converse routing of U.S. trade through Canadian ports result primarily from commercial and competitive forces other than dependency on foreign registered shipping. Some statistics are presently collected and made publicly available by Statistics Canada (Exports: Merchandise Trade 1979, Tables 9 and 10 Catalogue No. 65-202), and Revenue Canada through the Canadian ports and traffic development committee ("Trans-border Container Movements"). The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce will approach the agencies producing these statistics to explore the possibilities for expanded and refined data concerning Canadian trade through the United States.

USE OF PRIVATE RAILWAY CAR

Question No. 2,047—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is there a discrepancy in the answer to question No. 1,963 that the Minister of State for Science and Technology did not use a government-owned private railway car on or about September 2 or 3, 1980, and the information received in writing in the office of the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville in January, 1981, as follows: "Car no. 43. Roberts. September 2, 3. I have to inquire about where the trip went and will let you know." and, if so, what is the explanation for the discrepancy?

2. If the Minister of State for Science and Technology did not use the railway car, what minister did make use of the car and (a) on what dates in question (b) for what purpose (c) what were the names of all persons on board at any time (d) what was the point of departure and the point of termination of the car?

3. If the answer to question No. 1,963 is an error, will the Minister of Transport give a correct answer?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes. The Minister of State for Science and Technology advises that he had made tentative plans to use a government railway car during the period of August 30 to September 2 or 3, 1980, but decided not to make use of the car.

2. No other minister made use of the government railway cars on or about that period of time.

3. Not applicable.

FITNESS ASSESSMENT

Question No. 2,078—Mr. Blenkarn:

1. Are Canadians in western Canada considered to be more fit than Canadians residing in eastern Canada and, if so, is it the government's intention to do a study to find out the reasons?

2. What is the (a) anticipated cost (b) importance of the study?

3. In what way does the government propose to influence the fitness of Canadians in eastern Canada, if necessary, as a result of the findings?

4. How many persons will be employed under the study?

5. To the knowledge of the government, what are the political party affiliations of the persons that will be involved in the study?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): 1. A study of the lifestyle and fitness habits among Canadian workers undertaken in 1977 by the Canadian Public Health Association, at the request of Fitness and Amateur Sport indicated that statistically, western Canadians could be considered more fit than their eastern counterparts. These small statistical differences, however, have little practical significance and the government will not be investigating these differences in any special studies.

2. At the present time, Fitness and Amateur Sport is sponsoring a general Canada fitness survey from its share of Provincial Lottery revenues. The anticipated cost is $2.9 million over three years. Because the Canada fitness survey is an in-depth study of the fitness levels and recreational patterns of Canadians, it will provide a benchmark on the fitness status of Canadians, including their interests, preferences and participation in recreational activities. The information obtained from the survey will help governments, professional associations, voluntary agencies and leisure-related companies to evaluate existing programs and to better plan for future activities and facilities to ensure that future needs of Canadians are met.

3. Until the results of the Canada fitness survey for 1981 are available for analysis, it is premature to suggest any strategies which the Government of Canada will implement as a result of the findings. Preliminary results are expected by April, 1982.

4. One hundred and seventy-five persons have been employed with the Canada fitness survey. Except for national office staff (five), the term for 170 employees expires in July, 1981.

5. Political party affiliation was not a criterion in the hiring of individuals involved in this survey. Advertisements were placed with all major newspapers in each test centre and individuals hired after interviews were conducted.

Mr. Collenette: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, as you may recall, I have risen in my place two or three times with respect to question No. 1,851. I see that in Hansard for March 19, 1981, it is marked: "DND—Expenditure Differential on New Fighter Aircraft, question No. 1,851 (Revised)".

The question is not revised at all, Madam Speaker. The answer has been revised—and high time it was. I hope that the Department of National Defence will not eventually have to pass these things through for me to check out the answers to my own questions before they misprint them in Hansard. I hope there will be a future duplication of this question put on the order paper showing the answer has been revised and not the question.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, it is the custom of this House that when a correction is made to an answer already given, the reply is given in the House by the parliamentary secretary to the House leader stating the number of the question and using the word "revised". This in no way differs from any previous practice of this House. I am not sure the hon. member's point is well taken. Everyone knows that the question has not changed, that he was seeking a correction to the answer, which was done in conformity with the rules and procedures of this House.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1981-82

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-59, an act to provide supplementary borrowing authority, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved:

That Bill C-59, an act to provide supplementary borrowing authority, be amended in clause 2

(a) by striking out line 18 at page 1 and substituting therefor:

"eight billion dollars, as may be required"

(b) by striking out lines 25 to 27 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"expire on March 31, 1982."

He said: Madam Speaker, my motion before the House today with respect to Bill C-59 really involves two amendments. I had only intended to introduce one amendment, which was the second one, in connection with removing the government's right to extend borrowing into the next calendar year, that is, the year commencing March 31, 1982, and the amount that it might require under its budget as borrowing authority for the next fiscal year, that is, the year commencing in March next.

Since Bill C-59 was first introduced into this House two or three things have happened. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, the debate with respect to the bill was terminated by closure. I want to outline to the House why we in this party are not prepared to go for $14 billion in further borrowing. Nor are we prepared to allow the government the opportunity to carry $3 billion worth of the borrowing authority over into another fiscal year.

The debt management of this government is probably the most inept, incompetent and unconscionably stupid of any debt management program of any government for some very considerable period of time. Only last Friday the government, in desperation, increased the interest on Canada Savings Bonds from 11.5 per cent to 13.75 per cent to stem the tide of redemptions of those bonds. At that time the government should have known that interest rates were likely to fall off. The government could observe what was happening in the American market. Indeed, on Tuesday of last week the government had foreseen that interest rates were falling off and it was able to place a half billion dollar bond issue on the public market at 13.25 per cent.

Suddenly last Friday we saw a government, desperate, worried, upset and sick, increase the interest rate on Canada Savings Bonds from 11.5 per cent to 13.75 per cent to prevent further redemptions. On Tuesday last the government had no problem marketing a half billion dollars worth of bonds at 13.25 per cent. On Thursday, when the government sold its treasury bills, it did so at a 50 basis points reduction. Clearly, if it had worked a little harder it might have even brought the interest rate on its debt down further. What we have seen is a government incompetent, inept and unable—demonstrably unable—to manage the public debt. If there was ever a reason for limiting the government's borrowing authority, then it is its inept performance.

The House will recall that early in January we suggested to the government that it raise the interest rate on Canada Savings Bonds to 12.5 per cent from 11.5 per cent. At that time we knew, and the government ought to have known, that it would be subject to massive redemptions of these bonds if something was not done. So what did the government do? Nothing. Since January 1 approximately $1.5 billion worth of Canada Savings Bonds were redeemed because the government chose to offer the savers of the country 11.5 per cent on their money. The government took a loss of $1.5 billion of money borrowed from the treasury which had cost a great deal to place. It cost more to place Canada Savings Bonds than any other form of borrowing.

The government watched the drain on its Canada Savings Bonds continue week after week. Finally, last Friday, in absolute desperation and shaking in their boots, the government increased the rate to 13.75 per cent. By Tuesday of this week the bond rate was 13.25 per cent. By Thursday interest rates had dropped on treasury bills even further. As a result, what has the government done? It has lost all sorts of investment in Canada by the small savers. They were not treated fairly. It is not hard to understand how frustrated anyone looking at the management of money must feel in view of the inept and incompetent debt efforts of this government.

In the committee we got into the question of the management of debt money. No less than the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) appeared before the committee. In talking about the government's total ineptness it would be improper of me if I did not read into the record an exchange between myself and the minister. I asked the minister:

MR. BLENKARN: How much new borrowing do you intend to place in March before your borrowing authority expires as of the end of the month?

MR. MACEACHEN: We have not determined any borrowing yet.

MR. BLENKARN: Mr. Minister, are you seriously telling me that on March 3 you do not know how much you are likely to want to borrow, or are going to borrow or intend to borrow by March 31?

MR. MACEACHEN: That has not been determined yet, Mr. Blenkarn.

● (1220)

I asked the minister when he determines it. I asked him if he determines it over coffee in the morning. He jokingly said, "Well, it is not champagne at night." I asked him one more question:

I am just wondering where the fiscal end of this country is going. You have requirements in your budget for money, you have some borrowing authority here, and you cannot tell me what you are going to borrow this month.

The minister replied:

No, we cannot tell you that today, how much and when. But do not feel that somehow things are not being attended to, because these proposals are made and approved quite quickly, very quickly.

The decisions of this government with respect to borrowing and the interest rate to be paid are made very quickly. I settle for coffee for breakfast. The minister denied that. He said it was not even over champagne. It was probably over martinis at lunch.

Here we have a government coming to us to get a blank cheque, the right to borrow $14 billion—fourteen thousand million dollars. This is more money than this government even contemplated spending in 1969 or 1970 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was made leader of the Liberal Party. The government wants a blank cheque. When it was asked on March 3 what borrowing it was going to place on the public markets or elsewhere during the month of March, it did not know. The minister could have said to me, "I am sorry, I am not going to expose that intimate financial knowledge to you; it might affect the markets." But he did not say that; he did not offer that as an excuse. The fact of the matter is that the minister was being very honest with me. He did not know; he had no idea. Yet this minister asks this House to approve the borrowing of $14 billion.

The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) filed the report of the Bank of Canada earlier this week. Page 12 of that report reads:

From the point of view of dealing with inflation, this was an uncomfortably large deficit for the Government of Canada to have at a time when the level of economic activity relative to the economy's demonstrated capacity was as high as it then was. I am pleased that in the last budget the government recognized the need to reduce its over-all deficit in the years ahead.

We all remember the minister saying that he was going to reduce the over-all deficit in the years ahead, yet in this current fiscal year we have had supplemental estimates (A), (B) and (C). The spending estimates of the government were shot all to the devil; they did not mean a thing. It kept coming to the House for more and more money. Its final levy against the people of Canada for this current fiscal year will probably be rammed through on March 23 next. So where are we? Pious statements made by the minister to the Canadian Club and to this House will reduce the deficit and control expenditures?

It was very good that the government produced an outline of the new spending, its government expenditure plan, Part I. I looked at it and thought it was a sales program rather than a realistic outline of expenditures. I looked at some of the estimates of the government which it says will restrain expenditures. Look at what it did to the CBC, which had an estimate of $577.5 million for this fiscal year; and for next fiscal year it increases to $649.4 million, an increase of only $71.9 million. Probably this will finance CBC 2, despite the fact that Members of Parliament appeared before the CRTC to try to prevent that further expansion of government service. We can look at one department after another. Employment and immigration estimates are up $259 million. We can look at the increased spending on public archives and national museums, and all these very wonderful things, film development and the rest, which will restrain expenditures! I do not know what restraints are all about.

Last week the President of the United States spoke in this chamber and outlined a course of action he was going to take in his country. The President talked about a possible $80 billion deficit in a country ten times more profitable, on any economic base, than our country. He said that it was impossible for the American people to live with this situation any longer and he was going to slice expenses. Today the President has programs before his Congress which will slash expenses by cutting back on programs which are no longer important or absolutely necessary.

What does this government do? The minister mouths fine words, but he only gives us blue books and many spending estimates, with one supplemental after another, which demand more and more money. Eighty per cent of people surveyed by public opinion polls have described inflation as their number one problem. This week Statistics Canada says the new inflation level is 12.2 per cent, which is the highest level in years. It is much higher than it was when this government introduced wage and price controls. However, there is no effort being made by this government to come to grips with inflation. The Bank of Canada in its monetary policy, has legitimately tried to keep the growth of money supply down.

An hon. Member: Sabotaged by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Blenkarn: My friend says sabotaged by the Minister of Finance. It has been more than sabotaged by the Minister of Finance; it has been destroyed by the Minister of Finance. We must know where we are going in Canada, and this government must get onside and do something to restrain its growth and cut back on some services and give-away programs. This must be done, whether the government likes it or not.

We may want to increase our foreign aid commitments; and that may be desirable. However, if you told Canadians that they could borrow money at 13 per cent, 14 per cent or 16 per cent, but future generations of Canadians would be saddled with the interest costs of carrying that gift, I suggest that Canadians would say, as the Americans are saying, that we should get our House in order. When we have our House in order we will be able to help the Third World and people who are less well off than we are. But if our money has lost purchasing value, if our economy is shaky because of massive inflation and if we are to suffer the unsettling effect of inflation, then we will not help anyone, least of all ourselves.

● (1230)

The government brought down a budget on October 28 last year but, Mr. Speaker, I could not call it anything but a fairy tale budget. That is what it was.

Mr. Evans: A fairy tale budget?

Mr. Blenkarn: The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) says it was not a fairy tale. It calculated that the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar against the U.S. dollar this year would be 87 cents but it has been 82 cents, 83 cents and is now 84 cents. Perhaps it will reach 87 cents toward the end of the year and perhaps not. The budget forecast that the inflation rate would reach 10.2 per cent but at present it stands at 12.2 per cent. The budget forecast that interest costs would remain approximately the same, even though the Department of Finance should have known that they were escalating. It was a fairy tale budget. It projected the increase in petroleum products at about 20 per cent, but the increase in the price of fuel oil alone has already reached 36 per cent for the year. It was a fairy tale budget—a budget of Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs. I do not know who the dwarfs are over there but they are not competent, capable dwarfs and they are certainly not large in the mind. They are great at spinning yarns, however, and this budget was a yarn, not a budget. It was an effort to grab oil revenues and we know that.

Now let us look at what has happened since October 28. Mr. Speaker, the budget has been panned by every economic agency in Canada, from the Economic Council of Canada, which is the creation of this government, the Hudson Institute, the C. D. Howe Institute, the Ontario Economic Council, every major bank, the Canadian Association of Independent Businessmen, to the little fellows and the big fellows such as the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. We could understand if it had only been panned by the oil companies lobby, but when everybody panned it, that was an indication that the projections were incompetent and wrong.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) speaks about going to Alberta—or maybe it is Winnipeg—for a new round of talks to see if he can do something with this pancake. It is not working and it will not work. It is no good and yet we are being asked to give the government the authority to borrow money to put the budget through. The budget is not right and it has never been right. The requirements set out in it are not right; the spending suggestions are not right; the inflation figures are not right; the interest figures are not right; the exchange figures are not right. There is nothing right about it.

The matter can only be handled properly if Parliament acts responsibly. Parliament is the place where the government, the Crown, must come to apply for the right to levy taxes and to borrow money. The one control that this Parliament has over the incompetence and ineptitude of this government is its control over the right of the Crown to borrow money. The amount of that borrowing must be restrained.

I am not totally against borrowing, Mr. Speaker. If the purpose were to establish solid, new capital acquisitions, that would be one thing; if the object were to issue a debenture in order to build a pipeline, to build more rail track or to enclose harbours, that would be all right; if the purpose were to issue a debenture in order to build better bridges, that would be an intelligent suggestion; if the purpose were to improve the environment by building new sewage plants and so on, that would be pretty important. Anything done to improve the economy of the country would be important. But to borrow in order to pay interest—in effect, to pay off the Chargex card expenditure of last year, which is what we are doing—is not good enough.

One has only to compare the budgetary figures to see what is being done. This government claims that it will have to borrow $10.98 billion for this fiscal year. The interest on this amount was calculated at the rate in effect last fall, not today, and even at that it is calculated to cost $12.35 billion. Not all the interest has to be borrowed, but the interest is still in excess of the borrowing. The deficit which is forecast is $13.7 billion and the interest on that will be $12.35 billion. We are now spending more money than we receive in taxes. We must go again, and again and again, to the market to borrow the money just to pay the interest on what we have overspent in the past.

An hon. Member: And we compete against Third World countries.

Mr. Blenkarn: My hon. friend says that we compete against Third World countries for money. That is how we help them; that is our foreign aid program; that is how we borrow and hand out the money. We help to raise interest rates so that anyone else who borrows has to pay the higher rate. That is how we help the Third World improve conditions.

The government must bring in the new financial program called for by the Bank of Canada in its report. New policies must be introduced that will attack inflation. We must get things in balance. We simply cannot go on this way, Mr. Speaker.

The amendment would give the government $8 billion in borrowing authority. Even with the present spending plans, that amount would carry us through until the end of October. If the government has not changed its fiscal stance by the end of next October, it will have to come back to Parliament. But if it is sensible, it will be able to reorganize its affairs and get by on $12 billion next year. That means a cut of only $3 billion, Mr. Speaker, and I do not think it would take too much effort on the part of Parliament to slash $3 billion. We could do that and the government could get by on a great deal less money than it is asking for. It hopes to have that $3 billion as a carry-over, or, if you want to put it another way, it wants the right to have more slush in the 1981-82 fiscal year.

The government does not say the $3 billion has to be carried over; it says it may carry over the $3 billion. The real essence is that the government wants the right to borrow $14 billion in 1981-1982. If the government does not use the amount, it wants to be able to carry the $3 billion over so that it does not have to come back to Parliament until perhaps June or July, 1983. But if the government wants to come back to Parliament, it figures it can, and that it would be all right to do so.

What the government is asking us to do is give it the authority to borrow $14 billion. The government's own budget has been proven incompetent in all aspects. The fairy tale budget said the government would need $11 billion. We say the government could get along with $8 billion. The government could trim its cloth, change its spending plans, and cut down on some programs without doing any serious harm to anyone. We could get along on less. We would not have to borrow as much. By doing that, we could turn this country around. We could also come to grips with inflation. But to give the government $14 billion, $3 billion more than it says it needs for the next fiscal year with a fairy tale presentation proven wrong on every account, would be a disgrace. It is wrong. On this side we stand up and say it is wrong. We expect members on the other side to say it is wrong, but Liberal members may be embarrassed to do that on the floor of this House. They are under a terrible whip. Surely Liberals can get tough with their ministers or work something out in their caucus. Surely they have some respect for their children and their grandchildren. Surely they do not want to saddle Canada with impossible debt.

Mr. Thacker: There is no future with the Liberals.

Mr. Blenkarn: We were dealing with this borrowing bill in the finance committee the other day. We were pleased to have Michael Walker, director of the Fraser Institute, before us. He gave us some analysis of how borrowing affects us, our children and, indeed, our country.

The government likes saying that the borrowing is only a small percentage of GNP. The government says its borrowing is only 4.4 per cent of projected GNP, that it was 5 per cent last year and so on. If we add up the fours and the fives, we eventually get to 100 per cent. But that is not what I am talking about. When we increase borrowing, we ought to look at the increase in our GNP. If the GNP increases, then perhaps we can afford to increase our borrowing. That is another way of looking at it.

What was Canada's GNP last year? On a per person basis, our GNP slipped 3.3 per cent, perhaps 3.5 per cent. What will the GNP be this year? Will we possibly have a 1 per cent increase in our GNP? I doubt that; the forecasters doubt that. Most of them are talking of no increase in the GNP. Some say perhaps there will be a 0.1 per cent increase. We cannot justify, on the basis of increasing productivity in Canada, the increasing need to carry greater debt. That cannot be. Yet that is what this government is asking us to do.

Let us look at this in another way. How much of the real savings of Canadians is being absorbed by government debt? The Fraser Institute tells us that in the year 1970-1971 the percentage of real savings absorbed by government debt was 2.2 per cent. By comparison, in 1980-1981 real savings absorbed by government debt was 19.4 per cent. Next year it will be virtually the same. Imagine nearly 20 per cent of the savings of Canadians being absorbed by government debt. That is unconscionable.

Canada has had a great problem dealing with inflation. People are saying increased productivity is the only solution. The only way we can have increased productivity in a modern industrial society is to have more machinery and more equipment to do things more efficiently. We have to do things more efficiently to build and create. To do that one needs money. What we have with this government is massive borrowing. The Fraser Institute tells us that the government is taking very close to 50 per cent of all the debenture and bond money available in Canada. Where is the money for industry? Borrowings should not be used to pay old interest bills, nor should they be spent on current living expenses. Money should be available for worth-while, new, hard-nosed, hard-surfaced development which will create and build on the productivity which Canadians are capable of.

This government's borrowing plans suck up the available savings of Canadians making it impossible for industry and business, and in particular small business, to borrow. These borrowing plans drive up interest rates. They drive up interest rates for home mortgages and for farmers. The government's plans are causing interest rates to be driven up right across the board, crowding out legitimate business and paying instead for bigger and bigger government. This practice must cease.

This bill must reduce the government's requirements to $8 billion this coming year. We should not allow the government to have a hangover on its borrowing authority.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, I hesitated to rise because I fully expected at least one representative from the government side to rise and attempt to defend the borrowing position on which the government is asking the House to vote.

My colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), has suggested that the $14 billion request is unduly high. He suggested that there be a lowering of that figure to $8 billion, an amount he set out in his amendment. I hope before we go too far into the debate today that the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) will give us some explanation why the government presumably wants to resist this amendment. Perhaps he would like to speak now?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I always find amusing and amazing the lack of logic of some hon. members, in particular of the official opposition. They constantly complain about their being allotted too little time to speak in the House; yet, when they are given the opportunity of doing so, they would like to see us speak. The hon. member knows full well the bill was explained on second reading, and again, when the bill was studied in committee, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) gave other explanations; he knows full well that I still have time to give more details. So, I see no cause for complaint: let him be patient.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure the Minister of State for Finance knows that the minister never gave any explanation in committee. He now says there will be ample time to give an explanation. Frankly, this government is making no preparation that I can see to give us an explanation. To suggest, after the comments which have been made by various members of this caucus on this bill, that somehow or other it is wrong for us even to ask that the government try to justify this type of borrowing, I find most shocking.

● (1250)

What happens is that the government gets almost immune to what it is doing. It becomes insensitive. I do not believe it realizes the magnitude of what is $14 billion. The government can no longer borrow at 12 per cent. Only last week the official government rate on long-term bonds went over 14 per cent. I reminded hon. members that even at 12 per cent the debt doubles every six years. Therefore, we are not talking of $14 billion. With interest, that will amount to $28 billion in six years, in 12 years it will be $56 billion and six years after that $112 billion.

The reason I mention that figure is that I find the situation absolutely ludicrous when we are faced with 12.2 per cent inflation in this country. The government is aided and abetted by the little group to my left, which I hope will disintegrate completely. Up until now they have been exciting these fellows opposite, telling them to spend more, not to worry about debts or borrowing. On inflation day, they have the audacity to turn around and ask what is causing it.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) speaks often in this House on behalf of the pensioners and senior citizens. I wish he would go hat in hand and apologize to them for the fact that his party has supported and propped up this government. In fact, they have almost encouraged the government to spend, spend, spend and run into greater and greater deficits, which are the very thing creating the inflationary forces in this country which are crippling to the very people the hon. member so often speaks on behalf of, the pensioners and those on fixed incomes.

It is easy for the minister to gloss over and flub off this $14 billion borrowing. Let us put a billion into perspective. When we talk about billions, I do not think any of us, certainly not myself, can relate to what is a billion dollars. A billion minutes ago Christ was walking on the earth. A billion hours ago our ancestors literally lived in caves. A billion dollars ago in Ottawa is last week, a billion dollars is being spent this week and there will be another billion dollars spent next week. In fact, for the total year spending will be up to $60 billion.

It is bad enough to have such a growth in spending. I remind hon. members once again that that $60 billion compares to a total spending budget, when the emperor first took control of this country, of $10 billion. He has run up our spending sixfold. As I say, that is bad enough, but what is totally unforgivable is that the government estimates the total revenue it will have to offset that spending is about $46 billion. That is what we are dealing with, a $14 billion deficit which the government is contemplating. It is asking for parliamentary authority to borrow that $14 billion.

We must bear in mind that that is not the whole story. There are supplementary estimates before this House that are getting short shrift in the committees, barely being reviewed. By a guillotine rule introduced by the emperor himself, those supplementary estimates are deemed to be passed next week.

The estimates include 34 $1 items which cover almost $800 million of borrowings, guarantees and expenditures of varying types. The government is pretending that because we passed 34 $1 items in the estimates, somehow that is sufficient authority for it to obligate Canadians through borrowings, guarantees and other types of expenditures to the tune of almost $800 million. Talk about sleazy treatment of Parliament; that is the ultimate.

Mr. Kempling: Sewer politics.

Mr. Stevens: We learned this morning that under one $1 item alone the minister is proposing to guarantee loans to a wholly federal government-owned subsidiary called de Havilland. We also learn when we review the audited annual statement of that company that, contrary to what the government has been representing, they lost almost $9 million last year. We learn that, even on the government's own figures, in the coming year they are going to lose $5 million to $8 million.

I draw the attention of hon. members to this because over and above the $14 billion the government is requesting authority to borrow, it is going to whip through next week a $450 million guarantee to allow it to guarantee $450 million of de Havilland borrowing, a company that lost money last year and will lose money in the coming year. In fact, ever since the government has owned it, on a proper accounting basis it has done nothing but lose money.

When will this government come to its senses? For example, another $1 item contemplates the guaranteeing on behalf of Massey-Ferguson of $130 million, up $5 million since last February when the minister said he was proposing to lend $125 million. Another item gives back-up to Eldorado for approximately $150 million. Surely people should get a little excited.

That is not the whole story. We find that the government—and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) is telling us to expect more of this—is now resorting to the net-out principle where it takes revenue and instead of putting it into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, as is usual, it nets it against an expenditure. They say, "It is off the budget. We won't call it an expenditure. We won't call it a revenue." In short, the expenditures then look lower.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. When the House rose at one o'clock p.m., the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) had the floor.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that in my introductory comments I was asking that some spokesperson for the government try to explain why they feel the amendment proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), is unacceptable. If we have agreement, if they are willing to knock down the borrowing level from $14 billion to $12 billion, fine, let us hear it. However, in support of what I am saying I was trying to emphasize the point that the government, in asking for the $14 billion, is not telling the whole story because, as I indicated, contained in the $1 items in supplementary estimates (C) there is something approaching $800 million of other guarantees it hopes to ram through Parliament under the normal guillotine provision that applies to supplementary estimates. I find that deplorable.

Hon. members will recall that I pointed out the government proposes a $1 item that would allow it to guarantee loans up to $450 million to de Havilland Aircraft of Canada Ltd. It does that after having doctored the de Havilland statements. The annual report of de Havilland showed there was an income before taxes of $288,000. That is what the government sort of ran around boasting about, totally ignoring the fact it has something like $40 million in sheer equity investment; but on the basis of all that it had a statement prepared showing the company made $288,000.

Then we read the qualified report of the auditors, and I would emphasize that such a report is very rare. I have certainly never seen even a qualified report on the part of auditors dealing with a Crown corporation or a wholly federal government-owned subsidiary before. But when we read the statement of Deloitte Haskins & Sells we find the following:

As more fully described in note 1 to the consolidated financial statements, certain Dash-7 program charges are deferred to be recovered from future sales.

● (1410)

And note this:

The recovery of these deferred charges is dependent upon receipt of future orders significantly in excess of those received to date.

When you check note 1 to which they referred, you find this startling revelation:

Estimated sales proceeds from undelivered aircraft of a 250 aircraft program exceed the production and tooling costs in inventory and deferred charges at May 31, 1980, plus estimated additional production and tooling costs to be incurred. However, if fewer than 250 aircraft are sold or if the sales proceeds are overestimated, or if the costs to complete the program are underestimated, substantial amounts of unrecoverable costs may be charged to expense in subsequent fiscal periods.

Then they go on to say:

In the fiscal years 1978 and 1979, as a matter of prudence and reflecting the early program circumstances, the company adopted the practice of amortizing deferred production and tooling costs rateably over the first 100 aircraft deliveries. In 1980, due to the increased level of orders and options received, the company revised the amortization base to 250 aircraft deliveries.

This should also be noted:

The change in the rate of amortization had the effect of increasing income before income taxes by $8,950,000 in the current year. Had this rate of amortization prevailed in 1978 and 1979, income before income taxes would have been increased by $560,000 and $1,400,000 respectively.

That is the end of the note in the de Havilland statement.

What is significant, as all members who have been following what I have read into the record know, is that they literally doctored the books between 1979 and 1980 to present what was going to be almost a $9 million loss in the case of de Havilland as a $288,000 profit. Surely this House should become alarmed when we are then asked in a $1 item to rubber stamp a guarantee of $450 million on behalf of that company, which has not been examined by any committee of the House. In fact, we requested the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) to attend the finance committee twice, but he ducked out of the first meeting and today was there for only slightly over an hour, during which most of the time was taken up by planted questions asked by government members on that committee.

I cite this as an example only because, while we are asked for borrowing authority for $14 billion, we are not being consulted.

In those figures no account is taken of borrowings made by the Consolidated Computer Company, about which we are going to hear much more in the coming days and weeks, or by the Export Development Corporation, for which the government may borrow in the coming years hundreds of millions of dollars, thus binding the people of Canada. Eldorado's borrowings are not included, Canadair's borrowings are not included, and also the Post Office is not included because, as soon as it is made into a Crown corporation, the government intends to slough off to the side the $400 million loss sustained by that entity at present so that it will no longer be reflected in the government's accounts. Certainly there will be no reference to the money borrowed to sustain the corporation or to the operating loss.

Then the activities of the Enterprise Development Board have not been included in these figures. I think around $2 billion in total is to be granted to various people in the form of guaranteed loans, and this also is not included in the $14 billion requested. The CNR, of course, is not included. Then there is, of course, that real dandy, the one that our friends to the left love so much and for which they have taken credit for foisting on the Canadian public. I am referring to Petro-Canada. As we know, that entity alone is proposing to borrow $1.4 billion to pay for Petrofina. Not only will Petro-Canada borrow that amount, but it proposes to have what it calls the ownership tax put in place so that every time we go to buy a litre of gasoline we will have to pay as much as 4 cents per litre simply to cover the interest of the $1.4 billion and help retire some of the principal.

That is what is in the cards for us. Let every member who tends to go along with the government and acquiesce in what the government is asking us to do bear in mind that it is not just $14 billion but probably several billion dollars more of indirect guarantees or related amounts that the government is proposing to borrow for the coming fiscal year.

To suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment should not be given serious consideration is an affront to the Canadian public. It is something on which every member in this House interested in the ongoing economy of Canada should speak and explain, if he chooses to vote against this amendment, why he wants to do so. But above all, I hope hon. members will stand up, including members on the government side, and point out to the government—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stevens: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members for giving me some additional time.

I was going to draw to the attention of the House how tremendously this borrowing authority has increased. What I think is often overlooked is that when we are asked for $14 billion worth of authority, the request is made totally out of context. We are never told in an open way what is the over-all borrowing authority of the federal government at present, the aggregate or ceiling. All we are told is that there are many separate authorities. In the United States, as hon. members know, the borrowing level is limited, and when the administration want it increased periodically they have to go through Congress; but there is always an over-all ceiling. They do not have our piecemeal system where the government is coming to the House constantly with requests.

Mr. Evans: We deal with it every year.

Mr. Stevens: I am always pleased when the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) speaks from his seat because he demonstrates the fact that he is ignorant on the subject.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: If you deal with additions, you must deal with the total.

Mr. Stevens: That is the very point. I challenge the hon. member to stand in his place and tell us what is the total borrowing authority of the federal government as of this date.

Mr. Evans: It is whatever we pass in this bill.

Mr. Stevens: That is not right. What we pass in this bill is interim authority; it is $14 billion additional borrowing authority. The government cannot tell us exactly what authority it has before we pass this bill. We know that after we have passed the bill the government will have to use whatever amount it currently has on top of which it will have $14 billion. My point, and I think the parliamentary secretary has helped me make it—

Mr. Evans: So you put a ceiling on it.

Mr. Stevens: —is that the American approach is to have a ceiling. They do not deal with the incidental pieces. I think that would be a much more meaningful approach for the government to adopt. I believe that the reason they shy away from it is that they know it is embarrassing. They do not like to talk about the 1956-57 $1 billion level. That is why it is very nice to be able to fudge it and say, "How about another $14 billion while we are running the show?", without making it clear that the gross debt right now is $137 billion and that the net debt will exceed $100 billion next year.

We must bear in mind that when the emperor took power, not that many years ago, the net debt was $20 billion. His legacy is $80 billion of added net debt on the shoulders of not only the present generation, but every generation to come. He has mortgaged the future to preserve himself in power.

I was pointing out that this has been done in a piecemeal fashion. For example, he came to us in the fiscal year 1971 and received authorization for a $3 billion borrowing authority. In 1972, it was another $3 billion; in 1973, it was $3 billion; in 1974, it was $3 billion; in 1975 it was $5.5 billion. We can see how greedy he became, how much more he started to crave and to request from Parliament. In fiscal 1976, it was up to $6 billion; in 1977, it was $6 billion; in 1977, 1978 and 1979, that jumbled-up period, it was another $28 billion; in fiscal 1980, it was $7 billion; in fiscal 1980 again, it was another $12 billion; and now it is $14 billion.

Surely the time has come for someone, hopefully on the government side, to become a little concerned. To put it another way, the government allowed the gross debt and the net debt to grow to the point that today 23 cents of every revenue dollar coming into Ottawa is spent to service previous debt. It is the fastest growing cost with which government lives; it is the cost of servicing the debt.

I do not know what value the government puts on $1 billion, but I would have thought that some minister could have stood up on this amendment and at least spoken for 14 minutes. That would be only $1 billion per minute! Surely some minister could afford that courtesy to the House, without expecting us to rubber stamp this bill without even a 14-minute speech.

Mr. Evans: You should have been here at second reading.

Mr. Stevens: The parliamentary secretary is helping me out again. He should remember the government's argument at second reading—"Let us not delay it now; let us get it before the committee for a thorough examination." Of course, the government used closure to get it there. It said there would be an opportunity for a thorough review in committee. But in committee we were told, "Well, of course, you will have time in the House to debate it at report stage and third reading", which is what we are doing. We were told to expedite it out of committee and, of course, that we could speak on it in Parliament.

I have referred to the tremendous increase in our debt. It is not by coincidence that that increase is reflected also in the spending levels of government. We must not forget that in 1975 the government increased spending by 22 per cent. In 1974, it was 28 per cent; in 1973, it was 11 per cent; in 1972, it was 15 per cent; in 1971, it was 13 per cent; in preceding years it was 10 per cent, 11 per cent, 12 per cent and 14 per cent. Those were the increases of the late 1960s and the early 1970s.

If we take a look at the current spending plans of the government, and somehow adjust the fudging of the government, as the President of the Treasury Board admitted in committee the other day, we will find the spending increase for this year is 16 per cent. That is the trouble we are living with. This is a government without discipline, a government without any sense of responsibility. Unfortunately, the price does not come out of the salaries of its members. They do not get a reduction for their inefficiency and their bungling. It comes out much in the form of a mortgage on this generation and future generations, who will have to live with tens of billions of dollars of needless borrowing for years to come.

Hopefully many other members plan to speak on this amendment. I will not take any longer; I hope to speak later on the bill itself. But the time has come when the House must start dealing more seriously with a government which has lost all sense of responsibility. It is a runaway government which has lost control of the Canadian economy. Let not any minister over there—certainly not the Prime Minister or the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen)—stand up and claim in the future that they do not understand why there is inflation in the country. They are the cause of inflation; they are manufacturing inflation. If there is any industry for which Ottawa should be known currently, it is the great manufacturer of inflation with which the country must live.

I should like to touch on another point; I hope the minister will respond and somehow try to clarify it. Bill C-59 authorizes the government to borrow $14 billion in fiscal year 1982. Last May, the government requested and received authority to borrow $12 billion for the current fiscal year which ends this month.

At page 19 of his printed budgetary statement on October 28, the Minister of Finance said the following about government borrowing:

> We have been able to raise the large amount of funds we need through the sales of marketable bonds and treasury bills without hampering the Bank of Canada's ability to keep money supply growth within the target band. I am conscious of the risks we have run, however, in such a heavy reliance on borrowed money and I have referred already to the burden which it creates in the form of rapidly rising interest costs. The planned reduction in our financial requirements will be beneficial on both counts.

He predicted that financial requirements would decline more rapidly than the budgetary deficit, going from $12.2 billion in fiscal 1980-81 to $11 billion in 1981-82, to $8.4 billion in 1982-83, and to $7.2 billion in 1983-84.

If the financial requirements were to follow the line he indicated, why are we being asked for $14 billion, for example, for fiscal 1982 when just last October the minister said that it would be $11 billion for fiscal 1982? There seems to be a $3 billion overrun. I know the government lives very comfortably with overruns, but that seems to be a very, very large one.

This is the reason I think my colleague's amendment to reduce the total borrowing authority is justified. Certainly it is justified, unless we receive better evidence as to why the government needs these funds. If we take seriously the statement of the Minister of Finance, it appears that he does not need the $14 billion borrowing authority he is now requesting. Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that when you borrow amounts of the magnitude the government is proposing to borrow, it will have repercussions in the marketplace. This will be so if the government continues to print counterfeit money, if you like, to create the wherewithal that it in turn can borrow back. Clearly, the more borrowed the smaller the pie becomes for everyone else. This is what tends to drive up interest rates. This is what makes it so difficult for a person who is either having to live with a renegotiated interest structure on his home, or who wants to borrow money for his business. This is why he is finding it so costly to borrow money today. It is because of the government's greed. More and more the government is taking an undue portion of the total available funds which may be borrowed.

• (1430)

In short, I think my colleague's suggestion that this borrowing authority should be cut down is most appropriate. I hope the government will give consideration to reducing it or, at least, give us a more satisfactory explanation of why we are faced with a $14 billion request for funds, since the Minister of Finance told us last October that all he needed was $11 billion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I was aware that the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) is an expert juggler and again this afternoon he has given us a fascinating show when he juggled with figures the way a circus juggler does with balloons. It seems to me we ought to show more moderation because nothing is more alien to the House of Commons than a circus. Fortunately, the figures he was tossing around were not plates, otherwise we would be picking up the pieces because his balancing act was shaky enough to scare the daylights out of us.

We also knew the rhetorical talent of the hon. member and again he has given us an excellent demonstration. One thing I did not know, however, is that when the hon. member quotes from a document he does so only partially because he lacks patience. I thought he was a persistent man and that when he set out to read a document he would read it to the end. The last question he put proves to all hon. members that he failed to continue reading the budget documents tabled by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). Indeed, Mr. Speaker, he queried the amount of $11 billion, but he forgot to read a little further on in the budget and the budget documents tabled by the Minister of Finance where he would have found the minister's explanation about the additional requirement for $3 billion to make up the total amount of $14 billion sought under the borrowing authority bill now before us.

Since the request to borrow $14 billion is justified in those budget documents, in the budget and in related documents, the government is opposed to the first part of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) who wants to reduce the government's borrowing authority from $14 billion to $8 billion. Mr. Speaker, we are opposed as well to the second part of the amendment under which—

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The minister has stated that I did not fully read the quotation of the Minister of Finance in the budgetary document. I ask the indulgence of this House to allow the minister to read into the record what he thinks I did not refer to, or what he thinks I did not properly quote. I am making this request because I cannot see the reference on page 19.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, I do not have the budget speech before me. The hon. member is urging me to read page 19. What I am suggesting to him is that he ought not to dwell on only one page but read the full text of the budget documents. For instance, he will find out that the $3 billion margin we are seeking matches the margins which have already been used; these are balance margins which can serve for other borrowing needs or for requirements concerning our exchange rate.

I should like to get back to the second part of the amendment of the hon. member who wants to eliminate the possibility that the remaining borrowing authority on March 31, 1982, be used after that date. Anyone reading the borrowing authority bill will realize that if on March 31, 1982, the unused portion of the $14 billion borrowing authority is in excess of $3 billion, that unused portion will automatically be cancelled. However, if the remaining over-all borrowing authority were to be less than $3 billion it might continue to apply to the period after March 31, 1982. The hon. member is against that provision.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister accept a question so that we can better understand his explanation?

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the minister accept a question?

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would allow me to make my statement, we will have a lot of time to answer questions later.

An hon. Member: He might have an answer.

Mr. Bussières: Yes, and since I intend to speak for 20 minutes, it is quite possible that he will get an answer.

Mr. Blenkarn: Agreed.

Mr. Bussières: I do not like the untimely behaviour of students who interrupt their teachers—and I am not referring to myself.

In the bill under consideration there is also the possibility of borrowing in foreign currencies. Now to sum up: a borrowing power of $14 billion which has been justified in the budget tabled by the Minister of Finance in October last, the possibility of extending part of that borrowing power beyond March 31, 1982, and using it in the next financial year on one condition, namely, that the borrowing power be lower than $3 billion. Finally, it also provides that the borrowing power would be automatically cancelled if the remainder of the borrowing power amounting to $14 billion exceeded $3 billion, a clause appearing in the bill or in the legislation on the borrowing power now in effect; also, as I indicated, the possibility of borrowing in foreign currencies. In their comments, the previous speakers have pointed out, Mr. Speaker, the huge deficit. It is obvious that a $14 billion deficit is quite substantial. Nobody denies it. We are not saying that it is negligible. But, Mr. Speaker, the relative aspect of that deficit must also be taken into account. One of my friends was telling me that the importance of loans or debts can be expressed in terms of one's capacity to repay them, whether it be an individual, a corporation or a country, on the basis of one's wealth. In other words, if one is poor, one cannot borrow. This is not to say that the richer one is, the deeper one must go into debt. It means that all figures are relative and that examination of figures taken in the abstract, or in absolute terms, can lead to misleading conclusions as compared with reality.

It would be easy for the government to use the approach—and I say approach when I should say, in fact, what seems to be the drastic approach—of the Progressive Conservative party to the deficit. If I say the seemingly drastic approach, Mr. Speaker, it is because hon. members of the official opposition say in the same breath that we must reduce the deficit while asking us to increase the funds allotted to the Department of Transport and to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. We are asked, in the same breath, to increase the funds allotted to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. So, let us reduce drastically the deficit and government expenditures but, at the same time, let us give more money to transportation; at the same time let us allot more money to regional development; at the same time let us allot money to all sorts of activities, whether it be the Department of Manpower and Immigration, or any other government department.

So, I say that we are dealing only with what appears to be the will to slash government expenditures. The approach of the Minister of Finance was far more responsible since it is a liberal approach. It is a gradualist approach, Mr. Speaker; it is adapted to the needs of our society. Are the hon. members willing to see us do away with the indexing of the old age pensions? Are hon. members on the other side blaming us for having increased the guaranteed income supplement in order to help the less fortunate among us. Would hon. members on the other side want us to reduce drastically the amounts paid the provinces for health care? Would hon. members across the way want us to reduce drastically the enormous sums of money paid to the provinces for university education? Let us be serious: hon. members must tell us where their priorities really lie, and stop telling this government to increase its outlays in such and such a sector. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I say theirs is only an apparent will to reduce the deficit drastically, as members of the official opposition loudly claim.

The approach of the Minister of Finance will reduce the government deficit over a given period of time, according to a plan clearly explained in his budget papers, and will match the increase in government expenditures to that of the GNP. Those are the commitments made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. Of course, should the economic situation change, therefore allowing the government to change its approach, to lay greater stress on reducing the deficit, naturally the Minister of Finance will be the first to be happy, to rejoice about it. Mr. Speaker, it has also been said that the government borrowing was cluttering up, absorbing, wiping out or strangling the capital markets at the expense of the private sector in need of financing.

There is nothing to prove such an allegation to the effect that the federal borrowing has restricted the access to markets for other types of borrowers. In spite of higher borrowing by the Canadian government on the domestic market in 1980 than in 1979, provincial and corporate borrowing has also been significantly higher. This means that there was still room for increased borrowing on the capital markets. By checking these facts, we can therefore see quite clearly that there has been no congestion or cluttering up of these markets.

The new net borrowing on the domestic market by the provinces, excluding borrowing for the Canada Pension Plan, reached $5.7 billion in 1980, which is $3 billion more than in 1979. For their part, the companies borrowed $1.9 billion in bonds on the Canadian market in 1980, or $485 million more than in 1979. Moreover, companies borrowed $4.5 billion in the form of shares, or $500 million more than in 1979. Share financing has therefore progressed significantly these last few years, and an ever-increasing proportion of corporate financing was obtained on the stock markets in view of the very favourable terms obtained on these markets in the last few years.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to go on to another question raised by the hon. member for York-Peel, that of the fight against inflation. On several occasions, the Minister of Finance has clearly stated that the priority of this government was indeed to fight inflation, while protecting the most destitute in our society, who are the most vulnerable to inflationary pressures.

We are all aware of the repeated support given by the hon. Minister of Finance to the policy of the Bank of Canada to reduce progressively the money supply by reducing the M-1 bracket, an approach which will allow us in the long term to gain on inflationary pressures. The determination expressed in the budget papers to reduce the deficit and government spending over a certain period confirms and supports the monetary policy followed by the government bank by restraining government spending.

During a recent lecture, the Minister of Finance also mentioned an extremely important question, that is the need for a collective will to fight inflation. This will must be reflected in concrete efforts by every sector of the economy showing that they also want to reduce inflationary pressures and finally win the fight against inflation. There are many ways in which to show such a will. For instance, it is necessary to increase our productivity as a producing country, and this need does not concern only the workers. It also affects capital and investments. We need to make our business sector more productive in order to become more competitive, to set much lower prices and thus succeed in increasing our capacity not only on the domestic market, but also and mostly on foreign markets.

The budget speech of the Minister of Finance therefore outlined how the minister intended to fight against inflation, how he planned to reduce government expenditures, how he intended to reduce the government deficit over a certain period, and by setting out the financial requirements of the government, he outlined the need for borrowing authority, which resulted in the bill now under consideration that requests this $14 billion borrowing authority to balance the financial requirements of the government. During consideration of the budgetary estimates, the House had the opportunity to examine the use made of government expenditures, and I am convinced that it will now grant the government this $14 billion borrowing power.

● (1450)

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the minister would be prepared to answer the question at this point. I see the minister is nodding his head.

Is it not true that this bill allows the government to borrow $14 billion in fiscal 1982, to spend the whole $14 billion in fiscal 1982 and that the hang-over provision of $3 billion is not necessary? Indeed, on the face of the bill the government could borrow the whole $14 billion in fiscal 1982 as suggested by my colleague, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens).

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: I wonder if I understand the hon. member's question properly. Is he asking whether under the Borrowing Authority Act the government can borrow the full amount that it is entitled to for the fiscal year 1981-1982? Is that the hon. member's question? Yes, it can but it does not have to. So according to the provision, if there is a surplus of less than $3 billion it may be carried over to the fiscal year 1982-1983. If, for example, the House was in such a position that it could not deal with a bill to provide supplementary borrowing authority, in May or immediately after the end of the fiscal year the Minister of Finance could then avail himself of the opportunity to use the carry-over so that the Department of Finance would have more latitude concerning the borrowing authority and the House to deal with other matters.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which I think is a very serious one. In his remarks the minister indicated that I had misled the House in my reference to the statement made by the Minister of Finance when introducing the budget. He referred to the fact that I had read into the record that there would be a decline from $12.2 billion this year to $11 billion in 1981-82, in the fiscal requirements of the nation. I cannot remember his exact words, but he indicated that I had very cleverly fiddled the figures and had not referred to other tables, and that if I had put the whole record into proper perspective, the House would have understood the need for $14 billion.

I cannot allow the minister to say that I have misled the House in this way, without his backing up his statement. I have had a chance to go through the tables in the budget. On page 21 the financial requirement of the government in 1982 is shown as $10,980 million. On page 25 it is stated that for 1981-82 the financial requirement will be $11 billion. On page 39, under the heading "Fiscal Projections—National Accounts and Public Accounts Comparison", the financial requirements for 1981-82 are shown as $10,980 million. On page 41 in the table entitled "Summary, Extended National Accounts Presentation", total financial requirements for 1982 are also shown as $10,980 million. For fiscal 1981 on page—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has listened to the hon. member with some attention. This appears to be a matter of argument and debate. If the hon. member feels he has been misrepresented, let me just say that it is a complicated misrepresentation. The question of privilege should be stated clearly so it is understood. If the hon. member would care to restate his question, the Chair will listen.

Mr. Pepin: Oh, no, not a speech!

Mr. Stevens: The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) says, "Oh, no!" That shows how little he has—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member please state his question of privilege?

Mr. Stevens: My question of privilege is that as far as I know, I accurately reflected the statement of the Minister of Finance in this House that the financial requirements for fiscal year 1982 were to be $11 billion. The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) has indicated that that was not accurate, that I had chosen to leave out certain items reflected in the budget, and that I had, in effect, misled the House. I should like him either to explain his position or retract the statement.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member thinks that I was hinting he tried to mislead the House, I apologize for not phrasing my intervention properly. This is not at all what I said. What I said, is that I agree with him that the financial requirements in the budget amount to about $11 billion. However, I told him that if he read a little further on he would see that we are asking for a supplement of $3 billion in order to borrow in foreign currencies if need be. That was the meaning of my presentation, and I never meant that the hon. member was misleading the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: After hearing the arguments on both sides, I rule it is not a question of privilege.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, it would seem to me as we go along that the borrowing authority requirements go higher and higher. One reason is that there is a misleading impression given again and again in the presentation of the estimates that public spending by the Government of Canada is being kept within certain limits.

At the finance committee the other day I pointed out to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), to the deputy governor of the Bank of Canada, and my colleagues that, as responsible writers have indicated very clearly through newspapers, in the preparation of the estimates a practice has developed of presenting them on a selective net expenditure basis. Regardless of how much is to be spent, if there are moneys coming in from another source for these expenditures, the two sums are netted and that is all that is shown as the expenditure. A classic example is unemployment insurance. We know employees and employers make contributions to that fund. Those amounts are brought in on the one hand. Then the government, because of the level of unemployment, spends perhaps $5 billion or $6 billion more on unemployment insurance, but the contributions deducted from the government contribution appear in the estimates on a net basis.

As reported in Hansard for February 26, 1981, at page 7716, the President of the Treasury Board said:

> Total spending of $67.6 billion in 1981-1982 is 12.8 per cent higher than last year's level. This rate of growth, while somewhat higher than over the past few years, is below 1980-1981 growth. Total spending is forecast to increase by about 10 per cent in the two planning years beyond 1981-1982. I would stress that these increases meet the government's continuing commitment to expenditure restraint.

We know that part of the government's electoral campaign promises in 1979-1980 was to contain the growth of government expenditures to within the increase in the gross national product. This is an attempt to hide the fact that the government has failed miserably to do so. One of the principal reasons is that idiotic sort of "bread and circus furnished to the Roman mob" denial of an 18-cent increase in the price of a gallon of gasoline. On the other hand, to charge to national revenues an additional $3.5 billion to meet the increase in the price of offshore crude so as to pay a subsidy or to subsidize increasing consumption of petroleum products in Canada at a lower price, means in itself that we live in a fool's paradise.

The public of Canada was treated with contempt by the Liberals, and the New Democratic Party who went along with it, because anyone's intelligence is boggled by the absurdity of subsidizing increasing consumption of a non-renewable resource at much lower than world prices. This is a price even lower than 75 per cent of the world price which the producing provinces were prepared to accept. I say quite frankly in examining the estimates this year that they are not $67.625 billion, they are much closer to $80 billion.

Why do we want borrowing authority for $14 billion plus the carry-over of $3 billion from the previous year? The minister was quite candid and admitted this was the practice, and it is in this bill. There is a provision for a cushion to carry-over of $3 billion. Therefore, $17 billion is the size of that cushion, if it is all spent. There is a $3 billion carry-over and $14 billion in additional authority. The parliamentary secretary looks in amazement from behind the curtain. But I tell him that is so. The minister indicated that the $3 billion carry-over was a standard practice. In paragraph 2 of Clause 1, the explanation is only as to the excess over and above the $3 billion unused authority. The clauses are the same as they were in the previous year. In essence, this bill makes available to the government $17 billion in borrowing authority this year. Again, the parliamentary secretary is shaking his head, but I ask him to read Clause 2(1). I will read it into the record as follows:

> The Minister of Finance, with the approval of the governor in council, may, in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable of the loans authorized by any act of Parliament heretofore passed, borrow,—

That is up to $14 billion, in addition to that which remains unborrowed. If the practice is to have a carry-over of $3 billion, that makes $17 billion available to the government. It need not spend it all. The government hopes some miracle will happen.

