The rate of growth in some of our urban areas in recent years, and even more particularly in recent months, has been little short of prodigious. The growth in greater Toronto, for instance, has been at a literally amazing rate, but the housing problem in Toronto has not grown any less severe even with the very extraordinary development of housing construction in the greater Toronto area. With the continuing influx of population into our larger centres, unless we have something more to look forward to than the statement made by the minister today and the barren results of these retreats in government housing policy, it will be necessary for this house to go on demanding on the part of the government some effective appreciation of the seriousness of the situation and effective action to meet it. What is required first of all is a sense of reality on the part of the government in appreciating the seriousness of this situation, and then courage to retrace its steps at least back to last February 5 and restore the provisions of the 1949 amendments.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I do not know how long the government can expect, in the face of these increases in the cost of construction and the cost of residential properties, to hold lending values to the terms of January 1, 1950. To that extent they are simply whittling down the lending provisions of the National Housing Act, quite apart from the one-sixth additional loan provided for by parliament late in 1949. It seems to me this house ought to sound a call to the government to stop nullifying the provisions parliament has enacted to meet this situation, and the government should recognize that this problem is beginning to develop even more serious proportions than have been apparent in recent months. The government should take prompt steps, in concert with the provincial and municipal authorities, to work out measures that will meet these needs where they are most acute today, but the first step must be the full restoration of the law enacted by parliament.

Mr. Thatcher: As an opposition member, like the hon. member for Eglinton I am afraid I am going to have to say a few sour things about this department. Before doing so, however, I want to thank the minister on behalf of the people of Saskatchewan for the co-operation he recently displayed when the provincial minister of reconstruction and social welfare was here discussing housing for Saskatchewan. The problem in that province is very severe; proportionately I believe it is just as serious as in Ontario. Several weeks ago our minister asked for 2,000 houses, I believe it was, under section 35. The Minister of Resources and Development gave him only 500; but he intimated that there was hope that we might get a few more a little later on. Thus I wish to tell the minister we do appreciate the gesture he has made.

At the same time I think most hon. members will be a little disturbed by some of the statements made this afternoon by the minister. He made it fairly obvious that nothing will be done again this year to catch up on the backlog of housing; and as everyone knows that backlog is very substantial. I believe it was the hon. member for Eglinton who said that a short time ago in Montreal the mayors and municipal heads said that housing was Canada's No. 1 domestic problem. I remember reading the report of Mr. Mansur, president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, a short time ago, and on page 3 I found this:

Effective demand for new housing, both home ownership and rental, has never been stronger.

The reasons for this situation are obvious. A short time ago it was announced that we were going to try to bring 150,000 people to Canada in the coming year. I want to say at once that I heartily support that policy, but surely if we are going to bring those people here we should build homes in which to place them. In addition there will be a heavy natural increase in population. Those two factors, and the defence program, have brought the housing problem to desperate proportions in many cities.

What has the government done to alleviate this abnormal demand for housing? This year it has taken a number of steps which will accentuate the crisis. The first step the minister announced was an increase in the down payment, under N.H.A., which today amounts to roughly 25 per cent of the purchase price. This means that if a working man wants to build even a small, five-room house he must have about $3,000. Not many years ago you could build a whole home for $3,000. With higher taxes and the higher cost of living, such a down payment virtually bars about 90 per cent of the people of this country from building homes. That is the effect of the provision, whether or not the minister wanted it that way. But this is not the worst feature of the present situation. For one reason or another—and I contend largely because of government policy—in many parts of Canada the insurance companies are refusing to make loans under the National Housing Act. They can lend their money in other ways and get higher returns. No doubt they are still making loans in the residential sections of Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal, but I know that in most parts of my own province and in many parts of western Canada and the maritimes the insurance companies are not making those loans today. Surely if that is the case the minister should take advantage of the provisions of the National Housing Act, which permit him to make the full loan where necessary. I earnestly plead with him to do so in those areas where the insurance companies are not making loans.

The government took another step this year that bewilders me. At the very time we want more homes, Central Mortgage and Housing seems to be cutting down its building program. I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra who stated that the Fraserview project in Vancouver had been pretty well abandoned, and there have been other instances of that kind. What does this mean? It means that at a time when people are huddled together because of an increasing shortage of dwellings, at a time when we are bringing more than 100,000 immigrants into this country, at a time when we are trying to step up defence industry, instead of building more homes we are going to build fewer. The program just does not make sense to me. Why are we curtailing our program? Last February the minister said that was being done simply because materials were not available. At page 69 of Hansard for February 5 the minister said:

. . . starts at the 1950 rate are beyond the capacity of the house-building industry under present and foreseen circumstances. Building supply materials, and particularly products of steel, are in short supply, with the result that many builders and owners are unable to complete houses.

That was the reason the minister gave us last February, but a few days ago at page 3671 of Hansard I asked the Minister of Defence Production this question:

In view of reports that housing is being held up in many sections of Canada because of lack of materials, will the minister tell us what recent steps the government has taken to see to it that housing is given adequate priorities to obtain essential building materials?

The minister made this reply:

I have had no report that housing is being held up.

Both statements cannot be right. The minister whose estimates we are now discussing told us—

Mr. Croll: Would the hon. member read the second question and answer, just to give the committee the continuity?

Mr. Thatcher: Which?

Mr. Croll: The hon. member followed that up with a second question on the same page.

Mr. Thatcher: I will be glad to put the next question on Hansard also:

I should like to ask a supplementary question . . . Does his department give specific priorities to housing projects for the purpose of getting building material?

Mr. Howe: No, Mr. Speaker; there is no specific priority—

That is one of the points I am coming to.

—but certainly there is a working arrangement with my colleague the Minister of Resources and Development for priority assistance in building houses, where that assistance is required.

There is a working arrangement, but the Minister of Defence Production stated categorically that there is no special priority. I remember the Prime Minister telling us a short time ago that housing was to have a very special priority. I think he said it was No. 2, after defence. If there is any priority in housing today I have not been able to find any indication of it, nor have any of the builders in my particular riding.

We in this group are conscious of the needs of the defence industries. We think that everything should be done to facilitate and make the defence program a success. But we also say that in peacetime, while there is no major war, only defence industries of the most critical nature should be given priority over housing. Most of the houses which have not been finished to date are being held up possibly because they cannot get steel or cement. Surely it is sensible that the minister whose estimates we are now discussing should go to the Minister of Defence Production and demand that he be given the necessary priorities, so that materials can be made available.

This group has a number of specific recommendations that we would make to the minister in the hope that he would carry them out. One of the main criticisms that I have had in any talks I have had with the minister is that he is too prone to depend upon private enterprise to carry out his program. If he were more willing to go along with his own department, and with state-owned construction, we might make a little more progress. I cannot help but think of some of the promises my hon. friends opposite made in 1945. Here is one of the pamphlets in which they said:

New housing plan.

I am going to quote from it:

. . . more and better homes for hundreds of thousands of families. It means closing the present gap between our housing needs and the number of homes available.

Then they promised that houses would be available for a payment of as low as $13.82 per month. There are not very many of those in Canada today. Before the 1945 election every government spokesman promised that returning veterans would be given proper homes.

The C.C.F. program is fourfold. We suggest these specific points to cope with the housing crisis. First, let Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or some other government agency immediately undertake a large-scale building program of low cost houses to be sold or rented to Canadians in the lower income brackets. Second, let housing be given a top priority for the obtaining of essential materials, second only to urgent defence projects. Third, let down payments and credit terms generally under the National Housing Act be relaxed to encourage private building. Fourth, in localities where insurance companies will not lend money under the National Housing Act, let the government step into the field and provide the total National Housing Act loan.

Mr. Chairman, the minister stated a few minutes ago that the amount of money which was available for housing mortgages was limited. Then surely the time has come for the government to increase the amount of money available for mortgages of that type. I believe this year we are spending $3·7 billion. I say that to meet this problem the government must find a little more money, not to spend heedlessly, but to invest in the health and comfort of our people, to invest in a way that cannot be measured in dollars or cents.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words at this time concerning this subject. I do not intend to take very long. I want to say to the minister that since he has been the head of this department there has been a great deal more satisfaction in the construction of houses than there was previously. It is an important problem, and one in which I believe every member of this house should take his responsibility. It seems to me that, from a national point of view, there is nothing that could be developed in this country that would bring greater satisfaction, greater comfort to the people of Canada, than properly built homes. The idea of having the dominion government continue in the field of building homes is questionable. The hon. member who just preceded me thought that greater emphasis should be placed on socially constructed homes, as I believe he called it. I take it from that that what he had in mind was that the government itself should proceed with a much greater program for building homes.

I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, that that is a wise procedure. In the past we have had a great deal of experience with the government building homes. I must congratulate the present minister on getting out from under some of those difficulties. It is true that he has passed the buck to the provinces, and the provinces are going to find a great deal of difficulty with it if they embark on a large-scale home building plan. One of the greatest difficulties the federal government has had in building homes has been the proper supervision of construction. They have had specific plans with detailed specifications drawn up, but invariably those specifications were not lived up to, solely because the inspectors who were employed fell down on the job. I have always recognized that the government could not personally supervise every house that is constructed across Canada. It is an utter impossibility. They must depend, therefore, upon the inspectors whom they appoint. I am sorry to say this, but I must say that I believe a great number of the inspectors were appointed more from a political point of view than from the standpoint of their ability. That is one of the reasons why there was such poor construction.

Mr. Winters: Oh, no.

Mr. Johnston: The minister will say that is not right, but if he looks over the record of some of his inspectors he will find it is so. I could mention some, but we do not want to mention names.

No matter who undertakes that job, whether it is the federal or provincial government, difficulty will be experienced in that same field. It seems to me that the plan that the government has announced it intends to follow in regard to the building of homes is going to make it much more difficult for the people to get homes, particularly the stand which the government is taking in the raising of interest rates. As we all know the rates have been increased. The government is going to assume twenty-five per cent of the loan and the lending company is going to be guaranteed against losses to the extent of twenty-five per cent. It comes to this point, Mr. Chairman, that when the national housing plan was started the lending companies had great difficulty in finding any field in which they could safely lend their money. During and after the war, especially in the west, a great many people who were in debt to mortgage companies managed to get out from under that burden. When the housing project started, that opened an excellent field for the lending companies. They could not have had a safer project because they were guaranteed against loss up to twenty-five per cent. In fact, I do not believe the lending companies have lost one cent under this plan. The government has lost a little, but not too much.

When the lending companies have such an assured protection that there is no possible chance of a loss, or extremely little chance as experience has proven over the last number of years, why should we be asked to give consent to allowing the mortgage companies to raise the interest rate from five per cent to five and a half per cent on their share of the loan? The other day when I was reading the Financial Post, my attention was drawn to this part of the article which appeared on Friday, May 18, 1951. The heading was:

Ottawa Raises National Housing Loan Rate to Five Per Cent

—Return to Lending Institutions to be 5½ per cent—
Only Slight Deterrent to Home Building

This was the part that I was attracted by:

Lending Institutions Tight

Prevalent opinion expressed by trust, insurance, and mortgage companies is doubt whether the scope of operations can be maintained at the high level of 1950, the higher return in interest notwithstanding. They point out that they are simply short of funds for the time being; that they have still heavy forward commitments from 1950 . . .

From that it would appear that the reason the mortgage companies want to raise their interest rates is not that the investment is not secure but that they are getting a little tight in their loans of money. They are not now anxious to lend in this field because they can lend their money in other fields and get a greater return. But mind you, Mr. Chairman, they were not so much concerned about that when there were no other fields available for them in which to lend their money at higher rates of interest. They were mighty glad to take advantage of this field and lend their money at 5 per cent, which was a mighty good rate of interest in anybody's language. Certainly when you compare that field of investment available to the mortgage companies with the field of investment available to the private individual, you find that they stand to have a great advantage. What field is there for the ordinary man in which to invest his money and get 5 per cent or 5½ per cent return? Certainly the government does not provide that opportunity. Even if the individual invests in government bonds he gets 3 per cent or less now, if he wants to cash those bonds. It seems to me that when we add that increased interest rate to the already high cost of building, the thing is getting out of all reasonable proportions.

We must recognize the fact that these builders of homes are faced with other problems in addition to that of increased interest rates. There is the cost of material. As has been pointed out, the cost of material has increased greatly. The home that we used to build, when this plan first started, at about $6,000 now costs in the neighbourhood of $9,000. The cost of labour has increased; and it has increased directly as a result of the increased cost of living, in respect of which this government has played a major part.

Then the down payment, as it existed in 1949, has been withdrawn. Just where is the ordinary man going to get the money to finance the building of a home? It just is not there. Under the present program which the government proposes to put before the house, they are going to make it that much more difficult for any private individual to build a home.

Mr. Shaw: It will be impossible.

Mr. Johnston: As the hon. member for Red Deer says, it is going to be impossible for him. Surely the government should be taking the lead in trying to induce home building. It should take that step by lowering the financial cost of construction as much as possible.

If there is a shortage of material—and without question there is such a shortage—then there should be a proper rationing system. If the defence program needs the first priority on those materials, it should get it; but I think that housing should come next. Priority should be given to home building. In my locality a great number of houses that have been started cannot be finished; and in some cases, the contract has been let but they cannot even be started because there is no cement available. You cannot get far in the building of a house if there is a shortage of cement. The government should do something to make Canadian cement available to our Canadian home builders. It is an odd thing that while you cannot buy Canadian cement in most of our large Canadian cities, you can buy American cement at about twice or three times the price of Canadian cement. You cannot build houses under the national housing plan or any other type of plan when you have to pay these exorbitant prices for materials.

I think the government should reconsider this proposal as to increased interest rates and delete it from the program. The government does not need that extra one-half per cent in order to finance its program. The mortgage companies do not need any increase in order to lend moneys out on this project, in view of the wonderful protection they have had up to this point. They do not need any increase in interest rates because their loans are guaranteed practically one hundred per cent. There is no other type of investment where you get such great protection. Surely that protection is worth a little bit of consideration.

I want to join with the hon. member for Eglinton in suggesting that the government reinstate that one-sixth down payment.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Mr. Knowles: You mean the additional one-sixth on the mortgage, not on the down payment.

Mr. Johnston: Yes, the additional one-sixth on the mortgage. It is exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, for people to start out without that assistance. I think that the minister is sympathetic and that he would like to see this done. But sympathy is not going to build houses. No matter how much sympathy may be expressed, it is not going to get these people a home to live in. I would suggest to the minister that he take into consideration the suggestions which we have made.

Mr. Croll: Mr. Chairman, I wish to join with the members who have already spoken in giving praise to the minister for the excellent job he has done in the department of which he has the honour to be the head. The minister's statement made today gave clear evidence that he has kept faith with the house and with the Canadian people. In addition to that, he is doing an imaginative and gratifying job in the field of housing, as his report today indicates. Despite the obstacles and the shortages, the high objectives set by the minister for the country have been realized. The year 1951, we are assured, will have as many house completions as did the year 1950. That is a real accomplishment. It is also heartening to know that defence production areas will receive special consideration.

I think the true significance of the minister's statement has not yet been touched on by the opposition. That was the invitation which he extended to the provinces, considering present conditions, to join with the dominion government under section 35 of the National Housing Act to undertake low-cost and low-rental public housing. Some agreements of significance have already been entered into for public housing in four provinces in Canada; but unfortunately that is all too few.

I think we must start by admitting from the very beginning that housing, like any other capital expenditure, is inflationary. We must also face the fact that housing is essential. It therefore becomes the government's job to reconcile those two aspects with respect to housing. After being in the doldrums for about twenty years, housing began to make real strides in this country after the war. The government, by a variety of legislative measures, stimulated house building in this country to the point where year after year the industry was setting new production records. Let me put some of these on the record. In the year 1946 there were 67,000 completions, 57,000 net additions and 108,000 net family formations. In 1947 there were 79,000 completions, 71,000 net additions and 75,000 net family formations. In the year 1948 there were 81,000 completions, 73,000 net additions and 83,000 net family formations. In the year 1949 there were 91,000 completions, 82,000 net additions and 77,000 net family formations. In 1950 there were 90,000 completions, 81,000 net additions and 70,000 net family formations.

The minister has already told us that since 1946 the total of 414,000 new housing units have been built in this country. In the same period the new family formations have increased by 413,000. Therefore it is quite obvious that we have not been able to keep up with the current demand. In January, 1946, we started with a backlog of about 650,000 houses. As of January 1 of this year, we have a backlog of about 700,000 houses, so that we have a very long way to go yet despite the very encouraging and most excellent record as of this date. As a matter of fact, never before in the history of this country have we seen such a rush of new buildings.

I say that when in November, 1949, the government announced its program of public housing, as embodied in section 35 of the National Housing Act, it seemed to us that Canada was entering upon a new era of housing. It appeared that we were actually going places. Well, these high hopes have failed fully to materialize. They fell through in part for a number of reasons which are known to hon. members. First, there was the national housing interest rate which was outstripped by the commercial interest rates, with the result that investment funds of the insurance and the mortgage companies dried up to the point where the National Housing Act was in danger of becoming a dead letter.

Second, the government's decision to curtail capital expenditure was like throwing a pail of cold water on the entire building industry. The announcement already referred to in this house on February 5 as follows:

> Effective immediately, therefore, loans under the National Housing Act to homeowners will be limited to 80 per cent of lending values prevailing in January, 1950. The effect of this action is that the additional one-sixth provision is suspended.

—has had the effect of not only curtailing housing, but making it quite impossible for a great number of people to make the down payment. So much so that I think the government realizes that perhaps it has gone too far, and will have once again actively to encourage more building, particularly in the defence areas.

Third, the provinces and the municipalities failed to take advantage of the government's offer to finance as much public housing as they wanted. There was no limit. The government was open-handed. It was prepared to deal with all takers. I find it hard to understand that only four provinces have made any attempt at all to provide public housing under section 35 of the housing act.

And finally, as other speakers have already said in the house, the astronomical costs of building have had their effect. There was a rise of 15 per cent in the cost of building in the year 1950. The monopolistic attitude of the building supply industry lifted housing right out of the price range of the average citizen.

Whatever the reasons may be, housing cannot be permitted to decline in this country. The splendid beginning which we made in the post-war period has proved that the thing is possible. We can and we must continue to go ahead with housing for Canadians. The first move was to raise the National Housing Act interest rates from 4½ per cent to 5 per cent. No one regretted that or the necessity for it more than I did, because this country needs not just housing; it needs low-cost housing, it needs rental housing, and the National Housing Act, with its low interest rate and long amortization period, was designed to accomplish just that.

I regret extremely that the government was compelled to do it, but compelled it was. It was faced with the clearest possible alternative: houses or no houses; and on that basis the interest rate had to be increased. Nobody liked it, but if it had not been done and done quickly, then only the people of Canada would have been the sufferers. I think I can say, without any fear of contradiction, that even at 5 per cent the National Housing Act is still the best housing deal in Canada.

The government's next step must be to reconcile the two conflicting views which I have already indicated, namely, the essentiality of new housing and the desire to curtail capital expenditures. A new house is the most obvious example of capital expenditure; but we cannot say because it is that it is taboo. We have to realize that there can be such a thing as essential capital expenditure, and that we should encourage. I think the solution is within our hands. The solution lies within section 35 of the National Housing Act.

We have done public housing in this country. It is nothing new. We have built subsidized housing in this country. The minister said that we have already built 53,000 of them. We have disposed of 20,000 out of the 30,000 that were available for disposal. We have 10,000 more to dispose of. He expects to dispose of 5,000 this year and 5,000 at a later period. The building of these 53,000 subsidized houses has not cost the people of this country one red cent. We have not had one penny of losses.

Section 35 of the housing act makes provision for the most economical kind of housing that this country can undertake. With the dominion government, the provinces and the municipalities co-operating to build public low-cost housing we can stretch the housing dollar a very very long way. National housing building is fine for the people who can afford the down payment; but there are far too many people in this country who cannot afford the down payment necessary at the present time, but who still need houses. That is why section 35, the public housing section of the National Housing Act, is the instrument under which we can obtain low cost and rental housing.

What exactly does section 35 say? I am not going to read it. It provides that capital costs, profits and losses are contributed by the dominion government to the extent of 75 per cent and by the provincial governments to the extent of 25 per cent. In some cases the provincial governments have obtained a portion of the 25 per cent from the municipalities. But that gave to the provinces and to the municipalities a rare opportunity to build houses under this section of the act, because of the apparent advantages that are there.

Let me point out some of the advantages under the public housing section of the act. It permits the blending of houses of various sizes for families in various circumstances. There can be built multiple dwellings, apartments or single houses. One thing I would emphasize to the minister is that we ought not to spend a penny on emergency or temporary housing; we are far beyond that stage. That is a waste of money. We are here for good. Similarly, the houses we must build must be here from now on.

Then, so far as money is concerned, all hon. members have indicated the government can borrow money cheaper than an individual or any other organization can borrow it. Certainly we can get money cheaper than the loan companies are prepared to accept for the usual loan. In the past the government has been able to obtain money for less than three per cent.

Speakers from all sides of the house have talked about priorities. On such a government undertaking priorities and the allocation of materials could be arranged without any difficulty. As a matter of fact the hon. member for Moose Jaw quoted what had been said on June 4 by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as it is reported at page 3671 of Hansard. The hon. member's question, referring to the Department of Defence Production, was in these words:

> Does his department give specific priorities to housing projects for the purpose of getting building material?

To that question the Minister of Defence Production replied:

> No, Mr. Speaker; there is no specific priority, but certainly there is a working arrangement with my colleague the Minister of Resources and Development for priority assistance in building houses, where that assistance is required.

If the minister is as powerful as the leader of the opposition says he is, he ought to have no difficulty at all in obtaining for us these priorities, when and if we require them. In addition to that hon. members have talked about the cost of building. The hon. member for Bow River who was a builder and knows something about this business has talked about the high cost of building. Well, there is no question that a great saving can be effected if the government gives out specific contracts for houses.

One other great advantage under this section is that we can locate houses where they are most needed; and in that way we should overcome the defence production need for housing at the present time. After all, public low rental housing in the last analysis is a choice between spending money constructively and wasting it on palliatives; it is a choice between using it to subsidize decent living and the opportunity for healthy citizenship and subsidizing demoralization, apathy and delinquency.

I have said the housing problem is becoming acute in places which are referred to as defence production areas. I mean by that places where war contracts have reactivated industry, and where those industries have drawn many thousands of workers to focal points across the country. There are many of them in Canada—Toronto is perhaps the most obvious. The others include Malton, Sorel, Edmonton and Vancouver—there are many others. If as some eminent statesmen seem to think, the international crisis may go on for five or ten years, then the need for permanent defence housing becomes apparent and overwhelming.

The public housing section of the act is flexible enough now to meet this or any other need we may require within the foreseeable future. As a matter of fact the government is doing something under section 35 of the act; the minister gave us a brief résumé of what is being done. Agreements have been entered into with some provinces—I think they are four in number. I am informed that the following agreements have been entered into: St. John's, Newfoundland, on June 13, 1950, for 140 units, which have been completed; London, Ontario, on July 10, 1950, for 374 units; Windsor, Ontario, July 15, 1950, for 400 units.

Mr. Benidickson: The houses have not been built.

Mr. Croll: I am informed that this applies only to the lots. Agreements have been signed in respect of Ottawa, Vancouver, St. Thomas, Kingston, Atikokan, St. John's, Newfoundland, and Saint John, New Brunswick.

Mr. McIvor: And Fort William.

Mr. Croll: I do not find Fort William on the list.

Mr. McIvor: It should be.

Mr. Croll: The little that has been accomplished by virtue of the National Housing Act is good; but my point is, as has been indicated by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, that no houses have been built, except in Newfoundland. The rest of these plans are on the drafting board. The people of this country need houses, not blueprints. Instead of these few units we are planning for this year the government should be sponsoring thousands of such units. This country could absorb 20,000 of them. As a matter of fact my own province of Ontario could absorb this year and every year 10,000 additional low-cost low-rental units. The rest of the country could use as many more.

The Ontario government can afford it. I have occasion to look up the financial status of that government; I do not bother going to Dun and Bradstreet, but I have seen their own statement. It appears that since 1948 they have had surpluses of $25 million each year. Housing is a good opportunity to invest a few dollars.

We have heard a great deal about one-sixth and the second mortgage. Ontario can stimulate building in the province by restoring that one-sixth or the second mortgage. That will provide for those who cannot afford a very large down payment at the present time. Here is a real opportunity for the government of Ontario to prove to the people of that province that they really mean what they have been saying about housing.

The hon. member for Eglinton quoted the premier of Ontario as saying: "Of all things to be cut back, housing should be the last". How heartily I agree with what he says. But I think he can do something about it. The opportunity is there for him to do it. I said before that the province of Ontario is in great need of housing, particularly defence housing, at the present time. By restoring the one-sixth they can once again activate housing and make houses possible for those working people who are finding the down payment so hard to make.

But it is not Ontario alone. I find it a matter of very great and deep regret that after the government put section 35 of the act into effect—we had been pleading for it for years in this house—no great advantage was taken of it by the provinces. They have not come through as expected. The dominion is putting up the lion's share of the money, but if there are no takers the people will suffer. I think they should know that. So because of world conditions, because of the rise in the interest rate, because of the increase in the down payment and because of the high cost of materials, we find ourselves at the present time with a golden opportunity in the field of low cost and low rental housing, particularly when the government can borrow cheap money, allocations if necessary, and priorities for all that is essential.

There are a few obstacles. One of course I have already indicated, the apathy of provincial and local authorities, and their reluctance to get into this scheme. The other difficulty is the cost of building supplies. That is a very serious difficulty. I want to say something special with respect to that because I think it needs saying. The building industry in this country is being strangled by a system of hoarding materials and setting prices by the building supply houses.

Mr. Blackmore: Hear, hear.

Mr. Croll: Price maintenance and gentlemen's agreements are flourishing in the trade.

Mr. Noseworthy: That is why we need price control.

Mr. Croll: We may have another way to deal with it. Price control did not stop these monopolistic practices.

Mr. Rowe: It started them.

Mr. Croll: No one denies that scarcities exist in the supply of some commodities. But what we have is a concerted effort among the building supply houses to keep materials scarce and prices high. They are keeping certain essential materials for their old or special customers, and they are not opening up new accounts. Today there is no free and fair competitive market in the building material industry. I have a clipping from the Toronto Daily Star of May 23, 1951, which reads as follows:

> The composite index of the cost of residential building materials is calculated on a 1935-39 pre-war index of 100.

Summarizing the editorial: in 1945 the index had risen to 148·3. In 1948 it had risen to 217·5. In 1950 it rose to 256·3. In February of 1951 it had risen to 274·9, and in March of this year it rose to 282·6. The editorial goes on to say:

> Where will it stop? Is there no governmental measure that can decelerate or halt these increases?

Mr. Blackmore: Hear, hear.

Mr. Croll: I think it is high time that the government investigated this situation and corrected it. There is no room in a field as vital as housing for practices of this kind. The Combines Investigation Act could be profitably employed with respect to this particular industry.

Mr. Noseworthy: That would not do any good.

Mr. Croll: The need for housing, and particularly low-cost housing and rental housing, is almost unlimited in this country today. The supply of materials is limited. Therefore I think the government must see to it that building materials are not diverted to high cost and unessential housing. They ought to go where they can do the most good. Press reports indicate that in the first five months of 1951 contracts awarded for building were 89 per cent over last year. Housing did not hold up its end. Higher interest rates, higher down payments, higher cost of building have brought about a drop in housing starts which is already of some consequence, although not of major importance.

Building materials could not be better employed than in the type of public housing provided for under section 35 of the National Housing Act. Through public housing the same amount of materials can provide homes for more people than any kind of private building can. Public housing can build more homes. It can build them cheaper, it can build them better, and it can build homes at focal points across the country where they are most needed, in industrial centres where the growing population has far outdistanced present housing facilities, and particularly to meet the needs of defence production. I re-emphasize that I would not want any member of the house to have the impression from what I am saying that I am asking for something for nothing.

I have already told the house that we have long experience in public housing. We have not lost a penny. We built houses, we rented them, we sold them at a later date. We have not profiteered or profited from them. That is not our purpose. We have provided houses for people at a price they were able to pay. I felt some concern about one of the statements made by the minister when he did a little worrying for the private builders. There is a field for private builders in this country, but it is not in low-cost or low-rental housing. The private builder starts where public and national housing leave off. Private builders are not interested in constructing low-cost housing or rental housing. Their interest is in profits. There is not enough profit in the field of low-cost or low-rental housing for them. I do not think we should waste too many tears on the private builders. They have done very well in the last five years particularly; as some members of the house have said, their whole approach in the past has been for the government to take all the risks and for them to take all the profits. I think the time has come for the government to make a fresh appeal to the provinces and municipalities to do more in the way of public housing than they have already undertaken or contemplate undertaking this year. The cost of public housing to the provincial and local authorities is so little in comparison with the benefits gained that they cannot afford to hold back. What we need, defence program and inflation notwithstanding, are conditions which will enable more rather than fewer people to buy low cost housing or rent it at reasonable prices. We have on the statute books of this country excellent legislation designed to meet that problem; we have the will to do the job, and we have done part of the job. We need the co-operation of the provinces and municipalities, not to create a builders' paradise, which would not be in the public interest, but to meet this housing problem.

I re-emphasize that the need is for low-cost, low-rental housing for our people. I ask the minister in considering this problem to balance the requirements of defence, which must have first priority, with the social needs of the people, which must come very close to that first priority. People are making sacrifices now, willingly and gladly. Give them housing, and they will not have the feeling that the cost of defence is being thrown upon the shoulders of the poorest elements in our economy. Nothing we can do at the present time would raise the morale of our people, and reinvigorate and strengthen them, as much as the provision of thousands of these low-cost houses across this country, where people can see them and live in them. I ask the minister to do everything he can to reactivate section 35. Some provinces are anxious to take advantage of that section; Saskatchewan and Alberta both have made inquiries. Alberta will not have any difficulty with finances. Saskatchewan has the will which sometimes is just as good as finances. In each case these governments are looking for the opportunity to provide housing for their people. I ask the minister to co-operate as he has in the past. One hon. member said the minister knew how to get along with other governments. To that statement I can only add "How true." So far he has had excellent relations with the provincial governments, in a field which is difficult. I ask him to continue that policy so that by the time we meet again next year we will have built thousands of these homes for the people of this country.

Mr. Noseworthy: I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Spadina. It was my good fortune to have the occasion to discuss such questions as this with the hon. member when he was mayor of a very important industrial city, and also when he was a minister in a provincial government. I fancy—though this may be mere fancy on my part—that I detect a slightly different approach to this question by the hon. member today than his approach under other circumstances. In all friendliness I would suggest to the hon. member for Spadina that he have his speech printed in two parts; that he send the first half to members of the cabinet, and the second half to his riding. The first half might help members of the cabinet to realize the potentialities of the hon. member as a prospective minister. I certainly think the second half would meet with the approval of many voters in his riding.

Probably no one in this house is more aware of housing needs in Canada today than the hon. member for Spadina, and I was rather disturbed to find, at least in the early part of his speech, that he was so complacent and so completely satisfied with government policy. I was rather disturbed to find him so anxious to eulogize that government policy and to pass the buck of responsibility for housing to the provincial legislatures. After all, we had this housing problem with us for four years after the war before the government introduced section 35 of the act. The minister told us the provinces were not able to get the necessary supporting legislation until along in 1950. Considering that seven of the ten provinces have already passed enabling legislation I would say that on the whole the provinces have done much better in that respect than the federal government.

The housing problem resolves itself into two phases. In the first place there is a dire need for houses. The best the hon. member for Spadina could say about the achievements of the government in the matter of housing was that during the past four years they have succeeded in building about 100,000 fewer houses than new Canadian families required. In other words in that four-year period they have dropped back about 100,000 houses, which have been added to that backlog which existed at the end of the war. I do not think the hon. member's figures do justice to the government in that respect. The figures contained in the 1950 report of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are different from those quoted by the hon. member, and indicate that as of the end of 1950 we still needed close to half a million houses. I am prepared to be a little more lenient in this respect than the hon. member for Spadina. I think the very best that can be said of the achievements of the government since 1946 is that they have barely kept up with the need for new houses arising from year to year. We still have just as much of a housing shortage today as we had at the end of the war. That is the first fact.

I was delighted to hear the hon. member for Spadina, in the latter part of his speech which I suggested should go out to his riding, disapprove of the minister's marriage to private enterprise; that he felt there was a place for the government to take action in housing; that there was a place for publicly financed housing, particularly in the low rental group. The truth of the matter is that the provision of low or even moderate rental housing is not a commercial proposition at all with today's building costs. It is impossible for private builders to provide low rental housing, or even moderate rental housing. It is this field in which there is a great need for houses today, and if that need is to be met it must be met by public financing.

The prospect for catching up on that backlog of half a million houses is not very bright. In the 1950 report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation it is stated on page 6 that residential construction is that part of the construction industry least able to secure building materials in periods of shortage. In numerous places in the report there is the suggestion that the shortage of building materials in 1951 is likely to curtail the building of residential properties. According to that report, the picture is not nearly as bright as the one painted by the minister this afternoon. Even last year when, according to the minister, there was no shortage to affect housing, and when the department was advancing an additional loan of one-sixth of the basic mortgage, the net increase in houses was 83,000. According to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation report, the net increase in family and non-family households for the same year was 87,000. In other words last year, under those favourable conditions, we fell 4,000 short of keeping up with the new demands created during that year. We added an additional 4,000 to that backlog which had been piling up during the depression and during the war years.

Since that was the best we could do last year, what are the prospects for the coming year when we are faced with a defence program which will have first call upon our materials? It is quite evident that unless some priority is established whereby residential housing may secure building materials, we are going to add still further to that backlog. As a matter of fact, residential housing has never received its fair proportion of the men and materials available. According to the government publication, "Private and Public Investment in Canada in 1947," residential housing got only 34·3 per cent of the total construction expenditures; in 1948, 35 per cent; and in 1949, 34·8 per cent. Then, according to the corporation's report for 1950, the over-all share of men and materials that went into housing construction dropped back about four per cent as compared with 1949. This report indicates that housing construction is not likely to get its fair share of construction materials and labour in a situation such as that which faces us today.

I would suggest that one of the first steps in order to increase or maintain the building program, and to avoid adding still further to that half million shortage, should be a system of priorities for construction materials. I believe that is a must for the government. The second problem so far as housing is concerned is the cost of houses today. It places them beyond the reach of many thousands of our people, beyond their reach either to buy or to rent. I should like to refer to an article in the Economics and Political Science issue of 1949 which is entitled "The Economics of Low Rental Housing." This article is two years old, but the situation has not changed very much. The statement is made that the lowest income group, constituting 20·7 per cent of the population, could not afford to buy a house at all. The next group, 12·7 per cent, could not afford to own a house costing more than $3,000 or $4,000. That rules out one-third of our people who could not afford to own a house costing more than $3,000 or $4,000 two years ago, and who certainly could not secure any of the houses which are built at today's prices. There is practically one-third of our population for whom publicly financed houses must be provided if they are to secure houses. The next 20 per cent could not afford one costing more than $4,000 to $5,000. The next 12·1 per cent could not afford one costing more than $5,000 to $6,000. It is therefore quite evident that, at present prices, a large proportion of those who need housing accommodation—those in the lower income brackets —just cannot afford either to buy or to rent houses that are built even with government assistance at today's prices.

On page 11 of the report of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation I find that 4,311 housing units were provided through arrangement with builders and investors under what is called the rental insurance plan.

Mr. Blackmore: For what year was that report?

Mr. Noseworthy: For the year 1950. The average number of rooms in those 4,311 houses is four. The average rental is given at $70 a month. That is $70 a month for a four-roomed house. That is the average for 4,311 of these houses built across the country by investors and builders, through arrangements with the government. That price puts those houses beyond the reach of hundreds of thousands of those in the low-wage category.

As was indicated by the hon. member for Spadina, the need for low-rental housing is one of the great needs today. I think, as does the hon. member for Spadina, that the advantage which some of the provinces have already taken of section 35 of the National Housing Act is probably one of the brightest features of that report. In two of those projects at least the rental is based on 20 per cent of the tenant's income, in the case of unheated accommodation, and on 25 per cent of the tenant's income in the homes that were heated. That provides the legislative machinery necessary for solving the housing problem of those in the lower income groups. Certainly the minister should be encouraged to press forward with getting an increase in the number of agreements with the provinces, and in giving the provinces every possible encouragement to provide these low-rental houses on this basis.

Another difficulty in connection with our present housing situation is the matter of financing. When the minister introduced the measure by which an additional one-sixth loan was provided for builders he told us, in his own words, as reported at page 1295 of Hansard of 1949:

> We are establishing a pattern for long-term housing development . . .

Four months ago it became evident that the long term was instead a short term of about one year; for although that legislation remains on the statute books, the government has arbitrarily cancelled that feature of the legislation because it became the government's avowed policy to restrict building. I think it was made quite clear that the reason for cancelling this one-sixth loan was for the express purpose of curtailing residential building, in spite of the fact that we still need half a million new houses. It has been indicated by the minister himself and others, as well as in the report of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, that the government was afraid that there would not be sufficient material available to build all the houses that would be started if that one-sixth mortgage loan still remained available.

Apparently the minister believes that if we are to solve the housing problem, we must be prepared to accept a lower standard of housing. I think he told us that if we could reduce by about 15 per cent the standard of housing that the Canadian housewife wants to live in, we would solve a fair part of our housing problem. I doubt if the Canadian people today believe that the only way Canada can work itself out of its present difficulty is by reducing living standards. The other evening the Minister of Finance gave us the same policy: the need for reducing living standards. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we in Canada—even though, as the minister says, there is a housing shortage in all the countries of the world—have natural resources, in men and material, available for providing our people with houses, without lowering the standard of the houses with which our people should be provided. I suggest that the minister should restore that one-sixth loan in order to enable purchasers to make the necessary down payment on the houses that we are building.

There is another feature of housing financing that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. Since he has raised the interest rate for finance companies the builders tell me—and as a matter of fact two of them told me this only today—that finance companies are still refusing to advance moneys for building under the National Housing Act; that it is still practically impossible to get those loans; that the 5½ per cent which the finance companies would get is still not sufficient to warrant their lending money under the National Housing Act. I should like a statement from the minister on that. I want to assure him that today there are builders whose applications were approved two or three months ago who were rejected because of the interest rate, and are still being rejected. I do not think the answer is a further increase in interest rates to mortgage companies, but I do think that the government has to take some measures. If they cannot get the mortgage companies to advance money at their rate, I think the government will have to lend that money in part directly under Central Mortgage.

It has come to my attention that a considerable amount of United States capital has been available for housing projects in Canada, or would be if those who would provide that capital could be assured that if the projects could be sold they could get the capital and take it back to the United States. At the present time the foreign exchange control regulations permit that, but the foreign exchange control board will give no assurance to United States investors that if they can sell their houses and the money is available they will be able to withdraw that money from Canada. I wonder whether the minister will also speak on that point.

Mr. Henry: Mr. Chairman, this debate enables one to discuss the housing problem under the minister's estimates. My first words are of congratulation on what the minister has done, particularly for housing in the Toronto area during the period 1949 to 1951 inclusive.

The figures of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation make it clear that for the three-year period, including the years 1949, 1950 and 1951, there will have been erected in the city of Toronto and its immediate surrounding area no fewer than 25,000 new housing units. If one were to take those 25,000 new housing units and place them on lots of standard width, say fifty feet each, he would have 200 miles of new housing units constructed in this three-year period. This means a string of housing units which would go from the outskirts of Toronto easterly to Kingston. I think this illustrates that tremendous things have been done by this government in stimulating housing during the three years in question.

However, although much has been done about the solution of the problem, may I say to the minister that the need is still great indeed in the metropolitan area of Toronto. We have five emergency housing centres located at Long Branch, Malton, Geco, Stanley Barracks and Lakeside Camp. There are no fewer than 1,010 families located in those emergency housing centres at the present time. These families comprise a group of 5,282 individuals, and only 545 of the 5,282 individuals are relief recipients. And too these individuals are in the centres for the most part through eviction proceedings, and through no choice of their own.

In a recent report of the welfare commissioner for the city of Toronto to the appropriate committee of city council it was said that with reference to those occupants of the emergency housing centres—and I quote the report:

> In most instances no other accommodation was available following eviction.

Some had more than one eviction. I think it is also important to place on the record with reference to the Toronto area that at a recent hearing before the new rental board for the province Mr. J. J. Wingfelder, deputy administrator of rentals in Toronto, gave evidence—and indeed it is most cogent. He said:

> The housing situation in the Toronto area is terrifying and has not yet reached its peak of seriousness.

With reference to rents Mr. Wingfelder went further. He said that Toronto is an area of highest pressure of rents for all of Canada.

My philosophy teaches me that the home is the backbone of the nation. In my view housing is the natural right of all Canadians. Private enterprise does not always keep pace with the situation, and government aid becomes a necessity.

I commend the minister and the government in that they have placed housing as second only to national defence in Canada. Toronto is an area where we expect to be, and we know that we will be, an arsenal of our preparedness program. It is gratifying today that before the orders of the day were called the minister stated that negotiations were now under way as between this government and the province for perhaps 5,000 housing units to be located in Ontario. We have heard and we believe that these negotiations have to do with 5,000 houses under section 35 of the act. Some will be for rent, and it is important that they should be low-rental houses. Some will be for sale. Others of those units will be apartment units. Let us hope that they can work out an arrangement whereby they will be low-rental apartments.

In the light of my remarks on the seriousness of the situation which exists I hope that the minister will bring to bear upon the provincial authorities the importance of locating in Toronto our proportionate share of the new housing units on the basis of our needs and our population. It will be a sad thing to me if the minister, in his negotiations with the provincial authorities, cannot give us at least 2,000 units in this time of crisis when we have over 1,000 families in these centres, which centres have been called terrifying.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Green: No.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: We are considering item 427, emergency shelter administration, and item 565, dealing with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question having to do with a project in Vancouver known as the Fraserview project. About two or three years ago the government undertook, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, to set up this project which was to contain 1,100 homes for veterans.

The whole area which, as the minister knows, is in the city of Vancouver, was expropriated by the government against the wishes of many of the people who had homes in that area. Then the area was resubdivided. Portions of people's orchards and gardens were taken away from them; in some cases their homes had to be moved; and as a result they suffered a great deal of discomfort. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have gone ahead and I believe have finished about 600 of the houses.

Earlier this year it was announced that further development of the plan was to be dropped at least for the time being, with the exception of completing the installation of services such as water, sewers and facilities of that kind. The result is that we have this large area sitting there, all topsy-turvy, partially developed, the streets all changed, the parks—which were shown in the lovely plans put out by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—not put in. Indeed I think the project might properly be described as more or less of a mess. That is the description applied today by some of the people who have written to me asking that something be done to finish off the project.

There have been press reports to the effect that the lots upon which the homes have not been erected might be sold; of course this would mean that in some cases lots taken away from old residents will now be put on the market or turned over to real estate firms, or handed to the city for purposes of sale; the whole project will break down unless the housing corporation completes it.

We are told it has been held up because of the increasing costs, and I have no doubt that costs have gone up. But there seems to be very little prospect of their coming down in the immediate future, and I do suggest to the minister that where a project has been commenced and is well on the way to completion it is very poor business to let it drop when it has reached this stage. Not only is it very poor business, but it is most unfair to the people living in that district, including both the old residents and the veterans who have gone into the new homes which have been completed.

Moreover, it is unfair to the city. The city of Vancouver has co-operated throughout with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I do not believe the minister can have any complaint about the way the city council have acted. But there they are, being criticized by the citizens; yet nothing can be done because the whole scheme is in the hands of the housing corporation. I do not think that is good enough, and I would hope the minister could arrange to have the project completed. In any event I would ask him to let us know what is to be done.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word, and after I have finished the minister can reply to both the member for Vancouver-Quadra and myself. Before referring to housing in general I should like to refer particularly to the Fraserview project to which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has referred. He gave a broad outline of this project in which some 1,100 homes were to be built. Of these I believe about 600 have been completed and the building of the remaining 500 has been postponed indefinitely. That is the last information I have had in the matter.

As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has pointed out, it is unfortunate that the finishing of this project has been discontinued. It is unfortunate first, because of the great controversy that was created about the project when the land was taken over by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Second, it is unfortunate because of the great need for homes in Vancouver. There was a great deal of vacant tax land in the area, as well as many private homes. The city of Vancouver turned over the tax land at a fairly reasonable figure to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, following which proceedings were taken to expropriate the private homes in the area.

There was great protest made when the homes of people who had been established for 25 to 30 years were taken away from them, and their lives upset. I supported the project and tried to make a case—I believe a case could be made—for what Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was doing, in order to provide houses for the people of Vancouver, and of British Columbia generally, where there was such great need. But all the explanations and all the justifications we have made for the project went by the board when the government, or Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, decided to discontinue building when the project was only half finished. The government has decided to postpone the building of the additional 500 homes, because of increased building costs.

I have a copy of a letter written by the chairman of the Vancouver housing association to the minister. She represented that, even if the cost of each unit should be increased by $1,000 because of increased building costs, at 3½ per cent interest and with thirty-five year amortization the increase in rent would only amount to about $5 per month. In view of the terrific need for housing in Vancouver, I suggest that involves a very small amount of money and should not divert the government from its intentions in that particular area.

Let me draw the attention of the minister for a few minutes to the housing situation in Vancouver at the present time. May I first tell him that there are still 2,000 veterans families with four or more small children still waiting after six years for suitable housing accommodation. The building of the 500 houses would provide homes for at least 500, or a quarter of those 2,000 veterans and their families. At the end of 1945 the emergency shelter administrator estimated that the shortage of houses in the city of Vancouver amounted to over 23,000 family units. Between 1946 and 1950, both years inclusive, approximately 14,700 housing units were started while the increase in the number of families—and the estimate is a conservative one—was 21,000.

I think the rate of building in Vancouver and British Columbia generally has been higher than in other parts of Canada, but despite the relatively high rate the shortage of houses has increased since the war by a further 6,300 units. Today instead of having a shortage of 23,000 units as we had in 1945 there is the shortage of 30,000, and the population of the city of Vancouver is increasing every day. In addition the government is making strenuous efforts, and I believe with some success, to bring immigrants to this country many of whom will ultimately reach Vancouver. I think we are seeking trouble if we bring people here without having homes prepared for them and when we have not homes even for the people who are here.

Before I leave the Fraserview project, I suggest to the minister that he give the matter his most earnest consideration before finally deciding not to go ahead with it. I plead for that because of the controversy that came about as a result of expropriation and the hopes that were raised as to the development contemplated in that area, one of the finest locations in the Dominion of Canada.

I should like to give the committee the figures as to building progress in Vancouver and greater Vancouver for 1948, 1949 and 1950. Greater Vancouver of course takes in the surrounding municipalities. Dwelling completions in the city of Vancouver in 1948 amounted to 3,391, and in greater Vancouver 6,315. In 1949 completions in the city of Vancouver amounted to 2,748 and in greater Vancouver 5,599. In 1950 completions in the city of Vancouver amounted to 2,271, and in greater Vancouver 4,679. Dwelling starts, buildings started but not necessarily completed, in the city of Vancouver and in greater Vancouver for the same years are as follows: Vancouver in 1948, 3,297, and greater Vancouver, 6,442; in 1949, Vancouver, 2,161, and greater Vancouver, 4,465; in 1950, Vancouver, 2,034 and greater Vancouver, 4,442.

These figures do not include Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation building for which the figures for 1948, 1949 and 1950 are 586, 324 and 294 units respectively, all in the city of Vancouver. I am putting those figures on the record to show that the need for housing both in the city of Vancouver and in the greater area is increasing each year because we are falling further behind each year in the number of homes required. While the need is increasing the number of homes completed and the number of homes started have declined every year from 1948 to 1950. Something must be done. I agree that we must give high priority to our national defence program, but here again I think we are making the greatest mistake we possibly can make if we are going to put everything into the defence program and leave the provision of homes to private enterprise.

It has been demonstrated that for the last twenty-five years private enterprise has not been able to build homes for that section of the community which cannot finance homes for themselves. What is happening today? While low rent homes are what is required, it is much easier to get money to build a $15,000 or a $20,000 home than it is to get money to build a $6,000 home. As a matter of fact if we are going to deal with the matter properly I think there should be a maximum limit on the cost of homes, because two homes at $6,000 each are better for the community than one home at $12,000. I suggest that here is a situation that must be dealt with with the greatest possible energy because it is of the greatest possible urgency.

There is one other point I want to bring to the minister's attention. There is another project of 200 homes to be built in the city of Vancouver on the three-way principle under the National Housing Act. The last I heard was that there was a possibility the Little Mountain project would not be proceeded with. I would be very glad if when he speaks the minister would give assurance that this will be gone ahead with at once, and that the Fraserview project will also be completed.

Mr. Winters: In reply to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, there is very little I can add to the answer I gave to the question he asked in the house on April 9, at which time I told him some 600 odd houses had been completed with another 450 or so to go. We thought the prices for those houses were too high, that there was too big a cushion in them for the contractors, so in fairness to the ultimate tenants who would have to pay the higher costs in terms of rent we let the completion of the project stand in abeyance. We realize that it is very important to complete the project, and we intend to do so. As soon as Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation feels it can get realistic bids for the completion of the remaining houses to round out the project, it will do so.

As for the Little Mountain project, it is out to tender now and it is expected that tenders will be received within the next two or three days. Neither the government of British Columbia nor we have yet seen the tenders, so we are not in a position to say what the costs will be or whether the government of British Columbia will wish to go ahead with it. That is the status of that project.

Mr. Murphy: I wish to take up only two or three minutes of the time of the committee. I listened to the statement of the minister this afternoon, and I was sorry that, like many other hon. members, I was not able to hear all the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton, owing to the fact that I had to attend a committee.

In dealing with this subject I think we should localize some of our arguments, so for a few minutes I am going to speak of the situation as it exists in the Sarnia district, one of the fastest growing areas in Canada, which I think every hon. member will agree is making a big contribution to our war effort. There, as we all know, we have the greatest oil refinery in the British empire, which is increasing its capacity by some 25 per cent. There we have the Polymer plant, which is also spending some seven and a half million dollars or so in an expansion program. There we have Canadian Oil coming in, with an eventual program which will cost some $20 million. There we have Dow Chemical, another industry which has contributed much to our war effort, with a $5 million project under way. Sun Oil has a thousand acres or more on which it plans to start a $40 million refinery when steel is available.

I appreciate the difficulties under present conditions, when we have the defence effort competing with the construction industry for available building materials, but I feel that the three levels of government must take steps to bring about a final solution to this problem, which certainly is acute in my area. Let me give one illustration. Just two weeks ago last Saturday night, at eleven o'clock, it became known that a home was available to rent. By twelve thirty some nineteen telephone calls had been received inquiring about that home. That shows how desperate the situation is in Sarnia. I heard what the minister had to say in regard to his chat with representatives of Ontario earlier this week, and I firmly believe there are certain districts in this country to which all levels of government must give special consideration, particularly districts which contribute so much to our defence effort. I believe all hon. members will agree that because of what we produce in Sarnia that is an area which is entitled to special consideration.

I have often thought we are a little slow, not only in this country but in other democratic countries, in carrying on research to find ways of building houses at a lower cost. It seems to me that today Central Mortgage and the loan companies have specifications higher than are necessary. Certainly in some areas they could be moderated, and I believe we will have to moderate those specifications to keep down the cost of building. Perhaps not many people realize what is required to even put up the walls of a house, or the strength of the lumber required to complete a home. I believe these requirements can be modified and costs brought down. It seems to me our research departments could do something, and maybe they are doing more than we think, to bring down these costs.

In our section of the country, and I think this applies elsewhere, we believe that since the new restrictions have been in effect the construction of homes has been retarded. In the first place the builder has not been able to obtain a big enough loan to permit him to sell the home with a reasonable down payment. We have not many people in this country today, particularly in my part of it, who can afford to pay $3,000 down on a home they could have obtained a year ago for something like $1,500 down. They are not yet in that bracket, and I do not expect they will be able to afford such down payments. The need for homes is so serious that governments should not delay considering ways and means of making houses available to those in the low income brackets. That might be done by increasing the loans, or in some way under section 35 of the act, under which the three levels of government make contributions.

Then the higher interest rates, which apparently are inevitable, will be an important factor in the construction and purchase of these homes. There was a day most of us can remember when people built homes to rent, for revenue. That day is gone, I think forever, and today we must make houses available, either for sale or for rent, to those in the low income brackets. I know materials are scarce. As an illustration, my son had intended continuing in the building business after a sojourn elsewhere, but gave up his plan because he could not get rock lath or cement. One dealer had a backlog of fifteen carloads of rock lath, which seems to indicate something wrong with either our production or our distribution. The same thing applies to cement and other materials. I believe the statements made this afternoon as to the increased cost of building were much too conservative. I do not believe we in this country or any other country can depend on those who are engaged in selling building materials in any form to promote research which might lower building costs. That must be done by the government, because today those who have anything to sell can sell it at any price they ask.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am grateful for these few moments, because I have to go to a committee. I am going to make another point which I think will illustrate what I have in mind. Only a few days ago I was talking to one young man who had sold approximately three-quarters of a million dollars' worth of homes in the lower price field, that is between $8,000 and $9,000, during 1950. I was amazed to hear the hon. member who preceded me speak of homes being built for around $6,000. I wish we could build them for that amount in my area. You might build a three-roomed house for that, but you would not get much more. This illustration probably is typical of what is happening in many parts of this country. Last Sunday this young man told me that in the two weeks previous he had sold one very poor home, in the newer part of Sarnia which was taken into the city, at a price of $5,200. That was the only sale he had made in two weeks. There are not many people who can pay the higher down payment required to obtain shelter over their heads. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the government today must accept a greater responsibility than ever before for housing the people who require shelter.

Mr. Gillis: I am only going to say a few words on this question, Mr. Chairman, as I too have a committee to attend. I listened to the minister's statement this afternoon with a great deal of interest, as I did the statement made by the last speaker. I thought that the minister's statement indicated the great extent to which the government has gone into the field of housing. I believe they have gone a long way since 1946. I might add that I do not have much of a housing problem in my constituency. We solved that problem some considerable time ago through co-operative housing and other methods.

The statement made by the hon. member who just spoke, when compared with what happened in 1946, indicates that the memory of some of the members in this house is rather short. In 1946 the housing field was wide open to the construction industry of this country, known as free enterprise. In that year the government had some control over the distribution of building materials, cement and so forth. A few of us in the house were urging the government to retain that control in the post-war period because we felt more supervision would be required in the sale and distribution of those materials during that period. Many of the hon. members to my right were demanding that the government get back to a normal way of doing things, the law of supply and demand. Slowly but surely the government obeyed that request and unravelled the mechanics of free enterprise. It was very much against our advice.

The statement the minister made this afternoon indicated to me that the government has gone some distance in maintaining the policy they suggested at that time, to the effect that in so far as possible or practicable they would take up the slack where free enterprise failed. The minister's statement definitely shows that they have done that to some extent. It is evident that the hon. member who just spoke has changed his opinion completely; he now demands that these materials should be controlled. But that is locking the door after the horse has been stolen. I cannot go along with him. For instance, in the field of housing the construction industry enjoys a rather secure position. They erect a building, and they are guaranteed against loss; money is made available to them. But they want to come in and exact the last pound of flesh.

We are told that an industry is being established in a certain section at a cost of $40 million, but the government is expected to provide housing for the employees. We are going to invent $40 million. We are objecting very strenuously to any excess profits tax. We are not going to contribute anything to the government in the field of taxation, except what we feel is right. But in and around that industry where hundreds of thousands of employees are going to be housed, we expect the taxpayers of Canada to provide the housing. This attitude puts the problem back further than it was fifty or sixty years ago. When the old industries like steel and coal were established in this country, they built houses and rented them to the employees at a nominal figure. After years on that basis, many of these industries passed the houses over to the employees at a very reasonable price. But modern industry is not taking any social responsibility. The social responsibility must be taken by the government, and by the taxpayers of Canada. Unlimited profits they must make, but they object to any suggestion of corporation taxes. Private enterprise must be allowed an open field in so far as profits are concerned, but the building of homes, social responsibility towards the public, that must be accepted by the government. We want government control to the extent of guaranteeing us profits and underwriting our losses, housing our employees, but that is as far as we want government responsibility to go. Do not touch us in the field of taxation. That is the position of the Liberals to some extent, and the Tories to one hundred per cent as indicated by their activities in demanding the removal of controls.

I merely wanted to make these few remarks, Mr. Chairman, because I listened to the minister's statement and I thought it was a very good statement. I believe the government had to go a long way in replacing free enterprise in the field of housing. It is a social responsibility which, in my opinion, develops with industry. I should like to leave this thought with the minister, that housing is one of the first requirements of citizenship.

I do not believe any person can be a good citizen until he drives his roots into the soil and owns a piece of land. I believe the best way to get that type of citizenship is under a co-operative scheme of housing. I do not believe the federal government is doing the right thing when they farm out to insurance companies and large contractors in this country the interest that they have in the building of homes. I believe that money should be made available to the municipalities across the country who plan the housing in the community, who set the taxation rate in that field and who must provide the services. I think that whole thing should be decentralized. Instead of handling the matter through those large financial organizations who have no responsibility socially, who do not want any responsibility to the people as such, except the making of money, I think that process should be reversed and that the municipalities across the country who are with the people, plan for the people, service the people, should be given the money necessary to provide housing in their own communities.

It sounded rather peculiar to me a few minutes ago to hear British Columbia members standing up in this chamber and telling the committee about the terrific shortage of housing there was in the province of British Columbia. British Columbia is the lumber province in Canada. If there is any place in Canada where materials should be available at a reasonable cost, from the hardwood floor to the cement, it is British Columbia. There is something wrong with our planning, Mr. Chairman.

There is no shortage of cement in this country, and there never was. Any time you want to pay an extra 25 cents or 50 cents a bag, and take your cement from the black market, you can get it.

Mr. Ferguson: Fifty cents a bag? A dollar a bag.

Mr. Gillis: May I say that you fellows in Ontario are a little bit easier to gyp than we are in the maritimes. It was American cement. There never was any trouble in getting it if you were willing to go on the black market and pay the price. In that field I say that there is a straight monopoly. That is the reason for the situation. There should be some government regulation in the field of supplying the basic materials. There is something wrong in British Columbia when there is a housing shortage. The answer is to provide for the necessary legislation when you are writing amendments to the National Housing Act.

At the present time there is in Nova Scotia a provincial housing act which contains a section that enables you to organize co-op. groups and finance the building of co-operative homes at a reasonable cost. I suggest that the National Housing Act should contain a simple provision on a national basis so that where men want to build their own homes it should be done on a national scale through the federal government; there should be a provision similar to the one now contained in the Nova Scotia housing act.

Low-rental housing will never be provided under the present act. The only way to provide it is to do so on a municipal level, through your municipal governments, under a subsidy arrangement with the federal government. If it were done in that way, it would not cost nearly as much money as it does today, with the exorbitant rates that are charged by the people to whom the government is farming out the taxpayers' money.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman, in the last five years we have heard a tremendous amount of talk about shortages of this and shortages of that, when in reality the true picture is: just let us do a little less work, everybody. That is the true picture. The hon. member who spoke previously talked about British Columbia and why we should never have a shortage of housing. I am sorry that he is not now in the chamber, because I should like to assure him that, even in British Columbia, houses do not grow, irrespective of the amount of timber available there.

Briefly what is wrong in Canada today, in respect of all shortages, is that corporations are making tremendous profits. That is not the only reason. I am not going to flail the corporations for making tremendous profits. I am only saying that they do so. Evidence of that appears in the papers daily. We read that such-and-such a corporation's profits have doubled, that such-and-such a concern has doubled its capacity. The previous speaker said that the government had gone to a source to distribute money for the building of houses, and he intimated that was not quite the right source, in spite of the fact that the corporation is all set up to loan out money, that that corporation has a tremendous stake in the Dominion of Canada, principally in the life insurance business, in which people have invested millions and millions of dollars, and hope to get them back. Handling money for loan purposes is one source of making legitimate money. There is nothing wrong with that avenue of dispensing money. They probably make a better job of it than the government could, because the government is not set up to lend money by millions for housing. They would have to take on more civil servants, something which we are all growling about today. We criticize the government for the tremendous number they are employing. We are all saying they are employing too many, and I believe rightly so.

The truth is that no building materials grow on trees. The truth is that houses will not grow on trees. The truth is that people do not want to work more than eight hours a day, and some are clamouring for shorter hours. That is the truth, and that is why you are short of houses. We are short of cement and we are short of plywood. What is the actual reason for that? Not that the gift of God has not been bestowed on the Dominion of Canada with respect to raw materials. I believe in short hours if there is not enough work to go around. If you can produce what you need for this country in four hours a day, I say: let us work four hours and give everybody an opportunity to work. But I also remember that the Bible says: Six days shalt thou labour and thou shalt rest on the seventh day. I do not think that meant that you shall work four days a week.

As the previous speaker said, what we have got to do is get back to normalcy. Normalcy in the Dominion of Canada is not clamouring for shorter hours. Normalcy is not clamouring for greater pay, or for shorter hours and bigger take-home pay. Let us be men about this matter in the House of Commons and face the facts. You all know in your hearts what the trouble is. It is that we are afraid to work. We are becoming a nation of leaners. Let the people in my constituency—and this applies to every constituency in the Dominion of Canada, particularly in the small municipalities—try to get an American corporation to manufacture something in our town. Try to get an English manufacturing concern to come here, so that Canadians can have the great art of working, and can continue to be carriers of water and tillers of the soil, not participating in the cream of the profits. They will go to the stockholders of the English companies and the American companies, and we will continue to shout about that condition. We are becoming thankful for the fact that we are able to work, let alone make any surplus profit.

That is what is wrong with the Dominion of Canada. The people of Canada are afraid to work; that is, the great majority of them are. There is here in the Dominion of Canada ten hours a day of work cut out for every man who is willing to do it for the same pay he is getting, not overtime. Let labour buckle down in all walks of life and, where it is necessary, increase their hours of production.

I have built houses within the last ten years. On one occasion I sold a house. The purchaser was in the furniture business. He had contemplated a trip to British Columbia to see his customers six months previously. He had to move. He was paying $15,000 or $14,500 for this house. He wanted the moving people to move him, his wife and family, on the Saturday afternoon so that they could settle to some extent and order his furniture, and so that he could take the late train on Sunday night for British Columbia in order to carry on his business. Everything was completed except the polishing of the floors by the painters. I asked the painters if they would mind coming back on Saturday morning. Oh, no, they would not come back Saturday morning to help that man, with three children and his wife to get partially settled in their house. They had worked their forty hours a week. The same three gentlemen I have in mind were on relief for five consecutive years; and I am confident that I will live to see the day that the same gentlemen are on relief again, depending on the taxpayers and the good old government. As one woman said to me: I am entitled to a pension; I am entitled to money from the government. I said: "Who do you think the government is? Where do you think they get the money?" She said: "I don't know and I don't care". There is the trouble with the people of Canada. You can spend day in and day out in this House of Commons, one man presenting his views and another one presenting his views, one man saying that labour is not paid enough and another telling them that their hours are too long. Other people are blaming the suppliers of materials necessary for construction. There is not a man, irrespective of what he says in the House of Commons, or the party that he represents, that does not know the truth in his own heart. It is that people will not work long enough hours to produce from the gift of God the necessities of life. That is the trouble; not that you are short of materials, that is, raw materials. You are short of the stomach to work, and it is pretty near time that labour and management got down to the realities of life, put their heads together and said that irrespective of what happens behind the iron curtain or in any other part of the world, we are going to face realities, and if necessary we will work ten or twelve hours a day. When the time comes that we can sleep in bed all hours we shall work eight hours a day or four hours a day; but let us get down to it and stop the nonsense.

Mr. Beyerstein: Mr. Chairman, the subject of national housing has been fairly well discussed this afternoon; therefore I do not think it will be necessary for me to repeat any of the arguments that have already been advanced, consequently my remarks will be very brief at this time. However, I should like to say that I have had some experience in building under the regulations of that National Housing Act. I have been associated with a firm which in the past two or three years has built about 28 houses under the regulations of the National Housing Act, and I can truthfully say that my experience and my association with officials of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have in all ways been very satisfactory.

I should like to take this opportunity to compliment Mr. Douglas, who is in charge of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation office in the city of Edmonton and the surrounding district should like to compliment him on the efficient manner in which he handles the affairs for the corporation in that district. I have always found him very co-operative, always willing to give advice and help with any problem, no matter how large or how small. I think I can also say the same for the insurance companies. The insurance companies with whom I have been mostly associated are the Canada Life Assurance Company and the Manufacturers Life. I have found them very fair to deal with as far as advancing loans under this act is concerned. I have found their inspectors to be very fair, and they always make a thorough inspection, which I would say is to the advantage of everyone concerned, especially to the person who is buying the house after it is completed. Therefore I can truthfully say that my associations under this act have been very satisfactory.

However, I did have some correspondence from some of my constituents, in which they asked a few questions which I should now like to ask the minister. I shall make them very brief, and I hope that he will find time to answer them when he replies to other questions. As I say, these questions arise out of correspondence from my constituents. In the past it has been the practice, I believe, for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to supply contractors with scarce materials such as cement, wiring equipment, plumbing materials and so on, in areas where there is a shortage. Is that still the practice?

My second question is this. What are the regulations in an instance where an insurance company refuses to make a loan under the National Housing Act? Suppose a party made application for a loan in an area where an insurance company was already in operation, and for some reason or other the insurance company did not feel that it should grant the loan, not necessarily because the party would not be entitled to the loan but for some other reason, perhaps. What would be the answer in an instance like that?

My third question has to do with the report regarding the curtailment of insurance loans. Is that just a temporary measure on the part of the insurance companies until they have the problem of interest rates adjusted?

These are the three questions which I should like to ask and I hope that the minister will be able to supply me with the information.

Mr. Winters: The assistance the hon. member referred to was in connection with veterans housing, under which Central Mortgage did provide material on a free issue basis. The corporation also did provide some assistance in supplying nails for a short time under ordinary operations of the National Housing Act. At the present time there is no such arrangement.

With respect to the operation of insurance companies and their failure to operate in certain instances, the policy of the government and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is that direct loans are not normally made in an area which is usually or normally served by an insurance company.

With respect to the third question, the curtailment of credit on the part of the insurance companies, we hope it will be temporary and that when the amendment to the National Housing Act has been passed by the house to allow for the higher interest rate they will again be in the mortgage field just as they were formerly.

Mr. Knowles: Despite the applause which greeted the remarks that were made by the hon. member for Simcoe North I wish on behalf of the people of Winnipeg North Centre to deny his assertions, and I do so categorically. He made the statement that the real trouble in the country today is that our people are afraid to work, and do not want to work or have not the stomach to work. I have lived all my life either amongst the people of Winnipeg North Centre or amongst people like them. They are the industrial workers to be found in so many of our North American cities. The charge made by the hon. member for Simcoe North does not apply to these people.

An hon. Member: It sure does.

Mr. Knowles: Not at all, and the hon. member knows it. Not only are they willing to work and work hard, but they have worked across the years of their lives, excepting those days when depressions have robbed them of the chance to work. All they are asking, all we are asking for them when we ask for government responsibility in the field of housing and in other matters of social legislation, is that people who work and produce the wealth of this country, whether it be in the cities or on the farm, have a chance to get back and enjoy some of that wealth.

When we ask for proper housing in cities and in the rural areas of this country we are not asking for something to be picked off trees and given to our people. We are simply asking that the people of this country enjoy what is their right out of the abundance that they produce. It is that philosophy that lies behind the arguments in the field of housing that we have made from this corner of the house across the years, and it is that philosophy which underlies the National Housing Act so far as it goes.

A good deal has been said today, particularly by the hon. member for Spadina, about section 35 of the housing act. The hon. member for Spadina referred to it as one of the most important sections of that act, and in that I agree with him. Section 35 is that section of the National Housing Act which provides for agreements between the federal government and provincial governments on a 75/25 basis for low rental housing projects. As I say, I agree with the hon. member for Spadina as to the importance of that part of our housing legislation, and I share his hope that the minister will be able to persuade the provinces to take greater advantage of it.

I was indeed sorry to note that in the minister's comments today on the workings of section 35 he mentioned a number of provinces, but was unable to make any reference to my own province of Manitoba. There may have been some correspondence, and he may have been in touch with the officials of that province, but it appears that no project under section 35 is under way. I know the city council of Winnipeg has made representations to the provincial government urging that it take advantage of section 35, but as yet nothing has been done.

I would point out that possibly one of the difficulties facing the provinces is that of finding the capital with which to finance their 25 per cent of any of these projects. The hon. member for Spadina this afternoon referred to Alberta as a province which was able to go into this, if it wished to, because it has money; and he indicated that Ontario, too, has plenty of money. But that does not apply to all the provinces. It is perfectly true that it is no great burden on a province to suffer its 25 per cent share of any loss that may be sustained in the operation of a project under section 35; but, if I understand it correctly, as that section is set up, in order to get going at all the capital has to be put up in the first place. The federal government finds it much easier to obtain its 75 per cent of the capital than many of the provinces find it to obtain their 25 per cent.

I believe discussions have taken place between some of the provinces and the federal government as to the possibility of the federal government's lending that money to the provinces, it still being understood that the provinces would bear their 25 per cent share of any loss sustained. I hope when the minister speaks again he will tell us whether any consideration has been given to that way of making a more effective use of the provisions of section 35.

I was a little disappointed to hear one or two of the minister's comments this afternoon, when he was talking about these dominion-provincial agreements in the field of low-rental housing. If I understood him correctly he said something to this effect, that he was not sure whether low-rental housing projects, which were really low-rental in character, were possible under today's conditions, with particular reference to present high costs.

Well, low and high are relative words; but what struck me about that sentence from the minister was that it seemed to me that he was throwing cold water on these projects which are possible under section 35. I hope he listened carefully when the hon. member for Spadina was speaking, and that he realizes that his job in connection with section 35 is not to say anything that would discourage its use but, rather, to say everything and do everything that he can to encourage its use.

As has been said by other hon. members who have spoken, this is one of the most important parts of the government's housing legislation. It is just about the only part of it in which the element of subsidy enters. The minister will recall that when that section was first proposed the government really took a new forward step in this field, because it indicated its readiness to do something about low-rental housing even though to do so meant providing an element of subsidy.

Our philosophy about housing underlies all of that. We feel that just as it is part of the responsibility of the community as a whole to see that all children have the best educational opportunities, so in this modern society of ours it is part of the responsibility of the community as a whole, through the governments they elect, to see that all the children, all the workers, all the people enjoy the benefits, not of slums, not of mediocre housing conditions, not of houses which are just roofs to exist under, but of proper housing in the best of communities, that can be planned by modern architects and engineers.

So I strongly urge that the government do everything it can to push the use of section 35 of the National Housing Act. I urge that consideration be given to the proposal that ways and means be found of lending money to the provinces to find that 25 per cent of the capital they must put up. I urge that consideration be given to changing that figure, if that is necessary. Perhaps 75/25 is not the proper relationship; maybe it should be 80/20, 85/15, or even 90/10. The government is into this business of being concerned about housing. It is a social responsibility and a national responsibility, and a good step has been taken. Let it not be nullified by apathy on the part of the government.

Another phase of the matter which was discussed today—and I shall take only a moment or two to speak about it—has to do with the question of the withdrawal of the provision for the additional one-sixth that was announced earlier this session. That has prevented many people from getting a sufficient loan to get started, and I do hope steps will be taken soon to restore to its maximum the amount of the mortgage that can be obtained under the National Housing Act. I know the idea was to restrict housing, because of certain shortages of building materials. Surely if housing is to be restricted it should be on some basis other than that of the size of the pocketbooks of those needing houses.