Why does the government want to borrow that much? First, we are dealing with inflated figures, and second, there is the problem in respect of oil prices. The government does not know whether domestic supply is going to increase sufficiently this year, let alone overcome the cutbacks imposed by the province of Alberta. Nor does it know whether there will be other substantial increases by OPEC. If that is the case, then hang on to your hat, because the size of the compensation for offshore oil will require a great deal more money. The Government of Canada will have to borrow in order to pay for it.

• (1510)

The government fails to recognize that the Alberta and Saskatchewan oil producers are entitled to a far more substantial price than they are getting. The domestic price for energy is artificially depressed. As the foreign price goes up, so does the quantum of the subsidy and the government requirements are that much higher.

I know the budget provided that there shall be a levy on gasoline for the compensation account, but that is not the figure in the estimates. All that money going offshore is not an expenditure to the extent that there is money in the compensation fund. What a fine way of accounting to the people of Canada! It is for that reason the minister justifies the sort of misleading statement he made on February 25.

The government's priorities are wrong. Since October we have been involved with the question of patriating the Constitution. The question of patriation of the Constitution could have been dealt with long ago but, as we have shown in the other debate, there is a fanatical obsession on the part of one man who wants to put the provinces in their place. By devious and dubious means, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is trying to get the British Parliament to breach its responsibilities as a trustee, something not recognizable to our Prime Minister.

A much greater problem is that presented by inflation. The Bank of Canada is attempting to cope with it through its policy of high interest rates. However, it is powerless to cope with the inflation we face today; it is like a small boy trying to spit into the wind. There is far more involved in the setting of interest rates by the Bank of Canada to control the monetary supply than just the relation to that control of the interest rate. The bank cannot touch the worldwide level of increasing inflation. We have seen what it has been on the continent in the common market; 135 per cent in Israel, 300 per cent in Brazil, and equally as high in the Argentine. The Iron Curtain countries are facing this problem and we see re-evaluation of the ruble and other coinage. This is a world wide phenomena. That is one slice of inflation the Bank of Canada cannot do anything about. It cannot do anything about the increasing government expenditures, yet this is a fundamental domestic cause of inflation. The government is cheating at the federal level. Instead of $68 billion, the true expenditures amount to $80 billion. There is the same excessive spending at the provincial levels. They cover it in some ways, but it is there.

The Bank of Canada works on the M-1 factor or classification which is money in circulation, money in the hands of banks and bank accounts. What about credit cards? That credit card in the pocket of each member here is the same as a bank account on which a person may write a cheque in so far as the potential demand on goods and services is concerned. They must be taken into account in determining the state of the money supply.

Cartels also have an inflationary effect on prices. There are artificial restrictions on the market supply of any commodity or service, including marketing boards, supply management and artificial quotas. There are other reasons for marketing boards and quotas, whether in foods or goods. One must remember the price that has to be paid. If the producer is to be protected, the consumer has to pay more. Those are all things that go into the inflationary spiral. It is the old bugaboo of the low-cost unit productivity in Canada. This may be the result of improper training in the labour force, and this applies not only to the blue collar worker but the white collar worker and, ultimately, management through lost time at work and strikes. We have an inglorious reputation over the past few years as far as strikes are concerned. Strikes and loss of production must also include absenteeism at the management level, such as the stolen, afternoon for a game of golf or stolen time for curling. It is all time and comes down to the bottom line. The unit cost of production is high.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Mr. Lambert: I do not need it, Mr. Speaker. I just want to say I am opposed to the bill and will vote against it.

● (1520)

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, just so we have the facts straight before we start I should indicate that I will be voting against the bill and supporting these amendments.

In the dialogue that has taken place today between members of our party and the government, in the questions and the speeches I keep hearing the word "may"; we may borrow it; we may have $3 billion left; and if we do, we may use it in the fiscal year 1982 because there may be something that comes up that makes it awkward for the government to try to ram through another borrowing bill to carry on the governments business. That is not obstruction by the opposition parties. That is why, back when Parliament was first established, there were opposition parties to examine the King's purse and the expenditures which I am sure seemed very large to the people of the day, just as it seems unimaginable to myself and my constituents when we talk of $14 billion borrowing; not total expenditures, Mr. Speaker, but $14 billion in borrowing.

There is one point that has always bothered me since my election to this chamber, and that is with regard to financial planning, to estimates placed before committee by the government, particularly the $1 votes. When my accountant and I look at my books and we see $1 on the ledger we presume it means exactly that, the expenditure of a dollar. However, when we get into supplementary estimates, which are included, I am sure, in these "maybe" figures presented to us in the last few days, and when this bill was originally brought into the House, we also have $1 figures included in the $14 billion.

The use of $1 items by the government to accomplish a variety of things is not all bad, but some of them are outrageously bad. We have 34 $1 votes in the supplementary estimates (C) 1980-81. There are 12 votes which authorize the transfer of funds from one vote to another; five votes which authorize the payment of grants; eight votes which authorize the deletion of debts; four votes which authorize payments and guarantees; and there are five other votes for $1 which authorize reimbursement of a Wheat Board pool account, amend a previous appropriation act, increase borrowing authority and authorize transfer of an asset, ratify payments made in previous fiscal years and authorize an increased pension.

These $1 votes, Mr. Speaker, are actually used to circumvent Parliament. The question is: How can Parliament control government expenditures when a $1 vote is presented which represents expenditures considerably higher than $1? It takes dollars from one department and one program in a department and transfers the money that is left to a program other than that which it was originally presented for. On the transfers between $1 votes Parliament is asked to authorize the relocation of funds; thus we do have some control over spending but Parliament may scrutinize the reallocation of the spending priorities only between these votes.

I would just like to give an example from Supplementary Estimates (B), 1980-81 where we had operating expenditures in the marine program to authorize the transfer of $3,989,999 from Public Works in the main estimates. We transferred that money by putting $1 in the figure when it came back to estimates.

The second way the $1 vote is used under the rules of this House is by modifications to existing appropriations, where a dollar vote is required to repeal the existing spending authority. You can see this in the 1979 supplementary estimates where a dollar was issued to cancel the authority to spend $1,350,340 in the Department of National Health and Welfare. Canadians are deceived when they look at estimates that are not a true reflection of how this government is spending taxpayers' money.

The third way of using the $1 vote is by grants and contingent spending authorities. In the case of a simple grant or contribution the $1 vote is used to specify a new recipient of funds, not the one mentioned in the previous estimates of the year. Although no new appropriation is required, the vote is needed to reallocate an unspecified purpose. In effect, the government receives a blank cheque for contingent spending authority because the vote in fact reads "not to exceed" a certain dollar value. Once we have approved a $1 vote there is no way of further examining the expenditures.

It seems to me that Parliament, having given up this authority, has lost some control over financial management and has not been able to get it back. I hear the hon. member on this side saying it is sloppy management procedures. I also heard him say some other things but I will not repeat them.

An hon. Member: They are unparliamentary.

Mr. McKnight: A particularly objectionable instance of this happened in the 1976-77 supplementary estimates (D) where a single $1 vote was used to write three blank cheques, and I would like to read them into the record. In the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the trade-industrial program, $1 was used:

To authorize notwithstanding Section 5 of the National Design Council Act, the payment of remuneration to members of the National Design Council for their participation in committee meetings, planning sessions, and other related services in the course of the implementation of Design Canada programs to improve and promote design, beyond the three mandatory council meetings, the specific amount of such remuneration to be subject to Treasury Board approval,

They wanted money from the people of Canada but they could not even tell us at that time how much. In the same program the $1 vote was used in an:

—agreement with Bombardier/MLW to purchase at a cost not exceeding $9 million the two LRC trainsets leased to Amtrak—

I am not too sure why we needed $9 million to purchase a train that was leased to an American railroad.

Again, the same $1:

to indemnify and save harmless the Canadian National Railways, from any loss up to 30 million bolivars which it may incur under the terms of the bid bond guaranteed by it in support of the bid made by the Canadian consortium Canaven Limited to participate in a railroad project in Venezuela, notwithstanding that such loss may exceed the equivalent in Canadian dollars which is estimated as of January 1, 1977, at approximately $7,500,000.

By putting in $1, Mr. Speaker, the government of the day borrowed $83,386,000 for one department in one year.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. McKnight: This is why I believe the people of Canada are concerned and would be appreciative of the amendments made in the bill by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) to eliminate expenditures made without scrutiny, explanation or input from the elected members who do not happen to sit on the government side.

This method is also used for amendments to non-money legislation and regulations. It is used to change the legal status of a government entity; to exempt a government entity from the application of a law; and to amend legislation without recourse to a bill. These methods are used to circumvent Parliament. These changes could be accomplished by bringing forward a bill for debate; but no, you can use a $1 item to circumvent the elected members of the House of Commons. By the use of the $1 vote in place of a bill, the government eliminates debate, it hides the workings of government from the people of Canada. In my opinion, this is probably one of the most repugnant uses of the $1 vote.

Now I should like to come to the other part of this amendment on non-money legislation and regulations. I am pleased to see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) in the House because the example which comes to my mind is the one of a Crown corporation which was set up for $1, and this concerns the minister. All it said was:

Supplementary Estimates (D), 1976-77
TRANSPORT
A—Department—Surface Transportation Program

Vote 52d—Surface Transportation—with respect to surface transportation:

(a) to deem VIA Rail Canada Inc., a railway company incorporated pursuant to Section 11 of the Railway Act,

I am not saying there is anything wrong with VIA Rail, and I know the minister understands this. We on this side have supported that program, although we would like to see it operating a little more efficiently for the people of Canada and giving a little more service, as it was set up to do.

Already we have a proliferation of Crown corporations. Under this government, we continue to see more Crown corporations established. By establishing a Crown corporation for $1, as VIA Rail was established three years ago, the people of Canada, through their government, borrowed $854,111,698, or over three quarters of a billion dollars in three years. When a $1 item is used, we in the opposition find we have something over which in most instances we have no control. A $1 item is meant to circumvent elected members of Parliament. We find that although a form of parliamentary democracy has survived and can survive, the government's poor expenditure planning and changes in government policy can be effected by the use of $1 votes. There are no particular accounting practices; blank cheque expenditures or loan authorities continue to be hidden from the people of Canada in a devious way by the use of $1 votes.

When we come to the $14 billion borrowing authority, I wonder why it is necessary for the government to borrow that amount of money. It is something I do not understand. I cannot visualize that amount of money in my mind, nor can my constituents, I am sure. However, I should like to mention that while the government is asking for authority to borrow $14 billion, it is taking in revenues over the next three years under the National Energy Program about 49 per cent or $24 billion more than the government proposed to take in the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie).

When we see what the government will do with this money it is borrowing we find that, in its kindness and generosity, it has allocated $4 billion toward western development. I am sure the government will not have that cash on hand when it is needed, so it will have to be borrowed.

When we go through the budget papers, however, we find there only $2 billion. But I cannot find the $2 billion in new money. Most of the $2 billion over the next three years will come from already existing programs. We had the WEOP conference; the Western Economic Opportunities Conference in Calgary. All we had was the conference, and I am sure it did not cost $2 billion. We heard the Minister of Transport put forward the suggestion that perhaps we could use the economic development fund, however big or small it will be, to do away with the Crow rate and to make up for it through funds from the $2 billion. There are arguments about the figure, but I think most of us will agree that approximately $300 million a year accrues to western Canada from the Crow rate. When you take the $300 million which western Canada now has from the Crow rate, and you add the money allocated to the Prince Rupert project, toward which this government is contributing funds under western development, and you add a few other programs, you are not even left with $1 billion; the money is in the millions.

We keep hearing about the $4 billion. I would be very curious to see whether it is part of the funds we borrowed. We are told in the House that perhaps the $4 billion will not come from borrowed funds but from the National Energy Program. That money comes from western Canada, it is there now. I do not quite understand why we should be pleased that the government, in its generosity, will take $37.5 billion in three years and, as they say, leave $4 billion, although my figures say $2 billion. I really do not see why we should authorize this government to borrow $14 billion for the fiscal year 1981.

One of the reasons the government has to borrow money is for government expenditures. Part of the reason for having to borrow money to cover government expenditures is that the government has not expended its money in the proper fashion.

I should like to list briefly two or three items under government spending. Recently we discussed in the House the cost of government advertising. The government advertising budget is three times that of General Foods, which is only the second largest advertiser in the country. How does the government spend its money in advertising? The unity information office costs are about $15 million, and the energy advertising cost is about $10 million. The increase in the budget of the unity information office exceeds the total spending by the Government of Canada in the first year of confederation. That is when we did have unity in our country. The cost of last summer's campaign was $4 million. I am sure the constitutional ad campaign cost was covered by borrowed money. The original budget of that campaign was $6 million, but the final cost will probably only be $5 million.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (1540)

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief in my closing remarks. There is another reason the government is requesting $14 billion when it could just as well survive on $8 billion. It is requesting a $3 billion slush fund to go into fiscal 1982. This could well represent the cost overruns incurred in government departments.

The President of the Treasury Board released a list of 471 projects with cost overruns of $823 million. This list was prepared by Treasury Board at the request of the Conservative government which fell in December, 1979. Virtually every overrun occurred under the administration of the current government prior to 1979. The worst department was the Department of the Environment in which 153 out of 223 projects had cost overruns totalling $238 million. The cost overruns in this department were equal to 35 per cent of the original budget. Budgets do not mean much if departments can overrun them by 35 per cent. The list indicated that 66 projects experienced overruns. The Lachine canal project was for $45.9 million; its overrun was 90.4 per cent of budget. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development had overruns on 42 of 76 projects, or 55 per cent. There were 14 overruns in excess of $10 million and 19 overruns which exceeded 100 per cent of the original budget. Some other large overruns were $43 million for VIA Rail contracts and $26.4 million for a major postal facility in Montreal.

These are some of the reasons those of us on this side of the House feel the government should be held in check and should not be granted carte blanche to borrow more money than is needed at any time. This is why I will certainly support the amendments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on report stage of the borrowing authority bill. I will try to answer some of the questions, as did the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) previously, and try to expand on some of the areas which hon. members opposite have indicated they still do not understand.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) made a comment relating to the size of the borrowing authority. He indicated it was not $14 billion, but that in fact the government would have $17 billion at its disposal should this borrowing authority bill pass. That is incorrect, as I indicated during second reading debate. In fact, the Minister of State for Finance and the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) indicated that as well.

The confusion arises from a belief that borrowing authority will be carried forward from previous years into fiscal year 1981-82, and when that is added to the $14 billion we are now requesting it will result in a substantially larger amount. The fact of the matter is that there is no remaining borrowing authority that could be carried forward into the coming fiscal year; there will be no non-lapsing borrowing authority available as of March 31, 1981. All previous non-lapsing borrowing authority was used up by July, 1980, when we approved the previous borrowing authority bill. The borrowing authority obtained at that point was designed to lapse as of March 31, 1981. As a result, there is no borrowing authority to carry forward into the fiscal year 1981-82. The only borrowing authority which will be available to the government is the borrowing authority now being discussed in Parliament. I urge the hon. member for Edmonton West to listen more carefully when we explain that this $14 billion is the borrowing authority which will be available to the government in 1981-82. There is no more; that is all there is. I hope we get that point across this time.

The difference between the $11 billion financial requirements of the government shown in the budget papers and the $14 billion we are requesting in this borrowing authority was well explained by the Minister of State for Finance earlier today. The reason we are requesting that additional $3 billion is for contingency purposes. As the hon. member for Edmonton West indicated, if world prices were to suddenly rise by 50 per cent, the impact on the oil import compensation program would be substantial. This would have to be funded, so that possibility is being included in the $3 billion for contingency purposes. In addition, part of the borrowing authority, as has been the practice—not in the last two years but in the prior years—is designed not to lapse. It can be carried forward into coming fiscal years.

When the government came into power in February of 1980, it was faced with a problem. Parliament was called, but we could not get a borrowing authority bill through the House by the end of March, 1980. Had it not been for the fact that at that time we had some available non-lapsing borrowing authority, the government would have been effectively in a position where it could not borrow or it could not finance itself during the period between the end of March, 1980, and the time when the borrowing authority bill was passed in June or July.

We are asking for that same flexibility for our government and governments in the future. Normally we would intend to bring in a borrowing authority bill in January or February, as we have done this time, to be debated in the House for the fiscal year 1982-83, and to have this non-lapsing borrowing authority carry on as a flexible, contingent emergency measure, not to be used as is indicated by the financial requirements in the budget.

The estimates which were brought down clearly indicate the financial requirements. They will be approved by Parliament. Those are the spending authorities for the government. The borrowing authority is being requested to finance the difference between the revenues of the government and the expenditure plan, which is the financial requirement. It is quite proper and right; it is the way things have been done for many years. I expect it to be that way in the future.

The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) indicated earlier that because of the government's borrowing, it is crowding the private sector out of capital markets. All the evidence I have seen indicates that crowding out is not taking place. First, crowding out is not a very relevant concept. It assumes that the amount of available money for lending and borrowing in the economy is static, that it does not grow, that it does not expand and, as a result, if the government takes more there must be less for the business community and the business community must do with less. That is not the way in which the market system works.

In the market system there is the real rate of interest, which is the rate of interest paid, minus the inflation rate; it is the real gain people obtain from saving. If the real rate of interest goes up, then people will be induced to consume less today and save more. That expands the quantity of loanable funds. So, as the real rate of return goes up the supply of loanable funds increases. Therefore, there is a very clear test to see whether or not the federal government borrowing is crowding out—to use that phrase again, albeit improperly—or squeezing the private sector. The simple test is to look at whether or not the real rate of interest in the economy has been going up over time.

It just so happens that in the latest annual report of the Bank of Canada for 1980, which was tabled just a few days ago, we see on page 18 a diagram of the real rate of interest from the period 1970 to 1980. We find that the real rate of interest all during that time-frame has stayed below the average real rate of interest in the period 1956 to 1970. In fact, there is no trend, as shown by this document, which would indicate an increase in the real rate of interest. If there is no increase in the real rate of interest, that implies that the volume of loanable funds in the economy is sufficient to meet the demands of both the private sector and the public sector, without putting undue pressure on that supply. As a result, the crowding out theory put forward by the hon. member for Mississauga South is totally fallacious. I would suggest he go back and do his homework again.

Mr. Malone: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have noted with great interest the points just made by the parliamentary secretary. I wonder if he would entertain a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Will the parliamentary secretary entertain a question?

Mr. Evans: Yes, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact I will.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I have heard the description the parliamentary secretary is using to explain how interest rates might be quite different by using his calculations of averaging. As a Liberal Member of Parliament, would the hon. member say that if a person had his head on a block of ice and his feet in the firebox that, on the average, he would feel pretty good?

Mr. Evans: Given that most of the members opposite have their heads not on a block of ice but elsewhere, I would suggest that, on the average, that is not the case.

The document I have here from the Bank of Canada indicates the average annual rate. I would not want to mislead the hon. member. The figure is there, as is the diagram, for the hon. member to see. I suggest he look at the document. I know the hon. member for Mississauga South has a copy of it because when the deputy governor of the Bank of Canada appeared before the finance committee these documents were distributed at that time.

I would like to deal with another point, Mr. Speaker. We heard earlier with regard to the borrowing authority that the government was spending massively and that the government's forecasting abilities in the October 28 budget were very bad, according to members opposite. I would like to indicate that we have dealt with this subject before. Apparently, hon. members opposite are trying to leave the impression that their ability to forecast is much better than the forecasting ability on this side of the House. The figures given in the 1979 budget of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) were drastically different from the figures showing what actually happened in that fiscal year. The increases in world oil prices, which took place subsequent to the submission of that budget, and the increases in interest rates, which were not anticipated by the hon. member for St. John's West, and the recession which was worse than he had anticipated, have all been admitted to by the hon. member for St. John's West. I see hon. members opposite are shaking their heads, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Malone: That is right, because the recession took place after the Liberals came back.

Mr. Evans: As a result of those three factors, the deficit and financial requirements of the hon. member for St. John's West were understated in his budget by anywhere from $2.5 billion to $3 billion. This notion of fiscal responsibility and the ability to forecast so well is a total ruse being put forward by hon. members opposite.

Mr. Stevens: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. For the record, I think we must clear the misimpression that the parliamentary secretary has left. When he says there is any overstatement, what he is totally ignoring is the restraint program we had put in place with respect to spending. The truth is the government has ignored that restraint program and the trend line that we are now on for expenditures is exactly the same line that we knew we had to face, but had the courage to do something about.

Some hon. Members: Right on!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This appears to be a matter of argument.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I agree with you, it is argument, and not a very good one.

The fact of the matter is that the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West reflected that wonderful restraint program which the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) was about to bring into play. What I am saying is that even with that restraint program, changes in world events would have increased the financial requirements of that government to an amount that is higher than our forecast financial requirements for the fiscal year 1980-81. I will show the figures to the hon. member for York-Peel if he would care to see them.

Mr. McKnight: Table them!

Mr. Evans: If the hon. member will look back to the debate on the borrowing authority at the second reading stage he will find that those figures are tabled.

There have been some discussions by the hon. member for Edmonton West with regard to oil prices. I think we all agree that the oil import compensation program is costing the government, and the taxpayers, a substantial amount of money and, in fact, oil prices will have to go up. I want to clarify my understanding of what the hon. member is saying, which is that he would like to see oil prices increase much faster. If I am incorrect I hope the hon. member will correct me. I see he is nodding his head in agreement.

Mr. Lambert: They should have gone up a long time ago.

Mr. Evans: He wants to see the prices increase faster than would have been the case under the program of the hon. member for St. John's West. I just thought I should put that on the record, Mr. Speaker.

With regard to spending control, Mr. Speaker, we have talked about the ceiling on our borrowing authority. It is a case of six of one and half a dozen of the other. If you put a ceiling on the total amount you can borrow, and if you put a ceiling on the amount of increment that you can add to your total borrowing, you are controlling. We come before Parliament every year with that kind of control figure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, thanks to the parliamentary secretary I am left with only a minute to speak. It does not give me much of an opportunity other than to throw out a few lines. I would just like to mention the minister's—

Mr. Pinard: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With the hon. gentleman agreeing that one minute is a short time, maybe he would agree that we deal with the report stage now and third reading?

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Pinard: I just wanted it to be clear, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fennell: Mr. Speaker, I just want to get my one line in. The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) talked about circus jugglers. I would like to congratulate his government for being the greatest among circus jugglers. It is amazing that they are able to accomplish this with the number of clowns they have on their benches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 4 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall all orders preceding No. 42 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PARLIAMENTARY AND SENIOR PUBLIC SERVANTS' SALARIES AND ALLOWANCES

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF REMUNERATION TRIBUNAL

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing a Remuneration Tribunal composed of at least three full time members who shall occupy their posts during good behaviour, and whose duties shall include the annual review and report to Parliament on remuneration, allowances of all natures, entitlements and pensions payable to ministers, senators, members of Parliament, office-holders of the Parliament, holders of office at the executive level of the public service and the equivalent holders of public offices.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I sometimes feel that there are days when the fortunes do smile upon us. Rarely can an hon. member put forward an idea contained in a notice of motion four times within the period of one year, but such has been the case. I am grateful to the fates that have allowed me to do this. Today I want to speak about something to which I adverted at length during the second reading on Bill C-34, an act to amend the salaries of judges. We looked at this in some considerable detail in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, I was able to speak about it on another occasion earlier this year, as well as at the time of the adjournment debate last year. It is singularly apposite that we are discussing it today.

In April there were changes in some of the salaries of senior public servants. Judges have just received increased salaries as provided in Bill C-34. I accepted the level of pay with some reluctance. There did not seem to be principles contained in that bill upon which the salaries related to those of other persons in senior public service. We should be able to bring these together on some sort of rational basis.

As I have indicated before, the salaries and entitlements of deputy ministers at the executive level of the public service are based on what the cabinet considers to be acceptable as a result of the report of an advisory committee which has been known, for the past few years, as the Lambert commission, named after its chairman. There are those who hold privy council appointments through the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I fail to discern any real and objective principle for determining their scale of pay and benefits. I suppose, as a rough rule of thumb, it may have some bearing on their senior executive level in the public service.

There are those people who are most underpaid in the country, starting with the Prime Minister, cabinet ministers, Members of Parliament, and senators! People may say some are overpaid, but that is a global criticism. Those who raise this question are usually jealous. That is from where the chief criticism comes. It is natural, and we expect it.

During the nearly 25 years I have been in the House of Commons, I have seen scores of cabinet ministers leave here with their health burned out due to excessive pressures of office. Not only must they do a terrific job of administration, but they must also relate to other Members of Parliament, and they must always proceed at full bore. They must also be politicians, looking at their constituencies; they are always under the constant microscope of the people. The classic example of underpay and non-reward in this country is found in the office of the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert: It is a great honour to be Prime Minister, but, when we consider that presidents of corporations receive up to $300,000 in salary and benefits and that presidents of Crown corporations can make well in excess of $100,000, why is it that the Prime Minister gets a measly $80,000-odd? This is just a total reversal of the scale of values. That is the toughest job in the country. The amount of abuse which has to be taken by the occupant of the office is something to behold. Regardless of that, if you cannot stand the heat, get out of the kitchen. But on the other hand, he or she who levels that undeserved criticism or that blasphemous language, or what have you, is not thinking of that relationship in terms of the man who occupies that office.

Some people say, "Well, look, judges got $70,000 as of April 1, 1980, or $67,000 if they were in the county court." However, that is their sole source of income. As a lawyer, I would be the first to admit, that a corporate lawyer who earns maybe $125,000 or $150,000 before taxes might be the worst judge in the world. On the other hand, the man who makes only $45,000 or $50,000 from a small town practice could be one of the better judges because he may combine common sense with a sense of justice. He may learn how to be a good judge.

In justifying high rates of pay for lawyers, leaders of the Canadian Bar Association and other administrators of justice all too often ask how we will get the quarter million dollar man down into a court. Again, I would say that the quarter million dollar man is not necessarily the man who will be the good judge.

I was part of a large law firm, the senior earning partner of which said he would make the world's worst judge. He was the first to admit that. He would refuse to hear certain kinds of cases. He could not abide going into court to listen to what he called "domestic squabbles." He never felt comfortable with a case which involved personal injury. So the presumption cannot be made that a man who earns a big salary as a lawyer is qualified to be a judge.

I think we should compare the relative positions of these people. More than 20 years ago when I came to this House, a parliamentary secretary earned the same salary as a county court judge. Perhaps in total the judge earned more because he was given a surrogate allowance for handling the chancery side of the court, but the basic salary was the same. As of last April, that judge would be earning $67,000 per year and in a number of provinces would be receiving surrogate fees as well. This is particularly so in Alberta where there is only one level of court and the judge's salary is $70,000. On top of that, those who do surrogate work are paid the relevant fees.

The question is, what determines that level and the size of the increase that should be given? At the moment, there is built into the Judges Act a provision for a 7 per cent per annum increase or an increase equivalent to that which pertains to industrial wages. With all due respect, industrial wages have as much relevance to the salaries of lawyers and professional people as cheese has to oranges. It is not an appropriate scale to use for comparison, nor is it appropriate that it be applied to Members of Parliament.

As my studies indicated, with a 7 per cent increase for 15 years, by 1995 the salary would be $194,000. That is mind-boggling. If we all have to face inflation on that scale, then senior citizens will draw about $500 per month in old age security, by 1995! That will not mean they will be any better off, of course.

Not long ago the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) produced a 20 billion mark note from the old Weimar Republic, issued before the balloon went up in 1923. Imagine, a little piece of paper being worth 20 billion marks. The government does not even use that kind of figure in its inflated budgets. All these things must be brought together.

I propose that we should follow the Australian example and adapt it where need be. We should establish a remuneration review tribunal composed of three persons. In Australia such people are appointed for five years but I would suggest that in this country they be appointed "on good behaviour."

In Australia the persons involved must not be connected in any way with government; must not have served elective office for seven years; must not be part of the public service and the chairman must be a judge of a state court or one who is entitled to be appointed to a state court. The equivalent in Canada would be a provincial judge. The review board places annual announcements in the national press that it will receive representations with regard to a number of stated offices. It then hears representations and the government must appear before the board as a party. The board examines all the relevant data and in some instances representations may be passed over. The judges may appear before the board but not seek an increase for a particular year, or the government may rule that as the industrial increase in a certain year was 4 per cent the judges are entitled to the same increase. The government may also hold that certain categories should receive an increase. In any event, everything is out in the open.

The review tribunal makes its findings with regard to all the categories of persons upon whose salaries it must adjudicate. The report is tabled in Parliament and within 15 days the recommendation goes into effect unless more than 50 per cent of members of the House of Representatives and the Senate sign a motion to oppose it. When I was in Australia in 1975, that is precisely what happened. All the salary increases were deferred for one year.

In addition to salaries, the tribunal sets emoluments; for instance, such privileges as transportation for the wife or children of a Member of Parliament or a senator. Overseas travel is ruled upon by the tribunal but, strangely enough, pensions are not. In some states, the remuneration of the premier and cabinet ministers are also ruled upon.

In this country this thankless task could be removed from Parliament and the public would feel that not only had justice been done for this whole category of people but that it would appear to have been done. I think that is one of the difficulties with the present system. I do not subscribe to the argument that it is morally wrong for Members of Parliament to set their own salaries. That happens all the time in the business world. In many instances, people adjudicate upon matters where one might think there would be a conflict of interest. For instance, in this House members who are farmers assist in setting the level of subsidy to be paid on a particular crop or set the price of wheat or cattle. There are other things to be determined by members as groups. We see that at all levels, the school board, the city council, the county council level or what have you. It is the nature of the beast that it has to be done. Sometimes it is a difficult thing, but I hope this proposal I have made will be accepted.

I hope a House committee will take up this matter and carry it further to see whether or not it is practical. It is practical enough for the Australians. Since 1973, when the system was implemented there, it has worked well and it has been copied in New Zealand. New Zealand now has a body dealing with high level salaries. New Zealand pretty well deals with salaries all the way through to its tribunals. New Zealand has this higher level, and I am told by parliamentarians and diplomats that the system seems to be working well and has a degree of acceptability by the population.

I commend this resolution to hon. members for further consideration. I hope that rather than just talking it out, we might be able to handle it in some way so it could be given further consideration. Maybe we can get around to doing it now. The Senate and House of Commons Act, as it provides for the salaries of members of this House—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member because he has exceeded his allotted time. The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne).

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate this afternoon. First, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for putting this motion on the Order Paper for debate. I think it is a very worth-while motion. It is something on which we should focus as Members of Parliament. However, I have a few questions which I will outline. I am not questioning this in any critical sense, only in a positive way. The motion says, in referring to the duties of the tribunal, the following:

—shall include the annual review and report to Parliament—

But the motion does not say that Parliament would have authority to alter the motion or whether it would simply have to accept or reject it, as is the case in Australia.

The motion also lists several groups whose salaries the tribunal would review. They are as follows:

—ministers, senators, Members of Parliament, office-holders of the Parliament, holders of office at the executive level of the public service and the equivalent holders of Public Offices.

I wonder whether the hon. member would wish to include in that category judges for whom, as he noted, this Parliament had recently granted increases in salary? He did not mention what qualifications he would like to see for members of this tribunal. For instance, would he want a member of that tribunal to be a judge? Would he want a former Member of this Parliament to sit on that tribunal? Would he ask a former member of a provincial legislature to be a member of the tribunal? Those are the kinds of questions I would like him to address. I realize, of course, those questions can be addressed in committee. I am not criticizing the motion, I am simply pointing out some of the questions I have about it.

I agree with the hon. member in his assessment that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), ministers of the Crown, members of this House, and I believe of provincial Houses—in some cases at least—are not being adequately paid for the time they put in. I know it is a difficult matter for members to talk about. Personally, I do not have a lot of difficulty with the argument of some people that we should not be increasing our own salaries. The major argument I have, which I suppose could be a bit embarrassing, is that this matter is dealt with so unexpeditiously by this Parliament. When it is dealt with, usually a fairly significant increase is granted. This makes it look as though all of a sudden Members of Parliament have become very greedy. If this matter were reviewed on an annual basis, and maybe if we had not tampered with the formula which was enacted in 1975, we might not be in a position today where we are discussing this kind of motion.

As the hon. member for Edmonton West pointed out, it would be useful to look at some of the methods used in other countries. He referred to Australia and New Zealand. As I understand it, the situation in Australia is pretty much the way the hon. member described it. However, I want to add to what he said, that the act in Australia contains provision for Parliament to accept or reject the actions of the commission, but not to modify them. On the other hand, in New Zealand, there is a higher salaries commission. It has declaratory powers with respect to the compensation of senior public servants, heads of Crown corporations and Members of Parliament. It also acts in an advisory capacity for judicial salaries. There is no provision for review of its actions by Parliament. In other words, it is supreme in its recommendations. Whether we would want that in Canada is something which would require a considerable amount of reflection and debate.

In the United Kingdom there is a top salaries review body which is advisory in nature to the prime minister. I would judge from that that the prime minister or the government of the day would still have to bring before parliament a bill to implement the decisions of the top salaries review body. It consists of various panels and it deals with the compensation of the senior public service, the heads of nationalized industries, the judiciary, senior military ranks, Members of Parliament—and hon. members will note that Members of Parliament are in the list of priorities—doctors and dentists of the national health service and other ranks of the armed forces. Those are three examples of what is done in other systems with the British parliamentary system of democracy.

It might be useful for us as well to take a detailed look at what some of the provincial legislatures in the country do. I will not go into that in detail, except to say it is my understanding that in some of the provinces members of provincial legislatures are earning more in salaries and benefits than Members of Parliament at the national level. That tells us something regarding our position, vis-à-vis other levels of government in Canada. Even at the municipal level, some mayors are being paid, if not more, at least on a level equivalent to cabinet ministers and, in some cases I believe, equivalent to the Prime Minister. That situation raises some questions in my mind.

The hon. member for Edmonton West spoke also of the comparability between salaries of Members of Parliament and county court judges. He recounted that when he came here the salary of a parliamentary secretary was comparable to a county court judge. That is no longer the case. However, what I would be more concerned about is the disparity in salaries between Members of Parliament and members of the public service. I do not say that in any way to begrudge civil servants their salaries.

It strikes me as rather odd that some deputy ministers earn more than their ministers. If the figures I have are correct, the Clerk of the Privy Council earns more than the Prime Minister, as do the heads of Crown corporations. If we are to have good people to head our Crown corporations, obviously we must pay them good salaries. If we are to have good deputy ministers, the managers of our public service, we must pay them comparable to what they would earn in the private sector, or that is where they would go.

I do not suggest that a Member of Parliament should earn as much as a deputy minister. It is not that I do not think a Member of Parliament is not worth as much, but if we are to have good deputy ministers, the major managers of our public service, the business of the country, they must be well paid. If they are not well paid, they will go to private industry. We are lucky to have the calibre of people we do at the senior management level of our public service.

I believe it says something for our system when information officers in departments of government earn the equivalent salary of a Member of Parliament. That seems to be getting down fairly well in the pecking order of the various departments. If a position is at the level at which a Member of Parliament is paid, that is the level of importance that will be attached to the role of a Member of Parliament.

It is often forgotten by those who write facile commentaries about the salaries and benefits Members of Parliament receive and the role they play what the workload is and the number of hours actually worked. We constantly hear the charge that there are very few members here in the House. There are not many here right now. I am not critical of that situation on most occasions. While there may only be a relatively small number in the chamber, 80 or 100 members may be required for committees. On a Friday afternoon most members head back to their constituencies where they have to work the other two days of the week. For most members, their work week is seven days, almost every day of the year. If members were to determine the hourly rate for the number of hours they work, some would be receiving only the minimum wage. Long before I was elected, I believed that Members of Parliament should be paid a reasonable salary and that all expenses incurred in the performance of their duties should be covered from public funds. I would apply that principle to members of provincial legislatures and those serving on municipal councils.

I would object to Members of Parliament, members of legislatures and municipal councils being paid exorbitant salaries. I do not believe anyone should become wealthy by serving in public life, but neither should he be poverty stricken. Their children should not be denied a good education and as good a life as their contemporaries. That has happened with some Members of Parliament in the past and is happening now.

In some cases widows of former Members of Parliament have suffered grievously from financial instability. There are cases of members being defeated before accumulating significant pension benefits. In fact, some accumulate no benefits at all. Some have been unable to find other employment quickly. There are employers who consider service in the Parliament of Canada a detriment to employment. That situation should not pertain because someone has served in public life.

There are numerous ways in which the problem can be resolved. It should not be left to Parliament. In the past six and a half years Parliament has been reluctant to deal with the issue of members' salaries and services. While I do not have that reluctance, I can understand it. We owe the public an explanation of what we are doing and some justification for the level of our salary. I repeat it should be a salary that is defensible but not exorbitant.

We recently gave final approval to a bill which provides for a triennial review of judicial compensation by an advisory panel which will report to the Minister of Justice. Perhaps we should have a similar arrangement for Members of Parliament. In his motion, the hon. member suggests a tribunal of three. I feel there should be more members, but that may not be necessary if they are full time. It would be interesting to see the level of remuneration paid to that tribunal.

Mr. Lambert: The same level as judges.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The hon. member says the same level as judges. That would seem to be a reasonable level for that kind of important position. They would have to be in a comparable range with others doing the same kind of work. They should not be overpaid. The public must respect their judgment and not call them into question every time they bring in a report. I would like to know whether their report would have to be judged in Parliament, imposed, or whether it could be rejected.

Those are my basic views on the motion. I compliment the hon. member for bringing the motion before the House for debate. I hope it will go to committee for detailed study and a report back to the House.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suspect there is nothing more predictable in this place than the view I shall express with regard to the matter being discussed during this private members' hour. The matter before us in the motion presented by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has to do with the appointment of a tribunal to review salaries of Members of Parliament and various other categories. But I think it is fair to say that most of the discussion by the two members who have spoken thus far has been in defence of higher salaries for Members of Parliament. As I say, I imagine that my view on this is thoroughly predictable, in fact I hope it is. I also know it is not exactly a popular view in this place, but I have said many times and still feel that one of the ways we can demonstrate to Canadians that we have come here to serve them is to be much more careful about what we think should be our emoluments, benefits and pensions.

● (1640)

It is easy for us to say that those who criticize our salaries, benefits and pensions are just people who like to criticize or they are jealous, but the fact is that this institution exists to serve the people of Canada and that phrase "the people of Canada" includes millions who are having a tough time; not just the pensioners, widows and veterans on whose behalf I speak most often, but many working families, including those where both parents work, and I think in some way we need to demonstrate that we are concerned about them first.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, there is something wrong with me, but that is why I came here. It is a story I have told on occasion and I may have occasion to tell it again, but not today. I came because I was concerned about what was happening to people. I know that I speak about the 1930s and early 1940s when I came here, but I have the feeling that every time we get up and defend higher salaries and better benefits for ourselves we widen the gulf between ourselves and the people out there.

As the two hon. members, I am not advocating that we should be at the poverty level or that our salaries should be much lower than they are now, but I do not think it would hurt us to try and establish the proposition that we come here to be of service. I would hate to see the day when the salaries paid here are so attractive that men and women would be encouraged to come here just because it is a good paying job. It would be far better for us to emphasize the proposition that what this place needs is men and women dedicated to the service of their fellow creatures and the well-being of their country, those who are prepared to sacrifice a little bit to render that service.

I find it difficult to use that word because it is not a sacrifice at the level of pay we receive even now, and it goes up by 7 per cent every year. It is not, as one member said, a case of waiting a long while before there is an adjustment. That used to be so, but for the last several years it has been 7 per cent each January, and to use the comparison made by the hon. member for Edmonton West at that rate our pay will be way up in the stratosphere before long. I plead that we establish the principle that you come to Parliament to be of service, and prepared to work for a little less than you might be able to get somewhere out there.

Mind you, I think that is a bit of a myth. It is so often said that people are working here for a lot less than they could make elsewhere. Well, maybe that applies to some of the lawyers and doctors who are here. I certainly never said that. I have had more pay in this place than I ever had in the jobs I had before coming here, and you can laugh at that because the salaries at that time were nothing compared to salaries today.

I thought it was touching for the hon. member for Edmonton West to be concerned about the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I respect that office and its occupant but we are paying him something in excess of $80,000 a year, we provide him with a very nice house, everything found, and he makes lots of trips. If the day comes when he retires, and there are people in this country who hope that day is not far away—

An hon. Member: Not too many.

Mr. Knowles: —he will have—Well, my hon. friend says "a small pension." Having been a member for at least six years, he has his parliamentary pension; having been Prime Minister for more than four years he will have a prime minister's pension, equivalent to a judge's pension. He will also have his old age security pension and Canada Pension Plan, and all of these pensions will be indexed. Say all you want about that not being much compared to what Ian Sinclair of the CPR can get, or even some of the benefits that may accrue to public servants, but to the Canadians who vote for us that is pretty good.

As for ourselves, some members complain about the level of salaries and so on. However, we should take into consideration all the other things that come our way. I suppose I am more conscious of them because when I came here I could not get something mimeographed unless I got Arthur Beauchesne's signature on it. Telephone calls and the like were not even on the list, and as for travel we had a railway pass good at any time, but we got our out of pocket travelling expenses only twice a year. So we have come a long way. Then there is the help we get with constituency offices, the literature we can send out and one of the best pensions in the country. I know it takes awhile to get it up very far, but as long as you have six years you get the pension for life, no matter what your age may be.

I suppose this is a debate we may have on some other occasion if a certain proposal comes in, and I do not expect members to agree, they never do, but I want to put the damper on this notion that Members of Parliament are hard done by. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I was a little surprised the debate took this turn. When I looked at the motion of the hon. member I assumed we would be debating the creation of a remuneration tribunal in strictly relevant terms. I said to myself: I wonder if I can veer a little bit from that and start talking about our salaries. I did not have to; the whole debate has been on that subject. I just want to say, if you will, it is the same old view I have always had. Maybe you can pick holes in it, but I want to put a damper on the idea of higher pay. I would like at least one voice in this place to say to the people out there that I think it is a privilege to serve in this place. You cannot pay us for it.

My hon. friend is quite right in talking about the hours, 14 hours a day, seven days a week, 52 weeks a year. You cannot pay for that. All of us know, too, that there is another price we pay, and that is the difficulties of family life, being away from one's wife and children and so on. The sacrifices made in that area around this place are tremendous. Even if you raise the salary to $100,000 or $200,000 a year, you cannot pay for that.

This brings me back to my feeling that the main purpose in coming here should be to serve the country. I do not want it to be established that you try to get here because it is a good job with good pay, good benefits, and all the rest. Rather, this is the place where people are needed because they are dedicated.

Having used all this time to talk about what is not in the motion, having been prompted to do so by the last two speakers, I should like to say a word about the motion itself. I think the idea of an independent tribunal which would look at all these salaries has merit. However, I attach two conditions to it. First, the recommendations of the tribunal should be subject to parliamentary approval. One or perhaps both hon. members said what they would like to do is get away from raising our own salaries. Mr. Speaker, we cannot divest ourselves of that responsibility. Even if we merely set up a tribunal and never have to pronounce on what it has done, the fact is that we set it up and give it the authority. We will not be able to say in the future, as the children of Israel said to Moses—my knowledge of the Scriptures is becoming somewhat rusty—

An hon. Member: Shame.

An hon. Member: Just when they have become important.

Mr. Knowles: That is right. Moses had been away and the children of Israel produced the golden calf so they could worship it. He chided them for it, and they said to him, "It is not our fault; we just put in the gold and out came the calf". We cannot divest ourselves of that responsibility. We can say that we passed it to someone else, but it does not work that way.

The second condition I would attach to this committee is that the terms of reference for that tribunal should be drawn up very carefully. I do not want it manned or womaned by high-priced judges, high-priced lawyers or high-priced corporate executives, as we have done in the past. I can think of some who have brought down reports that were tremendous. I think there would have to be, on any such tribunal, some pretty good representative Canadians like workers, farmers, school teachers, and maybe even a pensioner or two. On that score I would want more than three members. I think somewhere, in whatever legislation there might be to set up such a tribunal, there have to be words, even if they are words that are in the nature of a preamble, which would remind the tribunal that its purpose is to keep in mind why people come to Parliament, why they become cabinet ministers or judges. The answer to that is that they come to these positions, not to get oodles of money, but to serve the country. I think the rewards for that service, even though it may be tough and you may have to stay at it for years and years, are tremendous; you cannot match that with pay.

I expected just to say I support the idea of a tribunal with the two provisos, one that Parliament should be responsible, and two, that it should have the necessary terms of reference, but I am grateful to my colleagues for having made the speeches they did in order that I could express once again the views every member in this House knows I hold.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I had anticipated we would be speaking about the splendid recommendation of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). The problem we have faced around here is not only in dealing with our own salaries but, as the hon. member has indicated, in coming up with some principle that will guide governments, the tribunal or us in our deliberations about comparability and what is appropriate in the circumstances with respect to salaries.

I have not been here as long as the hon. member for Edmonton West or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, though a little longer than the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne), but it seems to me in the 12 or 13 years I have been around here it has been like trying to grab a handful of fog when trying to determine what would be the appropriate compensation for a Member of Parliament. I know it has been said there are too many lawyers in Parliament, the fact is that the kind of work to be done here requires, in many cases, a certain degree of education or ability to do a specific job. Everyone who comes to the House brings necessary talent or a skill. But if there are so many lawyers and if they form a nucleus, it seems to me that compensation somewhat comparable to that of the legal profession might not be too far out of line.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says he came here to serve. I think every Member of Parliament can stand in his or her place and say exactly the same. The hon. member said that the cut in pay he took was not really all that great; that, as a matter of fact, he is doing very nicely, thank you. I believe at one stage he was a United Church minister. I know how hard my father fought to increase the salaries of United Church ministers because, like everyone else, United Church ministers not only have the opportunity to serve, they also have families to look after and children to put through university. There may be a vicarious thrill for the spouse and children in the fact that their husband and father is in the United Church ministry or in the House of Commons, but that does not pay the bills when it comes time for university education or some other kind of necessary training.

We did make financial sacrifices to come here. That is true of many of us who came to this chamber. To try to determine the degree of financial sacrifice we were asked to make or the degree of compensation to be paid to someone who never made that much money before in their life, is extremely difficult. Do we measure it in terms of hours spent, in terms of our dedication, or in terms of the length of time spent here?

One of the great things about the House of Commons and the pay scale here is the fact that all Members of Parliament are paid the same. By that I mean backbench members are all paid the same. We recognize the importance a member on the government side brings to his portfolio or to his job. We say it is equally important that we have a strong and effective opposition. So, very clearly, those particular tasks are the same and should receive comparable compensation.

I like the idea of a tribunal and I think all the questions asked by both the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi should be dealt with at committee stage. They were both very careful not to say an MP should get "X" number of dollars a year. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said the compensation should not be too high, and the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi said it should not be exorbitant, beyond that which is reasonable. Neither of them put a figure on it, but somebody has to do that. The responsibility is ours. Surely when a tribunal such as this has to make a decision, it has to go into the background of MPs and what we are required to do. Only in that way can its members come up with a figure which, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, not only is just but is seen to be just.

I do not wish to talk this out, Mr. Speaker, because I believe it has considerable merit. The questions which have been asked here are questions which should be asked in the committee, if the recommendation is referred to the committee.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, unlike my friend, the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), I am prepared to talk out this motion for one good reason. The fact is that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is, through his motion, embarking on an unprecedented course of action which could cause a great many problems. The motion would set up a commission which would deal not only with MPs' salaries but with public service salaries. So far as I am concerned, there is a dangerous link—

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

CALL FOR WITHDRAWAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas in a unanimous decision last Friday the Alberta Court of Appeal ruled that the federal government does not have the authority to tax exports of gas owned by a province, therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

That the Minister of Justice be obliged to apologize for the ill advice he has tendered to the Crown, and that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources now withdraw his destructive national energy policy and replace it with a system which is both equitable and constitutional.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT SPENDING PRACTICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, price increases are averaging above 12 per cent this year. A continuation of inflation at even 10 per cent a year will mean that a 30-year-old Canadian earning $10,000 today will need an income of fully $255,000 a year to stay even in purchasing power at age 65. Full indexation for inflation of the Canada Pension Plan at a 10 per cent inflation rate will, in 35 years from now, require $92,000 per year for such an individual, and fully $68,000 per year for old age security pensions. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney):

That this House condemns the grossly irresponsible spending and money printing practices of this government which are the major cause of rampant inflation and, thus, the real threat to decent retirement incomes for present and future Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

CALL FOR RE-EXAMINATION OF GOVERNMENT APPROACH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. This week just past underlined further the negative effects the Lalonde—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Towers: —energy policies are having on the Canadian oil and gas industry when the one hundredth Canadian oil drilling rig left the country for the United States. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the government re-examine its entire approach to energy questions so that we might have an orderly program of exploration and development with security of supply and fair and equitable prices. Otherwise, Canadians, as losers, will pay.

EMPLOYMENT

APPLICATION OF HEIGHT AND WEIGHT STANDARDS TO JOB APPLICANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

I recently had the pleasure of meeting with over 100 of my new constituents of Vietnamese and Laotian origin—the boat people, of whom there are close to 200 in my riding—and listened to their pleas for assistance and fair treatment in three languages. They are, of course, thankful for the generous help they have received, but they still have many problems. One serious problem relates to improper and unfair obstacles to employment, namely, arbitrary broad standards of height and weight restrictions quoted by industrial employers.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this House declare that arbitrary standards of height and weight being quoted to industrial employment applicants of Indo-Chinese and other origins are discriminatory, unfair and unCanadian; and, further, that this House, in recognition of basic human rights and of the historical contribution which Canadians of oriental and Asian origin have made to the Canadian economy, particularly in western Canada with respect to the original building and supplying of the CPR, demands that all Canadian employers give equal consideration to all employment applicants with landed immigrant status and/or Canadian citizenship in order that these new Canadians may be accorded a full and equal opportunity to contribute to their new homeland.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED TABLING OF PRIME MINISTER'S SPEECH ON CONSTITUTIONAL RESOLUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, the government House leader has suggested that speeches by members on the Constitution be printed in Hansard rather than delivered in this House. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That the Prime Minister dispense with oral delivery of his speech today and instead submit it for printing to appear in the back of Hansard—

Some hon. Members: Right on!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Domm:

—thereby demonstrating to the House the government's sincerity on their claim that there is nothing new to be said and, thus, allow the opposition ample time to expound on the dangers in the proposed constitutional package.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE PRIME MINISTER

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, prior to the Prime Minister's speech this afternoon, whether it is appended to Hansard or not.

In view of reports that the Prime Minister's close friend, the Hon. Gérard Pelletier, is to become Canada's ambassador to the United Nations, and in view of persistent speculation that the Prime Minister's push for constitutional reform is directly linked to his own personal timetable on the world stage, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

● (1410)

That the Prime Minister use the occasion of his second farewell speech later this day to tell the Canadian people whether he has his eye on a senior role at the United Nations, thereby putting personal ambition ahead of the interests of this nation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The former auditor general, James Macdonell, has warned that soon the Canadian dollar will not be worth five cents. If the Grit government does not get its act together to get the 12.2 per cent inflation rate reduced, Canadian workers will continue to be robbed of billions of dollars a year by inflation. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House call for the resignation of the Minister of Finance as he has proven he is incapable of managing the finances of this nation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

LEADERSHIP OF PROVINCIAL LIBERAL PARTIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that the 2½ year vacancy for the Liberal leadership of Manitoba has been filled by a former Liberal candidate from Calgary who was brought to Manitoba at public expense only last May to be a special assistant to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), at a salary of over $36,000 a year, and since this "Albertan" may be ineligible to run for election until 1982 because he does not meet Manitoba's residency requirements, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant):

That the federal government be instructed not to use the "mobility of labour" clause in the constitutional package to override provincial election laws, and that in future government employees brought into a province to aid dying or dead Liberal parties be asked to read provincial laws.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AID

SUGGESTED EXPEDITING OF DONATION TO ZIMBABWE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43. Today marks the commencement, in Salisbury, of the Zimbabwe Donors Conference, known as "Zimcord". It is taking place on the eve of Zimbabwe's first anniversary, an achievement which symbolizes the success of the democratic process, and an averted racial blood bath. The only post-war reconstruction funding which Canada has given amounts to $3 million. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House urge the government to authorize its regrettably low level delegation to the donors conference to scale its announced $50 million—over five years—aid package to Zimbabwe, so that most of the money is available now, at the time of most urgent need, and so that the United States and other governments will be encouraged, by our Canadian leadership, to honour earlier pledges to Zimbabwe.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PETROFINA CANADA

USE OF GOVERNMENT CREDIT CARDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Government of Canada claims it will provide good services and cheap gas to individual Canadian motorists by establishing Petro-Canada service stations and by purchasing Petrofina Canada Incorporated. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources provide similar services to users of Government of Canada credit cards by directing Petrofina Canada Incorporated to abandon its practice of refusing government credit cards.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

ALICE ARM, B.C.—DUMPING OF TOXIC WASTE BY AMAX MINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas Amax of Canada plans to dump 200 tons of uranium in their mine tailings into Alice Arm in northern British Columbia, and such an act is governed by the London convention, of which Canada is a signatory, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the federal government immediately file with the OECD an environmental impact statement regarding the Amax mine, and that the government call for a moratorium on the project until the OECD has had a chance to investigate the proposed dumping.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

HOUSING

SHELTER ALLOWANCE PROGRAM

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works who is responsible for CMHC. I should like the minister to stand in his place and tell us why he broke his promise to introduce a housing shelter allowance this year.

An hon. Member: Because the Ontario election is over.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, there was a representative of the party of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition at the All-Sector Housing Conference which was held three weeks ago. I am sure that if he inquired of the critic for housing in his party about the speech I gave at that conference, to which I believe the right hon. gentleman is referring, he would learn the context in which discussion was introduced to the country at large on the issue of shelter support. I am sure that he would then join with many other people who have indicated that the subject is worthy of serious consideration. If the right hon. gentleman checks the speech he will find that was the context in which the subject was raised.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I have checked the speech and I know the context was that the promise was made as an attempt to bribe the electorate of Ontario.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: By the way, Madam Speaker, it is an electorate that they are more interested in attracting to the Liberal party in Ontario than they are in attracting to the Liberal party in the province of Quebec. I know also that in interviews given after that speech the minister said that the program would be introduced this year. I want the minister to stand in his place now and tell this House of Commons why he broke his promise to provide a housing shelter allowance program this year. Why did he make it? Why did he break it?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, the groups which would benefit most by such a program, apart from those people who are presently benefiting from such programs in four provinces, other than the province of Ontario, are groups that will be supported with the combination of the MURB provision in the budget of last year in this House and with the initiatives taken by the Conservative government of the province of Ontario both prior to the most recent election and during that election, with add-ons, with what they call the super-MURB program. I am sure that group of people and that income group will be addressed by the combination of those programs. So, in answer to the right hon. gentleman, I must say that I think he is misdirected if he thinks that the province of Ontario is the province or an area that would benefit the most or, indeed, is a target area.

ASSISTANCE FOR HOUSEHOLDS AFFECTED BY INFLATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister has twice refused to answer why he broke, within a month, this solemn promise to introduce a housing shelter allowance this year. He broke that promise the day after the provincial election was lost, the outcome of which he was trying to influence.

In the publication issued by CMHC, his own department, there was a clear indication that, in 1979, 567,000 households in this country were not able to afford adequate and suitable shelter. The situation would be worse now. The minister has broken the promise he made less than a month ago. Let me ask the minister what he intends to do this year to help those 567,000 households which are caught by inflation, caught by unemployment, and which are now caught by a broken promise made by this minister?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, as I indicated in my opening remarks to the All-Sector Housing Conference, it is the intention of this government, as I indicated in this House on other occasions, to study seriously the question of shelter allowance and to ask for provincial response to it. Unlike the government of the former right hon. gentleman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cosgrove: —who asked for a report, who got a recommendation to study a shelter allowance in October, 1979, and then sat on that report during the last federal election because he was embarrassed by it, we are actually doing something about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1420)

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROGRAM CANCELLATION

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for CMHC. The community services contribution program was cancelled last fall two days after the Ontario municipal elections. After building up the public's expectations that a shelter allowance would be introduced to alleviate the hardships faced by Canadians trying to find adequate shelter, in a speech made in early March which I heard, the minister has further delayed consideration of the program, announcing the delay the day after the Ontario provincial election.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Lewis: Through you, Madam Speaker, my question to the minister is this: is this not another broken promise made for cynical political purposes and cancelled with cynical political timing?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that in the Matthews report to which I just referred in my last answer, the recommendation was made to the previous government, of which the hon. member was a part, to terminate the same program, a recommendation incidentally which did not see the light of day until four days after I became the minister responsible for that portfolio in this government.

Mr. Malone: Yes, or no?

Miss MacDonald: At least you don't pull it out and cancel it the day after the election.

PREDICTED NUMBER OF HOUSING STARTS

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the minister responsible for housing. Last week the minister was predicting an additional 10,000 housing starts directed toward low and middle-income people. Despite the introduction of the MURB provision in the October budget, multiple unit dwelling starts are down 32 per cent over the same period last year. Why is the minister suggesting an increase of 10,000 starts when, in fact, there has been a decrease of 9,000 starts?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, when I last mentioned the matter of the 10,000 starts in the House, I am quite sure that I referred to a report which appeared in the Toronto Star approximately two weeks ago. In that report, the company experts and those actually involved in multiple construction and starts in metropolitan Toronto recorded that there had been, through the combination of the MURB and the provincial super-MURB program, those actual starts coming on stream. I was merely recording the facts. If the hon. gentleman has some facts to the contrary or wishes to contradict these, I would be happy to hear from him. I am confident that in metropolitan Toronto there will be an increase in starts in the multiple areas as a result of those two programs.

IMMIGRATION

FUNDING OF SETTLEMENT SERVICES

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It concerns the weekend conference on immigrant women held in Toronto. First, I wish to register a formal complaint that members on this side of the house were barred from attending this conference.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mrs. Mitchell: The minister is aware that I hosted a non-partisan settlement meeting in Vancouver recently to which all politicians, representatives of schools, settlement agencies and government officials were invited. Since the prime concern of participants at this meeting, and certainly of people in all provinces, is that the federal government, which is responsible for immigration policy, must shoulder responsibility for the cost of its policies rather than leaving it as a burden for local government—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mrs. Mitchell: What action has the minister taken to do away with the three-year limit he has for funding of settlement services, a policy which discriminates against immigrant women in particular, and will he replace this policy with a funding formula which will be—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, it is too bad that the hon. member has seen fit to provide some negative comments about what was a very useful and very effective conference. This conference brought people from right across Canada to discuss one of the most important issues affecting immigration and women in general. I think the results of the conference and the kind of discussions which ensued have been most helpful to those involved as well as to those in government.

I think that if the hon. member had followed the proceedings of the conference more carefully, she would have recognized that we announced a number of new initiatives at that conference—

An hon. Member: Come on, Lloyd.

Mr. Axworthy: —including a commitment to undertake a serious integrated approach to language training, which is unquestionably the most critical concern in the integration of women and of immigrants into the work force. The Minister of State for Multiculturalism and I undertook to provide the fulfilment of that commitment at the conference, and I think it was well received by all those attending. The only person who seems to be complaining is the hon. member.

● (1425)

POLICY RESPECTING LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS FOR DOMESTIC WORKERS

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I can appreciate that the minister wants and needs to make political points, but the fact is we were not invited to this conference. I certainly hope that he also has approved funding for multicultural—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member must stick to the question.

Mrs. Mitchell: The minister has indicated that he may ease procedures to allow domestic workers to come to Canada as landed immigrants. Therefore, will he implement this policy immediately? Will it be retroactive, and will it contain amnesty for such people as Daphne Williams who is facing deportation and, if deported, will be unable to support her aging parents and five children in Jamaica?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would question who is trying to gain political points in this particular period. The objective of those of us at the conference was to establish new initiatives to ensure that immigrant women get a more fair deal and to correct some of the inequities of the past. That was the point of the announcements that we made. The commitments we made in terms of domestic service workers were to ensure that they would have full opportunity at jobs if they lost their first place of employment, and to review the point system to give them greater opportunity to come here as landed immigrants as opposed to transit workers. We will bring about those changes after we consult with the provinces.

In the meantime, we are releasing a major discussion paper by Mary Eberts, an expert in the field, so we can get a full reaction and response from provincial governments and leaders of various minority groups. We are going to proceed in a responsible and proper way and not be pushed into it by the kinds of comments made by the hon. member.

FUNDING FOR ENGLISH LANGUAGE LIFE SKILLS PROGRAM

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It is with regard to the pending March 31 cut-off of funds for the special English language life skills programs designed to assist in the settlement and integration of the some 60,000 Indo-Chinese refugees here in Canada.

Will the minister take immediate action to extend the funding for these vital and necessary basic programs, plus including provision for child care while attending classes, to ensure that Canada will fulfil its commitment to these new Canadians, who surely have suffered enough, in order that they may have a fair opportunity in seeking employment and have a chance to make their contributions to their new homeland?

My question to the minister is this: will we love them in 1981 as we loved them in 1979 and 1980?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would point out to the hon. member that when we tabled in this House the report on immigration last October, we indicated, as a government, that the major thrust of our efforts in the forthcoming year will be to provide additional resources and support to the settlement of immigrants and refugees in Canada. We have already introduced additional programs to provide for that support. We announced others this weekend. We will continue the funding of the ISAP program.

Furthermore, we are now negotiating and developing a brand new settlement program that will provide for a much broader degree of involvement of the private sector and the voluntary sector in helping us out with this very important problem. Our thesis is not like that of the group in the corner, which is to have government do everything by government. We want to recruit and enlist the tremendous energies and enthusiasm of the volunteer and private people in this country, which they demonstrated in bringing people over, and they are prepared to do the same in helping people settle in here. That is the philosophy over here.

ENERGY

EFFECT OF ALBERTA COURT OF APPEAL DECISION RESPECTING NATURAL GAS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister and his officials will have had the weekend to study the Alberta court of appeal decision on the natural gas tax reference. In view of the potential significance of that decision I would ask the minister whether his advisers have had an opportunity to study it and whether the government has yet decided to seek leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. Also, has the decision prompted the government to rethink its tax regime with respect to western resources in particular?

• (1430)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Justice has received a copy of the court of appeal judgment and his officials are examining it. No recommendation has been made to the government yet, but I am sure that the minister will want to advise his colleagues in the next few days as to what steps he is considering.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Well, notwithstanding that, Madam Speaker, I would ask the minister whether or not this decision has in fact caused the government to reconsider its own tax regime as brought down in the budget by his colleague, the Minister of Finance? In fact, Mr. Leitch, and the producing provinces are now considering the merits of a plan whereby those provinces would take their royalties in the form of gas production I would ask the minister, in view of that and the fact there are upcoming discussions with Mr. Leitch and his counterparts in the producing provinces, whether or not he is prepared to look at alternative methods of raising revenue because the present tax regime is under serious attack and questioned by the courts of this land.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I would advise my hon. friend that matters of taxation are more properly relevant to the Minister of Finance and that is to whom the question should be addressed. As far as the court case is concerned, it is a matter of decision whether or not an appeal should be made and in due course the House will be advised.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DISPUTE BETWEEN CORPORATION AND JOURNALISTS' UNION IN QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Is it true that the latest offer of the CBC French network to its 180 journalists in Montreal, Quebec City and Rimouski is final and that no further negotiations are possible, as Mr. Paul Mousseau of the CBC declared to the Montreal Gazette? In addition, can we expect return to work legislation in the near future, thus withdrawing the right to negotiate?

[English]

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the offer made by Radio-Canada was described by management as their final offer, their final position, and that offer is presently before the union to be voted on. That vote is now under way with the results expected, I believe, tomorrow evening. Obviously any future discussion between the parties is dependent upon the outcome of that vote.

[Translation]

Mr. Kilgour: I have a supplementary for the same minister, Madam Speaker. What does the minister intend to do to avoid another strike of the 1,100 employees of the CBC French network? Is he going to let the conflict drag on so that the French-speaking population will have even less of the information to which it is entitled and for which it will pay taxes just like all other Canadians?

[English]

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, I am not sure about the hon. member, but most hon. members are fully aware of the Department of Labour's role, and it is not within our power to order parties to agree. We provide probably the most able mediation service of any government in the country with a very, very high level of settlements. It is strange that when strikes are settled or avoided, there are never any questions. It is only in relation to the odd or unusual one, where the parties take a particularly difficult position, that a question comes forward. However, I am sure the hon. members on that side of the House would be able to explain to him the limitations on the power of the Department of Labour and what our actual role is.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADA WORLD CENTRE—QUERY RESPECTING ROLE AND FUNDING

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and relates to the proposed futures secretariat for which draft incorporation papers were signed some days ago. I understand it is being set up as a non-governmental organization under the name Canada World Centre, with an application for a substantial initial grant from CIDA. He is aware, no doubt, that the setting up of a new government-sponsored NGO to publicize international development issues has been strenuously opposed by the existing NGO community. Many NGOs are seeing their matching grants from CIDA lag far behind the increase in private sector funding. Can the Minister give us the assurance that the Canada World Centre will not parallel or undercut the activities of established NGOs in the field of public education?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I share the hon. member's concern, but he has his facts a little wrong. The organization being set up is not a government-sponsored NGO. That would probably be a contradiction in terms. It is an NGO setting itself up and applying to the government for operational funding, which we will consider in due course. Of course, in funding NGOs we are concerned whether or not their functions overlap, and so we will look at all these questions in the allocation of funds. I might say, by the way, that NGO funding is again being generously increased this coming year.

Mr. Ogle: In the North-South report we had indicated there should be increased funding for public awareness programs, but not through the forum of a non-government organization. Does the minister not agree that the centre must be seen as something more than a public relations exercise to sell foreign aid to the Canadian people and not fulfil the whole question of education?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I am not sure if I understand what the hon. member is referring to now. Is he referring to the North-South Institute or to the futures secretariat? I cannot answer the question because I am not aware of what he is referring to in his question.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CLASSIFICATION OF IMMIGRATION OFFICERS WORKING AT VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the fact that immigration officers at Vancouver airport have, on average, a 63 per cent heavier workload than those at Toronto airport, and a 125 per cent heavier workload than those at Dorval, would he please clarify to this House why the immigration officers at Vancouver are classified as level 1, PM1, while their counterparts at Toronto and Dorval are classified as level 2, PM 2, and would he please tell this House what steps he has taken to regulate this discrepancy?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's question points out the serious workload all immigration officers have in performing a very important duty. I can tell him that the matter of wage and position levels has been examined and reviewed, documents have gone to Treasury Board, and it is now a subject of negotiations between my officials and those of the union. We hope they will be completed in a very short period of time and those inequities will then be overcome.

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLAND—REQUEST FOR CONVENING OF NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, concerning the deteriorating situation in Poland which Lech Walesa, the Solidarity leader, described on the weekend as being far more serious now than it was last fall. The minister will recall that when he returned from the NATO ministerial meeting last December he stated in this House that the NATO foreign ministers would be called together immediately upon an intensification of the crisis.

Given Walesa's statement and the fact there are now some 25,000 Warsaw Pact troops on manoeuvres in and around Poland, and given the increasing fear of Soviet intervention to resolve domestic tension, will the minister say whether or not such a meeting has been called and, if not, will he undertake to suggest that to his NATO counterparts so that they can deal forthwith with the increasing threat of Soviet intervention in Poland?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the Polish situation is indeed such as to give us cause for some concern at the present time. However, no meeting of NATO foreign ministers has been called because it is not believed that this is the kind of intensification for which such a meeting would be useful. Indeed, I would hesitate to suggest such a meeting to my colleagues at the present time because of fear that it might intensify the already serious difficulties there.

• (1440)

The Soviet troops are not present at this time because of any disposition relating to the present problem—or at least not to any apparent one—but because of their normal manoeuvres at this time of the year. For us to intensify the situation even further by calling a NATO meeting, in these circumstances, would not help the situation.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO REQUEST FOR AID

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, on this issue the government has continually failed to show any leadership, and I am sure that the Canadian people are not satisfied with the role which has been taken by the Prime Minister of simply sending a friendly letter to Mr. Brezhnev to tell him what the Canadian attitude is.

I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs another supplementary question which has to do with the statement by foreign minister Genscher of West Germany on his return from Poland last week. At that time he stated that West Germany would be prepared to offer economic assistance to Poland, and he called on other western countries to make a specific commitment to aid Poland economically so as to try to alleviate some of the tensions which exist there. What has been Canada's response to that particular and specific request?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the request which has come to us is not from the government of West Germany but from the government of Poland. Of course we have taken that very seriously. It has both bilateral and multilateral dimensions. On the bilateral side we have given an extension of credit for the immediate future. On the multilateral side we are working with our other allies to work out a general program for the relief of Polish debts. In other words, we are doing exactly the same thing West Germany and the other countries involved are doing.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

MORTGAGE INSURANCE FUND—GOVERNMENT CONTINGENCY PLANS

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for housing. It is prompted in part by his answers to my colleagues. I want to ask the minister about the actuarial soundness of the mortgage insurance fund, which has over $20 billion worth of potential liability outstanding and practically no cash reserves. Since the minister has had the benefit of the Peat, Marwick study, the assessment of the controller general, as well as the Matthews report, to which he referred and has had ample time to study—unlike our government—what is he going to do? Is he setting up any contingency funds to guard against the contingencies implicit in AHOP and other recent mortgages which are liable to go bad, unlike the earlier mortgages which were taken out years ago and are financed at a lower rate of interest?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the corporation, through its aggressive sales program over the last 18 months, has been able to repay the loan taken from the last government to assist it in meeting claims under the mortgage insurance fund. My understanding is that, of $250 million drawn, approximately $175 million has been returned thus far, and as I indicated in response to an earlier question this year by the hon. gentleman, with the improved and strengthening markets the prices are, of course, improving. That has improved the sales position of the corporation, with the result that it is anticipated that the money borrowed to bolster the fund will be returned and, in fact, the corporation is in a much better position vis-à-vis recouping some of its losses.

REPORTED LOSS IN MORTGAGE PORTFOLIO

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I understand that while the sales program may have been a success—and I am happy it was—more units have come into the MIF than have gone out of it.

Let me ask the minister whether he was correctly quoted recently by a Halifax columnist to the effect that while the ostensible market value of the mortgage portfolio of CMHC stands at about $11 billion, the real market value is only about $3 billion. If that is true and if that is the case, does the minister intend to elaborate on this and tell the House and the country a bit more about this multibillion loss?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I have no recollection today of the figures the hon. member mentions or of the information he has quoted from a newspaper. Without having specific numbers in front of me, all I can do is comment, as I did generally, and say that with the strengthening market I do not think that the proportions used by the hon. member are accurate at all.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

QUERY RESPECTING SOVIET MILITARY EXERCISES CONDUCTED IN AREAS ADJACENT TO POLAND

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is supplementary to those asked by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, except that I would like to direct them to the Minister of National Defence.

My question concerns the troop exercises in and around Poland which are going on at the present time. Would the minister tell the House if Canada was invited to send observers to watch these exercises and, if so, in what manner did we respond?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I assure the hon. gentleman that there have been no requests for us to participate in these exercises.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, I thought that the minister might be aware of the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act respecting observers at exercises. If he is not, could he tell us if he has been briefed by our NATO allies as to the number of troops involved in these exercises and what types of divisions they are using during these exercises?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I would explain to the hon. gentleman that when there are NATO exercises we participate in them as requested by NATO headquarters or commands. As a NATO member we are always glad to participate in any exercises NATO would undertake.

HOUSING

PROGRAMS TO MEET NEEDS OF NATIVE PEOPLES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for housing. At a public meeting in Moose Lake, Manitoba, on the weekend I heard complaints about the deplorable state of housing in the native community. I subsequently saw some of those terrible conditions. Just over two weeks ago in Ottawa the minister acknowledged that more than 100,000 units of new housing would be required to meet the minimum needs in our northern areas, and particularly on Indian reserves. What specific programs does the minister have in order to meet those needs soon?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the issue of Indian housing needs and the lack of the adequate programs to serve the many thousands of native families to which the Leader of the New Democratic Party refers are quite apparent and have been apparent to all hon. members having anything to do with the provision of housing through the federal agency. It was to that end that approximately a year ago—before I became minister responsible for the portfolio—a review was undertaken.

However, in addition to identifying the need specifically and narrowly for housing, there is also a very strong feeling that the native people should be part of that review and, indeed, they have been part of the review over the last 12 months.

In addition to that, as soon as we start studying housing needs and looking at remedies to respond to the lack of services, we immediately come to realize that in the provision of new housing or in providing services, the natives should also be part of that response, so I am happy to say that the native organizations, together with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and officials of the corporation, have completed that review. They have completed drafting a program. That program has been submitted to the two ministers involved and, when we have made a submission to our cabinet colleagues, the program will be presented once again to both native bands and off-native bands, and we will be addressing those needs in the near future.

REQUEST FOR ACCELERATED PROGRAM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have been in the House for 13 years, and every other year there has been a review of housing needs of native people which has not met those needs. It is time for some action.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that at the 1981 rate of housing starts the minimum needs, as described by the minister himself, will not be met for 60 years, and since he has now told us he has another report at which he is looking, will he make a commitment today that the minimum needs of the native people of Canada will be met, not ten years or 15 years down the road, but completely within a maximum of five years?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has an advantage over me. I have had only one year's experience in this House. I have used that year to inform myself of the housing needs of Canadians generally. I agree with the hon. member that the most pressing need and demand for housing and improved housing standards in the country are those with respect to native Canadians. I hope my cabinet colleagues and members of the parties opposite will join with the government when we bring that program forward, because I think it is urgent.

THE CONSTITUTION

EFFECT OF CHARTER OF RIGHTS ON ABORTION PROVISIONS IN CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development. It is my understanding that the government interprets the charter of rights in the proposed constitutional resolution as it pertains to the question of abortion as being neutral.

What assurance can the minister give that Section 7 of the charter of rights will not be construed so as to make abortion, in the early phase of pregnancy, essentially a matter of privacy and thus protected from the sanction of the Criminal Code?

The Supreme Court of the United States, in dealing with a constitutional provision guaranteeing individual liberty, inferred that the concept of liberty included the concept of privacy and that the concept of privacy makes abortion, in the early phase of pregnancy, essentially a private matter, not a matter upon which the state should enact a penal sanction.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the question has been debated at length in the committee. I have stated the position of the government in this matter, that the question of abortion is dealt with in the Criminal Code and in no way can the charter be used to interfere with the actions of this Parliament in relation to the Criminal Code and abortion.

Mr. Hawkes: Wrong!

GRAIN

CONGESTION AT PORT OF VANCOUVER—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of the congestion in grain terminals in the port of Vancouver, resulting in the lowest level of space in the terminals in several years, some 49,000 tonnes. There is a scarcity of ocean vessels arriving at the port of Vancouver. Over the last two shipping weeks only four shipping berths were utilized during that time. Also there is a record number of cars en route and in terminal position, and the unloads are declining. In view of these facts, could the Minister of Transport tell the House why this lack of co-ordination is occurring and what he is prepared to do about it?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the hon. member gave a very adequate description of the complexity of the rapeseed situation.

Mr. Mazankowski: Not rapeseed, grain.

Mr. Pepin: Grain in general, but particularly applicable to the rapeseed situation.

Mr. Mazankowski: No.

Mr. Pepin: If it is the entire grain situation, I am sorry to say that my hon. friend is wrong. The delivery at Winnipeg—the delivery at Vancouver has been extremely good in recent weeks.

Miss MacDonald: Or somewhere!

Mr. Pepin: I have the figures here which I can share with the hon. member. The rapeseed situation has been a difficult one. In that particular instance the acting grain co-ordinator met with the industry. There were problems with respect to inland elevators and producer cars. They have agreed now on the sharing, the percentage in each instance, and it is my information that the situation will continue improving.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, my information is more up to date than that of the Minister of Transport. I should like to quote the latest Alberta agricultural statement on west coast traffic. They described the situation as "becoming critical". The fact of the matter is that ships have not been arriving on time. There are over 9,000 cars loaded with grain, waiting to be unloaded. There is only room for 49,000 tonnes.

What is the minister doing to ensure better co-ordination for the arrival of grain to terminal position and the arrival of ships? Is he not aware of it? If not, will he look into it immediately?

Mr. Pepin: I also have the kind of information my hon. friend used to have.

Mr. Mazankowski: You had better read it.

Mr. Pepin: Indeed the situation is difficult in the port of Vancouver, but my information is that, generally speaking, the situation has been quite good up until now, with an increase of 4 per cent to 5 per cent in unloading at the port of Vancouver. The present situation is a temporary one which will be rectified.

HEALTH AND SAFETY

MEASURES TO ELIMINATE HAZARD OF INFANT CRIB DEATHS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It concerns infant crib deaths as a result of high colonial-style corner posts. Since individual manufacturers recognize the hazard involving the cornerposts on very popular colonial-style cribs, but no individual manufacturer wants to eliminate them because of the risk of competitive disadvantage, can the minister say what changes he has made or is making to the Hazardous Products Act? What is his department doing to compel manufacturers to modify the design of these colonial-style cribs?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I will check that question with my department officials and report to the hon. member as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Would he verify that crib manufacturers themselves have been asking the department to compel them either to modify or eliminate these cribs from the market, and that one of his department's spokesmen has been saying that there has been a good deal of foot-dragging within the department on this very serious and controversial matter?

Will the minister assure the House that he will press his cabinet colleagues to back his own officials, so that circumstances leading to the tragic death of a little girl in Peace River will not be allowed to repeat themselves again?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, I will check that question as well.

ENERGY

PRODUCTION AND USE OF METHANOL AND ETHANOL AS ALTERNATIVES TO GASOLINE

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact we can use waste products to power cars and that we can grow crops on land, which cannot support food crops, to make fuel for our cars, will the minister consider developing new energy industries around locally-produced fuel, whether methanol or ethanol? Also, will the minister recommend that the Excise Tax Act be changed so that farmers could become energy-sufficient by devoting about 10 per cent of their crop land to fuel alcohol production?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, certainly I will study with great interest the representation of the hon. member and also draw it to the attention of the Minister of Finance.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STAFFING PRACTICES OF PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION—RESIDENCY RESTRICTION RESPECTING EMBASSY APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The minister will know that I rose in the House last Monday to ask why one had to be a resident of either Ontario or Quebec to become a secretary in one of our diplomatic missions.

On Thursday the Public Service Commission indicated that it simply bowed to a policy request of the Department of External Affairs. Could the minister tell the House whether or not he personally accepts responsibility for that policy? Could he enlighten the House on why he thinks living in eight provinces, the Yukon or the Northwest Territories, should make one ineligible to represent Canada abroad?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am not familiar with that reply of the Public Service Commission, and I will take that question as notice.

Miss MacDonald: At least say you do not believe in it.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, that answer is astonishing, in that same press release indicated that the commission told the Department of External Affairs, as of last Thursday, to broaden that competition to include all provinces of Canada. For the minister to stand up here four days later and say that he is unfamiliar with it is simply unacceptable.

Is the minister telling the house that he and his department have taken no action to broaden that to include the cities of eight provinces, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, or are we still in a situation where one must live in Ontario or Quebec to work for the Canadian Department of External Affairs?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, the hon. member's question is highly inflammatory. I will reply to it on a subsequent date.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. I think that the House deserves an explanation.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Lalonde: The deputy minister is from Winnipeg.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Is the minister now prepared to make a statement on these unusually restrictive provisions in recruiting Canadians to serve Canadians abroad, that they should be drawn from only two provinces? I think this is outrageous; there used to be a decent public service.

● (1500)

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, if I had been prepared to make a statement like that today I would have made it. I will make it in due course.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GREENAWAY—DENIAL OF MISS BÉGIN RESPECTING DEATHS OF JAMES BAY CREE INDIAN CHILDREN

Madam Speaker: I have notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin.

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with reference to an exchange which took place on Friday, March 20, between myself and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). The reference in Hansard is at pages 8454 and 8455, wherein she implied that I was not telling the truth in this House regarding the deaths last year of three children from the James Bay of northern Quebec. The minister said:

—I repeat that ten small children did not die last summer, as the hon. member indicated. That is completely untrue.

I would like to read into the record—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Greenaway: —the names of the four children who died in Mistassini in 1980. One, Patrick Samuel Mattawashish, son of Charles and Janie Mattawashish, died at the age of three months—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is entering into debate with respect to his question of privilege. I would ask him to restrict his remarks to the privilege that he feels has been breached.

Mr. Greenaway: Madam Speaker, I have here the list of nine children who died last summer in Cree villages. I would like to put their names on record.

Madam Speaker: That is not relevant to the question of privilege. If the hon. member feels that his privilege has been breached, he must explain to me in what way that privilege has been breached and not enter into debate on the question which was put to the minister.

I have read the statement which the hon. member has given me as notice of his question of privilege. As I read the statement, I frankly feel that he does not have a question of privilege. The hon. member says that some unparliamentary language was used and that it reflected on his reputation. If one looks at the list of examples of unparliamentary language as set out in Beauchesne, then I agree with the hon. member that we have two lists and that they are contradictory. If the list does not help us we must go to another factor, which is the factor that some trouble or commotion would have been caused in the House by the words that an hon. member had used. At the time when the minister used those words, indicating that the statement was false, there was no trouble or commotion in the House. The hon. member did not rise in his seat to protest at that time. Thus, in this instance, I feel that the hon. member does not have a question of privilege and that the language used was not unparliamentary.

Mr. Greenaway: Madam Speaker, she obviously called me a liar—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. We cannot debate the question any further, since I have already ruled on the hon. member's question of privilege. I assure him that the basis of this statement does not allow me to find there is a question of privilege in this particular circumstance.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, you have made a ruling, perhaps prematurely, with respect—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —on the basis of a written notice. I said perhaps.

Unless I am wrong, and I stand to be corrected, I understood that the basis of the written notice was to inform the Chair of the area in which the privilege lay and that the member, on the basis of that, was to be allowed to put his point. The written notice is the pre-condition for allowing the member to make his point. I have not heard the member make his point in the House, which he has a right to do.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is right, the purpose of the notice is to give the Chair an idea of the area in which the question of privilege might arise. But members are also invited to present some of the arguments that they feel they want to invoke in favour of that question of privilege.

The hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin rose in his seat, began to describe his question of privilege, then immediately entered into debate. I had to conclude that he was debating the question rather than exposing the question of privilege.

Also, from the statement I received, which consists of about ten lines, I was able to conclude that the hon. member did not have a question of privilege but rather was dealing with a question of unparliamentary language, which at the time was not challenged.

PETITION

MR. WILSON—POSSIBLE INVASION OF POLAND BY U.S.S.R.—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on behalf of 275 constituents of mine who have presented me with a petition requesting that the Canadian government clarify its stand on the possible threat of Soviet invasion of Poland, and to deplore the government's lack of action to date in this regard.

I think this is a particularly timely petition in view of the military manoeuvres by Russia in Poland last week and the existence of the military in Poland, and also the harder lines taken last week by the police in Poland with respect to activists.

I am therefore pleased to represent those who have signed this petition and who have asked me to speak on their behalf in urging this government to take a strong stand and clarify its position with regard to the very serious danger of intervention by the Soviets in Poland. This is particularly true in light of the response of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) in answer to a question today.

THEREFORE until the motion of the Minister of Justice for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada and any amendments thereto have been finally disposed of, Standing Order 6(1) and Standing Order 40 shall be suspended and, notwithstanding any other Standing Order, Private Members' Business shall be suspended, and the House shall sit from 10 o'clock a.m. to 1 o'clock p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays for the consideration of government business; and Standing Order 6(3) shall be read as if it said "At 11.59 o'clock p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays, at 10 o'clock p.m. on Wednesdays and at 7 o'clock p.m. on Fridays, Mr. Speaker shall adjourn the House until the next sitting day".

Madam Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 21(2), this notice of motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders later this day or at the next sitting of the House.

[English]

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I simply wish to give notice that if and when this motion is moved I shall raise a point of order with respect to the final paragraph thereof. My point of order will be based on citation 311 of Beauchesne's fifth edition, which reads:

Under no circumstances may a member merely table a speech for printing in Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I appreciate the hon. member giving me notice of the point of order which he would raise if and when this motion is brought before the House.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I rise on the same point of order, Madam Speaker. We have some reservations as well about the matter, which we will discuss at the time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

UNAUTHORIZED PRESENCE IN CHAMBER OF PHOTOGRAPHER

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have been informed—and this can be verified by Your Honour—that contrary to the understanding which exists in the House with respect to the presence of photographers in the House there is a photographer on the floor of the chamber, or in the alleyway, who is not one of the members of the press who have been authorized to be here on an experimental basis. I understand that this photographer is a photographer from the Prime Minister's office. I have been informed that his name is Robert Cooper. He is a stranger in the House and I would ask that he be removed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Quite obviously the permission for photographers was limited to the two photographers from the Canadian Press. This was agreed to after consultation among the different parties in this House. If there are other photographers present I would ask them to leave, please.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 132, 1,504, 2,031 and 2,038.

[Text]

RIGHT HON. JOHN G. DIEFENBAKER—STATUE, PARLIAMENT HILL

Question No. 132—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the former government appoint a person to select a site for a statue on Parliament Hill of the Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker and, if so, who was appointed?

2. Does the government intend to change any of the arrangements or decisions made by the previous government on who will be involved or what site will be selected and, if so, what are the details?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. The office of the former prime minister contracted with Mr. Keith Martin on January 23, 1980, for services for the period January 23 to February 21, 1980, "to study and recommend possible appropriate means of recognition by the Government of Canada for the late Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker". Mr. Martin requested advice on March 7, 1980, as to whether "the present government wishes me to continue my services". Mr. Martin was requested to continue his work and advised that the government looked forward to receiving his report. The report was received on April 8, 1980.

2. The present government is not aware of "arrangements or decisions made by the previous government".

BERGER INQUIRY—LAWYERS EMPLOYED

Question No. 1,504—Mr. Turner:

1. How many law firms, counsellors or lawyers were employed by the Royal Commission on the Mackenzie Pipeline (the Berger inquiry) and (a) what was his/her name (b) what amount was he/she paid per diem (c) what was the total that he/she received?

2. How many days did each counsellor or lawyer work?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The following two law firms and one self-employed lawyer were employed by the Berger inquiry:

(ii) Decario & Waddell,

(iii) Mr. Michael Jackson.

(a) Name of Firm/Lawyer	(b) Per diem	(c) Total Paid to law firms (includes fees)	(2) Days Worked (average)
(i) Cameron Brewin & Scott		$ 497,564.00
I. Scott	$ 75.00 (per hour)		77
S. Goudge	50.00 "		77
I. Roland	50.00 "		77
A. Ryder	50.00 "		77
(ii) Decario & Waddell		$ 110,768.00
Ian Waddell	$ 2500 (per month)		270
(iii) Mr. Michael Jackson	$ 2500 (per month)	$ 103,578.00	250

NOTE: In part (c) it was not possible to indicate the total amount each individual lawyer received as each was paid by the law firm for which he/she was employed. The response therefore lists the total paid to each law firm in question, with the exception of Mr. Michael Jackson who is self-employed.

CADC—SALE OF PRINCIPAL ITEMS OF MATERIAL OR EQUIPMENT 1979-80

Question No. 2,031—Mr. Herbert:

What were the principal items of material or equipment obtained in the fiscal year 1979-80, from the (a) Department of Public Works (b) Department of Supply and Services (c) Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, for sale by the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows:

(a) Department of Public Works—Chemical and laboratory test equipment, assorted wood, laboratory furniture and shelving, and a scow;

(b) Department of Supply and Services—IBM processor and assorted furniture and equipment;

(c) Canada Mortgage and Housing corporation—Assorted furniture and furnishings.

N.B. Principal items are defined as reports of surplus declared having an acquisition cost in excess of $100,000 or a recovery value of $25,000 or more.

CANADIAN PENSION COMMISSION—RELOCATION

Question No. 2,038—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Are there 217 positions in the Canadian Pension Commission scheduled to be relocated in Prince Edward Island and, if so, how many of the employees have actually agreed to move?

2. What was the total cost, so far, to the Department of Veterans Affairs for the P.E.I. move apart from land and buildings?

3. Has there been an increase in the forecast of the $23 million total cost of the move?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): 1. There are 217 positions in the Canadian Pension Commission scheduled to be relocated in Prince Edward Island. The number of employees who agree to move will not be known until nine months prior to the official date of relocation of the positions. At present, the tentative official date of relocation for the CPC is September, 1983.

2. The total cost, so far, to the Department of Veterans Affairs for the Prince Edward Island move, apart from land and buildings, is $9,867,400.

3. Yes. The present forecast is $35 million. The increased costs are directly attributable to several events that have occurred during the past three years: the decision to relocate the Veterans Land Administration originally slated to remain in Ottawa. The delay in the anticipated completion date of the new Veterans Affairs building in Charlottetown to September, 1983, from September, 1981. This delay resulted from the decision in 1979 to change the building site and meant a rephasing of the relocation schedules to span a five-year period rather than the originally planned three-year period. Consequently, additional resources were needed to support increased parallel operations, staffing, and communication links between Ottawa and Charlottetown. The introduction of legislation affecting War Veterans Allowance/Civilian War Allowance and Canadian Pension Commission benefits. This legislation necessitated a review and revision to the manual and automated benefit payment systems being developed as part of the relocation package.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that questions Nos. 533 and 2,057 be deemed to have been made orders for returns?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Towers: Madam Speaker, I have asked the parliamentary secretary on four different occasions if we could have an answer to question 811. This has to do with the metric conversion program which the government has been foisting on the Canadian people, a program which they do not want. It would be nice to know exactly what the administrative costs of that program will be. The Canadian people have the right to know the cost as it is their dollars which are being spent.

I would hope that in the not too distant future the parliamentary secretary can tell us what the Metric Commission is costing Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Collenette: I will certainly give my undertaking to reply to the question.

I would ask that all the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I regret that for the second time I must ask the parliamentary secretary about two very straightforward questions which I placed on the Order Paper on May 14 relating to costs of the McDonald commission of inquiry. Simply because this commission has turned into an annuity, there is no reason why the answers must also. These are very factual questions. I would respectfully request the parliamentary secretary—this is the second time I have asked him, and I have waited for some weeks since the first time—to see whether he can give me this data, some of which goes back to 1977. That was a year after the commission began work.

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, I wish to bring question No. 2,040, to the attention of the parliamentary secretary, which I placed on the Order Paper in January of this year. The question is: What is the estimated number of additional beds that will be required for the domiciliary care of chronically ill veterans for 1981, 1982 and 1983?

As there is a long list of veterans waiting for entry into these military hospitals and the veterans' organizations across Canada are very concerned about this matter, I would appreciate it if the parliamentary secretary would contact the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs to supply me with an answer as soon as possible.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I would like to draw attention to two questions which I asked about on several previous points of order, just to jog the memory of the parliamentary secretary. One is question No. 132, pertaining to the rental of a DC-9 aircraft which the Liberal Party of Canada used during the election of May, 1979. The bill for this rental was still outstanding at the outset of the election of February, 1980, last year. I asked whether the Air Canada bill had been paid, how much was paid, and various details about the delay in paying this bill.

I was advised by people within Air Canada that the answer was made available to the government approximately one and one half or two months ago. I therefore find it rather difficult to understand what has happened to it in the meantime, in view of all those devious channels it must pass through on the other side of the House.

I do not have the number handy, but I am sure that the parliamentary secretary would be familiar with another question I have had on the Order Paper for two years and some months—I am not sure how long over two years. It relates to a number of members of the Canadian Transport Commission who have passes to use Air Canada services. That question has been raised in every session of Parliament, but it has gone unanswered. I think it would be easy to answer, unless there are some people in the Canadian Transport Commission, or their spouses, who hold passes to which they are not entitled.

For that reason I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary if he could give the House a rough estimate as to when these two questions could be answered. Perhaps I should ask him to give a precise estimate, as one question has been unanswered for over two years.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) knows, I cannot predict which given day I shall table any given answer; but I have made notes of the comments today, and I will do my best. I would note that we have answered some 80 per cent of all questions on the Order Paper.

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, last Thursday evening I commenced speaking on the amendment to the resolution presented by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp).

I begin by congratulating the joint chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal), whose fairness and belief in the parliamentary system contributed to the make-up of that committee and allowed it to work. I hope he will give that feeling of fairness and parliamentary tradition to some of his colleagues and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). If he does, I am sure this House will be a much better place. I would like to add special congratulations to the hon. member for Provencher who, not only through the debate in that committee but also from early on last spring, was the main spokesman for my party on the constitutional resolution.

I would also like to offer additional thanks to the hon. senator from Quebec, Arthur Tremblay, who is well known in his province for his intellect and concern and who is now known in Canada as a man who puts this nation ahead of all else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, we have heard hon. members from the other side say that this debate has carried on far too long, that it is unnecessary. I do not want to contradict them; but when we are writing a constitution which not only myself and my children, but also my grandchildren and citizens of Canada yet unborn, will have to live under, time should not be a consideration. We should ensure that this resolution respecting the Constitution of Canada is well and perfectly written.

I would like to go back a little bit in history. It took us from 1864 to 1867, in Canada, with Canadians, to write the present BNA Act. Because of the time taken and the concern shown by those Canadians, those Fathers of Confederation, when the BNA Act was presented by Canada to the United Kingdom at Westminster, only one small change in the wording was necessary; A "united colony" was changed to "Canada".

If we do nearly as well with the presentation of this Canada Act, as it is called, we will have done well; but we have not done that yet. We do not have before us a Constitution written by Canadians for Canadians; we have a Constitution which is written by the Liberal Party. That is not acceptable to the majority of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKnight: Relating to the length of this debate, I would like to bring to the attention of the House that there was another debate, the pipeline debate, which lasted from May 1 to June 6, 1956, some 32 days. There was a flag debate extending from June 15 to December 15, 1964, lasting 33 days.

We started this debate on October 7, and this is now only the twenty-ninth day of debate. If a debate on a pipeline takes 32 days, and a debate on a flag—just a symbol of Canada—takes 33 days, a debate on a Constitution under which we will be asked to live and which will change the powers of provincial governments, the powers of the judiciary and the powers of this House of Commons and the Parliament of Canada should surely take longer than 29 or 33 days.

An hon. Member: Well said!

Mr. McKnight: The amendment presented by the hon. member for Provencher would delete the referendum procedures as outlined in Clause 46 of this resolution. The government has tried to argue that with the referendum the people of Canada will have the final say in drafting our Constitution. I do not believe that. The power will not be in the hands of the people; it will not even be in the hands of Parliament.

● (1520)

Section 44(5) of the resolution reads as follows:

(5) If Parliament does not enact laws under subsection (4) respecting the rules applicable to the holding of a referendum within sixty days after receipt of a recommendation from a Referendum Rules Commission, the rules recommended by the commission shall forthwith be brought into force by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada.

That means the cabinet, the governor in council, will set the rules for the referendum even if the House of Commons does not. How will that affect the people of Canada, the people we are supposed to represent in this House, those whom the government continues to maintain will be represented in making the Constitution? How much power will this leave the provinces when an order in council of the cabinet can overrule Parliament of the provincial legislatures? I am sure the Prime Minister and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) are aware that they lack support for this constitutional package. They know that it is not the government, not the Liberal Party nor the NDP party that should control the destiny of Canada; they know that the power should be vested in Canadians. That is what the majority of Canadians believe and that is the Canadian tradition.

Canada was designed on the parliamentary system with the legislatures of the provinces and Parliament being the final court in their respective jurisdictions. This resolution will hand much of the power over the life of Canadians to the courts.

Federalism has worked in Canada for 115 years. It has made Canadians one of the most envied races in the world. Federalism has worked because reasonable governments and reasonable leaders in this House and in the provincial legislatures have wanted it to work. It could continue to work if this government and the Prime Minister would be reasonable.

The government is imposing on the people of Canada the long-rejected Victoria formula for making future changes in the Constitution. We on this side of the House have presented an alternative based on the Vancouver consensus. The criticism of the Vancouver consensus is that it will allow the provinces to opt out. The advantage of the Vancouver consensus is that it will allow the provinces to opt in to the parts of the Constitution with which they wish to be involved.

Section 46 of the resolution creates several classes of provinces and several classes of citizens in Canada. There are the first-class provinces of Ontario and Quebec, which have the veto; there are the second-class provinces of British Columbia and the four Atlantic regions; there are the third-class provinces such as Alberta, and the fourth-class provinces, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Second, third and fourth-class citizenship for the people of Canada is created by this resolution. Four classes of provinces that wish to add something to the Constitution of Canada are created. What is the status of these provinces if they wish to prevent something being added to the Constitution at a future date, however? There will still be the first-class provinces of Quebec and Ontario; one second-class province, British Columbia; Alberta will remain third class; the four Atlantic provinces will be fourth class, and a new class has been added for Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

It seems strange that the New Democratic Party, with representatives from Manitoba and Saskatchewan, can bear to see their provinces and mine relegated to fifth-class or even fourth-class citizenship in this country.

In talking about the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures, we must look at the eight parts of the constitutional resolution. The first part contains the Charter of Rights and Freedoms; the second part deals with the rights of the aboriginal people of Canada; the third part deals with equalization and regional disparities; the fourth part makes it mandatory for the Prime Minister and the premiers of the provinces to meet once a year; the fifth part deals with the interim amendment procedure—and this is important to the provinces; the sixth part provides for an amending procedure two years after the act comes into effect; the seventh part deals with non-renewable natural resources, forestry resources and electricity; and the eighth part deals with the language of education.

The reason I go through these, Mr. Speaker, is that only the second part of the resolution deals exclusively with something within federal jurisdiction; all the other parts change or create different laws, statutes and methods of operation to be imposed upon the provinces. Only one part out of eight deals with federal jurisdiction.

The constitutional resolution takes from Parliament and from the legislatures of the provinces the ability to protect citizens' rights and places it directly in the hands of the courts.

It removes the supremacy of Parliament and establishes the supremacy of the courts and of the governor in council in the lives of Canadians.

There are two reasons for having entrenched rights, Mr. Speaker. The first is to entrench those rights so that they may not be removed; the other reason for having them entrenched in the charter is so that the people of Canada may know what their rights are and therefore may continue to demand them.

The resolution before us achieves neither of those objectives, however. It does not entrench rights and it does not educate the people of Canada about their rights. We on this side believe that there should be a charter of rights, but it should be one that is permanent and should ensure that the rights will not be changed in any way.

We should like to have Parliament supreme, as it should be, and we should like to have the courts supreme, as they should be. The people of Canada must be represented and it is only in the Parliament of Canada that this can be properly done.

The Supreme Court is not responsible to anyone; it is appointed by the Prime Minister. According to the constitution of the United States, the President may appoint members to their supreme court but the appointments must be ratified by the senate. This will not be the case in Canada. I feel this goes against the parliamentary democracy on which our country was founded and which, we hope, will continue to exist.

I should like to speak for a moment about what happens when the Supreme Court rules on a question that is political, not legal. I think all hon. members are familiar with the Dred Scott or the Scott Sanford case in the supreme court of the United States. Mr. Scott was a black descendant of slaves who had asked to be declared free by the supreme court. The court ruled that because of his ancestry he could not be set free. That decision went against the will and wishes of the majority of people in the United States. What followed in the United States was a civil war, before they made their twelfth amendment. I am not trying to say that there will be civil war in Canada; I do not want to go that far.

An hon. Member: Then don't.

Mr. McKnight: An hon. member opposite says "Then don't". If the government will not listen, if it is not receptive to the opposition which is trying to assist it draft this resolution, then why do we have what we call a parliamentary democracy in this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKnight: We may not have civil war in this country, but we will have communities and large groups of people who wish to withdraw their support, remove themselves from this country and perhaps form a different country. We will have people who will reject the fabric of the Supreme Court and of the judicial system, because a judicial system making a legal decision on a political question will spread distrust and animosity throughout the country.

I should like to put forward two examples of a situation where the proposed constitutional resolution could cause the courts to be asked to rule on a political question in a legal manner. Capital punishment is an obvious example, Mr. Speaker. What will the consequences be when the Supreme Court rules against the use of the death penalty and the majority of the Canadian people believe, as they do now, that it should be imposed? What will happen when the Supreme Court is asked, as it could be under this constitutional resolution, to rule on the right to life of the unborn child? If it rules against the right to life and in favour of abortion on demand, how will the people of Canada who believe rights were given by God and cannot be taken away by courts feel about the judicial system of our country?

These are just two examples. I cannot speak for the rest of Canada, but I can speak for my constituency of Kindersley-Lloydminster and for how my constituents would feel if the Supreme Court ruled against their wishes as Canadians on a political issue.

The majority of Canadians believe that there is a God or a supreme being. They believe they have the freedom to ask Him for guidance. They believe they have the freedom to worship under Him. I am sure Canadians would be very upset if a Supreme Court ruling was made, such as was the case in the United States, to remove the saying of the Lord's Prayer from the schoolrooms. The majority of Canadians, old and young, believe they can ask guidance from God.

What would happen if the Supreme Court ruled, because of the exclusion of property rights in this constitutional resolution, that individuals in Canada did not have the right to own property? Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that the majority of Canadians would feel that the Supreme Court had ruled properly? Do you not feel that they would impose their will and their wishes in another manner in our country and cause havoc and chaos, not because they are anarchists but because they believe they have a right to own property in Canada? Professor Edward McWhinney of Simon Fraser University, who I am sure is familiar to members on the other side, has said this:

> In the end, the preservation of national minimum standards of constitutional liberties and the rule of the law generally must rest on public opinion and on political action expressed through the ordinary political processes; and no amount of judicial liberalism can be expected to fill the gap in constitutional law created by a combination of weak or timorous executive-legislative authority and an apathetic and indifferent, or downright intolerant, general public.

Before my time runs out, I would like to ask a question of the New Democratic Party and of its leader, the hon. member for Oshawa. The question is this: Why is the New Democratic Party so anxious to impose this resolution on Canadian citizens? Why is that party rushing to impose this Liberal Party document on the people of Canada? It is not because the NDP does not recognize the inadequacies of this document, because it presented 43 amendments to the resolution, only two of which were accepted. Our party has presented 22 amendments, seven of which were accepted. The government proposed 58 amendments and, strange as it may seem, all were accepted.

This is not a resolution authored by an all-party committee. This is a resolution authored and supported by the force of the Liberal Party and the majority on that committee. When the Liberal Party members decided to accept an amendment, it was accepted. When members of the New Democratic Party voted in favour of one, it was not necessarily accepted. When members of my party voted in favour of an amendment, it was not accepted.

When there are as many as 43 mistakes in the resolution in the eyes of the New Democratic Party and only two are corrected, why is that party so anxious to pass this imperfect document? Even the premier of my province—that political mugwump who sits with his mug on one side of the fence and his wump on the other and who was led down the garden path by the Prime Minister—has decided on behalf of his government and the people of Canada that this document is an imperfect one and does not warrant the support either of his government or the people of Saskatchewan.

We have heard this document described as a civilized document. We have heard it described as the very best document. That description was given by the hon. member for Oshawa. I cannot see how a very civilized and very perfect document can have at least 43 mistakes in his eyes, only two of which have been corrected, and then be rushed through.

I notice the Prime Minister is in the House. I have a question or two for him which I am sure he will answer when he rises in his place in the House to speak. I understand he is going to speak today rather than table his speech, as was suggested today in a motion moved by our party under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

With regard to an amending formula, what will be the long-term effect of western resentment to the resolution that establishes several classes of provinces, with the western provinces being made fourth and fifth class? Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba were colonies until 1930. We in western Canada had not been given the right to our resources by the government. We had not been treated as other provincial governments had or other people in other provinces had. In 1930 we were given those resources. We would like to know now why we are being relegated to fourth and fifth-class status. How can the federal government, with any credibility, call for co-operation with its partners in confederation if those partners feel they have been legally discriminated against by the tyranny of the majority in the House of Commons?

Concerning a referendum, what will any province feel when an issue is raised that the federal government proposes to resolve by bypassing the provincial legislatures in a national referendum? What confidence can anyone have that the federal government will discuss changes in good faith, knowing the federal government can wait for a year and then hold a national referendum to reach a decision?