Then, with respect to another matter, namely the increase in the interest rate from 4½ to 5 per cent, I am afraid I cannot agree with the hon. member for Spadina, with the minister and with others who have expressed a similar view, that this might help the situation. It seems to me that what is needed in this field of building new homes is something of the same philosophy that the government has accepted with regard to homes for rent.

Here, too, the element of subsidy must enter, and I am satisfied that the day will come, because of our sense of social responsibility in respect of housing, that we will introduce an element of subsidy into the assistance we provide by way of help in building new homes. One of the ways that can be done is by making money available, not at the rate of interest which can be obtained by investors of private funds who invest their funds for making profit, but at rates of interest which approximate the actual cost of lending money.

I must not get into a speech on financial or monetary policy, but it does seem to me that what we should be doing is not raising interest rates that the National Housing Act permits to insurance and loan companies, but rather we should be lowering that interest rate, even if it means that the government itself, directly or through the Bank of Canada, must actually lend money directly for the building of houses. If the government lends money for that purpose at a rate less than the market rate for invested money it is true that will be to a certain extent subsidizing the building of new homes, but I submit that is every bit as good as subsidizing the production of gold and a lot of other things we subsidize in this country. In fact the providing of homes is one of our greatest national social responsibilities, and I urge consideration of that phase of the matter.

Several members who have risen to their feet tonight have indicated that they had to leave to go to committees, and there are indeed quite a few committees meeting. One who had to go to a committee before he could get a chance to speak was my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West. Just before he went he said there was one point that he would like to see given expression to in the course of the debate tonight. As a matter of fact it is a view I would be very happy to express myself, and I do so not only on my own behalf but on his behalf. He pointed out, as other members in the house have pointed out from time to time, the difficulty that people in small unincorporated communities, villages, and so on, have in getting the benefit of our federal legislation. This legislation is not only for the cities. It is not only for larger centres. It should be for all Canadians. If the insurance and loan companies do not feel that way about it, if they do not want to make their money available to help people to have decent homes in the rural areas and in small unincorporated communities, I submit there again the argument is strong that the government should step in directly. I make that plea on behalf of the hon. member for Kootenay West because he had to go to a committee, and I support it most strongly myself.

There is just one other comment I wish to make, and it relates again to something that the minister talked about in his remarks this afternoon. He referred to the fact that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at one time had some 53,000 rental units. He indicated that some 30,000 of those had been offered for sale and that 27,000 had been purchased. I believe he gave some other figures, but that is enough for now. I take it that the reference in that statement is in the main to wartime houses that have been sold to veterans. I would have to admit from the large number who have purchased these homes that there must be many who feel satisfied with that program of the government.

I must tell the minister, however, that I am still receiving complaints about this program from various parts of the country. Earlier this session I drew to his attention complaints from the Winnipeg branch No. 1 of the Canadian Legion. I have since had occasion by correspondence to draw to his attention complaints from places like Brantford and Paris in Ontario, again from veterans organizations. Only two or three days ago I wrote him on behalf of another branch of the Canadian Legion in northern Ontario. I could mention other places, such as Regina, Fort William and other cities.

In all these cases the complaint is the same. Veterans who have been renting these houses for a period of time and have enjoyed the benefit of lower rent than they might have had elsewhere are being pressed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to purchase these homes. In some cases when they are not able to purchase the homes they are occupying they find that other veterans come along and purchase them, and the veterans who are in them have to move elsewhere. It makes one wonder just how many of those who have purchased these homes did so under pressure. The veterans in these organizations in the centres I have named, and in other centres, feel that they are being treated unfairly in this respect. They hear a great deal being said about the desirability of low rental housing projects, about projects of this kind that enable people to live in quarters that they can pay for within their means. But here you have a program like that being upset by the policy of the government at the present time.

I agree with the hon. member for Spadina that these matters with respect to wartime housing and with relation to emergency housing only touch the fringe of the problem, and that our real effort should be concentrated not on them but on ways and means designed to build permanent housing for the people of this country, and let it be housing of a kind that our people really deserve.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I am sure from the remarks I have made previously on this subject it is well known how concerned I am about the housing situation in the city of Hamilton. In a local newspaper the other evening there was a dispatch from Ottawa claiming that the Minister of Defence Production has authority under recent legislation to assist companies to build houses in communities where defence contracts have produced an acute housing shortage. I have noticed at various times that in articles appearing in the press with reference to the housing situation in Canada, and in particular with reference to the communities where defence activities are producing a bad housing situation, the name of the city of Hamilton rarely appears. Two or three of the larger cities appear but in the city of Hamilton we have a situation that has developed over many years and, while I dare say it is similar to that which obtains in other centres, it is nevertheless aggravated by many factors.

I should like to quote from a very interesting report on housing presented at the annual meeting of the Canadian welfare council by a member of the Hamilton body. She says in part:

> . . . poor housing has been a chronic state in many parts of Canada for many years. With the first world war families began to crowd into the city areas and the need to house this influx was not adequately met before the onrush of the depression meant the doubling up of families who could not afford to keep up separate establishments. Besides, there was no money available for building, either for rent or sale. Then came the next war with its shortages of building materials on one hand and the rapidly growing number of new families on the other. Post-war has brought steadily rising costs and now again we are being faced with an increasing shortage of materials with a result that the gap between needs and available supply is widening rather than decreasing.

After some general comments she goes on to speak about Hamilton in particular and gives some very pertinent figures. She says:

> In Hamilton we have about 1,600 wartime houses with on an average of one coming free every month. On the waiting list they accept only veterans with children and on the list at the present time there are 603 families wanting to rent and over 1,000 wanting to buy. Here are a minimum of 1,600 families (for it does not include non-veterans) seeking what they consider adequate accommodation at a reasonable rent. Some are separated with all the loss of daily living together that means an impoverishment to both the parents and children, not to mention the possibility of the weakening of the tie between them and the beginning of a loss of responsibility. Some are living with relatives which can usually only provide a satisfactory solution for a short period of time. Such a situation is full of potential danger to the development of healthy families.

In reference to this lady's statement that a thousand people want to buy houses at the present time, I should like to go back to the day in this house earlier in this session when the minister announced the curtailment of the loans of one-sixth. I recall that I was amazed and greatly concerned over what I was sure would happen; and today in our city an investigation is going on which has broken into the headlines of our newspapers, with rather pitiful photographs. The one I now hold in my hand is of two small children, I would judge about three years of age, tied to a telegraph pole. They live in a highly congested area where the street, and a very busy street at that, is the only playground. So they will not be run over by the traffic, their mother ties them to the telegraph pole every day when they go out to play.

A few moments ago the minister spoke about the action to be taken shortly in connection with raising the interest rates. This article also mentions that, and says that in the meantime advances on mortgages have been frozen, with the result that builders are starved for ready cash and will be starved until the move is approved, which the writer guesses will come up in the house about July 1. I should hope that whatever is holding up the cash advances on these mortgages might be dealt with expeditiously so the work can proceed. It is estimated by the builders in Hamilton that only about 300 units will be built there in 1951, with over 1,600 families needing homes immediately. Only 51 dwellings were started in January of this year. I do not have the figures for the subsequent months, but with the mortgage money being frozen for the time being I do not suppose they are very cheerful.

I have more articles and more pictures which I would be glad to send to the minister, though I dare say he gets them from every city in Canada. In his statement this afternoon the minister said:

> We will pay particular attention to the communities where housing is most needed. Because defence production is the main effort of the country today the government is anxious to do everything it can to meet the housing needs in defence production areas.

Whatever consideration is being given to making it easier for builders to build and for workmen to own their own homes, I do hope special attention will be paid to Hamilton. There we have this situation, that not only are all these people seeking homes but in some districts existing homes are actually being removed to make way for expanding industry. In one section 250 people are being put out of their homes for this reason. We have the loss of this housing accommodation, and we have all these people coming to Hamilton now to work in our defence plants. These industries are by no means at their peak; this is only the beginning. We have this backlog of housing, as I quoted from the report, which goes back even to the first war days, and the situation is being further aggravated by the destruction of existing homes. I cannot too strongly urge the minister to give special attention to this city, because I know that from Hamilton must come a large part of the defence production which may ultimately save this nation.

Mr. Winters: Perhaps I should say a word in reply to the hon. member for Hamilton West and tell her that though the situation is very difficult, and no one overlooks the seriousness of the housing situation in her city, I hardly think she was justified in remarking that she doubted whether 300 houses would be built in Hamilton this year. The statistics show that 433 houses were started in the first five months of this year as against 307 last year, and that in the metropolitan Hamilton area there have been 800 completions so far this year as against 485 last year. Houses under construction at the present time number 881 as against 806 at the same period last year.

Mrs. Fairclough: I did not know how many had been started this year. I am pleased to hear that the number is over 400, but even that is merely scratching the surface. We do have in Hamilton, or will have as soon as this trunk sewer on the mountain is finished, a large area which can be serviced very quickly. That is a situation which has not obtained for some time.

Mr. Winters: I did not mean to imply that the problem had been solved; I just wanted to say it was considerably better than the 300 the hon. member mentioned.

Mr. Adamson: I want to bring to the attention of the minister a problem which is causing a great deal of dismay in many municipalities. I refer to the rapid increase in municipal taxation. There is no question but that we need every house we can possibly build. There is no question but that we should have a greater house-building program. But there is another problem which is ancillary to the general problem of the construction of houses, particularly low rental houses and more particularly houses assisted under any government scheme; that is the servicing of those houses after they are constructed, through municipal taxation.

This is a terribly serious matter. Municipal taxation is different from any other type of taxation because it destroys the asset you have. If in one year the tax on your house is X units and it goes up to X plus 20, X plus 50 and so on until it gets to 2X units, the value of your house is considerably less than half its value before the increase in taxation. Under our federal and provincial system of government municipal taxation is caused by the essential services which must be provided by the municipality, such as schools, streets, lighting, sidewalks, sewers and all the other things that must go to service a house. They are as essential as the bricks and mortar, the floors and the roof that go to make up the house, and in my contention they should be considered part of the cost of building that house. Many communities have been ruined because a housing scheme has increased taxes through the necessity of building more schools, roads and the hundred and one other things that must be provided. The old residents in that community will then have had their investment impaired, and the value of their houses considerably lessened by the new housing project.

A year or so ago, Mr. Chairman, I suggested that in order to relieve the burden of municipal taxation, municipal taxes might be considered as a deduction of income for income tax purposes. I still think that was a good suggestion, and would have helped considerably. However, the problem we face today is that municipalities, both large and small, particularly in the province of Ontario, are confronted with a serious physical problem owing to the number of new dwelling houses that have been built. I wonder if the minister has considered any of the following things? First of all, when a new housing project is being built with federal assistance, is the community in which it is going stabilized, that is, is the ratio of industry to domestic houses such that tax increases will be equitably borne by both industry and domestic dwellings; does the community in which these houses are being placed have any type of town planning to ensure that the location of the new housing units will be maintained as a proper housing area and not become blighted through industrial development?

These things are very important, Mr. Chairman, not only to the individuals who live in these communities, but to the government to safeguard its investment. I should like to see some provisions in the housing act to the effect that only in properly planned communities would assistance be given. I am sure that in the long run this would be of benefit to all, because if you have an unplanned municipality and you have an addition of hundreds of houses, you are going to upset the equilibrium of that municipality. Then, instead of producing an asset, you may produce a great liability, a liability not only to the people already living in the municipality but to the very people you want to help. If a house is built in an unplanned district, the district might deteriorate and the investment of the home owner would deteriorate along with the district.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the minister will be able to do something in this regard, because I sincerely believe that a properly planned community is the best safeguard, not only for the government but for the home owner whom we wish to help.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that everyone was impressed by the minister's statement this afternoon. It sounded to me as though the minister had been responsible for many improvements, and for increasing the number of houses through the facilities provided by the act. It came to me somewhat as a shock to hear the hon. member for Spadina state that the housing shortage is greater now than it was in 1944. There is now a shortage of about 700,000 houses. If that is so, then there is some truth in the statement of the hon. member for Eglinton that housing is the No. 2 problem of the nation. It ranks next to the question of defence.

If that is so, Mr Chairman, then I feel that perhaps this committee has not been giving the attention to this subject which it deserves. I cannot speak for any other community than the one I represent. I know the minister is familiar with that community. He has been there, and he has seen the problem for himself. I believe he will recognize that there is a problem in St. John's which is only being scratched at the present time. He spoke of 140 units, but I did not hear him say that they had been completed. I heard the member for Spadina say they had been completed. They were in the process of erection when I saw them in January, and I am glad to hear they have now been finished.

I do not know what arrangement was made for putting people into them. I understand that instead of being a low-cost rental proposition the houses will be rented for $40 per month. I do not believe that many of the poor people in the slum areas would be able to occupy those houses and pay that amount of money. I do not want to prolong this debate unnecessarily, but I would point out that one section of St. John's was destroyed by fire in 1892. The part west of the line where the fire took place is very old and has to be renewed. I believe the municipality is now tearing down some of those houses. We have three main problems down three, and one is slum clearance. The province has adopted something of that nature, but we have to have new houses in which people can live.

It seems to me that once before, Mr. Chairman, you prevented me from speaking about the terrible conditions in the slum area of St. John's. I must repeat that those are serious, and no honest man can feel happy about those conditions under which the people are living. I suppose there are places in this capital city of Ottawa where people are living in such conditions that we would be ashamed to let outside people know about them.

The Deputy Chairman: May I ask the hon. member to remind me of the circumstances in which I prevented him from discussing this matter?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): We were discussing this subject before, Mr. Chairman, and I was speaking about the hardships of the people who live under poor housing conditions in St. John's. I believe the chairman thought I was harrowing the feelings of the members of the house, and perhaps might harrow the feelings of the people who live in those houses. I believe you should recall the incident, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: If you will pardon me, I do not. I should like to inform the hon. member that at the time I interrupted him when he was speaking about slum conditions in St. John's I did so because I considered he was not in order. In any event, I shall look up the matter. I do not believe the hon. member should say that at one time or another I prevented him from discussing a certain subject if he was in order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The main point is that we have these conditions from one reason or another, and they ought to be removed. The question arises, whose responsibility is it? Is it the responsibility of the municipality, the province or the federal government? It seems to me it is a joint responsibility of the three forms of government. The minister has authority under the act to conduct research and investigation, I am wondering if he has been carrying on any investigations in the city of St. John's? It seems to me that city is so situate that we could have an ideal city there. An enormous amount of work has to be done before the city can be called an ideal city. I am wondering if the minister has been giving sufficient attention to the conditions as they exist there. The city is greatly congested. As he knows, the houses are mostly of wooden construction, built side by side, largely in long rows of ten, fifteen, twenty and perhaps even more than that, with narrow streets. A beginning is now being made to eliminate the worst places. I trust that some kind of plan will be devised so that, when houses are being constructed in the area which is being cleared, they will be of a different type and provision will be made for playgrounds and parks. That is one of the problems that I think should be a matter of study by the officials of the minister's department.

There is another problem that exists in Newfoundland about which I think the minister may perhaps not be aware. I do not believe there are many places outside of the cities or large towns, where a loan is being granted by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. On behalf of one fisherman living in my constituency I made application for a loan to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation agent down there, and it was turned down. It might have been turned down for some other reason than that it was in a rural area. But I do not believe that any effort is being made by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make these loans available to that class of person where he wants to build a house or where he wants to improve it or enlarge it. Only the other day a lady wrote to me to see if she could obtain a loan for the completion of the house which the husband had built. I consulted with the officials of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and I was told that no loan was available for that type of thing. Yet I find in the act, under the section dealing with home improvement loans or home extension loans, that such a loan can be made. I do not know whether any regulation has been made to prevent it. But that is the information I obtained from the agent in St. John's and from the office here in Ottawa. It seems to me that more consideration should be given to the people who live outside the cities. The trust companies will not lend them any money; and if the federal government will not lend them any money, they are under a great handicap, and what they are really doing is contributing for the benefit of other people, because in paying taxes they are helping to make loans to people who live in cities. Surely the minister will give that matter consideration. But it seems to me that overriding all that—and it is the principal thing I have to say—if the problem is so serious and we are slipping behind, and have slipped behind another 50,000 homes in the past five or six years, the minister would be justified in setting up a commission to deal with this problem for some years ahead. We have had a royal commission on the arts and sciences. We have had a committee of this house doing wonderful work in connection with old age pensions which are going to cost the government hundreds of millions of dollars a year. We have had a royal commission on transportation. But was any one of those commissions or committees concerned with anything more important than the housing problem in this country? I am sure the minister will agree with me that the housing problem should be tackled now. It should not be allowed to slip back, because it will slip back faster during these war years, or these years of tension, if we neglect it. I urge upon the minister that he not allow his colleagues in the government to give the matter of housing a place too far back when considering matters of policy.

Mr. Harkness: In his initial statement this afternoon the minister spoke with a considerable amount of satisfaction about the sales which had been made of wartime housing units. I can assure him that that is not a satisfaction which is shared by a considerable number of the veterans in Calgary at least, or by some, I think, in other places. Earlier this evening some reference was made to this matter, but I should like to deal with it from a slightly different point of view.

What is actually happening or what has happened in several cases in Calgary is that people who bought these wartime houses have now moved out of them and are renting them to other people at $70 and $80 and $90 a month. In the meantime, they have moved into other houses themselves which they have bought in some cases. That is the situation in at least two cases that I know of. Naturally that procedure makes for bad feeling amongst the many hundreds of veterans who are without houses, who were on the waiting list for some years, in some cases, waiting to get into one of these wartime houses.

The first question I should like to ask the minister is whether there is any means whatever that his department can put into effect to prevent this sort of thing from going on; I refer to the situation of a person getting into one of these houses, buying it and turning around and renting it to somebody else at a high rent; because in Calgary housing is extremely short, the people are desperate, and these high and excessive rents can be secured. It may be a thing which would be rather difficult to stop, but I would think that when one of these wartime houses is sold to the tenant who is in it, a provision could easily be put in the contract to the effect that there would be no what you might call renting it out at a high level. Surely it would be possible to put into effect some safeguard to prevent this abuse from going on. It is an abuse which I think causes an unnecessary amount of bad feeling.

In addition to that, I should like to ask the minister whether the tenants in these houses are being put out or whether there is any intention of putting them out if they have no other place to go. In his statement this afternoon the minister said that, as to tenants who did not wish to buy—and the ones who do not wish to buy are mostly those who just cannot raise the down payment with which to buy, they are in such bad circumstances—when the house they are in is sold they are put into another house owned by Wartime Housing. I should like to find out if that is always the situation. Amongst these people in Calgary who are in the position of not being able to buy their houses, there is certainly quite a strong rumour going around to the effect that if they do not buy them by October they are likely to be out of luck. The word that goes around there is: Make sure that you get your house bought before October or you are likely to find yourself out on the street, come next spring in any event. I should therefore be obliged to the minister if he will make a statement with regard to those three questions that I have asked. I should also like to say at this time that I think that this policy being followed by the government of getting rid of these wartime houses as rapidly as possible was probably a mistake, in view of the present housing situation. I should like to ask whether they intend to sell all those houses or whether there is any intention of holding a certain number of them to look after what we might perhaps call some of our neediest cases among the veterans.

Mr. Higgins: I have three questions I should like to ask, and the minister can answer them briefly. He told us he had built 140 new houses in Newfoundland this year, I believe. I wonder where they were built, or where the building sites were. Can he tell me anything about the demand, how great the demand is? Has the cost of building changed any? I refer to the actual cost.

The Deputy Chairman: Before the minister replies, may I be permitted to deal with the remark that was made a moment ago by the hon. member for St. John's West when he spoke of slum clearance and when he said that I as chairman prevented him from discussing that subject, on a previous occasion. The committee will recall that I rose at that time and said that if I had stopped him it was probably because I considered that while he was discussing slum clearance, he was out of order. I now have Hansard showing what happened at that time. It is found at page 2444 of volume III of the second session of 1949. The committee will bear with me. It is very important that this point should be cleared up. It reads as follows:

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to clear up a few points with regard to what my colleague has said about this section. It is rather difficult to approach the matter in view of the answer just given by the minister. I would certainly ask his sympathetic consideration if the subject ever comes to his attention. I understand the minister has been in St. John's, and has seen the conditions prevailing in certain sections of the city. There is a historical explanation of those conditions.

St. John's was destroyed by fire in 1846, and wooden houses were built. In 1892 half the city was destroyed by fire, and the half that remained—which covers about 50 acres—is in a bad condition owing to overcrowding. During the first and second world wars, people went to live in areas known as Southside hill and Blackhead road. The area is really in a scandalous condition. No interest is being taken in these people. In two sections of the city at least there is certainly a need for a housing project. If I could describe truthfully the condition—

The Deputy Chairman: I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the clause under discussion. His remarks must be strictly relevant to the clause.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Surely, Mr. Chairman, when we are speaking on a housing project we must say why it is that we need one. I hope the minister is not objecting to my drawing these things to his attention. He may have forgotten them in his hurried visit, but I am closely associated with them. I have been closely associated with these conditions for a great many years.

The Deputy Chairman: That cannot be done under this section. We are now discussing section 9.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The minister said it could. He told us that a slum clearance project could be considered under this section because it is a project arranged between—

Mr. Winters: No, Mr. Chairman. I think I should clarify that point. I said that slum clearance and this section could be regarded as complementary projects. But this section has nothing whatsoever to do with slum clearance as such. Slum clearance is covered under an entirely separate section of the National Housing Act.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Since the minister gave me that answer some time ago, I have read the section and I think the position is this.

Then he carried on, but he did discuss the matter of slum clearance again, and there was a point of order raised by the minister. Therefore, I say it is clear from the record that when I asked the hon. member for St. John's West not to discuss slum clearance it was because I considered that in doing that he was out of order.

When the hon. member for St. John's West reads the remarks that I have made following his this evening I hope that he will follow the only course which is proper in the circumstances.

Mr. Winters: The hon. member for York West raised one or two questions, and perhaps I should deal with them. His great concern was about town planning. I might say that is a great concern of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as well. There is a town planning section in the act, and they have a town planning division in the corporation. Where projects are concerned, which I imagine is what the hon. member had primarily in mind, it can be taken for granted that unless there is adequate planning the project does not proceed. However, I should say that the main approach to the problem now is under section 35 of the housing act where the proposals and the planning come from the province, and it goes forward only on a joint agreement basis. However, we are very strong supporters of town planning, and we think that where possible it should be adhered to.

On the point raised by the hon. member for Calgary East, there are circumstances in which houses sold to veterans are in turn resold, and I would imagine that the rents charged are perhaps higher than would have been charged had the house remained in the hands of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

For war workers' houses where they are sold to a civilian there is an arrangement under the agreement whereby if the purchaser retains occupancy for a period of five years he gets a preferred purchase right, which is an inducement and prevents that sort of traffic, you might say, that the hon. member had in mind.

Mr. Harkness: That does not prevent renting the house.

Mr. Winters: The fact of the matter is that he must have occupancy himself for a period to earn the preferred purchase price. There is no such arrangement, however, for veterans houses, and they can indulge in renting, as the hon. member has pointed out.

The sales program to which he referred has been going well. I think the hon. member asked whether or not there were cases where veterans were put out of a house and no suitable replacement provided for them. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation knows of no single instance, and I know of no single instance, where a veteran was not re-accommodated within the project area, and there have been no major difficulties in that regard.

The houses made available for sale are those up to and including the 1947 program where the arrangements with the municipalities have permitted it, and where suitable arrangements have been made with municipalities.

The hon. member for St. John's East referred to housing conditions in St. John's and, as I understood him—and I did not understand him too clearly—asked whether the demand for houses in St. John's is still strong and what is the relationship between costs now and costs a year ago.

Mr. Higgins: Not only in St. John's, but throughout the province generally.

Mr. Winters: The demand for housing is of course still strong, and roughly speaking the costs now are about 15 per cent higher than they were a year ago.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to thank the minister for the answer he gave me to my questions, and to ask him also if there is any truth whatever in the story which is circulating very strongly that October is the deadline for people in those houses to buy them.

Mr. Winters: There is no truth in that statement.

Mr. Higgins: There is one other question the minister did not answer. I asked where these houses were built and where the building lots were said to be. Are they all in St. John's or in other parts of the province?

Mr. Winters: The project which the hon. member referred to is the Ebsary estate in St. John's.

Mr. Harkness: There is one other question I asked which the minister did not answer. Is Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation proceeding to sell all of these rental houses, or are they going to retain a certain number to look after what you might call the most needy cases of veterans needing rental houses?

Mr. Winters: I answered that, I think, only indirectly. I did say that up to and including the 1947 building program all the houses are being made available for sale, where that is permitted under the agreement with municipalities, and where suitable arrangements have been worked out with municipalities. Houses built for veterans since that time have not yet been made available for sale.

Mr. Harkness: How many houses would that leave since 1947 in Calgary which would still be available for rental purposes?

Mr. Knowles: Give it for Regina and Winnipeg as well.

Mr. Winters: Perhaps we can look that up and give it to the hon. members before we pass from housing altogether.

Mr. Noseworthy: Can the minister tell us whether there has been any change in the attitude of lending companies since the announcement of the increased rate in interest? Are they still reluctant to lend?

Mr. Winters: They of course are not in a position to lend now. The amendment has not been dealt with by parliament. We understand, however, from talks with them that, once the legislation is enacted, they will be in the mortgage field and will carry out their lending program.

[Mr. Higgins.]

Mr. Johnston: Could they not do it under the old plan? There is nothing to stop them from lending under the old plan?

Mr. Winters: The reason we had to seek an amendment to the act was that they were no longer lending under the old rate of interest of 4½ per cent. But we believe and we hope that they will return to a lending program at the new rate of interest, once this amendment has been passed.

Mr. Noseworthy: Can the minister say why lending companies with offices in Ottawa refuse to lend money to builders across the river?

Mr. Winters: I do not know the particular circumstances, but I would imagine the lending institutions are exercising their privilege of making loans to the best advantage, where they can.

Mr. Knowles: Are there any agreements pending between the government of Manitoba and the federal government under section 35 of the housing act?

Mr. Winters: No, there are not.

Mr. Knowles: Have there been any discussions as to possible agreements?

Mr. Winters: To my knowledge, sir, there have been no discussions since the discussions we had with them at the time we were considering changes to the act, which ultimately resulted in the passing of section 35.

Mr. Knowles: I take it from those answers that the government of Manitoba has not made an approach to the federal government. Is the federal government doing anything further to try to sell this idea to the provinces, such as Manitoba?

Mr. Winters: Well, in view of the responsibilities various levels of government have for this problem of housing, we do not feel it would be appropriate for the federal government to put on a strenuous sales campaign to induce a province to enter into any program that is primarily its responsibility. But we have, in various public statements, on very many occasions, said that section 35 was available to anyone who wished to submit proposals that would meet with the mutual satisfaction of all levels of government concerned.

Mr. Noseworthy: While the Minister of Finance is in his seat, perhaps he could assist the Minister of Resources and Development in answering a question I raised this afternoon. I pointed out that, to my knowledge, there is American capital available for building in Canada, provided some assurance could be given that if investments could be liquidated within a given period of two or three years the original capital could be taken back to the United States.

I have before me the regulation of the foreign exchange control board which states:

> A non-resident who makes a new capital investment in Canada (other than in marketable securities) and records the investment with the board when it is made, is permitted under the policy followed by the board at present, subsequently to liquidate the investment in Canada and withdraw the proceeds from Canada.

But the foreign exchange control board can give no assurance that that policy may not be changed without notice at any time. Can either of the ministers tell us why that could not be done?

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I should answer the question. It has been the policy of the board for a good many years. On important matters of this kind one can never and probably one should not ever give a positive assurance as to what might have to be done under other circumstances. My recollection is that even in the latter days of the war we allowed new investments of that kind—that is, post-September 1949 investments—to be taken out by the investors. But circumstances might be such that it would be necessary to impose very much more drastic exchange regulations. I do not contemplate for a moment that it would be, because the whole trend in recent years has been to relax. But the outside investor, of course, has to take his chances on it.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to ask the minister, following his reply concerning this business of people buying these wartime houses and then renting them at high prices and using the proceeds to build other houses for themselves, if any consideration has been given by his department to safeguards which would prevent that very abuse from taking place.

Mr. Winters: I have the figures for the houses that will remain in Calgary, and also in Regina and greater Winnipeg, if all the houses up to and including the 1947 program are sold. In other words these houses on the 1948-49 programs number: Calgary, 300; Regina, 147; and greater Winnipeg, 1,415.

Then, on the other point to which the hon. member for Calgary East referred, I would say that this is a matter that has been receiving consideration. It is known that what the hon. member has described as an abuse does take place. It is difficult to cope with when Central Mortgage and Housing sells a house to a veteran and gives him title. Normally one would consider the veteran is free to do with his property what anyone else would do with property acquired under a similar transaction. However, I can say that the matter is one of concern and consideration; but beyond that I have nothing to say.

Mr. Harkness: You have no answer to it yet, do you mean?

Mr. Noseworthy: Has the minister any information regarding the number of times that veterans who cannot buy their houses are asked to move, in this process of selling veterans' houses? My attention has been called to one or two cases where not only the first but the second house was sold, and the veteran had the idea that he had to keep on moving so long as the house he occupied was saleable. Is there any information on that point?

Mr. Winters: The instances concerning which we have immediate knowledge are very few. There are not more than two or three such instances. We would have to search the records for an accurate number. Anyway it is a very small number, indeed.

Mr. Knowles: Only two or three instances where the same veteran has had to move twice? Is that what the minister means? Surely there are more cases than that where the veteran has had to move because the house has been sold.

Mr. Winters: Two or three instances where he has been obliged to move once, and then the house to which he moved has been sold. I understood that was the nature of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Johnston: One case in particular in connection with the sale of veterans wartime housing in Calgary has come to my attention. I took this up with the government and I must say a very satisfactory settlement was made.

In general the complaint was that some of these veterans have been living in wartime housing the government decided should be sold. It now appears that some agents are coming to veterans who moved into these houses and are telling them that unless they are prepared to buy them right away they will be kicked out on the street. Those are the words that were used.

I understand that is not the policy of the department. It is my understanding that if these people cannot buy the houses in which they are living, they are not to be kicked out. In the case I brought to the minister's attention it worked out so that these people, after having been informed they were going to be kicked out if they did not buy the place, are now assured that they are going to be able to live in that house. I think there should be some regulation governing the attitude of the inspectors who go around to the veterans giving them such information. It not only instils a great deal of fear in the people who are living in these houses but it gives the department a bad name because in these cases the department itself must take that responsibility. Is there anything being done by the department to notify these people now living in wartime houses, and who cannot possibly raise the down payment—I think it is 10 per cent—that they are not going to be kicked out, that they do not need to worry, and that as time goes on they will be given every opportunity to purchase the house if they can raise the down payment? It would certainly do a lot to relieve the anxiety of some of these people living in these houses.

Mr. Winters: I think that question was dealt with in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Calgary East. I know of no instance in which a veteran was told that if he did not buy the house he would be kicked out.

Mr. Johnston: I drew a case to the attention of the department.

Mr. Winters: We have been informed at various times that people dealing with the sales program have been harsh in their language, and on investigation we have always found that they have never been quite as harsh as had been represented to us. Nevertheless in all instances Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been very anxious that there shall be none of that aggressive approach to the problem. They have cautioned their people. They have emphasized the element of good will, and I believe in the over-all picture they have been successful in achieving pretty good public relations.

Mr. Johnston: I want to assure the minister that I was not misrepresenting the case. I took it up with his parliamentary assistant and it was very satisfactorily settled.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can the minister tell me whether they have made any study in the city of St. John's with regard to housing needs?

Mr. Winters: The problem in St. John's is well known to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. They have been over it a great many times with the Hon. Mr. Vardy, minister without portfolio in the Newfoundland government, who is responsible for housing. The local Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation officials are fully familiar with it, and I think that in brief the question can be answered in the affirmative.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Mr. Noseworthy: I did not get the minister's answer to my question. How many veterans have had to move once because the houses they occupied were being sold, and how many veterans have had to move more than once because the second houses were sold?

Mr. Winters: The answer is something that I can get only after having the records searched. We would not have the information available at the present moment. Would the hon. member be satisfied if I give him that information on a subsequent occasion?

Mr. Noseworthy: Thank you.

Mr. Blackmore: I have not been able to be present during the discussion, and I trust I shall not be repeating. However, so far as I can see, we seem to have got ourselves into a dead end street here and there in discussing the matter of housing and finding a solution. One of the difficulties appears to be that some provinces are hesitant about entering into agreements. Could the minister give the committee some sort of idea as to what seems to be the main reason or reasons why the provinces hesitate to enter into these agreements? It is granted that they realize that housing is their responsibility and that they are anxious to improve housing. The provinces must be just as anxious to improve housing conditions as anybody could be, and the same must be true of the municipal authorities. What seems to be the difficulty in the way?

Mr. Winters: I think perhaps the various provinces approach the problem in various ways. I of course would not presume to speak for them or to represent to this house what they regard their difficulties to be. I would imagine the hon. member has in mind particularly the province of Alberta. They are one of the provinces that did not pass complementary legislation to enable them to enter into arrangements under section 35 of the National Housing Act. We have had some discussions with them about participation under the act. They have their own views on how housing should be developed and what steps should be taken with respect to it. I certainly believe they have honest views. There is no question on that point, but the fact of the matter is that until recently they have not taken steps to qualify themselves for participation under section 35. Recently they did indicate an interest, and we told them that we would be very happy to receive specific proposals from them. However, I would imagine that before they can participate they would have to do something about their legislation.

Mr. Blackmore: There is no general statement that could apply to the majority of the provinces?

Mr. Winters: No.

Mr. Blackmore: They do not tell the minister they are afraid to take hold of the thing for fear they will be unable to finance it?

Mr. Winters: No, there has been no such general statement.

Mr. Blackmore: It seems to me in listening to the discussion and attending to it as far as I have been able to be in attendance—and I should like to congratulate the minister on the hopeful attitude he manifested in his original statement—that we are confronted with certain frustrations in our efforts to provide the housing that everybody desires to provide in this country. The first one is the indisposition of a number of provinces to enter into mutual arrangements satisfactory to the dominion government. Unless we can find out what it is that is deterring the provinces, it appears that this will continue to be a cause of frustration. Even after we find out what is the matter, we shall have to find some way to meet the difficulties with which the provinces are confronted.

The next question that seems to have developed before us is that the mortgage companies are hesitant about lending very freely in connection with the building of houses. I can understand why that should be. If taxation continues to grow, as was indicated very well by the hon. member for York West, certainly no prudent organization would risk very much capital in communities where taxation is going to increase as rapidly as it has been increasing. I know that in the community in which I dwell, which is an ordinary small town with about 2,500 of population, the taxation rate has become so great that people simply cannot support the taxation. Nevertheless there does not seem to be anything that the community can avoid. They say: We have got to have schools and we have to have certain other facilities. The demands for these are increasing and we just simply cannot avoid the expense involved. We simply have got to raise the taxation. Those who are charged with responsibility, school boards and other municipal officials, say: Heaven only knows where this thing is going to end. It seems to be getting worse. Therefore we are confronted with a problem which I presume is general throughout the dominion.

It is not likely that the mortgage companies will be more willing to lend money in future than they are now; in fact from the standpoint of ordinary reasoning it would appear that they will become less willing to risk their money. Can the minister see anything we might do to overcome the necessity of having the mortgage companies lend this money? For example, from the standpoint of plain, ordinary common sense I cannot see why in the world we could not use the Bank of Canada to lend money so people would have what they needed, at rates no higher than 2½ per cent. Can the minister see any reason why that should not be done? It just seems grotesque, does it not, that a nation like this should be prevented from developing adequate housing for its people simply because the mortgage companies dare not lend the money necessary? It is almost impossible to be reconciled to a situation so unreasonable. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says the mortgage companies do not want to lend money. I do not blame them. I wager that if the hon. member had at his disposal all the facilities of an ordinary mortgage company, with all the responsibilities that rest upon it, he would not lend money either. What is the use of putting money into houses on which enormous taxation will be imposed, with the danger of losing those houses to the municipalities? Just common sense prudence, which I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is endowed with, would tell him not to do that.

Mr. Knowles: If I were head of a mortgage company I would not be the member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Blackmore: That is not answering the question. I have the highest admiration for the hon. member, but we must be realistic in these matters. He speaks as though it were in some manner reprehensible on the part of the mortgage companies that they hesitate to lend money. I do not look upon it in that way at all. The mortgage companies have money in trust, and it is their business to lend money to make money in order to discharge their responsibilities. Certainly no one with any responsibility at all will lend money when there is every chance of not being able to make money, and where in many cases it is likely they will not be able to get the money back, and may lose the whole thing.

This problem must be overcome. I am sure the minister can see there is a problem which amounts almost to complete frustration. I should like to know whether he has given any thought to what he can do about it. If he finds that he simply cannot overcome this difficulty let him come in and announce that fact frankly to the house, so hon. members may participate freely in a discussion as to the best way out of the difficulty. Surely there is a way out. We have the ability to build houses in Canada. We can produce the necessary goods and materials, and we have the skilled men. I would like the minister to give this question some attention and give the house his reaction. We have two problems. One is the indisposition of the provincial and municipal authorities to participate, and the other is the indisposition of the lending companies to loan the necessary money. That indisposition is completely understandable, and in my opinion no way reprehensible.

Mr. Knowles: Every dollar they loan is guaranteed by the government. They do not lose a cent.

Mr. Blackmore: Then how do you account for their indisposition to lend?

Mr. Knowles: Because they want to make more money.

Mr. Blackmore: I am quite willing to undertake an argument with my hon. friends; I have never sidestepped a fight with the socialists in this house, but if the people whose business is lending money to make money are hesitating in doing so, there must be some good reason. Either they cannot make the money, or they have not a reasonably good chance of making it. I do not want to become involved in a lengthy discussion of that aspect of the problem. The simple fact is that if the mortgage companies are unwilling to lend money there is no conceivable reason why we should not use the Bank of Canada to make these loans. That is all there should be to it. If the minister is unwilling to risk using the Bank of Canada there must be something wrong with the minister or with the men who are with him in the cabinet. It is simply idle for us to come here year after year, as we have done since we started grappling with this problem after the war, and wring our silly hands and say this is a problem that cannot be solved. We are 261 men and a fine, effective woman; yet we sit here year after year doing nothing effectively to meet the problem.

I do not say we are not building houses; but it has been recognized quite definitely that we are not building them anywhere quickly enough. The minister and everyone else must recognize that. Well, if we are not building houses quickly enough what is to be done about it? It is not that we do not have the material or the desire on the part of the people. Certainly we have the skill to enable us to build houses, and those are the three determining factors which should govern. We have all the things that are necessary except the disposition to use the facilities that are at our disposal. If that is not the case let someone prove it. I think I can safely challenge anyone to prove that is not so, as I believe I can challenge anybody to show that we cannot use the Bank of Canada to build houses in Canada.

The next difficulty appears to be that we are running into shortages of material. I will grant that as the danger of war develops we may require more and more construction for military purposes, and we are likely to run out of certain materials. But has the minister canvassed the possibility of using certain kinds of soil in the construction of houses? I understand that this has been done successfully in Germany and other parts of the world. This may sound a bit crude, but when my folks came to Canada, and before that, we were building sod shacks, which were called "soddies". For the first six or seven years of my life I lived in a cabin with a sod roof and with the spaces between the logs of the walls daubed with mud. Let no one imagine I am advocating that we should have people living in log houses with the spaces daubed and the roofs covered with sod, but we would be far better off if thousands of people in this country could have houses even as good as that, and be sure they would not be kicked into the street. But we are not disposed to help them build such shelter; we are disposed to let our people go on suffering. Hundreds of thousands of people in this country today have no assurance that they will have a roof over their heads next year. Sometimes it is because they have children, and people who are renting houses do not want children in them. In most cases the people needing houses simply cannot pay the heavy cost of available housing, houses valued at $8,000 or $9,000. Are these people to be left without housing? Is there any reason why we cannot provide them with some kind of houses?

Now, then, has the minister done anything about probing into the possibilities of using other materials? I think I shall stop now before I have too many questions for the minister to deal with. I shall just summarize those three. The first one is, is there anything we can possibly do to enable the provinces to enter into these agreements? Might I say this, that I think the average provincial government realizes that if the cost of municipal government in the province goes on increasing at the rate it is now doing —and there seems no way of overcoming that increase—then the province simply will never be able to finance the building of the houses necessary within the province. I shall wager that that is ninety-five per cent of the reason for the provinces hesitating about getting into the housing problem. Now that is the first question.

If that is the case, then obviously it is a financial matter again, is it not? No province has the ability to increase its financial revenues by a dollar, except by the development of industry within that province. It is absolutely limited in the matter of revenue, to its ability to raise money from its people by taxation. It must have assistance from some source, which can resort to other measures, if it is going to be able to enter into the housing business.

The second question concerned the matter of lending money. I should like to have the minister tell us what has been done in respect of securing an alternative to the mortgage company. If nothing has been done, why has it not been done? We are going on year after year doing nothing about it.

The third question is, What has the minister been doing in regard to materials so as to enable us to use soils, if need be, so the people can have houses they can depend upon? Will the minister deal with those three problems?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the first question about what we can do to induce the provinces to participate under section 35, I think all I can say is substantially what I said before. We have told them collectively and separately that we would be glad to entertain specific proposals from them. Our legislation is clear. I believe it is understood by the provinces. Again, all I can say is that it is there if they wish to use it.

With respect to the second matter, the availability of mortgage money, in a detailed sense that of course is beyond my scope. It is something I would normally expect the Minister of Finance to deal with. The fact of the matter is that at the present moment the availability of materials for housing, and the availability of mortgage money to build houses, are pretty well in balance. The shortage of mortgage money was going to have an adverse effect on housing, in fact the mortgage companies had just about withdrawn from operations. We felt obliged, in the interests of the Canadian public, to take these steps which we think will keep the housing act alive, even though it means a slightly higher interest rate to the borrower.

When I mention the matter of materials, it brings me to the hon. member's third question as to what we are doing about finding materials that might be suitable for housing. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has a research section which works very closely with the national research council on matters of materials. They are finding substitutes all the time, and approving them for one purpose or another. They are not a matter of great public knowledge, but the fact is that some progress is being made all the time in the matter of new materials and improved materials for housing.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the minister's answers. But the minister's answers, all members of the house will agree, amount simply to this. We face complete frustration on each and every one of those three points. There is not anything we can do about removing any one of these three difficulties in our endeavour to provide housing for this nation.

Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to grant that the minister is not to blame for any one of these three problems. But if the members of this house are going to face this thing like grown people, with realism, they have got to do something to help the minister. This is especially true of the members of the Liberal party. If they are going to discharge their responsibility to this nation, they have to do something about it.

Obviously, the facilities are at their disposal if they choose to use them. With respect to materials, the minister said we are conducting research and are making some progress here and there. My question is, why are we not getting the houses? I am sure the member for Spadina was not extreme when he pointed out we are not getting nearly enough houses. But what are we going to do about it? I believe that the discussion we have had this afternoon and tonight has indicated that just about one-third—I would not be surprised if we could say more than that, just about one-half—of the people in Canada simply cannot afford the housing which is being offered under the housing act. Look how serious that is. That means virtually all the people who really need houses cannot get them. Are we not going to do anything about this matter?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Talk about it.

Mr. Blackmore: That is right, the Liberals are.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You have been repeating the same thing for the last half hour.

Mr. Blackmore: That is just about what the minister has been doing. He certainly has been repeating frustration.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You have not spoken about debt-free money yet.

Mr. Blackmore: That is right, and speaking of debt-free money in the presence of some members reminds me of one of the passages in the scripture, "cast not your pearls. . . . " I ask the Minister of Public Works to get up and tell us what to do about it. It is all very well for him—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You never sit down long enough for me to make a statement.

Mr. Blackmore: I have been sitting down. I have not spoken today until now. I have listened nearly all afternoon. At a time when people are simply groaning under the burden of inadequate housing in this country, here we are going to finish this discussion once more apparently with nothing done. That is all there is to it. The interest rate is raised, and the government's aggregate assistance to the people who would build has been cut down.

Mr. Lesage: Write to your friends in the government of Alberta to do their share, and everything will be all right.

Mr. Blackmore: The government of Alberta can show the whole Dominion of Canada a mighty fine record—

Mr. Lesage: They are not coming under section 35.

Mr. Blackmore: If the hon. member wants to have a discussion on the matter of Alberta I shall give him the opportunity and make him look like two cents. This sort of silly, flippant, idiotic remark about the government of Alberta is just an example of general Liberal irresponsibility. It is irresponsible to make a general statement like that. It is made so the press will pick it up and make it look as if something was said. After all, the something that was said demonstrated that there was "nobody home" in the head of the speaker.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one more thing and that is this—I am not repeating nearly as much as the Minister of Public Works would have it appear. The ordinary individual who wants to build himself a home—a modest little home, one that he can afford—today has no facilities whereby he can do so. Throughout this country there are great numbers of people who build their own homes just as men used to build their own sod shacks and their own log houses. They would build their own homes and they would learn how to do the building readily if they could only get a loan and get the material with which to build the homes. To tell us in Canada that materials of the kind are not available is to be absolutely unrealistic; and every member of this committee knows that right well. There certainly are in this country materials which can be used for building; and the people, generally speaking, would use those materials and build the houses, if they could get the money with which to buy the materials. But we will not let them have the money because we say we have got to get it all from the mortgage companies and that we cannot lend it to them except under certain circumstances. We therefore have to go on facing complete frustration.

I do not propose to say any more about this matter just at the present time, Mr. Chairman. If the people throughout the country could realize and know how many times during the last hour and a half we have had from the Liberals all over the place calls of "carried, carried", and could realize how completely that indicates the utter indisposition on the part of those members to find a solution for the problem, I do not know what they would do. I suppose they would go and elect a Liberal government right away again, because they would not have any alternative.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blackmore: They would have no alternative—I suppose I shall be out of order—because the Conservative party which faces them has exactly the same policy as the Liberals have, and the same ideas. There is not the slightest difference in the world.

Mr. Harkness: Say not so.

Mr. Blackmore: One does not have to say it. We are listening to it all the time. To say that there is no alternative as far as the Conservatives are concerned is quite obvious, and does not need to be said.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: All right, Mr. Chairman. I just wish to make this point. If people could realize how completely irresponsible the great, big, overwhelming Liberal party is in this house with respect to this matter of building houses, they would be astounded.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It appears to me that the remarks being made by the hon. member are not relevant to the item under discussion.

Mr. Blackmore: I can be relevant, Mr. Chairman, if relevancy is all that is necessary. I can speak right on this matter I am talking about, and I can say plenty more. The great question is this: When the members of the House of Commons go back to their constituencies, they will simply have to tell the people that nothing is to be done for housing.

An hon. Member: You take your chance.

Mr. Blackmore: Of course you take your chance. But the question is this: Will you get the houses? That is the thing that counts. Will you give the people that chance to have housing? The answer that is given by the Liberals is: No, we do not need to. Let them suffer. We do not care. We will not suffer. We Liberal members of parliament will be able to have houses. What do we care about the poor fellows down under who are getting too small an income to enable them to get a home? We do not care a button about them. They do not amount to anything at all. That is just the attitude of the ordinary Liberal. That is just exactly his attitude.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Blackmore: That is the attitude.

An hon. Member: Oh, no, it is not.

Mr. Blackmore: The general attitude will be this: they will have to take it or leave it; we do not care.

An hon. Member: Oh, no, it is not.

Mr. Blackmore: Oh, yes, it is.

The Deputy Chairman: I shall have to ask the hon. member not to discuss what he considers to be the attitude of other members of the House of Commons. He must discuss housing.

Mr. Blackmore: I am certainly discussing housing from the standpoint of about 45 per cent of all the people in Canada who find housing completely beyond their reach. The number of people in every community in this country who are wondering how in the world they are going to be able to afford housing is sufficiently large to constitute a complete scandal in this nation. I refer to the people who are called upon to pay $75, $80 or $90 for an apartment, when the cost of that living apartment likely uses up more than half of their total income. They must have housing. They have no alternative. That is a serious problem.

The point is that up until the present time this parliament has not done anything effective about the matter of housing. It chooses to leave at least forty per cent of the total population of Canada with inadequate housing and to indicate to the country that it is not ready to do a thing about it. No matter what facilities may be available to it with which to do something about it, it refuses to use those facilities. It chooses to let forty per cent of the people go with inadequate housing.

That is all, Mr. Chairman. If that is not enough to fill with shame all the men who have responsibility in this parliament, then all I can say is that they just are not qualified to appreciate reality at all.

Mr. Noseworthy: Following up the discussion we have just heard, may I say that I notice by this report of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that last year the corporation made 476 loans directly for the building of non-farm homes and 3 loans for the building of farm homes. I should like to know just what is the policy of the corporation with regard to the making of direct loans, both urban and rural, and just why it is that there were only three farmers in Canada last year who obtained loans from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Winters: The reason there were only three loans to farmers is that there were only three applications.

Mr. Noseworthy: What is the policy with regard to direct loans? I refer to non-farm loans.

Mr. Winters: The whole policy underlying direct loans is that they will be made in outlying areas where lending institutions do not normally operate.

Mr. Ferguson: Am I led to believe that if farmers made application they would get a loan if everything was found to be correct, and that the only reason that only three farm loans were made is that only three applications were made? Were there not any made, of which some were turned down? It is quite surprising that only three applications were made, and that all three were granted, from all the farmers of Canada. Is that correct?

Mr. Winters: To the best of my knowledge and to the best of the recollection of the officials of the corporation, that is correct.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What item is the chairman calling?

The Deputy Chairman: It was agreed that, instead of item 383, departmental administration, we would discuss the items relating to housing which are items 427 and 565. Item 565 has reference to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Item 427 is the one dealing with emergency shelter administration. Both of those items have been discussed and carried. We will now revert to item 383.

383. Departmental administration, $381,223.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I do not know whether the minister wishes to proceed with this matter tonight. It has been the practice to have a general discussion on the first item, that of administration. The minister's department is an important one, which is asking in the estimates for more than $35 million. There are very many headings. I do not know of any of them that is as important as the one that was discussed all day and all night, namely, the item of housing.

When the department was organized with the minister in charge we in Nova Scotia and eastern Canada expected a good deal from him and from the department. As one Nova Scotian to another I say to him that I want to see him succeed in his effort and to make a success of his department. But there is a feeling in Nova Scotia that very little progress has been made in the activities that have been assigned to this department. I have a few items here such as the Chignecto canal and cheaper power for our part of the province. I doubt whether the minister has made an inspection of the Chignecto canal and whether he gave support to its construction when a very large delegation came here. It was rather enlightening to see the interest which the Minister of Transport took in the proposed St. Lawrence seaway. He accompanied a large delegation over the St. Lawrence river inspecting that part of the river in which the seaway is proposed to be built at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars, and perhaps a billion dollars, which would give cheap power to central Canada when constructed. I do not say that I am opposed to that expenditure, but I would expect some compensating expenditures in my part of the country.

I should like to refer to the St. Mary's tidal power project, which was discussed in this house some sessions ago. The minister gave it his blessing at that time and said that he would see that it was investigated. Ever since that time we have been waiting for a report from the minister. It would create about two million horsepower or more and it would give us cheap power in eastern Canada. While they have cheap power and are looking for still cheaper power in central Canada we have had to meet increased costs of electric power in my part of Canada. The cost of power in that part of the country has increased by as much as one-third, 25 per cent and so on.

During the discussion of his estimates I should like the minister to make a statement on the results of the investigations of the St. Mary's tidal power project at the head of the bay of Fundy. If it could be constructed it would be very important to eastern Canada, and probably would warrant the electric smelting of the enormous tonnage of iron ore which will be produced in Labrador and which it is expected will be shipped largely to the United States centres.

We have also been disappointed with the progress made in the construction of the bridge over the strait of Canso. While this matter may not come directly under the minister's department, it has to do with resources and development. I presume he is working in close conjunction with the Minister of Transport and the government.

We have also been disappointed in the building and putting into service of the ferry steamship from Nova Scotia to Maine. We have had that promised to us and it has been delayed. Eastern Canada, and especially Nova Scotia, have every reason to be disappointed. There is also the question of the trans-Canada highway which we shall discuss in some detail when the item is called. We were assured that there would be large expenditures long before this in the construction of a trans-Canada highway which would give direct service to every part of Canada by the shortest practical route. In Nova Scotia nothing has been done up to the present. We shall get a further explanation from the minister. Perhaps he will make a general statement on that item when it is called, but anyway we shall expect direct information from him.

In Nova Scotia we have also been disappointed that no headway apparently has been made with the construction of the Blomidon national park. We were given assurance, perhaps not by the minister, but by his predecessor, that headway was being made in building this park.

Another important subject which has to do with resources and development is railway freight rates. I should like to have a general statement from the minister with respect to that as it relates to Nova Scotia. We are not satisfied with the situation there at the present time.

I shall refer to one other item before eleven o'clock, namely, the dispersal of industry and the construction of defence industries in the maritime provinces and the desirability of dispersing these large plants in this country. During the discussion of building houses it was pointed out how difficult it is, in fact almost impossible, to supply housing in the large centres of central Canada to accommodate the workmen required in those centres where as much as $100 million is being expended in a single constituency, which is more than is being expended in all of the maritime provinces under this heading.

As opposed to the dispersal of industry, people from central Canada are going to Nova Scotia and eastern Canada all the time draining off our workmen. Just a few days ago a large mining concern from central Canada asked for 1,000 men from Nova Scotia, labourers, to supplement the 2,000 that they had already procured in Nova Scotia. That is just one instance. There have been scores of them. Scores of industries are drawing labour from the maritime provinces, and particularly from Nova Scotia, where industries of our own should be established under this heading with the assistance and encouragement of the government.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will go into supply and continue with consideration of the estimates of resources and development, and then take up the departments of fisheries, and mines and technical surveys.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT

Housing—

427. Emergency shelter administration, $250,000.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—

565. To provide for advances to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the acquisition of land, the installation of services and improvements in respect thereof, the purchase of building materials and the construction or conversion of housing projects for veterans and for residents of Deep River, Ontario, under the authority of section 34 of the National Housing Act, 1944, $12,700,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE IN MONTREAL "GAZETTE" TO BANNING OF MAYORS AND REEVES AS MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of public importance and a question of personal privilege. It has to do with a report appearing on page 11 of today's issue of the Montreal Gazette in which the banning of mayors and reeves as members of parliament is urged. I happen to be one. This suggestion comes from none other than the somewhat bewildered member for Assiniboia. He would deprive the electors of the right to elect or select people of their choice. He would proceed to use his dictatorial power to take away their democratic rights.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Presenting reports by standing and select committees.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SOUND-AMPLIFICATION —CONCURRENCE IN REPORT OF STRIKING COMMITTEE

Mr. L. D. Tremblay (Dorchester) presented the report of the special committee to consider the question of a proposed amplification system for the House of Commons as follows:

The special committee appointed to confer with Mr. Speaker and with his assistance to prepare and report a list of members to compose a select committee of the house to consider with Mr. Speaker the matter of an amplification system for this house, begs leave to submit its report.

Your committee recommends that the said select committee will be composed, together with Mr. Speaker, of the following members: Messrs. Adamson, Bourget, Browne (St. John's West), Dumas, Graydon, Low, MacInnis, Robinson, Smith (York North), Stuart (Charlotte), and Viau.

The committee further recommends that five members will constitute a quorum of the said committee, and that the said committee should have power to sit when the house is sitting.

All of which is respectfully submitted

Mr. Tremblay moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PENSIONS

DEFENCE SERVICES—PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF PERSONNEL TRANSFERRING FROM ONE ARMED SERVICE TO ANOTHER

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to table copies, in English and in French, of an order in council passed yesterday under the Emergency Powers Act to provide that warrant officers, non-commissioned officers or men who are granted commissions, who leave one of the services for the purpose of joining another of the services, and therefore under the text of the Defence Services Pension Act become discharged, will not have their defence pensions interfered with by their so doing.

There are about 170 whom it is necessary to promote to special temporary commissions for the proper functioning of this special brigade which is being organized. Under the act the taking of those temporary special commissions would terminate their right under the Defence Services Pension Act; their contributions would have to be returned to them, and that would involve complications when their temporary commissions expire.

This is one of the provisions to be made in the bill with respect to which there is a resolution on the order paper as No. 11. We had hoped that that bill would be reached and passed in time to take care of this, but we are told that the delay in commissioning these 170 men is a serious inconvenience in the organization of the special force. For that reason, because of the urgency of the matter and the fact that it may be a couple of weeks before this statute could be passed and receive royal assent, the order in council has been passed so the commissioning may be done immediately.

Mr. Pearkes: Would the Prime Minister say whether any of these men have already reached Korea?

Mr. St. Laurent: This is not required with respect to the 25th brigade; it is with respect to the 27th brigade, which is now being organized.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 371, for the relief of Dorothy Chaffee Caduc.—Mr. Winkler.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MORNING SITTINGS ON AND AFTER MONDAY, JUNE 11

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday, June 11, 1951, until the end of the session, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning of each sitting day and that, in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock p.m., there shall also be an intermission every day from 1 to 3 o'clock p.m.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that at this stage of the session there will be a tendency on the part of hon. members to support this motion, which has become customary at this time of the year. But I suggest that this is an appropriate occasion to review what has happened during the present session which calls for a motion of this kind, at this time, particularly in relation to the announcement made a few days ago that it is the intention to adjourn the present session until October and then, having met, prorogue for the purpose of having a second session this year.

When the announcement was made a few days ago I urged the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to reconsider his statement—and it must be recalled that it was simply an announcement at that time. I did so in view of the fact that in the opinion of a number of members the legislation now before the house should be dealt with before this house rises. The explanation was given that it was desirable to defer consideration of the old age pension legislation until later this year. When that announcement was made, I said, and I repeat today, that I believe there are many strong reasons why that legislation should be dealt with before this house rises even for adjournment.

The passing of the old age pension legislation is not going to take very long. The members of this house have already indicated their desire to proceed with it as rapidly as possible. That was indicated in statements made earlier in the session. It was also indicated very clearly by the manner in which this house adopted, without debate and with every sign of unanimous approval, the request to Westminster for an amendment to the British North America Act.

Since the legislation dealing with universal pensions at seventy and over and the special legislation dealing with pensions from sixty-five to sixty-nine inclusive has met with agreement on the part of members of this house, I feel certain, and I am sure there is confidence in the minds of hon. members, that such legislation would be facilitated in every way. I can see no reason why that legislation should not be dealt with in one day, or in two days at the very outside. Therefore I see no reason why that legislation should not be dealt with before we rise for the summer.

I am not overlooking the explanation by the Prime Minister that the same plan might not be proposed were it not for the fact that other legislation requires consideration. He indicated that it was desirable to carry into effect by legislation those recommendations in the report of the transportation commission which the government is prepared to accept, and also indicated that it might be desirable this year to introduce legislation to implement some of the recommendations of the Massey commission.

So far as the recommendations of the transport commission are concerned, I concede that there will certainly not be complete unanimity in regard to the statutory interpretation of those recommendations. The same attitude will probably not be demonstrated as will be found when we are dealing with the recommendations in connection with the old age pension legislation. Nevertheless I am sure that if there is sufficient advance notice of what the legislation is intended to be, the members of this house will deal promptly and with very clear thought as to what they wish to have enacted into law when that legislation comes forward. That would not take very long, provided that hon. members have an opportunity in advance to consider the legislation. If the house is only adjourned for the summer, then it is possible, by agreement, to provide copies of the proposed legislation to hon. members and they would have a chance to consider it before we return here to examine it in the ordinary way in the house.

So far as the Massey commission report is concerned, I think that hon. members who have already read the report, or even have merely glanced through it, will realize that most of the recommendations are such that it will take some time to implement them. In any event, there are certain specific recommendations, one with regard to grants to universities and other specialized branches of education, and another with regard to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which obviously call for consideration, either within the next few days or at any rate certainly by the beginning of next year.

So far as grants to universities are concerned, I submit that all that the Massey report has done is to confirm the opinion that has been expressed here over and over again, that grants should be made to assist the universities without delay, if our higher education is not to suffer. That being so—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: That being so, then it should be possible—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest to the leader of the opposition that the legislation should not be discussed at this time, nor should the reports of the Massey or transportation commission.

Mr. Drew: I have placed before the house certain reasons why I believe the business of the house can be so facilitated as not to require a second session of parliament, where we would have a new speech from the throne and an extended debate, with time consumed in discussing matters which could well await the beginning of a regular session at the first of next year.

I come now to the necessity for a motion of this kind, a necessity which presents itself year after year. I know that members of the government do not welcome a statement along these lines, because it has been made before. The reason why we are going to be asked to sit at eleven o'clock every day and to sit every night—we are not opposing it, because we face a situation which has been forced upon us—is that there has been no direction of the business of this house from the day the house met at the beginning of this year. There has been no planning of the debates of this house. We have estimates brought up, they continue for a short time in debate, then that is stopped and they are revived some time later when a completely new debate starts. At the present time there are several departments which have been called, have been debated, then have been debated again after a short time, and will be brought before the house again.

I am quite prepared to concede that it has never been the practice in this house to follow the practice with regard to agreed schedule of debate which has been accepted at Westminster. One reason why we do not even approximate anything of that kind, one reason why members have no way of knowing in advance when any debate is to come forward, is that there is no attempt to plan in advance when important debates will come on. At Westminster—and, after all, we have patterned our course largely on their practice—they know a week or two weeks in advance when a debate is going to take place on any subject of major importance. The members are then able to plan their time accordingly. Members of this house certainly have demonstrated the fact that it is necessary for them to be away on a number of occasions, on duties that undoubtedly are connected with their service here; but when it is necessary for them to be away from the house on those duties it is also desirable that they be able to plan such other appointments with some knowledge of when debates will take place.

We could have disposed of all the business of this house before this time, and no such motion as this would now be necessary if there were some knowledge of when debates were going to come on. I know that it can easily be said that there are so many speeches made in the debate on the speech from the throne and on the budget, but one reason why many of those speeches are made is that there is a cynical certainty in the minds of many members of this house that the government is going to defer a lot of important items until the last, so that the very inconvenience of members may make it possible to rush through those items.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: It is all very well for members on the other side who do not like a remark of that kind, and who make noises that do not find their way into Hansard, to pretend that they do not think that is so. But I know that most of them do think it is so, because they have said so to me in discussion from time to time. Every member of this house knows perfectly well that many items of great importance are kept until the end of the session so that the very pressure of the warm days that come in the month of June is likely to make it possible to hasten discussion on what otherwise might be at some times embarrassing subjects.

So far as this motion is concerned, this house can within the next few weeks do a great deal more business than will otherwise be done if the government is prepared to indicate the sequence in which it proposes to take up business, not one day ahead, not two days ahead, but a week or two weeks ahead. If that is done, members will know that they are going to have the opportunity to discuss a particular subject, and the business of this house will be facilitated.

On this motion we find the only appropriate opportunity to discuss the suggestions that have been made in regard to furthering the business of this house. I submit that there is no occasion for a second session this year. Members of this house—

An hon. Member: You did not say that before.

Mr. Drew: In answer to a remark that I hear from one government supporter that I did not say that before, I did say that before. I am simply repeating what I said when this announcement was made. The members of this house are by now fully aware of the fact that this proposal has been generally accepted by the press throughout Canada, and doubtless by the people who have read that press, as a device to increase the indemnity of the members.

Mr. Cruickshank: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I love to call the leader of the opposition to order. I have enough confidence in parliament and in my colleagues of all parties to believe—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member state his point of order?

Mr. Cruickshank: My point of order is this, Mr. Speaker. I do not think that the leader of the opposition meant, in all seriousness, the suggestion he made that we are here, irrespective of party, for what we can get out of it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, Hansard will show quite clearly what I said. What I said was that the members must be aware that the press across this country and those who read the press have drawn the conclusion—

An hon. Member: You read only Tory papers.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: —or have drawn the inference that this is a device for double indemnity. After all, I find an editorial in the Montreal Gazette—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: What about the Globe and Mail?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to refer to this paper, the Montreal Gazette, as one of the most responsible and most experienced publications in Canada. I see that on June 6 there was an editorial with the heading "A Case of Double Indemnity". Then in the Ottawa Journal—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Benidickson: The Toronto Telegram.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: In the Ottawa Journal of the same date I find an editorial under the heading: "Device for Higher Indemnities". Then in the Globe and Mail—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I must say that the attitude displayed by the government—and in this case I say the government because the hilarity greeting these references is being led by the members of the government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: That is not right.

Mr. Warren: The hon. member is too modest.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that I am patient and that I have no intention of being diverted, by the interruptions, from what I propose to say.

On the same day I find an editorial in the Globe and Mail under the heading "The $240,000,000 Question", and it deals with the same subject. Lest there should be any thought that I am confining my remarks only to eastern Canada, I would point out that in the Calgary Herald on May 29, much earlier than this, I find an editorial under the heading "Double Pay for Half the Effort".

Mr. Benidickson: Bring out the Toronto Telegram.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I said and I repeat that no matter what the intention may be, these and other papers—and they are not confined to those which have expressed any one political point of view—across this country have been interpreting this procedure as a device to have a double payment of indemnity simply by arranging for an adjournment and then having a second session.

I am prepared to support any proposal frankly placed before this house for the purpose of providing indemnities which will appropriately indemnify members who serve the various constituencies of Canada here in this House of Commons. But they should be discussed as indemnities and they should be paid as indemnities for a regular session each year. No matter what the intention may have been, at a time like this particularly we should not be left open, any one of us, to the suggestion that there has come from the government of Canada, at a time like this, a proposal that has as its purpose the payment of higher indemnities—

Mr. Cruickshank: Nonsense.

Mr. Drew: —under any device which does not state that that is the purpose.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Speaker, again I hate to rise on a point of order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Cruickshank: No, I will not sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: The leader of the opposition is imputing motives. When he says, as I understand he is, that he is expecting any indemnity to be duplicated, whether it is qualified for or not, he is imputing motives on the part of the government or on the part of private members.

Mr. Wylie: It is too bad there is not a resolution before us now.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: I come to the remarks that were made after the Prime Minister made this announcement a few days ago. I was interested to hear the comment afterwards—and when I say "afterwards", I mean in this house—that this recognized the fact that membership in the House of Commons is a full-time job. It is a full-time job of representation of a constituency. But it was never intended to be a full-time job here in Ottawa; and there is a reason why it should not be. It was never intended that the members of the parliament of this country should be something in the nature of elected civil servants. It was always intended—and that was the genius of our system—that persons elected to parliament who are actively engaged in many activities in this country would be spending a considerable part of the time with the people of their own constituencies, and that during only a part of the year they would be representing their people here in the House of Commons, with the advantage of that intimate and personal contact in their own ridings which is denied if the members are sitting here most of the time. If this is to become a full-time occupation—that is, here in Ottawa—then we might easily reach the point where only those who could give up any other occupation or who were amongst that increasingly small number who are able to live on their accumulated means—

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Tories.

Mr. Drew: —would be able to be candidates. They would be the only ones who could become candidates for election to this house. I suggest that the obvious reply to that might be that in the House of Commons in Great Britain the members are sitting there—with fairly extended adjournments, it is true —throughout the whole year. But you cannot compare the situation in a country the size of Canada with that in a country like Great Britain, where, week end after week end, the people can all get back to their homes with a fair measure of convenience.

Mr. Cruickshank: Like the members from Toronto.

Mr. Drew: Yes. It is suggested that the members from Toronto are in a favoured position.

Mr. Cruickshank: And from Guelph.

Mr. Drew: From Guelph, from Montreal and from Quebec. They are in a favoured position because they find it easier to get home, and an arrangement of this kind is particularly unfair to members from the maritime provinces, from the Pacific coast, and even from the Fraser valley.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: It is unfair to them because they are not able to move back and forth in the same way.

Mr. Cruickshank: We always come back, though.

Mr. Drew: The fact is that while this motion is being discussed is a good time to review the seriousness of the proposal that is being made, and its possible effect on the future of this House of Commons. If the members of this house are in fact to be called upon to sit throughout the best part of the year, as they have before, then many of them will have to revise their opinions as to their ability to carry on other occupations and serve their people with the continuing and intimate knowledge of the affairs of their own constituencies which over the years has been regarded as such an important part of the business of representing a constituency here in the Canadian House of Commons.

Mr. Cruickshank: Item carried.

Mr. Drew: I take this occasion, Mr. Speaker, to present these views in the hope that the Prime Minister will review the announcement he has made, and in the hope that the government will seek to plan the business of this house for the next few weeks so that we can deal with the old age pensions legislation, clean up the business, and then if necessary adjourn in order to meet for a short time to dispose of whatever other new business may come up in the meantime.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, as a member of a group that supported the Prime Minister's contention that another session was necessary this year I cannot sit here, in view of the speech which has just been made, without giving some of the reasons why we supported the arrangement that brings about the motion now before the house.

In my opinion the leader of the opposition was not facing facts in any of the statements that he made. He is well aware of the fact, as are other hon. members, that the business now before this house, namely, the committee work, the legislation on the order paper and all of the things that we have to handle, will keep us going night and day perhaps into July, without touching the different pieces of legislation that he mentioned specifically.

While listening to him I thought the matter over, and I think he considered very lightly the reports that have to come before the house sometime in the future. My conviction is that if we deal with all the legislation that he feels we should deal with we would not get it all through and give it the consideration to which it is entitled if we sat here until September. For example, my thinking on the old age pension problem has led me to believe that it is going to take more than a month or two months to finalize that particular piece of legislation. The legislation dealing with universal pensions at seventy by right and the legislation dealing with the age group sixty-five to sixty-nine will go forward at the same time. Every province in Canada, with the exception of Ontario and Quebec, will have to raise additional funds in order to give effect to that legislation, if they are to accept the proposition that is being put forward by the federal government. What does that mean? It means that it is going to be necessary to have a dominion-provincial conference to determine where the provinces who have not the additional finances necessary to meet the obligation are to get that money. You cannot hold a dominion-provincial conference between now and the end of June, and that is the fact of the matter. That is what has to take place.

Ontario and Quebec may be ready to go ahead with it. Unfortunately, too many people in this house think in terms of their own provinces. In my opinion the old age pension legislation cannot be finalized before the October session. If the leader of the opposition is as anxious as he makes out that the old age pensioners should receive that money with equality as between the provinces, then he will have to agree that the only way to bring it about is to allow sufficient time to do a reasonable job as it affects the country as a whole.

The leader of the opposition mentioned the Turgeon report. It consists of at least 500 pages, and deals with one of the most complicated problems in this country, namely, freight rates. The adoption of that report means that for a long time we will be setting up machinery with regard to freight rates that will affect the economy of this country for a long time to come. It will affect the eastern and western part of the country to the extent that they will be able to find markets at reasonable freight rates within the rest of the dominion. It is a report that requires a long and detailed examination, and we would not be able to give it that examination if we sat through until September.

It is not good enough merely to glance at this report. Every hon. member has the responsibility of analysing it, of going through the figures and ascertaining for himself how it will affect the people whom he represents in this house.

Then there is the Massey report. It is a very technical report. It suggests the setting of the culture of this country for the next fifty years. It is something we badly need. We have not any at this time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gillis: My hon. friends can laugh, but I will challenge anyone in this house to show me where we have any such recognized thing as Canadian culture—

Mr. Martin: In Sydney, Nova Scotia.

Mr. Gillis: —or Canadian literature, or Canadian art. When I have finished my speech some hon. member in this house can get up and point out where we have any—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps a discussion on that question may be reserved for a future occasion.

Mr. Gillis: As I was pointing out, the Massey report consists of 550 pages. It will take more than the average member of this house to analyse it. It is a job that has to be done by technicians, librarians, research people and other who are familiar with that field. You are not going to be able to do that by the end of June and give it the examination that it deserves.

Then there is the seaway project. A billion dollars of the taxpayers' money is to be spent on that. It is a project that will affect Canada as a whole in different ways from province to province. If hon. members are earnest about their responsibilities, this is a project which they should examine very carefully, to find out whether we would get back any return on the investment that Canadians would be asked to make. In the items and reports that I have mentioned there are long range plans for Canada, and they are plans which will take a full session of this house if a proper analysis is made of them.

In my opinion the leader of the opposition was pressured into the statement he made, by newspaper reports and newspaper editorials. I hope neither the leader of the opposition nor members of the government or any other members of the house will ever get into the state of mind where they are going to allow someone outside the house to mould their opinion on legislation for which the government has to take responsibility. My conception of the speech of the leader of the opposition was as I say, that he was pressured into that position by these newspaper reports. I do not think it is a responsible position for a person to take, especially one who at some time aspires to form a government in this country.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I do not often have occasion to take issue with the hon. member for Cape Breton South, but I do want to point out that I objected to this procedure before any of these editorials appeared. I made my position clear at that time.

Mr. Cruickshank: No excuses.

Mr. Gillis: I was merely commenting on the position taken by the leader of the opposition in the house today, and his argument about having read those newspaper reports.

The other point I wish to make is one I do not wish to discuss at length now, because some time I think there will be a full-dress debate on the subject. I refer to this job of being a member of parliament, and its being a full-time job. I recognized that in 1940. It has been a full-time job for me since I entered the House of Commons. I think of members of the house who accepted the position on the basis of what it was in 1939 or 1935—that it was a place where one could come for two or three months to get away from his business, have a rest and make a lot of business contacts. The member who does that now must make up his mind whether he will work here or work somewhere else. I am doing now what I think every member of this House of Commons should do; and any member who has not the time to come here and sit eight or nine months if necessary, to do the business of the House of Commons—well, my advice to him is to go back to his riding, attend to his business and allow someone else to come here who is more interested in the welfare of Canada than he is.

I have no illusions on this question. Some of my lawyer friends around—I can understand why they would want to get back home, and I do not want to get into a personal argument; but if they want to keep chirping in and disagreeing, I am prepared to make an analysis of that position.

I commend the government for the stand it has taken at this time. It is the first time since I entered the house in 1940 that I have known what I was doing. There are a lot of members sitting immediately to my right who do not know what they are doing even yet. It is the first time a prime minister of this country has advised members of the House of Commons, well in advance, that he was going to try to clean up the immediate business of the House of Commons that could be cleaned up, as soon as it could be done, and has indicated that a large amount of important legislation that could not be dealt with at this time, and given due consideration, was to be allowed to stand, and that we would be called back here for the purpose of dealing with that legislation.

It is the first time since I have been here that I have known that I am going home and that I can stay there until October, and that I will come back here in October. In my opinion it is a good development; and I think that instead of the criticism, recriminations and accusations based upon assumptions, suspicions and editorials, the Prime Minister should be commended upon his honest approach to this problem.

The monetary aspect of this matter I will not consider. I am not mercenary. I demonstated when I came to the House of Commons that I was prepared to come here for $4,000 a year. I am still working full time for what I am getting, and I will continue to work full time for what I am getting. I do not want to run home and sell any hardware or anything else. I am anxious to stay here, and I am prepared to do so. I am not concerned about the monetary aspect of the matter. I know that perhaps the fellow who wants to run home at the end of June and stay there until next January might be able to make $12,000. But that aspect of it does not concern me at all, and I do not think it concerns the people of Canada.

I would point out to the leader of the opposition, on this question of monetary returns, that members of the House of Commons, in terms of business office hours and the hours of industrial workers, are working twelve months in six. There is no other group of individuals in this country that works until eleven o'clock at night. The trade union movement from which I come would scorn the attitude we take in the House of Commons with regard to hours, social conditions and recreation. They do not ask their employees to work for peanuts, and they do not want them to work all night, either. The average trade union leader in this country today is paid twice as much money as the average member of parliament, and he has a full-time expense account. The worker in a mine, a steel plant, or a textile mill does not want to place his representative in such a position that he has to lose sleep and deprive himself of recreation, or stay in a cheap rooming house or a cheap hotel. He wants his representative to have the best.

There is one thing I am sure of, and that is that the people I represent will never say to the government: You are paying that member too much money. The story I have always got from my people is: "How do you get by on it?" That is the attitude they take. And I think that raising this monetary consideration, in a forum such as this, having regard to the position members of the House of Commons occupy, in one of the highest offices in the country that can be given, voluntarily, by the people in the ridings, is small potatoes. It certainly is not supported by the average Canadian citizen.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on record two reasons why the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) should be supported.

I have been surprised many times that there has not been some form of closure to cut out these long speeches, and so much repetition. I believe this motion will tend toward shorter speeches, fewer words, and greater thought.

The second reason why we should have morning sittings is that our volume of mail is nothing like it was in the last four months; therefore we have more time to sit in the mornings.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose any member of the house entertains any illusions as to what will be the effect of the adoption of this motion. We are working hard now, with committees meeting as they have been, and the long hours all of us are putting in. This motion will mean an increase in those hours and an increase in the work, and it will make it increasingly difficult, for opposition parties particularly, to man the committees, so many of which are sitting at the same time. Nevertheless, I think all of us are prepared to accept any reasonable expedient for pushing ahead the business of the house and doing as best we can the work we were sent here to do.

We shall not complain of long hours, fourteen hours a day, or of hard work as long as we have the satisfaction of doing the country's business. But I commend my leader with all my heart for having today brought into the realm of discussion in this debate some of the things that were said in the house on Monday last, June 4, concerning the duties of members of parliament, the proper length of sessions, the method of proper organization of the work of the house, and kindred questions.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, I had hoped on Monday to have the opportunity to comment on some of the things that were said in that discussion, and I claim the opportunity as a private member speaking for myself to do so now. On that occasion the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said, as reported at page 3668 of Hansard:

> The experience we have had over the last several years, particularly since the beginning of the war, clearly indicates that membership in this House of Commons can no longer be regarded as something in the nature of a sideline to a particular profession or business. Membership in the House of Commons today is a full-time position, and members must devote their entire time, sooner or later, to the business of the country.

Let those on the other side of the house who have been engaging in very noisy displays today indicate that they subscribe to sentiments of that kind, because those who have been noisiest in the chamber today will be the first to tell you outside the chamber that they are not here to spend twelve months a year sitting in this house.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Speak for yourself.

Mr. Coldwell: That is not what I meant.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member says that is not what he meant. I take his words as they stand and I say to members of this house that, in the light of the duties that are cast upon members, with long sessions, long hours and hard work, nobody can say that being a member of the House of Commons is a sideline for anybody in this house today. For anybody who takes his duties as a member of the house seriously, I defy anyone to say that his duties can be regarded, or are in their nature, or are regarded by any of us as a sideline to his particular calling in life. Any assertion of that kind just does not fit the facts.

Mr. Coldwell: Then it is a full-time job.

Mr. Fleming: No, it is not. There is a fine sample of the kind of fallacies with which the speech of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) abounded this afternoon, and I am going to deal with some of them.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said on Monday last: "Membership in the House of Commons today is a full-time position." I entirely refute that statement, and I say to the house that if the time ever comes when the house accepts the view that membership is a full-time position you will thereby automatically be closing the doors of public life, of public careers, to a great many people who cannot afford to take the risks and insecurity of public life. What does it mean? It means that the avenue of public service in the House of Commons will be open only to those who are possessed of independent means—

Mr. Rowe: Or are no good for anything else.

Mr. Fleming: —or those who somehow, by reason of not having family responsibilities, or not having—

Mr. Rowe: Any other job.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Fleming: This is realism. Membership in the House of Commons will be open only to those who are fortunate enough to be so independent financially that they can give twelve months a year full time to their work as members of parliament or to those who have no family responsibilities and can somehow get along on the somewhat meagre amount that is left out of the sessional indemnity after the expenses and cost of keeping up two establishments and the other financial burdens of public office are met. There is nothing that can be more anti-democratic in its conception than anything which will confine public life to people who are on the one hand possessed of independent means and are completely independent of any financial worries, or to those on the other hand who do not have the responsibilities that most of us have, and somehow can eke out an existence on what may be left out of the sessional indemnity.

Sir, the strength of democracy and the strength of this House of Commons is that there are in this house people drawn from all walks of life. Every aspect of Canadian life in every part of the country is represented in the house, and the strength of this House of Commons is to be measured also in terms of the sum total of the experience which 262 members sitting in the house bring to the discharge of their duties. That is the reason why the experience of members in this house, contributed through debates in the house, contributed through discussions in committees, is so vitally important to the functioning of democracy. If the time ever comes when members of parliament are expected to sever themselves entirely from their other callings and take these risks that go with public life, these risks to their whole economic future, then I say to you, sir, that we will have taken a retrograde step, and democracy in this country will pay for it.

What we must do in shaping the course of parliamentary affairs and parliamentary work in the future is to try to see to it that the doors of public life are not closed to people who, having family responsibilities and responsibilities in other respects, are nevertheless capable of making a most valuable contribution to public life in the House of Commons. If you shut off from public service people bearing these responsibilities, then make no mistake about it, democracy will pay the price in Canada.

How do we go about achieving that purpose? Let me say at once that I do not think the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) shares the point of view expressed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. It is true that the Prime Minister has never sat in the house as a private member, and he does not know from firsthand experience the problems that face private members. Naturally when one becomes a member of the government he gives his full time to his position, and the compensation is at least intended to bear some resemblance to full-time responsibility. But I think the Prime Minister has some knowledge of the difficulties faced by private members in trying to discharge their duties. I think he has an appreciation also of the importance of keeping the doors of public service open to people in all walks of life, regardless of their means.

I want to say this concerning the proposal to hold a second session. There is not one of us who relishes a protracted session into the summer with its heat; nevertheless I say to you, sir, that is preferable to coming back here in the fall to face a session then. Make no mistake about it. Experience cannot fail to be a sure guide. It should teach us that when we come back the debates will be longer than they would have been if we had continued into the summer. Nobody will relish sitting in July. Nevertheless I say that as between these two choices it is the preferable choice.

I go further and I say that, as to the broader problem of making public life, a public career or public service possible for people who have heavy responsibilities to bear outside this house, two sessions a year are no answer. Whether you pay one indemnity or whether you pay two, that is not the way to handle this problem. It is not a question of indemnity. It is not a question of two sessions a year, and I would not be speaking today if I were not prepared to make some concrete proposals that would enable—

Mr. Gillis: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: If the hon. member will not interrupt in the middle of a sentence, I shall be very glad to.

Mr. Gillis: It is hard to pick out your sentences.

Mr. Fleming: Whether or not the hon. member agrees with these remarks, as I have indicated I shall be glad to take his questions when I have finished the sentence or thought that I was just in the midst of expressing. I always welcome his questions and observations, as he well knows. But, Mr. Speaker, holding two sessions a year is not the way to meet this problem. I would not be speaking today unless I were prepared to make some concrete proposals with a view to meeting this problem, which is a problem for every member of this house, because I question very much whether many hon. members relish the idea of two sessions a year. We have had two sessions now for the last two years. This will make three years in a row. Once these things are begun they have a habit of sticking; and I am very much concerned over the effect that two sessions a year, carried on year after year, will have on the minds of many in this country who might otherwise be prepared to offer themselves as candidates for public office and who are capable of making a very effective contribution. Now I will be glad to answer my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Gillis: I was just wondering whether the hon. member could inform me if under the Ontario judicial system they have fall assizes.

Mr. Fleming: There are sittings of the Supreme Court of Ontario for ten months of the year, and I doubt very much if my hon. friend was unaware of that fact. If he possesses the fitness for public office which I have always considered him to possess I am sure he would know that simple and elementary fact without interposing such a question.

Mr. Gillis: The point I was making—

Mr. Fleming: I know the point you were making.

Mr. Gillis: —was that there might be a question of personal interest.

Mr. Fleming: Well, Mr. Speaker, that is a sample. I thought the hon. member would observe the rules that gentlemen in this house follow—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: —and would refrain from suggestions of that kind. If the problem of being away from home, from family and from other responsibilities for long periods of the year does not create difficulties for the hon. member I am sure it does for most people in this house. If it is a matter of self-interest to most of us in that we are separated from our families for long periods—and this applies to members from western Canada and the far east more than to most of us who come from central Canada—then I say there is self-interest in this for every member.

Therefore I say that the way to have the business of this house done without putting additional obstacles in the way of people giving themselves to public service and making a valuable contribution to this country is to so organize the business of the house that it can be done effectively, efficiently and within a proper time.

I said I would not be speaking today if I were not prepared to make some suggestions to that effect, and I do so because I believe the holding of two sessions a year is not the answer to the problem. The answer is to modernize our procedure and expedite our business so it can be done within a reasonable compass of time; and I am convinced that this is possible. I have some suggestions to offer. I do not pretend that these are the only suggestions that can be made, nor do I pretend that they are altogether new.

In the first place, I believe we can contribute greatly toward expediting the work of the house and the better transaction of our business if we revise the hours of sitting. It was common knowledge to those who were in the last house that the then prime minister, the late Mr. Mackenzie King, did not favour the idea of the house meeting earlier than three o'clock, p.m., under ordinary circumstances. It was hoped that when the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) took over he would consider this question of the hours of sitting and try, with the general co-operation of hon. members and the size of the following he has in this house, to introduce some sanity into the hours of sitting. Here we are, sitting from three o'clock in the afternoon until eleven o'clock at night, the most absurd arrangement of hours imaginable. If the house would get down to some reasonable system, like starting at one o'clock in the afternoon and sitting until seven, we would pick up some time on our present total hours of sittings, and would transact a great deal more business than we do under the present hours. Every hon. member knows that by nine-thirty or ten o'clock at night many hon. members are fagged out, and we make relatively little progress in those late hours of sitting. It would also contribute to the health of hon. members; and I am sure that with better health and greater vigour we would do our work better and faster.

Then I think something could be done in regard to some of the specific debates. I believe if we introduced the sort of sanity I have suggested into the hours of sitting, our committees could meet earlier in the morning. At the present time we cannot call a committee meeting before eleven o'clock in the morning because we are sitting so late at night. If we had reasonable hours of sitting we would be able to get our committee work under way at a proper hour in the morning, and more work would be done because we would be fresher.

It seems to me we put the cart before the horse in this matter. At the time of the session when the committees are not sitting, our hours in the house are easiest. But toward the end of the session, when all the committees are sitting, when they not only overlap each other but overlap the sittings of the house, we bring in morning sittings. It is an impossible situation. The only time there is reason for morning sittings is in the early stages of the session, before we begin the work of the committees. That is when we have long debates such as that on the speech from the throne, which normally takes about three weeks; and the debate on the budget, though perhaps not so much that debate since it comes at a later stage of the session. There is no reason why we could not have morning sittings while the speech from the throne was being debated, because it consists of a number of set speeches. In that way we could pick up perhaps a couple of weeks of the time of the house.

Then I put forward another suggestion which has been put forward before, and I think something must be done to face up to it. It is the question of the use of the committees of this house for the transaction of much of the business that is done in the house at the present time, but which does not need to come before the house and can be done better in a committee. Much of the work done in connection with the estimates consists of trying to elicit information, often on a multitude of small points. That takes a great deal of the time of this house in committee of supply. We would not sacrifice any of our rights as members by referring much of that business to the committees, just as we do in connection with external affairs. We do not deprive any member of the house of his right to express his views on questions of policy which are properly discussed here, but information which is requested on the smaller details is obtained in the committee on external affairs to which the estimates of that department are referred. We save a great deal of the time of the house in that way, and consequently on the subject of external affairs we have a much more comprehensive and infinitely more orderly and constructive debate in the house than would be possible if it were interspersed with inquiries and discussions on a multitude of small details.

The same thing could be done with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. If the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would be content on his estimates to make some of his speeches or give some of his explanations to the standing committee on agriculture, which I believe has not met for several years, we could save days of the time of the house.

Mr. Bater: On a point of order, the hon. member just said the standing committee on agriculture has not met for several years. I would point out that we met on three or four occasions last year.

Mr. Fleming: I am very glad to hear the chairman of the agriculture committee say they met several times last year. I should think such an important committee ought to be meeting every session, since there is so much business relating to agriculture that could be usefully discussed there. I think it is a reflection on the way in which the machinery provided in this house today is being ignored in the transaction of public business that that important committee has met so seldom. It has not met this session. We have been in session here for over four months and it has not met. That is not the only committee. There are other important standing committees that are just covered with cobwebs and which could do useful service in reviewing estimates and assisting in the conduct of other aspects of business of the house if we would let them do so. Debates in the house would be infinitely better and more constructive in consequence.

Whether there is to be a fall session or not, it seems to me that the experience we are going through now is one that demands in a most imperative way that something be done to face up to this problem. There will be criticism about the length of individual speeches and of course there will be discussion about the time that is spent on particular subjects. It is easy for a large government majority to look at an opposition that is not numerous and to say, "These people are doing too much talking." If there were more of us the duties of the opposition would be spread over a greater number. I hope that we will soon have reinforcements for the official opposition so that the duty of speaking in this house will be spread over a larger number of members.

Surely it must be seen by now in the light of the experience that is common to all members of this house that to go on as apparently we are going to do for this third year with two sessions in a year simply means that we are not facing up to the problem. That problem is the modernization of the procedure of this house so that better work can be done in parliament in much less time.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member quoted my words of the other afternoon, but he entirely misinterpreted them. What I said was that I believed that experience had shown over the last few years that membership in the House of Commons had become a full-time position. I did not say that members of parliament should spend the whole year in Ottawa or in the House of Commons. If they are going to do the job for which they are elected, if they are going to discuss public questions in their own constituencies and elsewhere, they have not the time for very much else. That is precisely what I meant and that is precisely what I said.

Further, some hon. members of the house have from time to time been called upon to attend international conferences. I know that since 1945 all my autumns but one have been taken up with conferences relating to international and commonwealth affairs. Other members of the house have been called upon to do the same thing. Apart from obligations of that description, the business of this country and the business of a member of parliament is such that unless he gives his entire attention to his job it is difficult to see how he can fulfil the obligations of the position to which he has been elected.

Again let me say that I was not suggesting that members of parliament should sit here twelve months in the year. I think that no one within sound of my voice on that occasion could possibly have put such an interpretation upon my words. It is merely an interpretation by a legal mind of words that were not so meant.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I hope I understand correctly what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) intended to say, and I rise just to make a brief comment on it. As I understand it, he is suggesting that the time has come when, if membership in parliament is not to be a whole-time job, at any rate it is to be an exclusive job. I hope I am interpreting him correctly. I am in one sense disinterested as far as this matter is concerned. When I left business, I left it entirely. When I had the misfortune to be defeated in June, 1949, I became one of the unemployed. Therefore, I am not speaking for myself in what I am about to say.

I feel that if we have reached the stage which I understand the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar contemplates then I believe it to be a fact that a considerable number of men in this house, I would say at least thirty-five or forty, men whom we would dislike most to lose from this house, will not be able to continue. I believe that with all my heart. I say that irrespective of profession because some of them are farmers, some are doctors, some are lawyers and some are businessmen. If we accept the view of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, if that is to be the settled situation, then a considerable number of men will not be able to continue to be members of parliament and they would not be the men we would miss the least.

Mr. A. Phileas Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from my riding which I had not visited since last September. I did not know that this thing was going to come up in the house. I listened to the speech made today by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and I gathered that he was using a mental argument. I should like to use a little bit of an emotional argument, and this may prove a surprise, not to the Liberal party but to the Tory party. I like the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). He is a nice looking gentleman. However, I asked my constituents, "Has George Drew any chance of getting anywhere in my riding even with the best candidate?" They said, "Well, not under present circumstances, because if the leader of the opposition carries on with this policy of the Tory party, of the big shots of Bay street and St. James street—".

Mr. Fleming: They are all Liberals.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member should confine his remarks to the motion before the house.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): I have a hunch that somehow the Tory party will be recognized as being the party of the capitalists and the bigwigs. I should like to pay a compliment to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for having introduced a motion which has had the effect of bringing together in marriage the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). For the first time, in this session at least, they are in accord.

Mr. Fleming: I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member is suggesting that the leader of the opposition and I are in accord for the first time on this question. That is absolutely untrue. The leader of the opposition commands my confidence, and my loyalty as my leader.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): I still have the convention in mind.

Mr. Fleming: Better get up to date.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Let us get down to brass tacks.

Mr. Brooks: Sit on one.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): The hon. member for Peterborough West is not here. The Tories are against a second session to deal with the job that we have to deal with in parliament. May I suggest that twenty times during this session we have tried to promote legislation and estimates and the leader of the opposition and the Tory party brought up matters that they stated were emergency matters and they insisted on discussing another topic. That has happened over twenty times this session. Now the opposition is saying that it is the fault of the government that we did not make greater progress than we have made. I would suggest that they should have a sort of examination of conscience, and see how many days we have spent here, at the expense of the taxpayers, in discussing so-called emergency matters that were not emergency matters.

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I simply want to point out that, because Hansard goes out and because many who read it would know nothing about the hon. member except his name, I cannot let the statement that he has just made go unchallenged. He is well aware of the fact, as all hon. members are, that the statement he has just made is fantastic nonsense; and that far from there being twenty times, there have not been ten times or there have not been any occasions on which I have objected to the procedure, except to ask that the business of the house be properly organized, or on certain occasions I have made suggestions as to the subjects which should be taken up.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that Hansard will speak for itself. I do not want to challenge the chief of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in this particular matter. But I know how many votes we have taken in this session. I know how many times the leader of the opposition rose in his place in this house and said, This is an emergency, and we had to discuss the emergency; and on occasion we discussed the same topic three times. I do not want to attribute all the blame to the opposition or to the Tories, because they do not count in our province. They do not count and they never will if they continue to carry on their policy in this way. Now the big shots of Bay street and St. James street say—

Mr. Fleming: Those are Liberals you are talking about now.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): They say: One session. I thank the hon. member, the former president of the national association, for standing up and saying: Well, my God, and so forth. That is all right. But we are the representatives of the democratic people of Canada. That is why we are here, and because we are not representatives of St. James street or Bay street. Of course it is up to them to be here, although some like to play golf, if we have to stay here all the year round.

I agree with the hon. member who was a former capitalist. I hope he still is in case I need some money some day. Just a moment ago the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) said that it is impossible not to be here the year round. It is possible for these gentlemen to be here the year round when we have a session at $4,000. But how many can afford that across Canada? How many can afford to leave their business and be here all the year round except for two months in the year, I should like to know. The hon. member mentioned that it was the safeguard of democracy to have here a sort of representation of the stalwarts of the population. How can you expect to have that representation if you leave it to the hands of the gentlemen who have all the money? It was funny to hear the chief of the opposition who has a beautiful home in Ottawa, as has the Prime Minister—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member should confine his remarks to the motion before the house.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): There is no reflection meant.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would ask the co-operation of the hon. member who has the floor in maintaining order in this house.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): There is no reflection whatsoever on the chief of the opposition. It is a reflection on the Tory party of which he is the leader, and whose house has been given to him by the party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the motion before the house.

Mr. Drew: It goes slightly farther than that, Mr. Speaker. We are discussing public business and because the members of this house are all in some way associated with that business it is necessary for me to correct Hansard and to state what I feel sure the hon. member well knows, namely that no house has been given to me by the Tory party, but that a group of citizens provided a house which is to be the house for the leader of the opposition from time to time. That has been publicly stated—and stated clearly—and I thought the hon. member knew it.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): I will accept the correction made by the leader of the opposition. I accept it. I am glad that the correction was made by him.

Mr. Rowe: You should have known it before.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): I say that if for other reasons the chief of the opposition is willing to stay here for twelve months during the year, that is his business. He has the full advantage. I should be glad if I could stay here for twelve months and look at him. But as far as I am concerned I want to tell the Tories that if, in my riding, they continue to carry on the policy of the big shots, they will never get anywhere in Quebec irrespective of the last congress they had in Montreal.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): I am pleased to offer their support to the Prime Minister.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Here we go now.

Mr. Ferguson: —I often wish some of these great orators would get up and try to demonstrate whether they have much intelligence and try to say a few words on their feet rather than sit back sprawled out in their seats and interrupt people who are at least endeavouring to say something on behalf of those hon. members' constituencies as well as their own. There is one man who is frequent in his interruptions, but I have never heard him speak very intelligently on his feet on any occasion in the House of Commons, either for his constituency or for any other constituency across Canada.

This debate has been exceedingly interesting. I am going to try to speak just as a lowly individual member. I quite agree with the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) when he says that it will be a sorry day for the House of Commons when we lose the great asset which the people of Canada now possess in having men of diversified occupations, from all walks of life, sitting here endeavouring to administer the affairs of the people of Canada. That can only be made possible by people attending to whatever vocation they are carrying on in their home constituencies. If it ever becomes necessary for a member of parliament to devote one hundred per cent of his time to the House of Commons, we will no longer have a democracy or a democratic form of government.

All hon. members, with few exceptions, must undoubtedly agree with those words. We cannot have a democratic form of government unless people are in the position that they can seek and obtain information from people of all walks of life, through association in business. But surely the members of this House of Commons are not so antiquated and steeped in tradition that they cannot get together and smarten up the method by which we are endeavouring to carry on the people's business in the House of Commons. Surely we cannot let tradition hold us in such a vise that our own inveterate intelligence and knowledge, gained through bitter experience, will not serve the members of this house of all parties so that they may devise some method of expediting the service that we are trying to render to the people of Canada. I believe that what we have heard today will be of great benefit to all members of the House of Commons and, therefore, will be beneficial to the people of Canada.

I heard one hon. member, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), talk about remuneration. Let us be frank about it. The rising cost of living affects all members of parliament. Members who, through their integrity, their intelligence and their willingnes to work, are at times able to make more money than are other members of the House of Commons, are justly entitled to whatever money parliament sees fit to pay members of the House of Commons for the service they render to the people, irrespective of their private income from other sources. Undoubtedly the public of Canada should be aware, as most of them are not, of the length of time that a member of parliament devotes to the duties that he is called upon to perform as their representative. A member of parliament's duties are continuous. You talk about sixteen hours a day. The duties of a member of parliament extend over twenty-four hours a day. He is on call twenty-four hours a day. He comes to the House of Commons around nine o'clock in the morning and opens his mail. He attends the afternoon session, and the session closes in the evening at eleven o'clock. He finally wends his way home and arrives there at twelve or twelve-thirty, if he is fortunate.

The people of Canada do not realize exactly what is involved at the present time in the duties of a member of parliament. There are the committee meetings. They do not speak of this, but members of parliament are on call all the time. Men and women call a member of parliament when he is in his own home supposedly on vacation, and inform him that some gentleman has been arrested for drunken driving, what can he do about it, or some lady thinks she is entitled to a pension. She is only forty-eight years old but her children have all grown up and she is no longer getting the widow's pension. Just because she has been receiving it and the children are grown up she thinks she is still entitled to it, and the member must conceive some method of seeing that the pension is continued to her.

The duties of a member of parliament and the requests made of him should be considered by the people of Canada. The position of a member of the House of Commons should be set on a pedestal as high as any position occupied by any man in the country.

We talk about an increase of twenty per cent in judges' remuneration because of the service they render. I will say openly in the house today that the members of the House of Commons are badly underpaid. They are badly underpaid for the services rendered. If any voter in any constituency thinks that he is going to get the kind of intelligence that he will need, not the kind that he wants, perhaps, but the kind that he needs for his benefit, he will have to pay more for that service.

There are men who have been talking and heckling in this house today who are very keenly pleased at the fact that there is another session in the offing in the fall and that they may replenish their depleted coffers. I am one of that group. I do not want to work for marbles, and I do not mind giving the best that I have in me in service to the people who sent me here, and I shall continue to do that, but I am going to be free to tell them that I am entitled to more pay. I am not going to beat around the bush about it as some men do.

What we need to do in this house is to show the people of the Dominion of Canada that in the position we occupy, or should occupy, we are representing all the people of Canada. By so doing we shall gain the respect for our position which is its due.

Mr. A. C. Stewart (Yorkton): I have a few words to say on this motion. With all due respect to the hon. member who just took his seat, I think his remarks exemplify what a member of the House of Commons could do. The hon. member's voice and expression are such that if he went into competition with Jimmy Durante I think probably he could earn a lot of money. That is a compliment to the hon. member. I understand that he also had a splendid record in other realms, and I am proud to hear from the hon. member in connection with the duties of members of parliament.

In spite of the press statements, the duties of members of parliament have been carefully outlined by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), and the work of the forthcoming fall session has been outlined by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I do submit, however, that there is a waste of time in this House of Commons. I have sat in a house for as long as nearly twenty years. There is a waste of time in debates in this house. There are some hon. members here who have been here a long time who do not indulge very much in debates, but when they do get up they do say something. There are other hon. members who have been here a long time because they have looked after the people of their constituencies. But the matter of serving a constituency is not jumping up in the house on every conceivable occasion.

If we are to amend the procedure in this House of Commons before the next session rolls around I should like to have statistics before us showing the time actually occupied by some of the professional orators. If they had not taken up so much time we would have been through with all the business by now. Because they have been here a long time, owing to their being lucky or through being skilful enough to spend all their time on politics, and thereby get re-elected, they think that they should make the job of a parliamentarian a profession. That is not our duty here. For instance, yesterday we had motions on second and third reading of a bill that were almost identical. It had to be voted on twice. If the time taken in the house by certain members of the opposition were carefully calculated, and if we had it before us at the next session we might possibly consider changing some of the rules. Some of the suggestions of the hon. member for Eglinton could be very carefully considered by parliament and by the government.

The leader of the opposition objected to the statement being made that he was following the press. The leader of the opposition quoted from certain newspapers. I have read the two Ottawa papers and this paper from Montreal. There is no question in the world that they are nothing but Tory papers. I think they followed the leader of the opposition in their objection to the change that is proposed by the government. You cannot pick up these papers and find properly quoted anything that a Liberal said. In my opinion they are nothing but Tory press and a Tory vehicle. I think they follow the leader of the opposition in their remarks criticizing the fact that members' indemnities are being raised.

With all due respect to the press—and I know some splendid fellows on the press—we do not find many members of the press elected to parliament. There are very few members of the House of Commons representing the press. In so far as the relative merits of the press and the parliament are concerned the people can judge. If there is any doubt as to the relative merits of the press and parliamentarians the ball game last night amply demonstrated who is superior.

In so far as the western members and the maritime members are concerned, the men who wrote these articles have not featured the actual position of those members. Not only have they left their homes, but they have to stay in Ottawa. Very few of them have been back to their homes during the whole of the session. For instance, two members from Saskatchewan have had to buy homes down here to get their young children at school and to keep them in their parents' care. Members from the maritimes and from Newfoundland are in the same position. They have to stay here. On the other hand, members from Ontario and Quebec can get home every week end—and some of them are very long week ends. They are also faced with something that possibly the press does not understand, and that is, that the closer you are to home the more difficulties you run into, and John Jones, his uncle and his aunt are on your doorstep, morning, noon and night, just as the previous speaker said.

Parliament is an institution. Following what the hon. member for Eglinton said I think we could shorten procedure in this House of Commons if certain members who have usurped the floor time after time, thinking that they are displaying ability and skill that are not possessed by other members, would refrain from jumping up on every conceivable occasion and taking up the time of the house in senseless debate.

I think that between sessions the cabinet might carefully consider overhauling some of the rules of the house. The session this fall will be an important one; important matters will have to be dealt with. Then, over and above the legislation to be introduced, we do not know what the war situation may be. Members would be subject to call if the war situation became worse.

[Mr. Stewart (Yorkton).]

Instead of being criticized in the house, I say the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the cabinet should be commended for having taken the stand they have taken. As has been said by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), there are men working in factories, men working in mills in Hamilton and other places who, as unskilled labour, are earning more money than hon. members receive for their indemnity.

I disagree with what was said by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) with regard to lawyers. The law societies in all the provinces, and the judges, are not required to sit during what are known as the long vacations. The long vacation begins on July 1 and, except for summary trials before justices of the peace, there are no court sittings until September 15. And, Mr. Speaker, the suggestion that we sit here another two months listening to some of the speeches such as those we have been forced to listen to in the last four months nauseates some of the western members and, I believe, the maritimers, as well. That is a fallacious suggestion.

We have heard about the terrific heat of midsummer in Ottawa. We have not had that heat yet this summer; but as for accomplishing any real work in the House of Commons during July and August, particularly with respect to certain bills that have not yet been placed before the public, and which our constituents have not had an opportunity to study—and in this I include not only the matter of freight rates, but also the other bills the Prime Minister has mentioned—the prospect is not very bright. We want to discuss those measures with our constituents so that we may have their views and work refreshed in the fall.

In my opinion the government is to be complimented upon arranging matters as they have been arranged. For simple party reasons, the official opposition should have acquiesced, as have the other groups, in the suggested change for this year.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the last two speakers have made a real contribution to the debate. Anyone who will read their speeches carefully will see that they have pointed out many of the conditions facing members of parliament.

Morning sittings are distasteful to all hon. members; they are distasteful to members of the Social Credit group, because they constitute a heavy additional strain just when all conscientious members are pretty well worn down. But we know, as members of the Social Credit group, that in order to finish the business of the house we must hold morning sittings; there is no use complaining about it. It is just part of what we have to take in our stride.

Governing Canada is an exceedingly complex and laborious task. This is true even in what might be called normal times; we are now in the most perilous of abnormal times. All this ought to be borne in mind when we are considering the problem of having a second session.

We are faced with problems of tremendous importance and of almost overwhelming intricacy.

As one example of the difficulty of governing Canada, look at our estimates. I do not wish to reflect upon anyone in the house, so far as his work here is concerned. In fact, I believe there is no one in the house upon whom reflection should be cast as regards using time. All one need do in this connection is consider the estimates. If the people of the country could see the big blue books of estimates members have on their desks, books completely filled with items, any one of most of which could occupy the time of the house for perhaps a week, and realize that members have to labour through those estimates during the course of a session, they would realize in part the problem facing us—and particularly the problem facing opposition groups who are expected to criticize adequately the estimates coming before the house.

There comes to my mind one item which hon. members will all have in their minds. I refer to the Department of Transport. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) came before the house with his estimates, prepared and ready to discuss them, and days and days were spent by opposition members on the discussion of only the first item. We did not make the slightest progress during those days, so far as getting the estimates through was concerned—and yet I believe every speech made was well worth making and was a contribution to the debate. If hon. members proceeded to examine each item as carefully as they examined the first one in the Department of Transport, we could not possibly hold enough sittings in a year to cover the estimates.

One question is this: What are we going to do about these estimates, most of which are as important as the first item in the Department of Transport?

I should like for a moment to turn to the press. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has quoted from certain newspapers throughout the country. In my opinion the writers of the editorials the leader of the opposition quoted simply went off the deep end. They indicated they did not know anything like what they ought to have known about the conduct of the affairs of the House of Commons; otherwise they would not have made any such irresponsible statements as were read into the record this afternoon.

I think the time has come when someone ought to put our press to school, so that they would know something about the responsibility resting upon them. Anyone who reads almost any of the major newspapers of this country, on either side, finds himself reaching almost a state of disgust when he realizes the incompetency of the knowledge, understanding and thinking of the men who are writing these editorials.

Let me use one illustration: if members do not talk on the estimates, then according to certain newspapers they are weak, and are not doing their jobs; if they do talk, then they are wasting time and delaying the progress of the session! For some reason or other it seems there is scarcely a newspaper editorial writer in Canada who has been able to sense that fact, and to view the whole matter with equanimity and with a dispassionate soundness of thought. They do not seem to realize that everything they say has an effect upon the people, and has something to do with leaving the impression as to whether or not the House of Commons is a success.

As I said a moment ago, when we discuss the estimates we are accused of delaying progress; if we let them go through without criticism we are accused of being lax and negligent, so that we see headlines in certain papers condemning how the members have passed billions of dollars of estimates in one or two hours or one or two days! But all the members were trying to do was to get the estimates through so that the session could be finished in reasonable time. It is not that members do not want to discuss the estimates; under the circumstances they simply could not possibly take time to discuss them.

I suggest that every newspaper editor in the Dominion of Canada should obtain a copy of the estimates and then come forward with suggestions as to how the House of Commons can deal adequately with this volume of estimates in any length of session.

I am tempted to say something about the stand taken by the leader of the opposition, but I hesitate to do so. I did think, however, that after having been here as long as he has, and having been in public life as long as he has, he should have realized that a good many of the things he said would have been much better left unsaid. The position of this group was well set forth by the leader of the Social Credit party on June 4 as recorded at pages 3668 and 3669 of Hansard. He agreed with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) completely with respect to holding a fall session. If he were here today—and he is unavoidably detained—I believe he would say that he would agree with the Prime Minister with respect to holding morning sittings. Therefore this group is completely behind the Prime Minister not only in holding a fall session but also in commencing morning sittings next week.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just before the motion is put, there is a word I should like to say bearing directly on the question before us. I for one promise to be strictly in order and to talk about the motion now before the house, which calls for morning sittings starting at eleven o'clock next Monday morning. The reason I rise is that I want to put in a word for those whom the passing of this motion will directly affect. I refer to various groups of employees of the House of Commons. For a number of these groups it means additional work and additional hours. For one group in particular—and I refer to the Hansard staff—it not only means additional hours and additional work but it also means additional strain.

All of us have contacts with the members of the Hansard staff. I am sure all members will realize the truth of what I am saying, and will realize that in former sessions there have been times when we have been unfair to them because of the length of time during which morning sittings were held, and also because of the fact that toward the end of the session the tendency is to have a day or so when we sit right through meal hours. There are two suggestions I want to make. The first is that in view of this extra work I think consideration should be given to something in the nature of overtime pay. If there is no other way in which it can be done, at least it can be done by granting pay for a week or so after the session ends, and in view of the extra work I think members of the Hansard staff would be fully entitled to consideration of that nature.

The other suggestion I wish to make is that this time—and indeed in all future sessions—we should avoid, unless there is some dire emergency, going straight through on the last few days without rising for meal hours. I make that plea not on my behalf, not on behalf of the members, but on behalf of the Hansard staff who find those days really more of a strain that we should expect them to undergo.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

What I have said about the Hansard staff applies to other groups, and I mention in particular the page boys. In view of the extra work we will be putting them to I think some special consideration should be given them. So far as they are concerned, I think we can leave it to His Honour, the Speaker, to find some way in which to make sure that they are compensated. I trust this will be done.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am not going to speak very long. One hour and fifty-two minutes ago I bowed to the Speaker, and as a consequence of that bow he put a motion moved by me reading as follows:

> That on and after Monday, June 11, 1951, until the end of the session, the house shall meet at eleven o'clock in the morning of each sitting day and that, in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock p.m., there shall also be an intermission every day from one to three o'clock p.m.

In that hour and fifty-two minutes I have not heard anyone suggest that the motion should not be adopted. On the contrary, everybody has implied that it should be adopted. But notwithstanding that, there have been speeches that took an hour and fifty-two minutes on what the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) calls "kindred questions". Kindred questions are the explanation of the time that is taken in this house to transact the business that interests the country. The kindred questions were pretty carefully watched by the Speaker in this debate, and it is rather unusual that four or five times speakers were brought back to the matter that was before the house for discussion. It happens rather infrequently that in the discussion of these kindred questions the Speaker takes it upon himself to bring members back to the matter before the house.

I think that what has taken place here this afternoon is a very good explanation of why it becomes necessary at times to propose that there be three sittings a day in order to get through with the business that does have to be done. Those kindred questions are questions of considerable interest, but they are kindred. At the beginning of the session the standing of the parties was about 185 on this side and about seventy for all members of the opposition together. I have had a tabulation made of the time when kindred questions were under discussion in the budget debate and in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. On the budget 234 columns were taken by the 180 odd members of this party, and 331 were taken by the seventy members of the other parties. On the speech from the throne 317 were taken by the Liberal members and 454 were taken by others. I am not complaining. I am merely stating why it is that there comes a time when, to get the business of the house proceeded with, a motion of this kind has to be made. I submit it for the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTINGS ON AND AFTER WEDNESDAY, JUNE 20

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday, June 13, 1951, and every Wednesday thereafter until the end of the session, the sittings shall in every respect be under the same rules as are now provided for other days.

He said: Mr. Speaker, since this motion was inscribed on the order paper some hon. members have pointed out to me that they did not expect it, and that they had other commitments for this coming Wednesday. They asked if the motion could not be amended by replacing June 13 with June 20. If I have the unanimous consent of the house I would suggest that it be so amended, or perhaps that it merely be corrected, and that it be passed as if the motion read "Wednesday, June 20, 1951, and every Wednesday thereafter until the end of the session" instead of "Wednesday, June 13, 1951, and every Wednesday thereafter until the end of the session."

Motion as amended agreed to.

GRAIN

REQUEST OF WESTERN FARMERS UNIONS FOR INTERVIEW WITH GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I should like to direct to the Prime Minister a question of which I have given him notice. Has the Prime Minister received a request from the farmers unions of western Canada for an interview and an opportunity to present a brief dealing with the marketing of western grain? Is the Prime Minister prepared to arrange an interview for the delegation?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The hon. member sent notice to my office that he was going to ask this question, and therefore I was able to check the dates. The answer is as follows: On June 4 I received a telegram signed by Mr. J. L. Phelps containing a request that the government receive a delegation which would, according to the telegram, represent provincial farm union executives of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the British Columbia bloc accompanied by additional farmers, for the purpose of presenting a brief. I am not aware of what the brief contains, but the request stated that the delegation wished to present matters of urgent and immediate importance to western agriculture. I had a reply sent the next day, June 5, which stated that owing to the pressure of parliamentary duties it would not be possible to arrange an interview with the government but that the brief referred to in the request for the interview, when received, would be brought to the attention of those of my colleagues the organization might wish to have consider the representations.

I may add that members of the government met representatives of the farmers' unions of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta on April 9. Again on May 2 members of the government saw representatives of the farm organizations of western Canada. The delegation of May 2 included representatives of the federation of agriculture, the three pools, the united grain growers and the farmers' union. As nothing new to my knowledge has arisen since the May 2 meeting, I could see no urgent reason for arranging another interview at this time with organizations which form only a part of the federation of agriculture. When I receive this brief, if matters not already dealt with appear to be involved, the question of trying to find the time to receive a delegation can be reconsidered.

Mr. Fair: If I might ask a supplementary question, in view of the fact that a very great wrong has been done to western agriculture—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fair: —about which a delegation recently visited Ottawa, I would ask the Prime Minister if he will reconsider his decision.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I do not consider that a great wrong has been done to any section of the community. As far as the five-year wheat pool is concerned, as long as I am a member of the government it will make no further recommendation to parliament.

Mr. Fair: The steal still continues, then.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND SALT CODFISH—MINIMUM PRICES FOR 1951 PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I understand the conference between the Newfoundland salt codfish association and the representatives of the fishermen has concluded. I wonder if the Minister of Fisheries is prepared to make a statement as to the results of that conference.

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): The hon. member telephoned me this morning and said he proposed to ask this question. It has been reported to me that while agreement was not reached between the representatives of the fishermen and the merchants on minimum prices to be paid for the 1951 production of salted cod, there was no great difference between what the merchants were prepared to offer and what the fishermen considered to be the minimum they could accept. Agreement was reached to hold further meetings on a monthly basis throughout the season, and as the production and marketing picture clarifies it would seem likely that agreement on prices can be reached at a later date. I would point out that the chairman of the Newfoundland fisheries board, in calling this meeting, was simply providing a medium for the two groups to meet. The responsibility for decisions reached or not reached rests entirely with the fishermen and the trade.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SOUND-AMPLIFICATION —SUGGESTION AS TO PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the announcement of those members who are to serve on what is called the amplification committee. I observe that the name of an hon. member, in fact a member of the cabinet, who should be on that committee does not appear in the list. The hon. member to whom I refer is a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and is an electrical engineer. For a time he was associated with the Bell Telephone laboratories in New York, and more recently with the Northern Electric Company in Montreal. I am sure this must have been an oversight, and I now draw it to the attention of those who had to do with the selection of this committee.

POLYMER CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN DIRECTORATE OR MANAGEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce I wonder if the parliamentary assistant would advise the house whether there has been any change in the directorate or company management of the Polymer Corporation that can be announced at this time.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will draw the question to the attention of the minister, and if there is any announcement to be made I will have it made as soon as possible.

DEPARTMENT OF RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT

383. Departmental administration, $381,223.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): When the committee rose last evening I had been discussing this item and I do not propose to take much more time, though this department is extremely important to my part of Canada. When it was organized it held out great promise to Nova Scotia and the maritimes generally, and I think our members are very sympathetic to the minister and are disposed to co-operate with him in every possible way. We are voting a large amount of money to this department, some $47,775,575, which includes vote No. 565 having to do with wartime housing, under which we are to vote $12,700,000. During the course of this discussion I would like the minister to state just what he is proposing that will be of assistance to my province and eastern Canada generally.

Last evening, in the few minutes at my disposal, I mentioned quite a number of items about which our people are concerned. I recognize that some of those matters are not covered by the estimates, but they have to do with the resources and development of Nova Scotia and I took it for granted that the minister would be concerned with them. I was particularly discussing the dispersal of industry, which is of great interest to eastern Canada. Many representations have been made from all parts of the house with respect to expenditures made during the two great wars, and expressing the hope that due consideration or perhaps even special consideration would be given the outlying parts of Canada in the defence expenditures now being made. Not only was this view put forward by members in every part of this house; some senators expressed concern that more had not been done along this line. This does not come directly under the minister, I appreciate, but after all he is the minister directly responsible for the interests of Nova Scotia, and I look to him to take an interest in this. What has been done up to the present has been very disappointing, but we are still hopeful that special appropriations will be assigned to eastern Canada. I noticed an announcement a few days ago that the enormous sum of $50 million was to be spent in constructing a chemical plant in Alberta. A few days ago I asked the Minister of Defence Production what was being done in Nova Scotia in regard to chemicals development, and he gave the encouraging reply that it was being considered but he could not yet make an announcement. I hope the Minister of Resources and Development will be able to make some announcement in this respect.

There are many other matters which are concerning the people of eastern Canada but I do not know that there is any necessity for me to refer to them on this occasion as no doubt other hon. members will do so. Other items of expenditure will be discussed in detail as they are called and I do not know that I need say anything more on this first administration item.

The Department of Resources and Development holds out great promise, or it did when it was organized, to the people of my constituency, to the people of Nova Scotia and to the people of eastern Canada. I look forward to hearing a specific statement by the minister as to just what he proposes to do under these estimates to assist this part of Canada.

There is still a considerable amount of unemployment and many of our people are being attracted away from home to central Canada. We feel strongly that this should not take place. It is the primary duty of the minister to see that employment is given to these people where their homes are and that they be not attracted away with their families following in due course. It is the primary duty of this department and of the government in general to see that there is a fair distribution of industry at a time when there is so much production in Canada. This should be done as quickly as possible.

It has been stated in the house that members from the maritime provinces are continually complaining. I do not think that that is a fair interpretation of the appeals we made during the last war and since, and are making at the present time. I think it is recognized by many who do not live in the maritime provinces that those provinces have not received proper consideration from this government and from some previous governments. We have the resources and the manpower and we certainly have contributed our part to the formation of Canada.

There would have been no Dominion of Canada had it not been for a statesman who came from the maritime provinces. There would have been no Dominion of Canada had we not formed part of it. Many people in Nova Scotia have been disappointed with the results, but I assure members of the house that we are still good Canadians and are going to play our part within the bounds of Canada. We make this special plea to the minister whose estimates are now before the committee, to the government in general and to the membership of the house, that more attention be given to the needs of our people in eastern Canada.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two comments I should like to make but I can assure you that they will not be long. They have to do chiefly with conservation. I believe the minister, and no doubt all hon. members, will agree that possibly conservation is the most important thing in Canada today. When we speak of conservation we think immediately of our forests and what has happened to them. Someone told me recently that as a result of carelessness last year enough timber was burned in Canada to build a city the size of Montreal. If that is so then very definite measures should be taken to ensure the future wealth of our forests.

I understand that when the white man came to this country there were nine inches of top soil. As a result of the destruction of our forests by fire and improper cutting that top soil is now less than six inches deep. That is a very serious matter. If our forests are not properly conserved our top soil will gradually disappear. Top soil is the most important soil in the country.

With all this I couple the question of the conservation of game fish. I am sure that the minister's department has this matter seriously in mind. I do not think I can approach this subject more strongly than the department is probably approaching it at the present time, but I do feel that those who hunt and fish should have instilled in them, and we should keep on instilling in them, the fact that they should not shoot any more than they intend to eat. They should not shoot simply for the pleasure of shooting. This applies to all types of game and wildlife. It applies particularly to game fish, and here I am not dealing with the fish that would come under the Minister of Fisheries. He has strong ideas on conservation and he has been showing a great interest in this matter during the past twelve months.

If it has not already been done, a special effort should be made by the department along these lines. Education should be carried on through the schools in order to reach our younger sportsmen, and there should be some form of continuous public campaign. Not only do we need our wildlife, we also need the money that is obtained as a result of that blessing. I venture to say that a large part of the United States money that we obtain is obtained from those who are interested in hunting and fishing. If we are to preserve that heritage very definite steps will have to be taken to see that these resources are not depleted.

We have seen what has happened in other countries. We have seen various species of wildlife disappear. We have in this country streams which at one time carried great numbers of salmon but which today carry none. As I said, I am not going to speak strongly or at length on this matter. I am sure the minister's mind is clear on the subject, and I believe that he feels the same as I do. When you discuss the conservation of resources you are discussing a matter that touches everybody. After all, the resources of each province in this dominion are extremely vital. When we see any natural resources being made away with by any means, we get a little bit worried. I am sure the minister has not had the opportunity of studying the bill that is going to be put before the legislature in St. John's, Newfoundland; but it deals with a great many of these resources over which the minister here has control. I hope the minister will be in a position to tell me what stumpage on wood is being paid in each province of Canada this year. I should like those figures if I could get them. I have a special reason for wanting them. An attempt is being made to give to a corporation a large area of the province of Newfoundland at a stumpage rate of fifty cents. To me that seems to be an extraordinarily low price. It is a matter that comes within the minister's purview, I should think. I should like him to let me have a comment on this matter and, if he can, to let me have the stumpage that is paid in the other provinces that are cutting wood.

Item agreed to.

National parks branch—

384. Branch administration, $22,780.

Mr. Knight: I have a small but specific matter that I should like to bring to the minister's attention. It has to do with a national park, namely the national park at Waskesiu in northern Saskatchewan. Three or four years ago I had occasion to make some complaint on behalf of the people whom I represent in the city of Saskatoon and who, I may say, use this park as a summer vacation ground; and a fine vacation ground it is. At that time a great many people were using what are commonly called shack tents—a movable affair and semi-permanent, if I may call it that—which they took down and stored away in the fall of the year and put back again when they went back for the next summer. May I say that those people believed that they were receiving rather scant treatment on the part of the park authorities. They felt that they were being edged back from the lots which they occupied temporarily and that these grounds which they had previously occupied were being given to people who were willing to build cottages of a more permanent type. I want to pay tribute to the superintendent of that particular park. Since Mr. Strong has been there, we have found a decided improvement. The people for whom I was concerned previously have had little reason for complaint; and so far as I know they have not made any.

There was, however, one incident which happened this year and which was brought to the minister's attention, and as to which, in correspondence with me, he did not answer. Whether that was an oversight on the part of his officials, I do not know; but I am going to bring it to his attention again. To these people who had these temporary quarters an opportunity was given to get lots upon which they might build a little bit more permanent type of thing. There was a big demand for those lots, and the matter was decided by drawing certain numbers out of a hat. My correspondent tells me that there were only 70 of these lots available whereas there were over 100 applications for them. That is reasonable enough.

The point that I want to make is that these people, in whose interests I speak, have had these grounds for a number of years. This man in particular had the ground since the year 1928. When it came to settling as to who would get these sites upon which to build this particular type of cabin, the names were put in a hat. But the names were put in a hat by the general public as well as by the people who had previously occupied the grounds. His contention—and it is a contention which was totally overlooked, may I say, in the answer of the minister—was that these people who had occupied these grounds for a period of years—and my constituent had done so since 1928—had a priority over the general public. That was his opinion, and it is my opinion.

When this matter was brought to the minister's attention, he replied that he sympathized with my friend who had not been lucky in the draw of the numbers out of the hat and that my friend would have the opportunity again, when the numbers were again put in the hat perhaps a year from now, to get ownership of some other lot in some other grounds somewhere else. That is not the point. That is evading the issue. The point is this. Should these people who have had those lots for years and years not have some priority over the general public? That is the question that I should like to bring to the minister's attention, and I should like him to tell me what he thinks about that particular situation.

Mr. Winters: In Prince Albert national park at Waskesiu, there was a need for further campsites mentioned by the hon. member, and a new area was opened up. The determination of who would have the privilege of occupying sites in the new area was made by draw, which seemed to be the fairest arrangement.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, might I interrupt the minister long enough to say that I do not agree with him when he says that it was the fairest arrangement.

Mr. Winters: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Knight: Does the minister think those lots should have been open to the public when people who had been there for ten, twelve or fourteen years had to submit to the chance of a draw as to whether or not they could get one of these lots?

Mr. Winters: If the hon. member had allowed me to continue, as he did not choose to do, I would have said that the people who have been there for the period of time he mentioned still have the right to remain where they are now and that these new areas are available to new people coming in or to anybody who wishes to take a chance on the draw to change from where he is now to one of the sites in the new area.

Mr. Brooks: I just want to say a few words on this item and to ask the minister a question. We were greatly interested last year in the opening of Fundy park in New Brunswick. I think we were the last province in Canada to have a park. Newfoundland was not part of Canada at the time that the parks were considered previously. We were indeed pleased that our park was opened in New Brunswick. I remember that in 1937 or 1938, I think it was, the parks were opened in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. At that time and previously I had pressed in the house for the opening of a park in New Brunswick. I felt that it was unfortunate that so many years had passed before it took place, and that we lost a great opportunity of tourist trade over those years. There was, however, difficulty over a site between the federal government and the province, mostly, I think, owing to the fact that the province could not decide on a site.

I may tell the minister that there were some complaints. I should like to have the minister's attention if I may, while I am speaking. There was some complaint over the ceremony at Fundy park last year. I may say that I am not blaming the minister personally at all, because I know that, when he goes into a province to open a park or any other public institution, arrangements are usually made by those in the province. But he must have been struck himself, I think, by the fact that the opening of Fundy park was entirely a political matter. There was not one—

Mr. Winters: Not political.

Mr. Brooks: It was entirely political.

Mr. Winters: No, not political.

Mr. Brooks: There was not one Conservative who took any part in the function. The leader of the opposition in the province of New Brunswick was not even extended the courtesy of being asked to sit on the platform although there were twenty other members and officials and mayors of different cities and towns who were asked. Mr. Mackay, after he came to the park at the very last minute on that day, was asked if he would come up and sit on the platform; but the courtesy had not been extended to him previously.

I dislike interjecting a personal matter, but the Fundy park is a part of my constituency, just as it is a part of the constituency of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, and I was not extended the courtesy of having an invitation.

Mr. Winters: If the hon. member will permit me to say a word to avoid a long debate, I should like to extend to him and to the colleagues of his party an apology. At the time of the arrangement I did not know that there had been that oversight but I learned of it since, and I was just as disappointed as he was. I am very sorry it happened. With regard to the remark about its being political, it was not intended to be political. I believe anyone who was there that day would support me in saying that there was no political complexion to any of the proceedings. I say again, I am very sorry that the members of the opposition concerned were not invited, and we shall certainly see to it that such a thing does not happen again.

Mr. Brooks: The minister just bears out exactly what I said at the outset. I was satisfied that the minister had no intention that any discourtesy should be given to anyone. We look on our public park as something that belongs to all the people. There was considerable criticism in New Brunswick, and there is today, over the fact that this courtesy was not extended to members of opposition parties.

The minister says it was not political. Well, I listened to the speeches. I know that the chairman glorified the premier of the province and the premier glorified—

Mr. Winters: The leader of the opposition would have done that.

Mr. Brooks: —the Minister of Veterans Affairs. The Minister of Veterans Affairs came on and glorified the present Minister of Resources and Development.

Mr. Winters: I do not remember that.

Mr. Brooks: And so on right down the line. It was just a glorification of everyone. I was pleased to hear my good friend the hon. member for Saint John-Albert glorified, a man who had absolutely nothing to do with the park. He was not here in the house when the matter was brought up.

Mr. Riley: I have been here ever since the work started.

Mr. Brooks: I do not intend to elaborate this matter any further. I am satisfied that if the minister has anything more to do with matters of this kind in the province of New Brunswick he will see that courtesy and justice are extended to everyone. I have that confidence in him.

There is one thing that I should like to say about the park. We are indeed pleased to have it. It is a wonderful tourist attraction, but there is a complaint that there is no way of getting to it without great inconvenience. The money that has been spent has been justified except for the fact that the people cannot get there without travelling through clouds of dust. I know that a great many United States tourists who come into the province of New Brunswick start off for our Fundy national park. They have to breathe and eat dust for about fifteen or twenty miles. They come back disappointed and disgusted. It is certainly a great drawback. When looking into this matter I hope that the minister will provide a proper road through the park. I do not know whether it is his responsibility or the responsibility of the provincial government.

Mr. Winters: Provincial.

Mr. Brooks: I understand that it is provincial. After establishing such a splendid park in New Brunswick I hope that the minister will use his influence to try and see that the provincial government does something toward getting people there in comfort, and, as I say, without having to eat dust for fifteen or twenty miles.

Mr. Higgins: I notice that $10,000 was provided under this item last year for the province of Newfoundland, but no amount is provided this year. I believe that nothing has been done. Was the $10,000 spent that was provided last year? If so, what was it spent for? Why is nothing provided this year? Is it the intention to establish a park? If so—and I presume it is—has anything been done about deciding on the area? If so, what has been done? The minister has had this matter raised on several occasions. I feel it is about time that we had a pretty clear-cut answer on the matter.

Mr. Winters: Under that vote last year certain investigations of possible sites were carried out, but no park has been established. We have had no formal offer of an area from the government of Newfoundland, which is part of the arrangement under which any park is established, and no final steps have been taken toward the establishment of a national park in Newfoundland.

Mr. Higgins: Is the provincial government not anxious to establish a national park?

Mr. Winters: I of course cannot say whether the Newfoundland government is anxious to establish a park. They asked us to investigate certain areas, and officials of the department have done that.

Mr. Higgins: And the investigation is completed?

Mr. Winters: That phase of the investigation is completed, at any rate. A report has been prepared, and it is available in the department. I have not studied it yet myself.

Mr. Higgins: How long has that been completed?

Mr Winters: Since the first of this year.

Mr. Higgins: And no action has been taken?

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Riley: I was interested to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Royal with respect to Fundy national park and also with respect to the road, because some of the roads going through the county which forms part of my hon. friend's constituency are rather dusty. I realize at the same time that this is not a responsibility of the Minister of Resources and Development, although we in New Brunswick would like him to assume at least part of the responsibility. His department could very easily see that in the interests of promoting this most splendid park which is located in my constituency—

Mr. Brooks: Not altogether.

Mr. Riley: —a gesture could be made by offering to pay at least half of the cost of the road leading into the park from my hon. friend's constituency.

I was also interested to hear my hon. friend's comment on the opening ceremonies. I was present at these ceremonies. I enjoyed them very much, and I am sure that he did as well. Perhaps we did not have the leader of the opposition on the platform—I thought he had been there. I am sure he did receive an invitation to attend the opening ceremonies.

Mr. Brooks: Yes, but not to take part.

Mr. Riley: Did my hon. friend not receive an invitation to attend the opening ceremonies?

Mr. Brooks: Since my hon. friend has asked me, yes, I did. What I was complaining about was that in the ceremonies themselves no invitation was extend d to the leader of the opposition or to anyone else except Liberals. In over twenty on the platform there was one Conservative who happened to be the mayor of Moncton, and it was generally understood that it was a very discourteous matter right through the piece.

Mr. Riley: It is all very well for the hon. member for Royal to say that he was not on the program. Neither was there any member of parliament nor any member of the legislature nor any member from the Conservative party. On the platform that day was the Minister of Resources and Development. He could hardly have been denied a place there. Then there was the Minister of Labour. He could hardly have been denied a place. The premier of the province could hardly have been denied a place.

Mr. Brooks: None of them should have been.

Mr. Riley: And members of the legislature from the county of Albert, who worked so hard to have the park there, as a matter of courtesy were asked to be on the platform. And I am very proud that the courtesy was extended to me, because the park was in my constituency.

Mr. Brooks: I rise to a point of order. I am sure the hon. member wishes to be correct. The park is also partly in my constituency; I do not know whether he knows that or not.

Mr. Riley: Mr. Chairman, if the park is partly in the hon. member's constituency, then I regret very much that I have not yet been able to visit that tiny corner of the park.

Mr. Brooks: That is hardly fair.

Mr. Knowles: You are making it worse.

Mr. Riley: No, I am not making it worse, at all. The hon. member for Charlotte was not on the platform, nor was the hon. member for Northumberland. The hon. member for Royal says that we must institute economies and save money; yet if the platform were built—

Mr. Knowles: How much did it cost to put you on the platform?

Mr. Riley: If the platform were built big enough to take in all the political parties, every member of every political party in New Brunswick, I am sure the hon. member for Royal would have some word of criticism.

What I would point out to the minister in regard to Fundy national park has something to do with the rate of wages being paid to the employees of the park. I notice that from time to time people are engaged in what are known as casual labour positions, which do not come under civil service commission regulations. I have had complaints from some of those people and from other interested parties in different parts of the province who, after visiting the park, have pointed out that there are workmen there in responsible positions, or positions which would scarcely be classified as labour, and who come within the wage rate which is known as the prevailing rate in any locality. They are working perhaps ten hours a day and getting sixty-five cents an hour.

Would the minister look into this and ascertain if there are not people working at Fundy national park at wages which hardly compensate them for the amount of responsibility they must take and the long hours they work to retain their positions. I know of one instance where an expert garage mechanic was employed to look after machinery. A good deal of expensive machinery is used in connection with the park, and maintenance work generally. After warning the department on several occasions, this man was forced to seek employment elsewhere, because of the low rate of wages. I hope this item will come to the minister's attention before the park is used to any extent this summer. I am sure the people in that locality would appreciate the minister's attention in the matter, as indeed I would.

Another matter which has been brought to my attention on various occasions may not come exclusively within the jurisdiction of the minister. However, it has to do with the post office in the town of Alma.

Mr. Winters: That is not in this vote.

The Deputy Chairman: If it is not within the scope of this vote, the hon. member cannot discuss it.

Mr. Riley: I shall save it for another occasion.

Mr. Higgins: Is it correct to say that the minister is prepared to establish a national park in Newfoundland as soon as the provincial government makes the land available?

Mr. Winters: I am not prepared to say at this moment that that is correct. The matter of establishing a national park is something that must be done by mutual agreement of the federal and provincial governments, the two major parties concerned. The purpose would be to set aside an area in a province for the use of all Canadians, so that they may enjoy themselves, and so that a certain area may be retained in its natural state in perpetuity.

We have had some discussion with the government of Newfoundland as to the desirability of a national park there. However it has not been finally determined whether an expenditure of money could best be made in establishing a national park in that province at this time. That does not mean to say that it is not the best way of spending the money, nor do I say that it is the best way. It is a matter we have to consider, and we must decide whether at this particular time there might be some other way or ways in which an equivalent amount of money might be spent to better advantage for the benefit of the citizens of Newfoundland and of Canada as a whole. The matter has not yet been finally decided.

Mr. Higgins: Is it because the provincial government was not prepared to spend the money on this project, and felt it could spend the money to better advantage in another direction, that nothing has been done?

Mr. Winters: I am not prepared to say in this house what is in the minds of members of the government of Newfoundland.

Mr. Higgins: To your knowledge.

Mr. Winters: I am simply saying that it is a matter of policy for the province of Newfoundland which has not yet been determined.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, in the few moments remaining before six o'clock I should like to express a word of appreciation to the minister and the government for the decision taken recently to take over Citadel hill in Halifax as a national historic site. I believe the procedure of taking the responsibility for this property from the Department of National Defence and placing it under the historic sites and monuments board is a proper one, and one which has been welcomed not only in Halifax but throughout Nova Scotia.

Citadel hill, and Fort George, which is the fortification crowning Citadel hill, constitute in truth a most historic site. It is the central part of the old fortification dating back to the founding of the city of Halifax in 1749. The restoration and maintenance of the fortifications and work on Citadel hill will, I am sure, be of great interest and benefit to the whole of Canada. Not only is it an historical location, but it is also an extremely beautiful one, commanding a view of the city, the magnificent harbour and far out to sea.

Therefore I wish to express this word of congratulation and appreciation to the minister and to the government on behalf of the people of Halifax, who have had this matter at heart for many years. If anyone had any doubt as to the wisdom and farsightedness of the decision taken by the government in this connection, I am sure those doubts have been more than resolved by the findings of the royal commission which has dealt with this matter.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, before you call it six o'clock, out of deference to the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, and so that the reply to his question may be found near the question, for anyone consulting Hansard, I would say that the rates for the people he had in mind in the national park are established after consultation with the Department of Labour, and have regard to the prevailing rates in the area. The rates for the park are under revision now, and it is likely they will be revised before they are implemented this year.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

MOTION FOR SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bills Nos. 332 and 343.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask that Bill No. 332 and also Bill No. 343 stand for the reason that the evidence in connection with both of these cases has not yet reached us?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Stand.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 345, for the relief of Joseph Alfred Sabourin.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 346, for the relief of Sarah Kamichik Coviensky.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 347, for the relief of Yvette Marsan Valiquette, otherwise known as Marie Fernande Yvette Marsan Valiquette.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 348, for the relief of Margaret Elizabeth McIntyre Williams.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 349, for the relief of Mildred Ann Sinclair Allen.—Mr. Winkler.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Gagnon: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bills read the second time.

GABRIELLE ROBERT MALLETTE

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bill No. 350, for the relief of Gabrielle Robert Mallette.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a brief word on Bill No. 350. I feel I should point out that of the cases before us tonight, a number of which we have already passed, this struck me as the saddest of those we are now dealing with. I shall not go into the details, although I could. I point out that there are two children, one boy eight and one boy seven years of age. The evidence seems to indicate that the husband has failed to support his wife or to assist her with the support of the children for some considerable time. I am happy to make the comment that no detectives were employed in connection with this case. The petitioner, the wife, was able to present sufficient evidence to the Senate committee herself as to her husband's misconduct.

The evidence indicates that the woman's income is only about $29 a week. It is a very pathetic situation on all counts. I am glad to note that the Senate committee reduced the fees that this woman has to pay for this divorce so far as parliament is concerned from the normal figure of $210 down to $75. I think I should also point out, although I have done it before, that the request made by the petitioner's counsel for the reduction of fees to that amount was made on condition that counsel submit a statement as to the fees that he would charge for the case. In other words it is an established practice in the Senate that when, because of the poverty of the petitioner for a divorce, the Senate reduces its fee, the lawyer must accept the rule of the Senate that his charges must be not over a certain figure. It is a very unhappy situation on all counts, but I feel we have no option except to agree to this divorce.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. Gagnon: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the second time.

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—SENATE BILL

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bill No. 351, for the relief of Archibald Kenneth MacLean.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, might I ask that this bill stand, again for the reason that the evidence has not reached us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Stand.

FIRST CANADIAN REINSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston City) moved the second reading of Bill No. 354, to incorporate First Canadian Reinsurance Company.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the sponsor for an explanation of this bill?

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to incorporate this company to carry on the business of insurance and reinsurance as is outlined in the title and in the bill. I might say that reinsurance is a common practice in the insurance business. I am told that the present intention of the principals is that their business will be along the line of reinsurance to begin with, and they will do business in all types of insurance save and except life insurance. The bill is drafted in the usual form and complies with the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. I understand it has the approval of the superintendent of insurance and I recommend that it be accorded second reading and referred to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. Ferguson: Would the sponsor mind stating what the subscribed capital is and the capital set-up of the company?

Mr. Henderson: I believe the capital set-up is contained in section 7 of the bill. There can be no meeting of the directors until $100,000 has been subscribed in bona fide subscriptions, and no business will be commenced until $250,000 has been subscribed in a bona fide manner.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville) moved the second reading of Bill No. 356, respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. Green: Could we have an explanation of this bill?

Mr. Decore: The purpose of this bill is to enable the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to carry out the terms of an agreement with the Alberta Coal Company providing for the purchase of fourteen miles of railroad recently constructed. As hon. members know, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is incorporated by an act of this parliament and therefore comes under the dominion Railway Act, which requires that before a railway company may purchase or lease the railway of another company it must have the approval of parliament. The object of this bill is to grant the company this power.

Mr. Blackmore: Would the hon. member permit a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. Decore: Yes, when I am through. The line the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will acquire if authorized by parliament is a spur line recently constructed by the Alberta Coal Company connecting with the Canadian Pacific main line near Halkirk, which is somewhere between Calgary and Edmonton in Alberta. This spur line was constructed to enable the coal company to get its coal out by rail. The agreement which has been entered into by the coal company and the railway company is very much in the interests of the coal company. That company is not in the railway business and does not want to take over the responsibility of operating and maintaining this line. It will also enable the people in that area to open up a more or less new industry. As I have said, the coal company prefers to have this spur owned and operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway, with which it connects.

I therefore suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this bill be given second reading and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, where the circumstances surrounding the agreement and other relevant matters may be gone into.

Mr. Blackmore: Do I understand the coal company built the line and owns all the shares in it?

Mr. Decore: I am not sure who owns the shares of this line, though I understand the line is owned by the coal company. However, before the committee witnesses will be ready to give the answers to all these questions, and I believe that information can be obtained much more readily when the matter is before the committee.

[Mr. Henderson.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

BORDER PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 5, 1951, consideration of the motion of Mr. Robinson for the second reading of Bill No. 118, to incorporate Border Pipeline Corporation, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Herridge.

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, from time to time in this house we have had debates with respect to oil and gas pipe lines. It may be thought strange that a maritimer should have something to say on this bill to incorporate this company, which is seeking permission to build and operate a pipe line. My reason for taking part in the debate is to express the opinion I have formed after listening to those who have spoken in opposition to this bill. One must consider the remarks that have been made. With one exception all those who have spoken on this bill have opposed it because they do not consider it in the interests of Canada first. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) has impressed me from time to time with his arguments on these bills, in which he has indicated that he is looking out for Canada first.

I am taking the stand that I oppose this bill on similar grounds. I have nothing against the hon. member who is sponsoring this bill. I know him as a good member of this house, and I had hoped that he would go back to his incorporators and have them change this bill by making the route all-Canadian, instead of having it take oil or gas to the United States. I try to look after the interests of Canada first, and with that in mind I believe we should ask ourselves what we are legislating for. In the closing days of a session, and indeed at other times as well, bills are brought hurriedly before committees of the house and adopted. Later, as has happened in other years, we find that certain bills should not have been adopted, because they were found not to be altogether in the interests of Canada first.

Many reasons could be given for taking that stand. I am going to give a few, which I hope may keep hon. members from voting for this bill. It is a great pleasure to be in this house and hear various hon. members from different provinces boosting—I could say boasting, but I think boosting is a better word—about the natural resources of their own districts and of Canada as a whole. The natural resources of Canada are something that any hon. member can be proud to boast about. These resources are barely scratched. The natural resources of Canada are great indeed. Our production of agricultural products is one of the greatest in the world. Look at our forests. We can see at a glance that they constitute another great natural resource. Then we have minerals of all kinds. We have the finest fish that can be caught in waters anywhere in the world.