I come now to the charter of rights. What faith will people have that a charter of rights will be more than just a symbol if it is imposed on the provinces? We all realize that it is the provinces which deliver services and rights. When you drag someone into a method of transferring freedoms and rights to individuals, I do not see, Mr. Speaker, how you will receive those rights any faster than if they were not mentioned at all.

The imposition of a charter of rights against the customs of Canadian constitutional law is no way to ensure the protection of rights. The provinces must willingly accept those rights and endeavour to deliver them to the best of their ability, rather than try to deceive their populace. I believe that if those rights are presented to citizens who live in provinces in Canada, the demand of the citizens to receive those rights will motivate the provincial governments. I do not think they have to be clubbed by the government in central Canada.

In Canada last May, we experienced a referendum in the province of Quebec. I ask the Prime Minister, how do Quebecers know they made the right choice on May 20 if the changes they were promised are nowhere to be found in the Constitution?

I go back to Mr. Ryan's beige paper and his campaign in the province of Quebec. He said there would be greater power for the province of Quebec as soon as the referendum was over. Nowhere in this resolution do I see that power. What proof is there from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), who says this is just a beginning? Quebec has been given a constitutional veto, but so has Ontario, Sir. I would like to know how that equates with the feelings of the people of the province of Quebec. If constitutional renewal is to bring national unity, there must be a reference to equality in the field of resources. There must be the reference to equality which the Atlantic provinces asked for, the division of power sought by Quebec and the institutional renewal sought in most parts of western Canada.

Patriation is an important symbol for Canadians. It is a symbolic opportunity and we will have that opportunity only once. But what will be the symbolic value of patriation if it is accomplished in an atmosphere of division to the point of legal action such as we see now is the case? The Prime Minister says that process is not important, that substance is what is important. But it is the process and not the substance which gives Canadians the concepts of trust, confidence and tradition which lead to a building and strengthening of our country. The substance will change as times change. Trust and confidence of the people in their governments will always be necessary if Canada is to remain united.

Unilateral action undermines that trust and replaces it with resentment. Resentment feeds on itself, especially when there is incorporated a provision like Clause 46. The flag debate was a dispute over a symbol. We replaced that symbol with another symbol. In a sense, the resentment caused by that debate has removed itself from the minds of Canadians. This resolution entrenches the seeds of ongoing resentment because of its unfairness and its lack of concern for people outside of central Canada.

The people of Ontario and Quebec are protected by their parliamentary numbers, but what about the people of Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and Saskatchewan? We do not have that protection. Nowhere in the resolution is there any method of replacing the protection afforded to Ontario and Quebec by their numbers. The people of Ontario and Quebec are fair; it is not their fault. They are represented by members of a Liberal government who feel they must have more power than the people really want them to have. The Prime Minister stated on May 19, 1979:

> We will at last be able to have a Canadian Constitution made by Canadians in Canada for Canadians. And we will do it together. We will do it with the people of this country.

In case anyone has forgotten, the Prime Minister lost that election in May, 1979. He did not make that statement during the election campaign in February, 1980. I ask the Prime Minister, why impose now upon the people of Canada, without the support of the majority of the people in the provinces, a Constitution they will have to live under for the next 100 years with all its inequities and faults? I say to the Prime Minister that in the region of Canada I come from, we believe we are as Canadian and as proud and strong as any people in Canada. The Prime Minister is imposing upon them something which will cause them to live as fourth or fifth-class citizens, maybe for the next 100 years, maybe forever. This is something that I and my party cannot tolerate, nor can any fair-thinking Canadian. I will be voting against the resolution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as I stand to speak on the motion before the House, I am somewhat encouraged by the fact that I am doing so in response to popular demand. I was particularly touched, as recorded in last Friday's Hansard, when the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) called on me to speak in this debate. I thank in particular the hon. member for Athabasca for saying:

> Madam Speaker, not only the opposition but I think all the people of Canada would like to hear what the Prime Minister has to say.

I repeat, I am somewhat encouraged by that because I realize that this resolution has caused deep division among members of both Houses of Parliament, members of all political parties, within the ranks of provincial premiers and indeed among the Canadian population. However, I find some consolation in the fact—and this was pointed out just a moment by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) in his speech—that the division seems to arise not so much from the substance of what we are debating as from the process and the timing. They are the elements which are divisive. That is the argument that was made by the hon. member who preceded me and by many others.

I want in my speech this afternoon to deal with these three aspects; very briefly with the first, the substance of the resolution, and then perhaps at greater length with the process and the timing.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the resolution before us essentially proposes two things. First, that Canada give itself a Canadian Constitution with an amending formula that would allow the Canadian people to amend their Constitution at home, and second, a charter of rights and fundamental freedoms.

As for the first aspect, patriation and the amending formula, suffice it to say, Madam Speaker, that since 1927, the Canadian people have wanted it, they have been systematically seeking it under ten different prime ministers, under dozens of premiers and at numerous federal-provincial conferences. Moreover, this was confirmed in the House last May when the House unanimously agreed on the substance, namely, that we should patriate the Constitution with an amending formula. Allow me to simply refer the House to Hansard for May 9 last, when the member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) moved the following resolution, and I quote:

[English]

> Whereas some provinces have repeatedly refused to endorse the patriation of the Constitution of Canada from Britain, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):
>
> That the Parliament of Canada submit an Address to Her Majesty the Queen, that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a bill to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to provide for the amendment in Canada of the Constitution of Canada.
>
> MADAM SPEAKER: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

After a few comments, Madam Speaker declared:

> Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

The motion was agreed to. We remember, Madam Speaker, that there was unanimous agreement in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: On the substance of patriation, there can be no disagreement in this House. I believe that is made even more clear by the statement made to the special joint committee by the member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) on January 20, 1981, when he spoke on behalf of his party and introduced a document which began with these words:

● (1550)

> In presenting our proposed amendments to the government's resolution we do so in the knowledge that it is the popular will of Canadians that our Constitution rest in this country.

He goes on to deal with the second matter before the House:

> It is also the popular will that we have a charter of rights and freedoms for the Canadian people embedded in the Constitution.

That is the position of this House, of the Conservative Party and, in so far as we can rely on surveys, the position of the people of Canada. I say that not only because the hon. member for Provencher said it is the popular will, but because we have the Gallup poll that was published in The Gazette last August 6. To the question whether Canada should have its own Constitution written and adopted by Canadians, 78 per cent of Canadians polled said it should. Then the question was asked: Should the Constitution guarantee basic human rights? Ninety-one per cent of Canadians said it should. And on minority language rights, Madam Speaker, the figure was 81 per cent.

Those are the figures we found last August. Have they changed substantially over the months in spite of the debate which went on, or perhaps because of it? Let me read from the Toronto Star of January 8, Madam Speaker. The answers to the questions asked are tabulated as follows: 83 per cent agree that the Constitution should include a charter of rights and freedoms; 70 per cent agree that it should include an amending formula to be reached over the next two years, and any changes to the Constitution before then would need the unanimous consent of the federal and provincial governments. Seventy per cent agree with the very proposal in the resolution before the House, Madam Speaker: two years of debate and consultation between the federal government and the provinces, during which time unanimity would prevail.

Another survey published by the Calgary Herald on November 19, 1980, which covered 1,400 households in the western provinces and was carried out by the Canada West Foundation found that while westerners are solidly opposed to the method being used to change the Constitution, they are willing to endorse the basic features of the federal government's constitutional package.

Asked whether the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the package should be binding on both levels of government, 78 per cent agreed and 11 per cent disagreed.

Finally, Madam Speaker, referring to a survey apparently commissioned jointly by the Edmonton Journal and the Regina Leader-Post, published in the February 21 edition of the Journal and March 14 edition of the Leader-Post, the question was asked: "Would you like the patriation of the Constitution to be done in the next six months, the next year, the next two years or the next three years?" In Saskatchewan, Madam Speaker, fully 81 per cent wanted patriation to take place either during the next six months or the next year; in Alberta, the figure was 63 per cent, and in British Columbia, 71 per cent. In all cases, whatever part of the country we look to, there is a clear majority in favour of patriation.

As to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, because this is a sensitive question with our opposition the question was asked: "Should the charter be included before patriation, after patriation or not at all?" The answers: In Saskatchewan, before patriation 70 per cent; in Alberta, before patriation 55 per cent; in British Columbia, before patriation 56 per cent.

The Canadian people, Madam Speaker, are not afraid of this tag of colonialism which has been attached to this action of Parliament by the opposition. They are right, and I will explain later why they are. However, for the time being, I am merely talking once again to the substance of the issue and indicating that the Canadian people want a charter. The hon. member for Provencher said on behalf of his party that the Canadian people want a charter, and every political party represented in this House is on record as wanting a charter.

In the case of the Conservative Party, it goes back to the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker who, when he moved a bill of rights binding only at the federal level, deeply regretted that he could not make it binding on the provinces because they would not agree. That would have been the ideal, and he clearly says so in his memoirs "One Canada", published in 1975. And if we look at the position of the official opposition as shown by the resolutions adopted by that party at last month's general meeting, it is clear that they, too, enthusiastically endorse the inclusion of a charter in the Constitution.

The position of the New Democratic Party was also made clear by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) when on February 23 he spoke in this House and said, as reported on page 7593 of Hansard:

> I should like to say a few words about the suggestion of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and certain other Conservative members that a bill of rights is something new and that this is a recent decision made by one man who is attempting to foist his views on Canada.

The hon. member for Burnaby recalls that in 1960 there was the Diefenbaker bill of rights, but:

> ... in January of 1959, the then premier of Saskatchewan, Tommy Douglas, wrote the then prime minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, saying that the time had come for a constitutional amendment in this country to entrench fundamental rights and freedoms.

I am told, Madam Speaker, that the Hon. Tommy Douglas is in the gallery.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am happy, as all hon. members are, to acknowledge his presence in this House where he will always be a welcome guest. I just wish he would spend a little time with the present Premier of Saskatchewan.

The hon. member for Burnaby goes on to say this:

> So, it was not the present Prime Minister who was the great pioneer in this area. If anyone was a pioneer, it was Tommy Douglas who fought in 1959 to entrench these fundamental rights in the Constitution of Canada.

And finally, Madam Speaker, I can say with some modesty that our party, during the period of the 1970s, is on record as to the substance of these matters. One can refer to the newsletter of January and February, 1981, and see, particularly at the Winnipeg convention of 1980, that we are clearly once again on record for patriation and entrenchment of a charter. Therefore, all the political parties, and certainly the joint committees of both Houses of Parliament representative of all members, first in 1972 and then in 1978, are clearly on record as saying that a charter should be entrenched in the Constitution.

● (1600)

Of course, this is also true of the recommendation of the joint committee of 1981, the one made public just a few short weeks ago, which unequivocally stated that a charter should be in the Constituton. In that regard, I found an interesting statistic in an article in the Catholic Register yesterday written by the hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni) which shows that 54 groups out of 75 appearing before the joint committee were in favour of entrenching a bill of rights.

I do not need to go on much longer on the substance. Most provinces have bills of rights, and several premiers have indicated their clear preference for a national charter in the Canadian Constitution. Premier Davis has; Premier Hatfield has. In February, 1979, Premier Lougheed went on record to that effect. Premier Peckford did on August 18, 1980.

Hon. members opposite have shown great interest these past days in the leader of the opposition in Quebec, Mr. Ryan, and expressed the clear hope that he will become premier of the province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: That is a hope which, of course, is shared on this side, although rather than hope I should talk of certitude. On December 3, 1980 Mr. Ryan went on record as wanting the entrenchment of a charter in the Canadian Constitution. Perhaps that is not surprising because in the encyclical letter of Pope John XXIII, "Pacem In Terris", on page 101, I read the following words:

—in the juridical organization of states in our times the first requisite is that a charter of fundamental human rights be drawn up in clear and precise terms and that it be incorporated in its entirety in the Constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, as it could not be any plainer that all members of this House, the greatest majority of political leaders and Canadians agree on the substance of the motion now before us, that is, patriation with an amending formula and the entrenchment of a charter of basic rights in the Constitution, we have to ask ourselves the following question since we are elected to serve the people: how should we fulfil our duty? How should we comply with that wish clearly expressed by the Canadian people?

Madam Speaker, technically and legally, there is a quite obvious and clear reply to that question. It can only be done through a joint Address of both Houses of Parliament to the Queen, an Address which will be conveyed by her to the British parliament. Technically and legally, this is not even debatable. Amendments have always been made in that way. This is how Canada, ever since 1867, has been able to amend its Constitution. Whether we want to change our judges' retirement age, make it possible for Newfoundland to join confederation or update our unemployment insurance or old age pension scheme, there is clearly this way to amend some basic elements of our Constitution and it is through a joint Address of both Houses to Her Majesty the Queen.

I say to you, therefore, that the argument which we hear sometimes that drafting here an amendment or a charter borders on colonialism is clearly misleading. It has always been done that way. The point of this resolution before the House was not to ask the British parliament to wash our dirty linen, as some people have suggested. How could they use such an expression when referring to a charter of basic rights and freedoms? It had nothing to do with this. The formal process has always been very clear: a joint resolution of both Houses, debated and adopted by the Canadian Parliament, has always been the way to give substance to an amendment wanted both by the Canadian people and hon. members. The argument, therefore, is not on the legal or technical manner, but on the degree. Differences come to light when we deal with the degree or amount of provincial support such a process should get.

For a constitutional amendment, adopted through a joint Address to be given to Canadians, what degree of support should it get from the provinces? First of all, Madam Speaker, I should like to say that if there is a way which is sure to fail, it is to seek unanimity. I suggest this has been established by our history since 1927, because seeking unanimity is like looking for perfection. If there is something to be learned from our history, Madam Speaker, it is that seeking unanimous support to a resolution of both our Houses is a notion which is wrong in theory and in practice. In theory, I submit that the notion Canadians need unanimity to amend their Constitution is based on the misleading assumption that there can be no consensus among Canadians, that there is no national will expressed unless 11 first ministers come to an agreement.

Is there one single town council, school board, labour union or corporation which could operate if the unanimity rule were to apply to all basic questions? It is clear, Madam Speaker, that this unanimity is wrong in theory because it assumes that there could be no consensus otherwise and that all participants should have a veto right. I submit again that no town council could operate this way, especially if each member could have a veto right. In practice, anyway, this system does not seem to work.

On February 17 I heard the hon. member for Provencher make the following statement in the House, and I quote:

[English]

The record shows that since 1927 this matter has come up in federal-provincial relations on 48 different dates.

A little while later, on February 23, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) repeated the same idea, somewhat triumphantly, when he said:

—if one consults the record of federal-provincial discussion on the Constitution or on related measures, one will find that in the 54 years since 1927 the Constitution has been discussed for exactly 48 days—

One would think they were arguing that we should be getting on with it and that on as fundamental a matter as having our own Constitution and on as fundamental a matter as giving Canada the last evidence of its sovereignty, 48 attempts by dozens of premiers and prime ministers over a period of 54 years would lead them to say "Enough!" But, no, they are arguing that it was only 48 attempts. How many more attempts should we attempt; another 48?

• (1610)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The history of this country since 1927 establishes that the theory of unanimity leads only to deadlock, to inaction, to the entrenchment of the status quo. For those who think that maybe unanimity is no longer possible but that at least we should get a consensus, that at least this resolution should be supported by a consensus of the premiers, let me just disillusion those members of the House, if they think that a consensus would be sufficient and that we could forge ahead if we had one.

In 1966, Mr. Daniel Johnson, the then premier of the province of Quebec, linked patriation to a package of provincial powers; nobody could get patriation in the country unless the province of Quebec got increased jurisdiction. Perhaps at the time this was an original step which to my knowledge had not been taken before, but I suggest that that is the moment when in this matter the provinces lost their virginity, and every time we have met since then to seek not unanimity but a consensus, we have failed. We failed in 1971. We had everyone in agreement on the amending formula, on patriation, on reforms to the Supreme Court and on many other subjects. Then suddenly one premier, the Premier of Quebec, said, "But you will get it if you increase the powers of my province in one particular area".

I then let a few years elapse. On April 19, 1975, after a meeting of the ten premiers and myself in Ottawa, I tried once again for unanimity or at least consensus. I wrote every premier on that date a letter saying, "Let us at least agree on patriation with an amending formula; let us not try and do all these other things". I did not even talk of a charter then; I said let us just patriate with an amending formula.

The premiers met in the summer of 1975 and again in the summer of 1976, asking themselves how they would answer this renewed invitation. I have the answer in a letter from the Premier of Alberta, who was then chairman of the premiers' conference, addressed to me and dated October 14, 1976. Here are his words:

> All provinces agreed with the objective of patriation. They also agreed that patriation should not be undertaken without a consensus being developed on an expansion of the role of the provinces and/or jurisdiction in the following areas: culture, communications, Supreme Court of Canada, spending power, Senate representation and regional disparities.

It took exactly ten years for every provincial premier to follow the lead of Premier Daniel Johnson in 1966. Then they said there was no way the Canadian people will have their Constitution, no way the Canadian people will be allowed to amend their Constitution in Canada, unless as Premier Lougheed put it, we give the provinces more power, more jurisdiction, an expansion of their role in half a dozen fields.

This was somewhat discouraging, so I addressed myself to the premiers once again and said, "Maybe we can give you some more powers in this or that area, but, please, would you as a condition of that agree to give Canadians their Constitution and the power to amend that Constitution in Canada?" Two more years elapsed. The premiers met again in the summer of 1977 and then in the summer of 1978. Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan was then chairman of the premiers' conference. He wrote me on August 22, 1978, and I quote from his letter:

> Constitutional reform—The premiers discussed this issue at some length. The following are some general principles which they believe to be important.
> (i) The premiers endorse the need for constitutional reform.
> (ii) The premiers believe that major proposals from all sources must be given careful consideration in any process of constitutional reform.

Here we get the package again, major proposals from all sources. Then, sliding back even from the position of 1976, I read:

> (iii) The Premiers firmly believe that significant constitutional change should have the concurrence of all governments.

Back to unanimity. The premiers are telling us after all these years of effort that the Canadian people shall not get their Constitution unless everybody agrees and unless the provinces are given substantially more power.

Recent history is present in the minds of many of us. We recall February 6, 1979. We were yet again at a federal-provincial conference to discuss not only patriation and an amending formula but several other areas wherein provinces wanted to increase their jurisdiction. Though the federal government made various proposals then that we give provinces more power in family law, more power over resources, more power over indirect taxation, more power over interprovincial trade and even more power over international trade, the premiers said on television in February, 1979, "Not enough, we want more; if you want a Constitution for Canadians, we want more".

Premier Davis, sensing once again that there would be a deadlock, proposed immediate patriation, a joint Address by both Houses. "Forget all this debate; go ahead and do it", he said. We recall that that was worth a lot of headlines for him. I was quite relieved to hear at least one premier say, "Go ahead and do it".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1620)

Mr. Trudeau: This proposal for immediate patriation was supported by Premier Buchanan, Premier Bennett, Premier Hatfield and Premier Lougheed. The five of them and myself made six out of 11. In step, Premier Blakeney then says, "No patriation unless it is linked to a package of provincial rights." Naturally, René Lévesque agreed. Any move toward patriation, even though we were six out of 11, was stopped in its tracks.

I think everyone in this House probably watched television in September, 1980—just last September—when we had this very strong package by the premiers saying that if Canada is to have its own Constitution and its own amending process then we would have to give them all these things, and if we did not give them all, to even one province, then we could not have a Constitution. In other words, we were back to the veto by one province. We were back to unanimity. It was not only a veto over the amending formula, it was a veto over a shopping list that the premiers had brought to that conference.

What has happened since September, 1980? You would think that if consensus was sufficient, or if unanimity was possible, then we would have heard from the premiers. Six of them met in Montreal a couple of months ago to hammer out a consensus or, perhaps an agreement among themselves. I understand they then met with two other premiers. All this—several meetings of premiers and officials—since we in this House have been debating this motion sine the beginning of October. You would think that if consensus were possible we would have heard about it. You would have thought that they would have confounded us and said, "These people up in Ottawa are unreasonable. Consensus was not found because of the Kirby document, or because Trudeau was too arrogant, or because the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) did not work hard enough. But we, the six of us, getting together, will show that unanimity is possible." Have they done that? Has the opposition not urged them to do that?

Surely it would be a bit embarrassing to the government if they were able to show that six or eight of them could agree on something; then they would only have to move on and convince the other two to reach unanimity. Why has it not happened? Why has a consensus not emerged? I will tell hon. members why. Even if they could agree on an amending formula, they could not agree to let it go until each got satisfaction on his shopping list.

Have we heard Premier Peckford say that we could patriate before he got jurisdiction over the offshore? Have we heard Premier Lévesque say that it would be okay to patriate with whatever amending formula provided we did not write the notion of self-determination into the Constitution? Have we heard the Premier of Saskatchewan say that they had reached a consensus and we could go ahead and patriate, even though we had not given the provinces jurisdiction over international trade? Have we heard Premier Lougheed say "We have got a consensus on patriation and on an amending formula, go ahead and do it, even though we have not got more jurisdiction over resources?" Have we heard Premier Bennett say that patriation should be proceeded with even though he has not got what he wants with respect to the Senate? No, Madam Speaker. There is no consensus, not on an amending formula and certainly not on patriation, for the simple reason that, once again, the Canadian people will be able to get what is due to them, and has been due to them for the past 114 years, provided premiers A, B, C, D, E, F and G get more powers for their governments and their provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: So, Madam Speaker, if the provincial premiers are unable to reach agreement amongst themselves, it is clear, under those circumstances, that they will not come to an agreement with us in this House. One would have thought, however, that the official opposition might have allowed itself to define exactly what a consensus is since unanimity is impossible, as has been proved. Or again, it might want to tell us to try to reach a consensus, a word they use constantly in their speeches when they criticize us for acting without the broad support of the provinces. What is that broad support they want, they wish we had? Would nine provinces be enough? If nine provinces stood with us, could we go ahead? I ask the Leader of the Opposition: Could we go ahead if, for instance, Quebec or Alberta were not a party to the consensus? Could we go ahead then and patriate the Constitution? Could a consensus exist without the support of the federal government? We do not know where they stand; they have always called for a consensus if not unanimity, but they take great care not to define it. Let me put this question to them: could we patriate the Constitution with an amending formula if Prince Edward Island were opposed, or again if Alberta or Quebec were opposed to it? There is no answer, Madam Speaker? So—

[English]

It is quite clear that the way not to proceed in giving Canadians a Constitution is to seek unanimity or even a consensus. We cannot, we have not and we would not get our Constitution that way.

But what about the bill of rights, Madam Speaker?

Mr. McDermid: They have it.

Mr. Trudeau: I can tell you once again the way not to succeed in giving Canadians their basic rights, as recognized by the Conservative Party in a statement by the hon. member for Provencher, the way Canadians will never get a charter of rights and freedoms in the Constitution, is to seek unanimity. The hon. member opposite just said they have already got these rights. Why, then, is the spokesman for his party saying it should be put into the Constitution? Why did the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker want to put it in the Constitution?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Were they both mistaken? I can tell the House that the way not to get a charter in the Constitution is to seek unanimity. We have already been told quite clearly by Premier Lyon of Manitoba, both in Canada and from London, that he never would accept a charter of rights in the Constitution. He also went on to say that the only way Canada could act in this matter was through unanimity. So the way not to give Canadians what they want is to look for unanimity.

What about a consensus, Madam Speaker? Again let me ask the Leader of the Opposition or his party: what kind of consensus would be necessary to put a charter into the Constitution? Could we go ahead with just Premier Lyon opposing? What is the position of the Conservative Party on this matter? They have been telling women, Indians, property owners—they are even telling God—that they want to see them entrenched in the Constitution. They want these greater rights.

I challenged the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) just a few weeks ago when she said that we should accept an amendment to give greater protection to women in the Constitution. I said, "We will take it, but will you support us if we do?" Of course, she said no.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1630)

Mr. Trudeau: We just heard the speech of the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster, who was somewhat disappointed that we do not refer to God in the Constitution. Hon. members on this side have repeated many times that in our preamble presented to the ten premiers last June we recognized the importance and the role of God in governing the destiny of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We have told the Leader of the NDP that we would be prepared to accept yet another amendment on aboriginal rights and entrench it in the Constitution. We have made it quite clear that we were and are prepared to see the charter improved. It can always be improved.

What do the Tories say? They say they want to see more rights for women, more rights for Indians, but then they go on to propose a process which is sure to deny those rights to women and to property owners.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Sure they want to protect the rights of Indians and women, refer to God in the Constitution and insert property rights and many other things. But then they recommend a way that is sure to fail, either because we would need unanimity—and we have already been told by one Tory premier that we could not count on it—or else they would propose the Vancouver formula, one which permits opting out. As the Minister of Justice has said in his speech, it would permit God to be acknowledged in the Constitution, perhaps in Ontario and Quebec, but not in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. What kind of a charter is that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for Provencher made a vigorous plea to treat provinces equally; and again today the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster suggested that we were treating provinces unequally. Yet they come up with an amending formula, the Vancouver one, which, if implemented, would guarantee inequality between citizens because it would permit one province to opt out of the charter and another to opt in. It would guarantee inequality between the provinces. There again, when Canadians might want to change the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments, a province, particularly a powerful one which did not need whatever was being discussed, could opt out. They talk about equality? They are guaranteeing inequality for the people and for the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I think I have shown how not to proceed if we want to get a Canadian Constitution and charter of rights. Let me now examine the ways in which we can proceed if we want to give the people what we recognize they want. We could succeed in patriating the Constitution with an amending formula by adopting the joint resolution before the House. We know that Premier Davis is in favour of that. Premier Hatfield is in favour of that. We knew that three other premiers—I named them a moment ago—in February, 1979, said that that is the way it should be done. We know that this party and most of the New Democratic Party also think that we should proceed by way of joint resolution. I guess we probably represent, between us, something like 60 per cent or more of the population.

More importantly, I refer to the resolution of the hon. member for Edmonton East that I read a little while ago. Quite clearly, he got every member of this House to say we should move on. He did not talk of consent of the provinces. On the contrary, his preamble said that whereas some provinces have repeatedly refused to endorse patriation, we should get on with it; and every member of this House said: "Aye, we should get on with it; that is the way to do it!"

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Yet if we needed any more assurance that this is the right way to do it, let me read from Hansard of October 22, 1980. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition moved, and I quote:

> That this House supports the immediate patriation of the Constitution of Canada, incorporating only the generally agreed upon formula known as the Vancouver consensus, so that all other constitutional changes shall be made in Canada by Canadians.

In his speech, he went on to say:

> This motion calls for the Parliament and the people of Canada to act quickly on the one constitutional question with which virtually every Canadian agrees—Quickly, Madam Speaker; immediate patriation. No talk of unanimity from the provinces, no talk of provincial consent, no talk of a consensus. We must do it and we can do it. That is the substance of his motion.

If we have this repeated evidence, not only from the premiers and the majority of the members of this House, but, indeed, from all the members of this House on the motion of the hon. member for Edmonton East, and if we have the statement from the Leader of the Opposition that this House can go ahead and do it immediately—not after a federal-provincial conference, not after a year of negotiations, but immediately—then surely we have found the way in which we can succeed in patriating the Constitution. It is by way of joint resolution of this House; no more, no less.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Then let me ask the members opposite: if we can do that for patriation and an amending formula without being estopped by some constitutional convention, if we can do that, as has always been done since 1867, by a mere joint resolution of this House, if we can do that unilaterally—since that is the word that has been used to confound us—to patriate, as the Leader of the Opposition suggests, without having ten or five or three provinces agree, why, then, do they invent a constitutional convention to say that we cannot give the people their rights in a charter?

Why does the Leader of the Opposition say it is okay to patriate? Why has this House said it is okay to patriate because then we give Canadians their own Constitution, but some convention, some obscure theory of constitutional law, says we cannot do it for a charter? What is the logic of that position? How can they argue that unilateralism is all right to give Parliament and the provinces their independence, but it is not all right to protect the people?

I think at this point we hear them say, "Well, it may be legal. Maybe that is the way it has always been done. Maybe technically, in law, you can do it. But"—and then we use the big notion—"it is not legitimate; it is legal but it is not legitimate". They might even go on to say, "and probably not moral".

● (1640)

Let me examine this legitimacy argument. It is obviously an argument which is hard to define. I would begin by conceding that the Canadian people do not like to see their elected governments disagree or quarrel among themselves; they do not like confrontation. They would prefer harmony and so would we, Madam Speaker. That is why, since 1927, we have been seeking to do this without confrontation. That is why I, as Leader of this Government, have been seeking to do it since 1968 without confrontation in all these meetings, all these letters to the premiers, all these discussions. So I agree that it would be better if we could agree. I concede that at the outset.

Having shown that agreement is not possible or certainly not likely, given that the substance of what we are doing is wanted by popular will, to use the words of the hon. member for Provencher and given that we are elected to leadership to this country, let me now ask, on the three aspects of legitimacy, first, is the process we are engaged in compatible with our traditional political values? Second, is the process we are engaged in shifting the delicate balance of federalism toward, as we have been accused, a unitary state or some form of republicanism? And third, is the process fair?

I think if I can examine those three arguments I will have begun to deal with the question of legitimacy. Let me ask, first of all, if this resolution is compatible with our traditional political values.

[Translation]

Well, if it is a matter of traditional policy, then I think it is undeniable that evolution is part of the Canadian tradition and that we continue to evolve from the colonial state to that of nationhood. It has always been so from our very beginning, and that, with the complicity, I might say, of the parliament of Westminster whose greatness we recognize in that it has always granted its colonies their independence when they requested it.

And so it has been that from 1867 to 1931, when the Statute of Westminster was passed, traditionally Canada clearly evolved toward complete sovereignty. That was also true when prime minister St. Laurent abolished the appeals to the Privy Council in the late forties, and also true when this Parliament gave itself the symbols of a distinct nationality, the Canadian nationality, when it gave itself a flag and, finally, a national anthem; and perhaps one of these days in proclaiming July 1 Canada Day.

So when it comes to compatibility with the traditions toward more autonomy and more independence, I think we are following those traditions very closely when at last we are asking for our own Constitution. Let us look now at the amending formula. Is it compatible with Canadian traditions, with the political values which are generally acknowledged and accepted in Canada?

Well, what we are proposing is not an amending formula like in Australia where the states, the provinces, have nothing to say, an amending formula which provides for a referendum upon the initiative of the government of the Commonwealth, of the federal government. Some people say that our method will lead to republicanism, that it will destroy the constitutional monarchy, and that it is anti-federalist. Well, Madam Speaker, Australia has been amending its constitution since 1901 without consulting the provinces or the states. They do that but as far as I know that country has not yet turned to republicanism, nor has it destroyed parliamentary democracy or abolished the constitutional monarchy. But here in Canada we are not asking for that much.

What we are proposing in fact is an agreement, a consensus among the provinces and the federal government. Is it contrary to our traditions for us to seek constitutional amendments that way? No, quite the opposite, they object to the Victoria formula. And again I heard the hon. member who spoke before me protest because, it would seem, that formula makes the provinces unequal. Well, is that what we proposed in the Victoria formula? For a very simple reason, Madam Speaker: because it is the only amending formula on which all the provinces and the federal government unanimously agreed and which was recognized as such over a period of several months, from February to June, 1971. That is why we have proposed the Victoria formula, not because we prefer it. I, for one, said publicly that I would prefer others. For instance, I would rather have a formula under which a constitutional amendment is allowed and possible if there is agreement between the federal government and six provinces representing perhaps 70 per cent, 75 per cent or 80 per cent of the population, I do not know. We will not name the provinces, we each have a better amending formula in our pocket. All I know is that if we had come up with one on our own, we would have been told that the federal government was again acting arbitrarily.

Madam Speaker, that is why the resolution before the House contains the formula on which the ten provincial premiers agreed in 1971. And no one should suggest that it is discriminatory against western Canada, as the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster said a moment ago. If it does make a distinction between the western provinces and the Atlantic provinces, for instance, it is because the western provinces wanted it that way. It will be recalled that Premier Bennett in 1971 insisted on having a special clause for British Columbia and that premier Schreyer—he was then premier of Manitoba—said: Well, let us give him that.

The western provinces fashioned that amending formula to suit themselves. They did so with their agreement. It was not the formula we had in mind. So no one should tell us that is reeks of arbitrariness and that we are discriminating against the provinces. We have proposed the only formula about which the ten provinces were ever able to reach agreement.

[English]

Let me just ask in that regard if the formulae presented by the Progressive Conservative Party are more in keeping with our tradition. Would they be more legitimate, more akin to our traditions? It is a bit hard to say, Madam Speaker, because they have at least two formulae and one is subdivided into three parts. Let us take each one in turn.

In October, in the motion I read a moment ago, the Leader of the Opposition said that they would prefer the Vancouver formula. As I think I pointed out to this party that suggests the Vancouver formula, it makes the provinces unequal. The Vancouver formula by its very essence, because it is based on the conception of opting out, presumes that any one province which does not want to go along with the Canadian consensus can have its special status, can opt out, can say, "We are not like the rest of Canadians." It can say "We have citizens in our province who are not equal to citizens of the other provinces because we do not have a charter; we have rights in our province not equal to the rights of other provinces because of the opting out provision." So much for the desire to put provinces on an equal footing, Madam Speaker.

● (1650)

That is just one of the amending formulae. The other one was presented by the hon. Senator Tremblay before the joint committee in February. I do not know whether it had official status. I do not know whether his proposal supersedes that of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. But at any rate, if we look at it we see that it proposes discussion over three stages during a period of one year, following which, if there is no agreement, we end up with unanimity as the amending formula. In other words, one year of discussion where we propose two; and unanimity where we propose it is the people who should decide. Which of the two parties wants to get Canada out of the status quo and move forward with reforming its Constitution, the one which is based on a large consensus or the one which seeks unanimity? I believe the Canadian people can decide about that.

We heard finally that our proposal is not in keeping with our traditions, that it is not legitimate because we have provision for a referendum. Actually we have provision for two referenda. One will be in the case where the provinces and the federal government cannot agree and we will ask the people to break the deadlock. That does not seem so outlandish in a democratic country. But it is not against that particular to which I have heard objection; the objection is to the permanent deadlock-breaking mechanism.

Since we are told that we are doing something not in keeping with our traditions, let us ask ourselves how we break a deadlock now. How did Mr. St. Laurent break a deadlock when he wanted to bring Newfoundland into confederation and Quebec said no? How were deadlocks broken in the past? They were broken by the federal government asking Westminster to do something. That is our tradition. That is our law and that has been our practice. What are we proposing? We propose that when there is a deadlock, the federal government, as traditionally and legally has been the case, asks not Westminster—since we will be independent—but the Canadian people to break the deadlock. What is illegitimate in that, Madam Speaker? What could be more in keeping with our traditions as an autonomous sovereign state to break a deadlock, not as in the past by going to Westminster, but by going in the future to the Canadian people and telling them to get agreement among yourselves?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I have talked about traditional political values as they apply to patriation and as they apply to an amending formula. I would like to say a few words now about the charter. I listened to the preceding speaker. His was one of the few speeches in this debate that I have heard. But in it I found all the clichés which have been repeated from day one, and I am just wondering after five months why the opposition has not been able to renew its arguments a little. But since it has not, let me deal with the argument about the charter being in some way against traditional values. Is it against federalism? Is having an entrenched charter something which denies the spirit of federalism? We just have to look to the United States, the greatest federation in the world. It has a charter. Is it against parliamentary democracy? We can name many parliamentary democracies which have a charter. I think the ones which would impress this House the most would be Denmark, Norway, and the Federal Republic of Germany. But more important are the provinces of Canada. They are parliamentary democracies and most of them do have charters. Therefore, what is against traditional values if the Canadian people have a charter binding themselves or if most of the provinces have such a charter? I can see nothing there against traditional values.

Let me remind this House that in 1971, in Victoria, we had a charter called the Victoria charter. It was not as good or as perfect as the one we have now. It had a guarantee of basic linguistic rights and democratic rights. It was a charter. Was that against our traditions, or are we just following the tradition which the ten premiers accepted in Victoria? They had a charter. We have a charter in the Victoria charter. It was written in Canada, in Victoria, by Canadians, and it was to be presented to Westminster by way of a joint Address. I admit the provinces were also going to pass resolutions supporting it, but they offered a vehicle to bring a charter written in Victoria, Canada, to Westminster. Was that colonialism? We hear it said now that, if we write a charter in this House, it is colonialism to have it passed in Great Britain. What about the ten premiers who said in 1971 that the way to do it was, "We write it here; we get it passed in Westminster." So much for the argument of illegitimacy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: I now come to the language issue, Madam Speaker. Is there anything against Canadian traditions in the language provisions contained in the resolution before the House? Well, Madam Speaker, let me remind members of this House who repeated many clichés on this matter, together with provincial politicians, that under our original Constitution in 1867, the federal government, the Government of Canada, not only had the right but also the obligation to protect minorities in the area of education.

Under subsections 93(3) and 93(4), we now have the right to legislate in educational matters so as to protect minorities. Indeed, those minorities were then defined in terms of religion, whereas we now tend to define them in terms of language, and we know the historical reasons for that change. But the principle was there; the Fathers of Confederation—and that is the most beautiful and noblest aspect of our tradition—said: It is up to you in the federal government to protect in the field of minority language education. Well, this is what we are doing in the charter before us, but to be on the safe side, I remind the hon. members that the provincial ministers agreed in St. Andrews in 1977, and then in Montreal in 1978, to protect minority language education in all provinces. It is true that at the time it was proposed as a reciprocal agreement, which was never followed up. It is a fact that now we are making that proposal in the Constitution, but it is also a fact that we are carrying out a duty and following a tradition going back to the beginnings of confederation, according to which minority education must be protected in this country if not by the federal government or through reciprocal agreements, at least under a charter of fundamental rights and public freedoms.

Madam Speaker: I am very sorry, but according to our Standing Orders, it is now my duty to interrupt the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in order to proceed with private members' business. Unless the House would agree—

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, there are two other alternatives that are available subject to the unanimous consent of the House. We could agree that private members' hour be suspended today. Failing an agreement on this, we could agree that private members' hour be deferred to nine to ten o'clock tonight, instead of having it from five to six o'clock. Those are two suggestions that I submit to my hon. colleagues.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to the first proposal, that the private members' hour be postponed in order to allow the Right Hon. Prime Minister to conclude his remarks?

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has spoken now for an hour and 15 minutes. If it would be convenient to him not to break his speech, we would be prepared to agree to the second suggestion; that is, that private members' hour commence at nine o'clock and end at ten o'clock this evening.

Mr. Knowles: We agree, Madam Speaker.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The House then agrees with the proposal that the Right Hon. Prime Minister be permitted to conclude his speech and that the hour reserved for private members' business be taken from nine to ten o'clock tonight?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the members of this House for having permitted me to continue an already long speech. I am grateful that they permit me to continue at this time. I will not abuse the privilege and take up too much of their time, but as was pointed out on Friday, I have waited a long time to speak and I find it important to try to deal with as many arguments as possible.

[Translation]

I believe that I have therefore just shown that when we protect the linguistic rights of the minorities, there is no encroachment on and no departure from our Canadian traditions. However, I also want to deal with the delicate matter of Section 133 of the Constitution, since we have been criticized for not extending the provisions of this section to a greater number of provinces. I would simply like to say that we did not find on this side of the House that we could do this without effectively providing ground for the illegitimacy argument. Let me explain why. In the early days of confederation, Section 133 was forced upon certain provinces, namely, Quebec and later on Manitoba, and not upon the other provinces, contrary to what occurred in the field of education where we were justified in taking action. However, I am still surprised, Madam Speaker, that many people objected to our action while they had no objection when the provinces met in 1977 and 1978 in St. Andrews and in Montreal to speak about the protection of minorities in the field of education. No one blamed Mr. René Lévesque at the time for not having said that Ontario and New Brunswick at least, and perhaps the other provinces, should also agree to be bound by Section 133, since Quebec was bound by it and that reciprocity would require that the others be also subject to it. No one blamed Mr. Lévesque for this, neither Quebec nationalists, nor the leaders of francophone minorities in the other provinces. Why is this? Probably because the Quebec premier was then thinking in practical terms. He probably thought: "Let us get what we can for now, but I shall not ask such a thing of Ontario." I find it rather strange that all those who oppose the proposal now before the House are also those who were saying at the time that we should go even further. Those who accuse us of trying to use force and to encroach upon provincial powers are also saying that we should have encroached even more upon these powers.

Madam Speaker, I would like to remind a number of people in this nationalist bunch, both clerics and lay people, who prevented entrenchment of at least part of Section 133 in several provinces to come into effect when we, including myself as Prime Minister, negotiated this entrenchment in 1971. Once again, it was the nationalist movement in Quebec which put an end to the Victoria proposal even though it would have brought about the entrenchment of certain rights. I would also like to remind them that if the Victoria project was able to go rather far in implementing Section 133, it was not with the support of public opinion in Quebec. It was thanks to premiers like Mr. Smallwood, like Alec Campbell, like Bill Davis, who agreed that we protect wholly or partly francophone minorities in their own provinces by implementing all or part of Section 133. And if there was nothing in the Victoria charter concerning the protection of education rights of minorities, it was because the Quebec representatives did not want to hear about it. We now know why. It is because they were being advised by a certain Claude Morin who was thinking about Bill 22 and Bill 101.

It is with a certain emotion that I speak of these matters, Madam Speaker, because I believe that history will find it a paradox that what occurred in 1971 in Victoria, thanks to the support of a number of francophone premiers, repeats itself today in 1981, ten years later, as we entrench in the Constitution the Official Languages Act, which promises to all Canadians from sea to sea linguistic equality before all federal institutions and jurisdictions, and which guarantees to our anglophone and francophone minorities entrenchment of their basic educational rights in the Constitution.

Let me emphasize that history will find it paradoxal that we do not have the support in this regard of the nationalist movement in Quebec and of the Quebec government. We have the support of the Leader of the New Democratic Party, a man named Broadbent; we have the support of Premier Davis and we have the support of Premier Hatfield. This will go down in history, Madam Speaker! If the Quebec government found Section 133 so important, why did it not say: "Go ahead and impose Section 133 on Ontario and we shall support you." This is what it would have done if it really wanted to protect francophone minorities instead of opposing our resolution, which does more to protect francophone and anglophone minorities than any other piece of legislation to be introduced in this Parliament. The same happened in 1978 with Bill C-60 when we tried to convince the four provinces with the largest francophone minorities to accept Section 133. Who supported us and who opposed us at that time? History will show that it was again the nationalist movement in Quebec which opposed Bill C-60.

Madam Speaker, I would now like to deal with another aspect of legitimacy and ask whether this is actually a power grab, whether we actually are on the road to a unitary state, whether the federal government by way of the resolution now before us actually wants to grab additional power. This I can dispose of quite briefly. What about patriation, Madam Speaker? Does patriation involve a power grab on the part of the federal government? What is actually happening? We are transferring power from Britain to Canada, not to the federal government, but to Canadians as represented by a national government and by a number of provinces, or, lacking an agreement, to the Canadian people by means of a referendum. Is that a federal grab for power? What about the amending formula, Madam Speaker? Here again, does the proposed amending formula involve a bid to increase federal powers? We have said throughout this debate that the Constitution is now being amended by way of the federal government applying to Britain. Far from increasing our powers, we are distributing them to the provinces and to the people in that respect. Henceforth, if the resolution does pass, we will amend the Constitution not by unilateral action on the part of the federal government applying to Westminster, but by action of the federal government in co-operation with the provinces or, lacking such an agreement, by the Canadian people assuming the power to amend the Constitution. Is that an abuse of power?

Let us now look at the charter. Is there actually a transfer of powers to the central government? Quite the opposite, the charter in fact takes away a little of the powers of all the governments. But it takes away the most from the federal government itself, because as things now stand the provinces in a number of areas are prevented from abusing basic freedoms. There have been numerous decisions on this by the Supreme Court: in the Saumur case, the Padlock act case, the Jehovah's Witnesses case, etc. Provinces now do not have that power. I would refer in that respect to a speech made by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) before the University of Toronto Law Society. He quite aptly showed that basically the federal government is limiting its own powers under the Criminal Code and, I would add, its powers under the Emergency Act to infringe upon public liberties. If there is a transfer of powers, Madam Speaker, it is essentially a transfer from the central government to the Canadian people.

• (1710)

[English]

Are we really going toward a unitary state, Madam Speaker, when in all these instances we are giving more power to the provinces and the people of Canada than they have under the present Constitution? And let me just ask, is that not also the question one must answer when we look at the provisions for equalization which I have not yet discussed this afternoon? But what are we doing? Grabbing power for the federal government? Are we moving toward a unitary state? Ridiculous, Madam Speaker. By entrenching the equalization obligation in the Constitution we are giving more powers to the regions, not to the centre.

The same can be said, of course, on the division of powers, sections 91 and 92. Is this a power grab, Madam Speaker? Can anyone in this House show one single instance where the federal government could have more power in the resolution now being discussed? On the contrary, there is one section in this resolution which touches the division of powers, and that is the amendment moved by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I wish he had not, quite frankly, because he did it to please the west and I have not found a single western premier who says it is okay; they have all said it is too little.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: But if there is any transfer of power in this resolution before the House, that is it, Madam Speaker. It gives the provinces new powers, powers they do not have in the area of resources, powers of indirect taxation and interprovincial trade. So much for saying that the resolution is not legitimate because it is a power grab. If anyone is getting more power, Madam Speaker, it is the provinces and people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Madam Speaker, the third and final argument of illegitimacy is that the process is unfair. Let us examine that. Is the process fair? By this I suppose I mean: Are the opponents of the resolution, whether here in Parliament, in the provincial legislatures or among the Canadian people, in some way being deprived of the means of redress by this resolution? Is the resolution changing the course of our history in some way which is irrevocable and irremediable?

Well, let me just say it is quite clear, Madam Speaker, that neither the judicial process nor the political process is in any way affected. If we look at the judicial process we have the evidence of six provinces presently in front of the appeal courts; so obviously fairness, in so far as it can be expected from the courts, is not tampered with in any way by this resolution.

I was interested to hear the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster once again object to this charter because it suddenly gives more power to the courts, at the very time when the six premiers who share his opinion are in those courts seeking justice, Madam Speaker. Let them make up their minds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: If one were to believe that the provinces are more interested in the judicial process and in judicial redress, you would think that they would have asked the courts to determine with a little more celerity. You would wonder why they staggered their appeals in three different provinces over a period of several months and, having lost the first appeal in Manitoba, took more than six weeks to go to the Supreme Court. If they are sincerely interested, Madam Speaker, in seeking judicial opinions rather than fighting this issue by the political process, they would obviously have proceeded differently. So let us not hear the argument that we are in some way abusing the legal or judicial process in this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is the provinces who are using the courts, presumably to be better able to fight the matter among the electorate.

Is the political process in any way affected? Well, Madam Speaker, Sections 3 and 4 of the charter guarantee the continuance of that political process. They guarantee that in less than four years from now we will have to seek a mandate from the Canadian people. The provincial governments will also have to seek new mandates from the Canadian people. The Canadian people will judge the course that we are following, and the official opposition will have the occasion to seek a mandate to redress the situation. That is the political process. That is what is taking place now, not in the courts but here in this Parliament, Madam Speaker.

• (1720)

How can this situation be redressed through the political process? I am not sure what would happen in the case of patriation. I suppose theoretically a party could campaign that, if returned as the government of this nation, it would seek to re-establish the colonial status. I think to state the objection is to answer it; it is obviously a ridiculous situation. But then you must wonder that if it is obvious that no party would ever campaign to re-establish the colonial status of Canada, even supposing that the British would be foolish enough to accept it, how is it that they are opposing patriation now? How can they oppose it when they think colonial status would not be worthy of any support by the Canadian people when election time comes around?

Look at the amending formula. Are we interfering with the political process? On the contrary, the political process is written right into the referendum formula. It provides for two years of negotiations. Those negotiations are prescribed right in the resolution. There must be meetings between the federal government and provinces for two years, and then agreement either follows or does not. If it does not, is there some arbitrary measure which is then imposed by the federal government? On the contrary, if we cannot convince the provinces and they cannot convince us, no arbitrariness intervenes. It is the people of Canada who are called upon to decide.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, can redress be found in any other way? The opposition has said—and some senators have also said—that they are horrified by the idea of the deadlock-breaking mechanism. So be it. They are horrified. It can be changed. The Leader of the Opposition, the opposition parties and the provincial governments just have to seek a mandate to change that. There is not a referendum procedure forever in the Constitution of Canada. It is there until somebody uses the amending formula to change it. Political process is respected. We think the referendum as a deadlock-breaking mechanism is valid. It is in keeping with our traditions, but anybody is entitled to hold the contrary view. Any politician can run on the platform that, if elected, he will bring in constitutional amendments which will do away with the referendum process and which will do away with the charter, if that is what he wants. I think I have hinted that we would be happy to see the opposition parties campaign on such a platform.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: "Elect us and we will take away your rights; we will seek a constitutional amendment; no doubt it will be supported by Premier Lyon; we just need a certain number of provinces and we will take away the charter".

Once again, to state the argument is perhaps to say that it does not have much substance. Why are so many people opposed to the charter now who indeed would not want to consult the people on it or campaign on it? The answer is very simple. It is in those statistics and the Gallup polls and others to which I referred earlier. The people want this action. It is in the answer of the very member for Provencher who says it is the national will.

I believe I have dealt with substance. I have dealt with process. It remains to deal with timing, and perhaps I will deal with timing in a short and timely manner.

Many times when Canada was engaged in the process of nation-building we have heard that the substance was right. The flag was all right; we needed one. We needed a national anthem. But now was not the time. The time was divisive. Let us procrastinate. Let us postpone. I say with some regret that though the Conservative Party played a very eminent role in the creation of confederation, its members have long since abandoned that spirit of decisiveness which existed when Canadians took, because they were Conservatives and Liberals, the great leap into the future called confederation.

Let me just recall that at the time of confederation there were two great debates, very much mustering arguments like the ones we have heard today and very much saying that now is not the time; just wait a little longer. What did George Brown, a great Liberal, have to say at the end of his speech during those debates in 1865? I want to read these ten lines because they are very appropriate to today's debate. I quote:

> —the man who strives for the postponement of this measure on any ground, is doing what he can to kill it almost as effectually as if he voted against it. Let there be no mistake as to the manner in which the government presents this measure to the House. We do not present it as free from fault, but we do present it as a measure so advantageous to the people of Canada, that all the blemishes, real or imaginary, averred against it, sink into utter insignificance in the presence of its merits . . . Let us look at it in the light of a few months back—in the light of the evils and injustice to which it applies a remedy—in the light of the years of discord and strife we have spent in seeking for that remedy—in the light with which the people of Canada would regard this measure were it to be lost—

Today those who say that the timing is not right have one of two motives in mind. Either they think that with a bit more time the measure could be improved, or they are using the passage of time to destroy this measure, and I want to look briefly at each of those arguments.

With the passage of time could it be improved? We believe it could. The Minister of Justice and the government House leader twice gave more time to extend the deadline of the joint committee. They believed we could bring in amendments. Amendments were brought in by the Minister of Justice, who has done incredible service to Canada by his work—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —by the co-chairmen, the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal) and Senator Hays—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —and by members of the opposition such as the hon. member for Provencher and the hon. member for Burnaby. Members of various parties have improved this measure and, no doubt, through the amending process, more improvements can come in the future.

If hon. members in the official opposition want to improve the measure, it makes one wonder why they have held us up for five weeks on one amendment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1730)

Mr. Trudeau: The New Democratic Party has amendments to propose in the area of aboriginal rights, amendments to propose in the area of women's rights. We would like to see reference to God in the preamble.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: We have many amendments we would like to put in. Hon. members opposite laugh. I repeat, we would like to see God in the preamble; we would like to see the preamble brought back which we presented to the provinces last September.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: If ever proof were needed that a consensus and unanimity are not possible in this matter, it was given last June when that preamble was rejected. One of the reasons was that the preamble indicated that Canada was a nation. That was the reason, as is well-known, that at least one province did not want to accept the preamble.

The motion before the House can be improved. We hope there will be time to improve it, but we say that once the resolution is in Canada, we then have an amending process which can permit any improvement wanted by Canadian people and by the members of the House and of provincial legislatures.

Let me just once again ask those who are perhaps prepared to vote against this motion because it does not adequately protect women's rights, would women's rights be more protected in the country if the charter were defeated? Would God be more respected if the charter were defeated? Would aboriginal rights be more entrenched if the charter were defeated?

I make that point to those who have hesitation in voting for this measure because it is not perfect. But, to those who are asking for more time, who are saying that this motion is not timely because they really want to see its defeat, because they are hoping with the passage of time that somehow the judicial process and the political process will permit the measure to be defeated, let me just say that they are in the purest traditions of those who at each stage of nation building said that the time was not now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: First I refer briefly to the abolition of appeals to the privy council when prime minister St. Laurent in the late forties proposed a bill to get rid of this link to colonial status whereby the final courts of appeal sat in Westminster. What did the then leader of the Conservative Party have to say? Mr. Drew speaking on this matter had the following to say:

—I cannot imagine what injury will follow by holding this back until there can be full consultation in regard to the whole question. I strongly urge that this matter be held back, along with others affecting the Constitution, until the whole Constitution and its interpretation and the system by which its terms will be interpreted can be discussed fully by the representatives of the dominion government and the provinces.

So much for nation building when it came to cutting off appeals to the privy council.

Another important step was the matter of seeing Newfoundland enter into confederation. On February 14, 1949, in debating the proposed address to the King representing the entry of Newfoundland into confederation, opposition leader George Drew made clear his support of the idea of Newfoundland joining confederation, but he stated the following:

We should not tamper lightly with our Constitution, simply on the ground that the results are much worth while . . . No matter how desirable it may be to hasten any procedure, this is no time to take short-cuts which have the effect of lessening respect for the Constitution itself . . . desirable though the object may be, this course should not be adopted . . . As I have already suggested, the proper procedure is to consult the provinces now.

Do we need another example?

Some hon. Members: Yes, yes.

Mr. Trudeau: We hear the same arguments, we hear the same procrastinations, no doubt we are listening to the same speech writers.

In 1949 amendments to the British North America Act were brought forward respecting the amendment of the Constitution, that is, Section 91, paragraph (1) of that new amendment. Again we can listen to the Hon. Leader of the Opposition today, although I am quoting Mr. George Drew when he said:

This motion should not be proceeded with until after the conference, which is to take place after the termination of this session, in regard to limited aspects of the constitutional problem.

It does not seem to me that a single argument has been placed before this House to indicate why this matter cannot very well stand over until that time. What is the urgency? . . . In view of the statements already made by some of the provincial premiers with respect to the misunderstandings that may follow this piecemeal approach . . . I believe a very dangerous step will have been taken if this resolution passes and the provincial representatives are called together only after this has become a fait accompli, after this positive and definite step has been taken.

One more example of nation building is the flag debate in December 1964. I will only quote one phrase because members have referred to it and members are now sitting on the other side who participated in that debate. We will remember Mr. Diefenbaker then making it clear that Mr. Pearson was creating divisions which would be remembered way beyond this generation. These are the strong words that he used:

During the past months great harm has been done to the unity of the nation, greater than that during any other period in my lifetime.

Rather than quote more, let me just refer members to the tale of an eye witness which was given to me. It appeared in last Saturday's edition of The Ottawa Citizen. The eye witness was David Kwavnick, an associate professor of political science at Carleton University. Let me read a few words:

I can recall spending most of December 14, 1964, in the gallery of the House of Commons watching the culmination of the long and acrimonious flag debate.

Under Mr. Diefenbaker's leadership, it continued:

—large segments of the population reacted as though the government intended nothing less than the bloody rape of their history and heritage. The country, it seemed, had not been so divided since 1917.

I apologize for the next phrase:

I can recall Tommy Douglas telling the House that though he supported the measure, he opposed the way in which the government was handling it; that by using closure the government had thrown away a golden opportunity to unite the country; that instead of giving the country a flag of unity it was saddling the country with a flag of division. And it all sounded so reasonable at the time.

In the wee small hours of the morning, Mr. Pearson rose to conclude the debate. The atmosphere in the House was tense and ugly. When the result of the vote was announced, Mr. Diefenbaker stood, shaking his fist and hurling imprecations which could not be heard above the tumult. J. Waldo Monteith slammed his fist on his desk and stomped, cursing, from the Chamber. Other Conservative members stood silently staring across the aisle, and in those stares there was hatred.

That's how we got our flag.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1740)

Mr. Trudeau: We hear something of the same language today. On Tuesday, February 17, the hon. member for Provencher said:

This resolution is creating an atmosphere which will disrupt any possibility of genuine reform taking place in the coming years . . . To tear up those federal traditions which are at risk now, Madam Speaker, is threatening to tear up our own country—

The hon. member's leader, the Right Hon. Mr. Clark, interviewed on CTV's "Question Period" on February 22 had this to say:

—the Liberal legislation to patriate the Constitution with a charter of rights will cause in the region I come from in western Canada a legacy of division that we might not overcome as a nation.

It could quite literally break up this country . . . This could be the final straw.

What is being given to the Canadian people is that which everybody recognizes they want, even in western Canada, if these surveys I quoted are exact and if the hon. member for Provencher is right in saying that the Canadian people want a charter and want their Constitution now.

The Leader of the Opposition goes on:

It could mean the end of this country. It's more dangerous than anything Quebec Premier René Lévesque proposed because this isn't a dream that somebody is talking about, this is a juggernaut that somebody is trying to force upon a country.

He said the bill represented a personal obsession by Trudeau. Well, so much for separatism and Mr. Lévesque's efforts to break up this country. It was not as serious as the effort we in this chamber are making to give Canadians their fundamental rights and freedoms.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We are a country blessed with great resources, human and physical, secure from war or civil strife. Peace and prosperity have permitted our two languages, various cultures, to grow deep roots. Perhaps these very conditions have increasingly permitted the assertion in recent years of regional and individual self-interest at the expense of the common one.

What do we see, Madam Speaker? What has been described as we look around the country? We see alienation in Quebec, the west and the maritimes. It seems to me that makes it clear that the course of our national development cannot be left in limbo. We have promises to keep. After the Quebec referendum we on this side, at any rate, have promises to keep to change the Constitution so that we can move out of the status quo. We intend to keep those promises.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Even if we did not have any more time, lest the forces of self-interest tear us apart, we must now define the common thread which holds us all together. If this realization of our identity involves hard choices, whoever said that the coming of maturity was easy?

I do not think there is any permanent equilibrium in the political affairs of any nation. It is always a moving equilibrium. This is particularly true of a federation where checks and balances, regions and the centre are constantly adjusting that equilibrium. What we are doing today is merely providing Canadians with the means of seeking that equilibrium.

In sloughing off the last vestiges of colonialism, in entrenching those values Canadians hold in common, we are merely setting the stage with a contest about the kind of Canada we will have in the future. The contest about the two kinds of Canada, perhaps, will be laid out. Will we be highly centralized? Will we be a loose confederation of shopping centres, as some wag said about Los Angeles? Will we be something in between? I don't know.

The next two decades will see the gestation of the twenty-first century in Canada. I do not know what kind of country our successors in this place will leave behind them. But I do know, and I deeply believe, that it is our duty to leave behind us at least the ability to our successors to choose Canada's destiny. In that sense what we are doing is ending the beginning; the beginning being all that period during which Canada has moved toward independence and that period which is lasting now during which we cannot amend our Constitution. We are merely setting the stage for those who follow us to then have that debate about the equilibrium, about the kind of Canada they want.

I would like to end with an appeal to men and women of action, as we are in this House. We are not theorists. We are not academics. We are not people who can pontificate from on high, as can some of the people sitting above us. We are elected to produce results. I want to appeal to members of this House to use a device I sometimes use myself when arguing about a particular course of action, with myself, or with somebody else when I find that the pros and cons of a particular course of action are not conclusive, as in this debate.

We are told that the evils flowing from this resolution will be great. We hold that the good flowing from this course of action will be great. Let us say there is a stand-off. Let me appeal to members who oppose this resolution; let me appeal to Canadians who oppose it, to use the opposite test, to ask themselves not what will follow from the adoption of this resolution, but to ask ourselves what will follow from not adopting the resolution? Let us ask them to tell us in what positive way Canada will suffer from the defeat of the resolution before us now. If this is defeated, let me ask opponents of the measure whether they are prepared to accept a Canada where fundamental freedoms, mobility rights, equalization, language rights and non-discrimination will never be a part of our Constitution? Let me ask them if this resolution is defeated would God be more present in our laws? Would the right to life become more sacred? Would aboriginal rights be more entrenched? Would women be more equal? Would linguistic minorities be more protected if this resolution is defeated? Let me ask those who want to see the defeat of this motion what their victory cry will be. Will it be "Praise God, we have defeated the charter of fundamental rights and freedoms."? Is that the course that they really want to see followed?

What will be the boast of those who have defeated patriation? Will they say, "We were there, we were sitting in Parliament when we prevented Canada from taking its final step toward sovereignty."? Tell me what the provincial governments will say. What will their shout of triumph be? Will they say, "we were successful through the courts, through Westminster, in keeping Canada a colony a little while longer. Hooray! We managed to delay one year, five or ten, the coming of age of this country"? What a triumph for those who argue that a little more time would make this resolution more perfect, who we know in their hearts they are seeking at this crucial moment of nation building to procrastinate in the hope it will not happen.

[Translation]

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I would like to quote the words of a committed man, Charles Péguy, who was also a poet and a writer. Here is what he wrote:

Everything begins in mysticism and ends in politics.

He went on to say, and I quote:

What really matters is that mysticism not be devoured by politics to which it gave birth.

Well, Madam Speaker, we must remember that in this sentence Péguy said that mysticism must end in politics because he was not a pure speculator. He did not revel in contemplative endeavours. He was a committed man, just as we are committed men and women in this House. We have no right to seek shelter in idealism and in federalist mysticism to avoid making choices when we are asked to make them. We do not enjoy the right to shirk our duties as politicians, duties which, for all practical purposes, amount to taking political decisions which translate that federalist mysticism into the concrete, difficult and complex reality of every day. It is our job to make difficult choices. It is our job to devote ourselves to the art of the possible in a complex and imperfect world; that is why we have been elected and we do not have the right to wait blissfully for a gentle procedure to settle the basic conflict between those who are for this measure and those who are against. Mr. St. Laurent gave us an example of that when he had Newfoundland join confederation against the injunction of the Conservative Party, when he abolished appeals to the Privy Council in spite of the warnings of the Consevative leader. Mr. Pearson gave us an example of that when he courageously proposed a Canadian flag and for months had to take the insults of those who were saying that he would divide the country; and yet, three years after the flag was adopted, everyone was proud to speak about it at the Montreal world fair in 1967. Those are men I give as examples to those who know what personal commitment means, Madam Speaker, and as to those who do not know that, I leave them with this other sentence from Péguy who said, and I quote:

It is easy to keep one's hands clean when one has no hands.

Well, Madam Speaker, we have hands, we set them to the plough and we are not afraid to get them dirty for the simple reason that it is for a cause about which everybody is agreed that this is what the people want.

Well now, this constitutional debate has already lasted over five decades in this country, and in this current phase it dates back to the month of June last year. Our forebears used to say: Carpe diem, seize the day. Well, I call upon all Canadians: time has come to stop going around in circles, time has come to act, time has come to sever the Gordian knot.

If I may, I would like to appeal to the Leader of the Opposition who spoke in Toronto on June 6 of last year. Referring to the Monday in June when the 11 first ministers got together, he said:

The participants in Monday's conference speak for 11 governments, Parliament speaks for 23 million Canadians. If the first ministers of the federation cannot make marked progress towards changes which fit the Canada of the 1980s, then the Parliament of the federation may have to assert a stronger role.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I read on:

But if it does—

That is if Parliament does.

—that must not be as the instrument of one government, but as the forum of all Canada. Parliament, alone among institutions, reflects that country and can lift the discussion above the question of what governments need and focus on the question of what the nation needs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: If that is not an appeal to action, by the Leader of the Opposition, spoken to those people, after some eight or nine months of procrastination, if that is not an appeal to action by this Parliament I do not know what is. I commend those words to the followers of the Leader of the Opposition, just as I commend the words of the Leader of the New Democratic Party to those of his followers who may have some hesitation.

I quote the words of the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party, as reported in Hansard of February 17:

After the improvements that have been made, can any person who takes human liberty as a fundamental value oppose what is probably the best charter of rights in the world?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Once again, as in every important instance of nation building, this Parliament, these hon. members, must choose between action and inaction.

In closing, I want to quote the words of Georges Vanier, who was a great Canadian soldier, diplomat, statesman, and governor general. Three days before his death in 1967 he said:

The best time is always the present time, because it alone offers the opportunity for action, because it is ours, because on God's scale it is apocalyptic, a time when the lines between good and evil are clearly drawn, and each one of us must choose his side, a time when there is no longer room for either the coward or the uncommitted.

In this crucial stage of nation building let me echo those words. The best time is certainly the present time!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Madam Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Argenteuil-Papineau (Mr. Gourd)—Airports—Increase in passenger traffic at Malton, Edmonton and Calgary; the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight)—Grain—Change in policy on timing of announcement; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen)—Canada Labour Code—Protection of uranium miners.

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to rise to participate in the debate on the Constitution which I consider the most fundamental law of the land. Since the beginning of the constitutional debate hundreds of Canadians from all provinces and all walks of life have sent letters to me concerning the Constitution.

One letter written by Mr. A. V. Godden of Scarborough, Ontario, deserves special attention. Mr. Godden had the opportunity to follow the Constitution debate both in the House and at the special joint committee. He writes as follows:

—in recent months the delicate and oft-times fragile threads of Canadian unity have been most grievously weakened and the present and future security and stability of Canadian society is tragically most insecure and unstable. This is indeed a cruel paradox, when having in mind that the gaining of Canada's Constitution could and should bring the whole family together, in terms of will and purpose, towards a better and more equitable recognition of our many and diverse needs and aspirations.

As one who has been involved in the constitutional debate for many months, I, regrettably, have to agree with his observation.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, what has happened to Canadian unity when we have, as we have today, not a concerted and positive effort to renew our federal structure but instead a serious and growing confrontation in which a majority of provinces are challenging the legality of the central government's constitutional initiative in the courts of the land.

What has happened to Canadian unity, to our sense of family, when in the quiet prairie town of Weyburn, Saskatchewan, the former riding of Tommy Douglas, who was the premier of my province, a separatist organization can attract more than 1,000 people to a rally?

What has happened to Canadian unity when important instruments of national integration, the political parties themselves, are all deeply divided because of the federal government's constitutional plans?

[Translation]

As Montreal's Le Devoir editor Jean-Louis Roy wrote, and I quote:

The country of negotiation, the country of compromise which used to be called Canada no longer exists.

[English]

The resolution before us is acting as a catalyst; a catalyst not of unity but of disunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Unlike the flag debate which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) referred to today—that is a symbol, an important symbol, but merely a symbol—this debate involves the fundamental law of the land and division on this resolution is likely to linger in the canyons of time.

The government's attempt to impose constitutional change is inconsistent with the principles of federalism; it is inconsistent with the principles that have provided unity in a country of diverse peoples and diverse regions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Last October 7, I rose in this House to affirm my belief in the federal system. I rise today to reaffirm my belief in a federalism of co-operation, of compromise and of consensus.

After many hours of discussions with my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, after many hours of discussions with my constituents, after long discussions with Canadians from Atlantic Canada, from Quebec, Ontario, the western provinces and the north, and after many hundreds of hours of discussions and work on the special joint committee, I am more convinced than ever that this Parliament, in the national interest and in the interest of Canada, should reject the government's constitutional resolution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: My opposition in October was based in part on the substance of the resolution, but it was the unilateral action I found the most objectionable. Nonetheless, I decided at that time to try to modify the form and the substance of the resolution in the hope that Parliament would bring forth a package which would enjoy wide governmental and popular support. It is now obvious that a consensus does not exist.

● (2010)

Last October, six provinces opposed the resolution. This March, eight provinces oppose the resolution. In addition, public opinion clearly opposes the central government's initiative. In the past few months, the resolution has both caused and reinforced deep divisions in our country. I am convinced that in the national interest, in the interest of Canada, this House should reject the resolution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I have in the past argued many times for the cause of federalism, the cause which demonstrates what this country is all about. This cause, should be our cause.

The Fathers of Confederation discussed at great length in the 1860s the kind of a union needed. A legislative union or put in other words, a unitary state, was rejected.

The preamble to the British North America Act states as follows:

That the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed the desire to be federally united into one dominion.

K. C. Wheare, who is a noted international authority on federalism, defines the federal principle as follows:

As a method of dividing powers so that the general and regional governments are each within a sphere co-ordinate and independent.

Federalism is a means of both uniting and of decentralizing. It is a compromise between the uniformity of a unitary state, like Britain or France, and the simple independence of sovereign states. Like Gil Rémillard, one of the five expert witnesses who testified before our committee, I believe federalism is much more than a legal structure. Federalism is a philosophy, a way of thinking, a way of being, a way of seeing things, not only at the state level, but at the level of human relations. Federalism is co-operation, compromise and sharing.

In a federal system it is simply wrong for one order of government, acting alone, to amend the Constitution in important respects.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: It is certainly wrong when the unilateral action involves the most important part of the Constitution, namely, the amending formula itself.

To argue otherwise is to argue that Canada is not a federal country. To argue otherwise is to argue that provincial governments are subordinate to the central authority, even in areas of provincial jurisdiction. It is to argue that there is no requirement for regional approval of major constitutional change; that all we need in this country is a national majority, as expressed in the national Parliament. Remember, Mr. Speaker, that a federal state has two orders of government, the Parliament and the legislatures. Each are supreme and sovereign within their own areas of jurisdiction and each are equal in their sovereignty within their own areas of jurisdiction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Unilateral action of the kind on which we are embarking in this country is wrong. The process which Parliament has embarked upon will do lasting damage to Canadian federalism and to our capacity to work together as Canadians. When it comes to constitutions, the process is vitally important. Nothing in my experience tells me that good ends come from bad means.

[Translation]

Several people seem to be convinced, as the Right Hon. Prime Minister was this afternoon, that the proposed resolution has to be accepted because we have to keep the promises made to the people of Quebec during the referendum campaign. But, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that we are not talking about a formula for renewed federalism. During that campaign, not one single federal politician and neither the Prime Minister nor the Leader of the Opposition did commit themselves to support unilateral action designed to change the Constitution of Canada; not one single federal politician did commit himself to admit that the federal government might impose an amending formula and all those conditions; not one single federal politician did commit himself to amend Bill 101.

[English]

We are fooling ourselves; we are pretending, if we say that this is being done for the people of Quebec in response to the referendum.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: What about western Canada? Are we taking steps, by means of this resolution, to address the historic grievances and legitimate concerns of the west? Will this initiative help to moderate the feelings of frustration and alienation that are rampant in the west, and are even finding expression for a small minority in western separatism? I think not.

The premiers and legislatures of the four western provinces are united in their opposition to the resolution and are united in their attempt to block it. The resource provision, while useful, represents for less than was offered by the federal government itself in February, 1979. Indeed, there are certain provisions that I will refer to later in the amending formula which discriminate against western provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: This resolution does not meet the aspirations of Quebec or of western Canada, two regions where change is being most vigorously demanded, two regions with profound grievances, two regions whose needs must be accommodated within a new constitutional framework.

Turning now for a few moments to the substance of the resolution. There are many things in it which are good and worth while. Of these, the most important from a historical perspective are: the entrenchment of English and French as the official languages of Canada; the recognition and affirmation of the rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada, a first step which will hopefully lead to further reform redressing the very real problems and grievances of our first peoples; the provision on equalization, an important cornerstone of our federal system; and the resources section, which is good, so far as it goes. But while these are good and worth while parts of the resolution, there are also substantive provisions that are totally unacceptable in a federal state.

[Translation]

First of all, some clauses of the proposed resolution relate to language. In a field of provincial jurisdiction, education particularly, I am convinced that it is not the responsibility of the Parliament of Canada to intervene unilaterally without the consent of the provinces. As to those who do not share my opinion, as to those who believe that Parliament ought to have wider responsibilities toward minorities, what do they propose? First, they advocate certain measures whose aim it is to protect the French-speaking minorities outside Quebec. Let me say that I entertain serious doubts about this proposed legislation being effective enough to protect their right to education in their own language, as the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) says so often.

There are in my opinion too few guarantees, because many of them are subject to the interpretation of the courts of the nine judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. Second, in connection with the conditions in Quebec, those very same people, namely, the Prime Minister, are looking forward to an amendment to Bill 101 although they constantly repeat that such is not the case. I have only two examples to give. It would be possible under Section 23(2) for parents who are Canadian citizens to have one of their children attend an English private school during a few months, so that such a child, his brothers and sisters be admitted in any English public school afterwards. In addition, it would be possible for parents who are Canadian citizens to send one of their children to an English elementary school so that such a child, his brothers and sisters be allowed in any English public school afterwards.

I think in any case that the Prime Minister is no longer in a position to repeat in his speeches that Bill 101 is not amended under that resolution. Third, those people are also suggesting that Section 133 should remain in effect in Quebec while they are not courageous enough to extend those same measures, as my friend the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) has said so often in committee, to Ontario where three quarters of francophones outside Quebec are living. The Prime Minister is in favour of unilateral action or he is not, but I would urge him to make up his mind.

• (2020)

[English]

Another part of the resolution which remains seriously flawed is the referendum amending section, a provision which appeared for the first time ever on October 2. I do not think it should be there at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: On this point, the Prime Minister's former adviser and former privy council clerk, Gordon Robertson, is right. To amend the Constitution by way of referendum is inconsistent with Canadian traditions and with Canadian practice, and would be very divisive. The referendum provision in the resolution is also a denial of federalism. If we are to have a referendum provision, it is crucial that it be fair and balanced. The provision now contained in the resolution fails to meet that test.

As the Prime Minister says, there is a federal-provincial referenda rules commission, but its recommendations can be ignored by the federal government. There is no way that the provinces can trigger a referendum to seek the consent of the people for an amendment desired by the provinces but opposed by the federal government. The referendum technique is a constitutional device placed at the disposal of the federal government only.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: It is Parliament alone that will decide if there is to be a referendum. It is Parliament alone that will decide when it is to be held. It is Parliament alone that will word the question. It is Parliament alone that will set the rules. It is Parliament that is now, unilaterally, imposing into our amending formula the very tools for future unilateral action. That is not federalism, that is wrong and that is not the Canadian way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Finally, if ever a referendum is held in this country, the counting of the votes itself could be very divisive. A double majority is required; a national majority plus a so-called regional majority. Here is the problem. For a yes vote to carry, a majority must say yes in Ontario, yes in Quebec, but not necessarily in western Canada or the Atlantic provinces. The Yes side could win even if the No side has more votes in the west. The Yes side could win even if the No side has more votes in the Atlantic region. However, that is not the case in Ontario and it is not the case in Quebec.

In the Atlantic region all that is required is a Yes vote in two of the four provinces, and in the west in two provinces representing 50 per cent of the west's population. This means we could amend the Constitution despite the opposition of western Canadians and Atlantic Canadians. This resolution will entrench in the Constitution regional discrimination and regional inequity. I ask whether this is what you want to entrench in the Constitution of Canada?

One final point on the amending formula. I am pleased that Prince Edward Island has been given an important role, but I cannot support the present amending formula which gives Prince Edward Island, with only 110,000 people, more power than Manitoba or Saskatchewan, each with about one million people, or more power than Alberta with 1.7 million people. That is wrong. It must change. It is divisive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: As I said before, the resolution has been approved with the addition of the resource provision, a provision that confirms provincial jurisdiction over resources, which permits the provinces to levy indirect taxation as well as direct taxation on resources and permits the provinces to legislate with respect to the export of resources to another part of Canada with unqualified paramountcy. What it does not do is permit the provinces to pass legislation in relation to exports of resources to other countries, even with unqualified federal paramountcy. Two years ago the federal government had accepted that constitutional change.

There is one more substantive aspect of the resolution upon which I want to comment, namely the Senate. Hon. members will recall that the original resolution contained a clause which would have limited the role of the Senate in constitutional amendments by giving it a suspensive veto only, of 90 days initially, which the government on January 12 indicated it wanted to change to 180 days. Under pressure from the senators, and with the support of the Progressive Conservative party, the government in a most cynical move has now deleted that provision completely.

I will not take the time of the House now to repeat arguments that have been made by the CCF-NDP for 50 years. Suffice it to say we in our party have always believed that in a democratic system there should be no role for an appointed body in the legislative process. There is wide agreement that the Senate has not fulfilled its intended role as spokesman for regional interests and that Senate reform is high on everyone's list of needed constitutional changes.

Let me just make the following points about the deletion of the original Section 44 of the resolution, the deletion which gives an absolute veto to the Senate.

First, what the federal government is doing by deleting Section 44 is transforming the convention of Senate approval—and, as we all know, conventions can sometimes be ignored—into the written constitutional law of Canada. Secondly, there will be no way the Senate veto over constitutional change can be circumvented. An amendment desired by this House and all ten provincial legislatures could be blocked by the appointed Senate. Nor could the referendum procedure, of which the Prime Minister is so proud, be used to get around the Senate. A referendum can only be called on the basis of an amendment being approved by both the House of Commons and the Senate.

● (2030)

What is the background, the pedigree of the original Section 44 which placed a 90-day suspensive veto on the Senate? It was not a hastily-devised or ill-considered proposal. In fact, the very same provision appeared in the Victoria amending formula of 1971 on which, the federal government keeps reminding us, all the provinces agreed. I may point out, Mr. Speaker, they all agreed before there was a Senate veto, before there was a referendum procedure; so when the Prime Minister says they all agreed to the amending formula in this resolution, he is wrong, he knows he is wrong and he should stop saying it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: In fact, the 90-day suspensive veto has appeared in every serious amending formula since 1971. It appeared in the federal government's draft proclamations of 1976 and 1977, in the Toronto consensus of 1979 and the Vancouver consensus of last summer. In deleting Section 44 the government is turning the clock back, not just four months to October, but ten years at least. If I may borrow and change a favourite Chinese phrase, you could say that what the government is doing here can be called a great leap backwards into the past.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: It is flying in the face of proposals for Senate reform by a number of distinguished groups, not the least of which is the Senate itself. In a report last fall the Senate said:

> We feel that the present absolute veto power is not necessary. We believe that a six-months' suspensive veto would give the Senate all the power that it needs.

It even flies in the face of the federal government's own proposal in Bill C-60 of 1978, which would have transformed the Senate into a House of the federation with a suspensive veto only. The unilateral about-face on the Senate goes against the wishes of all the provinces and again, Mr. Speaker, it is not federalism, it is wrong and it is not worthy of the support of this Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: One final point on the substance of the resolution. The Prime Minister spoke a lot today about the enshrinement of a charter of rights, and I support that, but with the entrenchment of a charter of rights we will see the shift of considerable power to the courts. However, the resolution does not provide any mechanism at all that would place a check on what has essentially become a prerogative of the Prime Minister of Canada; appointment of judges.

Furthermore, as a major impact of the charter will be on provincial jurisdiction, it has become more important than ever to take the Supreme Court out of the sole control of Parliament and entrench the court itself into the Constitution. We must also entrench in the Constitution real provincial input on the appointment of Supreme Court judges so the court can become and will be perceived to be a truly federal institution. Without it, it is a case of one team, the federal government, appointing the referees or umpires to call the shots for both teams. These points have never been addressed in committee or debated here in the House, and were once again today conveniently forgotten by the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Something must also be said about the role of the parliament of the United Kingdom with respect to changes in the BNA Act. Frankly, Britain has been taking some undeserved abuse from our government in the last few months. In 1931, Canada asked Britain to retain the power to amend our Constitution until such time as we, as Canadians, could agree on a domestic amending formula. We asked Great Britain to be the referee, which request was with the unanimous agreement of the federal government and, at that time, all nine provinces. The role of the referee requires Westminster not to assess the merits or substance of what is being proposed, but to satisfy itself that the request for change in the BNA Act is a proper request, has the necessary degree of support within Canada and does not do violence to Canada as a federally structured whole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Some do not accept that point of view. They say that the Parliament of Great Britain has no option but to enact automatically any constitutional amendment requested by the federal government or Parliament, no matter how inimicable to the rights and powers of the provinces they may be, no matter how vigorous the opposition in Canada may be. That is a doctrine which ignores the federal nature of our country.

There is one more point to be made regarding the British connection. It is simply that of the legality of the project. The question is now before the courts and it is not fair to ask, in my opinion, the British Parliament to proceed until the Supreme Court renders a judgment.

[Translation]

At my press conference on February 18, when I announced my opposition to the proposed constitutional resolution, I stressed the need for another federal-provincial conference. My experience on the joint committee on the Constitution has convinced me that an agreement is now possible among the various parties. There is still time for an additional effort. I do not know to what extent the Canadian people realize how close the first ministers came to an agreement when they last met in September.

[English]

And for the sake of Canada I appeal to the Prime Minister and the premiers to return to the conference table and agree not to leave until they resolve the impasse; to at least agree on an amending formula so that we can patriate the Constitution and proceed with constitutional renewal in Canada. The Prime Minister may have given up hope but I have not, and it strikes me as strange, Mr. Speaker, that when one talks to federal officials, when one talks to the provincial officials in many provinces in our land, many of them have said to me that if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) had been the Prime Minister, instead of the member for Mount Royal, a compromise and agreement would have been reached.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Three major concerns arise from the unilateral process the federal government has undertaken. As I said today, the process is creating and will continue to create and escalate divisions in our country. Secondly, the current action is damaging intergovernmental relations and will seriously jeopardize future constitutional reform.

Finally, I share a concern expressed recently by former Privy Council clerk, Gordon Robertson, that the price of patriating the Constitution with changes, without broader provincial consent, will be the loss of public confidence in government itself. For the sake of Canada, the federal government and the provincial governments must compromise; they must both go the extra mile, they must both hold out the olive branch, they must both practise a federalism of co-operation, compromise and consensus.

● (2040)

In recent years the need for constitutional change has attracted a good deal of attention. It is not possible, in my view, to ignore the continuing presence of enormous pressures for constitutional reform. What I want to advocate now is the need to develop a new approach to constitutional change. While I see no other realistic alternative for the resolution of our historic impasse on the question of an amending formula than an intensive round of discussions by our national and provincial leaders, I have concluded that the federal-provincial conference of first ministers has not served us well as a means of achieving constitutional reform. It seems to me if we are to make changes in our Constitution which will reflect the will of the people, then we will have to broaden the involvement in the formulation and approval of those changes.

If the experience of the special joint committee has taught me anything—and perhaps taught this Parliament anything—it has taught that a multiparty committee of legislators, in the context of public hearings and public scrutiny, can constructively fashion constitutional change. This lesson must not be lost.

Future conference participants must include multiparty delegations selected by Parliament and each of the provincial legislatures. Additionally, there must be direct participation of delegates representing the aboriginal peoples, women and the territories, all of whom suffer the prejudice of the present political system. It would be this body which would propose constitutional amendments to Parliament and the legislatures.

This approach to the formulation of constitutional reform would represent an important democratization of the process. I have always thought it is democratic practice that is the essential underpinning of a democratic state.

In closing, I say to all Canadians who support or oppose the resolution to do so without exaggerating or distorting the facts, for doing so will only create more division.

I say to the Prime Minister that he should not question the motives of us who oppose the resolution, as he did recently in Vancouver, for we stand as proudly for Canada as he does. We stand as proudly for freedom and as proudly for liberty as he does. I ask the Prime Minister and I ask members of the Liberal party opposite to consider the words of Bevan, one of the greatest parliamentarians ever to sit in the British House of Commons. In debate during World War II he said, and I quote:

> Individual members of Parliament should be free to express in open discussion what they consider is in the interest of their constituents and of the country. Party discipline should end where it infringes upon parliamentary liberty.

I say to my Liberal friends opposite that if ever there has been occasion for free expression, it is now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: The Constitution is the basic law of the land. It is the foundation on which all other laws stand. The Constitution belongs to the people, not to the politicians, not to the bureaucrats. Every indication we have tells us that the people believe the resolution is wrong and that the people believe in a federalism of co-operation, compromise and consensus.

I want to return for just one moment to the letter I received from Mr. Godden of Scarborough, Ontario, the letter with which I opened my remarks. In the conclusion of his letter to me, he wrote, and I quote:

> I, like you, hope and trust that Canada's Parliament can and will always serve and protect the nation in the best possible way.

I believe, and I believe the people of Canada believe, it is in opposing the resolution that Parliament will serve and protect the nation. I believe Parliament will represent the national interest and give expression to the popular will by seeking co-operation, compromise and consensus.

[Translation]

It is in order to say yes to federalism and to Canada that I will say no to the proposed resolution.

[English]

Canadians believe in federalism. Let us not go against the will of the people. Let us give federalism and Canada a chance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, in beginning my remarks tonight I think it only fair and honest to congratulate the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom). He is one of the members of the House of Commons who spent considerable time in the joint committee in respect of our Constitution. I think his expressions tonight were very dedicated, honest and sincere.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): If everyone else in this House, including hon. members on all sides, would speak with honest conviction from the bottom of the heart, they would have to support what the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville has said. If they did, that would be for the good of Canada. It would not be for the good of their parties, but for the good of all Canadians.

I would like to begin my remarks by saying to my hon. colleagues that this resolution has been launched in this House on false premises. I would go so far as to state that this resolution is a deceptive and fraudulent ploy on the part of this government to set aside our existing Constitution and to replace it with one which does not have either the consent or the support of the majority of Canadians.

The second paragraph of this resolution reads as follows:

> AND WHEREAS it is in accord with the status of Canada as an independent state that Canadians be able to amend their Constitution in Canada in all respects;

If this resolution confined itself to the letter of the second paragraph in the preamble, or if it even followed the spirit of that wording, then we in my party would have no difficulty in supporting the government. However, there is no intention, and there has never been, on the part of the government to allow the Canadian people to amend their Constitution in Canada in all respects, or in any respect whatsoever. It must be made clear over and over again, so there can be no doubt in anyone's mind, that what we are debating here is not patriation of the British North America Act. We are debating whether we should allow the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to seek the approval of the British parliament of a totally new Constitution for Canada. That is exactly what we have here in this resolution, a new Constitution, written by a group of people selected and directed by the Prime Minister, complete with the Prime Minister's amending formula.

● (2050)

Like most of my colleagues who have spoken earlier on this resolution, I am suspicious of the Prime Minister's motives. I am disturbed by his refusal to seek a consensus on constitutional reform, and I am angered by his efforts to alienate our people from our mother country of Great Britain.

Although it has been mentioned by many of my colleagues, I would like to repeat that the Prime Minister was never given a mandate to replace our Constitution with one of his own making. In the last general election, the Prime Minister asked for a mandate to prevent the Conservative government from raising gasoline prices by 18 cents per gallon. He won his mandate, and in the first year of his government gasoline prices have risen by 40 cents per gallon. So much for the Prime Minister's mandate; so much for his promises. The Prime Minister knows that if he asked for a mandate in the last election to do what he is attempting now, he would have been rebuked.

In his improper and shameful haste to impose a new Constitution on our people without seeking a consensus, the Prime Minister has resorted to over-kill. The enormity and the scope of the Prime Minister's proposals are beyond even the wildest dreams of those who have sought constitutional reform in the past or present. When I say that, of course, I exclude those who would try to make Canada a socialist country, if they were given a chance. The Prime Minister has aligned himself with that group, rather than with the vast majority of Canadians who want to preserve our constitutional monarchial system of government.

If this constitutional package passes through the House of Commons and the Senate, and receives the approval of the British Parliament, it will be a sad day for Canada and for the vast majority of Canadians. It will signal the beginning of the end of one of the most splendid examples of nation-building on the face of the earth. It will effectively wipe out 114 years of progress in developing a political and social compact which is the envy of most other nations in our troubled world. It will disown and dishonour our founding fathers and all those generations of Canadians who have worked, fought and died to build and preserve this great Canadian nation.

I am going into my sixteenth year of continuous service and dedication to my riding of Victoria-Haliburton and its people. In those years I have come to know my people. I know them well, and I know they do not want to see their unique Canadian system swept away to suit the whims of the Prime Minister and his small but vocal claque of nation busters.

I know my constituents share a deep sense of love and respect for their monarch, for their history and for their traditional institutions. In the last 16 years of almost continuous Liberal rule most of our traditional institutions and symbols have disappeared. As the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis) pointed out so ably a few days ago in his remarks on the resolution, the erosion of our traditional institutions and symbols has been a part of the Prime Minister's master plan to establish the Canadian republic.

If this resolution is imposed on the Canadian nation it will sweep away all historical and traditional institutions that remain in place in Canada today. In the Prime Minister's words, Canadian history will date from the day he receives back his constitutional package from Britain.

To stay for a moment with the matter of the Prime Minister's plan for a republic of Canada, I would like to refer back to the preamble of this resolution. The first line on page 5 reads: "an act to amend the Constitution of Canada", and at the bottom of the page we find the line: "This act may be cited as the Canada Act".

It should be obvious to anyone that these paragraphs in the preamble do not mean the same thing. The first relates to amending the Constitution in Canada, while the second asks the British parliament to amend the Constitution before patriation. This is just one more example of the Prime Minister's double-talk, but in a matter as serious as our Constitution I would have to call it double-dealing.

Let us turn to Schedule I of this resolution. Perhaps I missed the remarks other members might have made on this section of the resolution, because I have not been present to listen to all speeches in this particular debate. However, it is my impression that this section has been completely overlooked by members, perhaps because it does not loom as large in their minds as the charter of rights or the amending formula. It would be a mistake to overlook this section because it is every bit as deserving of our attention as the rest of the resolution.

Schedule I seeks to amend the original British North America Act, 1867 and to change its name to the Constitution Act, 1867. This is the cornerstone of the Canadian nation. It is the starting point of the history of the dominion of Canada. In both name and substance it is a sacred document to all Canadians or, if it is not, it should be.

What would be the purpose of this amendment? I think I can answer that very simply and easily. It is intended to remove any reference to Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, the monarch who put her seal to the document which joined the four British provinces and created the nation of Canada.

Schedule I does not stop there. It seeks to amend each and every successive amendment which has been made to the British North America Act to remove any reference to each monarch who put his or her seal to these amendments and to remove all references to the United Kingdom, in whose Parliament these amendments were approved.

The American Declaration of Independence is enshrined in glass, airtight and moisture proof, to protect it from the ravages of time. This document is revered by all Americans. It is the starting point of the history of the United States as a nation. No president would even dare suggest that its name be changed. If one did suggest such a thing he would be scoffed at, or possibly even laughed out of office.

Should we in the Canadian Parliament sit by and allow ourselves to be made a party to the Prime Minister's silly and frivolous attempt to rewrite the history of our country? What purpose would be served by allowing Schedule I to remain in this resolution, to be passed by the obedient Liberal majority and the subservient New Democratic Party, and by sending it to Britain masquerading as the will of the Canadian people? This section does not relate in any way to the question at hand; the patriation of the British North America Act. It does not belong in this resolution, and it should be deleted forthwith.

In his speech last Thursday, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings said that a Liberal member, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre), told the committee that we would be rid of the monarchy within two years. This statement goes right to the Prime Minister's expressions of contempt for Parliament, for the constitutional monarchial form of government, and his infatuation with republican governments with a president as head of state.

● (2100)

I am becoming more and more alarmed at the state of the Canadian nation. This constitutional debate has created many bitter divisions in our country between provincial governments and Ottawa, and between racial and ethnic communities across Canada, all to satisfy the selfish and personal ambitions of one person, the Prime Minister.

May I call it nine o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. It being nine o'clock, pursuant to the order made earlier this day, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

Notices of Motion Nos. 31 and 33 stand by unanimous consent of the House.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ALLOWABLE DEDUCTIONS

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act to permit the mother or the father of one or more children who are under the age of twelve years, in computing his or her taxable income, to deduct $10 per day as a child care allowance in respect of supervision and care provided to the child or children by a person other than the spouse of the mother or father for each day that the mother or father works if the spouse of the mother or father also works, or is unable to care for the child or children.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think I should be permitted to begin my remarks by putting on the record of this House the reason for the delay today in the private members' hour. I do so because of the irony it involves. As members know, and it should be recorded, we delayed the private members' hour by the unanimous consent of myself and other members of the House in order to permit the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to complete his speech on the Constitution. That is ironic, since I was one of those members who accused the Prime Minister of not giving private members sufficient opportunity to speak on the Constitution and other matters in this House. I hope that now, and in the future, the Prime Minister will pay more attention to private members in this House and allow them more time to speak. He should not for one moment suggest that private members in this House should limit the amount of time they wish to spend on the constitutional debate, particularly when he himself saw fit to utilize two hours or more of the time of the House, delaying the very private members' hour, which is really the pith, substance and the raison d'être for our presence in this House.

With those remarks, I would like to begin the substance of my contribution by reviewing the provisions of this motion I have presented to the House for consideration respecting child care expenses under the Income Tax Act.

While the motion is quite specific in its terms, the real purpose of the proposed change can be stated in more general language. Briefly stated, the purpose of the proposed amendment to the child care provisions is to eliminate the conditions and the sex discrimination now imposed on claims, and establish a reasonable allowance for child care expenses. The allowance could be claimed by any taxpayer who provides care for his or her child while working who has no spouse, or whose spouse works. At present, a working mother can claim child care expenses upon proof, by a receipt for payment, to a limit of $1,000 for each child, with an absolute limit of $4,000 for all children. The receipt for payment must contain the social insurance number of the payee. A working father who has a wife can only claim these expenses when separated from his wife or when she is incapacitated.

By way of more detailed explanation, the applicable statutory provisions relating to child care expenses are contained in Section 63 of the Income Tax Act. Under those provisions, child care expenses are defined so that a number of restrictions are established. In the result, the cost of child care services must be incurred in Canada for a child who is under 14 years of age or who is infirm, in order that the taxpayer can work as an employee, in a business or pursue occupational training or special research. The child care services can include baby sitting, day nursery and lodging at a school or camp. It is important to note that child care expenses cannot be claimed if they are paid to a dependent of the taxpayer or a relative under 21 years of age.

When child care expenses are claimed by a father he must establish that he is either not married, a widower, divorced or separated by a written agreement or court order. If he has a wife, the expenses may only be deducted if she is in prison or if a duly qualified medical practitioner certifies she is incapable of caring for her children.

Section 63 of the Income Tax Act also contains very strict limitations on the amount of the expenses which can be deducted. For both a father and a mother there is the same limitation of $1,000 for each child. Also, there is the same absolute limit of $4,000 where there are more than four children. Of course, only the amount actually spent can be deducted in any case.

An additional requirement is that the mother or father must have earned income substantially greater than the deduction, or the limit on the deduction is reduced to two thirds of the earned income. This requirement is not especially onerous because those persons with incomes at levels below $6,000 would not be too concerned with income tax payments.

Here is an example of the child care expense provision in operation. A mother of three children under 14 years of age who earns $9,000 could pay a day nursery $2,400 a year for one child and baby-sitting fees of $1,400 for two older children, for a total of $3,800 for the year. These expenses would be more than reasonable by today's standards, but the $3,800 spent by the mother would be reduced by $800. Thus, the statutory limitation of $1,000 per child taken together would total the absolute statutory limitation which, in this case, is of $3,000. The result is that the mother loses $800 in terms of deductibility because of the statutory limitation.

A married father in the same situation with greater income would have to produce a separation agreement or a court order to obtain the child care deduction. If he was married and not separated he could claim only if a physician certified that his wife was incapable of caring for the children. He could also claim if his wife was in prison. If the wife's incapacity was for a limited period of time, or he only paid for a child's care for part of the year, he would be subjected to a limit of $30 per week for each child to a maximum of $120 per week for all children.

The point in detailing the existing provisions of the Income Tax Act is to demonstrate that they are overly complicated in terms of the conditions imposed, inadequate in terms of the monetary limits on the claims, and discriminatory in terms of the rights of fathers in comparison to mothers. More important, the provisions do not reflect the real needs of working parents in Canada today.

In fairness, and to the extent that Canadians can expect the income tax system to be fair, the child care provision should take into consideration the actual problems encountered by working parents in Canada today.

Let me deal with the proposal contained in the motion. By way of preliminary remarks I should make it clear that the motion is merely a request that the government consider the proposal. The words used are not carved in stone and may not fit exactly with the language now used in Section 63 of the Income Tax Act. I sincerely hope any discrepancies that arise from the letter of the words used will not be used to defeat the spirit and intent of the proposal.

The proposed provision would allow either a mother or a father to claim, by way of deduction on her or his income tax, a specified per diem child care allowance, I have suggested $10 per day for each child under 12 years of age. This claim could be made only when two conditions are met: First, and foremost, the child would have to be given care and supervision by an adult person other than the parent during the day when the parent or parents were at work. That includes single parents; second, the parent claiming the allowance would have to be working and, if that parent had a spouse, the spouse would also have to be working or, alternatively, incapable of caring for the child.

I should point out that if the allowance was claimed for 250 working days, the total would approximate the married exemption of $2,500. By this proposal the requirement which permits the taxpayer to claim the per diem child care allowance has been reduced to two simple conditions. I would ask why? It is clear, when you examine the facts, that a working parent or parents cannot care for a child under 12 years of age and must provide for some kind of day or custodial care. Second, there must be a financial cost involved in providing day or custodial care when that care is provided by a person other than the parent, whether that person receives cash or some other benefit.

I am well aware the proposal does not require a specified cash payment to the person who provides the child care. Let me explain why. Quite often, the person best able to provide day or custodial care to the children of working parents is the mother of one of the parents. I am sure almost everyone is aware of a situation in which the grandmother or grandparents provide care to grandchildren while the parents work. Whether the grandsparents make a financial charge or whether some other benefit is provided should be a private, family matter. The point is that custodial care is being provided to permit a single parent or both parents to work and earn income which is then taxed to the full extent permitted by law.

There are many examples in the Income Tax Act where an allowance is provided that is not dependent upon the actual dollars expended. The personal exemption which is $2,890 for 1980, the married exemption which is $2,530 and the dependent child exemption which is $540 are all examples of allowances not related to actual expenditures.

Another relevant example is the employment expense deduction which presupposes that a working person must incur certain expenses related to employment like clothes, equipment and similar items. This allowance is fixed at 3 per cent of employment earnings to a maximum of $500.

Another clear example is the $100 deduction for charitable contributions described in the income tax form as the "standard deduction". Again, the law presupposes actual expenses for medical care and charities of at least $100 per year and does not require an accounting below that level.

My question, then, is simply this: is it not equally fair to presuppose or assume for purposes of the Income Tax Act that single or working parents who arrange to have their children cared for while working incurs extra expenses? Whether those expenses should be fixed at an allowance equal to $10 per day or should be subject to some over-all total maximum like $4,000, I would not want to argue. I recognize the difficulty in establishing a fair amount. But I will argue most vehemently, and in principle, that there should be a child care allowance of some kind for single and working parents.

Let me point out that a single parent or working parents would not have the benefit of the married exemption which is $2,530 for 1980. There may be a possibility of a claim for the equivalent to the married exemption provided under the Income Tax Act, but that would depend on special circumstances. Certainly, it would be a simple matter to ensure that a taxpayer could not claim both a married or equivalent exemption and a child care allowance. I should also say that I do not think the matter is affected by the child tax credit which applies universally.

My point, regardless, is this very simple one. The Income Tax Act should recognize the fact that single and working parents incur child care expenses and should be provided some additional child care allowance based on this fact.

Let us consider what is involved in the child care provisions of the Income Tax Act. When they were initially enacted, it was recognized that there was a certain difficulty in establishing a reasonable amount to be permitted for child care expenses. Many of the promoters of the provisions enacted in the act—I believe, in the early 1970s—felt they provided a motive for women to return to the work force, knowing that they would incur expenses for child care, and that their effective incomes would be reduced by the cost of those expenses.

It may be that in this day and age the government does not want to encourage women to return to the work force. But in the 1980s I think it is accepted by most people that married women, whether or not they have children, have a right in our society to join the work force if that is their desire. I do not think that depriving those women, or men, of an adequate child care allowance should be used as a deterrent to keep those people out of the work force.

The Income Tax Act is difficult in terms of determining its philosophy. But to the extent there is a philosophy behind it, it is certainly that it distinguished between those costs which are part of the cost of living as opposed to those costs which are part of the cost of earning a living. I do not think any authority on income tax law in Canada or in the United States would disagree that child care expenses are very much a part of the cost of earning a living when they are incurred in order to allow the person in question to keep working or to join the work force.

Therefore I think, in terms of the philosophy involved in the Income Tax Act that should be applied to this provision, it is clear that the government, through the instrumentation of the Income Tax Act, should recognize the fact that child care expenses are very much a part of the cost of earning a living for people who would not otherwise incur those costs; that is, they would not incur those costs unless they were in the work force.

As I have said, I do not think it is fair to take advantage of those people, in terms of deterring them from entering the work force or from staying in the work force by unfair provisions respecting deductions for child care costs. It is simply not fair, as is the present case, to take advantage of those persons who incur child care costs having regard to the reluctance of persons who care for children in those circumstances, to require the amounts paid to them to be recorded. Provisions in the Income Tax Act now require as a condition of claiming child care costs, that the person obtain a receipt, which receipt must contain the social insurance number of the person who receive the child care payments. Many persons who provide these services by way of baby sitting or custodial day care do not want to become involved with the income tax system to the extent of disclosing the existence of these payments. This works a hardship on many people across the land. That is one other reason for permitting a non-accountable allowance in respect of child care, bearing in mind that somewhere down the line the cost of child care must be borne by the working parent.

At the same time, the provisions of the Income Tax Act are very clear in respect of the responsibility of recipients of any payments to report the same to the Income Tax Department. However, we should not require those parents who must provide custodial day care for their children in order to permit them to work to be policemen for the Income Tax Department.

One final point which has been made time and time again is that the current provisions of Section 63 of the Income Tax Act discriminate against males, that is, working fathers who are required to care for their children. They are subjected, as I have indicated, to more onerous provisions than working mothers. We do not have too many examples these days where male persons are subject to discrimination under the law. I certainly do not think males across Canada need an advocate in me or any other member of the House of Commons. However, this is one area in which sex discrimination rears its ugly head and is an evil in itself, an intrinsic evil, whether it is applied to men or women. That is one more reason for asking the government to look at this motion, to review the provision of the Income Tax Act respecting child care expenses and to come up with some method, some technique, that will be fair in its application, and will not place such a burden on the working parents of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2120)

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to have the opportunity to participate in this debate. I think the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) deserves to be congratulated for his proposal, for taking the time to organize his material and for making such a good presentation. I notice that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has been in the chamber for the last 20 minutes. It is unfortunate he has not been paying attention. If anyone should pay attention, it should be the minister. He missed a very good opportunity to hear some ideas on this subject so ably put forward by the hon. member for Halifax West. The minister is responsible for the Income Tax Act which should not only be used by the Department of National Revenue for the collection of taxes but to encourage people to be productive. Productive people pay more taxes and the measures outlined by the hon. member would help to bring this about.

I noticed that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) paid close attention to the speech, so I hope he can prevail upon the minister to adopt some of the points made by my colleague.

The motion contains many reasonable and sensible provisions. Parents should only be able to claim if both work or in the event of a single parent. A deduction could be claimed for children 12 years of age or under. This strikes me as entirely reasonable. The motion provides that the government "should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act to permit the mother or father of one or more children to deduct $10 per day as a child care allowance—".

The hon. member is asking that the House refer this matter to the appropriate committee; that is, the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. I have had an opportunity to sit on this committee and know it to be very busy and effective. I hope the government will refer the motion to the committee.

I live on a farm in a very sparsely populated part of the country so I know some of the problems parents encounter when trying to find people to care for their children while they are away at work. People who live in cities and in the larger centres have easier access to day care, or other good care for their children while they work. This is next to impossible to find in the country where just not enough people live close enough together to provide such professional services.

It seems to me when money is allocated for day care by the provinces it inevitably goes to the larger centres where there is enough population to justify the centres. I think that is rather unfair to the people who live in these sparsely populated areas. The motion would go a long way toward alleviating the inequalities presently in the system. It certainly makes sense to me.