These are things that are worthy of consideration. In referring to our mineral wealth I am reminded of the gold rush to the Yukon in 1898, the greatest gold rush in the history of America. There have been other gold rushes, but the 1898 gold rush to the Yukon was the greatest that Canada or the United States had ever seen. The reason why so many made such great efforts to get to the Yukon was the hope that gold could be practically picked up from the stream. But they were all sure of one thing, that no expensive mining operations would be required.

Then came the discovery of oil in western Canada, particularly in Alberta and the oil rush is on today to that part of Canada. There is a rush also by different corporations to obtain, as it were, a complete monopoly in connection with the sale or export of this oil. In passing legislation of this type our first thought should be to see that the province that produces the oil is served first. Our second thought should be to see that the provinces adjoining are given an opportunity to use the oil to develop their manufacturing and other industries within the province. Then if there is a surplus it can be piped elsewhere to those other parts of Canada which require oil for the production of power and for manufacturing purposes. They should have the third right to the use of this great natural resource.

Why does this bill not contain a provision that the pipe line shall be routed through Canadian territory to British Columbia and the Pacific coast, to pass through Vancouver and other places? If that had been provided I think this bill would receive the support of the house because it would then be serving Canada first. If the pipe line were built in that way it would supply the Pacific coast. If there was a surplus it could easily be extended to the United States to serve our good neighbours to the south.

However, we find that this pipe line bill does not appear to be in the best interests of Canada. When speaking on the pipe lines some hon. members have referred to the Canadian Pacific railway. The Canadian Pacific railway served Canada first. When it was proposed to build that railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific there was considerable difference of opinion among some of the most outstanding British, United States and Canadian engineers, some of them contending that it was impossible to build this railroad over an all-British route to the Pacific coast.

There must have been some men in British Columbia who have the same idea as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). At that time British Columbia had not entered into union with the rest of Canada and the people there stated that unless they received a guarantee from the railroad company that the railway would be built on all-British territory to the Pacific coast, they would not enter union.

An hon. Member: Is it?

Mr. McLure: This was carried into effect and that is the reason why today the Canadian Pacific serves Canada first and links up British Columbia as one of the provinces of the dominion.

An hon. Member: What about Maine?

Mr. McLure: Another route could have been chosen but how much better off are the people of Canada that some men insisted that this railroad should be built on all-British territory or, as we call it today, on all-Canadian soil from coast to coast. I have not sufficient information at my command to go into the further details of this bill, but I think our main reason for stopping its passage is that it does not serve Canada first. If it is to serve Canada first it must be built to the Pacific on Canadian soil. As I said a moment ago, if British Columbia does not require all the oil and there is a surplus it can be piped down to our neighbours to the south.

Another matter that I wish to make just a few remarks on is this. For many years we have been great sellers of foodstuffs and exporters of our raw materials. Here we have a raw material that we must not lose out on by exporting. The war brought to Canada an awakening; even if she had to suffer in two disastrous wars, at the same time Canada awoke and found herself ready to manufacture—something that was not done, except on a very small scale, prior to 1914. Canada can now be looked upon as one of the great, young manufacturing nations owing to the fact that we were forced into it. We have raw materials of every kind suitable for manufacturing. Why not manufacture that raw material into products that we need in this country instead of exporting the raw material and then bringing it back in its made-up condition, with our people having to pay five times the price they would have had to pay if they had adopted the principle of manufacturing their own raw materials into the products that they require?

Foodstuffs are a little bit different. We can supply our own people. But, on the other hand, the greater the manufacturing industries grow, the greater would be our home market for our own production of foodstuffs. In closing my remarks, I just wish to add this. We all believe that Canada is a great young nation. Canada today is progressing probably more rapidly than any other country in the world. While Canada may be small in population, in area it is the third largest country in the world. As I have already said, it has the greatest resources of any country in the world. Why not let us see that these resources are used for Canadians and for Canada first? Consider what it would do for men of labour. If this pipe line were going to be built in Canadian territory through to the Pacific, the men of labour would have the opportunity of building it. They would also have a further opportunity of seeing that it was kept in repair. Then last but not least, when that raw material would get to British Columbia, there could be large refineries that would employ a great number of men. Surely we in this house should look to the interests of the labourer, to give him more work, and to produce more comfort for him. The only way by which we can do that is by having pipe lines and similar things serve Canada first before they serve other nations.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that others will follow me and speak against the passing of this bill, so that we will be assured that the interests of the labourers of Canada, as well as the best interests of all Canadians, will be properly served by having an all-Canadian pipe line route to the Pacific coast.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, this bill is to create a company known as the Border Pipeline Corporation. I believe that this company is actually sponsored by a group of people south of the border who have had a tremendous amount of experience in the construction and operation of pipe line companies. Undoubtedly they have gone to a firm of solicitors in this country and have had them prepare a charter to be presented to the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada. I believe that the solicitors must have instructed these gentlemen south of the border with regard to the powers of the members of the House of Commons and with regard to their duties towards the people of Canada, and have told them that it was not a one-way street, that it was not simply a duty that we owed to our guests and to the people desirous of coming to our country to utilize our tremendous natural resources. We must think not only of courtesy to people coming to our country from the other side, but we must also think of the security and the welfare of the people of the Dominion of Canada.

Bearing that fact in mind, the situation reminds me somewhat of that which would confront you if you invited people to come to your home for dinner, and when they arrived you found that they did not like the dinner you were serving and started to dictate the kind and class of food they would prefer rather than the type you were serving. Much as we desire development of our great resources by our friends to the south and much as we need their aid and experience, we still do not want them to criticize too severely the food that we are offering. As a matter of fact, in this case it almost seems that they do not want to eat at all unless it is something they can provide for themselves. They must learn that we are the host. We have the natural resources. It is our food, it is our table, and it is our home that they are entering. They must therefore be content with some of the food we are offering and with the terms on which we are offering it.

The duty of the members of the House of Commons is, wherever possible, to see that the resources of this country produce as much profit and welfare for the people of Canada as they do for the users in foreign lands. We want to use our natural resources for the development of our factories and the development of our labour markets. We certainly cannot do that if we hurry our resources by the shortest possible route from the source of supply to the foreign country to which we are shipping our natural resources.

It has been gone into fairly thoroughly that by transporting the natural resources such as oil to the users in not too extravagant a manner, over a sane and reasonable distance, we are creating employment for the people of the Dominion of Canada. That does not seem to be asking too much when you realize the offering we have to make. It is worth millions. It will make millions. Oil has made millions for operators such as the applicants for this pipe line charter, in various parts of the world. One oil-producing country almost produced the spark that set off the third world war. That gives an idea of the importance of this natural resource we have. We find the President of the United States walking very gingerly and talking in whispers in order not to offend an oil-producing country that is not quite as far advanced in its general operation of industry as is the Dominion of Canada. Yet the applicants at this time would almost have you believe that we are wrong in demanding that they at least transport this oil by an all-Canadian route and agree to operate, with regard to running their pipe line, on identically the same basis as other applicants for charters are willing to operate. I cannot see that we are asking them to do something that is unusual or anything that might materially change their profits. I do not think there is any reason why they could not operate at a profit or that there is any reason that they might lose the money they have already invested in investigating the potentialities of this pipe line. We are not asking anything unreasonable on behalf of the people of Canada. We are asking for an assurance from the applicants for this charter that if it is granted they will have written into it the proviso that the pipe line or lines for the transmission or transportation of oil or natural gas, or artificial gas or liquid, or gaseous products or by-products thereof, shall be built entirely within Canada.

I do not know and I have not heard of any persons giving any logical reason why that should not be inserted in the agreement if this charter is granted. Too frequently in the past we have given away our great natural resources without due consideration of Canada. We have given those resources to foreign users. We have watched our population grow very slowly when it should have gone ahead at a rate at least twice as fast as it has progressed in the past fifty years. There have been times when we have wondered what we could employ our people at, and how we could utilize our terrific natural resources. Amongst the people in power there seemed to be an epidemic at times. Their desire was to get rid of those resources without due consideration to the coming generations of Canadians who would need them and who would be able and willing to develop them. We know that our forests have been denuded of the natural wealth which was given to us.

We now find ourselves in the position where the greatest nation in the world is willing to buy Canadian produced newsprint, not simply pulpwood, at a very handsome figure. The purchase of this newsprint goes a great distance towards balancing our economic condition with other great nations. We do know that it was not very long ago that our pulpwood was being shipped across the border to the south in tremendous quantities at very little income to Canada or Canadians. Through the foresight and determination of men in power in Canada a few years ago the tables have been entirely turned. Canada is still a producer of pulpwood. Canadians have built paper mills. Canadians by thousands are now employed in turning out the finished product, paper, and are shipping that product finished and complete ready for use to the vast paper presses of the United States at a very handsome figure, which means considerable and well deserved profits to the Canadian people.

If we did not have this tremendous paper wealth, which is almost exclusive to the Canadian people, just how much purchasing power would the Canadian dollar have in regard to commodities which we are forced to purchase in the United States? I believe I am safe in saying that we would be paying almost four, five or ten times as much on exchange as we are paying at the present time if it had not been for the perseverance and foresight of men in public life on matters pertaining to the vast wealth in the forests of Canada. We are not asking any more than these men asked in the past. We are simply asking that someone pay a reasonable amount, and that Canadians obtain as much of the profit as is reasonable from the discovery of oil in Alberta. The people who are desirous of obtaining this wealth should pay this amount.

It is unfortunate that the solicitors for this corporation, knowing the attitude of the members of the House of Commons—because they have expressed their opinions previously in the debates—did not tap their clients on the shoulder and say: "Let us hurry the assurance down to Ottawa that we do intend to run an all-Canadian pipe line, because the gentlemen in Ottawa apparently are determined. They are not going to bend their knee to your whim just because you would like it that way." This debate could have been avoided, and the great expense to the Canadian taxpayers could have been avoided, if that had been done. I do hope that the members of the House of Commons will have the fortitude to stand up and continue to block this charter until such time as the people who desire to use our wealth are willing to accede to our terms, which I do not believe to be unreasonable.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate chiefly because I feel compelled to do so.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Higgins: The compulsion though, Mr. Speaker, is not, as some hon. members may suggest by their raucous laughter, from anything else but the conscience that I feel every hon. member has, because all we must do is look around at hon. members here this evening and see the obvious interest that is displayed in this matter. When one does that he realizes how their conscience must be pricking them steadily as we discuss this most important bill.

I am quite certain that all hon. members, when they attend here on evenings like this and see such an important measure being discussed, must ask themselves: What are we here for? Especially is that so after the discussion that went on this afternoon at such great length on the duties of the members of the House of Commons and the stipends they receive for the very arduous duties that they perform. Then I say to myself again this evening when an important measure like this is being considered: How very obvious the interest is among the hon. members who are listening to me now.

I now intend to deal with various phases of the matter. I expect that any matter that has been left over from former discussions will be considered somewhat repetitious, but I am sure that a good thing cannot be repeated too often. For that reason, if I do repeat myself, and certainly if I repeat some of the expressions of my colleague, the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure), who displayed this evening a world of wisdom in the excellent address he gave on this matter, I hope that I will be pardoned, because it is not often that I have the pleasure of hearing the hon. member for Queens talking at length as he talked this evening. We do not often get that pleasure. Having heard him this evening I do say that we should have it many, many more times, because he has contributed to the discussion and to the wisdom of hon. members this evening something that we did not have before, and something that certainly the newer members of the house did not have before. It is only when you have the wisdom of the ages given by the sages of the house that the younger members can possibly hope to embody what this thing means in all its moods.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Higgins: Can you not bear with me a little longer? This bill to incorporate Border Pipeline Corporation was passed by the Senate in March.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. member that we are discussing the amendment.

Mr. Higgins: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Well, I just wish to look at the actual title of the bill. I understand of course that we are discussing the amendment. But that amendment gets right down to the principle I should like to discuss in the house this evening, namely the principle of the conservation of natural resources. This is a matter we must consider fully, because, after all, it must be kept in mind that trees are a crop; they are cut down and grow back again. Wheat and other cereals grown by the farmers are crops that can be cut down. But there are resources such as oil and minerals that are taken out of the earth and are not put back. That is the end of them. Either they are used properly or they are lost forever.

If we are to use our natural resources we must be convinced in our own mind that we are using them for the benefit of the people —all the people, and not only a small section of them. The amendment, to which Your Honour has directed my attention, incorporates a principle which has been discussed this evening by two hon. members who have preceded me in the debate. That is the principle of using the resources in the first instance for the advantage of the Dominion of Canada itself. That is the principle I wish to discuss briefly. I must confess, in passing, that recent changes in government legislation, and changes in other minor things, including telephone books, where the word "dominion" has been dropped, have come as a shock to me. The word "dominion" is not nauseating, is it? Surely there is much to be said for the use of it; much can be said for the use of old things.

We must deal with what was in the Dominion of Canada when it was a Dominion of Canada—and just what it is today, we do not know exactly. We do not know whether it is a commonwealth, whether it is just Canada, or what it is. I do not know. Does anyone else know? I would suppose that both the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Robinson) and Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) must take some responsibility for dealing with this pipe line situation. But the principle hon. members must keep in mind—

Mr. Sinnott: An all-Canada line.

Mr. Higgins: There can be no question about it that the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) has greater ideas about Canada and Canada-first than any other member in the house. He, for one, will be the first to agree that Canada must be for Canadians, first. I am sure he would agree with that. There can be no doubt that he is the type of Canadian who would always exemplify in Canada the principle of Canada for Canadians.

Mr. Riley: How could we help agreeing with you?

Mr. Higgins: I hope I am not aggravating hon. members.

Mr. Sinnott: They are just jealous.

Mr. Higgins: I should like only to repeat some of the exhortations I have heard this evening, that Canada must be for Canadians, and that Canada must first be served. I can see no argument against it; what argument could there be? One must consider that there are 14 million people in the country—

Mr. Gour (Russell): There are 15 million now.

Mr. Higgins: Well, what is 15 million people in a country like this today?

Mr. Gour (Russell): And they are nice people, too.

Mr. Higgins: Hear, hear. And certainly the 325,000 mentioned a little while ago are good people. But we must look forward to a country in which we would have from 50 million to 100 million people. And if the country with that population is to be served by the resources of Canada, then one of the most important of those resources should be preserved for Canadians.

There is no one in the house who has a higher opinion of our neighbour to the south than I have. I believe the Americans are a fine people, and that we can share our natural wealth with them. But certainly we can share it with them only when we have made certain that our own needs are assured. When that is done, then I am sure that even those who hold strong opinions in this matter would be prepared to share with them. In this I have no doubt the hon. member for Simcoe East would agree. But he does not want to deprive Canadians of their God-given rights; I am sure he does not. That is the last thing in the world he would want to do. And knowing him as I do, I believe I can say safely—that it is nine o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being nine o'clock, the house will resume the business it was considering at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT

The Deputy Chairman: The committee was considering item 384.

Mr. Fair: Mr. Chairman, for the last forty-five minutes we have been discussing pipe lines, and associated matters. For a few moments I should like to discuss another matter of national importance, namely one of the national parks within my province. I refer to Elk Island national park, which is along the Yellowhead route, and which should have been developed rather than the one that is being developed. However, we will not argue about that at the moment.

During the last two years particularly we have had several thousand visitors at Elk Island park particularly on Sundays and holidays. Provision has been made for concerts at those times. Up to the present the concerts have not cost the dominion government anything, but those in charge feel that, in the near future, because of the continuing importance of the park, it may be necessary to make some arrangements to pay small expenses, when voluntary performers cannot be obtained.

On March 12 last the president of the Alberta music board, Mr. Richard S. Eaton, wrote to the superintendent of the national parks service, Department of Resources and Development at Ottawa. Perhaps in explanation of the position I could not do better than to read three paragraphs from this letter. It reads as follows:

> As you are doubtless aware, since the park has been developed to the extent that it may now be regarded as a summer resort available to many thousands of tourists each year, the facilities of the cultural activities branch of the department have been placed at the disposal of Dr. Love, superintendent, and on Sundays and holidays throughout the season, weather permitting, entertainment has been provided at no cost whatsoever to your department except perhaps bus transportation.

I might say that the Alberta music board has been set up under the cultural development act which is administered by the department of economic affairs at Edmonton. The letter continues:

> Up to now, the detail involved in arranging for the entertainment Sunday after Sunday has been in the capable hands of Miss Audrey Ladler, the secretary of the branch, and whilst there is no suggestion of any change being made, we are of the opinion that the time is ripe for your department to enter into an official agreement whereby the cultural activities branch—for a consideration—undertakes to provide satisfactory entertainment whenever required at the park.
> We feel that your estimates should contain an appropriation—the amount of which need not be very large—so that when the supply of volunteer entertainers runs out, Miss Ladler would be in a position to offer a small fee to ensure that each Sunday and holiday the public visiting the park is provided with a concert of some description. Whilst we are aware that in every community groups are to be found ready and willing to display their talent without remuneration, after a little while the person charged with the responsibility of making the arrangements finds that the source of supply has dried up and is unable to continue asking groups to do something for nothing.
> Our suggestion is that you include in the budget for Elk island park a sum adequate to provide transportation, at least one meal, and a small donation, to each group asked to perform in the park. Should you accede to this request, we feel confident that the task of the person in charge of arrangements will be made much lighter, and the calibre of entertainment will be improved considerably. At the same time, the prestige of your department will undoubtedly be enhanced by the fact that you are providing patrons with an organized schedule.

During the past summer a male chorus from my home town of Vermilion put on a concert there one day, and a week from Sunday a ladies' choir from the same town is entertaining at the same park. I have read of other groups in surrounding towns lying between the park and Edmonton, and some in other directions, having promised their support to the program. I feel that because of the importance of Elk Island national park at the present time, and the large number of local and outside people who are being entertained there every Sunday and holidays and other days during the week as well, the minister would be doing a service to Canada by acceding to the request in this letter.

Mr. Bryce: I should like to ask the minister one or two questions about Riding Mountain national park. I have spoken about this matter before and have asked the minister to encourage larger camp sites there so that ordinary people can take advantage of them. The park is only about 150 miles from Winnipeg. It is an ideal situation for people from the whole area to come and spend a holiday at reasonable cost in these times of such high prices. I was not able to go there last year, but I intend to go this year. I was there two years ago. I had the idea from the minister in charge at that time that they intended to instal additional sewers and electric wiring along the lines of the camp site. I drew the minister's attention at that time to the fact that the use of coal oil lamps and other out-of-date lighting methods was very dangerous when so many people were visiting the camp sites. Would the minister tell me what extensions have been made there and what program is contemplated for this summer? Have you completed the highway through the park, running from Onanole through to Dauphin? Will you be able to accommodate more people this year than you could two years ago?

Mr. Winters: The electric wiring in Riding Mountain national park, to which the hon. member referred, is completed. It was completed last year. The road work to which he referred will be undertaken this year. There is quite a program of road construction in Riding Mountain national park. In reply to the last question as to whether or not we can accommodate more people in Riding Mountain this year than formerly, the answer is yes, we can.

Mr. Bryce: How many more streets?

Mr. Winters: There are about 200 new lots.

Mr. Fair: Would the minister comment on the remarks I made a couple of minutes ago?

Mr. Winters: I might say the matter brought to my attention by the hon. member is something I have discussed with the hon. member for Vegreville, and I have also had the representation to which the hon. member referred. We have of course put the facilities of the camp at the disposal of this music association, such as a shell, and have tried to assist this voluntary effort, which is a very good one, in every possible way. We feel, however, that we cannot undertake to pay their expenses to and from the park, but nevertheless we will do everything we can with the facilities at our disposal to encourage this voluntary effort.

Mr. Fair: I think the minister did not get my remarks correctly. I said the service was being rendered without any cost at the present time with the possible exception of bus transportation. The request made is, in the event that the supply of voluntary performers should run out, to enable those in charge of operating the program to ask somebody to come and be able to pay for their bus transportation, a meal, and possibly some donation.

Mr. Harkness: I think it is some five years ago now that I brought to the attention of the house and the then minister the fact that facilities in our national parks, and particularly in the parks at Banff and Jasper, were such that it required a fairly sizeable income to be able to go there to enjoy the parks. In other words, there was very little low-priced accommodation available. I made a strong plea at that time that some low-priced cabins should be erected. I think it was about two years later that some small move was made in this direction. Some buildings which had been used as army huts, or something of that sort, were moved into the park, and in that way a certain amount of low cost accommodation was provided. How far that has gone and how much low cost accommodation of that type there is in the parks I do not know. The first question I should like to ask the minister is what there is at the present time at Banff park particularly in the way of low-cost accommodation, cabins and so forth, where people with low incomes can afford to spend the night. I do not think the way in which this was done was particularly suitable, namely, the conversion of army huts. However, it was some help, though of course there was some complaint in Banff about the thing being done this way. I should like to impress upon the minister that a good deal more of this sort of thing should be done in our national parks. We should have cabins, which could be built at comparatively low cost, that would be in keeping with the natural surroundings. They could be built reasonably with these bark-sided boards; they would look quite all right and could be rented to people at low rates.

There is another side to this question of providing these facilities to people who are not wealthy. At the present time in Banff the building regulations are quite strict, so that it is impossible for people in the middle and lower income groups to build summer cottages or homes. The last list of lots of which I received a copy was dated May 25, 1950. The first ten or twelve listed give the legal description; the price of each lot is $650, and then the minimum value of the building to be constructed is given as $10,000. In other words, you cannot build anything costing less than that. Another group of lots in this list must have buildings costing at least $6,000, and there is one on which the building must cost at least $7,500. In other words, the very least a man can spend on a building is $6,000, and of course in addition to that there is the cost of his lot which he does not buy but leases. In other words, only comparatively wealthy people can afford to build houses in Banff. Of course buildings put up in places like that are used chiefly as summer cottages, and to some extent as ski lodges during the winter.

It seems to me these limits could be greatly reduced. The departmental officials say these restrictions are enforced so that only buildings which conform to the general amenities and conditions will be erected; but buildings that would conform to the other buildings in Banff, buildings which would be a credit to the park and which would not detract from anything there now, could be built for much less than these amounts. I would refer the minister particularly to a hut that has been erected at the ski camp on Mount Norquay for first aid purposes. This hut is quite a good looking building on the outside. It is in a rustic style, which is approved as far as Banff is concerned, and I presume was erected by the department. A building like that would be quite in keeping with the other buildings, and with the addition of a fireplace and plumbing facilities would be all many people would require for either a ski lodge or summer cottage. I can see no reason in the world why these minimum costs could not be brought down and the general appearance of the buildings governed by a regulation providing that they must be something along the lines of this ski hut, or such other specifications as may be approved.

In addition to the other question I asked, therefore, I should like the minister to tell me whether any consideration has been given this question of reducing the minimum cost which governs the buildings on these lots, and also what land is still available and will or may be opened up in the form of leased lots upon which people could build houses in Banff.

Mr. Winters: With respect to the matter of camp sites, a new area was opened last year at Summit lake which will enable campers to accommodate themselves either by tent or by trailer. Recently sixty low rental cabins were made available for occupancy at from $2 to $2.50 per day for a single person and an additional $1 for each extra person.

Mr. Harkness: Were those cabins or converted army huts?

Mr. Winters: Some were converted army huts. As to the housing standards in Banff, I think it important, and I think the hon. member will agree that it is important, to maintain a standard that will bring about buildings in keeping with the general high standards prevailing in the park. When all things are considered, when we consider the advantages residents of the national parks have, I think it will be agreed that they get good value for their money. The hon. member asked if it would be possible to extend the use of cabins such as the one built for first aid purposes. That was a one-room cabin costing in the vicinity of $2,000. It would be quite unsuitable for permanent occupancy, and I do not think we could contemplate the extension of its use for housing purposes.

Mr. Harkness: I indicated that I had in mind the exterior appearance of this first aid hut at Norquay, which is quite in keeping with the park standards. I said that with the addition of a fireplace and plumbing facilities it would meet the needs of many people. Of course it is a big hut, and if it were to be used as a summer cottage, I suppose it would be partitioned inside. A hut of that kind, in keeping with the general appearance of things in Banff, I should think could be constructed for $3,000 at the most, complete with plumbing, and probably for less because the cost of constructing it in Banff would be less than the cost of building it up on Mount Norquay, where it is situated. The minister has really gone around the question in the answer he has given. I should like to know if any consideration has been given to reducing these cost requirements and allowing people to build houses along the lines, architecturally speaking and from the exterior point of view, of this first aid hut at Norquay.

Mr. Winters: As I recall it, the hon. member said the minimum amount that could be spent on a house was something in the order of $10,000.

Mr. Harkness: I said the lowest figure on this list was $6,000, and up to $10,000.

Mr. Winters: The minimum permitted under the regulations is $4,500, which under present conditions would seem to be about the lowest amount that could be fixed and still maintain the standards required in Banff national park.

Mr. Harkness: The official minimum may be $4,500, but I have not heard of any lots being opened for building purposes on which that was the limit. In this list there are fourteen lots on which the limit is $10,000. On one the limit is $7,500, and on ten the limit is $6,000. That is all there are, and I have not heard of any others being opened up for some considerable time. I wonder if the minister could tell me whether in the last two or three years any lots have been leased upon which a $4,500 house could be built.

Mr. Winters: A new subdivision is being opened near the station in Banff. I am not clear as to whether or not there are any houses on existing property now costing $4,500, but such buildings will be permitted on the new lots being opened up in that subdivision.

Mr. Harkness: At what price?

Mr. Winters: A minimum of $4,500.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, the minister has been dealing with parks that are already in existence and the administration thereof, but I should like to ask a question or two with respect to a park which has been discussed but which has not yet been created. The minister will know that in the branch of his department which deals with this matter there has been considerable discussion about the Cape Blomidon site in Nova Scotia. Some two years ago before a committee in another place a definite promise was given that this park would be established.

The minister knows this location and I think he realizes the advantages of establishing a park there. The highest tides in the world are to be found in this area. Slightly to the west at Annapolis Royal there is the background of the earliest settlement in North America. There is the history of the expulsion of the Acadians and all the historical background incidental to that particular locality.

I should like to ask what is the policy of the department with respect to establishing a park there? Is it merely temporarily discontinued or will the minister reconsider establishing a park there some time in the immediate future?

Mr. Winters: In dealing with this matter perhaps I should state at the outset that I know of no statement by an official of the department to the effect that a national park would be established at Blomidon.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Nowlan: In another place.

Mr. Winters: By a departmental official?

Mr. Nowlan: Two years ago.

Mr. Winters: It did not come to my attention. At any rate, the matter of establishing a national park at Blomidon has been the subject of discussion, certainly in Nova Scotia, for a considerable time and has also been a matter of investigation. It is a matter in which I am considerably interested because I have spent some very pleasant hours at Blomidon looking over that magnificent scene and from where one can see a number of counties spreading out across the plain below.

The survey by the officials of the department reveals that the area in question does not conform to the standards laid down for national parks. Perhaps I should enumerate some of the salient requirements for a national park. They are as follows:

1. The area should be representative of the most outstanding type of scenic lands in the province.

2. The area should be of such a size as to provide a compact terrain adequately to support all forms of indigenous animals through all seasons and within the boundaries of the area.

3. The area should provide features suitable for recreational development.

4. It is preferable that the boundaries of the area conform to natural features such as height of land, rivers and shore lines.

5. Should only embrace as far as possible lands in the natural state.

6. Should not involve lands primarily suitable for agricultural use.

7. Should not disturb present settlement which is self-supporting on the lands involved.

8. Preferably lands still in the ownership of the crown.

9. Accessibility to centres of population or highways of tourist travel.

10. No excessive costs in construction of facilities required for the enjoyment of the public.

Dealing with the Cape Blomidon site on the basis of the above, it is an area unique in its natural formation but not entirely representative of the Nova Scotia seacoast and does not contain any other natural features such as inlets, lakes, streams or rolling hills as found typical of the general terrain of Nova Scotia. In so far as scenic attractiveness is concerned, it has only one feature of interest, its rugged precipitous shore line with views overlooking the sea and adjacent lands.

It is apparent from results of farming on lands now under cultivation that most of the land on the peninsula is productive. In the area under survey of about twenty-five square miles there are in the neighbourhood of 125 habitations in small communities such as Scotts Town and scattered farms, stores, schools, churches, sawmills, garages, service stations, etc. To include these lands in their entirety would result in considerable disturbance to people already established and apparently making a living.

To eliminate the lands now under cultivation from a possible park area would reduce land for consideration to about twelve square miles. This area would start from a sharp point at Cape Split and gradually widen at the eastern end at Borden Brook where the width would be approximately two miles. Such an area as described above would be of little use for preservation of wildlife in its natural state. Almost the entire coast line would be precipitous or bold rocky shore and, combined with the extremely high tides, would be of no use to the public for any form of recreation.

The conclusion that one must come to is that the area is not of the calibre usually considered for development as a national park inasmuch as the area is restrictive in size owing to the necessity of not disturbing lands now settled on and it has not the features for the usual all-round development for national parks.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, before we took recess at six o'clock I listened to a debate among the hon. member for Royal, the minister and the hon. member for Saint John-Albert. I was reminded of a story which with your permission I should like to relate to the committee. It is short and of the parlour variety. A noted English professor who had reached the limit in English culture employed a beautiful stenographer. One day his wife came into his studio and found that instead of sitting on her chair the stenographer was sitting on the professor's knee. She said, "John, I am surprised." He said, "I thought you had better English than that; it is I who am surprised; you are astounded."

I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Royal state that the opening of the Fundy park was rather a political opening.

Mr. Winters: No, that is not the case. I thought we disposed of that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McLure: I am not dealing with that. If the minister will possess his soul in patience I will come to the point.

Mr. Winters: I just did not want the hon. member to say that it was a political opening because I thought we had disposed of that point.

Mr. McLure: We will cancel that. I was going to say that I was pleased to hear the explanation of that meeting and the answer given by the minister to the hon. member for Royal. Where I was astounded was when the hon. member for Saint John-Albert went to work to make the minister's good explanation look as though it should be abolished. However, I really rose to deal with something else.

The minister visits our province quite frequently and I notice that he is booked to be there on June 11. I am sure that will be political because he is to speak in the by-election; that is, if the press report is correct.

Mr. Winters: When will the hon. member be there for that purpose?

Mr. McLure: I am not saying just now.

Mr. Winters: Is this the ace in the hole?

Mr. McLure: When the hon. member made his previous visit to Charlottetown and the island in general, I was astonished at him on several occasions. As one representative of that dual constituency, I was astonished that I never enjoyed from him even the courtesy of a telephone call. That circumstance made me believe that all his visits there were purely political like the one on June 11. However, that was not anything that was going to embarrass me, because probably the people he was associating with did not require me. I would, however, say this to the minister. There were several things down there in the interests of the constituency as to which, if he had had my information, he would have been saved some considerable trouble that is going to take place in the near future. But we will deal with that matter when we come to another item. What I want to deal with here on this item is historic sites. I want to say a word about an historic site in connection with the Rustico-Cavendish national park. As every hon. member in this committee knows—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must inform the hon. member for Queens that item 384 does not deal with historic sites but item 385 does.

Mr. McLure: Is this item not on historic sites?

The Deputy Chairman: No, not this one; the next one is.

Mr. McLure: The heading is "national parks branch".

The Deputy Chairman: Branch administration.

Mr. McLure: It is national parks and historic sites services, under branch administration, is it not?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is the next item.

The Deputy Chairman: Item 385 is the one that deals with national parks and historic sites services. Item 384 deals with national parks branch, branch administration. However, if the hon. member is almost finished with his remarks, and if he has unanimous consent, he may carry on.

Mr. McLure: With all due respect to the chairman, I cannot yet understand why this is not the first item: branch administration, national parks and historic sites services, the details of which are to be found at page 383. Where are we going to put in national parks? We were just speaking about them a little while ago.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member will not be surprised nor astonished if I tell him that that at page 383 appear the details of the resolution which is item 384, which relates to national parks branch, branch administration, $22,780. If the hon. member turns to page 384, he will see the details of item 385; and that item deals with national parks and historic sites services. But as we are now on item 384, historic sites should not be discussed. As I said, however, if the hon. member has the unanimous consent of the committee—

Mr. Winters: Let us carry item 384.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member will not forget that item 383, departmental administration, was carried this afternoon.

Mr. McLure: Then I take it that this is a misprint, Mr. Chairman, because we find that national parks were discussed this evening. If we leave historic sites, and go on to item 385, if I want to speak on that subject I fear that I will then be ruled out of order because it should have been discussed under item 384.

The Deputy Chairman: I can assure the hon. member that if he discusses historic sites under item 385, he will not be ruled out of order.

Mr. McLure: Will you assure me that, on the next item, we can talk as long as we like on historic sites? I refer to item 385.

The Deputy Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Higgins: Before item 384 is passed, may I ask this question? This afternoon the minister told me that a survey had been made. Can he tell me where the surveys were made, or in what areas the surveys were made?

Mr. Winters: The areas surveyed were the Salmonier area in the Avalon peninsula; the Placentia area in the upper Avalon peninsula between Placentia bay and Fortune bay; and the Bonavista bay area.

Mr. Higgins: Which area is given the preference? Or which area appears to be the best?

Mr. Winters: Of those four, the Bonavista area has a great deal to commend it. All areas have many features that would make them desirable for national parks. But of the four, the Bonavista bay area has the most to commend it.

Mr. Higgins: The Bonavista area has the best chance.

Item agreed to.

National parks branch—

385. National parks and historic sites services—administration, operation and maintenance, $3,153,594.

Mr. McLure: What I was going to speak about, Mr. Chairman, was an historic site in the Cavendish-Rustico national park of Prince Edward Island. Every member of this committee, if he has not forgotten it, knows that associated with and near to the national park is the home and birthplace of our great authoress, Lucy Maude Montgomery Macdonald, one of the greatest that Canada has produced. This authoress has done more for the advertising of Prince Edward Island in particular and for Canada in general than all the agencies of advertising with anything that has ever been put out at no expense to the province.

Her birthplace is quite near to the national park. At one time, as I understand it—and I raised this matter last year—it was in the possession of the federal parks; then by some kind of a shuffle it gradually came in under the government of the province. Both the federal government and the provincial government had a nickel so close to their eyebrows that they could not see the golden dollars of advertising beyond that this home would bring from the many people that came to Prince Edward Island. Then the provincial government offered this property for sale, and it was not advertised a great deal. Finally the birthplace of this great authoress was sold to a retired farmer, a fine gentleman. It is well that it went into his hands, because I am sure that if the government and the parks branch would communicate with this man they would be assured of getting this property back as a real asset to the national parks. I know that hundreds of people—yes, thousands—who come there are always anxious to come and see the land of Cavendish and also to see the birthplace of the great authoress. I want the minister to take this matter under consideration and to see if something can be done with regard to getting it back as an asset to the national parks. Today I had several letters from the people in that locality asking me to bring the matter again to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Knight: I welcome very much and congratulate the department upon its development of the Prince Albert park at lake Waskesiu. At page 387 of the estimates there is an item which shows an increase of potential expenditure of over 100 per cent, namely, $442,125. I should like some explanation of this expenditure. I take it it is a large capital expenditure. Can the minister tell me what it is? My second question has to do with the hard surfacing of the road through that particular park. What is the status of that? I know it was begun; I wonder whether it has been completed.

Mr. Winters: I think that this question might more properly be asked under item 386, since it has to do with construction, but perhaps I should say that the increase is for construction of the road in the Prince Albert national park. The large increase is owing to the fact that we are going to do work there that should have been done last year. We did not have a vote for it last year, and we are now going to do the work necessary to finish that road and protect the work that was already done on it.

Mr. Knight: There is something there, and perhaps it is historic. I refer to the property of the late Mr. Mackenzie King. Can the minister inform me what has been the disposition of that particular property? It is a beautiful cottage that Mr. King used on occasion.

Mr. Winters: I have been told that just before Mr. King died he transferred that property to some other person.

Mr. Cavers: Since we are dealing with the matter of national historic sites I think that we in Canada have not given enough attention to preserving and in some cases restoring many of our national historic sites. Our neighbours to the south of us have derived great satisfaction from national and historic sites which portray much of their history and past events and which they keep in a proper state of repair. I would suggest to the historic sites service that some means might be taken to preserve and restore the building which was the birthplace of Sir John A. Macdonald at Cataraqui, Ontario. Sir John was Canada's first prime minister, and a great Canadian. I am told by persons who live in and about the city of Kingston that the building has fallen into disrepair and is in a very dilapidated condition at the present time. It would seem to me that it is in the national interest and quite fitting that some effort should be made to restore this site as a national historic site for Canada.

Mr. Herridge: I heartily subscribe to the sentiments expressed by the previous speaker, because I am always in favour of doing much more than we are doing at the present time to indicate our historic sites. Will the minister explain to the committee just how much money was spent last year in the preservation and marking of historic sites? How does the historic sites and monuments board work? It is a bit of a mystery to many people.

Mr. Winters: Last year $110,000 was spent on historic sites, their maintenance and marking. The national historic sites and monuments board assembles periodically in Ottawa, and reviews all sites that have been brought to its attention by interested parties. The board decides whether a site should be marked as being in the national interest; that is, whether or not that site is nationally significant in the development of Canada's history.

Mr. Charlton: Has the government ever given any consideration to a grant for the upkeep and repair of Chiefswood, just outside of Brantford on the banks of the Grand river, which was the birthplace of Pauline Johnson, the outstanding Canadian poetess?

Mr. Winters: No, Mr. Chairman; that has never been brought to the attention of the historic sites and monuments board to my knowledge.

Mr. Charlton: Yes, it has. I wrote to the historic sites and monuments board last year regarding it, and never had any word from them.

Mr. Winters: I shall look into it. I was not aware of that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Riley: Have the minister and his department settled on any policy in respect to the laying out of and making available sites for private summer residences in Fundy national park? If so, can the minister give me some idea as to the location of the sites, if there is more than one site available, and what restrictions may be imposed upon the buildings and the specifications for the buildings? I can assure him, before he speaks, that not many of us in the province of New Brunswick are able to construct a summer home to the value of $10,000, as was referred to by the hon. member for Calgary East a moment ago.

Mr. Winters: An area has been set aside on the shore of the park to the west of the swimming pool, which will provide for 52 lots, but the regulations have not yet been established as to the type of dwelling that will be permitted to be built there.

Mr. Higgins: I think the minister will agree that the marking of historic sites is very important as an attraction to tourists. I understand that the historic sites board has been meeting in Ottawa fairly recently. Can the minister tell me what sites have been decided on to be marked in Newfoundland? In what way are they to be marked?

Mr. Winters: The historic sites and monuments board did meet in Ottawa. They made certain recommendations. I have not yet received the recommendations, and I have thus not had the opportunity of reviewing them.

Mr. Higgins: The minister does not even know how they are to be marked?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In an answer given by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport on May 30 to a question asked by my colleague from St. John's East regarding the demolition of a building at Fort Amherst, as reported at page 3543 of Hansard, he said:

> The department has referred the problem to the national historic sites and monuments board, and will abide by the recommendation and decision of that board.

This is a very historic spot, connected with Lord Amherst, who was commander in chief of the forces that conquered Canada in 1759. The two forts are named after two generals in the British army of that day, and are known as Fort Townsend and Fort Amherst. Is the minister in a position to make any recommendation?

Mr. Winters: That particular site did come before the historic sites and monuments board, but the recommendation has not yet reached me. However, pending developments, officials of the department have instructed that demolition work cease.

Mr. McLure: What is the annual operating and maintenance cost of Prince Edward Island national park? What are the revenues from concessions, rentals and sales, and also from the golf course?

Mr. Winters: I wonder if we could have another question while the answer to that one is being secured.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise a subject that I have mentioned on earlier occasions. I would go back to a suggestion I made before, and use it for the purpose of suggesting a somewhat different approach in respect of the preservation of some of these historic sites. I notice the minister in speaking of the sites referred to the marking of them. I must confess that in my view in many cases the mere marking of sites has relatively little effect, except for those who are actually living there and who know what the marking is supposed to indicate. People passing through simply see a stone, or some sort of mark, and perhaps know very little about it.

One of the points that could be borne in mind in connection with these historic sites is that many of them provide the possibility of a substantial revenue from any investment that is made. After all, at a time when we are urging economy, it is appropriate to suggest that the expenditures may be more than carried in many cases by the returns received.

I offer as an illustration the restored fort at Kingston, old Fort Henry, which is a very substantial source of revenue. That of course is administered by the government of Ontario, but it illustrates what I have in mind.

There is another place I should like to mention particularly, and I suggest that the minister himself may have a natural reason for sharing my view as to the importance of that site. I refer to the Bell property at the end of Bras d'Or lakes. I am not referring to it simply because it was the home in which Alexander Graham Bell lived during his later years, and actually did carry out some of his last experiments. I am referring to it particularly because at that point is undoubtedly one of the greatest collections of experimental models to be found anywhere on this continent. That is a collection which would be a challenge to the mind of any young Canadian. There, in a wooden building, near the old Bell homestead, is collected a complete set of Bell experimental models, from which the telephone was patented. There are also the early models of the tetrahedral kites which were the forerunner of the first aircraft built anywhere in the British empire at that time. There is there also the actual aircraft which was first flown anywhere within what was then commonly described as the British empire. There is also there a collection of experimental models of air propellers of all types, which show the earliest experiments in that particular field.

There is also a collection of models of gramophones. It is a matter of great historic interest that Edison and Bell were working at the same time on the gramophone, and that Edison just happened to beat Bell out by a matter of a few days or weeks. There are also models of an extremely interesting device invented by Bell, and which he described as a parafoil, to be used for the purpose of attacking submarines in the first world war. I do not believe they were ever used, but they did constitute an extremely important development and provided basic knowledge for some of the later devices employed in antisubmarine warfare.

I mention this to indicate some of the actual working models which are part of the history of scientific development in this country, and which are distinctly Canadian. I do suggest the time is long overdue for the taking of effective steps to house these extremely valuable models, which could never be replaced, in a fireproof building, so that they may be a centre of attraction and stand as a challenge to the imagination of young Canadians.

Although my association with the province of Nova Scotia is not as direct as that of the minister, I might say that I urged consideration of the project long before I came to this house, because to my mind it was one of the most inspiring and challenging experiences I have had to see collected there in one place this evidence of the great inventive genius which was brought to full development here in Canada.

I believe the minister would be doing something which would bring splendid results if he were to see that these were placed in a collection in a manner somewhat similar to what has been done at Dearborn, in connection with the Edison models, and with a view to having them reproduced in photographic form for distribution in all the schools.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I recall that last year in the discussion on the estimates I enjoyed and was greatly impressed by what was said in this connection by the leader of the opposition. Subsequently I spoke to the premier of Nova Scotia, who has close association with that part of the country, and of course has a particularly keen interest in it. He informed me he believed that most of the items to which the leader of the opposition has referred have since been removed from the site in question. He said however that he would bear the matter in mind and look into it. I can assure the leader of the opposition that I shall pursue it further.

Mr. Drew: I do not wish to extend the discussion, because I know the minister is interested in this subject. What he has said, however, impresses me with the need of taking some positive action. It would be most unfortunate if those models had been removed. Not only were they of immense historical value, but they are of immense value to Canada because they were produced in this country as the results of efforts made in this country. If they are being removed, or have been removed, then I suggest that steps should be taken to get them back if possible and have them housed in a proper building which would stand as a shrine for those who are interested in one of the greatest experimental and inventive geniuses this world has produced.

National parks and historic sites services—

386. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $4,186,704.

Mr. Harkness: What is the program for the hard-surfacing of roads? It is $2,762,000 as against $528,000 last year.

Mr. Winters: This will take some searching through the records. There is quite a program of work on roads in national parks. The basis on which we have approached it this year is that a great many roads were graded last year, and we are taking the steps that are necessary to protect the investment by keeping the roads from deteriorating. This requires us to do a considerable amount of paving this year. If the hon. member would care to reframe his question and ask me about any particular park I can give him the information. Otherwise I will have to extract from the projects in each park and then consolidate it.

Mr. Harkness: I am not questioning for a moment the necessity of the surfacing. As a matter of fact I am only too delighted it is going to be done.

Mr. Winters: I know.

Mr. Harkness: There is no doubt there were many roads in the national parks which were getting into bad shape and which needed resurfacing quite badly. I will just ask one specific question. Does this include the surfacing of the road from Banff down to Radium?

Mr. Winters: Yes, it does, a distance of sixty-six miles.

Mr. Harkness: Then that is not the entire distance. That is just the section from the road junction at Castle mountain, now Eisenhower mountain, to Radium.

Mr. Winters: From Eisenhower junction to Radium.

Mr. Harkness: What about the road from Banff to the eastern limits of the park? Is any resurfacing going to take place there this year?

Mr. Winters: Just repair work on that; there is no resurfacing program.

Mr. Harkness: There are sections which need quite a bit of repair work, and I would hope that that would be done. Under construction of buildings, is there anything in this vote of $294,000 for the construction of low rental cabins that I was talking about earlier?

Mr. Winters: No, there is not.

Mr. Harkness: I would recommend that the minister have that included in his estimates for next year because it is one of the great needs of the parks. There is no question about that. What has been done so far has not even begun to meet the need for low rental cabins in the national parks. They have not really scratched the surface.

Mr. Winters: The matter is being borne in mind.

Mr. Harkness: As to the item of construction of roads, bridges and trails, is there anything provided for the construction of hiking trails in Banff national park, which could also be used in the winter as ski trails?

Mr. Winters: In this year's estimates, and in view of circumstances with which all hon. members are familiar, we are simply undertaking a program of maintenance of existing trails.

Mr. Harkness: The latter statement is manifestly wrong because this vote of $399,000 is for the construction of roads, bridges and trails. Therefore the matter of maintenance is not the only thing concerned. There is going to be nearly $400,000 spent on construction. The question of building hiking and ski trails is one which has also been brought up every year, I think, for the past six or seven years, and very little has ever been done about it. It is one of the things which would enable a lot of people who enjoy what is called cross-country skiing to do a great deal more along that line. The trails could also be used in the summertime for hiking. It has been represented to the department year after year that a great need would be filled, particularly as far as young people are concerned who cannot afford an expensive holiday, if they could go into the park and hike along these trails in the summer or ski along them in the winter. The cost would be comparatively small. It is a cheap operation and would only require a certain amount of clearing. It does not require a lot of grading and so on that is necessary in the building of a road. At the same time if log cabins or shacks, whatever you want to call them, were constructed at intervals along these trails people could use them for places in which to eat a meal, or if they had their blankets they could stay there overnight.

[Mr. Winters.]

An hon. Member: Spend more money.

Mr. Johnston: I should like to ask the minister whether oiling of the roads is included in this vote.

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Johnston: How much is spent on oiling roads and to whom is the contract let? I am referring particularly to Banff.

Mr. Winters: The oil is purchased on a tender basis, the contract going to the lowest tenderer, and the work is done by day labour.

Mr. Johnston: Is it in all cases let to the lowest bidder, and who has the contract or contracts for the oiling of the Banff park roads?

Mr. Winters: To my knowledge, in all cases the contracts are awarded to the lowest tenderer. Speaking from memory, the officials of the department say they believe that Imperial Oil received the contract for oil in Banff park.

Mr. Johnston: Is it not true that Brewsters do a lot of that oiling, or do they get it as a subcontract?

Mr. Winters: We have no knowledge of any such arrangement.

Mr. Riley: There is an item in the details of $338,500 for Fundy park. Would the minister give us some information as to approximately how much of this money will be used this year to pay for hard surfacing of roads within the park, and whether the building of any additional cabins for tourists in the present concession area is contemplated? While I am on that subject, I should like to congratulate the minister and the officers of the department on the splendid type of accommodation they have provided there for tourists. The reason why I am interested in knowing whether or not any additional cabins will be constructed is that I know the officials of the park must anticipate an increase in the demand for this type of accommodation this summer. They were highly popular during the last tourist season, and I think they will be even more popular during the coming season.

Mr. Winters: It is not planned this year to add to the twenty-nine cabins already available in the park. The amount of money for hard surfacing in Fundy park this year is $200,000.

Mr. Riley: How many miles of hard surfacing does the department plan to complete this year?

Mr. Winters: We plan to complete 12·5 miles.

Mr. Harkness: Looking at the details on page 387, I see that for construction or acquisition and so forth in national parks there is roughly $400,000 for Banff, $569,000 for Jasper and $831,000 for Kootenay. Can the minister tell us what these respective sums are for? Apparently they are all for new building of some kind.

Mr. Winters: Those large items of expenditure are for the road programs in the three parks.

Mr. Harkness: They are all for roads?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Johnston: Referring back to the question I asked a moment ago, the minister said a contract was let to Imperial Oil for the oiling. I then asked if there was any subletting of contracts, and I do not recall that the minister answered that question.

Mr. Winters: I thought I had answered it. I said we had no knowledge or recollection of any such arrangement.

Mr. Brooks: Last year I asked the minister the cost of constructing the golf course at Fundy park, and at that time he told me that construction was not completed. If he has the figure now I should like to have it. I should like to know also the cost of construction of the superintendent's house at Fundy park.

Mr. Winters: We do not have that information available this evening, but I will be very glad to send it to the hon. member for Royal at an early date, if that is satisfactory.

Mr. Brooks: You should take a leaf out of the book of the Minister of Agriculture. He always has an answer.

Mr. Winters: I had an answer, but not the one the hon. member wanted.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like some information with respect to the acquisition of cars and trucks, for which an amount of $90,200 is provided this year. I should like to know how that is distributed. I am especially interested in this because a return was brought down this session showing that for the Cape Breton national park one truck was acquired in 1946 and fourteen more have been acquired since that time, making a total of fifteen. I would ask the minister if the purchase of fifteen trucks for the Cape Breton national park in the last four years is justified. In view of the fact that the construction work has been done on a contract basis it seems to me this is a large number of motor vehicles for the department to have there. I should like to know, too, how much of the $90,200 in the estimates for this purpose this year will be assigned to Cape Breton national park.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): While the minister is looking up that information I wonder if I might make a personal explanation in reference to the incident which occurred yesterday and which caused Your Honour some inconvenience. When we were dealing with item 427 I made reference to a former debate on the National Housing Act and charged that I had been prevented by you from speaking on a certain aspect of the matter. I was absent from the house when Your Honour made a statement dealing with the incident in detail and quoting extensively from Hansard of that time. I have read your statement and find that my assertion was incorrect. It was made inadvertently and without any intention of reflecting upon your impartiality, which I hold in high esteem. Accordingly I wish to express my sincere regret for any annoyance and inconvenience I may have caused you, and would like to withdraw the assertion I made.

The Deputy Chairman: I should perhaps say to the hon. member that he has taken the whole incident with good grace, and I am very happy it has been concluded in this way.

Mr. Winters: In reply to the question of the hon. member for Cumberland, funds are earmarked this year for one jeep for Cape Breton national park. The records of the departmental officials indicate that about five vehicles were purchased last year for Cape Breton national park as replacements.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): And how many have been assigned to that park, under the machinery they have for administering it? What is the total?

Mr. Winters: May I send the hon. member that information?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I would prefer to have it on Hansard. There is more information I would like from the minister with respect to this park. It would appear from a return brought down on March 19 that three contracts for highway and bridge construction have been given to one firm on a cost plus fixed fee basis. In 1949 the work was given the Fundy Construction Company, and the total expenditure was $413,101. For the following year, 1950, the expenditure was $467,434 and for 1951 the amount is $803,992. The total for the three years, if I have added it correctly, is $1,684,527. All this work has been awarded on the basis of cost plus fixed fee. Replies to questions asked at that time do not indicate the basis of the fixed fee. A certain amount of machinery and equipment was also rented. I would like to know how much equipment was rented and on what basis, and whether the rental of equipment is covered by the fixed fee. Can the minister give the committee that information? All this work was given to one contractor, the Fundy Construction Company.

Mr. Winters: The basis of the contract is cost plus a fixed fee, as the hon. member has said, but that is arrived at in this way. The department calls for tenders to be submitted on the basis of rates for the rental of the equipment involved, plus their figure for the fixed fee. The contract is awarded to the contractor who submits the over-all arrangement that gives the best rental figure for the equipment involved and the lowest fixed fee. It is comparative and competitive.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Would the minister state what was the fixed fee and what were the various tenders submitted to the department?

Mr. Winters: For which year?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): For the three years. I would like to have all the information. I understood the minister to say that this contract was let to the Fundy Construction Company because they submitted the lowest fixed fee. I would like to know what that fixed fee was for each of the three years.

Mr. Winters: We do not have that information available this evening, but I would be glad to give the hon. member any information he wishes with respect to any contract. I understand most of it is available in the public accounts, but I would be glad to give it to the hon. member privately, or make a return of it, or any way he wishes.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to have the information and I do not want it given privately because many people in Cape Breton are interested in this matter. I have been asking for the information and I am rather disappointed that I cannot secure it. I should like to know what equipment was rented by the department, and on what basis. I should like to know how much was paid for each vehicle and the total amount paid for each piece of equipment during the different seasons.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Not until we get some information.

Mr. Winters: We have the information of course, but it is not before me at the moment. I can certainly get it for the hon. member and I shall be glad to give it to him, either now or at a later date.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I prefer to have it now. However, I want to make it convenient for the minister. Unless there is great trouble in securing it, I should like to have it now.

[Mr. Black (Cumberland).]

Mr. Riley: While the information is being sought I should like to direct the minister's attention to something I started to bring up this afternoon on another item but apparently I was out of order. I was referring to a post office for the Fundy national park. There is a post office just outside the park at Alma. They would prefer to have a new post office in Alma but—

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mr. Riley: The self-appointed deputy chairman has called me to order, but I do not hear the chairman calling me to order.

Mr. Knowles: I rise to a point of order. Post offices are not under the Minister of Resources and Development.

The Chairman: I think the point of order is well taken; that matter should be referred to the Postmaster General.

Mr. Riley: I do not question Your Honour's decision or the decision of the self-appointed chairman, but I would like to point out that there is an item now before the committee having to do with the construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment for national parks and historic sites services. In Fundy national park the Department of Resources and Development has constructed a number of buildings, including a home for the superintendent, an administration building, a community centre, a number of tourist cabins, a clubhouse, and several other pieces of construction. One of these buildings was rented or loaned to the provincial government for its school of arts and handicrafts.

I simply want to make the recommendation that the Department of Resources and Development make available or lend to the Department of Public Works or the Post Office Department a building which could be used as a post office. May I continue, Your Honour?

The Chairman: That is in order.

Mr. Riley: I am simply suggesting that there be made available a building that would blend in with the type of building already there so that proper postal facilities may be provided for the tourists who come there to visit Fundy national park each summer. This afternoon the hon. member for Royal said that I had nothing to do with Fundy national park, but I want to assure you that I am very much interested in it. A number of representations have been made to me urging that proper postal facilities be made available for tourists. As I stated, there is a post office outside the park but it is located in a small building not adapted to use by a large number of people. They tell me that the roof leaks and the amount of rental that is paid to the owner is not sufficient to permit him to make capital repairs. Therefore I urge the Minister of Resources and Development to make some type of building available, or to persuade his colleagues and good friends, the Minister of Public Works and the Postmaster General, to see that proper facilities are made available for the people of that locality and the many tourists who visit there.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May I have the information I asked for?

Mr. Winters: I will get the information for the hon. member.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I would like the minister to arrange to have it put on Hansard following my inquiry. I would like to ask the minister what work is to be done under this item covering construction or acquisition of buildings. I notice in the details regarding Cape Breton Highlands park that $240,865 is in the estimates for the current year, which is a considerable reduction from the previous year. What is proposed to be done with this appropriation? In addition to that, there is an item covering maintenance amounting to $140,564.

Mr. Winters: Under acquisition and construction of buildings and works the following items are being arranged for:

Spreading crushed gravel from mile 36 to Pleasant Bay on Cabot Trail	$ 50,000
Completion of bridges at Clyburn and Effie's Brooks	25,000
Construction of oil shed at park headquarters	1,000
Construction of three picnic shelters	1,500
Construction of two-car garage for R.C.M.P.	2,000
Construction of parking area at golf clubhouse	1,000
Construction of forest telephone to Mt. Treney fire lookout tower five miles tree line	1,000
Construction of three toilets, three at western entrance and one at Lone Shieling	450
Landscaping grounds and thinning of trees at bungalow camp	1,000
Construction of three tool caches for fire fighting equipment	500
Construction of ten miles of fire trail	3,600
Development of camp grounds at Cheticamp river and Big Intervale	3,000
Construction of central building for low rental tourist accommodation	20,000
Construction of a sea wall and reconstruction of highway north of Presqu'ile and replacement of native timber cribs with steel cribs where necessary, between Corney Brook and the Rigwash	100,000

Mr. Black (Cumberland): How does the department intend to carry out work such as the surfacing of the road?

Mr. Winters: For the large projects we will call for tenders and issue contracts, while the smaller work will be done by the maintenance staff of the park.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Will it be done on a contract price basis or, as in the last three years, on a cost-plus basis?

Mr. Winters: We will make the best arrangement we can. Considering the nature of the work contemplated, I think we will be able to get a fixed contract.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Have any contracts been let up to the present for any of this $240,000?

Mr. Winters: No.

Mr. McLure: I want to ask one question. I see an amount for the Prince Edward Island park of $127,600. Is that for new equipment, new buildings or what? What are the details of that?

Mr. Winters: Of that, $110,000 is for hard surfacing and the remainder is for small maintenance jobs.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): In Cape Breton Highlands park how much mileage of the highway has been surfaced and what mileage has been paved up to the present time? I should like to know the cost per mile.

Mr. Winters: There has been none paved to date. About 70 miles have been gravel-surfaced.

Mr. McLure: Whereabouts in the park is that hard surfacing and wall to be built? In Dalvey, Cavendish, Rustico or where?

Mr. Winters: The project is the hard surfacing of the Dalvey-Stanhope road for approximately 4·5 miles.

Item agreed to.

Canadian wildlife service—

389. Wildlife resources conservation and development, including administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act—administration, operation and maintenance, $311,092.

Mr. Higgins: I note that there is a decrease of $2,135. I presume that is because there would be no need for supervision of the sea birds in Newfoundland this year. Seriously, I want to thank the minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the co-operation they have given in the matter of a request for the relaxation of the Migratory Birds Convention Act. I feel that when they have made this investigation that they expect to make in the next three years they will find ample evidence that there is no necessity for imposing any restrictions in the future, having regard to the reproduction of the birds. In view of the fact that we have been rather successful in the request to the minister in this connection, may I ask him to give consideration, if he is not already doing so, to the introduction of red deer to the province. I think they might well be implementing the living standard of the people and they would also be quite a great tourist attraction. I do not know whether the minister has had the proposal put to him already, but I think it is well worthy of his consideration.

Mr. Winters: The introduction of red deer to Newfoundland would be something to be initiated by the province. We would of course be glad to co-operate with them. The maintenance and care of deer in the province of Newfoundland would be the responsibility of the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Higgins: But the minister would be prepared to co-operate.

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Catherwood: Mr. Chairman, you did not call item "S" under 388. Will you permit a question under that item?

Mr. Winters: That "S" just means that it is statutory.

Mr. Catherwood: I was just going to ask the minister a question.

National parks branch—

388. (S) National battlefields commission (chap. 57, statutes of 1908, as amended), $100,000.

Mr. Catherwood: I wonder if the minister would indicate the nature of the expenditure under this item, and also where the $100,000 statutory amount will be expended? Would he also explain what is the relation between this item and the one under the battlefields memorials in the national defence estimates? Is there any connection between those two expenditures?

Mr. Winters: This is a vote that is administered by the national battlefields commission under the national battlefields act, which is the responsibility of the Minister of Resources and Development. The vote is made available to the national battlefields commission in Quebec which is responsible for the administration of the national battlefield area in Quebec. The bulk of the money is spent on maintenance operations. Some of it, of course, is spent on administration, salary of permanent personnel and all the normal expenses that go into operating that historic battlefield. It applies only to the Quebec battlefield.

[Mr. Higgins.]

National parks branch—

390. National museum of Canada—administration, operation and maintenance, $228,669.

Mr. Harkness: This is the item dealing with the national museum, which also was dealt with in the Massey report. I have only skimmed through that report lightly but the impression I gained was that it had given the government and preceding governments somewhat of a rocket over the national museum and the comparative neglect of it. I do not know what the government has in mind. I note that the expenditure last year was up considerably over that of 1949-50 and that it is down again this year. I think there is no doubt that our national museum has been neglected. The number of specimens that are in it is far too great for the accommodation that can be provided for them. They cannot be displayed properly, and little attention really has been paid to preserving in the museum a great deal of material of historic and other interest which it would be well worth our while in Canada to preserve.

I should like to ask the minister to tell us what his department proposes to do with regard to the national museum, and whether they have in mind any improvements whatever. I am prompted to ask that question particularly because, on looking over the details at pages 390 and 391, I do not see a single dollar in the estimates for the acquisition of new specimens of any kind. Of course they have far more specimens now than they can display properly. But the point is that more material should be added to that museum constantly. There is a great deal of material—and I am thinking particularly of a great deal of Indian material in western Canada—which is rapidly disappearing; and if steps are not taken to secure some of this material in the near future, it will be completely unavailable. A great deal of it has been purchased by private citizens in the United States, has been taken across there, and is used. In some cases it has been donated to museums there and in other cases it is in private hands. But in any event, a great deal of historic material of that nature has rapidly been disappearing and we shall soon be at the point where it will be completely unobtainable. I think it is well past time when steps should have been taken to secure distinctive collections of material—and that is just one example—from various parts of Canada and to house them properly in the national museum so that they will be available for our citizens more or less for all time to come.

Mr. Winters: I agree, of course, with a great deal of what the hon. member has said. The committee may recall that when this item was before hon. members last year, I said I thought that the time had come to pay more attention to the development of the national museum. But in the meantime circumstances developed that made it necessary for all of us to devote most of our energies and what funds are available to the development of the defence program. The vote therefore was cut back as were all votes of this nature.

With respect to the acquisition of specimens, there is no designation set up for that purpose. But there are parties of various types of specialists—botanists, anthropologists, zoologists and so on—in the field who collect a wide variety of specimens and make them available for the general public in the national museum.

Mr. Harkness: In my remarks I had reference not to specimens of a botanical nature but rather to specimens of historic interest, folk lore interest, native cultural interest and so on. The acquisition of those things in most cases requires a certain amount of money. These things have quite an intrinsic value apart from their value as museum pieces, and the people who have them are not going to part with them for nothing in most instances, particularly the specimens which are still left in the hands of our native population.

Mr. Riley: To what extent does the minister have jurisdiction over the art gallery which is located in the national museum building?

Mr. Winters: None, Mr. Chairman; I have no jurisdiction over it.

Item agreed to.

Engineering and water resources branch—

391. Branch administration, $65,410.

Mr. Higgins: Has the minister or his department had a request for a survey of water powers in the province of Newfoundland? If so, what has happened about it?

Mr. Winters: We have had a request, Mr. Chairman, and we are conducting stream measurements in Newfoundland at the present time.

Mr. Higgins: Has there not been an outside commercial corporation employed to do that work as well? Does the minister know of that? Was there any necessity for such employment?

Mr. Winters: I cannot answer that, Mr. Chairman. There has been no outside commercial company employed by this department.

Mr. Higgins: I take it that the department would have been prepared to complete a full survey of water power if given the time.

Mr. Winters: The function of this water resources division in the field is to make stream measurements, including flow data, and accumulate information which will be available generally to anybody who is interested, and who might be concerned with the power potentialities or any other aspects of stream flow.

Mr. Higgins: How far has the department proceeded with the matter?

Mr. Winters: We have seven stations set up now and by the end of this summer there should be ten gauging stations in operation.

Mr. Higgins: Has the minister the locations?

Mr. Herridge: Can the minister tell me what this phrase means: "Including grant of $350 to the international executive council, world power conference"?

Mr. Winters: The item to which the hon. member refers is a membership in the international executive council of the world power conference. It is just the amount to cover the membership fee.

Mr. Knowles: While the minister is answering that question can he tell us what the next item in the details is for: "Membership fee, $77"? What do we belong to that we pay that sum of money for?

Mr. Winters: I shall have to get that information. This is another of these items on which I shall have to get the information. I refer to the location of the gauging stations on these streams.

Mr. Higgins: Would the minister know if the Hamilton river in Labrador has been surveyed?

Mr. Winters: There will be one in there this year.

Mr. Higgins: There is none there yet?

Mr. Winters: No.

Mr. Drew: In view of the fact that the minister has explained the department is making certain hydrographic surveys in Newfoundland, has he been consulted in regard to the provisions of the bill that is now before the legislature of Newfoundland, known as an act to incorporate the Newfoundland and Labrador Corporation Limited?

Mr. Winters: No, I have not been consulted.

Mr. Drew: Is the minister aware of the provisions of the bill under which certain arrangements are made in regard to the development of water power in Newfoundland?

Mr. Winters: I have not read the bill and I am not aware of its detailed provisions.

Item agreed to.

Water resources division—

Water resources division, including the administration of the dominion water power and irrigation acts, and including grant of $350 to the international executive council, world power conference—

392. Administration, operation and maintenance, $585,926.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister inform us now as to what we have joined?

Mr. Winters: What is that?

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister tell us what it is we are spending $77 on? It comes under the item that we now have before us, item 392.

Mr. Winters: We are on item 391.

The Chairman: We are on item 392.

Mr. Knowles: We are on item 392 and the amount of $77 appears in the details about half way down the page.

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: What is that, the rotary club, the Liberal association or what?

Mr. Sinnott: A C.C.F. union. That is union dues.

Mr. Knowles: Are they deductible for income tax purposes?

Mr. Winters: It is membership fees for people in the waterway resources division in the various engineering associations, the engineering institute and the professional institutes of engineers, and the like.

Item agreed to.

394. To provide for studies and surveys of the Columbia river watershed in Canada, $381,095.

Mr. Harkness: This item is to provide for studies and surveys of the Columbia river watershed in Canada. The people concerned are engineers and so forth. I see down below there is the sum of $79,000 for topographical surveys and $26,000 for bathymetric surveys, and $43,000 for drilling investigations. Then there is an item of $26,000 for other professional and special services. I wonder why it is that all these surveys are separate from the cost of the various engineers, technical officers and so on, who are part of the department. Has this been done by means of extra contracts, or what is the explanation?

Mr. Winters: Although this department votes money, the surveys are carried out by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, or the Department of Public Works,

Mr. Harkness: The money is paid to the other departments, do you mean?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: Is that done on a contract basis, or do you just come to a private deal?

Mr. Winters: The other departments do it at cost for us, and we transfer the funds to them to carry out the work.

Mr. Herridge: Do I understand that on this item we must ask our questions of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys?

Mr. Winters: No. We will answer questions with respect to administration so far as we are able to and, so far as possible, we will answer with regard to details of work. However, I am sure my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys will give all that information, if he is asked, when his estimates are being considered.

Mr. Herridge: This item is of great interest to British Columbia, and particularly my constituency. How long will it be before the studies will be completed, and at what points has drilling been undertaken on the Columbia with the idea of finding foundations for dam sites? What success has there been in drilling at these various points?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Chairman, I had that information here until about ten minutes ago, but seeing that time was running out I sent it back to my office. However, I shall be pleased to supply it when my estimates are before the committee.

Mr. Winters: I can add that we contemplate the completion of the survey will take another two years.

Item agreed to.

Engineering and water resources branch—

395. To provide for studies and surveys of the Red river basin in Canada, $182,000.

Mr. Bryce: Would the minister tell us what has been done by way of work on the Red river. Is this being accomplished by the two governments, or only by ourselves? Is the American government co-operating with us in the work? I wonder if the minister would tell us what is going on, so that the people in Winnipeg will know what is taking place.

Mr. Winters: A considerable amount of work has been undertaken by this department on its own direct account and in co-operation with other departments to accumulate data in the Red river valley, and the other streams and rivers that contributed to the disastrous flooding a year ago.

We have acquired a staff in Winnipeg under the direction of Mr. G. L. MacKenzie, who is on loan to us. He is chief engineer of the prairie farm rehabilitation administration. Temporary space was obtained in the district engineer's office at Winnipeg, and later permanent accommodation was obtained from the provincial government at 221 Osborne street north. Recruiting of staff proceeded as need arose, and at the present time Mr. MacKenzie has a staff under him of sixteen, all but three of whom are engineering or technical personnel.

The work initiated and virtually complete as at this date includes the hydrographic survey of the Red river from Winnipeg to the international boundary and north from Winnipeg to lake Winnipeg. Analysis of hydrometric and meteorological data, flood records, river slopes and aerial photographs was carried on concurrently. The assistance of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys was obtained to complete precise levelling operations, and this department also conducted surveys to develop the controls in the valley as a further step to contouring the area. The full co-operation of the greater Winnipeg dyking board, the Department of Public Works, the prairie farm rehabilitation administration and the United States geological survey has been obtained. In this connection Mr. MacKenzie and two members of his staff visited the corps of engineers office at St. Paul and were able to have very useful technical discussions so that the methods of carrying out hydraulic studies and other details would be correlated. At this conference it was determined that the improvement in the United States section of the basin would create no material change in the river regimen within the reasonable future.

The actual survey work has consisted in taking cross-sections of the river generally at 1,000-foot intervals with lesser intervals being used at some of the sharp bends. Extra sections were taken above and below all bridges. These cross-sections consist of taking soundings in the river at 20-foot intervals and the topography of the banks for a distance of 100 to 500 feet beyond the top of the banks on both sides of the river. Information is also being obtained as to the nature of the bed of the river by means of probings. Certain cross-section information between Emerson and Morris was already available in the office of the district engineer, water resources division, at Winnipeg.

Information was secured regarding the hydraulic gradient of both the Red and Assiniboine rivers for various stages of water during this spring. Staff gauges were accordingly placed by Mr. MacKenzie's staff throughout the Red river from Emerson to lake Winnipeg and up the Assiniboine river to Headingly. The P.F.R.A. also established a number of gauges on the Assiniboine river from Headingly upstream.

Once the necessary surveys are complete, maps will be drawn on a scale of 600 feet to 1 inch with an accompanying profile on a horizontal scale of 1,000 feet to 1 inch, and most of the work during the coming year will consist in the preparation of plans and profiles from the information which has been gathered. The maintenance of one or two survey parties throughout most of the summer will be necessary to obtain additional data as the need for this information arises. Office studies will include investigation of possible river channel improvements, protective works, flood diversion schemes, storage or retardation possibilities, hydraulic elements and determinations of costs and benefits of various schemes or combinations of schemes. The prairie farm rehabilitation administration will be doing most of the survey work on the Assiniboine river. The dyking board has completed the Assiniboine river surveys within the city of Winnipeg. I think the danger is over for this spring.

Mr. Bryce: I thank the minister for his explanation.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Monday we will take up Bill No. 322, respecting the Canada post office. Then we will move to go into supply, and call four or five departments; and proceed with the estimates of fisheries.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Are you not going to go on with the Income Tax Act this year?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Might I ask the minister what departments he proposes calling on Monday?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I can give the hon. member a list. There are nine departments that have not been called, and subject to a change of mind I believe I would call defence production, trade and commerce, veterans affairs, post office, and citizenship and immigration.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT

National parks branch—

383. Departmental administration, $381,223.

384. Branch administration, $22,780.

National parks and historic sites services—

385. Administration, operation and maintenance, $3,153,594.

386. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $4,186,704.

387. Grant to the Jack Miner migratory bird foundation, $5,000.

388. Grant in aid of the development of the international peace garden in Manitoba, $15,000.

Canadian wildlife service—

389. Wildlife resources conservation and development, including administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act—administration, operation and maintenance, $311,092.

National Museum of Canada—

390. Administration, operation and maintenance, $228,669.

Engineering and water resources branch—

391. Branch administration, $65,410.

Water resources division—

Water resources division, including the administration of the dominion water power and irrigation acts, and including grant of $350 to the international executive council, world power conference—

392. Administration, operation and maintenance, $585,926.

393. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $50,995.

394. To provide for studies and surveys of the Columbia river watershed in Canada, $381,095.

395. To provide for studies and surveys of the Red river basin in Canada, $182,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 11, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That the name of Mr. Weaver be substituted for that of Mr. Conacher on the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to.

POLYMER CORPORATION

ANNUAL REPORT TABLED—CHANGES IN MANAGEMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I desire to lay on the table the annual report of the Polymer Corporation for the twelve months period ended March 31, 1951.

While I am on my feet I might answer a question that was asked last Friday as to changes in the directorate and management of the Polymer Corporation. Mr. E. J. Brunning, chairman and president of the corporation, due to pressure of other business finds himself unable to devote as much time as he has heretofore to the affairs of the corporation. He therefore resigns as president, but remains chairman of the board.

The board of directors accepted with regret the resignation of Mr. J. R. Nicholson, formerly executive vice-president and managing director, who leaves the corporation to accept a senior post in a large Canadian concern.

Mr. J. D. Barrington, who has been vice-president and general manager of Dominion Magnesium, Limited, and president of Light Alloys Limited, has accepted the position of full-time president and managing director of Polymer Corporation.

Mr. E. R. Rowzee, who has held the position of manager of Polymer Corporation, becomes vice-president and manager.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—QUEBEC-ST. JOACHIM LINES

Mr. Maltais:

1. What is the amount of tolls or rental paid each year by the Canadian National Railways for the use of the Quebec railway lines between Quebec and St. Joachim?

2. What is the freight rate schedule between St. Joachim and La Malbaie?

3. What is the freight rate schedule between St. Joachim and Quebec?

4. Has the Canadian National Railways any record of the freight carried during the last ten years on the section of the Clermont and St. Joachim line? If so, how much freight was carried during this period?

5. Has the Canadian National Railways any record of the freight carried on the section of the St. Joachim and Quebec line? If so, how much freight was carried during the last five years?

Mr. Benidickson: The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. The Canadian National Railways does not pay rental or tolls for the use of the Quebec Railway lines between Quebec and St. Joachim. Instead, and as is common to all interline traffic movements, revenues are divided on the basis of established divisions. Statistics are not available to indicate Quebec Railway's share of revenues derived from these interline movements, and to obtain them would involve a large amount of clerical work and extra expense.

2. Canadian National Railways' Murray Bay subdivision comprises the line between La Malbaie and St. Joachim, and the published rates reflect the regular basis of rates, which vary depending on the commodity or commodities moving. The distance from La Malbaie to St. Joachim is 63 miles, and the class rates are as shown below:

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10
—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
73	66	54	47	36	35	29	29	–	24

3. The distance over the Quebec Railway light and power line from Quebec to St. Joachim is 25·1 miles, and the class rates published by that line are reproduced hereunder:

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10
31	28	24	19	16	14	12	14	–	11

In addition, the Quebec Railway Light & Power Company, as in the case of local movements over our Murray Bay subdivision, previously mentioned, also publishes commodity rates, and these vary depending on the commodity or commodities shipped.

4 and 5. It is not the practice of the Canadian National Railways to disclose tonnage and earnings figures which might react to its disadvantage in the field of competitive effort.

Questions

BONAVENTURE, QUE., COMMERCIAL WHARF

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. Was any work performed on the commercial wharf of Bonaventure, Bonaventure county, Quebec, between May and September, 1950?
2. If so, was the work done by contract or by day labour?
3. If by contract, what was the amount thereof, and to whom was the contract awarded?
4. If by day labour, who was the supervisor or foreman of such work?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes.
2. By day labour.
3. Answered by No. 2.
4. Aubin Bernard, foreman.

REPAIRS TO MARSHALL BUILDING, ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. What has been the cost of the repairs to the Marshall building in St. John's, Newfoundland?
2. Are these repairs being made under contract as a result of tenders, and what was the amount of the contract?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. $133,507.27.
2. (a) Yes; (b) $117,410.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PRIME MINISTER'S RESIDENCE

Mr. Hodgson:

1. What are the total expenditures to date on the residence of the Prime Minister of Canada for (a) landscaping or alterations to grounds; (b) furnishing residence, including cutlery, etc.; (c) total payment to architects; (d) amount of commissions or allowances paid, and to whom; (e) total expenditures on this property?
2. What is the estimated cost to complete work authorized for this property?

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Wright:

1. What are the names and addresses of all persons employed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in Saskatchewan, during the year 1950?
2. What sum of money was paid to each person as (a) salary or wages; (b) sustenance; (c) mileage; (d) other allowances, and what was the nature of the work performed by each?
3. How many persons were employed (a) part time; (b) full time, in 1950?
4. What was the total sum paid to all (a) part time employees; (b) full time employees?
5. At what rate are (a) salaries or wages; (b) sustenance; (c) mileage; (d) other allowances, paid to common labour, foremen, all other employees, under this act?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the government of the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, and any department of the federal government, relative to the South Saskatchewan river irrigation and power project, and a copy of all engineering or other reports concerning the feasibility of the project or with reference to surveys made since January 1, 1951.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

BONAVENTURE, QUE., COMMERCIAL WHARF

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a copy of all payrolls and a statement of materials purchased in connection with the repairs to the commercial wharf of Bonaventure, Bonaventure county, Quebec, from October 1 to December 31, 1950.

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a copy of the payrolls and a statement of materials purchased in connection with the repair work done to the commercial wharf at Bonaventure, county of Bonaventure, Quebec, from May to September, 1950.

SALOMON HENRY'S WHARF, ST. SIMEON, QUE.

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a copy of payrolls and a statement of materials purchased in connection with the repair work done to Salomon Henry's wharf at St. Simeon, county of Bonaventure, Quebec, from September 1, 1949, to February, 1950.

CROSS POINT, QUE., WHARF

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a copy of all payrolls and a statement of materials purchased in connection with the repairs to the wharf at Cross Point, Bonaventure county, Quebec, from January 1 to December 31, 1950.

XAVIER POIRIER'S WHARF, ST. SIMEON, QUE.

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a copy of the payrolls and a statement of materials purchased in connection with the repair work done to Xavier Poirier's wharf at St. Simeon, county of Bonaventure, Quebec, from September 1, 1949, to February, 1950.

PROTECTION WORK IN FRONT OF CHARLES A. FOREST'S PROPERTY, BONAVENTURE, QUE.

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a copy of all payrolls and a statement of materials purchased in connection with the repair or construction of protection work in front of Charles A. Forest's property at Bonaventure, county of Bonaventure, Quebec, from October 1, to December 31, 1950.

RUISSEAU LEBLANC, QUE., WHARF

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a copy of all payrolls and a statement of materials purchased in connection with the repairs to the wharf at Ruisseau LeBlanc, county of Bonaventure, Quebec, from April to December, 1950.

FAUVEL, QUE., WHARF

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a copy of all payrolls and a statement of materials purchased in connection with the repairs to the wharf at Fauvel, county of Bonaventure, Quebec, from May to December, 1950.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF LINE FROM SHERRIDON TO LYNN LAKE, MAN.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure conferring authority upon the governor in council to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to construct a line of railway from Sherridon to Lynn Lake, in the province of Manitoba, a distance of approximately 155 miles at an estimated expenditure of $14,725,000 and an average expenditure of $95,000 per mile. The measure will make provision for the issue by the company of securities, which may be guaranteed by the government in respect of the cost of construction. To enable the company to proceed with construction forthwith temporary loans may be made the company out of the consolidated revenue fund, upon terms and conditions prescribed by the governor in council and secured by company securities.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE

QUESTION AS TO AMENDMENT OF SUPERANNUATION ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Will the Minister of Finance state whether the government is giving consideration to a revision or amendment of the Civil Service Superannuation Act? If so, is it intended to present the legislation at this session or in the near future?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): No consideration is being given at the present time to a revision of the act.

COST OF LIVING

CONSIDERATION BY BUREAU OF STATISTICS OF NEW BASIS FOR INDEX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the light of press reports, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the dominion bureau of statistics working on a new basis for the cost of living index? If so, will labour and other interested bodies have an opportunity to make representations before any new basis is finally adopted?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The bureau of statistics is studying a revised basis for the cost of living index, and I shall be glad to suggest to them that labour be permitted to discuss the matter with them before it is adopted.

Mr. Fair: Will the minister also include representatives of agriculture?

Mr. Howe: I shall be glad to suggest that agriculture be consulted as well.

IRON ORE

QUESTION OF FREIGHT SUBSIDY TO STEEP ROCK IRON MINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce state whether Steep Rock Iron Mines have now delivered the first five million tons of ore referred to in the agreement of 1942? If so, may we assume that the freight subsidy in connection therewith has ceased?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the delivery of the five million tons was completed last autumn, and there is no government subsidy in connection with the operation of the Steep Rock mine at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the minister's statement, will he indicate whether representations have been made to the government that the subsidy be continued or reinstated?

Mr. Howe: No such representations have been made.

POST OFFICE ACT

MEASURE TO CONSOLIDATE, CODIFY AND AMEND EXISTING LEGISLATION

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. 322, respecting the Canada Post Office—Mr. Rinfret—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Rinfret: The discussion on section 1 has been along two lines. One branch of the discussion has been concerned with the operating details of the department, while the other branch has been concerned with the increased rates on newspapers. In connection with this latter branch, I should like to say that when we reach section 11 I propose to ask one of my colleagues to move an amendment to that section. This might simplify the discussion of section 1, and we can discuss the amendment on section 11.

Mr. Drew: Will the effect of the amendment be a reduction in the postal rates now indicated in that section?

Mr. Rinfret: That will be the effect of it.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definition.

Mr. McLure: Paragraph (c) of subsection 1 reads:

"Deposit at a post office" means to leave in a post office or with a person authorized by the Postmaster General to receive mailable matter.

Then paragraph (d) says that "mail" means mailable matter from the time of its deposit at a post office to the time of its delivery. How soon after it is received is it postmarked?

Mr. Rinfret: The postmark is put on as soon as it reaches the post office.

Mr. McLure: Paragraph (g) deals with "mail conveyance". This paragraph does not include motor trucks, so I presume that tenders will not include the provision that the tenderer must give assurance that he has a half-ton truck to carry the mail?

Mr. Rinfret: This is only a definition, and it brings the definition in line with existing methods of transportation now used by the post office.

Mr. McLure: The old tenders for contracts included a paragraph stating that no tender would be considered unless the person tendering had a half-ton truck in which to carry the mail. Now, that is no longer included?

Paragraph (k) says:

"Postage stamp" means any stamp or impression authorized by the Postmaster General for the purpose of paying postage.

I presume that would include postage meters. How are these machines operated? Are they owned by the post office, or by the firm putting them in, and what do they cost?

Mr. Rinfret: On the first question, the stipulations that are put in the demand for tender depend, of course, on the condition of the road. I do not believe there is any condition in any of our contracts that call for a truck of so many tons. A snowmobile might be called for if the circumstances of the road required it during the wintertime. I do not believe we put any restriction or qualification on the truck itself.

As to the second question, paragraph (k) covers postage stamps and postage impressions of all kinds, including those made by postage meters, postage registers and like mechanical devices. The meters are rented by the firm. The firm goes to the post office, deposits a certain amount of money, and the meter is wound up to the amount that has been deposited. When the meter is used it decreases down to zero; then the firm goes back to the post office and deposits a further sum of money, and the meter is again wound up to the amount of money deposited.

Mr. McLure: The firm does not get any commission on these machines?

Mr. Rinfret: No.

Mr. Hatfield: Who rents the machines, the Post Office Department or some outside firm?

Mr. Rinfret: Does the hon. member ask who rents them to the firms?

Mr. Hatfield: Yes.

Mr. Rinfret: An outside concern.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Deputy postmaster general.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, can the Postmaster General tell me the percentage of postal employees now employed as temporaries as compared with the number of permanents?

Mr. Rinfret: The figure is twenty per cent.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Powers, etc., of Postmaster General.

Mr. Drew: It would appear that this is the section in relation to which I should like to obtain some information from the minister. There has been some considerable amount of discussion in the house since the earlier part of the session—Mr. Chairman, I will wait for a minute or two until it is possible for me to hear my own voice.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Drew: As I was saying, there has been a considerable amount of discussion since the earlier part of the session with regard to the changed arrangements which have been made for the delivery of mail. I recognize that in a great many places the hardship which was experienced by the postmen in the earlier stages has been diminished to some extent by the gradual working out of the new system. On the other hand, I find that in some of the larger cities, and in fact in many communities across the country, there is still a good deal of objection to the change which has been made in regard to mail delivery and the carrying of the mail. It does not relate so much to the length of hours that the postmen are called upon to work, although that matter in itself is a source of objection in many cases, but rather to the fact that, particularly in the larger communities, a postman is called upon to carry a load of mail which was never contemplated in the early days when postal services were established.

Every one of us recognizes that, day by day, there is a tendency for periodical publications to increase both in size and in weight. Moreover, the people are having a larger number of periodical publications delivered to their homes by mail. I am sure that every one of the members has seen postmen carrying an enormous load of heavy material which is largely the result of this changed arrangement. I know the answer can be given that the instructions are so worked out that this should not be the case. The fact remains, however, that whatever the instructions are, and whatever the circumstances are, I have personally had representations made to me by many postmen in different parts of this country in regard to the weight of the loads they are called upon to carry. That is particularly noticeable in the more severe weather, and of course in those areas in which the weather is more extreme.

I certainly would be the last one in the house to argue against any step that will effect economy in keeping with efficiency. I am convinced, and have said so many times, that there are a great many places where large savings can be effected in the government service. Nevertheless, in certain types of government service, efficiency must not be jeopardized by any attempt at false economy. The postmen and the post office employees generally are not only part of our whole social structure but are also a vital part of our economic structure. In addition, they are almost a part of the households of the people whom they serve. I doubt if there are any working members of the community who are brought closer, day by day, to the people whom they serve. For that very reason it is essential that this great and important service—and one which the Canadian post office has every reason to point to with pride—should not be jeopardized, nor should the excellent morale that has existed in that department over the years be impaired, by any regulations which would leave an impression in the minds of the postal employees that the value and the importance of their service were not being adequately recognized.

I do not think that the Postmaster General will question the fact that many postmen have retired from the service during these past few months. Some have been compelled to do so because of their health. No matter to what extent the earlier complaints may have been diminished in some communities, I earnestly suggest that the effect of the present arrangement on the morale and on the efficiency of the service in many other communities be carefully examined.

Having said that, from the point of view of the postmen themselves who perform an immensely valuable service for every one of us, day in and day out, in weather of all kinds, I wish to refer to the other aspect of this problem, and it is one which has not been discussed at any great length during the present session. Efficient and frequent delivery of the mail is one of the essential requirements of our modern society, and is a vitally important function within our business and economic structure. Anything which would make it less effective for the purpose of carrying on our ordinary business transactions would indeed be a false economy.

While I do not wish to draw comparisons unfavourably as between Canada and any other country, those who have had occasion to use the mail in London, and, in fact, generally throughout the British isles, realize that to a great extent the mail is used over there in the place of the telegraph because frequent and prompt deliveries have made the use of the mail an efficient and effective means of immediate communication between business houses as well as between individuals. Reducing the service to one delivery a day is not only a question of economy and a question of its effect on the postman, important though that may be. It also has a marked effect on the value of that service to many business houses as well as to many functions of government at the national, the provincial or the municipal level. Over the years mail delivery here has become less frequent rather than more frequent. Yet in other countries, with the increased efficiency of the general social and economic structure, mail delivery has generally increased, both in number and in speed of deliveries.

I therefore think that this whole procedure should be re-examined and that the Postmaster General should reconsider the changes which have been made, not only from the point of view of the convenience of the postmen and of the postal organization generally, but also from the point of view of the efficiency of business throughout the whole of this country. This is particularly desirable at a time when business is to be stepped up through the addition of defence production to our ordinary civilian requirements. New burdens will be placed upon our postal service—new burdens which will have their impact upon the postmen and the postal employees generally—and also new demands for efficient service for the more effective carrying out of the business which is done in that way. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge that the Postmaster General give this subject further consideration, and I can only hope that in this case the consideration may produce the same satisfactory results which ensued from our earlier arguments in regard to the cost of postal delivery of newspapers.

Mr. Rinfret: I would not like the leader of the opposition to feel too certain that it was his recommendation that brought about this reduction. I have had some other people speak to me, too.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the promptness with which the Postmaster General referred to something which I had not even indicated suggests that perhaps my arguments had very considerable force with him.

Mr. Rinfret: To come back to the reduction in delivery from two to one a day, there were two purposes to be accomplished by this measure. One was that of economy, and that is the one which for the most part the leader of the opposition has stressed. The other was the question of manpower. In reducing the deliveries from two to one a day we realized an economy of about 1,000 persons in the manpower field. At the outset, we felt that by making this change we could make a reduction of one out of every three men. That is to say, where three men previously served three walks and gave two deliveries a day, two men could serve the same territory by giving only one delivery a day.

We might as well face the cold facts. The service under the one-delivery system is not as good as that which was formerly given under the two-delivery system. Some of the residential patrons, who formerly received their mail in the morning, will now receive it in the afternoon. Somebody has to be at the beginning of the route, and somebody at the end. There would be a difference of several hours in the times at which various patrons on the same route receive their mail.

The complaints, however, were not from the residential patrons; generally speaking, they accepted the reduction in good spirit. It was mainly commercial or industrial concerns, who for one reason or another were located on a residential walk, who were chiefly affected. As I said before, we hoped to have made the change by making a reduction of one man out of every three. This was found to be impracticable. It was overburdening many of our letter carriers, and causing overtime. The procedure was modified in many areas and a reduction of one in four was instituted. I might say, however, that some offices have been able to fit in the one-delivery service with a reduction of one letter carrier out of every three.

A change of this kind cannot be put into effect overnight. There are so many ramifications, involving all kinds of changes in postal arrangements. Complaints were received, but in every case the complaint was investigated, and, where improvements could reasonably be effected, this was done immediately. The service did not involve greater travel by letter carriers, but it did involve additional loads. This was mitigated wherever possible by an adjustment of the routes, and also by having part of the load delivered to relay bundle boxes, stores and other places; we are supplying these relay bundle boxes as soon as they can be provided. In the meantime we are using stores and other places to store these bundles for the letter carriers. There was actually a certain amount of dislocation at the outset, but I do not believe this was any reason for not going ahead with the scheme.

I have received recently a report from the main letter carrier offices of Canada, and, with the exception of one or two trouble spots, the change is working out satisfactorily.

In cases where it is found by independent check that the letter carriers are working consistently more than the forty-eight hours a week, as corrected on the eleventh week to bring it to forty-four hours a week, steps will be taken to pay the letter carriers overtime for that additional period until such time as the walks can be readjusted and brought within the uniform five and a half day week.

One of the chief sore spots is Toronto. I will be perfectly frank and admit that the situation in Toronto is not as good as we could wish, but it is not entirely due to the establishment of the one delivery a day system. As a matter of fact, there was an inordinate increase in the amount of business in Toronto. The revenue for the month of April increased by $400,000 over the same month last year, or approximately twenty-eight per cent.

Mr. Adamson: I do not want to interrupt, but what was the total revenue?

Mr. Rinfret: Roughly $1,500,000. In addition many employees are leaving the post office to obtain employment in commercial and industrial concerns at a higher rate of pay than the post office is able to give, tied down as we are to specific rates and conditions. Improvements, however, will depend to no small extent on the department being able to obtain suitable replacements for employees who have either retired from the service on account of age, or have resigned, at the salaries and on the conditions of employment which we have to offer.

At this point I might mention that I have received a large number of letters from postal patrons all across Canada, expressing appreciation of the adjustments made.

I wish to express a word of commendation to those employees, particularly letter carriers and city sorters, who have had to bear the brunt of this change. In most cases they have helped us loyally to put the change into effect, and I can assure the committee that it is the intention of the Post Office Department not to place any undue strain upon these employees. We shall in all cases make the adjustments as quickly as possible, but we do ask for reasonable co-operation and forbearance while the contingent adjustments are being made. I can give an assurance that we will do all we can to remedy any justifiable grievance.

To put the picture in another way, the post office cannot refuse to accept all business that is offered. When a street car gets overcrowded, the public have to wait for the next one. When the Bell Telephone have used up all the space on the circuit, patrons wishing a telephone have to wait, sometimes for months, before they can be accommodated. Stores which have sold out a particular line of goods simply say "sold out". Laundries and other organizations selling service put out signs indicating that they are unable to accommodate any more customers. The same holds true for railroads and aeroplanes. The post office, however, is expected to take on all comers, twenty-four hours a day, 365 days a year, no matter what the fluctuations in volume may be.

We have no magic formula by which we can foretell the problems of any particular period or provide necessary manpower at a time of shortage. At the present time, men are going out to the armed forces and to essential industries, and this has to be encouraged, not discouraged. All we can do is to save manpower wherever we can, and to cut out any frills. The reduction in postal deliveries was inevitable, and, unless the manpower situation eases, more restrictions may conceivably have to be considered. Everyone who has studied the basic facts will agree with the conclusions we have reached, but unfortunately most people want us to make the necessary economies, but at the expense of someone else.

Let me again make it clear, therefore, that the Post Office Department does not feel it necessary to apologize for its action in restricting service. It was brought about by conditions beyond our control. In regard to the change itself, individual mistakes and errors in carrying out the general policy will occur, and these are regretted. They are perhaps pardonable in a large and complex organization such as the postal service, extending as it does from coast to coast.

We can offer no rosy promises for immediate improvement. That will depend on conditions, but hon. members may rest assured that we shall spare no effort to give the most practical and efficient service which the resources at our disposal will permit.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the illustration offered by the Postmaster General is, I suggest, rather misleading. He says that a condition under which there is an excessive use of telephones, or street car services, or even excessive purchases in stores, can be compared with this situation. If there is a crowding of telephone lines through excessive use of those lines, or if there is a crowding of street cars to such an extent that certain people cannot get on them, or if there is sell-out of goods in a store, necessitating a would-be purchaser waiting for another occasion, the result flows from the actions of the persons seeking to obtain that service. What happened in this instance is the result of action taken by the Post Office Department itself, not by those using the service. The cure, I suggest, is exclusively within the hands of the department. In the other instances the pressure comes about because of the number of people seeking to use the service.

Mr. Noseworthy: Speaking in reply to some of the observations of the Postmaster General respecting the situation in Toronto, I would say first that I was pleased to find that he is prepared to face the facts so far as that city is concerned and to admit that all is not well with the postal service in Toronto and district.

Through conversation with one of the managers of a postal station in Toronto over the week end I am informed that station managers are being flooded with telephone calls and letters expressing severe criticisms of the system as it now exists, and that this condition obtains to the point where life is almost unbearable for them. At the week end immediately preceding the last one there were five routes in the constituency of South York that were not covered. Last week there was one route, in the area in which I live, on which there were no deliveries on Tuesday or Thursday. Further, a daily newspaper from Hamilton, which would be carried as second-class mail, was not delivered daily; four copies were delivered on Saturday. Naturally the citizens are complaining of a service which obliges them to accept, in one day, delivery of four issues of a newspaper which should be delivered daily.

I was told by postal employees over the week end that in some of the Toronto stations neither the sorters nor the carriers have been able to keep abreast of their work. They are always behind, both in sorting and in delivering. It is obvious, therefore, that the situation in Toronto and district has not yet cleared up. It is not just a matter of having mail delivery at six or seven o'clock at night; rather it is one of having any mail delivery at all during one or two days of the week. This condition has arisen through the introduction of the one delivery a day system, which has come as a blanket order or blueprint from head office in Ottawa, without any effort to find out, through experiment in some of the larger centres, such as Toronto, just how the system would work out.

The blanket order was sent out across the country stating that the walks were to be telescoped so that one out of every three men was to be relieved, and this was done without the department having any knowledge of the disruption it would cause in the postal service. Not only has there been disruption in the system, but there has been a serious break-down in public relations. I believe in the past the Post Office Department has enjoyed as satisfactory public relations as any other department of government, but so far as my area is concerned, it has now sacrificed in large measure that satisfactory relationship.

In Toronto the change has resulted in the loss of a considerable number of permanent staff. The post office is finding it impossible to replace these experienced members with efficient help. I am informed that most of the help the department is now getting is sent from the employment offices, where the unemployed are given the choice of either taking a job with the post office or of having no unemployment insurance. The result is that not only is the Post Office Department getting inexperienced employees, but they are inefficient as well, and are thus slowing up the service.

I do not think anything can be done about retracing steps so far as the change is concerned. I am told that today it would be impossible for the Post Office Department to go back to the system of two deliveries, even if it wanted to. There is just not enough help available to reinstitute a system of two deliveries a day, even if the department so desired.

I was surprised to learn that the ratio of temporary to permanent employees in the Post Office Department is twenty per cent. An estimate I made in the Toronto area would indicate that the percentage of temporary to permanent employees is much higher than that. One of the complaints postal employees are registering is that they have been kept on for years as temporary employees, without being given permanent employment, with the result that they have become disillusioned. The whole feature of permanency, as applied to the section of the civil service connected with the Post Office Department, has been destroyed, and this has had a disrupting effect upon the entire service. The department is probably doing all that can be done at the present time; but the whole trouble lies in the fact that this system of one delivery a day was instituted by headquarters at Ottawa through a blanket order applicable across the country without their first having a proper study made, and without any effort on their part to find out before the order was issued just what the effect would be in a centre like Toronto.

The minister has stated that there is competition from private enterprise in the matter of wages, and he has stated also that a shortage of manpower exists; but these things existed all through the war. During the war there was a much greater shortage of manpower than there is today, and there was the same competition from private enterprise, but there was no disruption of postal service. We went through the war without any disruption of that most essential service. There were good relations between the Post Office Department and the public, and there was reasonable contentment on the part of the employees with their working conditions and pay. That has been disrupted because of the steps which have been taken, and I do not think the post office is going to be able to remedy this condition for a long time to come.

I think it unfortunate that this disruption has taken place. All that can be done is for the department to continue taking the steps they are taking. I understand that surveys are being made, but it will be some time before the data collected can be tabulated and the necessary steps taken to remedy the situation. If this idea of carrying employees of the department for years on a temporary basis—this applies to other departments as well—were discontinued and employees given a permanent status after a reasonable length of time, I think the situation would be eased somewhat.

The practice of the civil service carrying over fifty per cent of its personnel for years on a temporary basis is nothing but a cheap labour racket. That is all it is. There is no reason in the world why any department should carry such a high percentage of its employees for years on a temporary basis.

In view of the situation that has developed I think the Post Office Department will have to give serious consideration to increasing the scale of wages paid to postal employees. Never a week goes by but members of parliament receive copies of the advertisements put out by the Post Office Department for letter carriers, porters and other inside help. As the minister has said, the department is not getting enough help, and certainly is not getting the efficient type of help that it needs. This is the result partly of the disruption which has taken place, partly of the adverse advertising which the Post Office Department has received within the last two or three months, and partly of the way in which those who are employed have been subjected to working hours that are longer than necessary over a long period of time without any assurance of overtime pay.

The minister's statement last week that these employees would be paid for their overtime has had and will have a favourable effect. But I still think that before the Postmaster General can put his department on an efficient basis, consideration will have to be given to increasing the salaries paid to postal employees. Otherwise he is just not going to be able to get suitable help to enable him to give sufficient and efficient service to the public.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, I want to corroborate everything the hon. member for York South has said. Conditions almost identical to those he has mentioned exist in my district, except that they may be slightly worse. I am informed that last week there were no less than six postal walks which could not be serviced for days at a time, and that the postal authorities in Toronto had to ask members of their staff who were doing other things to fill in as postal carriers in order to have the mail delivered.

The delivery of mail transcends any dollars-and-cents consideration. You just cannot put it simply and solely on an economic basis. The delivery of mail is part of our economic and social life, and we cannot have it interfered with if the work of the country is to be carried on efficiently. Therefore we are faced directly with the following problem.

At the present time the Post Office Department is having great difficulty in getting personnel to handle its rapidly increasing business in the Toronto area and particularly in the suburbs as represented by the ridings of York South and York West. If men cannot be obtained to undertake this work—chiefly for economic reasons, although there are others as well—then we must be prepared either to increase the rates charged for the delivery of mail, or to have the Post Office Department operate with a deficit. There are no other ways out of the difficulty.

I have found the postal authorities extremely co-operative. Every day some member of the Toronto district postal office is in York West investigating a complaint or trying to iron out some frightfully difficult situation which has arisen. In practically every case they come to me, or to the ratepayers' association or to the industry which has complained, and say that because of the regulations they cannot make the change that is asked for. If the regulations are the cause of the slowing up in postal deliveries, then I suggest that consideration should be given to altering them.

As I say, this business of the post office and the delivery of mail transcends any purely economic consideration. The carrying of heavier and heavier loads by the letter carriers is something that must be remedied. I realize that the mail is there and that it has to be carried out; but when the volume of mail becomes so great that men cannot possibly lift it and deliver it, then something must be done. With all the good will in the world on the part of the minister and the department, unless extra help is made available that mail is going to remain undelivered. It is simply a physical matter; there is not the physical strength to do the job, and unless you make it attractive enough for people to undertake this work, the situation is not going to be remedied.

I have great sympathy for the Postmaster General and his employees. I know the problems they are facing, particularly in a district such as mine, which is growing at such an extraordinary rate. I want, though, to mention once more the matter of sub-post offices. In the several cases I have brought to the attention of the minister we thought we had all the arrangements made, but at the last moment they blew up in our faces, to use a common expression. It was impossible to get proper accommodation even after the postal authorities had toured the district. Presumably that is because the department could not offer people enough to induce them to undertake this work; and if that is because of the regulations, then the regulations should be changed so this work will be made attractive and people will undertake it. Large districts now are almost completely without mail service, or the only post office available is a considerable distance away. In my district, and I imagine this is the case around most large cities, transportation is a problem. As a result mail is now picked up perhaps once or twice a week, and collecting mail at a sub-post office is no longer a matter of a few minutes; you have to line up and wait for a half hour or more before you can get your mail. That situation is intolerable, and I think something should be done, either through the civil service commission or the department itself, so that this work, which is just as essential as any other work in Canada, may be carried on efficiently.

Finally I would ask the Postmaster General if he can give me the wage scale in three principal classifications of employees, mail porters, postal delivery men and some other classification, in 1939 and today. Then I have this suggestion to make: that if we cannot clear up the situation through the present machinery, a committee of this house be set up next session so that the whole question of the Post Office Department may be gone into. Whether it means we shall have to pay more for the service, or that the post office will have to operate at a deficit, the facts should be presented to this parliament so that the people of Canada will know what they are facing. They should know whether the present intolerable conditions have come about because of the regulations, or because of inflationary pressure or for what other reason, and whether they will have to accept either an increase in the rates or be prepared to have the post office operate at a loss. These are technical problems which I believe should be considered next session by a committee of this house.

Mr. McLure: When the Postmaster General was making some remarks a little while ago he referred to men going into the armed forces. He did not say whether or not there was objection to this, but there is a question I want to ask in that connection. This morning I received a letter from a permanent civil servant, a railway mail clerk operating from Charlottetown to Sackville. On May 29 he enlisted in the active army for three years, with the understanding that he would go with the 27th infantry brigade. This man had fourteen years of service with the post office and three and one-half years in the last war, and here is his complaint. The operations branch of the postal department of Ottawa wrote the inspector at Charlottetown stating that the civil service commission had not yet issued orders that a civil servant may enlist in the armed forces; the civil service commission did not issue leave of absence covering the men who enlisted in the 25th until lately, and those who have enlisted in the 27th have not been granted this leave of absence by the postal department. His question is: Will he, by going overseas, have lost his job, and will he also lose out on his retiring allowance?

I do not know anything about this man except that he appears to be a genuine civil servant, and I should like to know whether the department issues these letters to men who sign up. It would certainly break down their morale if that is the practice. I believe this man and others in the same position should be given some satisfaction as soon as possible.

Mr. Rinfret: The answer to the question is contained in what the hon. member just read. The civil service commission has not yet given a clear directive as to what must be done.

Mr. McLure: Is the Post Office Department governed by the civil service commission in regard to men joining the armed forces?

Mr. Rinfret: Not only that, but also in respect to appointments.

With regard to the question I was asked a minute ago by the hon. member for York West, a comparison of salaries, for the sake of simplification I shall give the maximum salaries. In 1939 for carriers the remuneration was $1,500; in 1950, $2,628; porters, $1,500 and $2,496; clerks, $1,740 and $2,904.

Mr. Gibson: Will the Postmaster General tell me whether the $2,628 for mail carriers is the salary in the largest office?

Mr. Rinfret: Yes, of course.

Mr. Gibson: Why is there a differential in the salary scale between a town like Port Alberni and the city of Vancouver?

Mr. Rinfret: It is a question of revenue.

Mr. Gibson: One of the great difficulties we have had in Port Alberni is the obtaining of mail carriers. In the district we have one of the highest wage rates in Canada. The saw mills pay $1.40 per hour, so we have difficulty in obtaining letter carriers. Why should the revenue of the office be the standard for setting the remuneration of a man who is doing comparable work to that which is performed in a larger office? Is that a sound basis?

Mr. Rinfret: That is the only standard we have to go by. If we increase the salaries in one part of the country, we have to be prepared to do the same thing throughout the rest of the country. If we increase the salary scale for Port Alberni, we would have to be prepared to do the same thing for a similar office situated in the east.

Mr. McLure: I should like to ask one more question with reference to the answer I got to the last one. I do not think it is satisfactory. I want to send a telegram to this man; have I got to go back to the civil service commission and consult them about this employee? I believe the postal department should have some control in this matter; instead of a member taking it up, the department should take it up. Surely this veteran is entitled to a straight answer so that he can try to get out of the army and get back to his employment, or so that he will know what is going to happen to him.

Mr. Rinfret: The answer to the first question is yes. The answer to the second question is that the hon. member can be assured that as soon as we get the necessary directive there will be no delay in the post office giving him his letter.

Mr. McLure: There will be no delay in receiving that from the commission; are we assured of that?

Mr. Rinfret: That will be a directive from the civil service commission, and I cannot answer that.

Mr. Herridge: I am pleased to hear the Postmaster General say that the situation is continuously being reviewed to correct mistakes. From what has happened, it is obvious that his department took hasty action without sufficient thought. I think it was unfortunate action, because it was taken in connection with one of the lower paid groups of employees. As the Postmaster General knows, it has caused a good many men to leave the service of the Post Office Department.

I had a few words to say on this matter on an occasion when we had the opportunity to raise grievances. But since that time I have had a number of letters from trade union organizations in the cities of Trail and Nelson, bringing to my attention the particularly difficult circumstances under which mail carriers work in that area. These two cities, Mr. Chairman, are situated on the sides of mountains. The mail carriers have to carry mail on routes which in many cases have grades of up to thirty per cent. In addition to that, in climbing from one street to another there are steps that are on a forty-five degree angle, and of such a height that they would reach from the base of the parliament buildings to the top of the tower. If the deputy postmaster general had to carry one of these sacks of mail up these steps we would get the matter rectified very quickly.

It is easy to make plans for level communities like Ottawa, but in that area we have particularly difficult conditions. I ask that the whole question be reconsidered so far as that locality is concerned. I realize the necessity for saving where possible, but the problem is so serious in my district that not only have labour organizations been writing to me, but elderly ladies, who have seen the postmen going along the streets, write to say that the Post Office Department is making poorly paid pack horses out of our letter carriers. I believe this shows that the change of route was made without sufficient consideration. I ask that the matter be reviewed in that district, because of the exceptional conditions under which these mail carriers work.

I should like to ask the Postmaster General by whose recommendation these changes are made in any given locality. At what level is that official? Who is responsible for the final decision? I am quite sure that no one who was directly informed as to the circumstances that exist in the cities of Trail and Nelson would have made the changes in the first instance. I believe there has been some improvement, but there is a necessity for more improvement if these men are to be treated fairly.

I should like to say a word in support of the remarks made by the member for Comox-Alberni, who at times does make some contribution to the debate in this house. In his remarks the Postmaster General indicated that a number of the employees were leaving his department because they could get higher rates of pay in industry. That is happening in the district I have the honour to represent, because there is a relatively high wage scale in that area. Lumbering, mining and smelting pay relatively high wages in Canada compared to those received by the letter carriers. This means that only the older men, who cannot obtain employment in the woods, mines or smelters, are going to apply for these positions. Older men who do this type of work will find it a greater burden than some of the younger men who have resigned because they were able to take heavier jobs. I believe that is going to increase the difficulties of the department; and in this connection I did want to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General the unusual and serious conditions in the cities in my constituency.

Mr. Wright: While I sympathize with these people in Toronto and other places who are only getting their mail once a day instead of twice, I want to say a word for some people in other parts of this dominion who were getting their mail twice a week and now are not getting it at all. In certain rural areas in my constituency, I believe four or five of these rural routes that were in operation five or six years ago are now closed. Only one route is operating today.

In those cases where rural routes are established, the courier travels from thirty to thirty-five miles, seventeen miles out and seventeen miles back. Quite often there was a rural post office serving the community before the routes were established, and now that these routes have been discontinued the rural post offices have not been re-established. This leaves many people from fifteen to twenty miles from the closest post office.

The reason given for closing most of these routes is that people will not bid on the contracts for the delivery of mail. The contracts are usually let at from $700 to $750 for a year. That is not much of an income, and it is very seldom that these people can take on much other work. They have to attend to these routes two days a week, and they have to maintain equipment, either a car or a truck for the delivery of the mail. They have to deliver it in all kinds of weather conditions, winter and summer. The result has been that many of these rural routes are closed. Will the minister give us the number of routes in Saskatchewan that have been closed during the last five years, and the number of new routes that have been established?

Speaking earlier in the debate, one of the members said that the delivery of mail should transcend purely economic considerations. I believe that, and I believe that the people in rural areas, who live there because they must do so in order to produce the food for the rest of this dominion, are entitled to better mail delivery service than they are getting at the present time. I bring the matter to the minister's attention because I think a mistake has been made in the closing of the number of rural routes that have been closed in western Canada during the last few years.

Mr. Rinfret: On that point, I may say to the hon. member for Melfort that not one single rural route in Canada pays its own way.

Mr. Wright: I realize that.

Mr. Rinfret: And as to the post offices, the great majority of them do not pay their way. We are therefore giving more service than is justified by the revenue we are receiving.

On the question of the closing of post offices, it has been discovered that, with the increase of the rural routes, so few people were served by post offices in small towns—four, five or six—we thought it was good economy to serve everybody by the rural route rather than have the post offices remain open.

If, as the hon. member suggests, there are some of these rural routes that have been abandoned, if he will kindly send me the names of them I will see that the post offices are reopened.

Mr. Wright: I thank the minister for that. But again I want to point out that you cannot put the matter on a purely economic basis.

[Mr. Wright.]

Mr. Rinfret: We do not. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. Wright: Nor can you use the argument that you do not realize adequate revenue. The revenue for those routes may come from the city of Winnipeg, because it is from there that a great deal of the mail is sent which is received over these routes. You have no way of determining their value. Therefore I do not think it is fair to put the matter on an economic basis. The basis on which we should operate the post offices is the basis of service to the most people in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Rinfret: That is exactly what we do.

Mr. Wright: You are not doing it altogether. I should like to see you do it just a little bit more than is being done now, having regard to rural mail delivery.

Mr. Fair: For the last fifteen or twenty minutes, Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting to say what the hon. member for Melfort has just said. In that case it was Wright; now it is Fair and Wright. I hope the Postmaster General and his deputy will take notice of what the hon. member for Melfort has just said.

Mr. Rinfret: And what is fair.

Mr. Fair: And what is supported by Fair. During the early part of this sitting we listened to discussion of the difficulties in the cities. It is not my intention for one moment to oppose mail delivery in the cities once or twice a day. I am fully aware that this service is necessary; and I was sorry when the Postmaster General and his colleagues found it necessary to eliminate one of the services in many of the cities that had been receiving twice-a-day service. But I think the minister will agree that if it were not for the rural population in Canada there would not be any need for either towns or cities all across this country. They are there for the service of the rural communities. The sooner we recognize that fact, the sooner perhaps will better service be given to the rural communities in postal and other matters.

There is a problem, I believe, all across Canada with regard to rural routes being shut down at least temporarily. In my own case I have been dealing for some little time with the other officials of the department. I have not yet brought the matter to the attention of the Postmaster General or his deputy, and I am not doing so now. But apparently the practice has been that where contracts expire and tenders are called for again, if in the opinion of the officials administering the service, a tender is too high, they wait for a while and again, in some cases after pressure is brought to bear upon them, call for new tenders. If those tenders still are too high, they let the matter drift, with the idea perhaps that somebody will be foolish enough to put in a tender on which he will lose money and still continue the service. That is one of the things to which I take serious objection. Where a tender is too high, I feel that at least the service should be continued until somebody is found who will put in a satisfactory tender.

In one case in which I am particularly interested I know that the tender put in is not too high, but because it is higher than it was four years ago the people on that particular route are obliged to go without service. That situation is now running into the third month. Yet when those people are attempting at the present time to take off last year's crop and to sow another crop for harvesting this year, they are compelled to go quite a number of miles for their mail. They are left without service simply because we must economize in the Post Office Department.

I understand that that complaint is general from the Atlantic to the Pacific in connection with rural mail routes. A little later on I will perhaps take this particular case up with the deputy minister, and later, if necessary, with the minister. I am not mentioning any names at the present time. But again I want to support the complaint that has been made by the hon. member for Melfort. The Postmaster General will hear from me a little later on unless service is restored in the near future.

Mr. Higgins: As the minister knows, the main post office in Newfoundland is the general post office in St. John's. The next important post office is known as the east end branch at St. John's. It is in connection with the operation of the east end branch of the general post office in St. John's that I want to speak for a few moments.

I have had a letter from a prominent newspaper man in St. John's; and in order that there may be no misunderstanding about the matter, may I say that it is a newspaper that supports the government. It is in connection with what he writes that I wish to speak; I want to draw the contents of his letter to the minister's attention. In his letter he states:

> Since we joined Canada the postal service has deteriorated. For example, the east end branch has been catering to a growing clientele . . . We are within eighty yards of that post office but have had to transfer our business to the general, a mile away. Why? Several reasons. One, mail dropped into the east end, even if for boxholders there, is sent to the general for franking and then returned to the east end. Think of the delay here; at least a day. The east end does not cash money orders, although it will sell them; and neither will it give out parcels. Air mails are sometimes not delivered until the next day if arriving at the general late in the afternoon. The east end is not open at night as it used to be . . . it is impossible to pick up mail after regular business hours. The other night, after I heard Mr. St. Laurent's message to the Commons, I wrote an article for—
> A Canadian company, a mainland newspaper.
> —and posted it at the general at 10.30 p.m. The caretaker said the air mail had been picked up for the next plane which was not going out until 1.30 or 2 a.m., and my letter would have to wait for the next plane, not before noon. Why the long delay between closing-off time and the departure of the planes? The airport is no more than twenty minutes slow driving, from the city, and midnight would be ample time to close off reception of mail. It must be emphasized, of course, that the present poor mail service is not due to the staff. They are the same as pre-confederation when we had a better distribution and the east end was open day and night, Sundays and holidays. The new order came in shortly after union and is the work of Ottawa. The carrier system has also been cut down to one delivery a day.

I will not go any further into the matter, except to emphasize once again that this branch serves not only a large part of the business community of St. John's, but also a considerable number of the outlying settlements. I feel that the minister is fully aware of that fact. I should like him to take the matter into consideration. I do not know whether he can give me an answer now.

Mr. Rinfret: I will certainly take the matter into consideration. As to what is right and fair, the number of rural routes that have been increased in the last four years is 237. The number of persons served is 65,000 more than it was in 1946.

Mr. Fair: May I ask the minister how many routes have been discontinued temporarily all across the country?

Mr. Rinfret: I have not that figure; I will endeavour to get it.

Mr. Brooks: I was going to ask the same question. I might add that I had a note here to make some remarks along the same lines as those made by the hon. member for Melfort and the hon. member for Battle River, but we in the maritimes have always had to take second place to the west. The greatest curse we have is our modesty.

It has seemed to me for some time that there was a peculiar situation in this country when in the towns and cities the people could get delivery of mail twice a day, and in the country districts many of them, as the hon. member for Melfort has said, get delivery of mail twice a week. That was the complaint that I wished to make.

Frankly, I wish to congratulate the Postmaster General on having changed the system to only one delivery of mail a day in the cities. In the past there has been very great discrimination all over this country so far as delivery of mail is concerned. There is no reason in the world why people living in a city or a large town should receive their mail both in the morning and in the afternoon, while the people living in the country districts receive it perhaps two or three times a week.

It is a difficult matter to keep people in the country and on the farms. The receiving of mail, the receiving of the daily papers, as pointed out by the leader of the opposition the other day, is an encouragement to people to remain in the country districts. I repeat that I heartily support the statements made by the hon. member for Battle River and the hon. member for Melfort.

I have a question with regard to the appointment of postmasters. I think some of them are called revenue postmasters in the smaller towns. Once a postmaster is appointed, has he the authority to appoint his assistants and helpers? Are they appointed by the civil service commission?

Mr. Rinfret: The other day we went fully into the system of appointment of postmasters. In some instances the assistants in the large post offices in the revenue division are appointed directly by the civil service commission. In smaller revenue post offices, recommendations are made by the postmasters, which are sent to us, and we either accept them or reject them, as the case may be. In all cases they are paid by the department.

Mr. Brooks: My understanding was that in some instances a postmaster was allowed a certain amount for the expenses of his post office, and out of that his salary came, and he also employed his help.

Mr. Rinfret: That has been changed in recent years.

Mr. Brooks: Anyway, I have had complaints from different sections that people appointed, sometimes not by the civil service commission but through the postmaster or in some other way, were not altogether satisfactory and efficient. The public have made that complaint. What supervision or check-up has the minister's department over these employees who have been appointed in this manner?

While I am on my feet I wish to ask the minister a question with reference to the delivery of mail to summer residents. The minister knows that in the summer a great many people go out from the towns and cities to summer houses, and there has to be a change in the delivery of mails. I know of some instances. I refer in particular to Kennebecasis island near Saint John, where in the wintertime there are only one or two families, but in the summer there are forty-five or more summer residents. The post office was closed. What provision does the minister's department make in cases of that kind?

Mr. Rinfret: In some places where there are a sufficient number of vacationers we do establish summer post offices.

As to the other question that the hon. member asked, our inspectors keep an official check on all these assistants as they go along.

Mr. Quelch: What basis is used in setting the remuneration of a postmaster in a small country point? I ask that question because several cases have been drawn to my attention in which the rates appear to be scandalously low. A year ago I drew the attention of the department to one small hamlet, namely, Lanfine, where they were advertising that they would have to close the post office unless they received an application for the job of postmaster. The reason they had such a great deal of difficulty in getting an application for that job was that they were paying actually less than $1 a day. Naturally it is not easy to get a man in there at that rate.

Then I have another point. In a larger village they are paying $83 a month, but out of that the postmaster has to pay rent for the building and the cost of fuel and light. It is not a living wage. I know that preference is given to veterans, and where a veteran is getting a fairly high pension he may be able to do this job and make a living. Surely we should be able to pay a rate which would make it possible for a postmaster to make a living out of the job, instead of using pensioners in the form of cheap labour.

I realize that the revenue from some of these points may be very small, but on the other hand, while these hamlets may be small they do provide a service for a large area, and it seems to me that there should be some minimum below which the remuneration should not be allowed to fall. What is the basis?

Mr. Rinfret: The question is threefold, as I see it. First of all, these small offices are paid in relation to revenue. Second, the revenue in each of these small offices to which my hon. friend refers is invariably below the salary that we pay to the postmasters. Third, the hon. member has referred to the fact that these postmasters have to pay for light, heat, and so forth. Over and above the salary we do pay a rental allowance to cover these costs. Fourth, and most important, the job of these postmasters is not considered to be a full-time job. They are given a certain amount, not to cover the salaries on the basis of a full-time job—it is not an amount sufficient for them to live on—but something extra that we pay them to carry on part-time jobs. I think that is the answer.

Mr. Bryce: This may not be the opportune time to ask for anything, after hearing the complaints of various members, but I am really concerned about my constituency, because it is one which is growing by leaps and bounds, and has for the last few years. Postal services have not grown along with it. I should like to draw the minister's attention to the municipality of Charleswood, where they have no mail service. The people who are living in Charleswood have been used to mail service. They were the original settlers in Charleswood. Now we have gradually moved the people from Winnipeg into the suburbs, and they do not have that service. The minister's department was good enough to give me all the necessary papers in connection with getting the service, but things always seemed to crop up—perhaps they did not have a cement sidewalk, or something like that. I am wondering if it would be possible to have a rural mail service in that area. Perhaps it would not be suitable, but surely something can be done. I am asking the minister now if he would be good enough to encourage the general post office in Winnipeg to continue the survey of the district.

I have talked both to the minister and to his deputy about jumping-off places; but the jumping-off place three or four years ago is certainly not the jumping-off place today. While the department is studying ways of economizing it wants to maintain the old jumping-off place. I would ask the minister in all sincerity if he would have a survey of West Kildonan and St. James, and see if something cannot be done by way of supplying a mail service to Charleswood.

Mr. Rinfret: I shall certainly do that.

Mr. Gibson: Some discussion has taken place about remuneration for different sizes of towns. I can understand that a postmaster's remuneration should be on that basis, because, after all, a post office with a revenue of $20,000 does not entail as much administrative work as one with a revenue of $40,000. On the other hand, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Kootenay West, it is possible that in the smaller towns it would be even more difficult for the letter carriers. In those smaller towns sidewalks might not be in as good condition, and transportation facilities would not be as satisfactory. I do not think it is fair to assume that because the revenue of an office is down, the letter carriers do not do as much work as is done by the carriers in the cities. I know that a worker in a small saw mill will have to work harder than a worker in a large saw mill. The man in a large and efficient saw mill would have to do less work. I ask the minister if he would discuss this matter with a view to working out a proper basis for letter carriers.

Mr. Rinfret: It is not a question of discussing it with my officials, because they are convinced in the matter. It is a question of discussing it with the civil service commission and having its approval.

Mr. Gibson: You will consider doing that?

Mr. Rinfret: Yes.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman, I wish all the people across Canada who voted Tory at the last election could be here to listen to the discussion in the committee this morning. They must be nodding their heads, in those forty-two constituencies which elected Tory candidates, and saying, "I told you so; I told you so." Certainly they must, when they realize the condition of the Post Office Department, and when it is proven, by fact and statement from one end of the country to the other, that it is inefficient, and that inefficiency now prevails. It must be a great laugh for those people who voted for the Tory party; there is no doubt about it.

We find a man volunteering to fight for his country, a man who writes, and properly so, to his member of parliament—and if those gentlemen behind the curtains will be a little quieter, I will proceed. We find a man who has joined the armed forces of this country writing a letter in which he tries to find out whether he is going to be penalized for daring to volunteer. And, according to the statement of the Postmaster General, all this is in the hands of the civil service commission. Instead of the Postmaster General being able to speak for the government and being in a position to say that a man who occupied a position in Canada, and who volunteered and is accepted in His Majesty's forces, will be able to return to the same position, and with the same seniority as he held before, it is referred to the civil service commission. We are told in the House of Commons today that this is left to the good graces of the civil service commission.

That is not so in all cases. We see that the commission, that great body of geniuses, is not consulted about appointments to smaller post offices. All that is passed on for political plums and recommendations. But our soldiers do not receive the benefit of political plums. They must wait for the civil service commission to see whether they are to be properly remunerated if they dare to volunteer for service in the armed forces.

Well, any of those people in the forty-two constituencies that elected Tory representatives must be laughing at the people in all the other constituencies across this country. And I say this, that at the next election the people of Canada will remember. They will remember the laughter of the forty-two constituencies who voted for Tory candidates. They will remember where the government of Canada stood when it came to treatment of soldiers serving overseas. This is only the beginning of the proof of the fact that this government, in all its departments, is deteriorating at a speed the people will soon recognize.

The postal department is a monopoly, and all the people of Canada must rely upon it for the delivery of mail. What are we getting? We have the undoubted and proven fact that there is not any department in any kind of activity that is as lax and inefficient as is the Post Office Department. I do not blame the Postmaster General. He is a man who is trying to do his job. He is a man with ability, and he is doing a good job in his department—and one must recognize that fact when he considers the lack of foresight and planning shown by the government.

This lack first became clear in connection with immigration. The representatives of those forty-two constituencies have stated repeatedly on the floor of the House of Commons that we should keep pace with the growing demands of our country and of Canadians. We have pointed out that we need an increased population, and that we should increase our immigration to meet the required expansion. But we have heard members of the Liberal party state openly in the house that, while we should increase our population, they want to have it done in the natural way, and not through the importation of immigrants from foreign lands. We now see the fallacy of that teaching. We find ourselves short of labour in all branches of government, including the Post Office Department.

The Chairman: Order. This is a debate in connection with the Canada Post Office Act.

Mr. Ferguson: All right, Mr. Chairman; I have included the post office. I could go on for an hour repeating complaints, justifiable complaints, and listening to explanations from the Postmaster General as to why we have this mess under which people receive their daily papers only once in four days. They are not having the required two-a-day delivery in cities, so that they could cope with their general business, and so that they could continue to compete in international trade. This simply cannot be done in the larger cities, where the mail is dumped at offices and delivered to factories only once a day. It is impossible during one period of the morning to attend to the mail for the entire twenty-four hours. It must be broken up, not only for the convenience of delivery, but so that it may be handled intelligently by those who receive it.

In the great city of Toronto people are receiving their mail two or three days late. This is not a condition that has grown up in the last two or three years. It is one that has finally developed after ten years of Liberal administration, and the unemployment brought about by the Liberal government in 1939. Because of the war brought on by Hitler there was some prosperity, but now we return to this condition brought about by the mismanagement of the Liberal party.

Mr. Shaw: Section 5(b) refers to the authority of the minister in the matter of making appointments. I should like to ask the minister if it is true that postmasters of accounting offices are appointed through the civil service commission.

Mr. Rinfret: It is not a question whether it is an accounting office; it is a question of revenue. All appointments to offices having an annual revenue of $3,000 and over are made through the civil service commission.

Mr. Shaw: The minister has indicated that the compensation paid to postmasters in certain offices is determined by the revenue of the office; is that correct?

Mr. Rinfret: That is correct.

Mr. Shaw: Could we have the formula that is used? For example, I notice that the revenue of different post offices varies considerably. The post office in my own home town had a revenue of $18,000 last year, whereas another post office in my constituency had a revenue of $26,000. What formula is used in determining the salary to be paid to the postmaster? I am not referring to those two cases specifically, but to post offices generally.

Mr. Rinfret: There are thirty-four groups, and it might be simpler if I just placed this statement on Hansard. The statement follows:

Mr. Shaw: By what method are members of the staffs appointed, and how is their remuneration determined?

Mr. Rinfret: The same method.

Mr. Shaw: What about hours of labour and compensation for overtime?

Mr. Rinfret: Where overtime can be checked, it is paid at the regular rate, but in the case of certain positions, such as letter carriers, where no check can be made of the time spent, usually we do not pay overtime. As I indicated last week, following the inauguration of the one mail service per day we are having official checkers go over the route. When it is found that any one route necessitates regular overtime, overtime will be paid.

Mr. Shaw: I was referring to employees in the post office itself rather than to the mail carriers. What rate is used to compute the overtime paid in various offices, accounting and non-accounting?

Mr. Rinfret: It is computed on the basis of a forty-four hour week.

Mr. Shaw: Is the compensation paid for overtime the regular rate?

Mr. Rinfret: Yes.

Mr. Shaw: Is it simply a matter of the postmaster in a local post office reporting to the district office that such and such an employee has worked overtime; is it as simple as that?

Mr. Rinfret: Just about as simple as that.

Mr. Shaw: I want to get this perfectly clear. They are just paid the regular rate for overtime?

Mr. Rinfret: Exactly.

Mr. Knowles: Not time and a half?

Mr. Rinfret: No.

Mr. Shaw: I assume the rate of compensation would be arrived at by dividing the weekly rate by forty-four hours, and that would be paid for overtime?

Mr. Rinfret: That is correct.

Mr. McLure: Section 5 (1) (a) provides for the establishment and closing of post offices. I think the Postmaster General will agree that the closing of a small post office may be a serious matter. Two post offices were closed in my constituency, and if the department had come to me in the first place and asked my opinion they would not have closed them and then have had to reopen them. I believe the department's source of information is not sufficiently reliable to warrant the closing of a post office without first obtaining the viewpoint of those who represent the people.

Paragraph (c) (iv) provides for the payment of indemnities. I should like to know how the indemnity is fixed. Paragraph (e) provides for the removal of postal employees. The Postmaster General seems to have power to dismiss employees, and I should like to know whether such employees have any court of appeal to which they can go. I know of cases in other departments where men have been let out without a proper inquiry being made, with the result that they have lost all the money they had paid in. Men have been dismissed for some political whim, with the results I have mentioned.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. McLure: When the committee took recess at one o'clock I was asking one or two questions. Section 5(1)(h) provides that the Postmaster General may—> —authorize agents to sell to the public postage stamps and stamped forms and envelopes and allow to such agents a commission not exceeding two per cent of the amount of their sales.

Last year in this connection I brought to the attention of the minister the breaking of the contract with the stamp vendor in Charlottetown. That man has given some fifty-one years of service in selling stamps to the people of Charlottetown and vicinity. Actually it is more than fifty-one years; on the basis of an eight-hour day he has given over seventy-five years of service, and now the department is trying to get rid of him. My objection is to the way they are breaking their contract with him so that he will not be able to make a living and will have to resign.

Over fifty years ago this man signed a contract with the Postmaster General for this concession. That contract is still in force, and I do not think it can be broken even under this bill, in which so much authority is granted the minister. How are they breaking it? I have no objection to meter machines, but at the same time the operation of these machines has reduced this man's earning capacity, since the department are not paying him on the postage sold by these machines, as they should according to the contract. They may say he is not selling stamps, but the postage issued by a meter is recognized by the department, and he should be paid his commission on that postage.

Here is the way it affects him. He has never made very high wages, and I went over the details with him so I could make a comparison over the last five years. As I said before, this man had an agreement with the Postmaster General calling for payment of a commission of two per cent on all stamps sold. Today there are probably thirty-five meter machines in the large business houses of Charlottetown. In 1945 Mr. Brown sold $135,630 worth of stamps, on which he received his two per cent commission. Then the meter machines were put in, and their number has gradually increased. This has reduced his sale of stamps to a little over $100,000. There is a difference of some $25,000 or more on which he has lost the commission, and in that way his salary has been reduced from an average of about $2,600 to about $2,000. In other words the department have reduced this man's earning power and benefited themselves by some $600 a year.

If they want to get rid of this man, why not give him a small pension for the rest of his days? Even at best they will not be long, and already the department owes him at least $2,500 which has been taken from him by breaking the contract. Suppose this man had not been efficient; suppose he had in some way broken the contract; how long would he have lasted with the department? I want the minister and those who are coaching him to understand this.

Mr. Rinfret: This is a repetition of last year, so I know it.

Mr. McLure: I want you to see the injustice you are doing to a good citizen of this country. This man puts in twelve hours a day, though I believe he has been given an extra half hour off recently. He has no dinner hour, no rest periods of any kind. If he goes out he must pay an assistant. If he wants one or two holidays a year he has to pay an assistant. He has given excellent service. A year ago he was honoured by the city on having completed fifty years of service without a demerit of any kind. I doubt if a score of people in the department have a record as good. Last year, according to the record, I was promised that some consideration would be given him. But there was a qualifying phrase—that he was not an employee of the department. According to these new regulations, however, I believe he is now an employee, so that excuse is washed out and consideration surely can be given to Aubrey F. Brown, the stamp vendor in the post office at Charlottetown. Suppose you do force him out and sell the stamps at the postal wicket; that will not be an economy measure, because it will cost the department twice as much. These men all work an eight-hour day, while stamps must be sold during twelve hours of the day. I want the Postmaster General to give me some statement to indicate that justice and fair play will be meted out to one of the best officials in the department—in Charlottetown, Ottawa or anywhere else. I hope the minister has thought of it in time to give some consideration to this matter.

Mr. Rinfret: The member for Queens referred to a matter before the recess at one o'clock which I think calls for an answer. He suggested that people were dismissed from the Post Office Department for political reasons—or political whims, I think he said—without any sort of inquiry. That might have been true years ago, but it is not true any longer. The circumstances surrounding the dismissal of any person for these considerations are inquired into by a board appointed by the Department of Justice. It makes a report one way or the other. The Postmaster General has no say in it, but has to follow the report of this board of inquiry.

Now, as to the other question asked by the member for Queens, it concerns the same matter that he brought up last year. This man is a contractor for the department and not an employee. The present act does not make him an employee. The hon. member has to decide whether or not it is a contract, because in part of his argument he said the man was receiving some sort of salary. He is receiving compensation on a contract. When we are acting with a contractor, we cannot give him any sort of pension.

Mr. McLure: That is quite right, Mr. Chairman. I did not say he was receiving a salary. He is on a commission basis. What I ask is that the department fulfil the contract, and not rob him of $500 or $600 a year which it is giving to someone who is making the meter machines. If he is not an employee you cannot deal otherwise with him, but are you not duty bound to live up to your agreement? It was entered into about fifty-one years ago. I should like to know whether or not you will give him the two per cent commission on all stamps sold, according to the terms of the contract.

Mr. Rinfret: I shall have to review the file. I have not looked at it since last year. I will see what I can do.

This morning the hon. member for Queens referred to a letter concerning a certain man, and I told him we were awaiting some directive from the civil service commission giving authority to permit this man to join the forces, and indicating whether he could come back to the service with the same priorities and privileges as he had. While the hon. member was on his feet, the department received the necessary directives, and we shall put them into operation immediately.

Mr. McLure: I thank you for that. There are several others in the same category, and I shall inform them all.

Mr. Hatfield: How many vending contractors do you have? Why should the Post Office Department not own and operate these vending machines?

Mr. Rinfret: That is the aim, and is one of the reasons why the number of these vending licences is going down all the time. I am sorry that I have not the exact number of licensees, but our aim is to restrict them as much as possible, so as to have all the operations under the post office itself.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wish to pursue for a few minutes a matter that I referred to on May 29. Before I do so I should like, as a city member, to support the plea that was made this morning by my deskmate, the hon. member for Melfort, and other members from rural ridings, for the best possible postal service in rural areas. I, for one, do not believe it is fair to judge a rural post office by the amount of revenue it derives from the sale of stamps. After all, it seems to me you have to take into consideration, particularly in western Canada, the amount of revenue that is taken in at Winnipeg, for example from the T. Eaton Company and other people, from the large volume of parcels and mail that is circulated in rural areas. If the mail order houses or some of the newspapers had to pay the actual cost of delivering their parcels or their periodicals to rural areas, the revenue from these sources at city centres would amount to a great deal. I want to support the position taken this morning by a number of members from rural areas. It does seem to me that this is one service we have to look at on an over-all basis. It is not a case of being able to ascertain whether or not each little district pays, but we are dealing with a service to the people of Canada. I believe it should be so regarded.

The matter I particularly wanted to pursue for a few minutes is one that I drew to the attention of the Postmaster General on the second reading of this bill. My remarks will be found commencing at page 3532 of Hansard for May 29. I refer to the case of mail couriers in the city of Winnipeg who work for contractors whose contracts are let under the provisions of the section with which we are now dealing, section 5, subsection 1, paragraph (o).

As I indicated on other occasions when I dealt with these mail couriers, the men who drive about in Winnipeg in what appear to be post office vehicles, picking up the mail from street letter boxes, are not employees of the post office at all, nor are the vehicles owned by the Post Office Department. These men are employees of the local contractor who contracted with the Post Office Department. Accordingly, the Post Office Department does not directly set the wages or working conditions of those employees. The Post Office Department has some indirect influence on the wages and working conditions of these employees, because the contractors are able to pay such wages and provide such conditions as they feel they can provide out of the amount of the contract.

To get down to the proverbial brass tacks, I should like to indicate to the committee some of the conditions under which these men work. May I point out that their numbers, particularly in Winnipeg, are few. In fact, the latest information I have is that there are about thirty-five classed as mail couriers, the men who drive these vehicles about, picking up mail from letter boxes and performing certain related services. There will be a similar number of them in other cities of a similar size, and more of them in the larger cities. In Winnipeg, these men work for a rate of 83 cents per hour. I have before me information, for some eight or ten other employers in the city of Winnipeg, as to the rates of wages paid to people doing comparable work. For example, I have the rates for civic employees driving trucks. I have the rates for the Manitoba Cartage Company, Canadian Pacific Express Company, the Coca Cola Company, Thomas Jackson Fuel Company, McCurdy Fuel and Building Supplies, Winnipeg packing plants and so on. All of these other firms are paying wages higher than 83 cents an hour, which is the rate paid to these Winnipeg postal couriers. One of these firms, it is true, has a starting rate that is less than 83 cents an hour but after six months that firm's rate is 86 cents an hour; and that is the lowest of all the rates. But the rate paid by these post office contractors—not paid directly by the government but by the contractors that get a contract from the Post Office Department—is 83 cents an hour. There are no changes in that rate for additional service. That is the rate at which they start and that is the rate at which they are paid, no matter how many years they have been doing this work.

These men get no overtime pay. It is not a case of their getting time and a half or double time. They do not even get straight time for overtime pay. They do not get pay for legal holidays. If they get a legal holiday off, there is no pay for it. If they are required to work on a legal or statutory holiday, they get only straight time. They have no sick leave. They have no pension plan, although there is some group insurance. They get no pay for the period of time between trips. Let me put it this way. In order to draw their eight hours' pay, these men are required to be actually driving eight hours during the course of the day. But they are not permitted to work that eight hours simply by going in at eight o'clock in the morning and quitting at five o'clock in the afternoon. They actually have to be on trips to an aggregate of eight hours. The time in between trips that they may have to sit around in the post office waiting for the next trip to be made is not paid for. These men tell me that many of them have to put in up to twelve hours on the job in order to get in eight hours for which they get paid, and that at the rate of 83 cents an hour. They get one week's holidays with pay; and that same one week with pay is all they get, no matter how many years they may have been in the employ of the contractor for whom they work.

Again I may say that if one goes over the chart that I have here showing the rates of pay and the working conditions for comparable work in the city of Winnipeg of these other employees, on the score of holidays with pay and on every other score those working for the other firms do much better than do these men. They are doing an important work, an important service to the people of Canada. We depend heavily on the work that all our postal employees do. The handling of the mail is an important task, and what could be more important than picking it up from the street letter boxes and seeing to it that it gets to the central post office and so on? Yet the general public tends to think of them as post office employees and tends to assume that they get whatever conditions of pay and employment go with service in the Post Office Department.

When these employees complain about their rates of pay or their working conditions —for example if they bring the matter to the attention of a member of parliament and the member of parliament brings it to the attention of the Post Office Department—the immediate reply is: These are not our employees; they are the employees of certain contractors in the city of Winnipeg and it is to those contractors that the men must appeal for any improvements that they desire. On occasion the contractors have been impressed with the plight of their employees and have asked the Post Office Department for an upward adjustment in the contract so that they could pay better wages. The request of the contractor is not always granted, and the contractor does not always make the request. There are times when he just gives to the employees his own answer that nothing can be done about it. To the credit of the Post Office Department I want to say that I know of one or two cases in which they have increased the amount of the contract with the specific understanding that it would be used to improve the wages of the employees of the contractors. But the position of these employees, as to conditions of employment and wages, is forever lagging behind that of men doing comparable work.

One answer to this problem of an immediate nature might be for the department to agree to increase the amount of the contract in cities like Winnipeg or any other cities where a similar situation obtains. But that does not solve the problem on any permanent basis. It seems to me that the only solution to this problem is for the Post Office Department itself to take over this work of collecting the mail from the street letter boxes and the various delivery services that have to be made in bulk, by trucks and vehicles of one sort and another. Taking that work over would involve making these mail couriers employees of the Post Office Department. I feel that should be done so that these men can get proper wages for the work they are doing, and so that they can get sick leave, statutory holidays with pay, pension privileges, and the other rights and benefits that go with the doing of government work. After all, that is what they are doing. They are working for the government or for the people of this country. I think they should have that status rather than the status of being employees of private contractors.

I have taken this matter up with the Postmaster General a number of times by letter, as is obvious from the thickness of the file I am turning over as I speak. On one or two occasions the Postmaster General has indicated to me by letter that consideration was being given to the request that this work be taken over by the Post Office Department, and that these men be made employees of the Post Office Department. I should be glad to hear from him now what the result of that consideration is. I hope that it is favourable. I hope that action may be taken soon. If there is to be any delay, I certainly hope he will find some way to improve the wages and the working conditions of these men. I am satisfied, however, that in the long run the only satisfactory solution is for these men to come under the direct employ of the Post Office Department.

Mr. Rinfret: I suppose the inference to be drawn from the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is that, after all, our employees are not so badly treated, having regard to the fact that he wants these other people that he talked about to become employees of the postal department. I thank him for that nice gesture. I have taken the matter up. I have discussed it with my officials. I might tell the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that all new contracts have in them an escalator clause as to the question of salaries only. With regard to this escalator clause for salaries or wages, we are governed by the prevailing wages that are established by the labour department. As soon as the labour department tells us that the prevailing rate in such a district is so much, we insist upon the contractors passing on to the drivers this addition that we make to our contracts. That clause is in the new contracts. We are now working to get these old contracts—of which Winnipeg I think is one—into line with all the others where the escalator will apply.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad to know that the matter is being given some consideration. I accept the comment that the Postmaster General made as to the inference from my remarks. It is certainly true that post office employees generally are dealt with much better than is this group of employees working under these particular private contractors. There is no question about it that they would be better off directly under the Post Office Department. But I am afraid that the suggestion that seems to be in process of being fulfilled will not solve the problem. This business of having escalator clauses and of referring to the Department of Labour to find out what the prevailing rate is always results in those affected by it lagging far behind. We know that from sad experience.

I am afraid I had better take a minute or two to give some of these figures just to show what is going on. At the present time these men are getting 83 cents an hour, which for a forty-eight hour week works out at less than $40, or around $170 a month. Thomas Jackson Fuel Company pays a starting rate of 85 cents an hour, and that moves up to 90 cents an hour. McCurdy Fuel and Building Supplies pays its truck drivers $1.05 an hour, gives them two weeks holidays with pay and time and a half and double time after certain periods of time for overtime. The rates for those working for the Winnipeg packing plants start at 95 cents an hour and go up after six weeks to $1.11 an hour; average earnings are $52 a week. All of these figures were in effect last July; in some cases they may now be even better. The Coca Cola Company pays a minimum rate of $55 a week and a maximum rate of $70 a week. The Canadian Pacific Express Company was paying its truck drivers last July a minimum rate of $198.57 a month and a maximum rate of $213.57 a month. The city of Winnipeg pays at one rate only, which is $195 a month. These city employees, employed as truck drivers, get one week's holidays with pay after the first year, two weeks holidays with pay after the second year, and later on that goes up to three weeks holidays with pay, and there are sick leave and other benefits that go with that service. In addition I would point out that civic employees doing comparable work driving trucks get time and a half for overtime and double time if that overtime goes beyond a certain point.

Against that these mail couriers are getting one rate only, 83 cents an hour. They get only one week's holiday with pay, and the only other concession is that there is a little bit of group insurance, no pension rights or privileges, no sick leave. They do not even get their uniforms; they have to buy them and pay for them themselves. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the minister's reply to the effect that consideration is being given to introducing an escalator clause to all these contracts dealing only with the wage rates does not deal with the problem. I wish he would take what he treated as a compliment to his department a little more seriously than he has thus far, and that he would go the whole way and put these employees directly under his department.