There is other evidence of the well-reasoned thought that has gone into the presentation of this motion. Ten dollars per day is not a large amount and the program would not be expensive to administer. It could be done on the basis of the T-4 tax slip which is sent to everyone who pays tax. It would be a simple matter to use that slip as a means of establishing the number of days worked by the parent.

One of the great shortcomings of the Income Tax Act is that it is difficult to understand and complicated to administer. The hon. member for Halifax West referred to Section 63 of the Income Tax Act, but I am afraid that unless one was paying very close attention to what he said one would find it difficult to understand.

This motion, however, is simple and straightforward and it would let people know where they stand with the tax department at the end of the year. It would give them the incentive to find extra work in order to meet their obligations. The more people who work in this country, the greater will our production be, and the Minister of Finance should consider that.

Children are a very important resource of this country and it is important that they be looked after properly. This motion would be an incentive to parents to meet their obligations toward their children.

It would be appropriate for the finance committee to consider the real cost. The Department of National Revenue could simply look at this, take a figure out of the air, say that at present there is a $1,000 exemption for a child and that, if the figures proposed in the motion were used, one could end up with a tax deduction of some $2,500, the difference being $1,500 as an exemption.

If additional jobs were created there would be more money in the economy. The result would be an increase in government revenues. I would be interested in having some of the officials from the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Finance appear before the finance committee and go over the net cost of the proposal, which I suspect would turn out to be less than we expect.

A jurisdictional problem is also involved in that day care is a provincial matter and the motion deals with a federal matter. If this proposal or something similar were adopted, the full cost could be borne by the federal government, but I feel the provinces should be willing to shoulder some of the cost of the lost revenue the federal government would suffer.

This is an excellent suggestion, mr. Speaker, and I congratulate the hon. member for Halifax West for doing his homework and for presenting such a well-reasoned argument. I hope the matter will be referred to the appropriate committee so it can be examined to find out the net cost and the benefit to the country, especially to the children. As we all know they are this country's most valuable resource.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to pick up on what the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) has just mentioned with regard to the federal-provincial aspects of this motion. They are very important and we have seen some difficulties with respect to them. I agree wholeheartedly with him that this subject, if it were to be adopted at some point by the federal government as an approach to resolving the great financial difficulties many of our citizens face in respect of day care expenses, would have to be very carefully worked out with the provincial governments.

When the federal government has brought forward programs in the past which transfer moneys to individuals or to the provinces to help defray the costs of programs and areas of responsibility, provincial in nature, in many cases—and I am not saying that as an unequivocal statement—we have seen that the provinces have tended financially to move out from that area to an extent closely corresponding to the amount by which the federal government has moved in. As a result, the kinds of programs in the area of day care, for example, could very well leave the individuals no better off than they are right now, but could leave the federal treasury worse off, and provincial treasuries better off. I would think that would be an area to be very carefully explored with the provinces so that we do not run into the kind of problem the Hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has related to us concerning medicare, or the kinds of problems we are facing now in the area of post-secondary education. In some cases we find that the federal contribution to post-secondary education in certain provinces exceeds 100 per cent of the cost of post-secondary education, when the original intent was to have a program in which the federal government would participate with the provinces to defray part of the costs, in some cases 50 per cent in a shared arrangement between federal and provincial governments.

I would not want to see a program in which the federal government enriched its tax expenditures to assist all citizens in day care expenses, with the result that provincial governments pulled back their existing funding of day care, such that individuals would be no better off after the introduction of new tax expenditure than they are now. That is a very serious problem and one which the newly established parliamentary task force to look into the question of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, could very well explore.

Mr. Mayer: All Canadians would benefit.

Mr. Evans: I agree with my hon. friend who is making comments on the other side of the House.

Something which I will certainly recommend, and I hope he will support and recommend along with me, is that the newly formed federal-provincial task force look not only at this kind of thing, in addition to the existing federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, but also at other potential areas, including the kinds of relationships and arrangements we should put into place between the federal government and the provincial governments to ensure that when an increase in funding comes from one level of government, be it the provincial or the federal government, the individuals to whom the program is intended to benefit are the beneficiaries and not one or other levels of government.

With that said, I would like to turn my attention now specifically to the motion. This motion relates to income tax deductions for child care expenses. It deals with two separate issues. The first calls for an increase in the amount of allowable child care expenses that may be deducted, and I will return to this question shortly. The other issue, which is a far more complex one, and one which hon. members opposite have spent a great deal of time on, raises the basic principle of this tax provision and asks the fundamental question: What does this particular tax provision seek to achieve?

It is argued that this is a discriminatory provision in our tax law. Indeed, that was the finding recently of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, after examining the complaints of male taxpayers that they did not enjoy equal treatment to that accorded to women by this section of the Income Tax Act.

Briefly, the point of contention lies in the fact that the deduction for child care expenses is available to women with no qualifying restrictions as to their marital status or circumstances within that marriage, but it is available to men only in limited circumstances.

A mother who has a paid job or operates a self-employed business may claim the expense deduction regardless of whether she is a single mother, or whether she has a husband who also works to support the family, or whether, indeed, her husband stays home and acts as a house-husband, so to speak.

But a man, to qualify for the deduction, must be a single or a separated parent or, if he is married, his wife must be unable through illness or as the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) indicated through incarceration to care for their children. In other words, a father will be allowed to deduct child care expenses only in circumstances where he has to seek outside help in caring for his children while he works.

Having said that, I think it must be clear, however, that in actual practice the great majority of women who claim the child care expenses as tax deduction need the income that comes from their job. I do not have to cite statistics to demonstrate the importance of money earned by women in the labour force toward supporting the family budget. Yet the fact remains that the deduction is available to men only in certain circumstances, while it is generally available to women.

Following the decision last fall by the Human Rights Commission, the Commissioner, Gordon Fairweather, said recently that this is discrimination and that it can be changed only by Parliament.

If we conclude that discrimination exists, however, it does not automatically follow that it should be removed. The Income Tax Act discriminates, and deliberately so, in other ways as well. Are younger people improperly discriminated against, for example, by the special deduction for the elderly? Or consider the proposed charter of human rights which stipulates that special treatment in the form of affirmative action programs to improve the position of certain groups does not constitute a breach of the rule against discrimination, found in that charter. So in the case before us, as in other areas, we have to consider carefully whether the discriminatory treatment is justified.

The deduction for child care expenses in the Income Tax Act was introduced in 1972, as part of the major tax reform being introduced at that time. Its preferential treatment for women has been no secret over the years since then. Yet no minister of finance during that period, including the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) in the previous government, has felt it appropriate to change that provision.

In fact, in 1976, in the wake of the 1975 International Year of the Woman, the maximum deduction allowable under the act for child care expenses was doubled. Why should Parliament have enacted this sort of discrimination in 1971 and confirmed it five years later?

The rationale for the initial measure as part of Tax Reform was stated in 1969 in the government's white paper on tax Reform, which said:

> This new plan is intended primarily to benefit mothers who need to work to support their families, and would be in addition to the normal exemption for children.

During the International Year of the Woman there was a very clear need identified for measures expressly designed to alleviate the plight of women in the work force. Probably the chief discrimination against women in the work force was the fact that they were generally paid less than men—a situation which continues to exist, unfortunately, to this day. Making the child care expense deduction generally available to women was seen as one way by which the state could redress some of these grievances.

In addition is the fact that, in spite of changing values, women are still traditionally held responsible for the care and nurture of children. I think that is further explanation of why the allowance is generally available to women, but available to men only in most circumstances in which the children's mother is not available to help care for them.

● (2140)

I should note an exception to that last generalization. In order to claim the expense deduction, a man who is separated from his wife must have a legal separation order or written agreement. If he has been deserted by his wife without the legal formalities he does not qualify for the deduction, unless his separation is confirmed by court order. This tax rule exists purely for administrative reasons; how else could one verify separation or marriage breakdown. This is one of the particular problems raised by the Human Rights Commission, and the government will certainly give careful study to that problem.

Ever since the deduction for child care expenses went into effect in 1972 it has been criticized as an example of sexism, or perhaps I should say reverse sexism. There are strongly opposing viewpoints and basic philosophies behind both sides of the argument.

One view sees the child care expenses as a personal expense that arises as a consequence of the mother's discretionary decision to work outside the home. It is her traditional responsibility to care for the children, the argument goes, and if she decides to go out to work, that is her decision made in the knowledge that child care costs will have to be paid. Since there are already tax benefits accruing to a couple where both partners are working, the public should not be expected to provide what is, in effect, a further subsidy through allowing deduction of the child care expenses.

The other contrasting viewpoint, one that I tend to share, sees child care as a shared responsibility and concern of the whole society, and one which should therefore be supported out of the public treasury. It follows from this argument that where a taxpayer must pay for child care in order to work, this should be considered a real expense of earning income and should be fully deductible. I think that is the spirit of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Halifax West.

Before concluding, I should refer to the other aspect of this notice of motion dealing with the ceiling on child care expenses that may be deducted. The present limits are $30 a week, and $1,000 per year for each child under the age of 14, with a maximum deduction of $4,000 in the year. There is a further stipulation that the deduction may not exceed two thirds of the taxpayer's earned income in the year.

As I said earlier, those maximum deduction levels were set in the 1976 budget, which doubled the previous limits established in 1972. This motion proposes a deduction of $10 a day for children under 12 years of age. Assuming a five-day week, that means $50 a week, or an increase of 66 per cent in the present level. Obviously a change like that would involve a considerable cost to the treasury, not to mention the much larger charge on the treasury if the deduction were made generally available to men. Such a change would have to be considered in the context of other tax changes in a budget.

One point we should bear in mind is that child care expenses are not the only kind of child raising costs for which our tax laws try to provide. There is the basic personal exemption for dependant children, for example, and the child tax credit which is designed to provide help where it is most needed, in low and lower middle-income families. Both these provisions are indexed to reflect inflation. There are other federal programs, including family allowances, which also have to be taken into consideration when we look at this proposal to change the tax deduction for child care expenditures. Furthermore, in our federal system we cannot ignore the various social services to families provided by the provinces which have the main authority in this field.

Since the decision of the Human Rights Commission, studies have been going ahead in the Department of Finance into the possibility of restructuring the existing resources being allocated to child care, to see whether they could be more efficiently applied to achieve the goals we seek. I should add that in his budget, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) clearly indicated he is going to undertake a major review of tax expenditures in the tax system. I can indicate to the House that this is one of the areas the department is now considering for modification.

In conclusion, what is being proposed here involves a substantial increase in our so-called tax expenditures. These are not the normal cash expenditures, but they have every bit as much impact on our federal deficit. This motion also proposes a fundamental shift in the policy underlying this deduction which was originally intended to help redress the inferior economic position of women in the labour market. I do not think anyone would argue that it does not constitute special treatment for women—call it discrimination if you wish. Hon. members will have to make their own judgments as to whether that special treatment is justified.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we agree that the present tax deduction of $1,000 per child per year is far from adequate. In some cases, this means only one sixth of the child care expense of a family is returned through the deduction. We also agree there should be no sex discrimination and that either a father or mother should be eligible for child care deductions, just as either a father or mother might remain in the home to care for a child.

I commend the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) on some aspects of this resolution. However, I cannot agree that an increased tax deduction which allows $10 per day for child care costs will solve the problem of affordable day care for most parents with average and low incomes in Canada. If we accept this plan, my fear is we would merely be continuing present inequities. Only the very rich and the very poor can afford day care in Canada today. The rich can pay directly and the poor resort to welfare subsidy.

What we need in Canada is a universal form of affordable child care. We must have a government policy which makes dependable, accessible and affordable child care a must for any Canadian family that needs it. I agree this is particularly important in rural areas of Canada where there is now really no provision for child care services and cost subsidies.

However, to achieve this goal, if we are trying to do it through the tax system, surely the Income Tax Act must be changed to add a child care tax credit. A tax credit would help pay the cost of child care for persons who do not now earn enough to pay income tax. Many of these are working poor, people with very low incomes. Also, there are those who are not working, in addition to some mothers on their own who need day care service.

This bill raises the whole question of the need for a universal child care program throughout Canada. With 44.5 per cent of Canadian mothers in the work force, there are some 721,000 children under the age of six who have working mothers. Very few of these families, about 12 per cent of them, are able to put children into government-approved day care spaces. In the ten years before 1979 the number of working women increased by 62 per cent. We know this trend is here to stay.

There are many points I would like to raise in support of much more active federal leadership to ensure a universal and affordable child care program in Canada. We all agree with the National Action Commission for the International Year of the Child that children are our greatest resource and must be given the first priority in our various policies.

Family structures in Canada are changing. Child care needs are very great. Child care, and I use that term rather than day care because it has a different connotation, must be flexible, meeting the child's development needs as well as the needs of the family as a whole.

It is also important, since the cost of living is so high, particularly the cost of housing and mortgages today, that in many cases both spouses must work. There must be two breadwinners in the family in order to meet survival costs. This means many couples are putting off having a family, and affordable day care would be a great help to them.

● (2150)

Single-parent families also are increasing at a phenomenal rate. Single parents must be assured of stable, high standard care for their children if they are to seek work and, as I said earlier, many single parents must have the choice to remain at home and care for their children, if that is best for them. We must not force single parents, particularly, into the work force if that is not best for them and their child, but we must have adequate flexible day care in any case.

We in this party feel that the federal government must be much more actively involved in the development of a universal child care policy. We must have federal standards that apply in all provinces, there must be fair financial arrangements involving a fair contribution for those who can afford it, and tax credits or deductions certainly would help in that way.

There also must be, of course, a major contribution from the provinces which carry the main responsibility for day care. This means funding in advance for operating costs, because they have to keep the doors open and pay the overhead. The federal government should certainly be contributing to start-up and capital costs; such incentives are needed to develop new day care centres but were refused by the responsible minister. The federal government should also be sharing subsidy costs, which it does now to some degree through the Canada Assistance Plan, but this is far from universal. It is very important there be an integrated, shared funding policy with up-front moneys to cover the operating costs for day care centres.

Many people, Mr. Speaker, feel that a child care centre should be an adjunct to neighbourhood schools, and I favour this idea. There are many schools where classrooms are becoming available and, with the help of federal funds, these should be converted to good child care centres operated close to home for mothers where the older children are in the regular school program.

It is estimated there are over one million children between the ages of seven and 12, the so-called latch-key children, who go home to empty houses because their parents work, or the single parent works, and they do not have adequate care for this age group. We need after-school care, summer programs, flexible programs that will include care for infants, perhaps with more homemakers going into the home; and we need registered family day care homes, satellite programs connected to neighbourhood day care centres.

We also need accessible, flexible day care in the workplace where this is the best practical arrangement for the parent and child. I am pleased to say a very active day care committee has been working here on Parliament Hill over the past year to establish a model day care centre, demonstrating the need for workers, not Members of Parliament necessarily, but workers on the Hill to have good day care in the workplace. We appreciate the support Madam Speaker has provided to this movement and hope to have the centre open by next September. I am pleased to hear recently that a federal department, I believe the Treasury Board, is considering implementing a pilot project of this kind.

When we talk about financing our day care centres, it is most important also that we remember there must be adequate, well paid staff for this most important service. For too long I think the attitude of people has been that child care is something that can be done by anyone; why do women, who have been in the home anyway, need to get paid adequate wages, they can go and be a supervisor in a day care centre—at terribly low wages. This is not a part-time job for so-called housewives, and this is an attitude that needs to be changed. There must be adequate funding and staffing at decent union rates of pay for day care supervisors.

I would also like to say, Mr. Speaker, that decent universal child care is far too important a subject to be considered as a result of a private member's bill, with all due respect to the member who presented this resolution. I urge that this be a major topic of debate in the House. The present health, welfare and social affairs committee has been studying the report called "For Canada's Children: National Agenda for Action". This report was presented by the Canadian Commission for the International Year of the Child in 1979, Mr. Speaker. Only now are we getting to this report, and I am ashamed to say that many members on that committee have not shown a great deal of interest in Canada's children and have not been as active as I hoped they would be on this very important issue. I hope this matter will come back to the House for a very serious debate. There is nothing more important than Canada's children and the future of our country depends on adequate care in the home where parents who want to can care for their children, or there should be adequate universal day care available.

In conclusion, I would like to quote excerpts from this report. These are points which I believe are relevant to the debate on this resolution and on which we in this party agree completely. On page 27 it states:

> Children have not had equal access to care the way they have had to education.
>
> Child care encompasses a wide range of alternatives to help children develop and flourish as human beings.
> Only the very poor and the very rich have access to many of these alternatives.

The major problems in the provision of accessible, available and affordable day care in Canada are cost, jurisdiction and attitude. Although child care is a provincial responsibility, the federal government could participate to a much greater degree and relieve some of the funding problems.

> With working parents now the norm, the need for child care programs is more acute than ever. It is unrealistic to expect parents to shoulder the full financial cost of raising the next generation.
> Parents who stay at home should have the support they need to best fulfil their caring role.

And finally, Mr. Speaker:

> Since healthy, well cared for children are a joy and an asset to their society, the care and well-being of our children should be a responsibility and a trust shared by society as a whole.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words on this important motion that the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) has put before the House. I think it is a very important motion and I hope the government will take notice of it. He brought out a very important point to which he did not address himself, but I think we will have to over the next few years; that is the preservation of the family unit.

Do we as citizens want to simply work, earn a good living, and look after ourselves, or are we going to look beyond ourselves to the question of why we are here and what this is all about? It looks to me like the preservation of the family unit is in reality what we should be looking for in this coming age.

The hon. member brought to our attention the present limitations on parents, whether they be single-parent families or whether both parents work. However, there are severe limitations placed on people who have to work and have to put their children into day care centres for one reason or the other. Because the time is short, I would like to bring to the attention of the House that a number of years ago as a project co-ordinator for a building project I spent many hours studying day care centres. Most highrise office buildings are well behind in development for the future.

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIRPORTS—INCREASE IN PASSENGER TRAFFIC AT MALTON, EDMONTON AND CALGARY

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil-Papineau): Mr. Speaker, Mirabel is a name that conjures up grandiose projects, projects that were meant to make of that spot the largest port of entry into North America! But Mirabel is also an expropriated community of Canadians who were asked to forget the dreams and aspirations that are typical of all members of rural communities. Mirabel is a white elephant. Mirabel, finally, is a ten-year-old issue that would appear to be so complex that each study leads our civil servants to recommend that a further study be made of it in greater detail. And so, year after year, pressing decisions are put off pending the findings of studies that are under way. So much time is spent on those precious studies that I have come to the sad conclusion that what findings are produced are always obsolete and, as time lost breeds new problems, we find ourselves with even more problems to solve. In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, everybody is waiting for the decisions the ministers in charge should be making. The land owners who were expropriated are waiting, as is the whole population of the area and the province of Quebec, because the economic future of Quebec is at stake. I am waiting, and I am sure several hon. members are waiting too. Those the minister responsible considers as Mirabel die-hards are waiting. In short, everybody is waiting and that is the irony of the situation. Also, everybody knows what should be done. I do not deny the complexity of the problem, and I respect the minister responsible who insists on playing it safe to avoid mistakes at all costs. However, how many more years should we continue waiting? And what price will we have to pay for this prudence which borders on paranoia?

There are two main aspects to this issue. On the one hand, the management of the adjacent lands, and on the other the future of Mirabel airport. As to the first element, I am very pleased with the decision which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) announced recently to establish a new Crown corporation. However, the future of the airport itself is still in doubt, and this uncertainty is not without adverse consequences on the Quebec economy. Since the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is not present, I should like to direct a series of questions to his parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael), and to avoid all possible misunderstanding, I must advise him that although I have read the Speech from the Throne very attentively, as the Minister of Transport had suggested on December 2, I have been unable to find any answers to my questions. First of all, what progress in their study have the officials of the Department of Transport made who, after ten years, are still unable to provide us with any additional information on this?

• (2205)

Second, did the parliamentary secretary read the article by Michel Gratton published in the newspaper Le Droit last December 1? Can he confirm the increase in passenger traffic at Malton airport, 14 per cent last year, at Edmonton airport with 21 per cent and at Calgary which beat all records with a rise of 23.3 per cent? And can he explain why Mirabel did so poorly, with an increase of 3 per cent? Can he also tell us what steps the Minister of Transport intends to take to turn Mirabel into a money-making venture?

Third, has the Minister of Transport been made aware of the resolution adopted by the Mirabel municipal council on February 3 in which they ask him to authorize the transfer of flights from Dorval to Mirabel? One excerpt from that resolution which I fully endorse is most revealing and deserves to be quoted:

> Whereas Mirabel airport has physical and operational features which are unique in North America and in the world because of the particularities of its adjacent territory, because there is no curfew, and because it has the world's most modern cargo and passenger-handling facilities which give it a lead in the operation and the industrial development to which it aspires;

Finally, and it is always the same question every day, when, when, and again when will the minister once and for all take the required decisions? Not only has the time come, we are already late as it is. In my opinion we must act right now. I am convinced that the decision to build that airport in the early seventies was sound. The mistake has been to delay until tomorrow what ought to and could be done today. It is a complex matter, I admit that, however its characteristic complexity does not justify all that wasted time.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Argenteuil has raised the issue of growing passenger traffic at the Toronto, Edmonton and Calgary airports as well as the question of the measures which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) intends to take to make Mirabel airport more profitable. The increase in passenger traffic at the Calgary and Edmonton international airports has been remarkable and mirrors western Canada's economic growth.

The increase at the Toronto International Airport was also slightly higher than the national average. Air passenger traffic did not increase as quickly in Montreal mostly because of slower economic growth. However, traffic in Mirabel should increase for the following reasons. First, Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that the commitment of the minister concerning Mirabel is unquestionable.

The hon. member is well aware of the ongoing study on the various options to restore traffic between Dorval and Mirabel. When the many factors involved, and especially the costs, have been analysed, a decision will be made. For the moment, I would simply like to give a short list of the programs to be implemented to promote the development of Mirabel.

—The Action Mirabel group which has already succeeded in promoting the airport as a freight centre open 24 hours a day and as a favourite location for trade exhibitions and symposiums.

—Action Mirabel has also worked on the question of access to truckers from the United States.

—The very recent installation of a free transit zone by the Widex Company.

—A proposal to eliminate what is called the "Last Stop Provision" in landing charges at Canadian airports. This would benefit mostly Mirabel.

—The establishment of a Crown corporation to resell the land adjacent to Mirabel.

I could go on, but I would simply like to assure the hon. member that the future of Mirabel is a priority for the minister.

GRAIN—CHANGE IN POLICY ON TIMING OF ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this adjournment debate as a result of a question and the response by the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, the assistant to the Minister of Transport.

On March 18 Senator Argue made a statement in the other place regarding the seeding plan producers in Canada should adopt for the coming year. He stated that increases should be in the neighbourhood of 10 per cent for all grains, for barley, and oats. He said durum should remain the same and wheat should be increased by 10 per cent.

The problem arises from the statement by the senator, and the answer given by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) in this House. He said that in week 33 of the shipping season, which was last week, there was a scarcity of ocean ships arriving at ports enabling them to loan out of the terminals. That brought the space available in the Vancouver terminals to the lowest level in several years. There was only 49,820 tons of available space in Vancouver.

The assistant to the Minister of Transport made a statement in which he asked producers to increase their production by 10 per cent, without giving them any assurance that they would be able to deliver that grain to market. This also pertains to week 33. We are signalling a warning to the producers and the government that there is a problem building. There are 7,601 loaded cars heading west, compared to last week's total of 7,200 cars, and last year's average of 5,000 cars. I know some people would feel it is progress to have increased loads going west, but when they arrive in the yards we will find there will not be room for them, since last week in the yards there were 14,434 cars in ports to be unloaded.

At the present time there is loading for 11 vessels berthing in Vancouver. Last week there were four vessels loading; there are no ships waiting, according to the information I have. That means when these 7,601 cars arrive in Vancouver there will not be adequate space for them in the terminals. We would like the minister to explain to the farmers in western Canada, who will be putting their crops in within the next six weeks, how they will move their product to market if this situation continues.

I would also like to take issue with the statement made by the assistant to the minister in the other place in which he stated he was not announcing initial payments this year because last year he announced them too soon. As I mentioned to the Minister of Transport in the House on March 20, it was not that the payments were announced too soon, it was that the statements were inaccurate when they were announced. If you will recall, Mr. Speaker, late in March the minister announced initial payments, readjusted those payments in July and again made a mistake either through incompetence or lack of information. I must say I doubt it was the latter, as at no time since 1971, when this practice was established by the minister's predecessor, the Hon. Otto Lang, was the error so great or the discrepancy so large between the initial payments and the actual interim payments. This practice was established in order that farmers and producers of western Canada would have adequate information in respect of pricing, and thereby have a management tool at their disposal. The present minister would be the only minister since 1971 who would not have that information available to him.

I would like to quote a statement by the Minister of Transport as reported in Hansard for March 20.

• (2215)

He said:

I said the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board did not give the initial prices. He said, however, that he expected the prices to be strong, to remain as they are now, which is an indication of his view on prices.

However, I looked very carefully at Senate Hansard for March 18, when the assistant to the Minister of Transport bootlegged an announcement into the Senate relating to seeding intentions. He stated that:

Last spring I recommended certain initial payments, and I got into trouble because I was too careful, too conservative.

He spoke further, but I do not find anything in this statement of the assistant to the Minister of Transport in the other place which would indicate that he expects prices to remain strong and firm.

I hope the parliamentary secretary will be able to add additional light as to why the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board has not followed the practice set by his predecessors since 1971, including the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), who had the same information, the same board, the same commissioners, and the same officials as this minister.

I would again say I do not believe this was done through misinformation. I suspect it is perhaps because the present minister, the assistant to the Minister of Transport, lacks the clout in cabinet to obtain a commitment from this government to guarantee initial payments at a level at which they should be guaranteed; we are aware that the federal government is responsible for any shortfall. I take it that the cabinet does not have a great deal more faith in the assistant to the Minister of Transport in the other place, in his judgment call for the initial pricing of grain, than do the farmers of western Canada.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises the question of why this year's pre-seeding report from the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board does not contain an indication of initial price levels for the 1981-82 crop year.

As my hon. friend has noted, this has been the practice since 1971, when it was instituted by Otto Lang, to give farmers a reasonably accurate picture of what to expect in the way of grain prices. That system, by and large, worked well in an environment of stable prices. Last year, it did not work so well. In fact, I remember several complaints from the hon. member that the initial prices were misleading in view of the trend in international prices.

On May 14, he asked the minister in the House about the fact that initial prices were below the previous year's adjusted prices. His colleague, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) brought the subject up again on May 30; and on July 7, the member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) said, and I quote:

In view of the world price for grain today, there is no justification for lowering the initial price.

This lowering is in relation to the previously adjusted price. Indeed, the initial prices have since been adjusted not once, but twice, to reflect the very healthy world prices.

My hon. friend obviously recognized that in a highly volatile market, such as the present one, an initial price announced in March is, in fact, not very meaningful. This year, the Minister of State indicated that initial price levels would be set at the beginning of the crop year, as was done before 1971. To give some indication to farmers, however, the minister continued this practice of recommending seeded acreages, most of which are well in excess of last year's. This, at least, will give the farmer some confidence until July when a more meaningful initial price can be announced.

CANADA LABOUR CODE—PROTECTION OF URANIUM MINERS

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): I would like to address my remarks to the subject matter of my question of January 28 of this year which related to the lack of safety provisions in the Canada Labour Code or in any other legislation pertaining to uranium miners at Elliot Lake and elsewhere across Canada. During my question, I said that uranium miners in Elliot Lake and throughout Canada have now been left surrounded and jeopardized by a jurisdictional no man's land which leaves them entirely without protection from the very real and hazardous dangers of their industry. I asked the minister if action was being taken, as promised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) in reply to an earlier question from the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) on December 16, 1980. The minister's response was, in part, as reported at page 6647 of Hansard:

● (2220)

I might say that submissions were made by the steelworkers requesting that joint safety and health committees be established at the two largest uranium mines, Denison and Rio Algom at Elliot Lake. They were accordingly ordered to be established at these two locations in an order dated April 14. As of this date they are not yet in operation, due to the refusal of the steelworkers to nominate labour members to these committees.

The minister added that he wanted to say that I, as the member for Kootenay West, would do a great service if I would pass back to my friends, the steelworkers at Elliot Lake, the message that miners there are as well-protected by safety regulations as those in any mine in Canada. To be generous, Mr. Speaker, people all across Canada who are involved in mining know that that statement is not correct. Anyone involved in mining and anyone in the labour movement knows that that is not correct.

Along similar lines, an editorial in the Sault Star on Monday, February 2, 1981, echoed the minister's words when he responded to my question on January 28. Mr. Homer Seguin, the staff representative of the United Steelworkers of America, whose office is at Elliot Lake, wrote a letter to the newspaper which is basically a reply to the comments the minister made when answering my question on January 28. The letter reads as follows:

Let me briefly acquaint you with some of them.

—The government, provincial and federal has over the years, said uranium workers are well protected.

—From 1955 to 1978 the government said the Ontario mining act applied to uranium workers in Ontario. This act did not even mention radiation and had many other shortcomings, however, —On December 6, 1978, the federal Minister of Labour announced in the House that the Ontario mining act didn't really apply, but, that Part IV of the Canada Labour Code does, contrary to former belief. In passing, it is interesting to note that the Canada Labour Code had no specific provisions for mining. Indeed, there was no expertise nor inspectors in the field. But, the fed's said we were well protected once again.

—Next, the federal government acknowledge (after considerable pressure from the Union) that we were in fact left without real protections, but they would rectify this inadequacy.

—In August 1979, the fed's adopted the old Ontario mining act by reference. Obviously, this was intended to shut us up since it is the same act that was said to apply (but really didn't) since 1955. It's interesting to note that two months later Ontario adopted Bill 70 and discarded the old mining act as obsolete, but not for uranium workers. Ironically, the new Ontario legislation resulted in large part from developments following a three-week safety and health strike in Elliot Lake in 1974. Again, the government said we were well protected.

—Next. Following more pressure, the fed's agreed there was inadequate protection and in May 1980, adopted the Ontario act by reference into its regulations. We were told face to face by Mines Minister Judy Erola that all of the Ontario Act applied. We expressed doubts about the legality of adopting regulations which conflicted with an act but were assured it applied.

—Next, as we attempted to utilize provisions of the Ontario Act, we were told the Ontario Act didn't all apply. For example. The right to refuse unsafe work was not as contained in the Ontario Act, nor was the rights of our safety and health committeemen nor was the composition of our safety and health committees or their protected earnings, etc.

—In support of our contention that our concerns are legitimate you should know that despite acknowledged violations of existing safety legislation (said to apply) not one charge has ever been laid by Labour Canada or the Atomic Energy Control Board involving the Elliot Lake uranium operations.

—we cannot and will not live in a jungle of jurisdictional confusion and unclear legislative protection. This has already killed hundreds of our members.

In support of the United Steelworkers of America position . . . I would refer you to the latest government committee report which investigated this whole area of concern.

The all party provincial "Select Committee of Hydro Affairs" issued its final report December 1980 on "Mining, Milling and Refining of Uranium in Ontario." This committee held many meetings, conducted hearings, and investigations for months and generally supports our Union's position.

—you will understand our continuing concern by reading on pages 12 and 13 of the select committee's report their legal opinion as to what protection we really have.

The letter quotes from the committee proceedings as follows:

The committee considers that there is a very real possibility that the government of Canada has not met the technical requirement of the Statutory Instruments Act and that as a result, Ontario's uranium mine workers are operating wholly without the legal protection they are entitled to and have been assured they have.

● (2225)

And finally . . . . . comment that the union has refused to name safety and health committees is ridiculous.

We have told the government agencies and representatives time and time again that our safety and health committees are in place, ready and willing to be legitimised as provided in the Ontario Act. The government has refused. We ask—if the fed's adopted the Ontario Act, then why does it not apply?

There is an old saying that it takes a big man to express honest opinions but it takes a bigger one to acknowledge he was wrong.

I would ask the parliamentary secretary, in the absence of the minister this evening, to finally acknowledge that the government is wrong, that the miners at Elliot Lake are in a jurisdictional no man's land. Let us get on, let us work together to attempt to resolve that problem and save the lives of those people working in the uranium industry in the province of Ontario as well as right across Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. According to the rules of the House, parliamentary secretaries should reply to questions. I see the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Parent) is seeking recognition. I want it clearly understood that this is not a precedent.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I might point out by way of information that both the parliamentary secretary and the minister are feeling a little under the weather tonight and they asked me, as a former parliamentary secretary to a minister of labour, to read the answer, with your permission, Sir.

With regard to the occupational safety and health protection for uranium miners at Elliot Lake, the federal government's involvement in the Ontario mining industry, as it relates to safety arrangements and practices, is limited to uranium mines and uranium plants which are licensed by the Atomic Energy Control Board. Until October, 1978, the Canada Labour Code, Part IV, which pertains to occupational safety and health was not applied to workers in the uranium mining industry because it is "subject to any other act or regulations," including the Atomic Energy Control Act and the regulations thereunder.

Protection for workers prior to 1978 derived from the requirements of the licence issued by the Atomic Energy Control Board to enterprises in the nuclear field. These licences required such enterprises to conform with the laws of the province in which they were located. This meant that in Ontario workers in uranium mines and processing plants were protected by Ontario's occupational safety and health law regulations. This arrangement pertained, as mentioned, until the autumn of 1978 when, in response to a letter from the United Steel Workers about jurisdiction, the Atomic Energy Control Board referred the question to the Department of Justice for consideration. The federal justice department at that time gave the opinion that since the AECB had not issued regulations governing occupational safety and health, and since Part IV of the Canada Labour Code was subject only to other acts and regulations, then Part IV applied to uranium mining and processing operations.

The Code does not cover radiation because there are existing AECB regulations respecting radiation and mixed radiation-dust hazards.

Arrangements were worked out with Ontario to reference its occupational safety and health laws by regulation under the Canada Labour Code making them, for purposes of uranium mining, federal laws and thereby designating provincial safety officers as federal safety officers. These arrangements permitted the continuation of the provincial machinery for administering conventional occupational safety and health in uranium mines. Thus, provincial enforcement carried on without significant changes.

On July 11, 1979, and again on April 10, 1980, submissions were made to the ministers of labour by the United Steelworkers Union, requesting that joint safety and health committees be established at the two largest uranium mines, namely, Denison and Rio Algom. In so far as the validity of the referencing of the Ontario occupational health and safety act is concerned, this is a question within the competence of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), and as far as this justice department is concerned it says that it is okay and that we must take the word of the law officers of Canada.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

EFFECTS ON SERVICE INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise to propose a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The South Eastern Saskatchewan Service and Supply Association reported in Weyburn, Saskatchewan on Saturday, a 40 per cent to 50 per cent shutdown in the industry; oil rigs and service rigs moving south to the United States; 1,400 oil wells shut in production in southern Saskatchewan; the price of oil in Weyburn, Saskatchewan at $17.75 per barrel, while our government continues to pay for foreign imports $40 per barrel. The action of the government putting people out of work is only Canadianizing North Dakota and Montana in the Wilston oil basin. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources take action immediately to turn around the drastic effects of this energy policy on the service industry, and the lack of supply of oil for Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

SPECULATION IN REAL ESTATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, the enormous speculation in residential real estate that has taken place in Vancouver has now spread to almost every major city in Canada as people rush out to buy homes and farmland to protect themselves against the government's induced inflation. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That this House direct the Minister of Finance to explain to this House why he continues to allow federally-regulated credit institutions, including Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, to validate the speculation in real estate by increasing the mortgage lending value of properties subject to speculative activity.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

DELAY IN PAYING OUTSTANDING ACCOUNTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, this has regrettably and finally hit Peterborough and it is in Ottawa as well. Many corporate and independent gasoline service stations are now displaying signs "Government Credit Cards Not Accepted". The reason is that it takes the federal government between three and six months to pay its accounts. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis), under Standing Order 43:

That this government hold an inquiry to find out why the Department of Supply and Services cannot issue cheques within 30 days, or at least pay interest of 22 per cent on all their accounts outstanding.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCE OF SASKATCHEWAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provision of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Because of its inability to set clear policy, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has put prospective home owners in the position of living in homes for which they cannot obtain mortgages—in one case since May, 1977. Not only do these people have no mortgages on their homes but they are not sure what the final price will be, whether the price on date of occupancy or the price at today's inflated values. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

S.O. 43

That Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation take action to finalize negotiations with the province of Saskatchewan so the mortgages will be finalized, based on the value of the home on date of occupancy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST THAT SPEECHES BY PARTY LEADERS ON CONSTITUTIONAL RESOLUTION BE BROADCAST IN FULL

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I seek the unanimous consent of the House to raise an important issue.

Given the significance of the question which is now being debated in the House, and considering also that we all wish that as many Canadians as possible be well informed on the constitutional question, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Bachand):

That the House request the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to make adequate advance publicity and then televise in full the speeches of the leaders of the political parties in this House, namely that of the Leader of the New Democratic Party, that of the Leader of the Opposition, and that of the head of the government.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLAND—OPPOSITION TO SOVIET INTERVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas events in Poland have, according to all reports, intensified the threat of Soviet intervention in that country, and in view of the refusal of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) to propose a meeting of NATO foreign ministers to discuss the impact this threat could have on Poland and on the western alliance, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House condemns the Secretary of State for External Affairs for his continuing reluctance to take any positive initiatives, either directly or in concert with our NATO allies, that would indicate to the Soviet Union Canada's strong opposition to any intervention by that country into the domestic affairs of Poland.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

FUND RAISING ACTIVITY OF LIBERAL PARTY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the Liberal Party of Canada is holding $150 per person meetings with cabinet ministers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the Solicitor General, who is supposedly responsible for the constituency of Simcoe South, call such a meeting in my riding to discuss the Constitution, particularly the entrenchment of language rights, with the invited guests, the funds received to go to a local charity instead of going to fill the coffers of my political association, thus working in a true democratic fashion and ensuring the re-election of the present member for Simcoe South.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

EL SALVADOR—FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF MURDER OF ARCHBISHOP ROMERO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, and I trust that I will have the unanimous consent of this House. Today is the first anniversary of the murder of Archbishop Oscar Romero of San Salvador. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson), and the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean):

That this House join in an expression of solidarity with the people of El Salvador as they remember some of the last words of their beloved archbishop, "They can kill me, but the clamour for justice among the people they cannot silence."

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BRIEFING SESSIONS FOR MINISTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, yesterday in replying to questions the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) indicated that he was unsure as to whether we were in NATO or the Warsaw Pact, and also seemed to think the Helsinki Final Act was a roadshow touring Canadian bases in Europe. Under Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek):

That this House direct the Prime Minister to hold briefing sessions at a primary level so that his ministers can tell the white hats from the black hats in international affairs.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUS OF WOMEN

INDEPENDENT REVIEW OF ADVISORY COUNCIL'S OPERATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, the credibility of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women has once again been called into question by the transferring of responsibility for this weekend's Atlantic Conference on Women and Aging to the New Brunswick Branch of Women for Political Action. The responsibility for this important conference was removed from the Advisory Council following numerous complaints, and threats of boycotts of the conference from women's groups, who do not feel the Advisory Council is capable of acting in an independent and impartial way. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House call for a public, external, and independent review of the Advisory Council's operations.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ENVIRONMENT

USE OF LOW SULPHUR COAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas Canadians are very concerned about the pollution caused by acid rain, some of which is caused by a high sulphur content in American coals; therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That this House urges the Government of Canada to promote the use of low sulphur Canadian coals in Ontario which will reduce the acid rain problem and provide employment for Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

HEALTH CARE

SHORTAGE OF MEDICAL DOCTORS IN RURAL AREAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, because small towns and cities in Canada have an unusually difficult time in recruiting an adequate number of medical doctors, and because our immigration policy is very restrictive in respect of admitting new doctors on the basis that Canada already has an adequate domestic supply, but has not taken into account that there is a surplus of medical doctors in urban areas and a critical shortage in rural districts, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That this House encourage the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of National Health and Welfare to initiate discussions within their departments and in consultation with the provinces so as to bring about an adequate resolve to Canada's shortage of medical doctors in rural areas.

NATIONAL SECURITY

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE REFERENCE TO SIR ROGER HOLLIS IN GOUZENKO INQUIRY

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I apologize to the House for my voice this afternoon. My question is for the Prime Minister. Was there a direct reference to Sir Roger Hollis, the then head of the British MI5, in the Gouzenko testimony held in camera before the Taschereau Commission, or was there any reference to a code name which could only, in retrospect, have fitted Sir Roger at that time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am afraid I do not know the answer to that question. I will be happy to take it as notice and try to find out the information about which the hon. member asks.

If my recollection is exact, Mr. Gouzenko in those days referred to a mole inside the British intelligence agency MI5. Not having been present at the time, I have no recollection of whether the mole could be identified. I will be glad to find out.

RELEASE OF GOUZENKO PAPERS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, both within and without the government now for about three or four years as the Prime Minister is aware, there have been members in this House who have been attempting to obtain the release of the Taschereau papers, or the Gouzenko documents.

I am sure that when the Prime Minister took over the high office he did, at some time prior to 1974 he was very comprehensively briefed on the Gouzenko papers. In any event, during 1974 or right after 1974, after the British caused an investigation to be made into the activities of Sir Roger Hollis, was there not at that time a very high level communication from the then British Prime Minister to the Canadian Prime Minister about the revelations and the accusations concerning Sir Roger Hollis? Was this not really the true reason why, to this day, those Gouzenko papers have not been released to the Canadian public, and was this not really the real reason why, four years ago, an extraordinary move was taken by the Prime Minister directly to put those Gouzenko papers on ice for another ten years?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, there are several points raised by the hon. gentleman in his question. The first is that Members of Parliament have been trying for three or four years, as he says, to get release of the Taschereau papers. The hon. member was solicitor general for the Government of Canada for a period between 1979 and 1980. I am sure he has the answer to these questions if he is as interested as he says. Why did he not release the papers? I do not know what the answer is to that. Probably he did not release them either because he did not get around to examining them or because he found other reasons.

In my case, the hon. gentleman suggests, and his words are, that I was comprehensively briefed on this matter before 1974, but I do not know why the hon. member assumes that. I have no recollection of having asked questions or having received any detailed information about the Gouzenko affair. Presumably, since his interest is so great, he did that when he was solicitor general. I am sure that he has the answers to these questions, whereas I do not. Let him give the answers to the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REASONS FOR NON-RELEASE

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I am glad the Prime Minister is attempting to release me from any oath by which I may be bound. He is saying yes. I think, therefore, that the Prime Minister realizes the reason none of us in the Clark administration was able to obtain those papers was because certain aspects were bound by an undertaking given by the then prime minister to him as the ex-prime minister. It was as simple and as stark and as naked in its restriction and cover-up as that.

● (1420)

In any event, apart altogether from the fruitless attempts in, before and since those days to obtain the Gouzenko papers, now that this international story is breaking throughout the world—yesterday, today, and there will be more revelations in the British House of Commons on Thursday—I plead with the Prime Minister, no matter the degree of incompetence in Canadian and British intelligence circles those papers may show, and apart from any internal investigation he is now having, to release those papers today. What national purpose is now served by continually hiding, for almost 40 years, those documents and papers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, even the hon. member astounds me when he makes such representations in this matter. When he alludes to this convention of not looking at papers of previous administrations, he realizes that is a convention that dates back many decades. It is a convention that presided over the transfer of Mr. St. Laurent's papers to Mr. Diefenbaker, over Mr. Diefenbaker's to Mr. Pearson, over Mr. Pearson and my administration, to Mr. Clark's, and then again from Mr. Clark to myself. The Gouzenko papers belong to another administration, not to mine and not to the Leader of the Opposition. I have no more access to them than the hon. member had when he was solicitor general.

Mr. Lawrence: You hid them for ten years.

Mr. Trudeau: Now the hon. member says I hid them for ten years. Why did he hide them for ten months? He had as much access to them as I do.

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED ACTIVITIES OF JOHN WATKINS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the current inquiry in Great Britain into the activities of Sir Roger Hollis, and the growing evidence that the penetration by the U.S.S.R. into western intelligence operations was and is more extensive than previously believed, will the minister reopen an investigation into the alleged espionage activities of former Canadian ambassador to Moscow, John Watkins, in order to ascertain any possible connection with Sir Roger, or any other current connections which may have arisen as a result of those activities?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am not personally familiar with that case, but I will certainly look into it.

INVESTIGATION INITIATED BY BRITISH PRIME MINISTER—REQUEST FOR FULL-SCALE INQUIRY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister knows, this country has had a long history of Soviet espionage activities, beginning with Igor Gouzenko's revelations in the forties, right through to last year when the Soviet ambassador was asked to withdraw three officials from his embassy in Canada for abusing diplomatic status to conduct espionage activities against the United States, from here in Canada.

In view of the apparent cover-up of the Watkins' case, which has been going on for some time, and numerous other questionable "diplomatic" activities in Canada, and in view of the Prime Minister's reluctance to table the Gouzenko papers, is he now prepared to follow Margaret Thatcher's example and initiate forthwith a full-scale investigation, not into this alleged specific cover-up that I am talking about but into over-all spy activities in this country and, more important, report them to this House and make them public?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member, as did his predecessor in question period today, talks about cover-up. "Stark cover-up" I believe was the expression.

Mr. Nielsen: Naked cover-up.

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat the suggestion I made to the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland. That side formed the government for a period of nine or ten months. They had access to these papers as much as I had access to these papers.

Mr. Clark: Not true.

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition says it is not true. Let him stand in this House and say that the convention which is operative somehow gives me access to papers of some previous administration to which he did not have access.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

THE ECONOMY

WAGE CONTROL PROGRAM—QUERY RESPECTING CABINET STUDY OF REPUTED SECRET DOCUMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): My question is for the President of the Treasury Board. On February 24 I asked the Minister of Finance if the government was considering a wage control program. The minister, in his quaint way, neither admitted nor denied it, but said that if he ever had such a document presented to him it would be "swept away mighty fast". Well, I have in my hands a secret document—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: —from the cabinet, and I would ask him if he would confirm that not only is there such a document outlining wage control methods but, in addition, there is a document that he himself prepared, file no. TBS 108-DP, and would he tell the House what decisions have been reached by the cabinet on these?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I believe the Minister of Finance has responded very directly to a question raised by the hon. member, or by some other hon. member of this House, with respect to wage and price controls. I am not aware of the content of the Treasury Board document which was cited under that reference number. I do not know what the contents of that document might be.

Mr. Broadbent: Well, that is a little bizarre. I understand the document is over the minister's signature, so it is a little unusual that he would not know what was in it, but maybe that is to be expected under present circumstances.

An hon. Member: Not so unusual.

Mr. Broadbent: Related to that question, though, would he confirm that the first document, which lays out in some detail a scenario for possible implementation of wage controls, acknowledges that public servants' salaries are well below average but should be singled out for rigorous control so that they would "provide a demonstration effect on private sector trends"?

In short, does not this document, which the cabinet is now considering, point out that wages are not causing inflation on the one hand, but singles out wages to be controlled as a means of curing inflation?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, no such document has been presented to cabinet. Furthermore, the inference that the hon. member wishes us to draw, that the public sector rates of remuneration are substantially below those of the private sector, is a subject which I have addressed on a number of occasions inside and outside this House. I have pointed out to members in committee, and in speeches in public forums, that our policy is not to lead the private sector. We have been consistent in that approach.

If one looks at last year you will find that settlements in the public sector federally were something in the neighbourhood of 10.8 per cent as against, as I recall, 11.2 per cent in the private sector. I believe that is a record of achievement by this government in being fair but firm in its bargaining positions, and I also say that, by and large, the public service unions have been most responsible in their demands as well.

Oral Questions

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO COMBAT INFLATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I would like to go to the Prime Minister with a final question on this matter.

An hon. Member: You were there this morning, Ed.

Mr. Broadbent: There is for cabinet consideration a document that points out that wages have not been the cause of inflation, but instead singles out such items as interest rates and food and energy prices as being the real and principal causes of inflation, and then recommends that public servants' wages should be singled out for attack as a method of dealing with inflation.

Could the Prime Minister tell the House why the government is not zeroing in on the causes of inflation which, the document acknowledges, are interest charges and energy and food prices, and instead is attacking the victims of inflation, namely, ordinary wage earners?

• (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I know nothing of this so-called secret document, but I will recognize that in answer to a question in this House, I think about a month ago, I mentioned that very point to the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I said that the causes of inflation are mainly energy prices and higher food prices and interest rates. The hon. member will recall that I indicated to him that at least the first two of those elements, and probably the third, are not controlled in Canada. We do not control the price of energy we import and, with respect to Canadian energy, he knows we have a policy which is to keep our prices below the world prices.

In so far as food is concerned, the Leader of the New Democratic Party also knows—and I said this a month ago—that when we have a type of controls that democratic countries introduce, they generally do not hit food. They do not hit food at the farm gate, and this is one of the causes now of a higher cost of living.

The same explanation has been given by the Minister of Finance with respect to interest rates. One of the reasons why they are high is because they are even higher in the United States.

This so-called secret document does not seem to be very secret. It says what I said in this House about a month ago.

As to why we would be enjoining—the hon. member shakes his head no. I will see what his supplementary question is.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Sherbrooke.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REVIEW OF DOSSIER OF MOVEMENT OF CARTOGRAPHY SERVICE TO SHERBROOKE

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. In 1974 the Government of Canada decided to go ahead with the relocation in the provinces of certain agencies and branches of departments. Two of 23 such projects could not be carried out because the Quebec government refused to substitute the Canada clause for the Quebec clause and thus unilaterally change the agreement between the federal government and the provincial governments under which civil servants moving to any province could have their children educated in the language of their choice. Could the Prime Minister tell the House if acceptance of the constitutional proposals by the House and Mr. Ryan's expressed intention of replacing the Quebec clause by the Canada clause would prompt the federal government to reopen the file on the relocation of mapping in Sherbrooke?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker, the answer is very clear because one of the obstacles preventing the relocation of the mapping branch in Sherbrooke is precisely the fact that the Quebec government does not want to apply the Canada clause. That clause is contained in the charter which is now before the House and, unless I am mistaken, that clause is endorsed as well by Mr. Ryan, the leader of the Quebec Liberal party, who in turn has gained the support of the Progressive Conservative Party in the House. Consequently, considering the circumstances of which we are aware, we hope that in the near future the mapping branch will be relocated in Sherbrooke.

NATIONAL SECURITY

EXTENSION OF FREEZE ON RELEASE OF GOUZENKO PAPERS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister is supplementary to those posed by my colleagues earlier. The Prime Minister will recall that he froze the release of the Gouzenko documents for another ten years, and by that freezing he made it impossible for my administration to have access to those documents. He will recall that fact.

The Prime Minister will also understand that the normal period for which documents are kept frozen is 30 years. He extended it an extra ten years in the case of the Gouzenko papers. Will the Prime Minister tell the House of Commons why he took the extraordinary step of extending, by another ten years, the freeze on the Gouzenko papers, and will he tell the House of Commons by what legislative authority he took that extraordinary step?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, you will have to allow me to answer this at a bit of length because there is confusion here also, and even in the question by the Leader of the Opposition.

The Gouzenko papers were obtained as a result of a royal commission set up by a previous administration.

An hon. Member: In 1948.

Mr. Trudeau: In 1948. It was not mine. It was not the hon. gentleman's administration. If these are the papers hon. members opposite want to have access to—

An hon. Member: They are public.

Mr. Trudeau: Now I am told they are public.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Trudeau: If these are the papers they want to have access to, or see tabled in the House, this is a different matter from the convention which linked various governments. These are the papers of a royal commission. They are not classified as papers of a particular administration. They are classified as papers of a royal commission. They were classified at the time because of security reasons, and because the privacy of individuals was involved.

This matter was reviewed in 1978 because that was when the papers normally would have been released. I was not involved in that review. I did not ask that it be done. I did not follow its sequence. The decision was made. If I was informed, I was merely being informed; I was not consulted.

Since then I did learn that the reason why another ten years were added to the period during which the papers would not be released had not to do with security but had to do with privacy of individuals. Some people were named; it was perhaps not in keeping with our policy to make the papers public for fear of invading their privacy. I repeat that the former solicitor general could, just as easily as I, have asked that this matter be reviewed.

Mr. Lawrence: I did.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member says he did. If he did, that is probably the reason the matter is being reviewed now. Another look is being taken at it. Perhaps the Solicitor General could inform us as to dates. Maybe this other review dates from the former solicitor general; maybe not. I could not say. But if that is the case, it is being reviewed now, and we will see once again if the papers can be released without offence to the privacy of certain people who are entitled to that privacy.

Perhaps the Solicitor General can give the information I do not have. Was this review started under our administration, or was it started under the right hon. gentleman's administration? Whichever, the answer is the same. Any administration can review the question of papers which some day are to be made public. This is not a matter of a convention under which he did not have access. This is a matter of knowing if it is in the public interest to release these papers. I am informed that there is no question of security involved; it is another aspect of the public interest that is being looked at.

An hon. Member: Release them.

Mr. Trudeau: An hon. member says "release them." Why did he not release them?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEDURE AND AUTHORITY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT ACTION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, this is not the place for debate, but the reason they were not released was because the action of this Prime Minister precluded our government from having them released.

Mr. Trudeau: When?

Mr. Clark: My question is twofold. Did I understand the Prime Minister to say, and is it his position, that there is no security implication respecting any of the people whose privacy, presumably, would be protected by the failure to publish the Gouzenko papers now? In other words, has the Prime Minister satisfied himself that the only reason is a matter of privacy and not a matter of security?

Second, can the Prime Minister answer my first question as to the legislative authority which allowed a government acting under his authority, even though he claims it acted without his knowledge, to take the extraordinary step of extending by ten years the period in which this series of papers could not be released to the public of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the right hon. member asks about legislative authority. I do not know if there is any. I believe there is, but I would have to ascertain that.

My recollection is that when I took office there was an exchange of letters with the previous administration. Then there was another between the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and myself. Whether this was under legislative authority or a convention, I cannot say, but certainly it is a convention which the right hon. gentleman respected, because he wrote me a letter that he was respecting the papers of previous administrations. I also wrote him a letter to that effect when I took office following him. So I really cannot answer whether it is legislative authority, whether it is just a gentleman's agreement, or what, but certainly I will find the answer.

I recall that when our government, in the late 1960s or early 1970s, reduced the period during which papers should be kept in the Archives incommunicado from 50 to 30 years, it was done at my initiative, and it was done after consultation with the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker and the Right Hon. Lester Pearson. So I imagine it is more of a convention than a law, Madam Speaker.

As to the other part of the question, I only retain that "it was the action of the prime minister which prevented the release" of the documents. I think the answer to that is linked to the first one. When papers are classified, either in the national interest, for security reasons, or in the national interest for other reasons, such as I have said, privacy of individuals, it is done on advice from officials. That was stated quite clearly in a written answer which appeared on the Order Paper—

Answers to questions from the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville were given as to who were the officials involved in this matter.

I think the Leader of the Opposition asked if I had satisfied myself that it was a matter of privacy only rather than of security. I was given this information by the Solicitor General, and I did not look beyond it. The Solicitor General is present in the House. If the Leader of the Opposition wants to ask him whether he is satisfied, if the Leader of the Opposition wants that further answer—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Who is running the show?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not know what is wrong with the hon. member for Saskatoon West. Has he woken up since yesterday?

QUERY RESPECTING BRIEFING BY BRITISH AUTHORITIES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he received any briefing from Britain after the investigation in Britain in the period between 1970 and 1974 into the activities of Sir Roger Hollis, and whether that briefing was delivered to the Prime Minister personally or to any of his officials, with the idea that it would be transmitted to him. I am speaking here of a briefing after an investigation in the period between 1970 and 1974 in Great Britain, into the activities of Sir Roger Hollis. Was there a report on any aspect of that meeting to the Prime Minister, or to officials who could be counted upon to report the contents of that briefing to the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in so far as briefings of our officials are concerned, I do not know the answer; I will have to inquire. I can say without equivocation that, as far as I am concerned, I have no recollection of briefings in that period. Certainly if it had been a serious briefing on a matter about which I was supposed to know, I would remember it, but I have no recollection of any such briefing. However, perhaps the Leader of the Opposition received briefings during that period from Great Britain or other countries. I do not know about that. If he has briefings that should cause us to worry, I wish he would inform the House, and I wish the former solicitor general would inform the House. They were the government, after all; they have been concerned about the Gouzenko papers for years and they had questions on the Order Paper. I would have thought that, if they had doubts about the whole matter, they would have made it their duty to inquire into it.

METRIC CONVERSION

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF APPEAL DEADLINE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and it stems from the fact that in the year 1871 the metric system was recognized as a legal form of measurement here in Canada. I regret to point out to the minister—and I will ask him a question as a result of this—that I learned from The Canada Gazette just a few weeks ago that they have made, by order in council, Canadian units of measurement in Canada illegal as of certain dates in 1982. Is it the government's intention to make Canadian units of measurement illegal? The deadline for appeal to his ministry is April 29. Would the minister at least extend that date so that people in the retail food sector who are opposed to this order would have an opportunity to respond to the order in council making Canadian units of measurement illegal as of 1982?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): The answer is no, Madam Speaker. I believe that those who want to express their views have ample time to do so before 1982.

[English]

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. Since, through the same process of order in council, the government has decided that, starting on a certain date, it will impose fines up to $1,000 by order in council on merchants who use any other than metric weighing scales, with or without a conviction, I ask the minister whether, in the interest of democracy, he would agree to remove that fine of $1,000 for the use of imperial weighing scales starting on a date in 1982 and, if he will not do so, would he at least agree to listen to the retail merchants and consumers of Canada and take a look at the test centres, which had the metric system forced on them and which have all reverted back to imperial measurements? Would he or the Minister of State for Small Businesses for once listen to the consumers in the retail food sector in Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, I have much more confidence in the public spirit of citizens and tradesmen than the hon. member seems to have. I do not believe that these fines should be removed because I am convinced that the tradesmen will obey the law and there will be no need to fine them.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ALICE ARM, B.C.—DUMPING OF TAILINGS BY AMAX—APPLICATION OF OECD CONTROLS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I am sure that the minister is aware of the fact that one week from today Amax Limited intends to start dumping toxic waste into Alice Arm in British Columbia. Yesterday I received a letter from Dr. Mercier, head of the international program on chemical safety of the World Health Organization in Geneva. Dr. Mercier confirmed to me that the dumping of toxic waste at Alice Arm is subject to OECD controls. Has the minister filed a report or received approval from the OECD?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I am not sure I accept the use of the word "toxic" as the hon. member uses it. This might spread a fair amount of fear in a situation where reputable scientists have already made a judgment. But to make sure, I have asked three distinguished scientists from British Columbia to review the matter and give me their advice. As soon as they have given me their preliminary report, I will, of course, try to act on their recommendations.

Mr. Fulton: The minister did not answer my question as to whether or not anything has been filed with OECD. I think the House can safely assume that it has not, and if there is anybody around here who should be afraid of something, it should be the minister.

During the summer and fall of 1978 four federal government scientists, whom the minister knows well, namely, Darcy Goyette with EPS, Mike Nassichuck with Fisheries and Oceans, Pat Nasmyth with the Institute of Ocean Sciences, and Don Trethewey of the Canadian Wildlife Service, looked at the existing information on the proposed dumping of toxic tailings into Alice Arm. My understanding is that they were pretty well unanimously opposed to the project. On just whose scientific advice did the minister and the cabinet put through that special order in council?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, I am not familiar with the report which the hon. member uses as a basis for his question, if there is a report. The fact is that the scientists from my department, who are responsible for advising me on matters affecting fish, advise me that in their judgment they were willing to let the regulations, which were promulgated by order in council, go ahead. They reviewed their recommendations.

To ensure that my own department does not examine itself, I have recommended that a scientific panel of distinguished outsiders look at the matter and give me their advice. I will await their report.

THE CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT STUDIED KERSHAW REPORT

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. A few weeks ago the minister stated in the House that he would examine the report of Mr. Anthony Kershaw. Has he had time to examine this report, and if so, is he ready to comment on it?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, when I appeared before the committee, I said that we would examine the legality of the situation. Later today, I shall table a paper in the House explaining the position of the Canadian government.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

REVIEW OF SALARY AND ALLOWANCES

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, my question concerns pay increases for the Canadian Armed Forces, notice of which I gave to the Minister of National Defence. In his absence I will direct my question to the acting minister, who is the Secretary of State for External Affairs; or perhaps the President of the Treasury Board can provide information on this matter.

I believe the salaries and allowances payable to members of the Canadian Armed Forces are under review at the present time. The current rates apply only to the end of March, 1981. Can the responsible minister indicate whether there is a salary review under way? If so, when will it be completed, and when can members of the Canadian Armed Forces expect to know about and receive pay increases for the next fiscal year?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, indeed there is such a review, actively under way. I hope the government will be in a position to announce the pay increases within the very near term, hopefully before April 1.

COMPARABILITY WITH PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board indicated public service pay increases were in the area of 10.8 per cent. I hope that the pay increases for members of the Canadian Armed Forces will at least equal that figure.

There is another complaint concerning members of the Canadian Armed Forces. It is with respect to their pay levels falling below those prevalent in the public service. In fact some tradesmen receive less than their equivalents in the public service. Can the minister indicate whether any steps are being taken to rectify this disparity and provide pay comparability for members of the Armed Forces, which will effectively relate them to the members of the public service, even though they do not expect to receive the same pay levels as those in the private sector?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, it is the policy to establish such comparability. The pay in the public service is, of course, a matter which will be taken into account.

I would also point out that when I made the reference to 10.8 per cent I was talking about an average. With any particular group the figure might be higher, or it might be lower, depending on where that group finds itself relative to the external market, so that should not be taken as a figure which is to be applied across the board.

ENERGY

EFFECT OF ALBERTA COURT OF APPEAL DECISION RESPECTING NATURAL GAS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday the minister responded to questions by me with respect to the natural gas reference in the Alberta Court of Appeal, saying that the matter of appeal was under consideration and that he would give a statement to the House in due course. He did not answer my question, though. He attempted to avoid answering the question with respect to the position being taken by the government as to whether it is prepared to adjust, amend, or bring in new taxation measures in discussions with the producing provinces.

Now that the minister has had a day in which to discuss the matter with his mentor, the Minister of Finance, can he now address the question as to whether or not the government, the minister in particular in his discussions with the producing provinces, is prepared to make any kind of changes in terms of the taxation regime and the sources of revenues for the federal government, in order to bring the discussions with the producing provinces to a satisfactory conclusion?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the judgment of the court of appeal, which I am sure the hon. member has read, states quite specifically that the judgment is on a very narrow point. As a matter of fact the judgment deals with two or three wells which are not producing at the present time and which are not exporting any gas. So, in terms of substantive impact, there is none at the present time. Therefore the question that the hon. member raises does not seem to require the necessity of changes at the present time. Again, this is a matter which the Minister of Finance will have under consideration. I am sure he will advise the House if any additional adjustments are required to taxation.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, the decision itself reaffirmed the ownership and the lack of jurisdiction and ability of the federal government to tax property owned by the Crown in right of the province. In view of the fact that this matter has been challenged not only in Alberta but that Saskatchewan will bring an action with respect to the direct taxation imposed by the federal government at the wellhead, and in view of the desirability of having this matter resolved as quickly as possible by the courts, can the minister say whether or not he is advising the Minister of Justice, or his cabinet colleagues, to bring the issue before the Supreme Court of Canada so that these matters being raised by the provinces can be adjudicated at the highest level? Is the minister considering that option, or will he consider it?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the government considers all options. As to advice which I may give, it is obviously given inside cabinet and it is of a privileged nature.

GRAIN

COMPENSATION TO FARMERS FOR EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture, who is responsible for the compensation being paid to Canadian wheat producers affected by the grain embargo. Can he tell the House whether the federal government is prepared to pay the $152 million, a figure arrived at in a study released by the New Democratic Party yesterday?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I saw the amazing figure the hon. member says he obtained through library research. It was arrived at by a different avenue than the one we followed. If he has any new ideas that he has been able to obtain from the Parliamentary Library, I would like to know of them. We do hope a decision will be made very soon with respect to the program.

Mr. Hovdebo: Madam Speaker, the minister is quite welcome to disagree with our figures, if he wishes. He is entitled to do so. Could the minister at least indicate to the House his method of calculation of compensation, which I understand has been completed for some time now? After 14 months, will the minister either put up or shut up? So that the farmers will finally get what is due to them in compensation, will the minister at least put before the House those figures so that there can be intelligent public debate with respect to what they should be?

Mr. Whelan: The figures we used were figures presented by all the different people in the different departments concerned with grain marketing, by compiling all the information available in the grain trade and putting it together in a very thorough manner. When a decision is made, these figures will be tabled. The figures will be put up, but it will take more than the hon. member to tell me to shut up.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PAYMENTS TO BAND MEMBERS IN ALBERTA

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It arises out of the decision taken by the regional office in Edmonton which affects payments to band members under the age of 18 years, under the per capita distribution program. These are funds which accrue to the respective bands through royalty revenues from resources. I would like to ask the minister why the department took this decision unilaterally and whether it is, in fact, just an interim decision, or whether it intends to consult further with the Indian bands and the Indian community before it becomes a permanent fixture?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, my understanding is that there has been consultation with respect to the policy taken by the department leading to this decision. I will check to see if the consultation has been inadequate, but that is certainly my information.

Mr. Mazankowski: The fact of the matter is there has not been any consultation. It was a unilateral decision. Surely the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is not suggesting that his departmental officials have a better command of handling these funds, rather than the funds being in the hands of the parents? Surely he is not telling the House that?

● (1500)

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The president of the Alberta Indian Association spoke to me this morning and indicated that he wished to cover a whole agenda of matters with me. He did not indicate any lack of consultation with respect to what the hon. member is talking about; rather, he wishes to talk about a whole range of other matters which do not include this at all. Therefore I think it is reasonable to assume that perhaps the hon. member is criticizing the policy; but certainly the president of the Alberta Indian Association is not, at this particular time.

PETITION

MR. WILSON—POSSIBLE INVASION OF POLAND BY U.S.S.R.—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF GOVERNMENT POSITION

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the forty-fourth report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAWRENCE—COMMENTS OF MR. TRUDEAU RESPECTING RELEASE OF TASCHEREAU PAPERS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege relates to certain comments made in the House today by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) regarding the failure of this government to release the Gouzenko papers or the in camera proceedings of the Taschereau Commission, and the alleged failure, as indicated by the Prime Minister, by any member of the Clark administration to attempt to obtain those papers. It also relates to the actual means and methods of the previous Trudeau administration in locking up and hiding these papers for a further ten years, with no legislative authority or jurisdiction to take that extraordinary step.

As I understand the whole gist of the Prime Minister's remarks, he said that as the solicitor general and as a minister of the Crown in the Clark administration, I had the full power and authority to obtain the release of those in camera proceedings; that if I was so anxious to obtain those papers, somehow or other I neglected to do so or failed to do so, and the blame for this lay on my shoulders.

I believe that that is an absolutely incorrect interpretation of the events; that interpretation, I believe, is a falsehood. I gather it would be unparliamentary for me to say that that incorrect interpretation is false to the knowledge of the Prime Minister; therefore, I shall not go that far. But I do say to the House, and to you, Madam Speaker, that because this matter has been in the forefront of many questions in this House, both written and otherwise, if the Prime Minister did not know that we were attempting to obtain the release of those papers, then he should have known. It is obvious that we were attempting to obtain the release of those papers.

My point of privilege really gets down to the basic fact that he has misled the House today.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Andre: Tell those Liberals to keep quiet!

Mr. Lawrence: He has misled this House today and has tried to leave the impression that no attempt was made to release those papers. First of all, may I go back to the actual—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. There are a lot of conversations going on between hon. members and—

An hon. Member: It is on both sides of the House.

Madam Speaker: I said there were a lot of conversations going on between hon. members in the House. If they could carry on those conversations behind the curtains, it would be helpful.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, may I just cite some short history, because the history of the matter is relevant to the understanding of the point of privilege.

Madam Speaker: I just want to remind the hon. member that he must be short on the history of the matter, and he must also be extremely short on what constitutes—from what he has said up until now—a divergence of opinion on how a certain matter was conducted. I have to hear the point of privilege, and I would urge the hon. member to come to it very quickly.

Mr. Lawrence: I understand that the burden is on me to prove to you, Madam Speaker, that it is not merely a divergence of opinion but an actual misstatement of the facts made today in this House by the Prime Minister. That is the burden which is on me, and that is the burden which I will attempt to discharge.

First of all—

Madam Speaker: Order. Even that does not constitute a question of privilege. If that is the argument which the hon. member is going to pursue, I would advise him to come more closely to the arguments related to the privilege. If one hon. member states facts which another hon. member does not think exactly reflect the reality of things, this does constitute a divergence of opinion on what they both interpret the facts to be; there is a lot of room for interpretation there. A question of privilege cannot address itself to that kind of argumentation. It must be indicated to me that the privilege of the hon. member has really been breached.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, I am always very cognizant of your rulings, obviously because we have to be; but I am also very cognizant of the suggestions and help which you give to us when we are struggling, in a matter that was unforeseen, to come up with arguments. However, as I understand my rights as an hon. member in this House, if another hon. member—whether he is the Prime Minister or the farthest backbencher in the House, it matters not—makes a misstatement of fact which alleges that an hon. member did something, or did not do something which he should have done, then that is a question of privilege. That is the allegation I am making here today.

Mr. Trudeau: You are doing that every day. Wake up, you guys!

Mr. Lawrence: If I may go back and make a very short summary of facts in this matter, Mr. Gouzenko defected in 1946 from the embassy of the Soviet Union in Ottawa, and made extremely serious allegations to a number of officials of the government and a number of people outside the government. As a result of those allegations, a royal commission was set up. The full report of the royal commission and the proceedings before that commission have never been made public. I do not question the authority of the government of the day in its decision not to make those papers public if it did not so desire. They were sent to the archives on the understanding that they were to be sealed for 30 years. That 30-year period ended in 1978.

I come now to the crux of the matter. In 1978, when all of the security provisions, and I respectfully suggest to you, Madam Speaker, all of the privacy problems relating to the testimony before the Taschereau commission were long since over and done with, the administration preceding the Clark administration took it upon itself, illegally, with no justification and with no legislative authority whatsoever, to send those documents back to the National Archives and reseal them for another ten years.

Now I come to my question of privilege.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, I must call the hon. member to order. The hon. member is debating the question. He is stating a different set of facts—

Mr. Trudeau: And making falsehoods!

Madam Speaker: —from those stated by another hon. member. That does not constitute a question of privilege. I would like the hon. member to come to those arguments.

Mr. Lawrence: If not for your benefit, Madam Speaker, for the benefit of the House, I was attempting very briefly to summarize the history of this matter, which goes back 35 years. As I have completed it in approximately three and a half minutes, I do not think that is bad.

The Prime Minister now alleges that, as solicitor general, I could have obtained the release of those documents but I made no attempt to do so. That is the nub of my question of privilege. With the full cognizance of the government of the day I attempted to obtain the release of those papers, as the minister of the Clark administration who was primarily in charge of security for this country. I attempted verbally through my own officials and I attempted verbally through Dr. W. I. Smith, the Dominion Archivist, when he informed me that these matters were sealed as the result of a cabinet deliberation of the previous administration.

I then attempted to find out the reason for that and whether the Clark administration could overrule that cabinet directive. I was informed that the reason for it came under the jurisdiction of an undertaking given by the then prime minister, the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), to the then leader of the opposition, now the Prime Minister of Canada.

I then insisted that I be given something in writing by Dr. Smith, which I received. I will read it to you, Madam Speaker; it is a letter addressed to me dated November 13, 1979. The only reason that I feel I can now release this letter to the House is that the Prime Minister indicated today that I would not be in breach of any rule of confidentiality or any oath of secrecy by doing so.

In a letter dated November 13, 1979, addressed to me as solicitor general of Canada, he wrote:

Dear Mr. Lawrence: In reply to your letter of 31 October, 1979—

I had asked for either the release or the right to inspect those documents.

—I enclose copies of documents relating to control of access to the transcript of the hearings of the Taschereau-Kellock Commission of Inquiry. This transcript is in the custody of the Public Archives—

This letter is from the Dominion Archivist.

—for permanent preservation, but access to it is controlled by the Clerk of the Privy Council. These records were declared "exempted" by the Clerk as allowed for by Section 1 (v) of the Access Directive (please refer to attachments: P.M. Pitfield to W.I. Smith, 3 February 1978; Access Directive of June 1977).

The Access Directive policies, dating originally from 1969, deal with both the transfer of federal government records to the Archives and access to records. I understand that these policies will be extensively revised in the light of proposed new privacy and freedom of information legislation.

If there is any further information I can provide, please let me know.

He enclosed copies of Mr. Pitfield's letter of 1978 to him and also an access directive from the Privy Council office dated November 14, 1978. All those measures were taken during the regime of the present Prime Minister of Canada who was also the then prime minister. Nowhere is there any legislative authority for those directives; nowhere is there any indication that legislation was passed by the Parliament of Canada enabling Mr. Pitfield or those from whom Mr. Pitfield took orders to do what he did.

When I complained about this verbally through my officials to Dr. Smith, the answer that came back to me, undeniably, was that these things were sewn up tight as the result exclusively of cabinet deliberations, and that these cabinet deliberations could not be challenged by me now as a result of the undertaking given by the then prime minister to the previous prime minister.

In the last few months of the Clark administration, and since I was not happy with that answer in any shape or form, I then caused an investigation to be started in conjunction with the Department of Justice to find out if there was any legislative authority for an action which I believed the previous government had undertaken that was absolutely illegal and without any authority whatsoever.

My colleague, the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) put a number of questions on the Order Paper that I wanted to ask after our government fell and we were back in this House. One of them was an inquiry whether there was any legislative authority for these actions. The written answer given to the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville was so evasive, as most of them are, that it is apparent to me today that there is still no legislative authority for this very extraordinary action.

I honestly felt, before becoming solicitor general, during my term in office and since then, because of the gross errors that were made at one time by a previous administration and by others who were our allies, that after 35 years the release of this documentation would certainly show those faults, those errors and that negligence so that this type of activity could be prevented in future by using a little bit of hindsight.

To return to the question of privilege, Madam Speaker, I honestly feel that my rights as a member of this House have been transgressed by the Prime Minister. I hope he will now be big enough to stand up and apologize. He should appreciate now that I made attempts, and that I am still making attempts outside this House, to obtain the release of those papers. I ran into a brick wall; I was frustrated by bureaucrats and I was also frustrated by the actions of his previous administration. I hope he will be big enough now to stand up and apologize to the House.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not think that was a question of privilege, but I will let you rule on that. I want you to accept the invitation to stand up and speak on this matter. What I want to do is to try to clarify a little bit the law and the conventions as I see it.

The hon. member keeps saying—

Mr. Andre: Since when do conventions matter to you?

Mr. Trudeau: —that illegally we extended the confidentiality provision by ten years because there is no legal provision to that effect. I indicated in answer to an earlier question that I knew not about the law in this matter but I did know about the convention. After the Taschereau papers were closed, I believe the convention was established—long before my time—that papers so classified would be classified and held by the archives for 50 years. Whether that was by law or by convention I cannot say. But I do know that in response to historians in many parts of the country, and representations from public servants, that I thought 50 years was too long. If the original 50 years had remained the rule, the Taschereau papers would be in the archives until some time in the late 1980s.

I intervened, as I explained earlier, after consultation with the Right Hon. Mr. Diefenbaker and the Right Hon. Mr. Pearson. I said, "Look, can we not agree that 50 years is too long? We could shorten it to 30 years." After some discussion and hesitation I got their agreement to shorten the period to 30 years.

The reason I needed their agreement was the reference to papers that had been classified not only under their administration but under the administration previous to theirs, that of Mr. St. Laurent's. Having received the approval of the surviving former prime ministers, then either in cabinet or by an order—I believe it must have been in cabinet since the hon. member is referring to a cabinet decision—we issued a directive that henceforth the 50 years would be reduced to 30.

The point I was making in my earlier answers is that the right hon. gentleman, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), when he was prime minister could have done what I did: He could have said that 30 years is too long or 30 years plus the additional ten that were given by directives in 1970 is too long and that the period should be reduced to 20 years, say, or ten, or five, or one—I don't care. That is the point I am making to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. I am not saying that the former solicitor general could have access to those papers any more than I am saying that my own Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) could have access to those papers.

The point I am making is that it is the government of the day, under law or under convention, that decides how long papers will be classified. I am sure the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition knows that. When the privacy legislation has been passed and this Parliament has accepted it, we may change the rules again. But it is the government of the day which issues cabinet directives or directives of the Prime Minister saying that we will reduce the 50 years to 30 years, as I did, or increase it by ten on one particular point or reduce it by 20 on some other point. That is all I am saying.

● (1520)

If the Clark administration had wanted to reduce the period when these papers were held incommunicado, it had that privilege. They were the government. They could have said: "We declassify everything, except the papers relative to an administration before ours". That is a distinction I tried to make in this House. Royal commission papers are not papers of an administration. A royal commission reports to the Prime Minister of the day. It is a royal commission. Papers from a royal commission, as I understand it, are not subject to the convention of transfers of administration. That is why I repeat the point: I was not Prime Minister when the Taschereau papers were given to the then Prime Minister.

Nonetheless, as Prime Minister in 1978, under my authority, and I must say without my recollection of it—I cannot say that because I recollect that at one point we said, "Okay, another ten years, if that is the advice we are getting." But the point I am making is that an administration can take that decision, and we did. Our administration is now looking into the matter to see if we can reverse the decision.

I am saying that the Government of Canada decides the length during which papers will be held in the archives and held incommunicado. That is all. The challenge I put to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is, why did he not release the papers? He could have had a cabinet meeting and said that henceforth they would reduce the incommunicado period from 30 years to 20 or to ten years. I imagine he would have then done what I did, namely, consult the previous surviving prime ministers. He could have checked to see what I would have said. The point is that he did not. My recollection is that he did not because the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition was advised, not that he could not release them, but that it was not in the public interest to release them. He shakes his head as if to say no. I do not know, but maybe he did not ask.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Or maybe had he asked, he did not get an answer. I am stating in this House what the laws and the conventions are. I am stating that, just as in 1978, the government of the day prolonged the period of confidentiality for ten years in the same way this government or the preceding government could reduce that period.

I have said that we are having the matter reviewed. If we find this material can be released without contravening the public interest, we will do so. We will not need to look for any obscure law or get permission from anyone. We will just be changing the convention, reducing it from a further ten years to something less than ten years.

That is how the matter stands, Madam Speaker. I repeat, I fail to see how—

Mr. Andre: You sure whomp that straw man! What about the question raised?

Mr. Trudeau: Now I am asked by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre)—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The Right Hon. Prime Minister has the floor. He should be allowed to finish his intervention.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I think the suggestion is that I did not answer the question why we had prolonged the matter for ten years. I answered that during question period. It is also answered in Hansard in reply to a question asked by the member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) as to why an extra ten years was given. The extra ten years was given because officials within the government looked at these papers. A study was made of them and a recommendation came forth. I said in the House that a recommendation was made that it was not only the security of the state but the privacy of individuals that would be infringed upon. That is why, as I understand it, the recommendation came to wait another ten years. That is the end of the matter as far as I know it, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I will recognize the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). However, just before I do I want to caution him. When the first speaker does not convince me there is a breach of privilege, I tend not to listen to many other interveners. In order to help the Chair, I would like the hon. member to address himself to the question of privilege. From Beauchesne I read that a question of privilege ought really to come up in the House and that a genuine question of privilege is a most serious matter and should be taken seriously by the House.

I do want to take questions of privilege seriously, but then, if they are to be serious, they must be addressed with the proper arguments and be treated as questions of privilege and not in any other manner. Therefore, I will recognize the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, having cautioned him about this.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I will naturally accept that caution knowing full well that you were directing it more pointedly at my predecessor who did not address the question of privilege at all in his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The question of privilege is very clear. The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) today in his place, in answer to questions in question period, accused the member of Parliament representing the riding of Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) of having failed to exercise his responsibility as a minister and as a member of the House of Commons—

An hon. Member: It is done every day in the House.

Mr. Clark: —in relation to the pursuit of the publication of a document which had been held secret. That was the accusation made by the Prime Minister of Canada. He said that the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland had not made any effort to carry out his responsibility as a minister to have those documents revealed.

Mr. Trudeau: He said that I had covered up.

Mr. Clark: That, in my submission, Madam Speaker, is a question of privilege that is not only a grievous charge because it accuses a Member of Parliament, in his capacity as a Member of Parliament, of failing to carry out parliamentary responsibilities—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: He accused me of covering up, Joe. Answer that.

Mr. Clark: That was a clear charge—but he also extended that charge to include the activities of the hon. member when he was a minister of the Crown.

The hon. member for Durham-Northumberland has just read into the record proof indicating that in fact he did take those actions which the Prime Minister denied he took, that those actions were not successful, not because of a failure to take them but because of a combination of actions taken by a previous administration headed by the present Prime Minister.

The present Prime Minister in the guise of dealing with the question of privilege, although he did not address it, spoke instead of different conventions that might or might not apply to the length of time during which documents will be held confidential. I agree with you, Madam Speaker, that while that is an interesting subject and one in which I will be pleased to join debate at another time, it is not the matter which is at issue here in the question of privilege raised by my colleague from Durham-Northumberland.

His question was, quite narrowly and specifically, that the Prime Minister of Canada had accused the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland of failing to do his duty as a member and as a minister. That was an accusation which the facts do not bear out. The member for Durham-Northumberland did not suggest—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Erik, he needs your help.

Mr. Clark: There is a great deal of shouting on the other side, Madam Speaker, because they do not much like having their Prime Minister caught out in a situation of this kind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I rise at this point because the Prime Minister, in my judgment, has now compounded what may well be a breach of privilege. He has accused the Member of Parliament for Durham-Northumberland of a failure, which accusation is not correct. When he had the opportunity, he refused to take the simple, gentlemanly course, a course which, when it is respected, makes this Parliament a place where business can be done and progress can be made. He declined to do the courteous thing and admit that he was mistaken and that his charge against the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland was wrongly based.

● (1530)

If the Prime Minister would be courteous enough to stand up and say that he was wrong, that the accusation he made was not founded on the facts, the issue could rest there. If not, Madam Speaker, I think you will find there has been a very serious breach of the privileges of the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland—

Mr. Trudeau: Baloney.

Mr. Clark: —both in his capacity as a private member and as a former minister of the Crown. Because he has been accused of a failure to act in his ministerial capacity when in fact he did everything possible to act, and was frustrated in the success of that attempt by actions taken by the previous Trudeau administration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I have been standing for the last 15 minutes trying to get recognized so I can speak to this same question of privilege.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cossitt: In fact, I have been trying for an hour.

Madam Speaker: I know the hon. member is asking to be recognized on a point of order.

Mr. Cossitt: No, Madam Speaker, on the same question of privilege we are now dealing with.

Madam Speaker: I am ready to rule on this question of privilege.

Mr. Nielsen: Surely, Madam Speaker, the hon. member has the right to be heard.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cossitt: I have been ignored for three weeks.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Cossitt: I am sorry, Madam Speaker, but I want the opportunity to set the record straight.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am disposed to rule on this question of privilege. Before ruling, I want to make a comment which I hope the House will accept in good faith. I did not comment on the kind of argument which the Prime Minister offered in response to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland. The reason was that neither of them addressed the matter of privilege, except for one saying that he had a question of privilege and the other one saying there was no question of privilege.

I do not want to unduly charge the hon. member, but I feel that since he did not address the question of privilege in a way that was satisfactory to me but aligned facts in order to expose what kind of divergence existed between the two points of view, the other intervener had no choice but to respond to those facts and align a new series of facts which he thought were related to the particular question.

However, that is not part of the ruling. I just wanted to make that remark since I do not want anyone in the House to feel that I am trying to unduly protect the Right Hon. Prime Minister; I do not think any member of the House needs that.

I quote Section 19 of Beauchesne:

A dispute arising between two members,

The kind of debate we have had this afternoon indicates quite clearly that this is a dispute between two members.

—as to allegations of facts, does not fulfil the conditions of parliamentary privilege.

The failure of a minister of the Crown to answer a question does not constitute a question of privilege. Nor does the fact that a former minister did or omitted to do something that he should have done during the course of his mandate constitute a question of privilege.

Charges in respect of that former responsibility can be made and are acceptable as long as they are made in a parliamentary way. We are talking about the responsibility of the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland in his capacity as a former minister. References were not made to his present role as a Member of Parliament. That does not constitute a question of privilege. It might be something which the hon. member would want to explain, and I think he did that abundantly today. I listened to him very carefully to see whether there was anything else but those explanations of his actions when he was a minister.

Even evasive answers, a matter which was raised during the course of debate, do not constitute a question of privilege. They are merely an invitation to probe the matter further. There are, of course, many occasions in this House to pursue matters in debate, but not by raising a question of privilege.

Therefore I must rule that in this case it is a matter of a difference of opinion, a dispute between members, but certainly not a question of privilege. I find no prima facie case.

MR. COSSITT—ALLEGED DENIAL OF RIGHT TO SPEAK

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): I rise on a question of privilege, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Leeds-Grenville on a point of order.

Mr. Cossitt: It is a question of privilege, Madam Speaker, not a point of order. I know that you would probably prohibit me from speaking on a question of privilege on which you have apparently already ruled. I would like to raise this point as my question of privilege, that in effect I am being prohibited from speaking in this House—

Mr. Nielsen: "My mind's made up, don't confuse me with the facts."

Mr. Cossitt: —on an issue on which I have as much right to speak as anyone else because I raised the matter of the Taschereau papers at least three years ago and on a continuous basis since that time. I had information available which I could have used if you had recognized me on the previous question of privilege—

Mr. Trudeau: Give it to the press.

Mr. Clark: He will.

Mr. Cossitt: —showing that on October 16, 1979, the then solicitor general replied to me by saying that he had ordered an investigation—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member himself stated, it is not possible for me to hear him on this matter since I have already ruled.

I remind the hon. member that it is in the discretion of the Chair whether to continue to hear interveners on a particular question of privilege. It has been my inclination when the first speaker had not convinced me that there was a foundation for a question of privilege that I would not go to any further speaker. If the member who feels that his or her privilege has been breached cannot bring forward arguments to prove that there is a question of privilege, it does not make sense that another person not involved in the privilege would be able to muster arguments in favour of that privilege. It is for the first member who raises the question of privilege to convince me there is a prima facie case. That has been my inclination. That is the way I want to deal with questions of privilege, and it is in the interests of the entire House to do so because every member of this House has things to say. Every member's right to say those things has to be protected within the confines of our rules.

Mr. Cossitt: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Cossitt: I would like to conclude what I started a moment ago.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry.

Mr. Cossitt: This is a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry.

Mr. Cossitt: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Well, if it is a point of order, the hon. member was up on a question of privilege before I interrupted him. Now he is up on a point of order. I can accept that. What is the point of order?

Mr. Cossitt: If I may paraphrase your words, Madam Speaker, you said something to the effect that it is the right of every member of this House to be heard. I have not seen that right exercised in the last half hour.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Cossitt: I have to say that. I am not criticizing the government, I am not criticizing the opposition, but I am saying, Madam Speaker, that there is an element of fairness—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Cossitt: You have known for a long time—

Madam Speaker: Order. I have to object to that expression of the hon. member. We are on pretty slippery ground here. If I prevent one member from speaking at a certain time, it is because I am protecting the rights of other members. Of course, one or two members are frustrated at that particular moment, but freedom of expression is protected in this House by the strict application of the rules to the best of my knowledge.

• (1540)

Is the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) rising on this point of order, because I do have another point of order?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I will be very brief with it.

There appears to be a question raised by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt). Obviously he and several hon. members on this side are not happy with the manner in which it has been treated. I simply rise now to file notice with the Chair that, after considering the matter, the hon. member may well wish to raise tomorrow the specific matter raised by him today by way of a substantive question of privilege, with the usual motion moved in support of it.

I simply provide the Chair with that notice now, and if the hon. member wishes to pursue it tomorrow, that is the procedure which will be adopted.

Madam Speaker: That is quite in order. If the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville has a new, substantive question of privilege to raise in the House at a later date, it will be examined on its merits. It is perfectly open to him to do that.

Mr. Cossitt: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Could you clarify for the House why a member who has dealt with any specific subject, whether it is the Taschereau papers or anything else, over a period of many years, and who probably possesses more information on it than anyone else in this House at this time, is denied the floor?

Point of Order—Mr. Andre

Madam Speaker: The hon. member could have the floor at any time this question is being debated. I do remind hon. members that what happened this afternoon is that one hon. member raised a question of privilege. I heard that question of privilege and a second intervener on that question. It is my discretion to determine when the Chair is sufficiently informed and ready to rule, and I have done just that.

I recognize the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. Mackay) on a point of order.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I will address the Chair very briefly. Perhaps you will forgive me if I make a suggestion which might involve reverting to motions, but I feel that most hon. members in this chamber would agree that we are seized today with a matter that has a great deal of significance, both in the national and international scene.

The Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) referred in the House to the fact that the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) had some information on this matter. I suggest with great deference to the Chair, Madam Speaker, that the House, which can do anything it wishes with unanimous consent, may be disposed to—

Mr. Trudeau: Question period tomorrow.

Mr. MacKay: Question period tomorrow?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, we will be here. Get on with the business.

Mr. MacKay: We have just heard from the oracle, so I gather there is not much point in pursuing the question any further with the Chair.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ANDRE—USE OF DOLLAR ITEMS IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, last Thursday I wrote to you indicating my intention to raise a point of order with respect to the Supplementary Estimates (C) and certain items in the supplementary estimates. You will recall it was my intention to raise the matter yesterday but in deference to the Prime Minister's intention to speak I postponed it until today. Therefore, with the permission of the Chair I would like to proceed with the point of order at this time.

As the House knows, Madam Speaker, the estimates lay out government spending plans and in their organization group these according to department and program in the form of votes. After the time allotted by the Standing Orders for committee study of the estimates, called the supply period, an appropriation bill is introduced and passes through all stages without debate. At some time in the past the government began the procedure of using votes on estimates to seek authority to undertake actions quite beyond the mere appropriation of funds. This may have been reasonable in the distant past when the appropriation bill was subject to full and complete debate with first and second reading, committee and report stages and third reading. However, since the rule changes in 1969 wherein the appropriation bill is passed through all stages with no debate, this procedure is no longer appropriate.

Now, over the last decade numerous members have raised points of order respecting the use of the estimates and the appropriations procedure to seek legislative authority by way of dollar items. Your predecessors, Madam Speaker, have ruled on these points a number of times, including on March 10, 1971, December 10, 1973, and March 6, 1974, by the Hon. Speaker Lamoureux; on June 22, 1976, March 22, 1977 and June 7, 1977 by the Hon. Speaker James Jerome.

On December 7, 1977, Speaker Jerome, referring to the supply procedure, said as reported on page 1642 of Hansard:

> This is a process which has long been adhered to by the House which provides for an examination of the estimates in rather great detail, but does not provide for extensive debate between the various stages of the supply bill. As a result of that, it has long been a tenet of the House that supply ought to be confined strictly to the process for which it was intended, that is to say, for the purpose of putting forward by the government the estimate of money it needs, and then in turn the voting by the House of that money to the government, and not to be extended in any way into the legislative area, because legislation and legislated changes in substance are not intended to be part of supply, but rather ought to be part of the legislative process in the regular way which requires three readings, committee stage, and, in other words, ample opportunity for members to participate in debate and amendment.

Perhaps the most definitive ruling, again by your immediate predecessor is to be found on page 4221 of Hansard, March 22, 1977, wherein he stated:

> On the general question, it is my view that the government receives from Parliament the authority to act through the passage of legislation and receives the money to finance such authorized action through the passage by Parliament of an appropriation act. A supply item, in my opinion, ought not, therefore, to be used to obtain authority which is the proper subject of legislation.

The rulings of the Hon. Speaker Jerome are unambiguous and precise, Madam Speaker. In my view, therefore, to show that the items or votes in Supplementary Estimates (C), which I will soon identify, are improper and out of order, it is only necessary to show that these are not truly supply items, but rather that they seek to go beyond the simple and limited scope of the supply procedure, which is the appropriation of specific funds for specific purposes and nothing more.

I would like first to bring to your attention Vote 5c under the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, at page 24 of the Supplementary Estimates (C), 1980-81. I will not read this rather long item into the record, but what it does is grant to the governor in council authority to establish what is termed the Canadian ownership account, a non-budgetary trust account, and give the governor in council authority to transfer funds from what will be a Canadian charge, if and when that is approved by this House, into such account. It gives the government authority to spend that money on the shares of Petrofina up to a maximum of, interestingly enough, $1.7 billion. Then, Madam Speaker, the item in the final line concludes with the following words: "and to provide a further sum of $5,382,000." Last Thursday, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) attended the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. He outlined in detail what the $5,382,000 was for. It consists of ten different items. The testimony is in the committee records and is available. The items are: $600,000 to implement the Canadian oil and gas substitution program; $81,000 for professional services; $195,000 for studies; $170,000 for capital costs of vehicle conversion; $250,000 for an energy audit; $50,000 for some contracting out; $20,000 for consulting fees; $2,259,000 for scientific equipment; $1,134,000 to supply resources to administer the petroleum incentives program; $623,000 to provide additional managerial authority.

Those ten items which are accounted for in the last seven words of the estimate add up to precisely $5,382,000, so that all of the vote described in the words preceding the last words of this vote do not have even a single dollar attached to them. In other words, if this vote were not seeking authority to set up this fund and to give the governor in council authority to administer it, it could have been taken care of by the simple words "to provide an amount of $5,382,000", the details of which were supplied by the minister.

The entire intent of that vote and that wording is clearly to seek authority for the establishment of this special fund, and it is described as a non-budgetary account. Those words are important in that they indicate that this account and the funds transferred in and out will be beyond the reach of the public accounts procedure, that is, the funds are collected by the Canadian ownership charge and will not go into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, be reported in the public accounts and thereby in fact show up in the blue books of estimates. In fact, they will go into this non-budgetary account, and Parliament will have no opportunity to examine them in the same way as we have the opportunity to examine the gathering and expending of normal taxation funds through the consolidated revenue fund.

Without these checks and balances which are normally provided, I think it falls upon us as a responsible Parliament to give even more consideration to what the government is attempting to do here.

If I may quote again the words of Mr. Speaker Jerome of March 22, 1977, he said:

> —the government receives from parliament the authority to act through the passage of legislation and receives the money to finance such authorized action through the passage by Parliament of an appropriation act.

The government in this instance is clearly seeking legislative authority through a parliamentary act to set up this account, but in this instance it has not even sought the nominal one dollar which has been the traditional device used in order to establish an account.

If there is any question in the mind of the Chair with regard to the points I have raised, I would be pleased to elaborate. There are ample precedents in the rulings of Your Honour's immediate predecessors to establish beyond doubt that what the government is attempting to do is something which ought to be done through legislation and not through the appropriations procedure established by Your Honour's predecessors.

I would like to draw attention to three different votes in the supplementary estimates which are similar enough in their intent that I can deal with them all at the same time and in the same argument. I refer first to Vote L18c on page 48 of Supplementary Estimates (C), which is a vote of the Department of Finance. It seeks by way of a one dollar item to authorize the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to issue non-interest bearing, non-negotiable demand notes, in such form as the minister may determine, in an amount not exceeding $11,500,000 in respect of Canada's commitments to replacement of the sixth replenishment of the resources of the International Development Association. In essence, what that item does is place or seek to place in the hands of the International Development Association a debt instrument or instruments which obligate Her Majesty in right of Canada to payment of sums up to $11,500,000.

I would like also to draw attention to Votes 7c and 8c of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce which appear at page 66 of Supplementary Estimates (C). Vote 7c seeks authority for the governor in council to guarantee loans of up to $450 million to de Havilland Aircraft of Canada, a Crown-owned corporation but not a Crown corporation as defined by the Financial Administration Act. Vote 8c seeks authority for the governor in council to guarantee securities of Massey-Ferguson Limited up to an amount not exceeding $130 million.

The question the Chair must consider is whether these three votes—L18c of the Department of Finance and Votes 7c and 8c of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce—are in fact items for which parliamentary authority should be sought through the usual legislative process. It is my view that they most certainly are items for which authority must be sought through the legislative process.

In support of this position I bring the attention of the Chair to Section 22 of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, Statutes of Canada, which reads, and I quote:

> Where a guarantee has been given under the authority of Parliament by or on behalf of Her Majesty for the payment of any debt or obligation, any amount required to be paid by the terms of the guarantee may, subject to the Act authorizing the guarantee, be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Notice that the language is very clear and precise. It refers to a guarantee given by Her Majesty—given by Canada—which requires an act of Parliament. That is what Section 22 says very specifically.

The appropriation of Vote L18c, which deals with the $11,500,000 debt instrument to be given to the International Development Agency, is clearly an obligation of Her Majesty. It places an obligation on Her Majesty in right of Canada, and it is an obligation which can only be placed there, according to Section 22 of the Financial Administration Act, by an act of Parliament. Legislative authority must be sought to impose that obligation on Her Majesty. It is not the requisition of money at this stage because at a later stage—as I will demonstrate with another section of the FAA—when the IDA seeks funds based on these debt instruments, it will be necessary for the government to seek through the estimates procedure an allocation from the consolidated revenue fund. At this point in time with that dollar item it is not a requisition of funds; it is an attempt to seek legislative authority for a guarantee which, as Section 22 says, can be sought and obtained only through an act of Parliament.

I refer to Section 36 of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, which says, and I quote:

> No money shall be borrowed or security issued by or on behalf of Her Majesty without the authority of Parliament.

That is very clear and specific. The authority of Parliament must be obtained in order to grant a guarantee. The supply procedure and appropriation procedure is to grant funds for programs, not to grant legislative authority. This clearly establishes that Vote L18c of the Department of Finance is out of order, and the authority being sought by the minister must be sought by way of an act of Parliament and not by the use of this supply item.

With respect to Vote 7c dealing with de Havilland Aircraft and 8c dealing with Massey-Ferguson Limited, I refer the Chair to Section 79 and 80 of the Financial Administration Act. Section 79 provides definitions for that part of the act and defines a Crown debt as follows:

• (1600)

> "Crown debt" means any existing or future debt due or becoming due by the Crown, and any other chose in action in respect of which there is a right of recovery enforceable by action against the Crown;

That is the definition of a Crown debt.

Section 80 of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10 of the Statutes of Canada, states:

> Except as provided in this act or any other act of the Parliament of Canada,
>
> (a) a Crown debt is not assignable, and
> (b) no transaction purporting to be an assignment of a Crown debt is effective so as to confer
> on any person any rights or remedies in respect of such debt.

Therefore, clearly any government guarantees by that definition are Crown debts as defined by Section 79 of the Financial Administration Act; and Section 80 states that no Crown debt is assignable except where an act of Parliament provides that authority to the government. The government is seeking authority by this procedure to perform something requiring an act of Parliament. It is not seeking funds, which is the sole and exclusive route through which an appropriation bill can be put.

I would not want the House or anyone speaking after me to imply that I had not been thorough. I recognize that Section 83 of the Financial Administration Act does say, respecting Section 80:

> This part does not apply
> (a) to any negotiable instrument, or
> (b) to any Crown debt incurred by or in the name of a corporation set out in Schedule C or D.

In other words, incurred by the Crown corporations set out in Schedules C and D. The Financial Administration Act defines "negotiable instrument" as any cheque, draft, travellers' cheque, bill of exchange, postal note, money order, postal remittance and any other similar instrument. In other words, in no way are the guarantees of these instruments described herein negotiable instruments. Most certainly they are not.

I hardly need to point out that Massey-Ferguson is not a Crown corporation under Schedules C and D, at least not yet. While de Havilland Aircraft is a Crown-owned corporation, it is not one of those corporations set out in Schedules C and D as required by the Financial Administration Act. For authority here I refer to a document produced by the financial administration branch, office of the Comptroller General of Canada, revised in July of 1979, which lists under "other government corporations", corporations which have not been designated as Crown corporations, de Havilland Aircraft of Canada Limited. So de Havilland is not a Crown corporation, and therefore for the Crown to guarantee its debt instruments according to the Financial Administration Act it is necessary for the government to seek legislative authority.

Finally, I should like to deal with another class of dollar items which I believe are also out of order. These are items whose purpose it is to cancel certain debts to Her Majesty. The votes in question are Vote 5c of the Department of Agriculture in the amount of $29,208.12, Vote 30c of the Department of National Health and Welfare in the amount of $153,207.67, Vote 1c of the Department of National Revenue in the amount of $3,630,492.81, Vote 5c of the Department of National Revenue in the amount of $24,770,219.53, Vote 10c of the Department of Public Works in the amount of $206,236.38, Vote 20c of the Department of Public Works in the amount of $185,660.93, Vote 1c of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the amount of $13,216,170, and Vote 5c of the Department of Supply and Services for $5,254.

As I indicated, all these items deal with the deletion or cancellation of debts owed Her Majesty. Madam Speaker, I would like to refer you to Section 18(1) of the Financial Administration Act, which states:

> The governor in council, on recommendation of Treasury Board, may make regulations authorizing deletion from the accounts, in whole or in part, of any obligation or debt due to Her Majesty or any claim by Her Majesty that does not exceed five thousand dollars.

Thus, Section 18(1) of the Financial Administration Act grants legislative authority for the government to cancel debts, provided they are less than $5,000. There is no legislative authority for the government to cancel debts in excess of $5,000. To cancel such debts, legislative authority must be sought from Parliament, which is clearly what the government is attempting to do through the votes I have previously identified.

To seek such legislative authority through the use of an appropriation act is clearly in violation of the ruling established by your predecessors, Madam Speaker, Mr. James Jerome and Mr. Lucien Lamoureux. It would be clearly unreasonable to have a situation whereby for debts of less than $5,000 authority is granted through the Financial Administration Act, an act which has been subjected to the full legislative process of first and second readings, committee study, report stage and third reading, whereas for the deletion of debts in excess of $5,000, the larger debts, one merely needs to pass a $1 item in an appropriation bill which is passed through Parliament with no debate at any stage. Clearly that would be an unreasonable proposition, and I think, Madam Speaker, that the rulings of your predecessors have established that.

I have covered a few points here, Madam Speaker, and I feel that the subject being raised is important. Any fair minded reading of the rulings of your predecessors would establish beyond a doubt the importance of what has occurred. If this procedure is not challenged by the Chair, we will very soon be in a situation where, by virtue of $1 items in an appropriation bill which Parliament cannot debate or amend, the government could seek authority to spend almost any amount.

Clearly the role and responsibility of government when it seeks to do something which it does not have the authority to do is to submit legislation to the House of Commons, and the House of Commons must have the opportunity to debate it, to amend it, and to vote on it through all of its stages. We have a long history of a procedure which has served us well and which I believe we should retain if we are going to fulfil our responsibilities.

Let me say by way of explanation that I can certainly understand the frustration of the public service and the government which want to do all of these things, and really none of them is particularly unreasonable and I do not object to them. I would argue about some of them, but I would not object to them in substance. What is being attempted here is not unreasonable. I raise objection for the reason that, if we do not challenge the government in this regard, it will clearly seek to open that door wider.

• (1610)

As I started to indicate, I can understand the frustration of the minister's senior civil servants wanting to seek some authority to undertake these actions, which are not unreasonable actions. But if we are to protect this institution from the Crown—and surely it is the role of Parliament to protect itself from the Crown and from the intent of the Crown to rule without what must be an annoying interference by the commoners—we must follow proper procedures. I understand their frustration and their attempts to define these easy ways in which to grant legislative authority. The straightforward way is not easy. On the other hand, I think the responsibility of the members in this chamber, and of Your Honour in the chair, is to ensure that proper procedures are followed, and that we do not simply turn a blind eye to what are inappropriate procedures because they are easy and because the items dealt with are not particularly offensive.