Mr. Rinfret: That would mean taking over 13,420 contracts.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute; there are 35 of these employees in the city of Winnipeg. I am talking about the couriers who pick up letters from street letter boxes. Does the minister mean to tell me that there are that many contracts for that type of work?

Mr. Rinfret: There is no difference between the courier who picks up the letters from the boxes and the other couriers who pick them up and take them from the station to the post office or from the post office to the rural districts. It would mean 13,420 contracts.

Mr. Knowles: All right; I would like to be shown that there are that many contracts; but if employees of 13,000 contractors are suffering conditions such as these, then it is high time that the Postmaster General did take them over.

Mr. Rinfret: I did not say they were all like these. What I did say was that there were 13,420 contracts altogether.

Mr. Knowles: Does the Postmaster General think that it is fair to leave these men working at these rates and under these conditions?

Mr. Rinfret: I have answered that.

Mr. Knowles: Is there no answer?

Mr. Rinfret: I have already answered it; I do not need to answer it a second time.

Mr. Knowles: I have asked the Postmaster General whether he thinks it is fair to leave these men under this wage rate and under these conditions.

Mr. Rinfret: I have already answered the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and told him what I have done to correct the situation. He has made another suggestion. I will study it as I study every one of the suggestions that come from any hon. members.

Mrs. Fairclough: About three weeks ago I directed a question to the Postmaster

General with reference to payment for overtime work in the transition period on the inauguration of the new mail deliveries, and was subsequently answered, I think a week later, to the effect that payment for overtime would be made in cash. Since that time I have been talking to some of the carriers. Perhaps the minister will be good enough to tell me whether the information that I have is correct. I am now told that nothing will be paid until all of these walks have been checked, and that when they have been checked, if it is found that the man has worked six hours overtime a week during the checking period he will then be paid overtime for the period back to the inauguration of the new walk. Is that correct?

Mr. Rinfret: That is correct.

Mrs. Fairclough: What provision is there for the men, some of whose difficulties may be ironed out, and who probably would not show a great volume of overtime at the present time, but who have in the past, in the process of getting the new walk into some kind of efficient working order, put in a great deal of overtime? Are they to get nothing for the time they have put on this work?

Mr. Rinfret: As I said this morning in answer I think to a question put to me by the hon. member for Battle River, any walk that can be checked will be paid overtime. But unfortunately, if we are not in a position to check it, there is nothing much we can do about it.

Mrs. Fairclough: Of course this matter was talked about at great length at the time the changes were made in the deliveries, and these men were working for a couple of months under these conditions, carrying particularly heavy loads and working several hours overtime a day. There are a number of them who have a record in the city of Hamilton, for instance. A record was kept of these hours, and without putting a man actually on with every man every day to check I do not know what figures the department will take to arrive at the amount of overtime that was actually worked, because as conditions changed some of these men left the routes. Some of them have gone on to other jobs, and some of them have had adjustments made so that they are no longer operating under the conditions under which they were operating in March, April and May. There have been a great many hours worked. I quoted some figures in the house at the time I spoke to the minister in the house. I have them here, but I will not repeat them at this time. Can some consideration not be given to these men who, everyone will agree, worked many hours overtime in order to inaugurate this new system?

Mr. Rinfret: Again I wish to thank the hon. member for the inference that the situation is much better today than it was some weeks ago, because if these couriers are working less time today than they were, then the situation has been corrected to that extent. As to the other feature of the presentation of the hon. member, I am afraid there is nothing much I can do unless an efficient check is made of the routes.

Mrs. Fairclough: It seems to me the minister is very quick to put an optimistic slant on any statement made with reference to his department. I would not say the situation is corrected at all. I have a list here showing the overtime worked in the month of April, and for one week of the month of May. At that time, of course, the new routes were in operation, and some of the difficulties had been ironed out; but they are not cured by any means.

I do not think that because a man on a route has been efficient is any reason for saying that he has not suffered, or that he has not contributed to the efficient operation of a route at considerable cost to himself in both time and effort. I do not think it is proper for the Postmaster General to claim credit for his department for correcting a situation which has been corrected largely as a result of a man's own efforts.

Then, with reference to deliveries, I would say that on previous occasions I asked about the classification of walks as residential walks. Since that time many more complaints have come to me; I would mention one in particular which refers to Main street, Hamilton, within two blocks of the post office proper, which has been classified as a residential walk.

From memory I have made a list of some of the businesses operating in that area. There is the office of a large canning industry, there are several lawyers, a restaurant, a real estate office, a stockbroker, a coal merchant, a large trust company, the main branch of a large bank, the Bell Telephone Company, a hotel and a manufacturing jeweler. Those are only a few of them. Yet that walk is classified as a residential walk, and they have only one mail delivery a day.

Moreover, those who wish to pick up mail at the post office so that they may carry on business more or less in a normal way find that no boxes are available, and that they are unable to do so. It seems to me there should be some way of rectifying a situation like that. If the mail delivery service is to be cut, then certainly there should be facilities at the post office whereby these people would be able to pick up their own mail and not have to wait until the afternoon, so that banking hours would be over before they received the mail coming to them.

Then there is one other matter I should like to ask about, and that has reference to mail going out from the House of Commons to various parts of the country, and the manner in which it is handled. On Friday, May 25, I wrote a letter here in Ottawa and posted it here in the House of Commons before five o'clock in the afternoon of that day. It was received on the following Tuesday, May 29, in Hamilton. I inquired about this delivery and was told that mail going from the House of Commons and different government departments is handled as second-class mail, and that this accounts for the delay.

If this is not so, then I suggest a check should be made, because apparently that is what has happened; a letter which I posted at five o'clock on Friday was received in Hamilton on the following Tuesday.

Mr. Rinfret: I shall most certainly check the latter part of the hon. member's statement. There is absolutely no foundation for the information she was given, namely that it was dealt with as second-class mail. All first-class mail is handled in the same way throughout Canada.

Then, as to residential routes, I have already explained to the committee that they can include as much as twenty-five per cent of commercial or industrial establishments. I have already said to hon. members that a complete re-survey is being made of all commercial and industrial establishments with a view to reorganizing the routes so that if, out of four or five different routes, we can establish a commercial route, we shall do so. But the services of the Post Office Department have to go on. We just cannot stop the machine, make the repairs and then go on after the machine has been repaired. We must make the repairs while the machine operates—and of course that takes a little more time than if it were stopped.

Mrs. Fairclough: Would a hotel be classified as a residence? Would the Y.M.C.A. or the Y.W.C.A. be classified as residences?

Mr. Rinfret: The hon. member is quite right when she says that about fifteen of the places she named are not residences. But we have to establish a certain standard, and we say that a residential route is one that may include up to twenty-five per cent of commercial or industrial establishments.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Mrs. Fairclough: I can understand what the postmaster is driving at, and I would have no quarrel if this were taking place in an outlying area; but when it is right in the very heart of the business district it is entirely different. If the route is being classified as a residential route because of that portion of it lying in a residential part, and removed from the centre of the city, then I urge that the part in the centre of the city should be placed on another route.

Mr. Rinfret: That is exactly what we plan doing.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is a great injustice to these people.

Mr. Gillis: I was glad to hear the Postmaster General say this morning that he realized there had been a good deal of difficulty and confusion in the swing-over in the postal department. I have already expressed my views about most of those things with which I disagree.

The minister said this morning the department was prepared to examine all complaints and to correct any situation where there may be a hardship.

Mr. Rinfret: If possible.

Mr. Gillis: Yes, if possible. I believe the minister will recall that he has been receiving a substantial amount of correspondence from the city of Sydney in regard to the business section of that city with a population of from 8,000 to 10,000, and which is three miles away from the main post office. Perhaps the deputy minister will be more familiar with the correspondence. Delivery has been cut to one a day. The city clerk of Sydney has written to me, and I have written to the minister and the deputy minister. To date, the city council are not satisfied with the attitude taken by the department. A letter to me dated May 18 from the clerk of Sydney encloses a copy of a letter written to him by the minister. They say the minister has not faced up to the problem, and they urge that two deliveries a day are necessary in that section. It would mean the addition of only one mail carrier, and this would not entail a very heavy expense. A large area in the city is affected.

I believe the city council of Sydney is making a reasonable request when they ask the minister to relieve the condition by adding another mail carrier to the walk for the purpose of making the additional delivery. I do not know whether the minister has re-examined the problem since he last wrote to the city clerk but, if he has, I would ask him to make a statement. If not, will he look into the matter again and see if something cannot be done to remedy the situation?

Mr. Rinfret: To be perfectly frank, this is one matter I would have expected to discuss when my estimates are before the committee. I am not ready to give an answer at this time.

Mr. Gillis: Well, I thought I would bring it to the minister's attention so that he could give some thought to it. I hope the minister will do some more thinking about it, because he will hear more about it.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman, there is a veterans housing project in St. John's known as Tunis Court to which there is no mail delivery. Representations have been made to the head postmaster in St. John's but without success. I forwarded a petition signed by these people to the minister on May 4 and he promised he would get in touch with the head postmaster at St. John's. Nothing has been done and the residents are getting anxious.

Mr. Rinfret: This is another matter that should be taken up when the estimates are being considered.

Mr. Fair: When we were discussing rural mail routes earlier in the day the minister said he would give me the number of routes that have been suspended temporarily. I wonder if I could have that information broken down into the different provinces. Another matter I have been asked about is the cost of installing lock boxes in post office lobbies. Some people feel that the rates being charged are too high in comparison with the cost of installing them, particularly when other people are being served by mail routes without charge.

Mr. Rinfret: When I stated this morning that I would obtain information for the hon. member for Battle River I meant that I would have that when the estimates were before the committee. The information in the form in which he wants it is being collected. I have nothing before me with regard to the cost of lock boxes, but I shall have that information on my estimates.

Mr. Johnston: Before we drop this matter of post office boxes may I again direct attention to a matter which I have brought up on other occasions, although not while the present minister was head of the department. In most post offices where lock boxes are installed the outside doors of the post office are locked at six o'clock which creates a hardship for many people who have boxes, particularly those who are in business and who cannot get away until after six o'clock. Then again mail may come in by train late in the afternoon or toward the evening, be taken to the post office, distributed to the boxes, but again the outside doors are locked.

Where lock boxes are installed I cannot see any necessity to keep the outside doors locked. The boxes are all locked and the safety of the mail would not be jeopardized if the outside doors were to remain unlocked. When people are paying for their boxes they should have access to them. I join with the hon. member for Battle River in suggesting that the present rates for these boxes are higher than might be charged.

Mr. Rinfret: Wherever it is possible we have what we call a night lobby with direct access from the street. We have these night lobbies in new post offices, but the hon. member will realize that that would not be possible in all post offices.

Mr. Wright: Section 5 (1) (l) reads:

(l) establish and maintain a fund derived from moneys received from postal employees and pay out of the fund losses sustained by reason of the default or neglect of any postal employee or mail contractor in carrying out his duties in any matter relating to the Canada post office;

Could the minister give the present standing of that fund, how much was collected and how much was paid out last year, and what are the rates of deduction?

Mr. Rinfret: We have not collected anything from employees for several years. It was intended that the fund should grow and it has grown to a sufficient extent that we do not need to collect any more.

Mr. Wright: What is the amount of the fund?

Mr. Rinfret: I will get it for the hon. member.

Mr. Catherwood: I was pleased to hear the minister say to the hon. member for Melfort that post offices might be opened in rural areas where the routes were being discontinued. There is a feeling throughout rural Canada that some of the post offices are to be closed and I hope the minister will give serious consideration before the closing of any such post offices. Most of these post offices are located in general stores and form an important part of the community life.

Mr. Rinfret: This again is a matter for my estimates and if possible I should like to keep to the bill. When the estimates are up we will have all the information. In the meantime, I would say to the hon. member for Melfort that the fund stands at present at $300,000.

Mr. Wright: How much was paid out last year?

Mr. Rinfret: Could that wait until the estimates? I stated this morning that we were closing post offices when it was felt that the rural routes were providing sufficient service. In some cases the number remaining to be served by the post office might be only two, three or four persons. I do not think we could defend keeping a post office open with all the expense necessary to pay the salary of the postmaster, to pay the courier to bring mail from the station to the post office and so on, to serve two, three or four people. I think it is a good policy to close such post offices. As I said this morning, when a mail route is discontinued we will consider the reopening of the post office.

Mr. Adamson: Paragraph (s) reads:

Pay out of postal revenue losses resulting from fire, theft or forgery.

Then subsection 2 is headed "no liability." Those appear to be contradictory. Paragraph (s) is new, and I should like to have the minister explain it.

Mr. Rinfret: Losses from fire, theft or forgery may not result from malfeasance or misfeasance on the part of postal employees, and in that case the amount to be payable as compensation could not be properly drawn from the guarantee fund and it is therefore essential that such payments be made from revenue.

Mr. Adamson: That is, if a postal note is forged and improperly paid, the department pays the owner of the note from the general funds of the country and not from the reserve funds of the department?

Mr. Rinfret: Yes, if there is no misfeasance.

Mr. Noseworthy: I have two or three questions, and I do not know whether the minister wants to answer them now or on his estimates. In his report I noticed that last year there were about 44,000 full and part-time employees of the department. Can the minister tell me how many of those were employed through the civil service commission and how many were appointed outside the commission?

Mr. Rinfret: I believe that would be a proper question for the estimates.

Mr. Shaw: Would the minister put on record the regulations relative to the hours during which post offices may have their general delivery and other wickets open to serve the public? I find great variations in this regard. For example, in one town the office will be open at a certain hour, and in another town it will be open at a different hour. In one town the general delivery and other wickets will be closed at noon for an hour and a half or two hours, while in another they will be closed for one hour. In one town they are closed Wednesday afternoons; in another they are closed Thursday afternoons. There must be regulations in connection with this, and I would appreciate it if they could be put on the record.

Mr. Rinfret: There seems to be a general impression that service in thinly settled areas and the frequency of the opening of wickets are matters governed solely by the department. Actually attention must be paid to the hours when trains come in, and how frequently the trains run. We have to follow the movement of the trains, and for that reason we cannot draw up any such schedule as the hon. member requested.

(Translation):

Mr. Gagnon: I would like to know what is required of those places which would like to have a post office built. Is that decision left to the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) or to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier)? What are the department's requirements?

Mr. Rinfret: No such recommendation is ever made by the Post Office Department unless a post office has a revenue of over $10,000. Beyond that, a priority is established according to the needs of the locality. Then, after discussion between the Post Office Department and the Department of Public Works, the construction of a building is decided upon.

(Text):

Mr. Noseworthy: Is not the question I asked the Postmaster General in order under subsection 1 (b).

Mr. Rinfret: The number of employees as at March 31, 1951, was 46,402, made up as follows:

Headquarters	985
Staff offices	15,436
Part time	634
District offices	565
Railway mail clerks	1,318
Mail contractors	13,440
Revenue postmasters, including semi, sub and seasonal offices	12,038
Full time assistants	1,355
Part time assistants	631

Mr. Noseworthy: Now can the minister tell us how many of those were appointed through the civil service commission and how many outside the commission?

Mr. Rinfret: The contractors, of course, are not appointed by the civil service commission. Of the revenue postmasters, as I have said before, those in offices where the revenue is more than $3,000 are appointed by the civil service commission and the others are appointed by the Postmaster General. The proportion of the post offices with less than $3,000 is about 89 per cent, if I remember correctly.

Mr. Knowles: Can the Postmaster General give the exact figure of the number appointed under the provisions of section 5 (1) (b); how many of that 46,000?

Mr. Rinfret: That is exactly what I said. The post offices having revenue of less than $3,000—

Mr. Knowles: But what is the number?

Mr. Rinfret: They represent 89 per cent, and the calculation is easy enough to make. I have not made it, but about 1,200 would be appointed by the commission and about 11,800 by the Postmaster General.

Mr. Knowles: Does that have reference to contractors only?

Mr. Rinfret: No, that is the answer to your question.

Mr. Knowles: Those appointed under 5 (1) (b)?

Mr. Rinfret: Yes.

Mr. Shaw: In reply to my previous question the Postmaster General indicated something we all appreciate; that we must have some regard to when the trains arrive. But is there not some regulation to the effect that post office wickets may be closed for a reasonable period while the mail is sorted? Surely you are not going to permit wickets to be closed for perhaps three hours while mail is sorted which would normally require an hour. There must be some general rule governing that.

Mr. Rinfret: The rule is usually half an hour to an hour, depending upon the amount of mail arriving on the train, not three hours.

Mr. Shaw: Then I understand there are in Canada some post offices where the revenue is more than $3,000 and the postmasters are on a commission basis.

Mr. Rinfret: That is not right.

Mr. Shaw: Then let me approach it in this way. I understand this was the case until recently. I knew there was a move away from that, and I was going to ask how many postmasters in Canada are still working on a commission basis. I assume the answer will be that the change-over has been completed.

Mr. Rinfret: There are no such post offices. There may be some sub-post offices in cities.

Mr. Tustin: I would like to ask a question in regard to the closing of the lobbies of the post offices. For instance, usually the wickets close at six or six thirty, and a certain time is allowed after that during which the box holders can get in to get their mail. Is there any set time when the lobby doors must be locked, or is that up to the postmaster?

Mr. Rinfret: That ties in pretty well with what I have already told the hon. member for Red Deer. There is no set time for that. It depends, as I just said, on the arrival of the trains. We have to be guided by that.

Mr. Tustin: I do not mean the wicket where they apply for their mail.

Mr. Rinfret: The night lobbies will be open only after the post office proper is closed, and the closing of the post office depends upon the arrival of the trains.

Mr. Tustin: I do not think the Postmaster General understands me. Let me take my own post office in Napanee. Our trains come in around noon, at one o'clock and one thirty, and again at midnight. I am trying to find out if there is any set time when the lobby doors must be locked; that is the doors of the building. There are no trains coming in, and I believe the doors are locked at seven or seven thirty.

Mr. Rinfret: Under those circumstances the normal closing time would be six o'clock.

Mr. Tustin: That would be for the lobby and all?

Mr. Rinfret: Yes.

Mr. McLure: I do not fully understand paragraph (i), subsection 1 of section 5 which gives the postmaster authority to set up stamp vending machines. What is the difference in the commission paid to the people who run stamp vending machines as compared to meter machines? Some of these stamp vending machines must be making quite a profit, because you have to pay five cents for a four-cent stamp; for three 3-cent stamps, you have to pay ten cents. There is no change coming back from these machines. I understand they are established in hotels or wherever they can get a vending machine going.

This leads me back to the fact that you must be paying some commission, or is the machine just paying for its own operation? Paragraph (k) gives the Postmaster General authority to require any person to give security for the due performance of duties performed relative to the Canada Post Office. Now, I believe that puts my stamp vendor at Charlottetown in the category of a postal employee, at least with regard to his security. I should like some information on that as well.

Mr. Rinfret: As to the first question, vending machines are established for the convenience of the patrons. They do not get any commission. If my hon. friend has seen one of these machines, he knows that they will give two 2-cent stamps for five cents. They make their commission out of the sale to the public. If the public does not want the convenience of getting two 2-cent stamps for five cents, that is their business, not ours.

On the second question, this paragraph only gives the Postmaster General the authority to ask for security.

Mr. McLure: Who owns these machines?

Mr. Rinfret: The persons operating them, who buy the stamps from us. As to paragraph (k), that only gives the Postmaster General the authority to do that.

Mr. Noseworthy: I appreciate the answer the Postmaster General gave, and that his answer applied to paragraph (b) of section 5. I should like him to take note now that on the estimates I should like to know how many of those 46,000 employees are permanent.

Mr. McLure: Paragraph (n) of section 5 gives the Postmaster General authority to establish and alter the limits of postal areas. This gives considerable trouble to any member of parliament who represents a rural constituency, because when the postal department changes an established area we have a great deal of trouble. I should like the Postmaster General to say how he gets the information to establish and alter the limits of certain postal areas that have been in operation for years?

Mr. Rinfret: This paragraph (n) has to be read in connection with section 10. Section 10 says:

> The rates of postage on letters posted in Canada for delivery in Canada are:
> (a) On each letter for delivery within the postal area in which it is posted, . . .

The Postmaster General must have some authority to define an area, and this gives him that authority.

On section 6—Regulations.

Mr. Knowles: In connection with section 6, there is a comment I should like to make. Most statutes that come before us contain sections providing that the regulations to be made under such and such act are to be made by the governor in council. I do not find any such section in this act. When we read this section, it seems that the Postmaster General by himself may make the regulations spelled out in the various subsections. Has it always been the practice for regulations of this kind to be made solely by the Postmaster General? Does the Postmaster General feel it should be this way or would it not be for his own protection if it were necessary for them to be made by the governor in council?

Mr. Rinfret: All these are subject, of course, to the Regulations Act, and have to be published in the regular way. If the hon. member will look at the other side of the page, he will see that all these paragraphs with the exception of (s) are contained in the old act.

Mr. Knowles: These have always been regulations made exclusively by the Postmaster General, then, without reference to his cabinet colleagues?

Mr. Rinfret: That is correct, except (s), of course, which is new.

Mr. McLure: Paragraph (d) of section 6 refers to the establishment of rates of postage. Will the Postmaster General bring in his amendment under this paragraph or will he wait until section 11?

Mr. Rinfret: Paragraph (d) says:

> establishing rates of postage on any class of mailable matter for which a rate is not established by this act;

Section 11 does establish a rate, and therefore this paragraph excludes section 11.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Unlawful use of mails.

Mr. Blair: Will the Postmaster General explain just what types of tickets for raffles and so on are prohibited? Where is the line drawn? I received a few tickets through the mail from one organization, and printed on the tickets were the words "Cleared for the purpose of complying with the law". Some really responsible people have been denied the use of the mails. Where is the line drawn?

Mr. Rinfret: The Criminal Code, I am afraid.

Mr. Blair: Would the minister mind explaining the sections of the Criminal Code covering lottery tickets?

Mr. Rinfret: There are a number of sections in the Criminal Code covering these various matters.

Mr. Blair: There are communities that are building community halls or war memorials, and some very responsible people have been denied the use of the mail by a ruling of the Postmaster General.

Mr. Rinfret: I am afraid it will have to continue to be like that. Tickets for all drawings that go through the mail, whether they call them lotteries, bingos or anything else, for prizes worth more than $50, come within the classification of a lottery. They are denied the use of the mails. I understand that by doing so we are hitting quite a number of charitable institutions that we should be helping. But on the other hand, if we allow one of these charitable institutions to go through the mails, we will be flooded by a hundred rackets that should not go through the mails.

Mr. Noseworthy: Subsection 2 of section 7 provides for the setting up of a board of review nominated by the Postmaster General. Has the Postmaster General received any representations from public bodies asking that that board of review should be independent instead of being nominated by the Postmaster General?

Mr. Rinfret: I received some representation to that effect from the board of trade of the city of Toronto, yes.

Mr. Noseworthy: Has the minister given any consideration to that request?

Mr. Rinfret: I have given it consideration and I have discussed it with the officials of the department. Any independent board that might be nominated under the suggestion of the Toronto board of trade would, I suppose, be one board like the railway board or the air transport board or ones like that, which would again be a governmental body. It is felt that the authority should be left in the discretion of the Postmaster General.

Last year when this matter was broached, the request that was made of the department was not so much to have an independent board as to give the persons whose mail had been stopped an opportunity of explaining to somebody in the department the reasons why it should not be stopped. Last year I promised that this would be done. By introducing section 7 we are just giving effect to the promise that was made last year.

Mr. Noseworthy: For his own protection and in order to avoid criticism, would the minister not be well advised to make that an independent board? To me there does not seem to be any difference between appealing to the Postmaster General and appealing to a board appointed by the Postmaster General. To me that seems to be one and the same thing. I would strongly urge that consideration be given to the suggestion to which I have referred.

Then there was another request to the effect that there should be the normal right of appeal to the courts from ministerial action based upon the findings of a board of review. Has the minister given consideration to that question?

Mr. Rinfret: That is so. The brief of the board of trade of the city of Toronto also mentions the question of an appeal; but it was not felt that the discretion should be taken away from the Postmaster General. I realize that it is quite a heavy responsibility, but I think it is one that a minister of the crown should be ready to accept.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Exclusive privilege of Postmaster General.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to say a word or two about the wording of section 8 (1). I understand as well as anyone else what this wording is intended to mean. I realize that we are following a practice that has come down as a bit of tradition. But it seems to me that we might make the wording in a section like this a little bit more appropriate to the situation. Just notice, Mr. Chairman, what it says:

> Except as provided in subsection two, the Postmaster General has the sole and exclusive privilege of collecting, conveying and delivering letters within Canada.

The Postmaster General is a fairly capable fellow, but he is not as ubiquitous as that. I do not think we should have on our statute books a statute which seems to say that, as to every letter that is picked up anywhere in Canada, or any letter that is delivered, it is done by the Postmaster General.

Mr. Rinfret: Not himself.

Mr. Lesage: If the hon. member had been at law school, he would know different.

Mr. Knowles: The parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs refers to law school. That is exactly my point. Professional lawyers do not stop to look at the meaning of the language they have been using—

Mr. Lesage: It is because we do look at it; that is why.

Mr. Knowles: They do not look at the meaning of the language they have been using across the years. We all know that what is meant by this section is the Post Office Department or the Canada Post Office. In fact, back in section 2 (1) (a) we have defined Canada Post Office in these words:

> "Canada Post Office" means the activities conducted under the direction and control of the Postmaster General.

Then a little later on we had section 3 which provided for the organization of a department to be known as the Post Office Department over which the Postmaster General is to preside. But it seems to me that we should be realistic and factual in our wording, and that in a section like this, instead of saying that the Postmaster General collects, conveys and delivers all letters within Canada, we should say either the Post Office Department or the Canada Post Office. I like that phrase that has come into this act; I refer to the "Canada Post Office". I think it would be preferable if in this section the wording had been:

Except as provided in subsection two, the Canada Post Office has the sole and exclusive privilege of collecting, conveying and delivering letters within Canada.

It is not a matter that is of sufficient importance for me to bother to move an amendment. But I suggest the idea seriously, not just in fun. I think the wording in our statutes should conform to the facts of the situation.

Mr. Rinfret: The same wording has been in the act since 1867.

Mr. Knowles: That is exactly the point and that is exactly the trouble. Certainly it has been there since 1867. I realize that. In the notes to the right it says that this section has been section 35, and that means no change has been made. That was good Victorian legal language back in 1867, but we do not mean that today. We do not mean that our good friend Edouard Rinfret is going to run around, collect all the letters and deliver them himself. Then why say that? We mean the department over which he presides. I think a change should be made. In fact, to bring the matter to a head, I will, despite what I said a moment ago, offer an amendment. I move:

That section 8(1) be amended by deleting therefrom the words "Postmaster General" and by substituting therefor the words "Canada Post Office."

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, may I read the section with the amendment. It would read as follows:

Except as provided in subsection two, the activities conducted under the direction and control of the Postmaster General—

Mr. Knowles: No; you had better go back to law school.

Mr. Lesage: It would continue:

—have the sole and exclusive privilege of collecting conveying and delivering letters within Canada.

It makes sense, does it not?

Mr. Knowles: I suggest that the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet had better go back to law school. I moved as an amendment that the words "Postmaster General" be deleted and that the words "Canada Post Office" be put in their place. That would make section 8 (1) read—and I read it before, if the hon. member had been listening—as follows:

Except as provided in subsection two, the Canada Post Office has the sole and exclusive privilege of collecting, conveying and delivering letters within Canada.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, but—

Mr. Knowles: If anyone wants to know what "Canada Post Office" means,—

Mr. Lesage: Read it now.

Mr. Knowles: —he does what one does with every other act. He looks back to what is usually section 2, the definition section.

Mr. Lesage: That is what I did. Read it.

Mr. Knowles: Looking back to section 2, to find out what that phrase means—

Mr. Lesage: That is exactly what I did.

Mr. Knowles: —one finds it is defined as follows:

"Canada Post Office" means the activities conducted under the direction and control of the Postmaster General.

Mr. Lesage: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, it means the Post Office Department; it means employees of the Post Office Department.

Mr. Ferrie: Do not waste the time of the committee.

Mr. Rinfret: It means activities. We cannot very well accept that amendment in the other section. It is not the activities that have the privilege. It is the Postmaster General.

Mr. Knowles: If the Postmaster General wants to leave the law reading that he personally is the one who is to run around and pick up the letters and do all the delivering I have no option but to leave it to him, but surely it is a ridiculous way to word the section.

Mr. Graydon: Had you not better bring in a judge?

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has not sent the amendment up to me, but I understand he is doing so.

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: As I understand the amendment, it replaces the words "Postmaster General" with the words "Canada Post Office".

Those in favour of the amendment, please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Deputy Chairman: Those against it please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Deputy Chairman: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the amendment lost.

Amendment negatived.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Rates on letters.

Mr. McLure: Paragraph (a) deals with rates of postage. There is an increase of 50 per cent, an increase from 2 to 3 cents. Let us hope that this service will get back on a revenue producing basis because of these increases, and that we may get back to the position we were in during the years 1946 and 1947 when the Post Office Department had a surplus of $10 million, $11 million and $12 million annually. When one looks back at the report of 1946 one sees a surplus of $11 million. Where has it all vanished? Now we have to raise the postage rates.

Mr. Rinfret: I am sorry to disagree with the hon. member, but there is not one cent of an increase in section 10. It is exactly the same as it was before, except that under the preceding law one part of the postage was charged under the authority of the postal law and the other part was under the Excise Tax Act. Under section 78 of the bill part IX of the Excise Tax Act is repealed but what was in the Excise Tax Act is incorporated in the postal act. There is no change in practice. It is exactly the same rate.

Mr. McLure: There is a change in the postage rate.

Mr. Knowles: Has there been any separate bookkeeping with respect to the excise tax and the rates of postage that have been charged since that came into effect?

Mr. Rinfret: Not for many years, anyhow. I do not know whether at the beginning there was any segregation, but for the past several years it has been all kept as revenue of the post office.

Mr. Knowles: The reason I ask that is that I remember when Mr. Ilsley first brought in that tax during the war he specified that it was a tax for general revenue purposes and not an increase in the postage rate. What has happened now is that what originally was a tax for war revenue has been built into the postage rates on a permanent basis.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Newspapers and periodicals.

Mr. Rinfret: There has been quite a lot of discussion on this subject. One matter that has been brought up is whether or not the amount of $12 million which was paid last year in services was or was not a subsidy. I beg leave to disagree with the leader of the opposition, and I am very fortunate in having Webster on my side. The New International dictionary says a subsidy is:

> A grant of funds or property from a government, as of the state or municipal corporation, to a private person or company to assist in the establishment or support of an enterprise deemed advantageous to the public; a subvention. In practice subsidies are chiefly granted in aid of transportation enterprises, as to ship, canal, air transport, or railway companies, bounties on sugar being next in importance. A subsidy may be a simple gift or may consist in the payment of an amount in excess of the usual charges for any service, as in carrying the mails, or of funds to aid in establishing or maintaining a service or equipment larger or more powerful than the state of trade would warrant, as the building and keeping in service of vessels designed for use as cruisers and auxiliaries in war.

According to Webster the excess of what the Post Office Department has to pay for transportation on newspapers over what we actually receive would therefore be a subsidy. Therefore last year we gave a subsidy of $12 million to newspapers and magazines. Newspapers will claim that it was not paid to them directly. That may be true. They may have been paid for the purpose of the rural readers. That also may be true. It also remains true, Mr. Chairman, that never has any government given for the purpose an amount as large as the one that we did give last year, to wit, $12 million, and the rural readers have benefited to that extent. The year before the subsidy was $11 million; the year before that the subsidy was $11 million. It has kept on increasing all the time. It is felt that at some time or other, with the mounting costs that we have to bear in the department, something has to be done to bring the matter a little more in line with the situation. With the estimate that we have at the present time, the present year in which we are now engaged, unless there is some change, will bring us a deficit of some $14 million or $15 million on the second-class category alone.

I have already said that if we did not have a deficit we could reduce the postage throughout the four-cent rate area so as to bring it into conformity with other areas in Canada so that we could have a uniform rate of 3 cents throughout the country. But the surplus that we have on the first-class mail we have to apply to certain deficits that we have on certain other classes. I have already spoken of the $12 million deficit on the second-class mail. I have also referred, prior to this debate, to the deficit of $2,250,000 that we have on third-class matter. The rate there has been adjusted. I have also referred to a deficit of $1,800,000 that we had on registration. That rate has been adjusted upwards. In all the various compartments where we had deficits we have tried to bring them in line with expenditures. In this instance, Mr. Chairman, we have a deficit of $12 million, and we are seeking from the newspapers only one-sixth of the amount, to wit, $2 million.

Some representations have been made to the effect that we have discriminated against certain classes of second-class matter. I should like to point out that last year the Post Office Department carried 158,004,560 pounds of mail. Out of this total, 66,355,674 were carried for dailies over 10,000 circulation and 3,480,407 for dailies under 10,000. A weight of 70 million pounds was carried for dailies, as against all the rest of the second-class matter.

Therefore the situation is that if we are to ask the people of Canada to pay two million dollars more in postal rates we have to divide the field in two, having on one side all the dailies, and on the other the weeklies, the monthlies, the quarterlies and all the others. That is the division made in the weight. After all, weight is what we have to reckon with. What we have to charge for is a service we give, and the service we give must be reckoned on the poundage we have to move.

Therefore in the department we have made a calculation of the various ways of making a separation between these two bodies. We figure that one million dollars should come out of dailies and one million dollars should come from the rest of the field. We have arranged our rates so that it would produce exactly that amount.

Mr. Drew: I do not wish to interrupt the Postmaster General, but when he says that one million dollars is to come out of the dailies, and another million from the rest of the papers, does he mean by that that the computation he now makes provides that there will be one million dollars paid in respect of the carrying of the daily papers and one million dollars in respect of other types of material carried in this way?

Mr. Rinfret: That is right. That would be only the increase, of course. The accusation of discrimination has been mentioned in respect of the various rates charged. There again I would point out to the committee that, in assessing rates for various newspapers or periodicals, we must take into consideration the strain being put on the post office by these various papers.

Dailies of over 10,000 circulation entail the highest cost of any class of publication. Many railway post offices could be discontinued if no dailies were in existence. The daily newspapers have to receive top priority at peak work-load periods.

Mr. Graydon: There might be a lot of institutions which would have to close if we did not have the daily papers.

Mr. Rinfret: One thing I am sure of is that I would not have a $12 million deficit, and I could pass that on to the rest of the population of Canada. The dailies come to the post office when the big rush is on. We must give them a priority, because they do not want to be delayed, nor do we want to delay them. They have to be on the market as soon as possible. With the weeklies and monthlies, on the other hand, the question of reaching the market one or two hours later is not of such great importance. Therefore, instead of handling this business at a time of peak load, we can deal with the weeklies and monthlies one or two hours later, when the rush is over.

Another question which arises in connection with the big dailies, and one which involves another strain upon us, is the fact that they are put to mail in the post offices which are the most expensive for us to operate.

I have before me the various considerations as they affect the dailies, the tri-weeklies, the semi-weeklies and the weeklies, the monthlies, the fortnightlies and the quarterlies. It must be realized that a monthly magazine comes to us only once a month, whereas a daily comes twenty-five times a month. We have to deal with the papers as they come to the office.

However, I believe the real test lies in the weights I have indicated, which show that the dailies, by themselves, constitute half the total weight we have to carry. Information has been put on record indicating what these increased rates would mean to rural mail readers. I believe it was the leader of the opposition who read into Hansard a computation he had made to show increases for those readers. He pointed out for instance that a daily of 32 pages with more than 10,000 circulation would pay under the old rate $2.34 whereas as the result of the bill, at the 4-cent rate, it would have to pay $6.24, or an increase of $3.90 on that one paper.

I have here a letter addressed by one of the leading newspapers, one which would fall into the category to which the leader of the opposition referred the other day. This letter states:

Dear Postmaster: (or Rural Mail Courier)
For the first time since 1938—

And the name of the newspaper is set out—

—has made a price change in the cost of mail subscriptions. We do not call it a rate increase because we do not get the money. The new mail subscription rates for—

This newspaper.

—shown on the enclosed confidential rate card have been forced by the government's action in announcing a staggering increase in postal rates on newspapers.

Formerly the postage on a yearly subscription cost $2.34. Now it costs $6.24 a year.

This is exactly the same figure as was quoted the other day by the leader of the opposition.

Under the new postal rates announced May 21, the postage on a year's subscription has increased $3.90 since 1938; and only now is part of this increased cost being passed on to our readers.

I underline the word "now" because, according to this letter, this is to be put into operation on June 1, which is a date before the bill has passed parliament. I underline also the words, "part of the increased cost being passed on to our readers". It continues:

You will notice from the enclosed new rate card that in changing the yearly subscription price of—

This newspaper.

—to $10 per year we have taken this opportunity to increase your commission on yearly subscriptions to fifty cents each, and shorter terms, with the exception of one month, have been increased in proportion.

For a long time we have felt that your commission on mail subscriptions should be increased, but it was impossible to do it under the $7 rate.

The new mail subscription rates become effective June 1. In accepting new or renewal subscriptions on and after this date please be sure that every subscription is taken at the new rates given on the enclosed schedule. Enclosed also is a new rate card for public use. Will you please display it prominently in your post office.

Mr. Graydon: To whom is that addressed?

Mr. Rinfret: It is addressed, "Dear Postmaster or rural mail courier."

Mr. Graydon: But not to the minister? How is the minister reading it?

Mr. Rinfret: I just said that I received it with a blank piece of paper containing these words, "nothing like taking things for granted." Let us examine the situation of this newspaper. Last year it paid $119,000, partly under the one and a half cent rate and partly under the four cent rate for a more than fifty per cent advertising content. Therefore, the amount paid on each subscription was $3.91, although in the letter it is stated that the yearly subscription costs $2.34. They have 30,380 mail subscribers and last year they paid $119,000. Therefore the basis set out in this letter should not be $2.34 but rather $3.91, which indicates a difference of $1.57. According to this letter dated May 28—

Mr. Graydon: Not addressed to the minister?

Mr. Rinfret: It could have been and it would have received the same answer. I might say that the $2.34 mentioned in this letter would be the amount payable by a newspaper without any advertising content, but I do not know of any daily newspaper without an advertising content of 50 per cent or over. Let us examine what this particular newspaper will have to pay under the rates proposed in the bill. They would have to pay $59,203 more, based on the four cent proposed rate, which would represent an increase of approximately $1.94 and not $3.90 as has been suggested. The calculation is easy to make, $59,203 increase spread over 30,380 subscribers.

Mr. McLure: Are those figures for the Globe and Mail?

Mr. Rinfret: That is the name of the paper.

Mr. McLure: Has that paper only 30,000 subscribers?

Mr. Rinfret: Mail subscribers, yes.

Mr. McLure: That proves definitely that this bill is not aimed at the large metropolitan newspapers; it is aimed exclusively at the small ones.

Mr. Rinfret: I want you to know that certain newspapers are taking advantage of this increased rate to pass on to their rural subscribers some of their other charges like those for newsprint and other commodities and then they blame it on the Postmaster General.

If the situation were represented as it should be the increase to the Globe and Mail would not be $3.90; it would be $1.06 without taking into consideration the 50 per cent income tax they would have had to pay on the amount of the real increase. If the income tax were taken into consideration there would be an increase of only 53 cents. They have been asking their mail subscribers since June 1 to pay an amount which is much more than the net increase of 53 cents. What does the balance represent? It certainly does not represent an increase in postal rates.

Mr. Graydon: That might be just a paper you picked up off the street you are reading.

Mr. Rinfret: With the paper that is picked up on the street for reading there is a difference. It has been represented that $15.25 is paid by city readers. I do not know the exact arrangements, but I understand that a certain amount is paid to the boy who delivers the paper or to the newsdealer who operates newsstands. I do not know what the arrangement is now, but when the paper sold at three cents it used to be one-third.

Coming back to this interesting discussion, under the amendment that I am going to ask one of my colleagues to move in a minute the Globe and Mail will have an increase in postage of $32,366. Deducting from that the fifty per cent income tax that they would have had to pay if they had it, you arrive at an amount of $16,183. They are asking their mail subscribers to pay over $91,140; they are passing that on as being the result of the postal rates.

Mr. Knowles: Has the Postmaster General comparable figures for the Toronto Star?

Mr. Rinfret: I have not made a similar calculation because the Toronto Star has not sent any such letter to its mail subscribers.

Mr. Knowles: Does the Postmaster General know whether the Toronto Star is making a comparable increase in its subscription rate for mail subscribers?

Mr. Rinfret: We have not been advised in any way, shape or form. I shall ask one of my colleagues to move this amendment. Under this amendment we keep the four cent rate on the advertising portion of the newspaper, whatever it may be, but in view of certain representations that have been made to the effect that the news portion was entitled to some reduction we have reduced the rate to two and a half cents on the portion of the newspaper which represents news. Therefore, the rate will be two and a half cents for the news portion and four cents for the advertising portion. In that way the newspapers will be treated fairly according to the amount of advertising they carry. If a newspaper has 10 per cent advertising it will be charged 4 cents on the 10 per cent and 2½ cents on the 90 per cent. If on the other hand it has 60 or 65 per cent of advertising it will be charged 4 cents on the 60 or 65 per cent and 2½ cents on the remainder. That is the amendment I propose to introduce to that part of section 11.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That subparagraph (i) of paragraph (a) of subclause (2) of clause 11 of Bill No. 322, an act respecting the Canada Post Office, be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

11. (2) (a) (i) with a circulation of ten thousand or more copies per issue, two and one-half cents for each pound weight or fraction thereof in respect of the portion that is not devoted to advertising and four cents for each pound weight or fraction thereof in respect of the portion consisting of advertising, and

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. Wright: How much will this amendment reduce the revenue from this type of mail in comparison with the original proposal here?

Mr. Rinfret: Approximately $190,000.

Mr. Wright: Will you still have enough revenue to cover the cost of this service?

Mr. Rinfret: Oh, no; not by a long way. The deficit is $12 million and this will produce approximately $1,800,000.

Mr. Wright: In other words there will still be a subsidy of over $10 million?

Mr. Rinfret: Yes. At present for every 8 cents we spend we collect only 2 cents from the newspapers or other periodicals, taking them all generally, whereas with this amendment we will collect approximately 3¼ cents for each 8 cents we spend.

Mr. Wright: I was asking that because some of these newspapers were quite alarmed at what they called a $65 million subsidy to western farmers over a five or six-year period, though at the same time they were being subsidized to the same extent.

Mr. Rinfret: I would not call $12 million equal to $65 million.

Mr. Wright: But the $65 million was over a five-year period.

Mr. Drew: Since the Postmaster General has been giving certain explanations, along with a speech on something which does not seem peculiarly related to the subject, I should think it might be well if we knew or had an indication of what the other amendments are going to be, in order to simplify the discussion.

The Chairman: Then this amendment will stand and we can have the next one.

Mr. Rinfret: The other amendment is to subsection 4, "Rate where letter carrier service."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That subclause (4) of clause 11 of Bill No. 322, an act respecting the Canada Post Office, be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

11. (4) All copies of newspapers and periodicals referred to in this section, other than those referred to in paragraph (f) of subsection 2, that are addressed for delivery within the postal area of publication where there is letter carrier delivery service are subject to postage at the rate of one cent for the first two ounces or fraction thereof and one cent for the next two ounces or fraction thereof and one cent for each additional four ounces or fraction thereof to each separate address.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask just one question for clarification? I take it that with respect to the second amendment these rates apply to each individual copy of the paper?

Mr. Rinfret: That is correct.

Mr. Knowles: Whereas with respect to the first amendment it is a case of weighing the whole works?

Mr. Rinfret: That is right; and for purposes of clarification I might add that a double page of a newspaper weighs about one ounce. Therefore to make one pound a newspaper has to consist of 64 full pages. A 32 page newspaper is calculated at approximately one-half pound.

Mr. Knowles: Then one other question, still for clarification, with respect to the first of the two amendments.

The Chairman: Order. I think if we are to have debate in an orderly way we should take the first amendment first.

Mr. Drew: Is there any other amendment to section 11?

Mr. Rinfret: No, that is all.

Mr. Knowles: Then with respect to the first amendment, the one now before us, when will the computing be done with respect to the space devoted to advertising and the space devoted to news? Will it be at regular intervals, or what is the plan?

Mr. Rinfret: They are checked every day.

Mr. Knowles: So each issue is checked and the bill is made out specifically for that day?

Mr. Rinfret: I do not know whether the bill is sent out that particular day, but every issue is checked and the corresponding figure is established. I am told that most daily newspapers have credits at the post office, and the amount is charged to that credit every day.

Mr. Graydon: It is rather difficult to follow the ramifications of these amendments, so to clarify the situation I would like to ask a question. Does this amended section cover just daily newspapers, or does it cover magazines, weekly periodicals and all that sort of thing? If not, what do they pay, or is any change contemplated with respect to them?

Mr. Rinfret: The amendment is in relation to section 11 (2) (a). The position of magazines, weeklies and so on is not altered except to the extent that they may be affected by the second amendment to subsection 4.

Mr. Graydon: What will a weekly or monthly magazine pay by way of postage after this act comes into effect?

Mr. Rinfret: As I said before, the extent of the increase in toto will be $1 million. If a weekly has a circulation of more than 50,000 it will pay 3 cents for each pound; that is under paragraph (c). If the circulation is less than 50,000 and more than 10,000 it will pay 2½ cents, and with a circulation of less than 10,000 per issue it will pay 1½ cents for each pound or fraction thereof with the proviso that in cities of less than 10,000 the weeklies have free circulation of 2,500 copies. Does that answer my hon. friend?

Mr. Graydon: Partially.

Mr. Noseworthy: Has the minister figures showing the effect of this change upon the weekly magazines published in Canada, such as Saturday Night and magazines of that type?

Mr. Rinfret: There will be no change unless they are covered by the amendment to subsection 4, if they are delivered in letter carrier areas. Then instead of two cents for the first four ounces they will have to pay one cent for the first two ounces and one cent for the next two ounces. So far as weeklies, monthlies and all the others are concerned, the only difference it will make will be the amount of $1 million, roughly.

Mr. Wright: I should like to know under what class of mail the mail order catalogues are carried?

Mr. Rinfret: Printed matter at two cents for the first two ounces, and one cent for each additional two ounces. It amounts to about nine cents a pound.

Mr. Wright: I asked what class. Are they second class?

Mr. Rinfret: Third class.

Mr. Wright: Earlier the minister stated that the deficit under third-class mail was $2,250,000. Are you proposing any increase in those rates to cover this deficit?

Mr. Rinfret: No. I have already explained that under section 8, which has been adopted, the Postmaster General has the exclusive privilege of collecting and delivering letters within Canada. The rates for so doing have to be established by parliament. So far as second-class mail is concerned, such as newspapers, on account of the subsidy question it is better to have these rates established by parliament as it is a matter of policy. On third-class matter, such as circulars, catalogues, parcel post, registration and all the other fees, the rates are fixed by regulation by the Postmaster General.

As I explained before, for the year ending March 31, 1951, we had a deficit of $2,250,000 on third class matter. We increased our rates on the first two ounces from one cent to two cents, effective on April 2. We are hoping that with this increase this deficit will be wiped out.

Mr. Graydon: This afternoon the minister brandished, with considerable flourish, a letter which he said was not addressed to him. How he managed to get this letter out of the post office is a matter which I suppose will have to be left to conjecture. I was wondering how the Postmaster General could come into the house and read a letter which was addressed to someone else, not table it and not give any indication as to the source of the letter. He then based his argument upon part of that letter. I should like the Postmaster General to clarify that.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The same thing was done by one of your members today.

Mr. Graydon: If the Minister of Public Works is now going to take as his example for the future what we in the opposition do, we welcome that because we should like to give him some good examples to follow.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Very often the hon. member for Queens gives an example.

Mr. Rinfret: First of all, this is not a regular letter, but a circular letter sent to all postmasters and rural mail couriers who happen to have on their routes or in their post offices subscribers to the Globe and Mail. One of them, I do not know who it was, sent it to me with this little note attached: "Nothing like taking things for granted".

Mr. Graydon: The minister is a lawyer and he knows that that sort of thing would not for one moment be admitted as evidence in a court of law, yet a minister of the crown is attempting now to spread it over the columns of Hansard. I believe the minister ought to put himself in the same position as any other member. Does he take the responsibility for the accuracy of what he has read to the house?

Mr. Rinfret: I shall answer that question by asking the hon. member whether he denies that the letter was sent by the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Graydon: I do not happen to know, and my problem is that I do not believe the minister knows. I was not using the letter but the minister was, and that puts us in very different categories, if I may say so.

Mr. Rinfret: If the house wishes, I am quite ready to table the letter, and also this card which says:

Change in mail subscription prices due to increased postage rates.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

It then sets out the increase of $3 that the Globe and Mail has already requested. I am in the hands of the committee, and if the committee wishes me to table it then I shall.

Mr. Graydon: At best it is an anonymous letter. The minister has told us it is an anonymous letter.

Mr. Rinfret: No, I never said that.

Mr. Graydon: This enclosure came in it. Those people who are not able to understand the difference between a letter and an enclosure will have to work that out for themselves. In any event, the minister says he does not know where it came from; he does not know who wrote it. The only thing is that someone sent him that enclosure, and on that basis he attempts to argue a case. In all fairness, I believe the minister has some motive in this beyond what he has indicated—

Mr. Chevrier: Order, order.

Mr. Graydon: —in bringing a thing of this kind before the house. I would think the minister, who understands so completely the various ramifications of the law, would not bring in an anonymous letter with an enclosure and then base a flowery speech upon that very weak foundation. May I suggest to the minister that he has stepped beyond the margin of fairness in taking the position he has with respect to that. I do believe the house is entitled to know the facts. The minister does not apparently know what the facts are.

Mr. Rinfret: Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand now a letter with the heading "The Globe and Mail, Toronto 1, Canada: George McCullagh, president. To avoid delay please address to Globe and Mail and not its executive." This letter is signed by Ray Forrest, who is director of circulation of the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask to whom it is addressed?

Mr. Rinfret: I have already answered that. It is addressed, "Dear Postmaster or Rural Mail Courier".

Mr. Graydon: It is not addressed to the minister, and more than that it would be very easy for that circular letter to be composed by anyone.

Mr. Abbott: Give up. They won't deny it tomorrow.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, in the first place the amendment is only an amendment to a general section with which we have not started to deal. I would suggest that we must deal either with the section as a whole or with the subheadings of the section. I want to deal with the impression which, intentionally or otherwise, the minister seemed to convey by what he said. I was interested in his reference to the figures I had given, and then he introduced this discussion on some circular which he has produced and for which he assumes the responsibility.

I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that what I said in regard to this matter can be found at page 3511 of Hansard for May 29. In view of what the minister has said, I am going to read the part which referred to the figures to suggest that it was a surprising interest that the minister showed in one particular set of figures I had used. This is what I said:

> A newspaper of over ten thousand circulation averaging 45 pages for each publishing day now pays $3 a year. Under the new rates it will be called upon to pay $7.64 a year.
> A newspaper of ten thousand or more circulation with an average of 32 pages for every day of delivery now pays postage of $2.34 a year. The new rate will amount to $6.24. A newspaper of 28 pages in this group which now pays $1.80 postage will pay $4.90 under the new rates. A newspaper of 24 pages which now pays $1.56 in postage will pay $4.19. An 18-page newspaper which now pays $1.36 will pay $3.62. A 14-page newspaper in this group which now pays $1.14 will pay $3.05 if these provisions are adopted.
> Then let us take newspapers with a circulation of less than ten thousand. A newspaper with an average of 12 pages and a circulation of less than ten thousand now paying 93 cents will pay $1.54. A newspaper with a 10-page average in this group, which now pays 87 cents, in future will pay $1.31.

I am extremely interested, Mr. Chairman, in the fact that the minister should have sought to convey the impression that the figures I had used had some relation to a particular newspaper. I would ask the minister if he disagrees with the accuracy of any of the figures I have now quoted; and I am sure he can answer because it is quite obvious that he has had these figures checked.

Mr. Rinfret: I said generally, Mr. Chairman, that the calculation of the leader of the opposition on any paper of any number of pages that he has cited there is based on the assumption that any one of the papers to which he refers would pay only one and one-half cents. I do not think there is any newspaper—any of the larger ones, anyway; let us put it that way —that did not pay let us call it a fine of four cents for having over 50 per cent advertising, as it used to be. All the large dailies have paid that four cents; and from the moment it passes the 50 per cent advertising content and pays the four-cent rate, then it cannot be claimed that any of the bottom figures cited by the leader of the opposition are right. I picked those 32 pages to which the leader of the opposition had referred and I, having seen it on this letter of the Globe and Mail, made the comparison between the two. The leader of the opposition had said that a newspaper of more than 10,000 circulation—

Mr. Drew: Give it for the Toronto Star as an example. You have checked it.

Mr. Rinfret: No, I have not checked it. I am sorry, but the figures would not agree. I am sure that the figure at the bottom would not be $2.34.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to do more than to point out that the minister has obviously had certain computations made, and has made those computations on the basis of a statement I made. If he will refer back to that statement he will find that I referred to the 50 per cent advertising. The figures I have given are figures based on the rates set out in section 11, and they are figures which do not include the supposition that there is in excess of 50 per cent of advertising.

Mr. Lesage: There was.

Mr. Drew: Just a minute, Mr. Chairman. The reason is perfectly obvious. I also hope that the attitude of the minister toward this whole problem will be fully understood by the public and by those who are interested in the matter when he used the word "fined" in relation to advertising. Obviously in the mind of the minister people who advertise should be fined. He used that word.

Mr. Rinfret: I did not use that word in that way. I called it a fine, for want of a better word. I said "Call it a fine".

Mr. Drew: The minister used the word "fine". The fact is this. I referred to that very proposition and pointed out that, under the amendments now proposed, it was intended to remove that inducement to hold the advertising down to 50 per cent. I pointed out that this, far from being a fine, was an obvious inducement to the newspapers to retain the maximum amount of space available for news, consistent with the general attitude toward newspapers as a means of distributing news in this democracy of ours.

Before I proceed, I will simply ask the minister one question. Basing these computations on the figures in section 11 as now proposed, or as it was proposed without these amendments, and the provisions that existed at the time that I made these computations, and not taking this inducement provision in regard to 50 per cent advertising, does the minister question that the figures which I have just quoted from Hansard are correct?

Mr. Rinfret: They might be ideal, but unfortunately they do not conform with the facts.

Mr. Drew: I asked the minister if, without any reference to the inducement provision with regard to 50 per cent advertising, the figures I used as reported at page 3511 of Hansard are correct. He can give an answer because he has had them checked.

Mr. Rinfret: Certainly I have had them checked. That is the reason why I say that these are facts. Whatever this newspaper was—or any other newspaper that the leader of the opposition had in mind—it in fact did pay something last year, and the figures that he has quoted are ideal. But they cannot conform with the facts; because every one of them has paid some part of their content under the four-cent rate.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, from the refusal of the minister to answer the question, it is perfectly obvious that he knows that the figures I gave were accurate and that they are accurate. As to the 50 per cent, that was not a fine. I wish that the minister would not try to divert the attention of the members from the real facts of this case by wholly imaginary diversions of this nature. There is a perfectly obvious reason why the 50 per cent was provided, whether it was sound or otherwise. That was, first of all, to offer the newspapers an inducement to retain for news that 50 per cent space, or as close to that as possible. On the other hand, there is the fact that every child of reasonably mature years knows that advertising is paid for and that if a newspaper is carrying a substantially increased amount of advertising they are finding some additional source of revenue to carry on the ordinary functions of the newspaper. That has nothing to do with the accuracy of the figures which I notice that the minister carefully refused to challenge, when I place it on the basis on which it was placed when it was put before the house.

Mr. Rinfret: I did not refuse to challenge it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, it is a very interesting thing that the minister should be so emphatic with regard to one particular newspaper and should have so much information in regard to it, and at the same time should be so strangely disinterested in any other newspaper, although I had referred to a great number of other categories which obviously would refer to other newspapers across this country. It is extremely interesting that in the city of Toronto, where there are three large newspapers, he was not sufficiently curious to find out what the effect would be on a newspaper known as the Toronto Daily Star or on the Toronto Telegram, but only found occasion to examine the figures with regard to this one newspaper. I must confess that this situation indicates that the minister attaches more importance to that paper than some of his colleagues have, on some occasions, suggested they were prepared to give it. Perhaps his education is advancing as indicated by this attention. I would point out, however, that even if it was not a matter of interest to him in the case of Toronto, perhaps in the case of Montreal he might have been interested in finding out comparable figures with regard to La Presse, the Montreal Star, the Gazette and several other newspapers in Montreal. Then he could have given us a broad analysis of those figures, instead of simply taking particular figures out for the purpose of creating an impression which he sought to convey this afternoon. In so far as any individual newspaper is concerned, it will be able to deal with this subject effectively through its accounts. I was referring to the general items and to the figures of postage rates as set out in the bill as it was before the new bill was introduced. As the minister has pointed out, and as I pointed out when we discussed this before, there was of course a 50 per cent advertising rate, and only the Post Office Department and the accounting departments of these newspapers are in a position to inform this house as to what the percentage of advertising rate is.

In so far as these amendments are concerned, it would appear that in the first one, which is an amendment to section 11, subsection 2 (a) (i), there is a provision that newspapers with a circulation of 10,000 or more will pay two and one-half cents for each pound of weight or fraction thereof, in respect of the portion that is not devoted to advertising, and four cents for each pound of weight or fraction thereof, in respect of the portion consisting of advertising. What is happening here is that the Postmaster General is returning to the idea of offering an inducement of some kind for news space as compared with advertising space, something which was not covered by the bill now before us. As this would work out, if a newspaper had exactly 50 per cent news and 50 per cent advertising the net result would be that it would pay three and one-quarter cents a pound. What that works out to is something that will have to be computed, and which we cannot compute quickly here this afternoon. It is still a very substantial increase from one and one-half cents.

Mr. Lesage: Plus four cents.

Mr. Drew: I am sorry; plus what?

Mr. Lesage: Well, it was four cents when 50 per cent or more was advertising.

Mr. Drew: I am talking about what the provisions were in regard to ordinary circulation where the advertising did not exceed 50 per cent. And I would point out that this is a substantial increase from the rate of one and one-half cents which was in the act before.

Now in so far as the other amendment is concerned, which is an amendment to subsection 4 of section 11, it is something that would have to be worked out with certain examples before one would be able to determine exactly what the effect would be. In this respect, and with the new postal rates before us, before I refer to this amendment further I would ask the minister if he will tell me whether periodicals coming in from the United States pay the postal rates of Canada or the postal rates of the United States? If they pay the postal rates of the United States, are these rates higher or lower than Canadian rates?

Mr. Rinfret: United States publications have two ways of coming into the country. Some of them are mailed in the United States. When they are mailed there they of course carry United States postage which, at the present time, compares with the figures in the bill. United States rates are lower, but they are also considering an increase in their rates. The publishers of some magazines will send their magazines in bulk to some Canadian post office, from which they are mailed, and these of course are charged Canadian postage.

Mr. Drew: The situation would be then, with these rates which are now before us adopted, that publications coming in from the United States under the laws that would be then in force in Canada and in force in the United States would pay less than Canadian publications sent by the Canadian postal service within Canada.

Mr. Rinfret: That depends on the increase that they will have over there.

Mr. Drew: We cannot guess what they are going to do, and so far they have only indicated that they are considering the possibility of a 20 per cent increase in their postal rates this year, and that has not even come before congress.

Mr. Rinfret: That of course produces a deficit of $589 million a year over there.

Mr. Drew: When the minister says that, it brings me back to one question that I am asking. The minister said a good deal about a deficit of $12 million. I understand he is not suggesting that that $12 million deficit arises from the carrying of newspapers or periodicals.

Mr. Rinfret: Second-class mail.

Mr. Drew: Only of newspapers and periodicals?

Mr. Rinfret: Correct.

Mr. Drew: Does that involve newspapers or publications coming in from the United States? Let me ask this question. In view of the very large distribution of publications from the United States in Canada, has the minister had any computation made of the cost to the Canadian postal service of handling publications coming into Canada from the United States and paid for by postage in the United States, which goes to the United States government?

Mr. Rinfret: Most of the United States magazines are posted in Canada.

Mr. Drew: All right; I still come back to the question. Has the minister had any computation made of the cost of handling United States newspapers, periodicals, publications or other second-class matter, coming from the United States with United States postage paid to the United States government?

Mr. Rinfret: As far as newspapers are concerned, very few do enter Canada. The American newspapers are not in competition with Canadian newspapers to any great extent. A comparison might be made between United States magazines, and as to them, the great majority are sent here in bulk and posted in Canada. As to whether I have had a survey or a study made of that, the answer is no.

Mr. Drew: The minister says he has not had a computation made; therefore it is not easy to compare the rates. But he has given us the answer in regard to publications coming in, whether it is a large or a small percentage. I would point out that whatever number do come in from the United States, they are contributing to whatever the deficit is, so you must bear that in mind in examining these figures. It has not entirely arisen from the handling of our own newspapers and our own reliable periodicals.

I come back to the fact that there is one way in which added revenue could be obtained, and in the process of obtaining it the postal department would be doing something of very great advantage to the people of Canada, and that is, to place really high postal rates on crime comics, sex magazines and trash of that kind, which no Canadian parent wants to see coming into his house if he can possibly avoid it. I would suggest there are ways of raising revenue from those publications which play no useful part in the functioning of our democratic system, and that in this way it would be made possible to extend perhaps greater advantages to those publications which perform a useful service.

May I refer to the suggestion that this is a subsidy to the newspaper. This is a provision by which the people of Canada can get newspapers at a rate lower than would otherwise be the case. I do not think for one moment that the Postmaster General believes that the newspapers across this country are going to absorb the increased postal rates involved in whatever amendments may be adopted. By virtue of the fact that a substantial part of their space is devoted to revenue earning advertising, undoubtedly the newspapers will charge some of the increase to that advertising. I am not in a position to say how it would work out; but one thing I am sure of is that in this or any other business the added cost is going to be added to the price ultimately charged for that thing the people are buying. This applies whether it is a newspaper, a pair of shoes, an automobile or a food item.

It would be well if we got away from the suggestion that provisions of this kind are simply subsidies for the newspapers which the people, after all, buy for purposes of reading.

While every appropriate measure should be taken to place our public services on a businesslike basis, it can only come with some measure of surprise that a postal rate which has stood so long at the figure which has been on the statute books should require suddenly to be raised to the extent it is now being raised in the amendment before us.

The Postmaster General has referred to the United States, and what is being done over there. I would point out that if in the United States they go ahead to provide increases, such as the Postmaster General has suggested are likely, it has been indicated that those increases will not be made at one time, but that they will be made in three stages. So that the course we are following is one which produces a much more severe impact upon those who will be using the newspapers.

One point the Postmaster General did not explain has to do with the effect of the change on the smaller newspapers, and what the advantage of these amendments will be to newspapers with a circulation of less than 10,000. That is I believe a matter of perhaps greater importance to many people who rely for their news upon the publications with smaller circulation. When the Postmaster General places so much emphasis upon the necessity for meeting these deficits, it is interesting to note that the government apparently proposes to adopt a very different attitude toward this type of distribution of news from the attitude adopted toward the distribution of news by radio. Because while the government is ready to accept the proposition that deficits are necessary in connection with the distribution of radio news, evidently a different attitude is to be adopted toward the distribution of news by the written word which, as I said earlier in my remarks, is a much more important means of conveying to the people, in a form they can remember and re-examine, those facts upon which the decisions in a democratic country can be made.

There is no use saying that in this instance the newspapers have advertising, because we know that our publicly-owned radio system also accepts advertising. So that there are sources of revenue in both cases.

It is not possible to make an exact computation in the light of the amendment suddenly placed before us. We can only wait. Certainly we welcome the thought that there may be any reduction in these postal rates which, in the end, the people will have to pay. I hope that when the computations are made it will appear that the results are more satisfactory than is suggested at first glance from the figures before me.

Mr. Noseworthy: Why do the publishers of American newspapers and magazines find it to their advantage to send them in bulk to Canada?

Mr. Rinfret: They have discovered that the publication reaches its destination more quickly in that way.

Mr. Noseworthy: It is not because it would cost more to mail them?

Mr. Rinfret: No; on the contrary it would cost less.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The minister has mentioned several classifications of newspapers, according to circulation. What is the classification of semi-weekly papers, a number of which there are in Canada? Are they classified as weeklies?

Mr. Rinfret: For the first time in the history of our postal administration we have made a separate class for semi-weeklies, and have described it as bi-weeklies. Perhaps it would have been better if we had used the description "semi-weekly". They are set out in subsection 2 (b).

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is the rate on the bi-weekly higher than on the weekly?

Mr. Rinfret: The rate is set out in the bill. Where there is a circulation of 10,000 or more it is three cents per pound; a circulation of less than 10,000 copies, two cents per pound. Then, for weeklies where there is a circulation of 50,000 or more copies, three cents per pound; where there is less than 50,000 but 10,000 or more, two and one-half cents; and where there is a circulation of less than 10,000 it is one and one-half cents. That is found in section 11.

Mr. McLure: May we take it for granted that the letter which was used in argument this afternoon was a letter that was not sent by the Globe and Mail to the minister? No one has yet found out whom it was sent to; but it came from somewhere, out of the blue.

I should like to have some figures with respect to smaller newspapers in smaller areas. We have heard a quotation this afternoon concerning one of the large daily newspapers. I should like to know what it will cost a newspaper with a circulation of 13,000, 8,000 of which go through the post office. It is a 16-page paper and it is guaranteed that the advertising will not be over 50 per cent.

Mr. Lesage: Would the hon. member give the proportion of advertising?

Mr. McLure: I said not exceeding 50 per cent.

Mr. Rinfret: It would be approximately three-quarters of a cent per paper.

Mr. McLure: How much would that be per pound?

Mr. Rinfret: With a 16-page paper it would be four papers to the pound.

Mr. McLure: This Charlottetown paper has a circulation of 8,000 going through the post office. At the present time they pay from $35 to $40 per day. So far as I can figure, with this amendment there would be part of it at two and a half cents per pound, some at four cents, some at four and a half cents and probably more. I have given the minister the information.

Mr. Rinfret: I am afraid the calculation is impossible. Any amount we could give the hon. member would be purely hypothetical because we do not know the advertising content of the paper the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. McLure: I told you exactly what it is.

Mr. Rinfret: The hon. member gave a figure of 50 per cent, but is that the actual advertising content?

Mr. McLure: It will never be over that, because it is a 16-page paper.

Mr. Rinfret: If it is below that figure there is quite a difference; if it is 45 per cent or 50 per cent.

Mr. McLure: It would not be very much below because they could not exist.

Mr. Rinfret: The fact that up to the present they have not reached a content of 50 per cent does not mean that they will not reach 40 per cent or perhaps 35 per cent.

Mr. McLure: I cannot understand why the minister cannot give those figures when he has given the figures for the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Rinfret: The Globe and Mail is the only paper that has raised its rates. I know of no other paper that did that. When I got that letter I made up the computation.

Mr. McLure: There is no use the minister losing his temper and wanting to fight. I am quite prepared to fight if he wants to; I will go all out with him. I am going to get these figures if we have to stay here for a week. If they can be made up for a big metropolitan paper, I am going to get them for this paper. This bill, this section particularly, is aimed at the smaller newspapers. The large newspapers have different methods of distribution. They deliver much of their circulation by truck and the post office does not get anything.

The smaller newspapers should not have to pay the whole shot. As I said before, I am referring to the Charlottetown Guardian, which has the largest circulation in Prince Edward Island. As their slogan says, they cover the island like the dew, and I do not mean Roderick Dhu. I will give the minister the figures again and perhaps it will not interfere with his meal hour to figure out what the new rates will mean. This paper has a circulation of 8,000 going through the post office for delivery throughout Prince Edward Island. It is a 16-page paper with advertising not exceeding 50 per cent because the readers would not permit it. In fact, they have had to refuse advertising.

Mr. Rinfret: That is exactly the point. The fact that it will not exceed 50 per cent does not enter into the calculation at all. Under the new amendment, those that have less than 50 per cent will pay on the four cent rate. In order to make an accurate calculation we must know the exact content. I am not going to give a hypothetical answer and then have a newspaper say that I have given a figure in the house when it should have been different.

Mr. McLure: Give an estimate.

Mr. Rinfret: I cannot.

Mr. McLure: The minister can give an estimate on the basis of 8,000 copies with 50 per cent advertising. If I had the information here I could figure it out myself.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McLure: When the committee recessed, Mr. Chairman, I had been asking the Postmaster General to give me the facts and figures in connection with a certain newspaper. I need not mention its name because the minister has already referred to it. I gave him the particulars; 8,000 copies were going through the post office daily, with never more than 50 per cent of advertising and a paper of 16 pages. If the minister will tell me what it is already costing this paper for postage and what it will cost after this amendment I may be able to understand the meaning of the amendment. This newspaper is peculiarly situated, in that it is located in a small province and has a large circulation almost exclusively to our own citizens. Therefore they have to be careful to give them at least 50 per cent reading matter. I think I have made it plain enough so the Postmaster General can give me some idea of the comparison before I resume this debate.

Mr. Rinfret: Various other factors might enter into the calculation. The advertising material is not the only thing. There is the weight of the paper and the size of the paper which would also enter into the calculation, because they are not all standard. If the hon. member has reference to the Guardian, as I think he has, in the past on occasions that newspaper has sometimes gone past the 50 per cent mark. I would not like to put on Hansard a figure that could be quoted against me later on if the calculations proved to be inaccurate.

Mr. McLure: You need not make it the case of the Guardian, then. Why can you not put those figures on record? You know the advertising material does not exceed 50 per cent; we are giving you that in good faith. In a 16-page newspaper they would not be allowed to have 60 or 70 per cent of advertising. The odd day it might go below that; the odd day it might go a little over; but surely the minister can give me an estimate of what it would cost this newspaper per day. Would it cost $40 a day or $50 or $60 for the 8,000 copies that go through the post office? They are delivered to about one hundred postmasters throughout the country, where they are distributed to the mail couriers and box holders. Surely we can have something definite on it. How could the minister get all those definite figures in regard to the Globe and Mail? They did not give him as much information as I am giving him. He knows where this is coming from, and he did not know where the other information came from; or if he did know he did not tell us. Surely he can give me some kind of estimate.

Mr. Rinfret: I have already explained to the hon. member that I am not in a position to give an estimate. Even if I were I probably would not do so anyway, because every member of the house would ask for a similar estimate in connection with the newspaper in his own town.

Mr. McLure: I do not think that is an answer at all. Let us figure it out this way. With a circulation of 8,000, under the amendment it is two and a half cents per pound. You could easily figure that out because you told me earlier you figured four copies of a 16-page paper made a pound. This has 50 per cent reading matter, and in that case you charge four or maybe four and a half cents. Again I ask the minister in all fairness to give us an estimate. I do not see why he wishes to discriminate against a newspaper in my province. I know it has been the habit of the government to discriminate against Prince Edward Island in many different ways, even through the postal department. A few years ago, for example, when they were making some changes and putting in a head officer for each province, we were the only province left out. They tacked us onto New Brunswick. I have dealt with that matter before; but here we come to something that is of vital interest to my province. How much are you going to tax this paper? If you had left it as it was, I could figure that out myself; it was going to cost them from $93 to $102 daily and about $122 on Saturday. The situation is a little different now and I cannot figure out whether it is going to be more or less, because I did not get the real meaning of the amendment. But if the minister and his officers will not give that information, why are they withholding it? You have it, or if you do not you could easily figure it out. On behalf of my constituency and the people of my province I believe I am entitled to a fair estimate. The minister is not going to be held to it strictly. That is an excuse that will not hold water; so I am going to ask him again. The minister need not commit himself. If he were five dollars a day astray, what would the difference be? It might be one way or the other, and surely he can satisfy me and the newspaper by doing that.