I submit that the votes I have just recited to the Chair are, in fact, all out of order, and I respectfully suggest that you so rule, Madam Speaker.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I respect the concern of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) to ensure that the sanctity of parliamentary procedures is observed. I can assure you, Madam Speaker, and this House, that there is nothing in Supplementary Estimates (C), which has been tabled by the government, which in any way departs from well-established precedent with respect to all the items to which the hon. member has made reference.

The first point I would like to make—and it is one that all hon. members should bear in mind—is that an appropriation act is an act of Parliament. It seems to me that in the course of his remarks the hon. member has ignored that very fundamental principle.

Beginning with the first item raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre, namely, Vote 5c of Energy, Mines and Resources on page 24 of Suplementary Estimates (C), I would point out to the House and to the hon. member that the definition of any appropriation item is that it is an authority to expend moneys for its purpose, specifically a purpose as set forth in the estimates. Clearly, if one looks at the language of Vote 5c it is apparent that it is a proper appropriation within the meaning of that definition. It establishes an authority to expend money, as the hon. member has pointed out, up to a fixed amount of $1.7 billion, for a very specific purpose, namely, the acquisition of Petrofina by Petro-Canada. Therefore, it is not at all correct to maintain, as does the hon. member for Calgary Centre, that this account will in any way be outside the estimates procedure. To effect any change in the upward expenditure limit would require a further authority, and it would have to be obtained through the estimates or some other legislative authority.

Beyond that, the hon. member is under the mistaken impression, apparently, that this fund which is being established by Vote 5c to which I have made reference and which is found at page 24 of the Supplementary Estimates, is somehow outside the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Indeed, this is merely an account within the Consolidated Revenue Fund. It will be established in the manner described in the vote. It is clear from an accounting point of view that the levies will be gathered in the fund and accounted for in respect of the accounts of Canada as part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. What is particularly significant is that there is no attempt in any way to change any existing legislation, as suggested by the hon. member. Every appropriation item is clearly a legislative item; every vote in the estimates is a legislative item. There is no attempt here to amend existing legislation.

I can assure you, Madam Speaker, that the well-established precedents which are followed by the government and by Treasury Board in preparing estimates is to ensure that no items are to have that effect. In that regard, it might he helpful to the House, in terms of this particular item and the other items with which I will deal in a moment, to outline the circumstances in which one dollar votes are, in fact, used and will, in fact, continue to be used, and also to deal specifically with some situations where one dollar votes are inappropriate and are not used.

First, one dollar votes will be used in the following cases: the transfer of budgetary funds between votes and programs of the same department. This is to provide operating flexibility consistent with the accountability of heads of departments and agencies.

The second is in the area of new and increased grants, since parliamentary authority is required for new and increased grants even when funds are available within the vote. That, of course, requires a one dollar item.

The third is in the deletion of debts, which is a point to which the hon. member has made reference at some length, specifically with respect to the deletion of debts which appear in Supplementary Estimates (C). The Financial Administration Act, as the hon. member points out, requires that the deletion of operating debts in excess of $5,000 be approved by Parliament although no additional funds may be required. Hence, the deletion of debts is a proper application of the estimates procedures.

The amendment of previous appropriation acts is a fourth area where one dollar votes are used, and this is to effect changes to previous votes authorized through appropriation acts. One example which comes to mind would be increasing the limits of revolving funds.

Finally, there is a general miscellaneous category to provide financially-oriented authority in instances where separate legislation would not appear to be warranted. This is to authorize guarantees or to deem an individual to come within the ambit of existing legislation.

I suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that every single item to which the hon. member for Calgary Centre has made reference, that is to say with respect to guarantees in the cases of both de Havilland and the IDA, clearly falls within existing authorities. With respect to deletion of debts, again this clearly is within accepted practice for which there are many precedents.

However, I would like to complete my comments on this particular point, which is the use of one dollar items, by citing some instances where the government does not consider one dollar items to be appropriate. The first case is the transfer of budgetary funds between departments and agencies. This is not a concern with operating flexibility. It would be acceptable if there was a related transfer of a function between departments and agencies, but in the absence of the transfer of such a function, that kind of transfer is not acceptable.

The second case is the transfer of non-budgetary funds. This is because of the specific nature of the non-budgetary vote. I notice that the hon. member for Calgary Centre is not listening and, perhaps, I should send him a note on this aspect afterwards so that he will clearly understand the practices of the Treasury Board and of the government, which we submit are completely in accordance with precedents and the law.

Finally, the point to which the hon. member makes reference, one on which we would have agreement, is that there can be no amendment of existing legislation other than an appropriation act, since the relevant act itself would normally be amended.

I believe in the course of these comments I have covered the specific objections raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre and the specific definitions which clearly fall within established precedent, a practice which has been carried on for many years. The guarantees the hon. member referred to are, of course, ones with respect to de Havilland and are within the program of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the IT&C votes. Industry, Trade and Commerce votes do require parliamentary approval, as do other votes. In the past this has always been obtained through appropriation acts in this House. So I submit that in all these items we are following precedent and the law.

● (1620)

I would like briefly to re-emphasize the importance with respect to vote 5c, which was the first item raised by the hon. member. It is a normal appropriation item in every sense of the word since it merely establishes an authority to spend a specific amount of money for a clearly specified purpose. Second, it is obviously not an attempt to legislate through the estimates, since it contemplates no amendment to existing legislation; it is simply an expenditure item.

So far as the income side of that equation is concerned, the levy itself will be authorized by legislation in this House, and hon. members will have full opportunity to debate that particular provision in committee and in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order, which really relates to the rights and responsibilities of Members of Parliament to examine the spending plans of the government. It is a pleasure to follow the speech of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston).

It is important to begin by pointing out to you, Madam Speaker, that in our normal daily lives, the fact that we have done a certain thing before, whether it is illegal or immoral, is no justification for continuing to do it in the future. The point of order raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) requires every consideration, and the previous practice of the government should not be taken into consideration in your ruling.

I want to broaden the issue raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. It is incumbent upon all hon. Members of Parliament to take responsibility for examination of the government spending plans very seriously. The Standing Orders of the House of Commons should be—perhaps they are not—clearly phrased so that we, as elected representatives of the people, responsible for trying to keep taxes down, can undertake that responsibility.

Madam Speaker, I believe that one of the unfortunate consequences of your assuming the Chair of this House is that sometimes you are not totally aware of what happens to those of us who carry on the daily business of the House in relation to its standing committees. However, my desire to broaden this question is related to one of the Standing Orders of the House, in particular Standing Order 58(15). As it is directly relevant to the arguments I wish to make, I would like to read it:

> Supplementary estimates shall be referred to a standing committee or committees immediately they are presented in the House. Each such committee shall consider and shall report, or shall be deemed to have reported, the same back to the House not later than three sitting days before the final sitting or the last allotted day in the current period.

I would assume that the terms of that Standing Order must be met or the estimates cannot be passed by the House of Commons. We are now reaching the end of the supply period. I can speak of my own personal experience. In that context, I want to re-emphasize the words "each such committee shall consider". What they shall consider in this context is the supplementary estimates. Madam Speaker, you are well aware of the fact that the standing committees of the House of Commons are controlled by the chairman and the vice-chairman who, in almost all instances, are members of the governing party from which comes the majority membership.

I was appointed by the leader of my party to be the manpower critic in this House of Commons. Part of that responsibility is to sit as a member of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. When I examined the supplementary estimates, I found four pages devoted to a revision of estimates for Employment and Immigration, and two relating to the Department of Labour. It is the responsibility of the standing committee to consider those estimates, but it cannot consider the spending plans of the government unless the chairman calls a meeting. From personal experience, I can say that the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration has not called a meeting to consider the supplementary estimates of the Department of Employment and Immigration and the Department of Labour. I cannot indicate whether the same situation exists with respect to other standing committees of the House.

When I look through the supplementary estimates, I see that the Department of Employment and Immigration wants to change Vote 1c to move some $2,621,999, which I presume is a saving, from one vote to another. I cannot tell the House with accuracy whether that is the intent and purpose of that vote because the standing committee has not met to consider this supplementary estimate. I suggest that it would therefore be illegal for this House to pass this supplementary estimate.

I draw your attention to Vote 5c contained in the administrative part of the supplementary estimates for employment and immigration. Again, the department wants to transfer the sum of $5,535,999 from one appropriation to another. Once more it appears that there is a saving, but in fact the government wants to spend the money elsewhere. I cannot say whether this is the case because the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration has not yet met to consider the supplementary estimates. I think you will agree, Madam Speaker, when the government controls the chairmanship and the vice-chairmanship and has the largest part of the voting membership, that if the government is truly serious about its supplementary estimates, it has the responsibility to call the standing committee and give it an opportunity to examine the spending plans of the government.

I also draw attention to Vote 20c found under employment and immigration, which wants to transfer the expenditure of $686,999 from one vote to another. Again I suggest that some money is saved, but the government still wants to spend it. However, I cannot give a definitive statement because a standing committee has never been called and has not had an opportunity to consider the supplementary estimates.

Vote 25c is a very large one dealing with immigration. It transfers $18,304,999 from employment and immigration, vote 15, to be used for another purpose, and the government is doing it under the guise of a one dollar supplementary estimate. Again, I cannot say whether this move is wise because the chairman of the standing committee, the vice-chairman and the majority of the voting members are members of the government party and they have not given the opposition an opportunity to consider the supplementary estimates of this department.

If I turn to the Department of Labour, I find a similar pattern. Vote 1c is a supplementary estimate of $105,000; vote 5c is for $370,000. This is a statutory payment increase of $1,500,000, for a total change of $1,975,000. I am embarrassed to be standing in this House not able to say whether that is a wise expenditure decision or not, because the chairman and vice-chairman of that committee are members of the governing party, the majority of committee members are members of the governing party, and they have not called a meeting or given the opposition an opportunity to examine the wisdom of these spending estimates.

I suggest that the protection of members of this House, on behalf of the constituents they represent, lies in Standing Order 58(15), which clearly provides that no supplementary estimate can be passed by this House without at least the condition being met that the standing committee of the House be given the opportunity to consider it and to ask questions of the minister and his officials about the planned expenditure.

I have just received a note from the lobby, Madam Speaker, stating that members who sit on the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works have been similarly treated by the government. Therefore, so far as the estimates which relate to the functioning of the Department of Public Works are concerned, if you rule as I think you must on the point that I raised, then it would not be appropriate for this House to pass the estimates of that department either.

The two departments whose estimates I had the obligation to examine in committee, if that committee had been called, dealt with taxpayers' money in excess of $35 million. That figure is not taken from the main estimates, which run into hundreds of millions of dollars, but from the supplementary estimates. The government chooses to spend some $35 million, money that it was saving but now wants to spend in some other fashion. It chooses to do so in a manner which does not allow me to question the wisdom of that spending on behalf of my constituents.

I have been informed by a voice in the chamber that the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture has not met either. I therefore suggest that any supplementary estimates relating to the functioning of that committee must also be found ineligible to be passed by this chamber, based on Standing Order 58(15) which requires that members of Parliament be given the opportunity to consider supplementary estimates.

I would encourage you, Madam Speaker, to inquire from the Clerk of the House whether the three situations that I have brought to your attention are the only situations of that kind or whether there are others.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vanvouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, I want to intervene briefly at this point. I will not repeat the very sage and cogent arguments made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre). The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) covered some points that I had intended to make so I shall deal with one or two that have been missed, particularly with regard to the Department of Agriculture's Supplementary Estimates (C) at page 10. There is a suggestion that the gross program supplement of $62,803,000 should be reduced by funds transferred to other votes. In other words, we are being asked to approve a net amount of $58,613,000 instead of the gross expenditure of $62,803,000. This involves the principle referred to earlier of transferring credits from one area to another when approval has not been given for the gross expenditure requested.

On pages 32 and 34 the estimates of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources suggest that Eldorado Nuclear Limited, under a $1 vote, be authorized to increase its borrowing limits from $130 million to $280 million. This is an increase of $150 million under the guise of a $1 vote. This will increase the debts of the Government of Canada by that amount in the manner referred to by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. The normal procedure is to pass a specific bill for borrowing or for increases in government debt of this kind.

There is an item on page 32 which I do not fully understand. It purports to be a transfer of title by the minister to Eldorado Nuclear Limited in the uranium stockpiles recorded in the accounts of Canada at a value of $76 million. In other words, under a $1 vote the minister would be able to turn over $76 million to Eldorado Nuclear Limited.

Page 34 deals with the Department of the Environment and shows the transfer of $2,371,000 from a different vote to vote 5c under the guise of a $1 item.

I think you have had enough examples, Madam Speaker, and I do not need to go on; the point has been well made. I support the comments of my two colleagues from Calgary and ask that you declare this procedure to be beyond the powers of the government.

Madam Speaker: Far from being a new matter, this is one which has been brought before the House from time to time.

Order Paper Questions

There are several precedents set and rulings given by my predecessors which deal with this matter. I would have to look into the arguments and the nature of the objections brought forward by hon. members, so I shall take the question under advisement and rule upon it later.

EXCHANGE AGREEMENTS—CHINESE DELEGATIONS

Question No. 2,152—Mr. Herbert:

1. Have any scientific, cultural or technical exchange agreements been signed with China in the past three years?

2. Did Chinese government delegations, during this period, visit Canada to discuss engineering, educational and medical subjects and, if so, does the government send representatives to such discussion sessions?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The Canadian government has signed no scientific, cultural or technical exchange agreements with the People's Republic of China during the past three years nor are there any at present under active consideration.

2. A number of official government delegations from the People's Republic of China have visited Canada during the past three years to discuss a broad variety of subjects in such areas as engineering, education and medicine. When Chinese delegations visit Canada at the invitation of Canadian government departments, representatives of the latter host the visitors throughout their stay and are usually the primary interlocutors. They also normally accompany the delegations on calls on private industry. On the other hand, when Chinese delegations are invited by private industry or other levels of government, the federal government ordinarily plays a facilitative role but only on occasion attends these meetings.

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I want to bring two questions to the attention of the parliamentary secretary. The first is question No. 1,439 dated July 11; the second is question No. 1,450 dated July 16. These questions deal with the government's advertising budgets for the last several years. They ask about the government's advertising plans during the Quebec referendum as well as contracts given to various advertising agencies in the country. They also inquire whether purchases have been made in the name of one government organization with the intention of turning space and time over to other government organizations.

When you consider that the first question I asked was about the government's total advertising budget for the fiscal year 1979-80 and the proposed budget for the fiscal year 1980-81 and that the estimates have already been tabled for fiscal year 1981-82, it raises questions about the government's seriousness in dealing with these issues. We will be into a new fiscal year before I learn about the advertising budget of two years ago.

The first part of question No. 1,450 asks the government to go back in time and give information about its advertising budget, and it may be the case that the government feels it is not possible to give that information or that it would be too costly to do so. What the government should be doing is simply to say so in a direct way as part of an order for return or as part of a response to this question.

I think the other elements of the two questions asked are fairly easily answerable and that the House is entitled to an answer to them. I would appreciate the parliamentary secretary giving some priority to answering these questions, which have stood on the Order Paper for more than half a year.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I take note of the suggestion made by my colleague opposite. I want to assure him sincerely that the government is not dragging its feet in answering these questions. I have been pursuing the matter quite diligently. We have a number of the answers, but there are five or six pieces of information required to complete the picture, so to speak. As soon as we have the whole picture, we will table the answers in the House.

I should inform the hon. member that we did answer a series of questions asked by his colleague, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). I believe No. 1,740 was answered and a few more after that in that series. That was a few weeks ago. The answers dealt with this question but on singular issues involving singular departments.

We have also answered questions about the media-buying contract, as it is known. This clearly illustrates that we are not trying to hide anything. We are certainly committed to getting these answers before the House. I realize there has been some press speculation about delay in answering these two questions, but I can assure you, Madam Speaker, and all other members that we shall be answering these questions soon.

On the order: Government Notices of Motions:

March 19, 1981—The President of the Privy Council:

THAT WHEREAS the Prime Minister tabled in the House of Commons on October 6, 1980 a document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen Respecting the Constitution of Canada";

AND WHEREAS the motion to refer the said document to a Special Joint Committee of the House and Senate was debated in the House on 11 days between October 6 and October 23, 1980, allowing some 78 members to speak;

AND WHEREAS the Joint Committee, on which some 132 members of this House served, held 106 meetings, sat for 267 hours, received over 1,000 written submissions and heard testimony from 95 groups and 5 individuals;

AND WHEREAS the Joint Committee, having had its reporting date extended twice, reported on February 13, 1981 with the recommendation that the government introduce a motion for the presentation of the Address as modified by the committee;

AND WHEREAS the motion of the Minister of Justice implementing the Joint Committee's recommendation was moved on February 17, 1981;

AND WHEREAS the honourable member for Provencher moved an amendment to that motion on February 17, 1981;

AND WHEREAS the said amendment has been debated by this House for some five weeks, with the result that as of March 18, 1981 there have been 52 speakers on behalf of the official opposition, 15 speakers on behalf of the New Democratic Party, and 31 speakers on behalf of the government;

THEREFORE until the motion of the Minister of Justice for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada and any amendments thereto have been finally disposed of, Standing Order 6(1) and Standing Order 40 shall be suspended and, notwithstanding any other Standing Order, Private Members' Business shall be suspended, and the House shall sit from 10.00 o'clock a.m. to 1.00 o'clock p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays for the consideration of government business; and Standing Order 6(3) shall be read as if it said "At 11.59 o'clock p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays, at 10.00 o'clock p.m. on Wednesday and at 7.00 o'clock p.m. on Fridays, Mr. Speaker shall adjourn the House until the next sitting day."

AND during debate on the said motion of the Minister of Justice and any amendments and sub-amendments proposed thereto,

(a) notwithstanding Standing Order 31(1) no member shall speak for more than 20 minutes;

(b) when no member rises in his place to participate in the debate, or at 15 minutes before the time of adjournment provided for by this order on the second day during which the motion of the Minister of Justice or any amendments and subamendments proposed thereto have been under consideration following the adoption of this motion—whichever occurs first—the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of any amendments and subamendments then under consideration;

(c) if, at the time provided for in paragraph (b) there is no amendment or subamendment under consideration, the Speaker shall put every question necessary to dispose of the main motion; otherwise, after the amendment and any subamendment have been disposed of, the debate on the main motion may be resumed;

(d) at 15 minutes before the time of adjournment on the second sitting day following the resumption of the debate on the motion of the Minister of Justice pursuant to paragraph (c), the Speaker shall put every question necessary to dispose of the motion, including any amendments and subamendments proposed thereto; and

(e) any member who, not having spoken in the debate either on the main motion or on an amendment or subamendment may at any time before the fulfilment of the conditions set out in paragraph (b) deliver to the Clerk a written speech relevant to the debate of not more than about 3,000 words, which will be printed as an appendix to the House of Commons Debates on the day following the conclusion of the debate.

Madam Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on a point of order.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a point of order.

Madam Speaker: I recognized the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, it is customary to recognize first the official opposition. What is happening today?

Madam Speaker: I am terribly sorry. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre gave me notice yesterday that he would rise on a point of order at this time. I know it is customary that I recognize a member from the opposition first, and I usually do. However, when I do get notice I try to put things in the order in which I receive them. In this particular case, I received notice yesterday from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He told me precisely what his point of order would be. Subsequently, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) gave me oral notice of a point of order, but his was of a general nature. Therefore, I think it is fair at this point today to recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I would appreciate the point normally. The normal courtesies and traditions have it that members of the official opposition are usually recognized first.

I am aware that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) gave you notice, Madam Speaker. If the matter were a question of privilege, then I think that notice would have had some validity; but it is not a question of privilege and the notice is not critical in terms of giving recognition first to any member on a point of order. I know of no practice which exists in this regard. As the House leader for the opposition, I claim the right, if I may do so, in the normal traditions and passage of events, to be recognized first. That is the position I take.

I do not think we should depart from the normal practices of the House. I am aware of the notice that was filed. I indicated to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—and I am not catching him by surprise—that I intended to exercise the right that I feel, by tradition in this House, falls upon Her Majesty's loyal opposition and upon the official opposition. I happen to occupy the position of opposition House leader. It is a position, for better or for worse, which is recognized in the House of Commons Act.

I could go on for some time because, with respect, Madam Speaker, I think I do have the right to advance an argument. It may well be the argument I would advance would encompass part of the argument that will be made by my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, because he was quite precise about the argument he will be dealing with and he will have his opportunity in the normal course. Therefore, I claim the normal courtesy in this matter.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I simply want to say it is true that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) told me he would try to get ahead of me on this matter. I told him that I could not stop him from trying to do so, but that I would claim my right, having given notice yesterday.

Mr. Nielsen: Notice is not necessary.

Mr. Knowles: I think perhaps I shall leave that determination to the Chair. Of course, if hon. members are not satisfied with the person on whom the Speaker has called, they can move a motion under Standing Order 29.

Madam Speaker: I recognize the arguments which the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton has just put forward. It is true that members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition have certain privileges in this House, but I am not sure they apply in this circumstance.

It is true that, as a matter of courtesy, members of the opposition are usually recognized first on points of order which deal with government business. However, in this particular circumstance it seems to me that I owe the courtesy to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre because he gave me notice of it yesterday.

I am just trying to be as courteous and as fair as it is possible to be. The same situation occurs when members rise during question period. Sometimes five members rise at the same time and they have to be put in a certain order. But if one rises before the other, the first one to rise is usually recognized. The hon. member has said, quite rightly, that it is a matter of courtesy. I accept that as being a matter of courtesy, but this time I think I owe the courtesy to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I will recognize him.

I see the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is rising.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, with respect, it is not a matter of courtesy; it is a matter of long-standing usage, custom and practice in this House to recognize the opposition House leader. I, for one, resent that kind of departure from our customary practices. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling):

That the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton be now heard.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Madam Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Madam Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Nielsen), which was negatived on the following division:

● (1800)

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Motion (Mr. Nielsen) negatived.

Madam Speaker: Therefore, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has the floor.

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m. this evening.

At 6.11 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, it is interesting the new things that can happen to one no matter how long he stays around this place. This is the first time I have had 151 members of the House vote to hear me speak.

Mr. Herbert: Don't abuse it.

Mr. Knowles: At any rate, Madam Speaker, I rise to press the point of order of which I gave you notice yesterday. It has to do with the final paragraph in the proposed motion on today's Order Paper in the name of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). I will not take the time to read that final paragraph for, as members know, it is the one in which provision is made for members not to speak in the rest of the debate on the constitutional package but yet to have their speeches printed in Hansard.

My purpose now, and I hope I can stick with it, is not to argue the merits of that proposal—I can do that later if Your Honour does not find it out of order—but rather to state the reasons I believe it should not be permitted to remain in the motion before us.

As I indicated yesterday, Citation 311 of Beauchesne's fifth edition reads as follows:

Under no circumstances—

That is positive: "under no circumstances".

—may a member merely table a speech for printing in Hansard. With minor exceptions, what appears in the record of debates has actually been spoken in the House. On rare occasions a member may receive the consent of the House to have printed as part of his speech long lists, statistics or similar material. Such consent should rarely be asked for and is rarely granted. The House may also give its consent to have documents, or exchanges of letters, printed as a formal appendix to Hansard for the use and information of members.

As I said, Madam Speaker, the first sentence of that citation is absolute: "Under no circumstances may a member merely table a speech for printing in Hansard." Since I gave you notice of this point yesterday, that has provided time for you and those who assist you to study the matter. I suppose the first response you are inclined to make is that what I have quoted is only a citation in Beauchesne but is not a Standing Order as such.

● (2010)

With respect to that possible answer may I draw Your Honour's attention to an interesting paragraph in the first few pages of Beauchesne's fifth edition. On page 5, the section headed "Precedent and Tradition" reads:

Behind the written rules and filling in the gaps, lies the vast quantity of precedent. Although the House normally assumes that a ruling is binding for the future, Speakers have used the flexibility available to them to develop procedure regardless of conflicting precedents in the past.

A little further along in that same paragraph it says:

It is impossible to estimate the extent of this body of traditional parliamentary law. In Canada, not only is there more than a century of native practice, but also Standing Order 1 adopts for Canada all the centuries of tradition (where applicable) of the United Kingdom House of Commons. Custom and precedent are basic to the parliamentary system.

In a moment, Your Honour, I shall with great pleasure refer to things that happened this very day which underline the fact that we are governed in this place not just by the precise rules set out in our Standing Orders, but by custom, precedent and tradition.

Going back to some of the earlier parts of the chapter just referred to, I would draw your attention to the fact that there is provision for rules to be passed by a simple majority, to be altered or added to and so on, but note this:

By custom, changes in the Standing Orders are generally made after study and a recommendation by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

Then later in that same paragraph are these words:

Sessional and special orders are normally moved by the government after consultation with the opposition parties.

Then at the bottom of page 6 there is the heading "Unanimous Consent" under which it is pointed out that many of our rules are set aside. We do it every day, we set aside this rule and that by unanimous consent. However, it is also clear, when you put these things all together, that you cannot change a rule except in one or the other of two ways: either by the rule being brought before the House, usually on a report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization; or for sessional or special purposes by the government after consultation with the House leaders of the other parties.

Now, I point out that what we have in this paragraph (e) is something which changes the rules in the sense that it changes a century-old tradition and precedent. There has been no consideration by the committee of this House on changing the rule, and if it is argued that it is just a sessional or special order applying only to this debate, the rule that before this is done there should be consultation with the representatives of the other parties has not been kept. Therefore, Madam Speaker, this proposal before us that permits speeches to be printed in Hansard without their having been delivered in the House, has been brought forward contrary to the principles and practices of the House.

I did not arrange, Madam Speaker, for today's business to take the turn it has, but I point out that considerable time was spent on a question of privilege. Your Honour had to read from Beauchesne's in support of your position when you sought to rule that there was no privilege concerning the Gouzenko affair. There is nothing in the Standing Orders that gives you any direction on handling a question of privilege. The only thing in the rules pertaining to questions of privilege is Standing Order 17 which tells us when they can be raised. But what you do when the matter is raised depends entirely on the precedents and traditions. As I say, we are governed by the customs and practices of the years. In perfect fairness, Your Honour, I felt that the Gouzenko matter was not a question of privilege and you got rid of it as quickly as you could.

We also had a point of order today regarding dollar items in the estimates. We all seemed to realize that this was a genuine point of order, but there is nothing in the Standing Orders that tells you that. You were acting on the basis of custom, tradition and precedent.

This afternoon, when the bells were ringing for some considerable time, some of my colleagues and members of other parties as well came to me and asked how long those bells were going to ring. I said: Until the Whips come in. A couple of members picked up the rule book and said: Stanley, where is the Standing Order? I said it is not in the Standing Orders at all, it is in the citations, part of the tradition and practice. At one point this afternoon things looked a little rough when one of the members was asserting himself and I wondered if we were going to get to that ultimate situation when the Speaker has to name a member. I point out to Your Honour that you will not find anywhere in the Standing Orders a reference to the naming of a member. It is in the citation, the precedents, the traditions; that is the basis on which you act.

Almost every day, certainly more than once every week, the Chair has to deal with what it calls unparliamentary language. Try to find a reference to that in the Standing Orders. There is none. You will find that the Speaker must maintain order and decorum, but if you want to look up phrases that are unparliamentary you have to go to the citations in Beauchesne or other books. In other words, our practices are governed more by the practices of the past, by the traditions, the things that have been found to work, than they are by the precise Standing Orders.

I suggest, Madam Speaker, that Hansard being a document in which only those speeches that have been made are printed, is in that same category. For the full 100 years of Hansard in this House, that has been our tradition. The cover of Hansard says "House of Commons Debates", not "House of Commons Essays". It is not House of Commons speeches that have been prepared and handed in. It is a booklet called "House of Commons Debates".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: I know that on many occasions there have been requests for a speech to be put in Hansard even though it had not been delivered, and I can yet hear Mackenzie King objecting: I hear St. Laurent in particular saying: Is that not an American custom that we do not want in this place? We have never done it. I say there it is, Madam Speaker, and that makes Citation 311 just as much a part of the rules of procedure of this House as are the citations regarding parliamentary language on which you have to rely, as are the citations regarding naming members, which has to be done once in awhile, as are the citations about privilege or points of order or the ringing of the bells. Indeed, though I have contended that we are governed by citations as much as we are by rules, I would point out that Standing Order 1 does say that:

● (2020)

In all cases not provided for hereafter or by sessional or other orders, the usages and customs of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland as in force at the time shall be followed so far as they may be applicable to this House.

I say that in Britain, where they have had Hansard much longer than have we, there has never been a deviation from the rule that the only speeches printed in Hansard are those that were delivered. As a matter of fact, they do not even permit the appendices and things like that which we add at the back of our copies of Hansard. They are as strict as citation 311 says, that under no circumstances may speeches which have not been delivered be put into Hansard.

I contend that this is a violation of a tradition of 100 years in this House, and longer in Britain. I maintain that it is just as much a part of our rules as are the things that had to be contended with today: privilege, points of order, ringing of the bells and unparliamentary language. All of these things are governed by the citations and by the practices, and we should stay with them. The same is true about the printing of speeches.

I think I have fairly well kept my promise not to get into the merits of the issue as to whether or not it is a good idea. I am sticking to this as a point of order. I believe Your Honour should rule that paragraph (e) at the end of this motion, which would permit speeches to be handed in and printed in Hansard, is out of order. As I say, it is not an attempt to change the rules on a permanent basis. Neither is it something that has been put there as a sessional order because there has been consultation with the other parties—there has been no such consultation.

I note in respect of other things that are being set aside for the purposes of this motion that there is a reference to orders that need to be changed, there is the word "notwithstanding" and so on. We find references to Standing Order 6(1) and Standing Order 40; somewhere else there is the word "notwithstanding", and so forth. But when it comes to this departure from a century's practice, there is not even the word "notwithstanding". There is not any suggestion that this change in the rules is one to which the House should consent.

Therefore, I contend that we should not have to debate this when we get to the motion. This is why I sought to raise the point of order right away, even before Your Honour put the motion. I contend that Your Honour should rule paragraph (e) out of order and that it should be stricken from the motion now before the House.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is my neighbour and co-conspirator in the ownership of a snowblower. Sometimes he is a passenger in my car on the way to work, and sometimes I am a passenger in his car going home. Members of this House should know that despite that, from time to time we have differences of opinion. We are, nonetheless, neighbours and friends. I also have occasion to agree with him from time to time. As I indicated to him privately earlier in the day, I intend to argue the point he has made, but I also told him that there are other aspects of this motion which are quite important from the point of view of this House.

Before I get into the merits of the argument, I want to say there is one thing that is absolutely important in respect of this question, and that is the matter of the long traditions of the House of Commons regarding the rules. It is true that before rule changes are made there is consultation in respect of those changes. It is true sometimes that consultation takes the form of private meetings where specific things are brought forward by one House leader to another, and there are debates in the House. As a result of the debates and the references therefrom matters are sent to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. The whole House of Commons, not just the opposition House leader and not just the House leader of a third party, knows precisely what is intended by the government as a result of the speeches and the debate which occurred in the House of Commons.

In this case and with respect to this order the whole House of Commons did not know. We certainly knew of the impatience of the government. That impatience is not surprising. We knew of that, but the uncommon thing about this is that up until the announcement downstairs in this building in Room 130S not even the opposition House leader or the House leader of the New Democratic Party knew what was happening.

I do not go to House leaders' meetings to establish the basis for that lack of knowledge. I start from the House business question last Thursday, when I put the usual question to the government House leader and asked him what he intended. There was nothing about this. In violation of the traditions about which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spoke, and in violation of everything we have come to know about the rules of the House, the government House leader at six o'clock apparently—this is what he said, anyway—went to the Table, filed a three-page document and held a press conference. That was the first time any of us knew what was on the mind of the government House leader except, of course, that he was impatient to get on with this. He had said that publicly, and we knew that. We knew that from our discussions.

That is the situation in which we find ourselves. What is the result of what he asks this House, and now the Chair, from the point of view of this point of order, to accept? He asks the Chair to accept a violent change in the Standing Orders of this House. It is not a simple change but a violent change in the Standing Orders of this House. I think we should all understand what it is about.

The first thing he wants us to do in terms of the motion itself is to suspend private members' business. He wants to extend the hours of the sittings of the House of Commons on various days as set forth in the motion. He wants us to lose the right to debate a motion that is important and fundamental to the country, the motion which deals with the Constitution. This is not the dogfish subsidy. It is not a change in the legislation respecting the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais). It is nothing like that. It is the basic Constitution of the nation, and he wants us by this order to agree to a violent change. He wants to cut out adjournment debates. That may not mean anything to hon. members of the government who do not have questions of the ministry to put in adjournment debates, except planted questions from time to time.

An hon. Member: Sure we do.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): But that right to question and that right to debate the issues happens to be important to members of the opposition and important to Parliament.

The other thing we must remember about this is that the government House leader is really saying he is not happy with the Standing Orders of the House of Commons. These are the Standing Orders that protect the rights of every member whether sitting on my side of the House or the government House leader's side of the House. They are not happy with them. These were the Standing Orders of the House which, in 1969, were pushed through the House of Commons by closure. There have been arguments about the curtailment of the rights of private members with respect to the existing Standing Orders as compared to what they used to be. That was one set of closure rules. We are living under them now, and every observer of the House of Commons, even those who do not sit here in this place, thinks that the present rules are most inadequate.

• (2030)

The government House leader has finally decided, because of something his colleagues have said, because it is imperative to the government's plans, I suppose, or to somebody's plans that something be done by a certain date, that even these rules are not satisfactory and that the government must initiate a brand new process and deny rights, such as curtailing my right and that of other members of the House to speak about a subject that is important, thus flying in the face of 100 years of tradition. These things are not done without consultation which must go far beyond merely saying, "I want that through." The government should indicate in these consultations what it intends to do, and that did not occur.

I do not think this House of Commons began yesterday. I do not think the traditions of this House began yesterday or when the procedural motion was conceived. The House of Commons is much older than even the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It goes back hundreds of years. Its traditions, as he has said, have come from another parliament. We have melded our traditions with theirs and developed our own, but those traditions are important to the House, to the members and to the people who are represented by members. That is the issue I want to put forward by way of a preliminary statement regarding the feeling of resentment which is being felt in Parliament over the apparent use of the government of its majority to push something through and, if it cannot do that, to change the rules and to fly in the face of the traditions, customs and precedents of which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spoke.

To put it bluntly, Madam Speaker, we look to you for some protection. You are the first commoner, you are elected by all members of the House. You were nominated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), your nomination was seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), and every one of us was proud to support that motion. You have a unique obligation to ensure that even the things that are not mentioned in the Standing Orders, the customs and traditions of Parliament, are observed. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said—I will expand briefly on his remarks with respect to the subparagraph on the written speeches a little later—this does fly in the face of those customs and traditions.

I will sum up briefly on the motion itself. I think it is an insult to Parliament. I say this directly to my friend, the government House leader. Aside from being an insult, and over and above the good point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—and he did make a good point—it is procedural garbage in other ways as well. I hope to be able to develop as best I can an argument on three other points which are, I believe, in error with respect to this motion.

Point of Order—Mr. Knowles

I will start by saying that I hope and wish the government would reconsider the motion, not just in the light of anything one says in the House but in the light of the traditions of the House. I should like to make my points quickly to you, Madam Speaker. The first one is this. The motion itself contains factual assertions which should form part of the speeches in support of the motion rather than being contained in the motion itself. So that there should be no doubt as to what I am referring to, let me say I am referring to a series of clauses, which may be loosely described as "whereas clauses", in which there is a recitation of what purport to be facts but what in effect are arguments. My contention to you, Madam Speaker, is that those things which purport to be facts—and I use the word "purport" advisedly—are arguments and have no place in the modern day practice of the House as it has evolved. I will point to some by way of an illustration. First, there is an assertion that:

—the Prime Minister tabled in the House of Commons on October 6, 1980, a document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen Respecting the Constitution of Canada";

Second, it states:

—the motion to refer the said document to a Special Joint Committee of the House and Senate was debated in the House on 11 days between October 6 and October 23, 1980, allowing some 78 members to speak;

Then there is another assertion that:

—the Joint Committee, on which some 132 members of this House served, held 106 meetings, sat for 267 hours, received over 1,000 written submissions and heard testimony from 95 groups and five individuals;

Surely that has no place in a modern day motion, and I will argue the point. I want to give you, Madam Speaker, examples of how flagrantly the government House leader has mistreated the practice in this House.

The motion goes on to state:

—the Joint Committee, having had its reporting date extended twice, reported on February 13, 1981, with the recommendation that the government introduce a motion for the presentation of the address as modified by the committee;

It goes on to state:

—the motion of the Minister of Justice implementing the Joint Committee's recommendation was moved on February 17, 1981;

Those words have no place in a modern day motion in the House of Commons. They may have a place in a speech in the House of Commons by a member of the government, such as the government House leader or one of his supporters. They certainly do have a place there if he wants to make those assertions in explaining some factual omissions. They would also have a place in debate, but they have no place in the motion itself. The precedent for that is Citation 423 of Beauchesne's fifth edition which reads as follows:

A motion should be neither argumentative, nor in the style of a speech, nor contain unnecessary provisions or objectionable words.

This motion violates at least three of the four prohibitions in the citation. It is argumentative, it is in the style of a speech, it contains unnecessary provisions, and it may contain objectionable words if you would consider the first three points as making up the concept of objectionable words. They are not unparliamentary, but they are objectionable in the sense that we are arguing this motion. That is the first point.

My second contention is that the wording of the motion does not properly express an expression of the House, but that the motion is presented in the form of a conclusion to the argument to which I referred a few moments ago. The fact that that is a failing or a fault in something which purports to be a motion is set forth in Citation 411 of the fifth edition of Beauchesne's, which reads:

● (2040)

Every matter is determined in the House of Commons upon a question put by the Speaker, on a proposition submitted by a member, and resolved either in the affirmative or negative as the case may be. This proposition, called a motion, is a proposal moved by one member—

In this case it is the government House leader.

—in accordance with certain well-established rules, that the House do something or order something to be done or express an opinion with regard to some matter.

On the face of it—and I will argue this more fully later on—this motion fails on that ground. It fails in that it does not properly express an opinion of the House but, instead, is presented in the form of a conclusion to an argument which is set forth in the paragraphs I received earlier.

Third, the motion itself in certain of its parts is self-contradictory and, therefore, the will of the house in passing the motion is not certain. The proposition in support of that, again is contained in Citation 411 in Beauchesne's fifth edition, which I read just a few moments ago and which I will not read again.

While the motion purports to operate, notwithstanding certain Standing Orders, it leaves in operation—and this becomes more important later on—the full range of custom, practice and precedent in areas not covered by these Standing Orders. This was the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that there is more to the rules and the operation of the House of Commons than merely the Standing Orders. Beauchesne's is cited time and time again as a repository of the customs, traditions and precedents of the House of Commons. The Standing Orders are guidelines only. They are not exhaustive. Our customs and precedents are not all enshrined in that green book called the "Standing Orders of the House of Commons."

I wish now to deal with argument No. 1. It is that the motion contains factual assertions which should form part of the speeches in support of the motion rather than being contained in the motion itself. This concept is set out in Citation 423 of Beauchesne's.

I want to now ask you, Madam Speaker, to turn to a ruling made by Mr. Speaker Michener on Monday, January 16, 1961, where he dealt quite fully with the proposition which I placed in the first part of my argument. I would like to quote from page 1074 of Hansard for that date, about the middle of the page, where he said:

I have come to the conclusion that this amendment is not defective because it is preceded by whereas clauses, reasoning clauses or argumentative clauses in the form of a preamble, our practice to the contrary is too well established to be upset.

On the other hand, I am not satisfied that I should follow the precedent of allowing a preamble to include a lot of matter which would properly be part of the debate which would follow the motion. Therefore, without trying to split hairs at all, because I think there is a principle involved, even if the principle is only that the Speaker must do his best to draw the line somewhere between what may and what may not go in the preamble. I have come to the conclusion that the whereas clauses in this amendment are not objectionable in accordance with our practice, but that the inclusion of the eight quotations in one recital and of the two quotations in another recital are bad and should not be permitted to restore a practice which has not been followed since 1932 and only twice in our whole parliamentary history, as far as I can discover.

I remind you, Madam Speaker, that this ruling was made in 1961.

Therefore, my view is that if the amendment stopped after the figures "1960" in the second paragraph, so as to eliminate "as illustrated by the following ministerial statements" and the eight numbered paragraphs of statements then set out, and stopped again after the third recital after the words "Leader of the Opposition" so as to eliminate clauses one and two which quote further, the rest of the amendment would be admissible, according to our practice.

That is the gist of that argument.

Madam Speaker, you no doubt have had the opportunity, or will have, to compare the wording in the recitals and the "whereas clauses" which have been referred to in the ruling of Mr. Speaker Michener and in the "whereas clauses" contained in the motion before us. You are nodding, Madam Speaker, that you have had a chance to look at it. I am asserting and submitting respectfully to you, Madam Speaker, that what was offensive in 1961 is equally offensive in 1981 in this motion put by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) and which we are arguing tonight.

If Mr. Speaker Michener was occupying your seat tonight, Madam Speaker, he would have to come to the same conclusion as I respectfully submit you must come to with respect to this particular motion because of the similarity of the wording. As you know, Madam Speaker, in the ruling of Mr. Speaker Michener there are numerous quotations and statements made. But the essence of it is that the reference in the government House leader's motion as to hours, speeches, speakers, the facts and the selection of them are basically argumentative. That was the argument put to Mr. Speaker Michener. He did not assert that you could not have a "whereas clause", he said you could not have a "whereas clause" of the very kind that is now contained in this motion being put by the President of the Privy Council.

I want you to note, Madam Speaker, and I would underscore it, what Mr. Speaker Michener said must be done in a case like this. He said:

Therefore, without trying to split hairs at all, because I think there is a principle involved, even if the principle is only that the Speaker must do his best to draw the line somewhere between what may and what may not go in the preamble.

What he is saying there is that you, Madam Speaker, are in charge of the proper practice and procedure in the House of Commons, not only to protect the rules and precedents of the House of Commons, but to protect the members of the House of Commons from abuses of the rules; and this motion, in my respectful submission, contains an abuse.

I made reference to the date of Mr. Speaker Michener's ruling, being 1961. He recognized that in the preceding 20 years custom and usage had changed. The House of Commons evolves, and as it goes ahead it evolves in a positive way. We are now at a time, 20 years after the ruling of Mr. Speaker Michener, and I am putting to you, Madam Speaker, that the argumentative practices have fallen out of use even more than they had prior to 1961.

I referred to rule changes made in 1969 and what has occurred in the House of Commons since that time. Those rule changes completely changed the practice of the House of Commons in supply and ways and means motions. The practice has now moved even further away from the practice of 20 years ago. I give you the examples that there are now succinct motions on the budget, very succinct motions taken by the opposition parties on days allotted to them, on the Speech from the Throne, and the list goes on. We are now in the position, through the ordinary evolution of the rules of the House of Commons, where the argument, which the government House leader obviously put in for political purposes, is not permitted for procedural purposes. That is the difference. He can make those arguments when the merits of the motion are debated—I am not going to argue the merits of the motion tonight—but he cannot make them on procedural terms. I ask whether you, Madam Speaker, could imagine what it would be like in this House of Commons with 25 allotted days, with three budget motions, and with three throne speech amendments; particularly allotted days, if it were held that argumentative preambles would be allowed on these motions. I do not think there would be any busier person in the national capital than you, Madam Speaker, with respect to points of order arising out of them.

It is for very good reason it was decided that those matters should be dropped. They are dropped because they have been proven to be unnecessary and, as Mr. Speaker mentioned, are contrary to the principles that he, as Speaker—and I respectfully suggest that you, as Speaker—must uphold.

If I may repeat the argument on the second point, my proposition at that point was that in its wording the motion does not properly express an opinion of the House but, instead, is presented in the form of a conclusion to an argument. This seems to flow out of the first argument. The whole matter is presented as an argument and a conclusion rather than a proposition. I want you to note the recitals, the "whereas clauses" which I have mentioned, and then note the beginning of what purports to be the motion. It says: "Therefore, until the motion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen, respecting the Constitution has been finally disposed of", etc. It contains no words which say "that this House resolves" that certain things will happen, or "it is moved that" certain things will happen. That is why the precedent in the citation which I quoted in support of it is absolutely important.

What purports to be a motion is really, on its wording, an opinion of the government rather than a motion of the House of Commons. Clearly, it must be moved; the House must be asked to do something definite, clear and precise, and that does not appear on the words. Therefore, the words, by themselves, are not sufficient. If the government House leader had put the words "that this House resolves", or, "it is moved that", or words asking the House to do something, then we would have more than merely a conclusion to an argument.

With respect, in the French version on the opposite page, it is even more obvious that we have a conclusion following an argument rather than a substantive motion.

For clarity, I am going to briefly repeat the third point. The motion is, in certain of its parts, self-contradictory. Therefore, the will of the House, in passing the motion, is not certain. As hon. members recall, I relied on Citation No. 311 from Beauchesne's.

I want to call attention to the provisions of Standing Order 40, which that part of the motion purports to deal with, and particularly Standing Order 40(7) which appears on page 36 of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons. It says:

(7) When it is provided in any standing or special order of this House that any specified business shall be continued beyond the ordinary time of daily adjournment or that any such business shall be forthwith disposed of or concluded in any sitting, the adjournment proceedings in that sitting shall be suspended.

That is what the Standing Order says, and it is pretty clear. Apparently the government, in part of the order, wanted to somehow get rid of Standing Order 40. Its obvious intention was that the House would sit beyond the time allotted and that the private members' rights to which I have referred would be written over; but they wanted to get rid of it. If the government had meant to say there should be no adjournment debate at ten o'clock, p.m., or at midnight, or whenever, under the order which had been proposed, it simply would have allowed Standing Order 40(7) to take effect because it is already there. There was no need to deal, or purport to deal with it, at least in the wording of the government's motion.

Standing Order 40 exempts certain things, but the exemptions contained in Standing Order 40 are also exempted. We have a contradiction in terms. I do not know what it means. Nobody knows what it means. The government House leader says, "Very easy." But I am not so sure that it is quite so easy or, more importantly, that it is clear and certain.

Therefore, I respectfully submit to the Chair that at best it is a redundancy, and it is perhaps a contradiction. But in any event, it is a fatal confusion, and it ought not to be allowed to stand. If it does not stand, then I respectfully suggest there is a case that the motion itself ought not to stand.

Finally, the fourth submission I wish to make to you is that in its wording, the provision for tabling speeches directly offends the practice of this House. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre read the precedent upon which I rely, Citation 311 of the rules of the House. I do not think I have to read it again, because it is quite clear.

Citation 311 is a devastating and conclusive attack on the ridiculous proposition that this House and this institution could be served and that Parliament could function if we write our little 3,000 word essays and put them on the Order Paper or Hansard. There is not one self-respecting hon. member of the House of Commons who can stand up and do anything else but condemn what must be a warped aberration of the mind of the government House leader.

There is an hon. member down there who is shaking his head. I recognize he is shaking his own head, and we know what hon. member is shaking his head, we can hear it. He does nothing at all to detract from the force and the truth of the argument.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) on a point of order.

Mr. Pelletier: Madam Speaker, would the hon. member allow me a question?

[English]

Madam Speaker: Unless the hon. member accepts this, there are no questions allowed on points of order, I would think the hon. member should continue his intervention and not receive questions at this time.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Thank you, Madam Speaker. The hon. member can keep shaking his head, and I can speak to him later outside.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Get a job on the Muppett Show.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that the traditions of the House of Commons are enshrined in Beauchesne's. They are not enshrined in the mind of the government House leader. They are not enshrined in the mind of my hon. friend who is shaking his head, agreeing that it would be appropriate for him, at any rate, to file his speeches. That is not the point at all.

● (2100)

My submission will be short. The fact is that the proposal made by the government House leader is directly contrary to the practices set out in Beauchesne, if the intent itself is specifically to exempt the proposal from the operation, custom and practices which Beauchesne dictates. Beauchesne is the repository of those customs, practices and traditions.

It is void, as well, because there is nothing in there that says, notwithstanding any Standing Order something shall be done; that is vacant; that is absent from the clause which deals with the filing of speeches. Without it, Madam Speaker, the proposition of the government House leader falls to the ground.

The last point I want to make is important. It shows that what is wrong with this motion in terms of custom, precedent, tradition, vagueness, uncertainty, violation of Beauchesne and all the other things from which it suffers—its conception and in the mind of the government House leader, in the lack of consultation with members of the House, with his colleague House leaders and with the wording as it appears on the Order Paper—is that it so violates the traditions of this House and ought not to be allowed to stand. Common decency demands that it be withdrawn. Given his anxiety to continue the debate, the government House leader should propose something which, while it is questionable in parliamentary practice, is at least within the bounds of decency. It is in that area, that final area, that this motion ought to be struck down by the Chair.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I want to participate in this point of order with respect to the admissibility of the motion before us today. As a member who did not have an opportunity to participate in this debate I feel quite strongly about it and want to make sure this point of view is brought forward on behalf of those many other Members of Parliament who did not have that opportunity. This motion purports to curtail and restrict the ability of members of the House of Commons to participate in debate on a very important topic.

The basis on which I enter the debate, after listening to the presentations made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), who dealt with a wide range of objections, is to bring forward a perspective and an argument which would support the position taken by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. This motion sets an unusual precedent, one which has extraordinary implications, and one which offends the rules established in the House of Commons during the life of our country.

I would point out to Your Honour that this motion is unique in the parliamentary history of Canada. In our parliamentary history there has never been an occasion when the government, during debate of whatever nature, has taken the course of changing the rules of the House in mid-stream. From my study of our parliamentary precedents, this seems to be the first occasion when a government has taken the Draconian measure that is now being taken, to impose a form of closure, under whatever guise or name, during the course of debate.

As my House leader pointed out, this is not a debate with respect to a minor piece of legislation; it is a debate that affects the fundamental rules of our country; a debate which is of considerable importance; it is an historic debate and I acknowledge that. It is a debate in which you, Madam Speaker, as the first commoner, must take special care to ensure that the rules of the House of Commons which allow members to participate freely, without intimidation or unnecessary exclusion are applied. It is your responsibility, Madam Speaker, to ensure that there is an opportunity for members of this House of Commons to adequately, properly and democratically debate this very important motion.

Point of Order—Mr. Knowles

I should like to make one reference in this connection, Madam Speaker. As you are well aware, the rules of the House of Commons are established by the Standing Orders, by the precedents and traditions developed over the course of years, not only in this Parliament but also in the parliament of the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland as referred to in Standing Order 1.

You will know that there is no deviation allowed, unless by unanimous consent, in the method of changing the rules of procedure. In other words, it is not possible for me as a member of Parliament to stand in the course of the daily proceedings and gain the floor unless I abide by the rules. I cannot smuggle a particular motion in by standing on a point of order. The examples are many. The rules are there; they are carefully guarded and interpreted by Your Honour, and enforced by the House of Commons.

In light of that background, it is absolutely imperative that you, as Speaker of the House of Commons, look at any motion that comes before you to make sure it is fully and completely in accordance with the tradition or Standing Orders of the House. That almost goes without saying.

If I may be permitted to say so, it is doubly incumbent upon Your Honour to pay special attention to any important debate; that is the nature of politics, that is the nature of Parliament and that is the nature of the democratic system in our country.

Perhaps I can begin my presentation by referring to what I consider the least important aspect of this particular motion, an aspect referred to initially by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaking on behalf of the New Democratic Party. We know the position of that party on the matter. It supports the government with respect to the motion. But on the other hand, he has indicated they are opposed to the motion as being a form of closure. The member for Winnipeg North Centre has shared the bed with the government, but he now wants to put in, by virtue of this minor objection, a kind of a bundling board between himself and the government in order to maintain his chastity in respect of the position the party has taken. That is rather difficult to accomplish.

The question of the tabling of speeches is dealt with, as Your Honour will appreciate, in Citation 311 of Beauchesne. Since the full context has not been brought to Your Honour's attention, I shall read it.

Under no circumstances may a member merely table a speech for printing in Hansard.

Mr. Knowles: I read it all.