Mr. Rinfret: The hon. member made reference to a tax. We are not taxing any newspaper. All the Post Office Department is asking is that the newspaper pay a part of the transportation charges. It is a service for which we ask compensation, and that is no tax. I am sure that if the hon. member were still the owner of the Guardian he could make the calculation with the information he now has. I may add that the representatives of the Guardian were in my office and we discussed the whole situation. They were much less concerned when they left than when they arrived.

Mr. McLure: I might just say a word more. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that is a fair answer for the Postmaster General to make. I am not pleading for myself, and that ought to make it a stronger case. I am pleading on behalf of a newspaper that is worth while in the small province of Prince Edward Island. The same thing is true in other provinces. I am not arguing any particular case. I am just using this as an illustration to show that we should have some fair treatment. Really all the small daily newspapers are being discriminated against, and all the favours are going to the large newspapers in the big centres.

They talk about advertising. Suppose a newspaper in the city of Windsor put out about thirty or forty pages per issue. It could easily pay the extra four per cent, because it could go around to the big industrialists and get two more pages of advertisements. Who would notice two extra pages of advertisements in a fifty or sixty page paper? The newspaper would still make money out of it. I believe the Guardian or any other newspaper has the right to have the figures put before this committee just as the Globe and Mail had its figures shown here today. They were used to show how little it would cost the Globe and Mail. I thought if the Postmaster General had continued a little while longer he would have been paying them a bonus.

Mr. Rinfret: That is what we have been doing for years.

Mr. McLure: Well, you have not been doing it for us. This $40 goes a long way towards paying the help in your post office.

Mr. Rinfret: When it costs us $160?

Mr. McLure: I would ask you to give me those figures, and break them down. If you can show me where it costs that to deliver the Guardian, I shall drop the question right now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Still you would not be satisfied.

Mr. McLure: I shall deal with you a little later. You are guilty of the same thing, and you are not going to put it over me while I am a member representing the people down there. If there is no one else from Prince Edward Island who will fight our causes, I am going to do so.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Until the 26th of June.

Mr. McLure: As I said before, I shall attend to you later. A big score is piling up against the public works, and that will not be such a happy position. However, we had better finish with the Postmaster General. Is he going to give me that information?

Mr. Rinfret: Mr. Chairman, the total postage costs compared with the total cost of operation of a newspaper range from 1·1 per cent to about three per cent. The total portion of the cost represented by postage, even if there is a sixty per cent increase in postal rates, means that there is an increase of sixty per cent of one per cent. Are we going to continue a discussion on this very small amount?

The Deputy Chairman: At this point perhaps I should say that I think the hon. member for Queens is under a misapprehension. I am just wondering if the hon. member is in order when he insists on finding out what the actual increase in cost will be for a certain newspaper. The amendments have been provided and explained. The rates are two and one-half cents and four cents. The hon. member will have to let the newspapers calculate the increase, or he will have to do it himself. It is a matter of mathematical computation. To follow this line of questioning would be tantamount to someone, when the Income Tax Act is before the committee, asking the Minister of Finance to calculate his income tax or that of some corporation about which he knows. I believe the hon. member for Queens should reconsider his position, because in my opinion he is not in order when he asks the minister to calculate the amount the newspaper will have to pay.

Mr. McLure: You think the amendment will do that?

The Deputy Chairman: The only point I was drawing to the attention of the hon. member was that I did not think he was in order in asking the minister to give him the actual increase or decrease for a particular paper. What we are discussing now is the advisability of adopting the clause as amended.

Mr. Fair: I should like to ask the minister a question on section 11, subsection 2, paragraph (c), subparagraph (iii) which reads as follows:

with a circulation of less than 10,000 copies per issue, one and one-half cents for each pound weight or fraction thereof, subject to the exception that 2,500 copies per issue may be transmitted by mail free of postage within a distance of forty miles from its known place of publication in the case of a newspaper or periodical published in a city, town or village with a population of not more than ten thousand persons;

If that means what it says in plain English, it would mean that a publisher living in a small town and publishing not more than 10,000 copies could have 2,500 sent out free of charge. Is that correct?

Mr. Rinfret: That is correct, and is a continuation of the practice. It applies to weeklies only, of course.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, I like to agree with you, and usually do, but I do not believe your ruling on the question of the member for Queens is quite fair to him. It is a serious matter to his constituents, and a serious matter to all the residents of Prince Edward Island. When this bill was introduced, I understood the charges were so exorbitant they would put the newspaper to which the member for Queens referred completely out of business. The Postmaster General has modified those charges, and the managers of this paper are better satisfied than they were, which is natural. I would think that the Postmaster General should be able to give a reply to the request made by the hon. member for Queens. If he cannot reply in dollars, he should be able to give an indication of what additional percentage of postal charges will have to be borne by the Charlottetown Guardian under the proposed amendment.

The operators of that paper certainly deserve credit for what they have done in recent years. They have now not only to meet these increased postal charges but they have to meet heavy sales taxes and many other charges that have to be borne by all the newspapers of Canada. Personally, I think the Postmaster General should be able to indicate to this committee, and particularly to the hon. member for Queens, what additional percentage of mailing costs will be imposed upon this paper in Charlottetown with regard to whose circulation the hon. member for Queens has given definite information. They know what they have been paying in recent years. As I said at the beginning of my few remarks, the charges that were proposed would put the paper completely out of business. The operators made that statement to me. Personally, I should like the Postmaster General to give much more definite information than he has given, so that the hon. member for Queens will have a better understanding of how these increased costs affect the paper in which he is directly interested.

Mr. Rinfret: Not any more.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): It is not going to cost the Charlottetown paper any more?

Mr. Rinfret: No. He is not interested in it any more.

Mr. McLure: Oh, yes, he is.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I thought it was public works.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I do not quite understand the remarks of the Postmaster General. I am quite sure that not only this paper but many others in Canada are anxious to know what additional costs will have to be borne by them. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that many of these small rural papers are struggling today for existence, to meet the charges imposed upon them. They are performing an important public service in giving the news to their particular communities, and they are entitled to have more definite information than the Postmaster General has given to the committee tonight.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The Postmaster General refuses to give any further information?

Mr. Rinfret: I have already given all the information that I could on the subject. If I give any more information, it will be a very inaccurate "guesstimate" and I use the word guesstimate purposely. The amendment calls for a two and a half cent rate on the news portion and four cents on the advertising content. That makes an average of three and a quarter cents. If the hon. member wants to make the calculation, it is up to him to do so. It is only the newspapers themselves that can make the calculation accurately, in the same way as the hon. member for Queens is the only person—perhaps with his accountant—who can prepare his own income tax; and he certainly would not ask the Minister of National Revenue to tell him in advance what his income tax would be.

Mr. McLure: They would not accept it.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The Postmaster General is planning on a material increase in his revenue. I would think that he should be able to give this committee the amount that he expects to get from the Charlottetown Guardian, in view of the figures that have been presented to him. Then the hon. member for Queens and the other members of the committee would be able to appreciate the full circumstances, and they would be able to decide, in their own minds at least, whether a paper situated as is the Charlottetown Guardian will be able to continue. If it is not able to continue to operate as it has been doing, then I think these facts should be placed before the committee and that they should decide whether they are going to allow the Postmaster General to exact what I consider to be exorbitant additional charges, much too heavy to be paid by the ordinary newspaper serving the rural districts.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, is it in order to move an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. Knowles: You can always try.

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member wishes to move an amendment, I will consider whether or not it is in order.

Mr. McLure: There is probably no use in my going any further. The amendment has not been voted on yet.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps I should make a suggestion to the committee. Since this section has four subsections and since two amendments have already been moved to two subsections of it, in order to make for more orderly debate perhaps I should suggest that we deal with each subsection separately. If the committee agrees to that procedure, we will carry subsection 1 and proceed to subsection 2 to which there is an amendment. Then if the hon. member for Queens wants to move a subamendment, we could then consider that. If that course is agreeable to the committee, we might follow it.

Mr. McLure: The amendment I wanted to move was to section 11, subsection 2 (f).

The Deputy Chairman: What I am suggesting is that we consider each subsection separately, so that when we come to subsection 2 the hon. member may then move his subamendment. Shall subsection 1 carry?

Subsection 1 agreed to.

On subsection 2—Rates for newspapers and periodicals.

The Deputy Chairman: There is an amendment to subsection 2. I understand the hon. member for Queens has a subamendment.

Mr. McLure: I can move the amendment now. In view of the absence of facts in connection with the matter, I have to deal with this amendment in a slightly different way, and it may not be so favourable to the minister as if he had given me his own figures. I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Lanark:

That papers having more than 90 per cent of their circulation within a radius of seventy-five miles and which deliver more than 30 per cent of their papers through the post office, be continued at the present rate.

That amendment will be of great benefit to many papers in a situation similar to that of the paper in Prince Edward Island. I hope it will get some consideration from members who want to be just and fair to a struggling newspaper in a small province.

Mr. Rinfret: Mr. Chairman, I believe the amendment is out of order as it changes the revenue that is contemplated under this bill.

The Deputy Chairman: Before I put the amendment, I think that I should tell the hon. member for Queens that it might be well to revise this subamendment. The subamendment must relate to the amendment. The amendment is to subparagraph (i) of paragraph (a) of subsection (2) of section 11 and the subamendment has relation to section 6 and section 11 (2) (f).

Mr. McLure: Section 11 (2) (f)?

The Deputy Chairman: Yes. The subamendment must have some direct relation to the amendment. As it is, I do not see how the subamendment can be linked with the amendment. The hon. member should let the amendment go through and move his amendment when the other one is out of the way. His subamendment must relate to the amendment which is before the committee. He should move his subamendment after the amendment has been disposed of, which would be considered separately.

Mr. McLure: The amendment which was moved this afternoon is to reduce the rate from four cents to two and one-half cents a pound. My amendment to the amendment is to reduce the amount again, so that they must be very closely related to each other. They both have the same object in view. If I knew the rules of the house as well as some other hon. members I would have my subamendment voted on.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member has omitted a word in his subamendment. If it is to be linked with paragraph (f) it should read as follows:

For any other newspaper or periodical, the rates prescribed by the regulations, provided that papers having more than 90 per cent of their circulation within a radius of 75 miles, and which deliver more than 30 per cent of their papers through the post office, be continued at the present rate.

Is that the sense of the amendment?

Mr. McLure: The amendment is to reduce the charges. While it does not specify it, its object is to continue the rates as they are at present. They cannot go any higher than that.

The Deputy Chairman: Yes, but I am in this difficulty. Amendments must be intelligible. They must be understood not only by the hon. member, but by the chairman and other hon. members as well. As it is now, it is certainly not a subamendment to the amendment to paragraph (d) (i). At this stage it is certainly out of order. If the hon. member would like to move it after the amendment that we now have before us is disposed of I think we could consider it.

Mr. McLure: Under what rule of parliament is it out of order?

The Deputy Chairman: There is a rule, which is very well known, that subamendments cannot be moved to amendments if they are not relevant. It is clear that this subamendment is not relevant to the amendment before the committee.

Mr. Carroll: Has not the Postmaster General brought to your attention the fact that apart from this question of whether the subamendment relates to the amendment, it is out of order for another reason altogether?

Mr. Knowles: On that point of order—

Mr. Dickey: The parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Knowles: My only interest in this matter, like yours, Mr. Chairman, is that it be looked at from a procedural standpoint. With regard to the point raised by the Postmaster General, which you were deferring until later, and which the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond has now raised—

Mr. Carroll: I do not think that the chairman deferred it at all.

The Deputy Chairman: Oh, yes, I did.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you, sir. May I point out that when this bill was first introduced there was not a resolution preceding it. In other words, it was not regarded as a money bill, if there was no resolution preceding it.

Mr. Carroll: The newspapers will be glad to hear that.

Mr. Knowles: On the question of procedure, all money bills that involve expenditure of money can only be introduced by a minister on a resolution in connection with which he states the approval of the Governor General. That was not done.

Mr. Rinfret: This is not expenditure; it is revenue.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Knowles: That is exactly the point. The minister cannot have it both ways. He cannot claim that this is the kind of money bill which a private member must not upset, and now claim it is not a money bill; that he did not need to get the Governor General's recommendation. As far as that is concerned —and I am not speaking for or against the subject-matter of the motion—I am just saying that this is an ordinary bill; that it came in directly on first reading, and if it is in order to present it without the Governor General's recommendation, it is in order to try to change the cost provisions that are in it.

That is another question from the one you are dealing with now, Mr. Chairman. I agree with you thoroughly that if the hon. member for Queens is seeking to amend paragraph (f) of section 11, whereas at the moment the Postmaster General is seeking to amend paragraph (a), the thing to do is to decide on the amendment of paragraph (a); and then before you actually carry subsection 2 I know you will give the hon. member for Queens a chance to move his amendment to paragraph (f).

The Deputy Chairman: That is exactly what I proposed to the hon. member for Queens. I am not denying him the right to move the amendment when it is in order, but I say he is moving it in the wrong place and he is linking it to the wrong amendment. The amendment moved by the Postmaster General is to one section, and the amendment moved by the hon. member for Queens is to another section. Therefore let us deal first with the amendment that is before the committee. Let us dispose of that, and then the hon. member for Queens can move his amendment. I should like to read citation 364 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, which reads:

> Since the purpose of a subamendment is to alter the amendment, it should not enlarge upon the scope of the amendment, but it should deal with matters that are not covered by the amendment; if it is intended to bring up matters foreign to the amendment, the member should wait until the amendment is disposed of and move a new amendment.

I think the hon. member should be satisfied with that.

Mr. McLure: I will be. Will you as chairman advise me when the proper time comes, and I will move it then?

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member has given me the text of his amendment. As he indicated his intention to move it to paragraph (f), when the time comes, I will put his amendment.

Mr. Fair: Before the subsection carries, may I ask the minister whether this bill proposes any change in the postal rates on weekly publications of less than 10,000? If so, what is the change?

Mr. Rinfret: The regular postage prior to this bill on weeklies was one cent a pound, plus four cents a pound on more than 50 per cent advertising content. The proposed rate is one and a half cents.

Mr. Fair: It is moved up 50 per cent?

Mr. Rinfret: It depends of course on the advertising content of the weekly. The advertising content now is eliminated, but to compare one set of figures at one cent, plus four cents on the advertising content, with one and a half cents without advertising content, is very hard to do.

Mr. Fair: There is a change in the rates.

Mr. Rinfret: In the rates? Very little.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. Fair: Mr. Chairman, the editors of some weekly papers have written to me protesting against any increase in their rates. I pass this information on to the minister, so that he will know about it.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the amendment? It is moved that:

Subparagraph (i) of paragraph (a) of subclause (2) of clause 11 of Bill No. 322, an Act respecting the Canada Post Office, be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"11. (2) (a) (i) with a circulation of ten thousand or more copies per issue, two and one-half cents for each pound weight or fraction thereof in respect of the portion that is not devoted to advertising and four cents for each pound weight or fraction thereof in respect of the portion consisting of advertising, and"

Amendment agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Then, we have another amendment. This one is to paragraph (f), and is moved by the hon. member for Queens. He has moved that subsection (2) (f) be amended by substituting for the present words in that paragraph the following:

(1) Papers having more than 90 per cent of their circulation within a radius of 75 miles, and

(2) which deliver more than 30 per cent of their papers through the post office, be continued at the rate of one and one-half cents per pound.

Perhaps this might be the proper time to deal with the point raised by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, and commented upon by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Carroll: I did not think I raised a point.

The Deputy Chairman: There is merit in the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on the point. What struck me, and my reason for deferring consideration of the point until later, was the fact that in his remarks earlier the minister referred to these sums as not being a tax. It makes it difficult to rule an amendment out of order on the point that it would upset the plans of ways and means, and upset the revenue. Although I must say I have some doubts in the matter, since this is a charge by the government for a service rendered, and since it is in fact a matter of raising revenue, it could be treated as not being amendable in this way.

Mr. Graydon: If it was, there should be a resolution.

The Deputy Chairman: Nevertheless, I think the amendment could be accepted at this time.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Question.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I take a moment to—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): He says it is in order.

Mr. Rinfret: He has maintained your point.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I speak to you?

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member wishes to speak to a point of order, then I shall hear him.

Mr. Graydon: Don't argue the case when the judge is with you.

The Deputy Chairman: I have already accepted the amendment.

Mr. Knowles: That is fine; but there is one point I think should be looked into. I was going to call your attention, sir, to citations 449 and 450; however, you may look at them after this discussion is over. I might add that they support your ruling.

I was taking note of another aspect of the amendment. I have not a copy of the amendment offered by the hon. member for Queens, but I believe it is to the effect that the present rate be maintained. Once this bill is passed the previous rates do not appear anywhere. The words "present rate" will not then have any meaning.

Mr. Rinfret: In the bill.

Mr. Knowles: The Postmaster General says the present rate will then be the rate in the bill. In other words the hon. member for Queens in his amendment simply confirms the rates to which he objects. My point is that if he wants his amendment to mean anything he will have to realize that this is a brand new bill, and that he has to spell out in his amendment the rate he wants to apply to the kind of papers he mentions.

Post Office Act

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Question.

Mr. McLure: I said "the present rate". This bill has not yet passed. We are operating under the old rate. I do not think they are operating under the new one. The present rate is one and one-half cents.

Mr. Knowles: When this bill passes the one and one-half cent rate will not have statutory authority.

Mr. McLure: If the amendment carries—

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. McLure: However, if I am allowed, I shall insert the present rate of one and one-half cents per pound.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Then the hon. member is amending his amendment.

Mr. McLure: I am not afraid of giving figures, even if the Postmaster General is.

Mr. Graydon: That fixes it, Chester.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question? The question reads that there shall be substituted for paragraph (f) the following—

(1) Papers having more than 90 per cent of their circulation within a radius of 75 miles, and

(2) which deliver more than 30 per cent of their papers through the post office, be continued at the rate of one and one-half cents per pound.

Amendment negatived.

Subsection 2 as amended agreed to.

Subsection 3 agreed to.

On subsection 4—Rate where letter carrier service.

The Deputy Chairman: There is an amendment to this subsection, as follows:

All copies of newspapers and periodicals referred to in this section, other than those referred to in paragraph (f) of subsection 2, that are addressed for delivery within the postal area of publication where there is letter carrier delivery service are subject to postage at the rate of one cent for the first two ounces or fraction thereof and one cent for the next two ounces or fraction thereof and one cent for each additional four ounces or fraction thereof to each separate address.

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection 4 as amended agreed to.

Section 11 as amended agreed to.

Sections 12 to 21 inclusive agreed to.

On section 22—Invitation of tenders where amount over $1,000.

Mr. MacKenzie: Mr. Chairman, before this section carries I should like to make a few comments with respect to it, and also I would have them apply to section 23. I am interested in these amendments to the Post Office Act. However, I was sorry to find, upon reading the bill, that it did not make any provision which in my opinion was satisfactory for the settlement of the problem with respect to rural mail couriers of Canada.

My constituency of Lambton-Kent is typical, I believe, of those in western Ontario, in that it has many rural mail contracts. I believe that all told there are seventy mail routes in the constituency, with ten stage services, or probably eighty all told. Throughout Canada I believe there are about 5,200 rural mail contracts, in addition to some 7,500 stage and side service contracts. These refer to services from one post office to another, or from railway depots to post offices.

The average price paid for rural mail routes throughout Canada is $53.30 per mile per year, or pretty close to $54. The contracts in operation in the constituency of Lambton-Kent run at approximately $54, so that in that constituency they are almost the same as the average across the country. These mail contracts have been let for years under a system of public tenders, in which four-year contracts are awarded. The contract is renewed at the end of four years without calling for public tender if the courier is willing to continue the service at the same rate and if there is no serious objection to the service being given. This practice has been in operation for a long time.

Between 1945 and 1947 the cost of operating rural mail services increased along with the general cost of living. In March 1947 a special act of parliament was enacted which provided for the bonusing or subsidizing of mail contracts then in force. This was called, the Mail Contracts Supplemental Payments Act. That act was in operation for one year and then was extended for another year, so it was in operation from 1947 to 1949. Many of these contracts had previously been awarded at ridiculously low rates and they were adjusted to take care of the increased cost of operation. The new price was agreed upon between the post office officials and the contractor.

I would think that during those two years approximately 90 per cent of all the rural mail contracts in Canada were adjusted. When those contracts had expired at the end of four years of operation the subsidies or bonuses were incorporated in the new contracts. The new contracts provided for a larger remuneration than had been agreed to when the tenders were accepted. I think it is generally accepted among the rural mail contractors that that was one of the best moves that had been made in many years on behalf of the rural mail couriers. It provided an equalization in the amounts received by rural mail couriers who were working out of the same post office.

I contend that the remuneration now paid to rural mail contractors was not arrived at by means of public tenders. These rates were arrived at by the post office officials. Section 23 permits the awarding of contracts for $1,000 or less without calling for public tenders. I am quite satisfied that sections 22 and 23 do not clarify the situation. They make things a lot more difficult in the way of administration than they were before. I am quite sure that in my own riding of Lambton-Kent this section 23 will not affect five per cent of the contractors, and I am quite sure that is true of the rest of the dominion. Only those with very short routes will be helped by this new regulation.

I have received many letters from rural mail contractors stating that they cannot carry on under the present rates as costs have gone up greatly since 1949. Many of these men want to quit. Five mail routes operate out of the town of Bothwell. Quite recently one route was put up for tender and was awarded to the lowest bidder at approximately $70 per mile. The other four routes operating from the same post office receive approximately $50 per mile. If rural mail contractors decide that they are going to give up their old contracts in an effort to get new ones, tenders will have to be called and new contracts made out. In my opinion that would cost the department a great deal more than would the re-enacting of the Mail Contracts Supplemental Payments Act.

I urge the Post Office Department to consider re-enacting that act, because it would be most satisfactory to the rural mail couriers. I know it will probably be said that if that is done there will be a lot of patronage, but candidly I do not believe that would be true. I know of no patronage in Lambton-Kent in the past several years in connection with the awarding of mail contracts. These contracts have been awarded and renewed and adjusted by the Post Office Department. There were no reactions during the time the Mail Contracts Supplemental Payments Act was in operation and I had no complaints that patronage was being practised in any way.

Section 26 provides that bids may be got from anywhere at all. This matter will probably be dealt with under the next section. I contend that the public tender system in connection with rural mail routes is antiquated and should be liquidated. If that were done we would not have the difficulties we have now in awarding contracts. Most people handling His Majesty's mail are on a salary basis. This is true of all letter carriers. Then why not rural mail couriers?

The rural mail system was established in 1908, the first service being from Ancaster to Hamilton. In 1909 it was put into general operation all over Canada. Conditions have changed greatly. Let us bring this matter up to date and adjust these contracts so that they will meet the present cost of operation. Then these people should be put under the civil service or on some permanent basis. If that were done we would not need to go through this process from year to year.

Rural mail delivery should be extended to all rural residents in Canada. There is a lot of free franking and I would suggest that we do something to curtail that and extend rural mail delivery to all rural residents in Canada. It would not cost much more and, as someone has said, the post office service contributes considerably to our social and economic development. It should not be curtailed in any way.

I urge again the Post Office Department to re-enact the Mail Contracts Supplemental Payments Act. It worked well before and it will work well again and in the end will give us better service and cost the Post Office Department and the taxpayers a lot less to run.

Mr. Graydon: I think there is one piece of information the committee should have if we are to intelligently discuss the advisability of adopting this section. As you know, Mr. Chairman, this provides that the Postmaster General may make a contract for rural mail carriage where the amount of the contract is $1,000 or less. I think it would be germane to a discussion of this question to have some figures which I have no doubt the minister is prepared to provide. Would he tell us how many contracts in Canada, taking the present rate as a basis, would come under this provision giving the Postmaster General power to award a contract to anyone he sees fit? In addition to the number of those contracts I would like to know what percentage that number is of the total contracts for rural mail carriage throughout Canada.

Mr. Rinfret: That would represent about 70 per cent in number and 32 per cent in value.

Mr. Graydon: Then may I ask another question which has been suggested by the hon. member for Cumberland. How many rural mail contracts are there in Canada?

Mr. Rinfret: As of March 31, 1951, there were 5,087. On the point raised by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent concerning increases to contractors, as the hon. member has said the effect of the supplemental payments act was that about 80 per cent of all mail contractors had received adjustments prior to March 31, 1949. In order to see whether the time had come to put a similar act in operation we made a calculation of the percentage increase that had taken place from April 1, 1949, to date. We discovered that in 1946, when the supplemental payments act was put into operation, there had been an increase of 37 per cent in the previous year. On the other hand we discovered that from April 1, 1949, to date the increase on proportionate tenders and proportionate routes has been only 17 per cent. I can assure the house that the department is keeping closely in touch with the situation, and if this percentage increase reaches any greater proportions no doubt we will have something to present to the house in the fall if necessary.

Mr. Graydon: Has the minister invited the suggestions or opinions of the organized mail couriers with respect to this amendment, and are they satisfied with it?

Mr. Rinfret: I do not know that there is any association of rural couriers.

Mr. Graydon: I have attended some of their gatherings.

Mr. MacKenzie: There is only one other point I would like cleared up. When the Postmaster General said this $1,000 provision would affect 70 per cent of the rural mail contracts, surely he was also taking into account all these side services, the short routes such as those from railway depots to post offices, stagecoaches, and so on.

Mr. Rinfret: It would affect 45·4 per cent of the rural mail contracts.

Mr. Graydon: If that is the case why did the minister tell me 70 per cent?

Mr. Rinfret: Seventy per cent of the total contracts.

Mr. Graydon: The rural mail contracts.

Mr. Rinfret: No, that is of all contracts. As far as the rural route contracts are concerned it would affect 45·4 per cent in number and 30·4 per cent in amount.

Mr. Kickham: Some time ago I placed on the order paper a resolution having to do with mail couriers which was not reached owing to the passage of time, so I should like to say a word now. I agree with others who have spoken that some changes should be made in the remuneration of our mail couriers. I do not want to take too much of the time of the house, but I should like briefly to go over the points set out in my resolution.

My idea was to place all mail couriers on the same basis, that of a permanent rate per mile. Since all mail couriers are performing identical services for the Post Office Department, I submit they should be placed upon the basis of equality, not only as between themselves but in comparison with other employees doing similar work for the government. This would eliminate the existing vagaries in the practice of tendering for contracts, which make every tender a competition. Often accepted tenders are so low that the contractors cannot make a living, with the result that the bondsmen must perform the service for one year before the contracts can be terminated.

My next point simply provided that the basic rate should be the present average rate. The next point was that the permanent rate should become effective on the expiration of the existing contracts. This would permit all existing contracts to terminate in accordance with their specified terms. My fourth point provided for an increase of 10 per cent. I would not insist upon that in any regulation the department might see fit to adopt. I would rather change that now to an increase over the average rate per mile now being received.

Many couriers have asked me to seek increases for them. They claim that their living costs have increased, together with the cost of equipment necessary to perform the service. I have had to tell them that no increases have been granted since March, 1949, on the termination of the supplemental benefits. The percentage increase would be a reasonable request, since the employees of all other departments have had their salaries increased. In my opinion there are far better grounds for increasing the rate of pay of the rural courier, who in performance of his duties must face the elements six days a week, and in the spring and fall often has to drive over very bad roads in stormy weather. In contrast to this, those employed in other departments have much shorter hours and perform their duties in well furnished and heated offices. This government has made successful efforts to deal with inequalities as they have appeared in our industrial and economic life. My sole purpose in rising was to bring to the attention of the government, in the most forceful way I could, the need for some adjustment. The purpose of the resolution was to bring to the attention of the government existing inequalities in the rural mail courier service itself, and to enable us to compare the insecurity of the rural mail couriers with the security of other groups of employees engaged by the Post Office Department, who are afforded the security of sick benefits, pensions on retirement, yearly vacations with pay, while the rural mail courier is left to bargain with the department individually on unequal terms.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I feel quite strongly on this subject. Since I have become a member of this parliament I have had many requests on different occasions, and I have written to the Postmaster General directly. While the replies were always courteous and polite, nevertheless under our present act we could receive no relief for our mail couriers. There are many rural areas, Mr. Chairman, in which we are unable to provide daily mail service for the residents because of the regulation that there must be a minimum of four boxholders to the mile. I should like to see a change made in this regulation so that our farmers, fishermen, miners, lumbermen, the producers of our national wealth, would be placed on an equal footing with the urban dwellers in Canada. I am urging the minister to give this matter serious consideration. I believe the time has now arrived when a change should be made. It is difficult to convince the rural mail couriers who are serving the people of Canada honestly and well, often at great risk to their physical welfare, that now is an opportune time, when the Postmaster General is making some changes, to have these requests met.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I notice there is a considerable change in the wording of this section from the old section 73 from which it has been derived. I believe the Postmaster General had a discretion before, but there was a provision which put an onus upon him. He could only conclude such contracts in special cases by private agreement when he conceived the public interest would be protected by such a course. I notice that those words have been omitted, and the Postmaster General has been given a free hand to make such contracts without any such binding stipulations as the old section contained. I should like the Postmaster General to tell us how he proposes to enter into contracts which are under $1,000. Will he proceed in the same manner as he does now for those under $200? Can he give us any idea of the routine which will be followed?

Mr. Rinfret: We shall proceed in exactly the same way as we are doing now for contracts under $200. As hon. members of the house will know, in awarding these contracts the Postmaster General is obliged to follow the amount ordinarily paid for services of a like nature under contracts made after inviting tenders. There is a condition attached to this section which makes it compulsory for the Postmaster General and his employees to follow the trend of the tenders, as we are doing now for contracts below $200.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can you describe how you are doing that now?

Mr. Rinfret: We are asking persons to submit offers, we do not call them tenders, and when they are reasonable we do accept them. If they are not reasonable we reject them and go after some other offers.

I believe I have already dealt with the question raised by the hon. member for Kings. If we were to establish some sort of average throughout the country for rural mail couriers, we would have an extraordinary situation. People who are now above the average would be reduced to the average, whereas others who are below the average would be elevated to it. There is a special reason why some couriers are below the average. It is because their route is not as long; there might not be as many boxes; the hours of service might be different; the conditions of the road might be different; the general climatic conditions might be different; and the degree of competition might be different. All those questions have some influence on the amount of the tender. If we have an easy contract that can be performed for say $49, and on the other hand we have another contract covering difficult conditions making a tender of $71 necessary, the person that is contracting at $71 would be punished very severely if we were to make some sort of average between those two. The one having the contract at $49 per mile would benefit to a great extent for performing these services.

There was one other question which I should like to answer. We calculate that since 1946 the average prices for rural mail couriers have increased by about 30 per cent.

Mr. Coldwell: I wish to make a remark on these two sections. We are dealing with section 22, but section 23 is also involved to some extent. I understand that the minister and the department are having great difficulty, in some instances, in getting people to take contracts at current levels. I quite agree that often the tenders are of such a nature that the person who has a tender accepted is in reality performing a service for an amount far below what the service is worth. That should be remedied.

I just want to point out that, taking these two sections together, it really means that henceforth the Postmaster General will be able to award contracts of $1,000 or less without a tender. It seems to me that this is going back instead of going forward. What we are doing is opening the door once again to more of the patronage system. Ever since the first war the disposition of this house has been to get away from the patronage system. I believe that if a contract involving $1,000 is to be awarded, then it should be properly advertised and tenders invited. I do not say that the Postmaster General or the department should always accept the lowest tender, but I think the ability of the person tendering to perform the contract has to be considered. I think that this is opening wider a door that this parliament has tried to close for a good many years, namely the door of patronage. I personally think that it would be better to leave the act as it now is and to say that any contract in an amount of over $200 should be advertised and that tenders should be called. I think that would be much more satisfactory to the house, even if we expected the Postmaster General at times perhaps to award a contract to one who was not necessarily the lowest tenderer. But I personally think that we have tried in the House of Commons to get away from the patronage system; yet here we are once again opening the door a little wider than it has been in the past. I should like to see the old amount restored in this particular clause. Just to test the feeling of the committee on this matter, I am going to move:

That clause 22 be amended by deleting the words "more than one thousand dollars" and by substituting instead thereof the words "more than two hundred dollars."

That really has the effect of restoring the act to its original form. I think we are unwise to open wide a door that we have been trying to close in this parliament over the years. I know that objection may be raised that there is something like cut-throat competition, which means that the couriers often take contracts for far less than the service is worth. But at the same time I think we in this parliament are wise to try to get away from patronage as much as we can.

Mr. Graydon: I was going to ask the minister a question in connection with subsection 1 of section 23. The procedure that was outlined by the Postmaster General, in answer to the inquiry of the hon. member for St. John's West, did not seem to me to be any too clear. It is perhaps my fault that that condition arose but, if I may, I should like to have the minister's assistance on the point. What actually is the procedure under that section, having in mind a comparable arrangement made previously under the $200 ceiling? First of all, the minister said, of course, that he invites offers. But I am greatly interested in knowing what kind of invitation is extended to these privileged people and, second, what the form of the invitation is when it is so extended to them. Those are the two things that I think are important at this stage.

Mr. Rinfret: The mail has to go through. We have inspectors in the districts and we have postmasters in the districts, and they make inquiries from the persons who might be interested—such as taxi drivers or others —or who could be interested, and they endeavour to obtain from those people some offer to do the job. The offer is then referred to our department of communications here, which looks it over. If the offer is reasonable and if it is in keeping with the prices prevailing for similar contracts of like nature where a tender is called, then it is accepted. But if it is out of all proportion in comparison with contracts where tenders are called, then we do not accept it at all.

As to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, when the act was originally passed in 1867 the amount of $200 represented 86·9 per cent of the contracts. The value of money has increased considerably; I think fivefold is not saying too much.

Mr. Graydon: Careful.

Mr. Knowles: It has decreased, you mean.

Mr. Coldwell: The value of money has decreased.

Mr. Rinfret: The value of money has decreased to a fifth of its former value. I think that $1,000 today represents approximately the same value as $200 in 1867. I now found that under the $200 clause only 17 per cent of the contracts are covered.

As to the other suggestion, that for those contracts below $1,000 we could ask for tenders and not accept the lowest, I think that would make a farce of the tender system. Under section 24 the Postmaster General is obliged to accept the lowest tenderer who offers sufficient security for the faithful performance of the contract. We therefore could not have one system of tenders for one class and another set of tenders for another class.

Mr. Coldwell: Does not that phrase allow you some latitude even now? The section reads in part:

. . . the contract shall be awarded to the lowest tenderer who has offered sufficient security for the faithful performance of the contract . . .

That does not mean financial security only.

Mr. Rinfret: It does to a certain extent.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, to a certain extent.

Mr. Rinfret: For instance, we would not accept a drunkard as offering sufficient security. We would not accept as offering sufficient security one of our old contractors who had been dismissed for not performing his duties satisfactorily. There are also some other instances like that. For instance, there are the big contracts where a contractor must have quite heavy equipment. If a person is not sufficiently well off financially he could not, of course, offer sufficient security.

Mr. Wright: I know of cases where the lowest tenderer has not been accepted. I know of quite a few cases in rural districts where the lowest tender was considered too high and the route was closed. Under this clause 24 it would appear that they must accept the lowest tenderer.

Mr. Rinfret: On that question I would refer the hon. member to section 26.

Mr. Fair: May I ask the minister whether the department has any objection to reletting a contract that has expired now or during the past few months, if they get a price approximately 17 per cent higher than the old contract price? The minister told us that the increase has been, on an average, approximately 17 per cent since April 1, 1949. In many cases I believe the contracts expiring now have been of a duration of four years. I wonder whether any objection is taken to letting the contract again to the old contractor for about 17 per cent, 18 per cent or 20 per cent above the old contract price.

Mr. Rinfret: Under the new system, if the contract is below $1,000 I suppose that would be possible. If the contract is over $1,000, I do not think it would be possible; we would have to call new tenders.

Mr. Fair: I understand that perfectly. But in cases where tenders have been called, and where there have been one, two or three tenderers, I wonder whether there is any objection to letting the contract at approximately 17 per cent to 20 per cent above the old contract price. That is what I was trying to get at, and whether that procedure applies all over Canada or just to some sections.

Mr. Rinfret: As I said before, the average price or the price tag for a route is fairly well fixed up in the minds of our employees. Of course, they have had to revise some of their figures; but as far as tenders go they know now approximately what a route should call for.

Mr. Fair: I know the officials have got things in their heads; I think some of these should be moved out. That is what I am complaining about.

Mr. Rinfret: I know they are tough bargainers.

Mr. Fair: I am trying to get service for people in rural communities, because I think they are the most important people in the country.

Mr. Rinfret: At the present time under the existing set-up there is no authority for the Postmaster General to continue a contract except on exactly the same terms as the old contract, provided that he is satisfied the service has been satisfactory. Under the new system, as I said before, if the contract is below $1,000 there will be the possibility of revision, and when the clause passes it is my intention to deal with each of these cases; but over $1,000 there is still no authority in this bill by which I can do what the hon. member suggests.

Mr. Fair: I will make it a little more specific in order to get a specific answer. A man took a contract four years ago. It was for $500. The contract has now expired. The contractor wants an increase of $100 over what he previously tendered for. What will the Postmaster General do in that case when there is only one tender received?

Mr. Rinfret: At the present time, and until this clause carries, there is absolutely nothing I can do for him.

Mr. Fair: When the clause carries, what then?

Mr. Rinfret: Then I suppose the contractor will have to give us three months' notice of cancellation of his contract. We will re-examine the matter, and we hope to be able to arrive at some mutually satisfactory figure.

Mr. Fair: You have already fired him. He does not need to give notice. I am trying to get service. We had at least two country post offices that were closed when we were given rural mail service. This is my complaint. We had the post offices, which were closed, and we were given rural mail service. Now you have stopped the rural mail service because the man wants another $100.

Mr. Rinfret: I did not say that. I said we would probably come to a mutually satisfactory solution.

Mr. Fair: I will come to see the minister in a very short time.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Does the Postmaster General think that he is going to take on that responsibility? It would be very difficult for him to attend to thousands of contracts. He will not be able to do that.

Mr. Rinfret: During the war under the supplemental payments act a hundred per cent of these contracts were covered, and yet the department was able to handle it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is what I was going to suggest. You should devise some regulations of a general nature and not leave it to a rule of thumb to be handled in each case.

Mr. Rinfret: I suppose the regulations will be developed as time goes on. I am not going to deal with every one of them personally. The section says that the Postmaster General may enter into contracts. It will be the officials of the department who will do that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am interested in seeing that the people get fair play. There is a great deal of suspicion that political patronage plays some part in the giving of these contracts. I would like the Postmaster General to have it so that he would be above suspicion.

Mr. Rinfret: There was absolutely no suspicion during the war while the supplemental payments act was in operation. I think it is only fair to say that the officials of the department conducted this without looking at any colours and they arranged the various contracts according to the merits of the application.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Why is the minister referring to what happened during the war? The war has been over for six years.

Mr. Rinfret: Because during the war we had exactly the same situation, and we were—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How?

Mr. Rinfret: We had the supplemental payments act under which payments were made to rural couriers. That was in operation from 1946 to March 31, 1949, under under which any courier could apply to the department for an increase, and the department would look at the figures to see whether an increase was justified; and if the increase was warranted the department would grant it. The power is the same today as it was then.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is that act in force now?

Mr. Rinfret: No.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Why is the minister bringing it up?

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

Mr. Rinfret: The principle is the same today as it was then. If the officials of the department were able to look at the various contracts on their merits at that time, they are the same officials that are here today, and is there any reason to suspect that they would not do it today as they did it then?

Mr. MacKenzie: I just want to support what the Postmaster General has said with reference to the years 1947 to 1949. I quite appreciate, and I am sure the departmental officials appreciate, that it is rather difficult to set a basic pay, because you have different lengths of routes, you have different numbers of boxes on the routes, and you have different conditions of routes. That is quite true, but the fact remains that from March, 1947, to March, 1949, it was in operation; it did give good satisfaction, and if you do not believe me ask the 2,500 rural mail couriers.

Mr. Graydon: The minister spoke about the regulations and the legislation known as the supplemental payments legislation. There was one grave objection to that from the standpoint of procedure, namely, that it unnecessarily tied the hands of the officials of the Post Office Department. What happened was this. No real publicity was given to the fact that these supplemental payments were available to the rural mail couriers. There are hundreds of rural mail couriers across Canada who did not know that there was a supplemental payment made or available. So bad was the situation at one time that I decided to write to all my rural mail couriers and tell them it was available. Immediately I got a great number of replies, and in all fairness to the officials of the department I must say that in most instances they received reasonable compensation for the amount that they should have received. But that did not cure the situation at all, because after the faces of the rural mail couriers had been ground down under this kind of legislation, which calls for the tender system, surely it was only fair that they should have been told by the government in some way or other that they were entitled to these bonuses if they applied for them.

To make matters worse, after a certain length of time had expired the law cut them off altogether from making an application for the bonus. If you were to take a census of the rural mail couriers for the last five years in Canada I fancy you would find a lot of people to whom the government owed money if the government had only allowed them to know that there was money coming to them if they made an application for it. That is not a criticism of the officials of the department; it is a criticism of government policy that I think is inexcusable, and it was a shameful exhibition at the time in which it was done.

I only want to say this to the minister in connection with section 23. I realize his difficulties in connection with it, but I know that he has probably got in his mind the fact that if the tender system is removed —by the way it is only removed at the option of the government; it is not removed at the option of the individual. The government has held the trump cards ever since it was started, and they are continuing to do so. So long as they sit as a government they are going to be able to put their finger on a man in any section where they may want to have a rural mail courier, and no one will be able to do anything about it. On the other hand, if the government does not think the right person is doing the work, or if it thinks some change should be made, then it is free to open it up for tender. I can see, and I am sure other members in the committee must be able to see, that this opens the door to a condition of patronage I know no member is anxious to see in Canada.

I do wish to say that I am sorry there is not some provision which would be helpful in the act. If we are going to open up what looks like a patronage section and if we are going back to the dark ages in politics in connection with the appointment of rural mail couriers, then, in his own defence, I think the minister should have some provision in the act. He should have some kind of protection with respect to the awarding of these contracts. To my mind, it would appear to be a big responsibility because where patronage is not involved at all he will be suspected of patronage—and I do not want to have any such suspicion fall upon the minister.

Mr. Rinfret: How kind of you!

Mr. Graydon: If we are going to have a reversal to a medieval system of contracting, then, if it cannot be done out in the open while the contract is made, it certainly should be out in the open as soon as it is made. While post-mortems are not a great help, sometimes they save mistakes in the future.

I have no doubt the government is determined that this section shall pass, and undoubtedly the amendment offered by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar will not receive unanimous support from the government benches. It would have to have that support if it were to pass.

When contracts are awarded, how are we going to know each year when we come back to the session of parliament? Will there be a special report laid on the table of the house dealing with these contracts awarded behind closed doors, shall I say? Will we have the door opened in this way so that we will know what went on when these contracts were entered into? I suggest parliament is entitled to have that. It is only a fair and reasonable suggestion to make, and I suggest to the minister that it should be done.

I would close by stating that I am sure the minister knows, as do other hon. members in the committee, that I have been pretty faithful and persistent in my advocacy of a committee to deal with that part of the legislation dealing with rural mail couriers, as well as other parts of it. I believe when we come to assess the time taken up in this session in discussing amendments to the Post Office Act the government will have to accept a large measure of responsibility for the fact that the bill was not allowed to go to a special committee of the house, where it could have been dealt with. In view of the fact that this is the first amending bill since 1867, so far as this act is concerned, it seems to me there should have been an opportunity for much more debate and discussion than we are now given. I am more certain in my mind now that I was right when I asked for a committee than I was when I originally asked for it.

Mr. Rinfret: Replying to the hon. member I would say that while at the beginning it might have been true that many of the couriers did not know about the existence of the supplementary act, at the end 80 per cent of them were taken care of through an increase made by the officials.

Then, as to the hon. member's second question, I would reply that at the present time there is no procedure for tabling in the house the names of contractors under the tendering system. But when hon. members wish to place questions on the order paper they are free to do so, and I see no reason why that procedure should not be continued.

Mr. MacKenzie: Mr. Chairman, I have one further comment to make. My understanding is that there was a special act of parliament in 1947 which provided a supplement for mail couriers, and that it passed through this House of Commons. All members knew about it; and I am amazed to think that the hon. member for Peel did not know about it. If hon. members did not tell the post office authorities and have them tell the couriers, then they were not on to their jobs.

Mr. Graydon: I suggest the gratuitous lecture which has been read to some of us by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent must have been directed to someone other than myself. However, I do hasten to assure the committee that the great difficulty did not arise after the act was finally passed. If my memory serves me correctly, some of the greatest difficulties arose through the legislation by order in council under which the provision was originally instituted. When it was made in 1947, it came as part of legislation that was then being passed to take the place of order-in-council legislation of previous years. We had asked the government time and again to make these orders in council more public than they had been made. The rural mail couriers did not hear about it, and I think my hon. friend must bear some share of responsibility for that.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to enter into any controversy which would hold up the passage of the bill. On another occasion, when we were discussing another section, I was ruled out of order when the subject of patronage was mentioned. However, I was surprised this evening to hear the leader of the C.C.F. attack the government and then move an amendment on the ground of changing from the $200 jobs, which existed when money was worth much more than it is now, to thousand-dollar jobs for hauling mail. In this way he has brought in the matter of patronage.

Well, I do not think I have the right this evening to go into the history of the C.C.F., so far as patronage is concerned. I would point out to the hon. member who has offered the amendment that, in so far as the Post Office Department is concerned, there are older Liberal members than I am in the House of Commons who no longer make recommendations to the Post Office Department, because they say those recommendations are never acted upon. So, as for patronage being practised in the Post Office Department, I suggest that what I have said is a clear indication that it is not. I know that condition is true in my own constituency.

However, as regards the hon. member's amendment, and its application to the subject of patronage, I suggest to the leader of the C.C.F. that he study the history of the only government in Canada that really practises patronage, and that is the C.C.F. government is Saskatchewan. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar will recall that when I was a member of the government of Saskatchewan we retained his services to act as head of a commission to bring in a report on the matter of patronage. He discussed patronage at the time—

[Mr. MacKenzie.]

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member may refer to patronage only as it applies to the Post Office Department.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Then if I am to limit it to the Post Office Department, I cannot go very far. However, I will say this, that it might be very helpful to pass the bill as the minister has introduced it, and thus give a chance to those C.C.F. chaps in Saskatchewan who now have $5,000-jobs to live up to the platform of the C.C F. party, so that they may resign their jobs and apply for $1,000-jobs with the minister.

There are plenty of them, including defeated candidates and others, who have taken jobs in Saskatchewan, and—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, which section are we discussing?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I did not think the leader of the Conservative party would object to a discussion of patronage because that party practised it in the past. I shall not go into the details of what has happened in Saskatchewan.

The Chairman: The hon. member may refer to patronage in connection with the Post Office Department, but not otherwise.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): In so far as the Post Office Department is concerned, the only suggestion I have to make is the one I made a minute ago. By passing this section we will simply permit the appointment to $1,000 jobs of persons who are now making $5,000 in Saskatchewan, many of whom were candidates for this house. The Postmaster General might consider that they had lived up to their platform. If they believe in it then they will cheerfully resign their present $5,000 jobs which were given to them at the expense of the taxpayers of Saskatchewan and will apply to the Postmaster General for these $1,000 jobs. At a later time I shall go into all the details of these 2,000 odd appointments in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not propose to enter into an argument with the hon. member for Yorkton whom I have known for a long time, but I want to say that as far as I am concerned I have always been opposed to political patronage. I am opposed to it now. If the hon. gentleman wishes to discuss Saskatchewan affairs, the place to do it is in Saskatchewan where I have no doubt he will be answered most adequately by those who have the responsibility of administering affairs in that province.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Will the hon. gentleman say that patronage is not being practised by the government of Saskatchewan?

Mr. Coldwell: I am not responsible for what is being done in Saskatchewan, nor is this the place to discuss it.

Mr. Ferguson: I do not think this is the time and place to provide a cushion to sit on when we are defeated, which is something that will happen to a great number of hon. members in the near future. If the hon. member does not know anything more about the Post Office Department than he does about patronage, then he will not be employed. This is a most serious item and it should not be tangled up with patronage; it should be tangled up with the proper method of running the government. This particular item might lead to serious results. How much does it cost the government which is endeavouring in a small way to save public money to call for a tender for a rural mail route? It would cost next to nothing if they did it in a common sense, business-like manner.

Yet we find the government saying that they are going to leave this to the discretion of a man who is given the right to handle this amount of $1,000 of the taxpayers' money. He is to have the say about the competency of the man who is given the job. He is supposed to pick the best man to do the job. I remember a few years ago when I brought a certain matter to the attention of the department which took the proper action. A man who could not read correctly had been appointed as a rural mail carrier in my constituency. He would take a letter addressed to Mr. Smith and deliver it to Mr. Jones one mile away. I must say that when I brought this matter to the attention of the department they made a thorough investigation and found that my contention was correct, that the man was absolutely incompetent to carry the mail in that district.

An hon. Member: He may not have been a good Liberal.

Mr. Ferguson: I do not know whether he was a good Liberal or a good Conservative, he was certainly a poor mail carrier. I must say that the government officials recognized that fact and the man was relieved of his duties and a competent person appointed in his place. This is the thin edge of the wedge. It may be only $1,000, but I do not think this principle should be extended at all as it will lead to bad practices.

The human element will enter into appointments of this kind. This is so in municipal, provincial or federal government affairs. I think the minister and his officials have the best motives in the world for requesting this change, but I appeal to them not to take this matter out of the hands of competent Ottawa officials or civil servants and place it in the hands, not only of defeated Liberal candidates but I can think of defeated Conservative candidates whom I would not like to trust with so much power.

While I am here it is my duty, as it is the duty of every hon. member, to see that no temptation is placed in the wrong hands especially when it may involve the taxpayers' money. There is a possibility that inefficiency will creep in and will remain unnoticed for months and the people will suffer. That is exactly what happened in the case I brought to the attention of the department. People complained to the postmaster and they went to other people. One or two inspectors came up and looked over the situation, but it required action by a man who meant business. The department wrote to me and said that my contention was quite right and they admitted that this man was delivering one mail one-quarter mile, one-half mile or one mile beyond where it should be delivered.

I can see where this might be permitted in the case of small routes involving $500 or $600, and I would not care whether a Liberal or a Conservative got it. But I know the investigation would not be thorough enough. While I have the utmost respect for the small country postmaster, I do not think the responsibility of making such appointments should be placed on his shoulders. I can understand that in the case of $250 or $300 time might be saved by making a temporary appointment, but when you are going to appoint a permanent rural carrier I do not think this practice should be followed. I remember the old teaching of my father—save the pennies and the dollars will take care of themselves. That is what I am urging now. I do not want to hold up the bill, but if we do not hold it up on these items the consequences may be considerable.

Amendment (Mr. Coldwell) negatived.

On section 23—Postmaster General may contract where amount $1,000 or less.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have an amendment to move to this section. I was discussing the old section 73, from which this section is derived, and I had drawn the attention of the Postmaster General to the following phrase in that section:

—when he conceives the public interest will be promoted by such a course;

I see no reason why those words which place a responsibility upon the Postmaster

General should be omitted from the present section, so I should like to move:

That section 23 (1) be amended by inserting at the commencement of the subsection the following words:

"When the Postmaster General conceives the public interest will be promoted by such a course he"

I submit that is a very reasonable provision, which places upon the minister a responsibility he does not have at the present time. Now he has carte blanche; and I hope he will be prepared to accept the amendment.

Mr. Rinfret: I have no objection to this amendment, which I believe is taken word for word from section 73 of the present act.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 24—Lowest tenderer to be accepted except for cause.

Mr. Adamson: This is the section which provides that the lowest tender shall be accepted, except for cause. Generally in commercial contracts the last clause provides something like this: "The lowest or any tender shall not necessarily be accepted." I realize that in dealing with tenders it is good practice usually to accept the lowest, but in some cases there are tenders obviously too low, which in the judgment of the residents of the area cannot be successfully fulfilled. I wonder if the minister would consider some practice such as taking the mean of all tenders submitted on a mileage basis and eliminating those say 20 per cent above the mean or 20 per cent below. I know of one case in particular, the man who was servicing my own district, where the tender was so low the contract could not possibly be fulfilled; as a matter of fact later on the route had to be split into three. But because he was a reputable man the tender was accepted. The facts of the case were not sufficiently investigated, and there was considerable trouble on that route.

There is just one other point in regard to these routes. When that man took over the route there were some 600 people living on it. By the end of the first year that number had increased to something like 1,400, and the number of boxes had almost trebled. I would like the minister to give the formula under which the pay is increased as the number of boxes goes up. My first question is whether there is any method by which a tender which is obviously well below the mean is not accepted, and my second question is what is the formula for extra payments for an increased number of boxes.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

Mr. Rinfret: The answer to the first question is no. The answer to the second question is none.

Mr. Adamson: You mean if there are 300 boxes and that number increases to 600 the courier gets no more?

Mr. Rinfret: Not if there is no increase in mileage. If there is an increase in mileage there is an increase in proportion to the rate of the contract.

Mr. Adamson: I think that is most unfair.

Mr. McLure: When tenders are called and received, why does the department write to those tendering and ask them to lower their tenders? Do they write the same letter to all those tendering?

Mr. Rinfret: I refer the hon. member to section 26 on that point.

Section 25 agreed to.

On section 26—Where tenders excessive.

Mr. McLure: Well, I will ask my question again. Why is it that when tenders are called the department then writes to the men who have tendered, or some of them, telling them their tenders are too high and asking them to reduce them? I thought when tenders were called the department would accept one. I have in mind a case over which we had a lot of trouble, and I am going to name the route so the Postmaster General will know what I am talking about. This was the contract for Vernon Bridge rural route No. 2, which was held by a man named Sullivan for a number of years at the price of $960. His contract expired in 1950. Before it expired the department wrote to him saying the price he was getting was considered too high. Then the department asked him to tender again, though they knew that other contracts for the same mileage were being signed for as much as $1,150. Notwithstanding that they wrote telling him he was too high and wanting him to reduce his price. He did not reduce it, so once more they called for tenders. This time he was the only tenderer at $960, and they had no alternative but to accept that tender, which they did. They sent Sullivan a contract for four years at $960, and Sullivan signed it.

In the meantime a fly got in the ointment. The department wrote that there had been a mistake, that the contract was only for one year, and they sent Sullivan a new contract for one year at $960. This he refused to sign, because he had already signed a contract for four years at the same price. Then the funny part of this thing took place. They called for new tenders again, and so it would not seem that they were calling for the same route again the department added an extra mile to it, dressed it up in a new costume and called for tenders. Naturally Sullivan tendered again, and someone else came into the picture with a tender some 30 cents a day lower than Sullivan's. The tenders were opened on December 29, 1950, and the contract was let on January 16, 1951; pretty quick work. That contract was with another man for four years, and for $1,020. They did not give this faithful courier a ghost of a chance, though on two or three different occasions he had obliged the department by carrying the mail during the war years when they could not get anyone else to do it.

Mr. Ferguson: I'll bet he's voting Conservative now.

Mr. McLure: If he is not, I miss my guess. Deals of this kind are going on all the time; and I am speaking now of my own constituency, which I know. I object to the department writing to a man who had the contract before and telling him his tender was too high last year, he will have to go lower, and as soon as he consents, then the department sends somebody out to see if they can get another tender at a lower rate. Now, that is not what we should expect from the department. One sees the tendency in every part of this new bill to give more absolute power to the Postmaster General. After a while it will become so bad it will be difficult to get people to carry the mail at any price. I think that is a question that should be looked into. For instance in my constituency, apart from the side districts, out of the seventy-nine rural contracts that are left fifty-two of them are below $1,000. They should all be let by tender, and more than three weeks should be allowed for advertising

On section 28—Guarantors.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May I ask the Postmaster General in how many cases in the past year the guarantors have been called upon for a refund?

Mr. Rinfret: There is no question of any refund, but in some instances the sureties have carried on the service. That is one of the reasons for having them as sureties.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Do I understand the Postmaster General to say that in no case have the guarantors been called upon to make a payment because of the failure of the contractor?

Mr. Rinfret: I would not go so far as to say there is no case, but I do not know of any.

Sections 29 to 32 inclusive agreed to.

On section 33—Increase or alteration of service.

Mr. Pearkes: Would the Postmaster General not have authority under this clause to increase the amount paid to a contractor if there had been a substantial increase in the number of boxes along his route? Quite obviously, boxes which are scattered all along a route mean additional expense to the carrier. I would have hoped that something could have been done to influence the patrons to collect their boxes together at a suitable place. As one drives along a country road one can see boxes scattered every fifty yards. As the number of these boxes increases, so does the expense of the courier increase because he has to stop every few yards. Would this clause not give the Postmaster General an opportunity of increasing the amount of a contract where there had been a substantial number of boxes added, although there might not have been any increase in the mileage?

Mr. Rinfret: This is the old section 79, and it has always been interpreted as being based on a change in frequency and distance. The reason for interpreting it like that is contained in the lines following the one to which the hon. member was referring which reads:

> Where there is a substantial increase or alteration in the service required under a mail contract necessitating additional expenditure by the contractor...

I do not think it adds any additional expense for a contractor to have one or two more boxes. The fact that the frequency is increased or the distance is increased does mean increased expenditure. I do not think an extra box means extra expenditure.

Mr. Pearkes: I cannot accept that, because every time you stop a car and start it up again it takes more gasoline and it takes more time. If a certain interpretation has been given to that clause in the old act, surely now that we are having a new act we could have a new and more generous interpretation. The rural courier has a pretty tough time. The increase in the number of boxes in some areas is so great that many of these rural couriers are serving what amount to suburban areas. It is a question of stopping two or three times within a block. Every time the car stops and has to be started up again, it takes more of that man's time and takes more gasoline.

Mr. Rinfret: I appreciate the position taken by the hon. member for Nanaimo in trying to give me more power than I have been requesting. It makes a difference with some other members.

Mr. Pearkes: I do not mind powers if they are used reasonably and intelligently.

Mr. Rinfret: Considering the possibility there is to use the additional powers that have been given to me—

Mr. Pearkes: I believe those powers are written right into that clause.

Mr. Adamson: That is exactly the point I tried to raise. Years ago in my own constituency there used to be two or three boxes where now there are as many as thirty boxes. Our rural mail man has to stay there for as much as a quarter of an hour to deliver the mail to all those boxes. Sometimes the mail is substantial, and all the time he has to keep his car running. Surely his time must be worth something. The car has to have extra capacity in order to carry the great volume of mail he has to put in the back of it. It is a much more expensive business than it was in the old days. I recall that the rural courier used to be through his job by midday or by one o'clock in the afternoon. Today he has so many boxes to look after he is not through before five or six o'clock. Surely if he were paid a certain amount to do half a day's work, even though the mileage is the same, there must be some formula by which he can be paid more if it takes him a whole day to do the job.

Many rural mail couriers used to have a half day's work to do, but now it is a full-time job. They used to be able to do other work, but that is precluded. I feel sure there should be some formula in this act by which the rural mail courier could be paid on a per box basis over a certain period.

Mr. Rinfret: Mr. Chairman, the section has never been interpreted in that way, but after listening to the arguments of the hon. member, perhaps it should be interpreted that way.

Mr. Pearkes: May I suggest one other reason for giving it a more generous interpretation. A few years ago we had a bonus system—

Mr. Rinfret: That is what I just said.

Mr. Pearkes: No, you did not say that. I am pointing out another reason why you could give it a more generous interpretation. A few years ago there was a bonus system for these rural mail couriers. Now that has been eliminated, and I believe this section gives an opportunity for a more generous interpretation than the old section.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

Sections 34 to 44 inclusive agreed to.

On section 45—Transportation of United States mail.

Mr. Higgins: Will the minister state how this section will apply to mails going to United States bases in Newfoundland?

Mr. Rinfret: I do not know whether this will cover the point that my hon. friend had in mind. This is a reciprocal arrangement and it is covered by the convention between Canada and the United States which reads as follows:

> The United States of America and the Dominion of Canada each grants to the other free of any charges, detention or examination whatsoever, the transit across its territory, by all trains that it uses for its own mails, of the closed mails made up by any authorized exchange office of either country addressed to any other exchange office of the same country, or to any exchange office of the other country.

Mr. Higgins: When did this convention come into force?

Mr. Rinfret: I have not the date here. I will try to get it.

Mr. Higgins: The point I am making is this. This is a brand new act which is being put in and it is going to be superseded by what has gone on before. I think you would have to amend that particular section.

Mr. Rinfret: This section 45 covers the regular international convention or agreement. Maybe what the hon. member has in mind is paragraph (s) to which I drew the attention of hon. members when we were considering section 6. That might be the question the hon. member would like to know about. That paragraph (s) flows from the declaration that was made the other day by the Prime Minister about the Newfoundland bases.

Mr. Higgins: Should it not go farther than the section shows there? What about civilians at those bases? Is that not to apply to them at all?

Mr. Rinfret: No. Civilians are covered by the ordinary postal laws.

Mr. Higgins: I mean civilians in the sense of wives of service personnel. Where do they fit in?

Mr. Rinfret: I think that section 6 (s) covers the whole point. If there are any particulars the hon. member would like to have, if he will call at my office, we can give him anything that he wishes. All the necessary authority is in the act at the present time.

Mr. Higgins: If the minister is satisfied, all right. I am far from satisfied that that section is right as it is, but if the minister does not wish to amend it, I do not want it to be amended. I may say quite frankly, however, that I do not think it is right as it is.

Sections 46 to 74 inclusive agreed to.

On section 75—Evidence.

Mr. Adamson: I do not want to spoil this perfect holiday so far, Mr. Chairman, but I gather that the term "royal mail" is no longer applicable. The section reads as follows:

In any prosecution under this act evidence that any thing bears the words "Post Office," "Canada Post Office," "Canada Mail" or any similar expression is prima facie proof that the thing was established or authorized for use in connection with the Canada Post Office under the authority of this act.

I understand that the term "royal mail" now has no significance in Canada.

Mr. Rinfret: The hon. member will notice that the name of the act is "An act respecting the Canada Post Office."

Mr. Adamson: Yes. But this term "royal mail" is now an obsolete term in Canada. That is the point I am getting at.

Mr. Rinfret: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: I regret that.

Sections 76 and 77 agreed to.

On section 78—Repeal.

Mr. Knowles: Before section 78 carries, there is a word I should like to say. But before I say what I want to say on section 78, may I ask Your Honour to look back to the section which you called as section 53?

The Chairman: Yes. It is numbered "35".

Mr. Knowles: That is being corrected, is it?

The Chairman: Yes. There is a correction to be made.

Mr. Rinfret: It is "53" on my copy.

Mr. Knowles: I have two copies here, and it is "35" in both of them. I move an amendment that the "35" be changed to "53".

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the section as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute, Mr. Chairman. I want to say a word on section 78. I realize that it is unusual to get an amendment through around here, but I just wish to make a brief comment on this section for the repeal of various items of legislation now on the statute books, including part IX of the Excise Tax Act. The repeal of that legislation has to be looked at in conjunction with section 10 which we have already passed. Part IX of the Excise Tax Act which is now being repealed is the part of the Excise Tax Act which imposes taxation on the delivery of letters or post cards by post.

I wish to remind members of the committee that when the taxation in part IX of the Excise Tax Act was placed before the house, it was clearly stated that it was a tax for war purposes only. Some hon. members whose memories go back quite a few years will recall the days when the Liberals had a good deal to say about the restoration of penny postage, "penny" of course being used in the English sense of two cents. But when the war came there was brought into being the Special War Revenue Act which later became the Excise Tax Act, and in the early years one cent was added to the postage rate which was formerly on the penny postage basis. The first tax of one cent increased the rate for letters from two cents to three cents. Then in 1943, when Mr. Ilsley brought in his budget of that year, he announced a further tax, or in other words an increase in the tax on letters. The result of the tax of 1943 was that the rate on letters became four cents, two cents of which was postage and two cents of which was tax. When questioned about this matter on April 25, 1943, the Postmaster General of that day made it clear that this was a tax for war purposes and not postage. I should like to quote a bit from page 1851 of Hansard of April 5, 1943, which reads as follows:

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): This means that the extra cent —

That is, the increase from one cent of tax to two cents of tax, making a total of four cents per letter.

—is an excise tax, not postage?

Mr. Mulock: That is correct. The postage has not been raised. But my colleague the Minister of Finance has required extra money for the war expenditure. It was estimated that something upwards of $8 million could be raised by an additional one cent on letters and post cards. It was not that the Post Office Department required more money for operating. In fact our surplus as shown in the report has increased substantially in the last few years, from some $3,250 to upward of $4,500,000, with every indication that it will be still higher, although the final figures for the fiscal year are not yet in.

The point I wish to make is that when the postage on letters was boosted first from two cents to three cents, and then later to four cents it was made clear by the Postmaster General and by the minister of finance of that day that that four cents was not all postage; it was two cents postage and two cents tax for purposes of war revenue. Today, without much notice being paid to it, we have had laid before us a proposal which builds that two cents, which has been on during these years as a matter of tax, into the postage rate structure. It may be that increased costs make this change necessary. It may be that the idea of penny postage, in view of what has happened to the value of money, is gone. But I felt that before we passed this last section we should know what we are doing. We are changing the basis of our four cent postage rate from what it has been for years, two cents postage and two cents tax, to four cents postage—

Mr. Fulford: One cent—

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Leeds is saying "one cent". No; I thought that myself this afternoon, but I went to the library and looked it up, and found that the postage rate was two cents, and that at first one cent tax was put on. I cannot tell you precisely the year, but it was probably in the early years of the war. Then in 1943 when Mr. Ilsley brought in his budget of that year he had this as clause 1 in his resolution regarding the Special War Revenue Act:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Special War Revenue Act and to provide:
> (1) That the excise tax on each letter transmitted by post be increased from one to two cents.

It was already one cent tax and two cents postage. It became two cents tax and two cents postage. It has been that way from 1943 to the present. What we are now doing is repealing the tax but raising the postage to the figure of four cents.

Section agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Adamson: Before the title carries I want to ask the Postmaster General one question. I notice that in this bill nothing has been said about philatelists. I understand there is a special philatelic section of the post office. No mention is made of that section in this bill. Is that done purposely, or can the minister explain why? I understand that there is a special Canadian philatelic exhibition this summer which has the blessing of the department. I just want that one point cleared up.

Mr. Rinfret: It could certainly be covered by section five, which reads:

> Subject to this act, the Postmaster General shall administer, superintend and manage the Canada Post Office—

[Mr. Knowles.]

It could certainly come under that.

Mr. Adamson: It could?

Mr. Rinfret: Yes.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

He said: The object tonight is to call some new departments. I find that I am getting short—

Mr. Drew: If I may, just before the minister names the department, I should like to make this suggestion. I notice that in his reference to the calling of departments on Friday night the minister mentioned that nine departments were still outstanding and that he proposed to call four or five now. With the hope of avoiding any discussion on the calling of departments tonight, so that we may get ahead with fisheries, I would suggest that the minister call three tonight, and I would hope that in calling three there would be no debate at this time. This would leave an opportunity to raise any point that may have to be raised, because all the departments could not be called at one time.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I see no objection to calling three, but you know on Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays we have to make a formal motion to go into supply. Tomorrow we intend to move to go into supply again without calling any departments. If we call five tonight we would not call any tomorrow, but we would continue with fisheries, because we could not continue with fisheries tomorrow without making a formal motion. Let us say four, because I would like to bring in public works to please the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Drew: All right.

Mr. Knowles: It is clear then, Mr. Speaker, that whatever happens tonight it is the government's intention to move to go into supply tomorrow?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes, and to proceed with the estimates of fisheries.

Mr. Drew: All right.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Higgins: It is rather late in the evening to start discussion, but if there is no objection I have some comments I should like to make. I make no excuse for speaking on this subject, coming as I do from a province that produces one-third of all the fish caught in Canada. The Newfoundland catch is roughly equal to that of the maritime provinces and Quebec, and the remaining one-third is made up of British Columbia and the great lakes fisheries.

Last year the marketed value of the dominion's fisheries, that is the entire fisheries of the dominion—I suppose I should now say of Canada—amounted to approximately $180 million. Newfoundland's share of this amount was not one-third, but one-sixth. The reason for the difference in the returns for the Newfoundland product and that of the rest of the dominion is that the other provinces catch a greater variety of fish, particularly the more highly priced varieties such as lobster, than does Newfoundland. Whilst Newfoundland caught approximately the same quantity of fish as the maritime provinces and Quebec, those provinces received twice as much in payment for their products.

An hon. Member: Better fish.

Mr. Higgins: Not a bit of it; don't let anybody tell you that. Quebec and the maritimes sell greater quantities of their fish fresh; whereas the product of Newfoundland is sold as a dry salted fish, and consequently it can be sold only in the lower priced markets.

It is true that in Newfoundland we are producing more and more fresh frozen fish; but for many years, until the market has been converted, Newfoundland will have to depend, in the selling of her fish, to a very large extent on the salt fish trade. And as this fish is sold principally to the countries in the sterling group, the question of the convertibility of sterling is one of the greatest, perhaps the greatest problem, in connection with fisheries in Newfoundland.

That is a problem which, as the minister realizes, will continue for years to come. I trust that those of us from Newfoundland who sit in this and in future parliaments will not have continually to be bringing this problem of convertibility to the attention of the present minister and his successors; because it is a problem which will continue for many years to come, before the fish trade switches to fresh frozen fish. As the minister is aware, and possibly some hon. members are not, the Newfoundland salt codfish trade has continued practically without interruption for some four centuries. Before Newfoundland joined Canada, she received preferential treatment from Great Britain in this particular connection. There is no question in my mind or, I am sure, in the mind of the minister or the minds of those associated with him in the department, that there is no better service Canada could render to its newest province than to see to it that this particular currency problem is looked after regularly.

When the minister made his statement with regard to convertibility, I joined with the hon. member for Trinity-Conception in saying that I welcomed that statement, in which it was pointed out that convertibility was being arranged for this year. While the arrangement has been made only to the extent of $4 million, I feel if it comes to the point where we have to arrange for an extra $2 million, we will not be knocking at a completely closed door.

There is no doubt about the fact that unless we in Newfoundland continue to make our sales of salt codfish to Mediterranean countries, and this sterling problem is satisfactorily handled, it will be a serious matter for our province—and serious not only for Newfoundland, but also for the maritime provinces and Quebec. It means that if we are not able to sell in these age-old markets we have had, and try to sell in markets in which fish from the maritime provinces and Quebec is being sold now, it will seriously interfere with their markets for that type of fish.

It is for that reason therefore I say that the maritime and Quebec members should not feel in any way jealous of what they may consider as preferential treatment, in so far as the arrangement for the convertibility of sterling, for Newfoundland is concerned. Because without this arrangement for convertibility, and with Newfoundland challenging the markets enjoyed by the maritimes and Quebec, it would be catastrophic for all these provinces. That is why I say there should not be any real difficulty in so far as appreciating the problem is concerned, when the members from those provinces understand that situation.

It is generally admitted that Canada is one of the great exporting countries of the world. It may be of interest to hon. members to point out that the ratio of exports of Newfoundland to its gross national production is practically three times as great as that of the dominion as a whole. Newfoundland's ratio of export trade to total national income is 67 per cent, whereas the ratio of the dominion is approximately 24 per cent. Newfoundland's ratio of imports is about 85 per cent while that of Canada as a whole is 21 per cent. The over-all picture therefore indicates clearly how our export trade works considerably to the benefit of the country as a whole. As I have pointed out, and as has been pointed out by hon. members before, the great bulk of exports from our newest province is to countries dealing in dollars. Those dollars are American dollars, and they aid materially in the economy of Canada as a whole.

But the fishing industry, in so far as salted fish is concerned, because of the particular circumstances I have pointed out, does require preferential treatment, and will continue to need it for many years to come. The chief reason is that by far the largest percentage of the working force of Newfoundland is directly engaged in fisheries, and the money goes directly back to those people.

Then, we come down to the type of fish caught. There are three types, namely Labrador, shore and bank. As the name implies, the Labrador fish are caught in Labrador waters, while the shore fish are caught along the shores of Newfoundland, and the bank fish are caught on the Grand Banks.

In view of the higher cost of living, as it has been going up in the last year, and in view of the low prices which prevailed last year for fish, it appears to me that the fishermen will have to have an increase of at least from 30 to 35 per cent in the prices of their fish, if they are to get through successfully at all, even with a good average voyage.

With all due respect to the minister, and the hopes he expressed in his statement on May 17, particularly his belief that the prices are going to be good this year, I doubt very much whether they will be as good as he thought they would be. If they are going to be good, they are certainly not going to keep up with the increased cost of living. Consequently fishermen will not be any better off.

And this gets back to the statement made by the retiring president of the fisheries council of Canada at its sixth meeting in Ottawa in March last, when he said:

> The fisheries would seem to afford a great opportunity to Canadians to demonstrate the democratic way of life. Fishing is a noble, a wholesome, venturesome calling. It should bring forth the best that is in the fisherman and businessman, but I submit the industry will have failed in its destiny if the fisherman has not prospered and enjoyed a fair measure of the good things of life.

That should be the keynote of the fishing industry; it is the keynote, I am sure, of what the minister is trying to do, the keynote of what those associated with him in the department and in the fisheries council are trying to do—to give the ordinary, common fisherman a better share of the good things of life. I submit the only way the ordinary fisherman, as I know him, is going to be given a fair share of the good things of life is to have his catch sold in such a way that he will have a better return than he is getting at the present time.

This gets right back to what we have been talking about for some time. Newfoundland members have not been squawking unnecessarily; they have just been trying to make their point clear—and I believe the minister is aware of that. I believe I am justified once again in asking him that very, very serious consideration be given to setting a floor price for fish. I know the minister has given this matter consideration and I know he has had the advice of the prices support board. I know also that he is aware of a meeting that took place last week in St. John's between the fishermen and the salt codfish association. I understand that the minister stated the other day that there was not a great difference between the prices asked and what the merchants were prepared to pay. I do not know whether the minister is prepared to indicate what those prices are because if he is not I will be arguing more or less in the dark. The price that has been asked by the fishermen for the best grade fish I understand is around $12 per quintal, and I do not think that has been met. That would not appear to be an unfair price to ask. I am not saying that it is or is not, that is just what I am told.

This is not an altogether new problem. We have had price support for other commodities produced in Canada. Our friends from the west have seen their commodities subsidized extensively and I believe there is still a hot argument as to whether proper payment has been made for wheat. We have had subsidies on potatoes and cheese and I see no reason why the same principle should not be applied to fish. In the brief submitted in 1944 by the United Maritime Fisheries, as a result of which the Fisheries Prices Support Act was passed, the following statement appears:

It is the view of our members that, if the fishery is to be reconstructed upon a basis that will provide freedom from want for the fishermen, some means must be devised to maintain fish prices on a parity with other commodities. If the price structure in other branches of food production is to be supported by a floor, it is equally necessary to make a similar provision for the fishery. It is well known that in the past the discrepancy between the prices received by the primary producer and the general commodity levels has been greater in the fishery than in any other branch of production.

The concluding paragraph of that brief reads:

We urge, therefore, that in order to ensure our fishermen a reasonable measure of security, a floor be established under fish prices on a basis which will put them on an equal footing with other producers.

I understand that Norway and Iceland, both of which are competitors of Canada in the sale of salt fish, have established floor prices. I believe that this information, which I obtained from a departmental publication, is correct.

I am not too well prepared tonight at this late hour and for a moment I shall leave fish and deal with another part of the fisheries that comes under the minister, our seal fisheries. As the minister is aware, there was considerable competition in sealing this year from the Norwegians and other nationalities. The killing date of March 13 was established many years ago by Newfoundland, which date gave the seals time to deliver their young. This year the Norwegian sealers came in without waiting for that date and the seals were killed before they had a chance to deliver their young. This was very cruel killing and it has been commented upon strongly by the Newfoundland press. In the Daily News of April 2 Captain Sidney Hill of the Arctic Sealer commented on this fact as follows:

A crime was committed, one for which there should be no excuse. I saw the crews of the ships sculping the whitecoats within a few hours after they were born. Many of these seals were not more than twelve pounds in weight. The Norwegian and other ships were taking seals and this forced all ships to do the same. There should be some international agreement made to prohibit the taking of young harps before the old Newfoundland killing date, March 13. It is a murder to take the seals so early and I cannot condemn the practice too strongly.

In the Evening Telegram of April 19 appeared a strong editorial headed, "The sealing industry imperilled." I shall not read it all, but there is one paragraph dealing with this type of slaughter which reads:

That is a matter of importance. The other damning aspect of this early killing is that the slaughter is perpetrated so soon after, or even before, propagation occurs, to the complete disregard of all the laws of conservation. It is asking men to engage in a barbarous slaughter. It is also asking them to disregard laws which have been made to ensure that species, no matter what kind, will not become extinct. Under such unregulated conditions it is futile to expect that the seals can long survive.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

PRESENTATION OF SIXTH REPORT AND CONCURRENCE IN RECOMMENDATION

Mr. F. P. Whitman (Notre Dame de Grace): By leave of the house, I should like to revert to routine proceedings in order to present the sixth report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. By leave of the house, I should like to revert to motions and move:

That the recommendation contained in the sixth report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines presented this day in respect to the capital stock of Bill No. 321 be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will give third reading to Bill No. 322, respecting the Canada post office. Then we will move to go into supply and call one department, after which we will continue with the fisheries estimates. I believe we will have time to take up some small bills and resolutions. There is a resolution concerning an amendment to the P.F.R.A., and that will be first; then Bill No. 357 to amend the Criminal Code (race meetings) and Bill No. 338, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act. After that we always have the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Knowles: Those bills and resolutions will be dealt with, if at all, after we have been in supply on fisheries?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 12, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

BURNT OUT PENSIONERS—EFFECT OF APPLICATION OF OLD AGE PENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Veterans Affairs inform the house whether legislative or any other necessary steps will be taken to make sure that burnt-out pensioners over seventy years of age, when they receive the universal old age pension, do not lose the burnt-out pension or the treatment or hospitalization benefits they now enjoy?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend will permit, I shall take his question as notice and look into the matter. I would rather read his question in Hansard before making a statement.

Mr. Knowles: That is satisfactory.

POST OFFICE ACT

MEASURE TO CONSOLIDATE, CODIFY AND AMEND EXISTING LEGISLATION

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General) moved the third reading of Bill No. 322, respecting the Canada post office.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I propose to move, seconded by the member for Peel (Mr. Graydon):

That this bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of reconsidering section 11 thereof.

I shall make my comments after the motion is read.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may make his comments now.

Mr. Drew: I am presenting this motion in the hope that it will receive the same measure of consideration as was extended to other contentions that were put forward. The amendments introduced yesterday at the instance of the Postmaster General did relieve to some extent the postal charges on newspapers with a circulation of 10,000 or more. As I indicated at that time, it is not possible to say how satisfactory or otherwise this provision will be until there is an opportunity of examining its effect on newspapers that come within that category. In any event, the government has clearly indicated that this is as far as it is prepared to go. For that reason I am not directing my comments to that, although the purpose of this further consideration does embrace the possibility that these reductions will not be adequate.

I repeat what I said yesterday, that this is not a case of subsidizing newspapers. The provision for special postal rates for newspapers is primarily for the purpose of making newspapers available to those who cannot satisfactorily obtain them by other means. It is possible for persons living in urban communities to have newspapers delivered to their door, or to buy them on the street corners or in stores. In those areas where there are fast trunk highways, trucking has largely taken the place of postal delivery. Trucks carry newspapers for hundreds of miles, and they are then delivered in precisely the same way in the smaller urban communities as they are in the larger urban communities, that is, from door to door, through stores, or from street corners. The postal service is a facility extended to those who do not happen to live in areas in which these opportunities are ordinarily available, and it should be regarded in that light. The proposed postal rates on the large urban dailies were reduced to some extent by the amendment put forward yesterday by the Postmaster General and moved by one of the other member; that reduction to some extent relieved the situation. I will not extend my comments on that point but, as I said yesterday, I do not believe the reductions are adequate.

What I am particularly dealing with now is the fact that nothing has been done to relieve the situation in which the smaller newspapers, with a circulation of less than ten thousand, now find themselves. The statement has been made by highly responsible representatives of those smaller newspapers that these rates may put them out of business. That may or may not be an overstatement of the case. In any event, there have been indications of great concern right across the country about the effect of these increased rates on the smaller newspapers, which, it must be remembered, have not available to them the advertising resources which are available to the larger newspapers.

I believe that further consideration should be given to section 11 with regard to the rates on the large urban dailies. I particularly think that further consideration should be given to the rates for postal delivery of those smaller newspapers for which no relief was afforded by the amendment introduced yesterday. It must be remembered that in many of the cases where mail service is the only way in which people can obtain these papers, the only papers immediately available to them are the smaller newspapers. The smaller newspapers form a vitally important part of our whole democratic process. In many cases they say that, under these rates, they will be compelled to stop delivery of their papers. Whether the Postmaster General agrees with that assertion or not, I submit that before this bill becomes law their contention should at least be heard. Such a hearing would not mean an extended delay of the consideration of this bill. It simply would mean that the bill would go back for further consideration of section 11, and that, with the indication already given by the government that they are prepared to give some consideration to this problem, those who represent the newspapers of Canada—both the large urban dailies and the smaller dailies as well as the weeklies—may have an opportunity to present their case before this matter is finally disposed of and these rates become irrevocable.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a word or two to what was said yesterday with regard to the setting up of a board of review under section 7 of the act. The question was raised, I think, by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), having been presented to the minister by the Toronto board of trade. I wish to refer briefly to the answer which the minister gave, to suggest that I think the situation is not satisfactory, and to express the hope that the minister may reconsider the decision which has been given.

As to the appointment of a special board of review, I need not detain the house by reminding hon. members what an important matter to any business enterprise or to anyone else is the use of the mails, and what a serious thing it can be if the use of them is refused, particularly in such a way as to draw attention to the fact that a business enterprise is under suspicion.

With regard to the appointment of a board, the minister's answer, as reported at page 3921 of Hansard, was as follows:

> Any independent board that might be nominated . . . would, I suppose, be a board like the railway board or the air transport board . . .

I must admit that if something of the kind were to be done, it would be like taking a steam hammer to crack a nut, because we do not want to have permanent boards set up to deal with matters which may seldom arise. I do not think that is at all a complete answer. If the minister wishes to give effect to the suggestion which was made, I think that it could easily enough be done.

As to the question of appeal, the minister brushed that aside lightly. He said, as reported at page 3921 of Hansard:

> The brief of the board of trade of the city of Toronto also mentions the question of an appeal; but it was not felt that the discretion should be taken away from the Postmaster General. I realize that it is quite a heavy responsibility, but I think it is one that a minister of the crown should be ready to accept.

It may be pleasant for us to know that the ministers of the crown are ready to accept responsibility, but sometimes we may think that they are ready to accept a little bit too much. I wish to point out that in the one case where, I understand—perhaps in some informal way—a board of review was set up, the members of the board were the chief executive officer of the department—that is, of the Post Office Department—the law officer of the department, and the director of administration. Without any disrespect to these gentlemen, and indeed without any disrespect to the minister, I wish to point out that such an appeal is really no appeal at all, and that we are just playing with words if we are asking members of the minister's department to review the action of the minister. It is not fair to the minister; it is not fair to the members of the department; it is not fair to anyone, and it does not make sense. I therefore venture to put this point forward and to suggest that, if no reconsideration can be given at the moment, at any rate the matter be kept before the minister for future consideration.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I should like briefly to support as strongly as I can what has just been said by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). I think that his protest has point given to it by what happened last year on several occasions. I am not going to go over the long story of those occasions on which strong complaint was made about denying the use of the mails to certain persons. The matter was discussed in this house last year.

The appointment of a committee may be some advance on the present state of affairs, but, Mr. Speaker, it is not a sufficient advance. If the committee is simply to be a departmental committee, no matter how conscientious or how capable the officials may be, it is still a departmental committee; and I do not see how the policy of the department could fail to have an influence on the minds of the members of such a committee.

If the minister is adamant in insisting that the committee take the form indicated in the bill, then I submit to him that the very least that ought to be done to mitigate the rigours of a provision of that kind is to provide an appeal to the courts, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Greenwood, and as has been proposed in the extremely intelligent brief submitted to the minister by the Toronto board of trade. After all, what reasonable objection can there be to allowing an appeal to persons who suffer this grave disability of being denied the use of the mails? Remember that this power in the hands of the minister, even under a committee, could be used with damaging effect on anyone's business and reputation. What possible objection can there be in a situation of that kind to allowing an aggrieved individual to go to the courts by way of appeal from the decision of the committee? For the life of me, Mr. Speaker, I cannot see why this objection should be taken by the minister and by the government to allowing any person to go to the courts in appeal against what he contended is an arbitrary and unjustified use of these broad powers conferred by the bill in cases of this kind.

I urge upon the minister that, before it is too late, provision should be made in this bill at least to allow an individual against whom this extremely wide power has been exercised to take his case to the courts by way of appeal.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I see no very useful purpose in referring this bill back to the committee of the whole on third reading for reconsideration of the clause dealing with newspapers generally. Most of us have some sympathy with the position in which the rural and small papers find themselves at this time; but we must not overlook the fact that in reality the newspapers of Canada—and the principal beneficiaries are the large newspapers of Canada—will soon be getting an annual subsidy of something in excess of $10 million.

As I understand it, the deficit last year on this particular business was $12 million. In other words, what the country has been doing is subsidizing newspapers, large and small, to the extent of some $12 million a year. Again let me repeat that when a short time ago this house voted $65 million as a compensatory adjustment to the farmers of western Canada for a period of five years, as my hon. friend points out, or $13 million a year, as it were, these newspapers were critical of the compensation granted to the grain growers of Canada. And here we are proposing to subsidize these newspapers to the extent of $10 million a year for a long period of time. We are simply substituting $10 million for $12 million a year. Consequently I think they have no legitimate complaint against what this house is doing at the present time.

Let me point out to hon. members that unfortunately while most of us are anxious to preserve a free press, the press is becoming less free all the time, because even many of the weekly rural newspapers are being bought up by powerful interests in this country. I need only to refer to the Thomson chain in this province which is buying up weekly newspapers and controlling them in the interests of, we will say, private profits rather than the dissemination of news and discussion of views. To my mind one of the great dangers in our democratic countries is the control by a few small groups of individuals of newspapers and news services with a mass circulation in the areas which they serve. That, I say, is a danger to our democratic institutions. If some people want to use the newspapers today as monopolistic news gathering and news disseminating services, then I do not think this parliament should subsidize to the extent we are subsidizing at the present time. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, in view of what the house is doing, namely, granting to them today by this bill a subsidy of something like $10,190,000 a year instead of $12 million which we have been paying for a long time, the house is being very generous indeed, particularly with the large daily newspapers. The bill also contains provisions designed to ease the burden of postage on the local small weeklies across the country. Consequently I think no good purpose can be served by referring this back to the committee for review.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Post Office Act

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

An hon. Member: A waste of time.

Mr. Casselman: It is not a waste of time at all.

Mr. Drew: Parliament is a waste of time to some members.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River (Mr. Simmons). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER PROCEDURE—AMENDMENT, MR. DREW

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I propose to employ this motion for the purpose of introducing an amendment, the first purpose of which is the raising of an issue which I believe is of major importance to this house, and which has been under consideration for many years.

I shall read the amendment which I propose to move, so that my remarks may be directed to it and hon. members may know precisely what I am moving. The amendment reads:

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"This house is of the opinion that appropriate steps should be taken for the appointment of a select committee to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure of this house for the purpose of making recommendations designed to assure the more expeditious dispatch of public business and to suggest any changes that may be desirable."

This subject has been under discussion for many years, and public funds of Canada have been appropriated for the purpose of obtaining information in regard to this subject and of making recommendations which the house was asked to consider for the purpose of producing the results contemplated by this motion. I have introduced the motion in the form of a recommendation that appropriate steps be taken, recognizing the fact that this purpose will be accomplished only if the government is prepared to take the initiative and introduce a motion similar to the motions which have been introduced in the past with this thought in mind.

Such a motion was moved in this house on May 21, 1940, by the then prime minister. The words were similar in effect, but they took the form of a positive motion to set up a committee, as was in keeping with a motion introduced by the prime minister. After considerable discussion of the subject on that occasion and an indication of general agreement in all parts of the house that steps of this kind were necessary, the motion was withdrawn, not because it was considered inadvisable to proceed with such a matter but rather because it was thought that changes of this kind could well be deferred during the period of the world war which was then in progress.

At a later date the Speaker of the house at that time, Hon. Gaspard Fauteux, proceeded to Great Britain, accompanied by Dr. Arthur Beauchesne, and considered the procedure in Great Britain as well as elsewhere. The Speaker presented a report to the House of Commons, which, as I know Your Honour will recall, related also to voice-amplification equipment for the chamber. That report was laid on the table on December 5, 1947, and was printed for distribution to hon. members as well as for general distribution.

The opening paragraph of that report indicates how long this subject has been under discussion and how general the agreement has been that steps should be taken to consider a revision of the rules and the acceptance of new procedures which would expedite the business of the house. I should like to read the first paragraph of the report, because it indicates the basis upon which the Speaker was proceeding. When I speak of this report as being the report of the Speaker, may I again remind hon. members that the Speaker was accompanied by Dr. Arthur Beauchesne, whose eminence and authority in the field of parliamentary procedure is unanimously accepted in this house, outside the house in Canada, and also beyond the bounds of Canada. We can recognize the fact that in presenting this report the Speaker had the advantage of advice from the man who is the most experienced of anyone in Canada in matters of this kind. The first paragraph reads:

Complaints have been made in the past few years that protracted sessions of parliament are caused by deficiencies in the rules of procedure. Criticism has been widespread and sometimes based on misconceptions. Several attempts to revise the rules were made during the last and the present parliaments, but they had no results. On May 21, 1940, the Prime Minister moved the appointment of a select committee to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure of this house in regard to a more expeditious dispatch of public business and to suggest any changes that may be desirable. After a short discussion the motion was withdrawn unanimously.

As I have indicated, the reason the previous motion was withdrawn was that it was accepted that it was advisable to defer changes of this kind until the termination of the war. A number of speakers on both sides of the house indicated their strong support of a motion of this kind. On May 26, 1942, not speaking to this particular motion but in regard to the whole question of procedure in the house, Mr. Ilsley stated, as reported on page 2774 of Hansard of that date:

In my judgment parliament is more and more on trial, at the bar of public opinion. There is something wrong with this House of Commons. I am not reflecting on the house, and I do not know what is the cause. But there is something wrong with it.

Then on February 9, 1943, the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), also speaking in the house in regard to procedure, had this to say, as reported on page 291 of Hansard:

Some of the criticism about the House of Commons and its working is just misinformed.

And later:

Other comment on the working of parliament results from the feeling that there is room for improvement and that we can do something about it so as to make parliament the great forum of the nation and a better expression of the national will.

And again:

If there is one answer to be made to the criticisms so far made about parliament it is that nobody seems to have studied and expressed why it is defective, if it is defective; what can be done to change it, what should be done, and when.

On the same day Mr. P. J. A. Cardin in this house, as recorded at page 280 of Hansard:

Our rules of procedure are obsolete. They have been framed after the rules followed at Westminster, but here we have not developed the methods and customs prevailing at Westminster. There is an urgent necessity for a change in the rules of the house, a change in our methods of procedure.

Then I find that on February 1, 1943, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) had this to say, as recorded at page 60 of Hansard:

I was disappointed, however, to hear the Prime Minister say that he thought a revision of the rules of the house ought not to be undertaken during this period of war.

Then the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar went on to review what he had seen in the House of Commons at Westminster, and the dispatch with which the business was completed there. He then continued with these remarks:

I have read the rules of some of our sister nations, New Zealand, for example, where the rules have been changed in comparatively recent years; and in my opinion if we would modernize the rules we could do very much in this house without interfering with freedom of expression or freedom of speech.

More recently, on June 25, 1947, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) suggested twenty specific changes in our rules. Those changes, which are recorded in Hansard, indicated his considered thought from extended experience in the house as to ways in which the rules could be improved by the attaining of a more expeditious procedure in the House of Commons.

May I point out that the report presented by the Speaker on December 5, 1947, had a number of very excellent recommendations which have not been carried out, and which undoubtedly deserve consideration. After all, this report was presented to the house more than two years after the termination of active hostilities. Any reasons for deferring consideration of this subject that may have existed in May of 1940, when the then prime minister presented a motion similar in intent to the one now before you, had been removed, and we may very properly say that they do not exist today.

One of the recommendations made at that time had to do with a subject that has been under discussion on various occasions, not only during the present session but also in other sessions in recent years. It is to be found in paragraph 22 of the recommendations presented by the Speaker to the House of Commons. That paragraph reads as follows:

The House of Commons in the United Kingdom is now contemplating a combination of the public accounts committee and the estimates committee, making them a single committee to be called the public expenditure committee. There is great logic in that. The public accounts committee works on moneys already spent; the amounts considered in committee on estimates, before payments are made, eventually become items for the consideration of the public accounts committee. There should be no limitation to the jurisdiction of the new committee which ought to investigate anything it thinks fit with regard to estimates and regularity in the payment of expenses.

If there were no other specific recommendations in the report of the Speaker tabled in the house on December 5, 1947, that one recommendation contained in paragraph 22 would deserve consideration by a committee of the nature I am now proposing. May I emphasize the words of the Speaker, not quoted by him from anyone else, but his own conclusion. He said:

There should be no limitation to the jurisdiction of the new committee which ought to investigate anything it thinks fit with regard to estimates and regularity in the payment of expenses.

There are many other recommendations, intended to simplify procedure, to give orderly direction to the procedure of the house, to ensure that with the more expeditious dispatch of business in the house there nevertheless shall be the preservation of the rights of members with respect to motions such as those made on going into supply. All these deserve consideration; but let me emphasize the importance of the particular recommendation to which I have referred. We have a public accounts committee which is not permitted to examine accounts after March 31 of the year before the year in which the committee sits. After all, it is a useful committee and could be more useful for the purpose of checking procedure, ensuring a review of auditing methods, and the adoption of the very excellent recommendations of the Auditor General which are made year by year.

In a time of rapidly expanding expenditures, however, a review of past business more than a year old is of little advantage to the members of the house in determining whether the greatly expanded expenditures are in keeping with the demands for economy as well as for the very necessary purposes for which they are designed. If there ever was a time when it should be possible for a committee to examine expected expenditures, it is at a time when there is an enormous increase in the request of the government for money to provide the necessary expansion of our defence organization and equipment, which does, however, introduce many types of completely new governmental activities which will not be covered by the public accounts that can be considered in the ordinary way by the public accounts committee.

I would point out that when the Speaker recommended in 1947 that we should follow the practice being recommended at Westminster of combining the activities of the public accounts committee and the committee on estimates, in that very recommendation he was emphasizing something which we should bear in mind. There has been a committee on estimates in the United Kingdom for a great many years. That committee deals with the estimates that are presented, and avoids a great deal of the discussion that takes place in this house, to which many hon. members, particularly on the government side, repeatedly object.

May I suggest to those members who are constantly objecting to the length of time devoted to the questioning of ministers with respect to the estimates before the house that if they do not want that discussion to take place here, neither do we. We say that the place for that discussion to take place, to the advantage of the business of the house and the people of Canada, is in a committee where departmental officials can be brought forward, where details can be explained in a much more businesslike way than in the House of Commons, and where a discussion can take place concurrently with the ordinary business of the house. Our experience in the house is that with the appointment of committees made up of representatives chosen from the different parties in the house, there is a very strong inclination on the part of members generally to accept the recommendations of such committees. I am confident that if we had a committee on estimates, in the majority of cases there would be little new discussion concerning the details, because the members here would know that other members in whom they had confidence had examined the estimates, had obtained the information and were satisfied. Where there was a difference of opinion indicated by the members of the committee, then the members here would undoubtedly be inclined to carry forward the discussion in that area in which there was a difference of opinion. I am satisfied that in most cases that would be the only area of continuing discussion in this house. The area of discussion in this house in regard to the estimates would, therefore, be substantially reduced. This would expedite the business, not merely by weeks but perhaps even by months, and it would be much better handled within a shorter time.

May I refer again, and certainly without any apology, to another subject that has been under discussion concerning a means of improving the conduct of business in this house, and most important business. I am referring to the appointment of a committee on defence expenditures. I repeat the suggestion, because I believe that this is an appropriate time to point out that we have had defence under discussion here not only since the estimates came forward but on the speech from the throne, on the budget debate and again on the different occasions on which the minister has made announcements prior to the introduction of his estimates. Those estimates are to be considered again. Many new events will have occurred, and a completely new debate will take place, and ought to take place. Then, if we follow the procedure we have followed, after another short discussion the estimates will be withdrawn, held back; new events will occur in different parts of the world, and new bases for discussion will arise. If, Mr. Speaker, there were a committee on defence expenditure, appointed by the parties in this house, and made up, I should imagine, largely of those gallant members on both sides of the house who have served this country in two world wars, there would be little inclination on the part of other members to question their recommendations wherever they were unanimous. We would doubtless find that the number of items on which there was a difference of opinion would be limited. There would be a discussion on those items. There would, of course, be a general debate on defence, but that general debate would take place with the advantage of an examination of the estimates before the members of this house engaged in such a general debate.

May I also point out, sir, that by procedures of this kind we could avoid two extended debates, one following the motion to approve the speech from the throne, and the other following the motion to go into supply after the introduction of the budget. Because of the fact we have no such committee, members are naturally inclined to range over a wide field. They do not know when they will have an opportunity of discussing any of these subjects at a later time. If they knew there was going to be an examination in the committee, and that committee reports were to be presented in regard to each of the departments, they would know that at that time they could make appropriate comments concerning any subject of general interest throughout Canada or of concern to their own constituents.

I feel sure that hon. members of this house know that in the United Kingdom, as a result of consideration of procedure in the house, they have avoided these two general debates which range over such a wide field. There is a general debate, not covering the extended period which it does here, on the motion to approve the speech from the throne. But there is no general debate of a similar nature at the time the budget is introduced. The debate on the budget is a debate on that particular subject, and also on the subsequent bills that are introduced—which, I may say, are now before the House of Commons at Westminster.

I have only touched on some of the subjects that have been raised and some of the arguments that have been put forward, some of which have been put forward with even greater vigour by members on the other side of the house. I have sought to avoid anything of a controversial nature relating to any comments I may have made on other occasions during this session in regard to procedure, because I am presenting this motion in the earnest hope that it will be adopted. I hope that the earlier arguments from all parts of the house will be accepted at this time, and that we can have an examination of the procedure of this house, consistent with complete freedom of debate, to devise a method that will assure the more expeditious dispatch of the public business of Canada.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government, and I am sure most members, if not all members of the house, welcome at least the substance of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). Before declaring expressly that we should be glad to accept it, I should like to see the exact language that is used. The substance, however, is one which we welcome, and which I believe the whole house will welcome. I am taking it for granted that the leader of the opposition and the members of his party are making this suggestion in an earnest desire to bring about improvements in the manner in which the business of the house can be conducted, to the end that sufficient opportunity for careful consideration may be provided, but also that repetitions may be avoided of anything that might consume time without producing really beneficial results for the country at large.

I believe, in view of the announcement I made the other day, that this would be an opportune time to have a select committee to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure, and to study all the suggestions that from time to time have been made in the house. The committee perhaps might not have its report ready for the opening days of the next session, but I think that during the next session, because of the fact it will be a session in which we shall ask the house to give priority to government business so that we may clean up the arrears and start with a fresh slate in 1952, we could perhaps resolve to adopt as an experiment some of these suggestions for the duration of the session. The experience we would gain might help the committee come to some conclusions for more permanent changes.

There has been, for instance, the suggestion that each day there be an uninterrupted sitting that would end around seven o'clock in the evening. We might possibly accept the suggestion that we start at one o'clock or two o'clock. Even if we started at two o'clock we would be losing only two hours of the normal week under the present rules, because there are four days when we sit for six hours, and there is one day when we sit for three hours. If we had five days when we sat five hours, it would make twenty-five hours instead of twenty-seven. If we accepted the suggestion made the other day by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) to commence sittings at one o'clock, we would really be increasing the normal number of hours in the week, because we would have five days of six hours each, or thirty hours instead of twenty-seven. That is something to which consideration can be given.

With respect to the suggestion made about committees on estimates I would be happy, as I am sure would a large number of members in the house, if we could adopt a procedure that would function as does the procedure that has been adopted at Westminster. Hon. members realize, of course, that at Westminster there is a limitation on debate, and that a relatively short time is allotted for the consideration of estimates in their committee of the whole after the estimates have been considered in the committee on estimates. The committee on estimates does not attempt to range over the whole field of the estimates, but rather picks out one department or more and goes carefully into the estimates of that one department or more, the choice being made by the opposition. I think that procedure might be quite acceptable, and could at least be tried out here.

As to a committee on defence expenditures, we did not think that during this session such a committee would provide useful results, because the defence department and the defence production department are just getting under way and are obliged to devote a great deal of time to organizing. We know that, during the last war, the war expenditures committee was extremely helpful to the government as well as to the country; because I think that it is essential, in order to have support from the public, that there be such inquiries and such checking as do satisfy the public that their money is being properly expended. That procedure is of value to the very existence of democratic institutions. On all those matters, if, without it being looked upon as too restrictive of the rights of members, we could accept the kind of arrangement that it has been found possible to carry out at Westminster, I think it would be highly desirable.

I have now had an opportunity of reading the language of the motion submitted by the leader of the opposition. I take it that the leader of the opposition does not intend this motion as one of no confidence in the government.

Mr. Drew: Oh, no.

Mr. St. Laurent: I take it that he intends it merely as an expression of the opinion of the members that there is room for improvement in our rules.

Mr. Drew: Just so that it will be a matter of record, may I say that I sought to convey that understanding. I sought to convey that it is not intended as a motion of non-confidence. It was for that very reason that I carefully refrained from anything that could be regarded as critical of discussion during this present session. I rather sought to place it upon the ground of reason and of argument, supported by the arguments which had been made over the years on this very subject.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am glad that the leader of the opposition wished to have that statement appear on the record. I take it, as I think we all do, it is merely that this opportunity is being used for the expression of the views of members of parliament on the possibility of improving our procedure. I know that there are precedents which indicate that after an amendment to a motion to go into committee of supply has been accepted by the house, a motion to set up the committee is then necessary, and, after that, a motion that the Speaker do now leave the chair, which is the usual motion on going into committee of supply. It is a new motion after an amendment has been carried.

Mr. Knowles: Citation 489, Beauchesne's second edition.

Mr. St. Laurent: "Now" is a new period of time. It may very well be that the house, though not prepared to accept the motion that was made three-quarters of an hour ago, and wishing to use it as an opportunity for expressing some specific views, would be prepared a little later on to accept another motion relating to another period of time.

In order to do something realistic about this matter, I think that consideration might be given to setting up, as we did in connection with the amplification system for the house, a small striking committee that would confer with Mr. Speaker to select the working committee that would then consider with him the suggestions that might be made with respect to changes in the rules. I should be happy indeed to see this amendment adopted, on the understanding that it is an expression of the views of the house; and if it is adopted, I shall then be glad to suggest—if that course seems to meet with the approval of the house—that we set up perhaps the same small striking committee we had with respect to the amplification system, to consider and to recommend a list of members to make up this select committee to co-operate with Mr. Speaker and suggest any changes that may be desirable in the rules.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think this amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) serves a useful purpose. We have had motions and amendments of a similar kind over the years since I have been here, and we have not yet accomplished what the leader of the opposition, and I am sure, other members of the house, wish to accomplish, namely, a revision of the procedures and methods of doing business in this house so that we can deal with matters more intelligently and more expeditiously.

I do not know whether we could adopt somewhat the same procedure as is followed in the mother of parliaments. With their long experience a procedure has been worked out which has, of course, the effect of largely limiting the right of the private member to participate in debates. We have never done that here. But the suggestion that a small striking committee be established to choose a committee to assist Mr. Speaker in a revision of the rules of the house, or in the consideration of a revision of the rules, is indeed a useful one, in my opinion; and I think that it should be put into effect.

I do not think that anyone wants to consider this matter as one of confidence or non-confidence. We are all interested in seeing that the business of the house is conducted efficiently, and, as far as possible, expeditiously. If this committee is to be set up to consider revision of the rules, I think that some consideration might be given to going over the citations and rulings in the various volumes we have; because some of them are conflicting; sometimes they lead us into difficulties on procedural matters, and a good deal of the time of the house is occupied in procedural discussion.

I am happy to hear both the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) speak as they have spoken; and I can assure them that I thoroughly agree that the time has come when a committee might discuss with Mr. Speaker the procedures and rules of the house. When the report is brought into the house, I hope that a better fate will befall it than that which has befallen similar reports in years past.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I hesitate to attempt to speak today, because I may have difficulty in making myself understood.

Mr. Knowles: We are glad you are back.

Mr. Low: I feel I should say just a word about the amendment that has been moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I was on the committee which was set up in 1948 for the purpose of revising the rules of the house, along with the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). We discussed at that time a considerable number of suggestions for streamlining the rules of the house and making it possible for us to get through the business with more dispatch. At that time, however, we did not bring back any recommendations to the house, because it was felt that we had not had enough time to go right into a study of the important things that should be done.

I have given a good deal of thought to the matter since that time, and it seems to me that there are five or six important things that we could do, and because there are these five or six important things that we could do to shorten the time of the session I feel like supporting the amendment that has been moved today.

I shall mention briefly what I do think. My own feeling is that we should give consideration first to some organization for setting a time limit on the major debates. The debate on the speech from the throne and the budget debate could be shortened considerably by agreement, by some form of organization that will indicate in advance the time when the vote will be taken. I understand that is done in Britain, and it has been quite successful. It might be tried here.

Consideration should be given to cutting down the time limit on speeches. I do think that if we could cut them to say thirty minutes it might induce some people to do a little more terminable thinking. Unfortunately, not all of us have had training in organization, and too many people fail to go straight to the heart of the problem in their thinking and their speaking, with the result that they go round and round, repetition becomes the order, and we do not get to the point where we can terminate anything at all.

I have always heard that it takes at least three hours to prepare carefully a five-minute speech, and that the longer the speech the shorter the time for preparation. That seems to be the case, all right, and some of the long speeches that we hear in this house would indicate that people had taken very little time to prepare them. If we had had a rule limiting the duration of a speech to thirty minutes we might do a little more preparing and more careful thinking.

I think we could consider too, Mr. Speaker, programming the work of the house for at least two weeks ahead, or possibly something in the nature of that time—ten days to two weeks; this would help the members to know what is coming up so that they could get ready for the debates and be thoroughly prepared. As I have already indicated, thorough preparation would do more to reduce the length of sittings than almost anything else.

Instead of having questions on the orders of the day every day we might consider setting an hour once or twice a week during which members might ask questions of the ministry, and, when that hour is up, go ahead with the regular business of the house whether the questions are finished or not.

Then we might consider a more orderly widespread use of committees to study the estimates. I think we have had quite unusual success in this respect in the external affairs committee. I ask hon. members to note that when these estimates are brought back into the house they will be passed with much more dispatch than almost any estimates that will be brought before us this year, simply because a complete and thorough discussion of them has taken place in the committee. Members of the committee have been perfectly satisfied, or at least they have satisfied themselves, about the proposals for expenditures. They have all the information they want, and when these estimates come back into the house, hon. members will find they will go through much more smoothly and quickly.

These are things that have been in my mind, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to see this committee set up. I should like to see it directed to get to work as soon as possible, with a view to doing the things I have suggested, plus a great many of those the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) have suggested. I support the amendment.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to say a word in connection with this amendment, because, with the members who have spoken, I have been working through the years to try to see if we could not do something toward streamlining the work of the House of Commons. It is not a very easy job or a simple task. We must approach it with that idea in mind, because to speak of general principles is one thing, and to get down to details and to try to get all hon. members to agree is another. But that should not hinder us from making a very earnest and concentrated effort to see if it cannot be done at this time.

I want only to say this. There are three matters in which many of us have been interested in connection with committee work. One is of course the question of the hours of sitting of the house. I would not like to see the house reduce the number of hours of sitting. If we are to have a change, perhaps we might increase them, but make them more convenient for the members. I should think that sittings from one to seven, which I have suggested for many years, might be adopted by the house. It would be a sensible arrangement. It would increase the hours of sitting, but it would increase the convenience of hon. members immensely. It would leave the evenings open for committee meetings, if that were necessary, and it would not interfere with morning committee meetings.

On the question of the length of speeches, I do not know whether that is as serious an issue as I once believed it was. On the other hand it does seem to me that a thirty-minute limit might readily be put on private members generally without affecting their contribution, or affecting prejudicially the work of parliament itself. At one time I suggested twenty minutes, and I am not so sure that I would not be prepared to support and substantiate that position even at this time, because if hon. members would only try to see what can be done in twenty minutes it might be a very good contribution.

On the other hand, what strikes me forcibly is this. When I came into the house some fifteen years ago we had just $500 million of estimates to consider. That is all we spent. A number of hon. members who were here at that time will recall that I thought that was a scandalous amount of money for the Dominion of Canada to be spending. But you see what has happened in the years since. We have increased that to seven times what it was in 1936, and that has its reflection on the length of the sitting of parliament. Moreover, it has an important bearing upon what we do with respect to trying to fit that immense increase of work into our general day-to-day activities. I believe that those who sit on the committee should consider working out a scheme under which general policy would be discussed and decided in this chamber, in the presence of all hon. members; then, the mass of detail should be taken out of the chamber, so far as possible, and placed before committees.

As I said before, it is easy to speak in generalities. Nevertheless it is my view that that is one principle which should be followed. If I had any way of doing it I would tear out the present committee structure, because I think it is antiquated. What was good fifty years ago might not necessarily be good now. I would prefer to see the committee structure changed so that it would relate more closely to the various fields over which ministers of the crown have jurisdiction. In this way, when the estimates of a certain department were brought forward we could send them to the appropriate committee and, so far as detail is concerned, have them dealt with there. However, we would never allow matters of policy to leave this chamber.

This procedure I believe would be of great help, because then we would work in the House of Commons in a discussion of only broad policy, the detail to be discussed in committees. Wherever policy arose, it could be brought back to the House of Commons. Not only would this help tremendously in streamlining our work and materially shortening our sessions, but it would not leave such a heavy load upon those hon. members who take an active part in the work of the session. In addition, it has the distinct advantage of utilizing the vast capacity of the backbenchers, the private members. After all, it is my view that each member should bear his or her fair share of the load of legislation. I realize that it cannot be done on a basis of absolute equality, but we should try to approach that degree of equality so that each member, no matter where he or she may sit, would have a responsibility. I know when I say this that private members are anxious and eager to assume responsibility.

May I conclude by making a suggestion to the Prime Minister. I know, as I am sure he knows, that these suggestions have a habit of dragging along, session after session, with nothing being done about them. This time, when we are unanimous in wanting to do something, let us get the pilot committee started before the end of the present session. I suggest to the Prime Minister that on the first operating day of the fall session, which, I understand, would be the second day, unanimous consent should be sought to set up the committee, with the understanding that within two weeks it report to parliament as to the progress it has made. I should think that within three weeks a recommendation could be made to the house. Then, with such a recommendation before us, let us by way of trial and error, by way of experiment, put into operation for the balance of that session some of those major recommendations made by the committee, so that we may see how they work. If they work well, let us make them permanent. If they do not work well, we can take out those parts which are not found suitable.

I make these suggestions in what I hope has been a constructive way, because no one is more anxious than I am that we make an honest effort to place parliament in a position to handle its business in a modern and efficient manner.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the fifth and only remaining member of the committee which met with your predecessor in 1946, I should like to say a word about the timeliness of the proposal made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). Only last night I was discussing with some of my colleagues a memorandum on this very subject. I believe I am correct when I say that in that memorandum there appeared every one of the suggestions thus far advanced by hon. members of various parties during the course of the discussion this morning.

It must be in the minds of all of us that the difficulty of reforming procedure lies not in the will of the house, not in the will of any party, or in the support we would receive from public opinion; because we realize that we are all of one mind in wishing to do something about the present conditions. Certainly the public would like to see us do something about it. The difficulty, however, is a genuine one, in that we would be changing things which have been in existence for a long time, and which, however badly they worked, still worked; and which, if we changed them, would almost certainly run counter to the views or interests, as they see them, of one group or another, or of individuals. The reason for this was made clear by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). If we were to adopt the practice as well as the rules of the parliament at Westminster today hon. members would be astonished at the curtailment of their rights and liberties—because at Westminster they have very few indeed.

I am sure, however, that without going too far we could make some progress. The greatest single thing we could do, without, I am sure, any dissent, would be to arrive at some kind of timetable with respect to major debates. This would enable us to achieve the objective of the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low), that of being able to announce a program at least a week if not weeks in advance. Because if, as they do at Westminster, we could rely upon having a debate on the address last six or seven days, and no more, then we could say that on the eighth day we would proceed with a definite item of business. Similarly, if twenty-three days were allocated to the discussion of estimates, as obtains at Westminster, then we could say that we would have two days to discuss external affairs, one day for agriculture, and so on, with the opposition groups indicating their preference as to the time to be taken.

That of course would require rationing, as well as a timetable. It would require acquiescence and agreement. It would also require —and I am sure this will be appreciated—a good deal of sensible and constructive leadership on the part of the house leader, which I believe we have, and a great measure of wisdom on the part of Mr. Speaker, of which there can be no doubt; with this it should be possible to have this constructive and desirable suggestion undertaken with all possible haste and with a real sense of fairness which would enable all of us to do in a better way the important job we are here to do.

Mr. J. H. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on record my approval of the suggestion made, and I am happy to learn that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the government are taking it into consideration. My endorsement of the proposal is based upon an experience extending over some time in the House of Commons—at least for a year or two, anyway.

It is my opinion, sir, that members of the house should have some other vocations from which they draw their bread and butter, their daily sustenance, rather than having to rely wholly upon their being members of parliament. For this reason I am opposed to two sessions a year; I do not like that idea at all. I prefer to see members of the House of Commons conducting their private business affairs in such a way as to make it unnecessary for them to have to depend upon their membership in the house for a living. I hope that that condition will continue. Do not let us revert to making this an assembly of men and women who live on their indemnities. I hope that the shortening of the session, which is in the back of the minds of all of us in discussing this particular motion, will be such that we shall be able to get through the business of the house with one session in a year instead of two.

Perhaps that may seem unkind to many men and women who are here, but it is the way I feel about it. I hope that hon. members will appreciate that I am just speaking from the bottom of my heart as a private member. I hope that these changes in the rules and regulations will be such as to allow the members to get back to the private business from which they derive their daily bread and butter.

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, when this committee is set up I hope that one of its recommendations will be that members can get answers to questions. Going back over the last three years I can think of one question in particular that I have put to cabinet ministers and their assistants, but to which I have received no answer. During the debates in the house in connection with margarine I endeavoured on three or four occasions to obtain details as to the ingredients in a pound of margarine and what they would cost. For the last three years I have continued to ask that question on behalf of the farmers I represent, and I have not yet been able to get that information. If cabinet ministers and their assistants were prepared to answer questions, then we would be able to carry on much more efficiently. Only yesterday I tried to get a cabinet minister to answer an honest question; and I hope that when this committee makes its representations, one of them will be to the effect that we can have questions answered in an intelligent manner.

Amendment (Mr. Drew) agreed to.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I move that this house do immediately resolve itself into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of supply.

FREIGHT RATES—REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON TRANSPORTATION—AMENDMENT, MR. ARGUE

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, before you put the motion there is a matter I wish to raise which I suggest is of extreme importance to most sections of Canada. I am concerned at this time with the apparent delay in implementing the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation, and I should like to point out the bad results which may follow, affecting, as they will, at least eight of the ten provinces.

The report of the royal commission was submitted to the government on February 9. During a discussion in the house on the report on April 5 the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) said that an interdepartmental committee had been set up to work out the amendments which would be presented to parliament implementing the main recommendations of the report. On April 24, and again on May 11, I asked the Minister of Transport on the orders of the day whether those amendments would be presented during the present session, and his answer was "I hope so."

On June 4 we had a statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) outlining the government's intentions in reference to this report. As I understand it, the bill dealing with the implementation of this report will not be presented to parliament until the fall session. When it is presented to parliament a committee will be set up which will hear representations from interested parties. After that committee has listened to many representations over a long period of time something may be done toward implementing the report.

I want to point out to the house and to the government that while this delay is continuing, the railroads have applied for a five per cent increase and a further fifteen per cent increase in freight rates. In other words, before any action is taken by this parliament to bring about an equalization of freight rates we are likely to be faced with further large horizontal increases in existing freight rates. Since 1948 there have been four separate horizontal increases in freight rates totalling forty-five per cent. If the present applications for two separate increases are agreed to they will result in a horizontal increase since 1948 of some seventy-four per cent. In other words, the questions which the royal commission was to solve are likely to be further aggravated.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member is now discussing an application which is before the board of transport commissioners. That is a court of record and it has been ruled in the house on previous occasions that matters before the board of transport commissioners cannot be discussed in the house.

Mr. Argue: I realize that, Mr. Speaker, and I shall bow to your ruling. I referred to what was before the board of transport commissioners only to point out the great necessity of this government doing something soon toward implementing the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation.

There is another matter about which I wish to protest, and this is not the subject of an application to the board of transport commissioners. It is that the general inquiry into freight rates has once again been postponed. This general inquiry was first initiated as a result of an order in council passed by the government on April 7, 1948. According to the report of the royal commission on transportation, that general freight rates inquiry must be proceeded with and completed before equalization can take place. I should like to read recommendation No. 5, appearing on page 125 of the report of the commission, as follows:

> The objective of equalization is something which can only be attained after considerable study by the board and by the railways. Undoubtedly many serious problems are involved, for example the effect that the proposals may have on railway revenues, on established industries and on trade and market patterns. All of these things are matters of the utmost importance. Having regard to the large number of rate changes which will be involved, the problem is one peculiarly for the board to resolve finally after the general freight rate investigation and after all parties who may be affected by the proposals have had an opportunity of being heard.

In other words, according to the main part of the report of the royal commission, equalization can be brought about only after the completion of the general inquiry. At the present time the general freight rates inquiry has apparently been postponed indefinitely. In answer to a question put by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) said, as recorded at page 3028 of Hansard:

> I saw in the press report this morning that the board of transport commissioners had adjourned until September 10 its general investigation into freight rates. I do not know what the reasons are, other than those which I saw reported. I presume that the railways and the other parties concerned were not prepared to submit evidence until such time as the legislation concerning equalization had been studied by the house.

If the Minister of Transport is right as to the reason he gave for the postponement of the general freight rates inquiry, then presumably the board will have to postpone the inquiry to a date later than September 10, because the fall session will not start until the first part of October, and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has already said that before the house decides on what we are going to do with the legislation a committee of the house will be set up to hear representations by the parties concerned. In other words, we do not appear to be any nearer the solution of this perennial problem of discriminating freight rates than we were on April 7, 1948, when the government ordered a general inquiry.

During the period that the royal commission was considering its report and hearing evidence, we had three separate horizontal increases in freight rates. As the government has decided not to implement the report immediately it of course follows that the government has left the door open for further increases in freight rates. If we are to have our freight rates equalized so that the people of all provinces of Canada will be treated equitably, then the only way that can be done is for the government to implement the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation, and then for the board of transport commissioners not to postpone but to continue its general inquiry into freight rates which the royal commission says will be necessary before equalization can take place. For that reason I wish to move in amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright):

> That all the words after the word "That" to the end of the question be struck out and that the following words be substituted therefor:
> "in the opinion of this house no further increases in freight rates should become effective prior to consideration by parliament of the government's proposed legislation arising out of the report of the royal commission on transportation."

I might say that the wording of the amendment is based upon the provisions of section 52 of the Railway Act, which allows the governor in council to amend or postpone the coming into effect of increases in freight rates. If the amendment were passed, all it would do would be to guarantee to people residing in eight of the provinces of Canada that there would be no further increases in discriminatory freight rates until such time as parliament had dealt with the royal commission report and the legislation based thereon.

I suggest that this is a reasonable request. I suggest it is the very least that the government should be prepared to do at this time. In looking over the revenue picture of the railway companies, I would say that there is no immediate need for the government to oppose this amendment. The railway companies certainly are in a good financial position at the present time and would not suffer if such an amendment were supported by the government. The latest report of the dominion bureau of statistics for May 30 has this to say about railway operating revenues in Canada:

> Operating revenues of Canadian railways in February this year totalled $76,545,419—a new peak for the month—as compared with $65,724,122 in the same month last year. Operating expenses rose to $72,084,579 from $64,854,156 a year ago, while operating income, which had shown a loss of $1,486,997 in February last year, rose to a credit of $258,037, the first for the month since 1946.

In other words, the position of the railways in February of this year was better than their position in February of any previous year as far back as 1946. Therefore I say again that the adoption of this amendment by the government would not in any way jeopardize the financial position of the railways, but at the same time it would guarantee to the people in eight of the Canadian provinces that there would be no further increase in discriminatory freight rates until such time as the legislation based on the report of the royal commission had been passed by parliament.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Just before the house rose at noon, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) moved an amendment which reads as follows:

That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out and that the following words be substituted therefor:

"in the opinion of this house no further increases in freight rates should become effective prior to consideration by parliament of the government's proposed legislation arising out of the report of the royal commission on transportation."

When the hon. member for Assiniboia was speaking I referred to the fact that an application for an increase in freight rates was pending before the board of transport commissioners, and I ruled that the subject could not be discussed in this house while an application was before the board.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I just say a word, Mr. Speaker, before you make a definite ruling? If you will read the amendment carefully, as I have no doubt you have, you will note that it reads in part:

"in the opinion of this house no further increases in freight rates should become effective prior to consideration by parliament of the government's proposed legislation arising out of the report of the royal commission on transportation."

It does not refer to any application now before the board, but merely anticipates that applications may be placed before the board, not only the one which the newspapers say is now before the board but others, before parliament has had an opportunity of considering the report of the royal commission on transportation.

The governor general in council has the power, under the Railway Act, to oppose the coming into effect of any recommendation of the board. What we have in mind is that since we know, from what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and others on the government benches have said, that legislation is to be introduced into this parliament soon, probably at the special session in the autumn, we ask, not that the board of transport commissioners shall not make a recommendation but that, if the board does make a recommendation on any application that may be before the board, such decision shall not become effective until parliament has had an opportunity of studying the legislation which the government proposes to bring down. We hope this legislation will remove some of the discrimination that is now implicit in any increase in rates that may be permitted because of an application by the railways.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the manner in which this amendment is worded does not refer to any specific application before the board of railway commissioners but is general in its character, and simply requests that the government do not permit any increases to become effective—the government having the power to prevent that—until such time as parliament has an opportunity of considering the proposed legislation which will arise out of the report of the royal commission on transportation.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): May I be allowed to speak to the point? The leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) is simply explaining the effect of the amendment, which to my mind is clearly out of order. The explanation which he has made of it does not at all strengthen the legality of the amendment. My reason for saying that is twofold. First, I have in my hand an application made by the Railway Association of Canada, dated December 21, 1950, for an increase in freight rates of something in the neighbourhood of five per cent. That application was heard but the decision has not yet been rendered. Therefore, this application is still pending. I have before me also an additional application made to the board on April 23, 1951, for an increase in freight rates dependent upon the forty-hour week which is to become effective soon.

Mr. Knowles: It is already in effect.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right, it became effective on June 1. This matter is now squarely before the board of transport commissioners, and I believe the hearings were begun today. There can be no doubt but that these two applications are sub judice and should not be discussed.

This amendment reads as follows:

"in the opinion of this house no further increases in freight rates should become effective prior to consideration by parliament of the government's proposed legislation arising out of the report of the royal commission on transportation."

These two applications are requests for further increases. The leader of the C.C.F. party says "Oh well, that is not before the board and all we want is to prohibit the effective date of the decision until after parliament has dealt with the recommendations of the royal commission". That is exactly the point. It is unconstitutional because it is an interference with the rights of a court of record. My hon. friends might just as well say that a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada should not be made effective because of amendments which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) wishes to introduce. I believe that the house would agree that would be entirely out of order. The board of transport commissioners is a court of record. If we were to adopt this amendment, we would be interfering with the right of the board of transport commissioners to make increases effective on a certain date. As a matter of fact, the board might decide against the increase altogether, and this motion would be superfluous.

I, therefore, hold to the practice which has always been approved, that matters which are sub judice should not be discussed. I submit with deference that this amendment is entirely out of order.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) has had something to say about the effect of this amendment being to interfere with the right of the board of transport commissioners to put into effect any change in rates that might be decided upon. In reply, may I say that section 52 of the Railway Act gives to the governor in council the undoubted right to interfere along those lines. What my colleague the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) is asking in this amendment is that parliament give a directive not to the board of transport commissioners but to the government, bearing in mind the authority that the governor in council has under section 52 of the Railway Act. I submit that the point of distinction that is to be made is that the amendment as worded is not directed toward the board of transport commissioners in any way. It is not an amendment which says that the board of transport commissioners should not approve an application. It is rather an amendment which expresses an opinion of this house as to what the government should do.

May I also draw to Your Honour's attention the fact that back four or five years ago when there was before the board of transport commissioners an application for one of these increases—I believe it was the 22 per cent increase—an attempt was made in this house to discuss the question. The ruling of that day was that that specific application for a 22 per cent increase could not be discussed; but hon. members—and I recall in particular Mr. Walter Tucker among others who were here at the time, as well as members on this side of the house—were permitted to discuss the general question as to whether or not there should be any increase in freight rates. The hon. member for Assiniboia, in drafting his amendment, has clearly stayed away from the specific application that is now before the board of transport commissioners. In fact, when he says "no further increases" he is referring to some that might be made later and is simply asking that this parliament express its opinion to the government.

The other point I should like to make is this, Mr. Speaker. Surely there should be some way in which parliament, the highest court of this land, can discuss a matter as important as that of railway freight rates. Yet, as things have been going, applications to the board of transport commissioners for increases in freight rates are perennial. The railways are always over there before the board. The result is that the strict application of the rule, as has been suggested, would mean that parliament is practically precluded from discussing this important matter. I submit that that fact must be taken into consideration. I agree that parliament is confronted with the obligation not to discuss any application that is there. But I do think that parliament should be able to discuss in general terms the question of whether or not there should be any increases in freight rates.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that what this amendment is doing is not to express any opinion on what the board of transport commissioners is doing or is not doing. What the opinion of this parliament as to what this amendment seeks to do is to express the government should do; and it asks that the government should not allow any increase to become effective prior to the time that parliament considers legislation arising out of the report of the Turgeon commission. I believe the amendment is in order.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think that the point that is raised by this proposed amendment does not produce the result that is suggested by the hon. member who has just spoken. It is all very well to say that this is simply an instruction to the government; but the fact is that the hon. member has indicated that the purpose of the motion is to express the view that a certain decision shall be reached by this house. This parliament, in its collective judgment, has set up a board of transport commissioners. That board of transport commissioners is set up for the purpose of determining freight rates and other matters of that kind. I have contended in the past, and shall contend at the time that this subject is before the house, that what we want is a more flexible and a more continuously-operating board of transport commissioners. Certainly I would very much regret to see any practice develop which had the effect of slowing down rather than expediting the proceedings of the board of transport commissioners. We may or may not agree with them, but that is the vehicle we have provided to deal with a matter of this kind; and I do not think that parliament should provide what actually amounts to an alternative method. For that reason I shall oppose the motion.

Mr. Speaker: The purpose of the amendment has been clearly placed before the house by the hon. members who have spoken. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has explained that the purpose of the amendment is to present the view of parliament to the government in a general way, and not referring specifically to any application which is before the board of transport commissioners. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) has pointed out that there is an application pending before the board of transport commissioners and that, in his opinion, this amendment must in some way refer to that application. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said that this amendment does not directly relate to the present application before the board but that it refers to increases which may from time to time be approved by the board. I would think that if it refers to increases from time to time, it would necessarily include the present application for increase. It is therefore difficult for me to see how the present application for an increase can be divorced from the words of the amendment.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has stated that he thinks there should be some method whereby parliament can discuss freight rates and other matters when they are before the board. That may or may not be advisable. A number of members may or may not agree with him. That matter, however, is not one which the Speaker can decide. That is a matter which parliament must decide if it feels inclined to do so. There is a citation in May's Parliamentary Practice, fourteenth edition, at page 430, which reads as follows:

> Matters awaiting the adjudication of a court of law should not be brought forward in debate.

Then in Beauchesne's third edition, citation 246 (c), it is stated:

> . . . it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member while speaking, must not:
> (c) refer to any matter on which a judicial decision is pending.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has stated that a decision on freight rates is pending before the board of transport commissioners. He has certain views regarding the functions and powers of the board; but again that is a matter which parliament must decide. He has, however, expressed the opinion that the matter of freight rates is before the board and I think he would go so far as to say that the application cannot be separated entirely from the amendment.

I realize the importance of this matter and I sympathize with hon. members who would like to discuss this motion with respect to freight rates at this time. However, I am bound by the rules of parliament. It has been held that any matters before the board for discussion are sub judice, and cannot be debated in this house until a decision has been reached. I refer hon. members to the Journals of the Canadian House of Commons of 1923 at page 268, and Hansard of March 5, 1947, at pages 1051 and 1052. May I also refer to a ruling which I made when I had the honour of being Deputy Speaker of this house. In fact that is the reference of March 5, 1947. At that time I ruled "that any matter which is before the board for decision is a judicial proceeding within the meaning of the ruling which prohibits debating in this house matters which are sub judice. It is thus unnecessary for me to consider whether the process by which the board will reach its decision is administrative, quasi-judicial or otherwise. This question would be of vital importance only if the tribunal making the decision had not been designated a court of law by parliament".

I realize that the amendment which is now before the house is in general terms. Nevertheless I cannot see how the amendment could be adopted without referring to the application for an increase in freight rates which is at present before the board. In my opinion, this amendment, if carried, would inevitably have an effect upon the present adjudication. This is one of the reasons why the rule has been put into effect. In view of the foregoing, I can only conclude that the present amendment is out of order in that it would be bound to affect the adjudication by a body designated by parliament as a court of record in an issue which is now pending before it, which is contrary to the rule which prohibits discussion of any issue which is sub judice.

Is the house ready for the question?

HARRY ALLEN READ

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): I rise to voice a grievance. My grievance has to do with a southern Alberta boy who entered His Majesty's armed forces of Canada during world war II. The name of this boy is Harry Allen Read. He joined the R.C.A.F. as R-77867 and served his country well, rising in the ranks to become a warrant officer. He was chosen to form a part of the force making the very important attack upon Peenemunde on the night of August 17, 1943, an attack the success of which is believed by many to have changed the whole course of world war II.

Warrant Officer Read at present resides at 66 west 17th avenue, Vancouver, British Columbia.

I am informed by trustworthy authority that W/O Read comes of one of the best of families in Medicine Hat, Alberta. The family is a very wholesome, reliable one, and made their way by hard honest effort. They have never sought to get something for nothing, since they have been known in the area where they reside. The father was a railroader, and remained such until he was honourably retired. A sister won distinction as a trained nurse. Allen was a good, reliable boy and was successful in school. He had a splendid military record.

Before proceeding with this case may I hasten to state that the treatment of veterans generally at the close of world war II has been, in my opinion, incomparably superior to anything accorded the veterans of world war I. Whenever I have had any dealing with officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs I have found them interested, sympathetic, efficient and effective, manifesting diligence in following up to see that veterans are established with the best possible chance of making good.

The present Minister of Veterans Affairs will no doubt desire to improve conditions with sincerity of purpose, as did his immediate predecessor in office. The present minister will, I know, desire to eliminate, as far as may be, all possibility of miscarriage of justice to Canada's veterans. It is with the object of strengthening his hand in all his efforts to combat any forces or influences moving to curtail benefits to veterans, that I bring to the minister's attention the case of W/O Read.

My grievance is, that W/O H. A. Read appears to have been made the victim of a most regrettable miscarriage of justice involving (1) permanent injury to health and strength, with serious physical deformity; (2) constant and often severe pain; (3) gross indignities; and (4) mental torture; and that, moreover, it appears that the government has thus far neglected to provide W/O Read with financial compensation appropriate to the bare necessities of the situation.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

I desire to quote from an article appearing in the Medicine Hat Daily News of August 8, 1944. The article is entitled "Warrant Officer Allen Read portrays panorama of Sweden." I quote two short passages:

> . . . Warrant Officer Allen Read, who returned to his home Sunday after being interned for six and a half months in that country.
> W.O. Read's plane was brought down over southern Sweden and the crew was forced to bail out by parachute, following which they were interned at Falun, Sweden.

And again:

> W.O. Read will spend one month's furlough here before returning to Ottawa where he will receive medical attention for a spine injury received when he came down. He hopes to return to active service.

I cite these two quotations as an indication of the general soundness of the position which I feel called upon to take with respect to the treatment of Warrant Officer Read.

I now desire to read an excerpt from a letter from Mr. A. L. Smith, the former member for Calgary West, whom we all remember. This letter was written on March 1, 1951. It is written to Harry Read. I quote the following excerpt:

> As far as I am concerned you have been treated abominably and without your consent I am immediately sending this letter to Mr. John Blackmore, M.P. for Lethbridge. I do this because I think his son was with you in the ill-fated expedition and has since been killed, and Blackmore and I discussed your problem on numerous occasions.

The letter is signed by A. L. Smith. It will help to show that my complaint is not without at least considerable justification.

I now desire to read a letter from Mr. A. L. Smith to myself, dated March 1, 1951:

> John Blackmore, Esq., M.P.,
> House of Commons,
> Ottawa, Ontario.
> My dear John:
> I am enclosing herewith letters from this young chap Read, whose case I discussed with you on more than one occasion. I really do think this is a case where the D.V.A. should take some special action.
>
> However, I am leaving the matter in your hands, as you will see by the copy of letter that I have written to young Read.
>
> Yours truly,
> A. L. Smith

To set the record straight, it may be wise to give a brief explanation of the reference to my own son. My son, Winston W. Blackmore, referred to in the letter, piloted a bomber in the raid on Peenemunde, Germany, in which raid W/O Read also piloted a bomber, next to that of my son. My son gave his life in the course of the attack on Peenemunde.

It is reported to me, reliably, I believe, that W/O H. A. Read, R-77867, while flying over Sweden, bailed out at approximately 1,500 feet and, owing to the fact that the outer covering of his parachute was caught up in the shroud lines, he could not control his direction of landing, and therefore hit going backwards and rolled over four or five times.

I shall now ask the first of a series of questions:

1. What evidence can the government adduce to disprove the statements in this report?

It is reliably reported to me that after landing, W/O Read walked about four miles, with a painful leg injury, which was treated by a doctor in the small town to which he was taken, and that in full view of some one hundred curiosity seekers his bomb aimer had to assist him to rise, to sit down and to walk, and that his bomb aimer continued to help him around for a few days, after which he managed on his own. My second question is:

2. What evidence can the government adduce to disprove the statements in this report?

Again, it is reported to me, reliably, I believe, that up to March 5, 1951, never in the years before the war or since, had W/O Read been hospitalized or treated by any doctor for a fracture of any kind, or a spinal injury of any sort.

3. What evidence can the government adduce to dispute the statement in this report?

The three statements I have made thus far appear to constitute a serious arraignment of the government.

Again, it is reported to me, reliably, I believe, that W/O Read was invalided home from overseas.

4. Is this true?

5. If so, upon whose recommendation was the decision made to invalid W/O Read home?

6. And if so, upon whose diagnosis was the recommendation made?

7. And upon what evidence was based the diagnosis of W/O Read's case that resulted in the said recommendation?

May I draw to the attention of the house the fact that evidently this airman was considered unfit for service. He was invalided home. There is no evidence whatsoever that he received any effective treatment for the maladies or injuries that caused his being invalided home. If the government can produce evidence to the contrary, it would be well for it to do so. Otherwise it looks to me as though someone in the government who had to do with W/O Read has gravely offended this nation.

It is further reported to me, reliably, I believe, that after being invalided home W/O Read had to wait four months in England before there was space available on a ship, and then a further four months while awaiting posting for discharge at Ottawa, all this time suffering from a painful neck condition, and without any kind of treatment.

8. What evidence can the government adduce to disprove the statements in this report?

9. If the statements referred to in question 8 are true, who made the decisions upon which such apparent gross neglect was based?

10. Upon what principles of government policy were made those decisions referred to in question 9?

11. On what date did W/O Read first report for hospitalization after his discharge?

12. To what agency of the Department of Veterans Affairs?

13. Who was the doctor to whom W/O Read was turned over for diagnosis?

13(a). Who turned him over?

14. Was that doctor a psychiatrist?

15. If so, why should a man having had a physical injury be turned over to a psychiatrist?

Again, it is reported to me that on that occasion, as on previous occasions, no X-ray was taken of W/O Read's spine—which fact, if substantiated, is most astonishing.

16. Can the government adduce evidence to show that the statement in this report is untrue?

17. If not, how does the government explain such apparent callous neglect of ordinary common-sense precautions in dealing with a case such as that of W/O Read, who had suffered a physical injury while landing in a parachute after jumping from an aircraft fifteen hundred feet from the ground?

It is reported to me that in 1947, in Regina, W/O Read, faced with the task of caring for himself in his injured condition, as well as his wife and two little children, approached the Department of Veterans Affairs and begged for care and treatment, and some kind of assistance, but met with absolute refusal.

18. What evidence can the government adduce to disprove the statements contained in this report?

It is reported that W/O Read approached the Department of Veterans Affairs for treatment on at least three occasions in Regina, but was refused, under humiliating circumstances.

Harry Allen Read

19. What evidence can the government adduce to disprove the statements in this report?

It is reported that as late as April 15, 1951—almost seven years after his injury—although W/O Read had several weeks previously gone up to Shaughnessy hospital at Vancouver, seeking admission and treatment for his neck and back, he had been refused admittance by a certain doctor, although outpatient psychiatric treatment was available to him. If there is any truth in that report, then every member must realize that it is an absolutely astonishing situation. Here is a man afflicted with a physical injury who approaches a hospital, desiring to be admitted to treatment for that physical injury, and a psychiatrist has authority to refuse him admission to the hospital, but clears the way to give him psychiatric treatment, as an outpatient!

20. What evidence can the government adduce to disprove these statements?

It is reported to me that after many years of almost heartbreaking neglect W/O Read was finally, on May 17, 1951, admitted to Shaughnessy hospital for a spinal fusion operation, which the doctors decided to delay for some time to see if some physiotherapy might relieve the back pain.

Here is a man who has been abused for seven years and who has finally been admitted to a hospital for a spinal fusion which it would seem could have become necessary only through a serious physical injury to the spine, and which men all the way back through nearly seven years had refused to recognize, and stubbornly refused to conduct an examination of, which quite possibly would have disclosed the difficulty.

21. Does the government deny this report?

It is reported to me that, even at the late date of May 17, 1951, when W/O Read was finally admitted to Shaughnessy, he was classed as a 6A patient, thereby being denied allowances for his wife and children.

22. Does the government question the truthfulness of this report?

23. If not upon what grounds does the government attempt to justify this procedure?

It is reported to me that even as late as June 7, 1951, although W/O Read had by that time been transferred to the George Derby health and occupational centre, New Westminster, B.C., and was receiving something like fitting treatment, there had occurred no reclassification of this veteran patient to enable his wife and children to receive financial support.

24. Does the government deny all this?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Once more, how does the government justify such delay in providing this tortured veteran with at least some small measure of peace of mind?

This is the first reference I have made in this house to H. A. Read. I may say that I have made attempts to obtain redress for this young man, but thus far those attempts have not been rewarded with adequate success.

I am bringing up this matter at the present time so as to give the Minister of Veterans Affairs time in which to probe into this serious case of Warrant Officer Read. I shall eagerly await his answers.

VETERANS AFFAIRS HOSPITAL AT SASKATOON AIRPORT

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the house a matter which may be said to have local application to my own part of the country, but none the less it is of interest to me. Some time ago I addressed a joint question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) concerning the proposed closing of the Department of Veterans Affairs hospital at the airport at Saskatoon, which is commonly known as No. 4. At that time the Minister of Veterans Affairs told me that the government was giving the matter further consideration and a firm decision would be announced in due course. It is because that decision has not been announced that I am tempted today to put upon the record some of the arguments why I think this particular hospital should not be moved to Regina or anywhere else.

Some time ago it was announced that the patients in this hospital would be transferred to Regina. A year or two ago—the former Minister of Veterans Affairs, who is in the house, will remember this—a similar move was under way, but owing to representations made at that time the hospital was continued at its present location. It was shown at that time that such a move would be injudicious and would create hardship for the friends and relatives of the men in that hospital. There are over a hundred of them and their homes are located in the districts served by Saskatoon. These men like to have their relatives able to see them with some facility and frequency.

The argument for closing this D.V.A. hospital at this particular time is that the buildings are needed for defence purposes. That is a good argument if it can be shown that the buildings are actually needed for that purpose. New buildings are being put up on the station. I have received notification that some contracts have been let. I submit that an active treatment unit is and will be necessary at that point. If this building is not used for that purpose, another will have to be provided. I suggest that the government should retain the present building and erect additional buildings for whatever other purposes they may be required.

My next argument is that a fine staff has been built up at this hospital over the years. The representative of the Department of Veterans Affairs, Brigadier Klaehn, has taken a tremendous interest in it. He has justifiable pride in that particular institution. I think the staff consists of about 100 people, and I can break down that number. Is that fine staff to be sacrificed and dispersed? Apart from the doctors there are 20 nurses, 20 orderlies and 20 technicians and skilled workers.

These people are going to be needed at that particular point just a little later. We are told that when the university hospital at Saskatoon is completed these veterans will be moved there, but that hospital is not likely to be ready before early 1953. Where will this staff be at that particular time? We must remember that there is a shortage of this type of technician all over the country. They will be scattered and it will be difficult to assemble them again.

The members of the medical profession have expressed opposition to this change. Some of the representatives of the medical profession attended a protest meeting which was held in my city some time ago and which is referred to in the Star-Phoenix of May 25. They pointed out, first, that the loss of an active treatment hospital in this period of acute bed shortage would affect every institution in the province; second, that some of the active treatment cases could not be transported the necessary 200 miles to Regina and would have to be hospitalized in Saskatoon where the hospitals are already overcrowded. I need not mention the need for housing which would be affected, at least to some small degree, by the closing of this hospital. Another point that was brought up was that those who were taken to Regina would replace civilian sick in that city for whom places could not be found there.

The people were so concerned about this that they held a protest meeting and came to the conclusion that any such move would be bad from the point of view of civil defence. If Saskatoon were to be bombed this hospital would be necessary to take care of military casualties, but even in an emergency which did not affect us directly these facilities would be needed because Saskatoon has been designated as a reception centre for the surrounding district. Why should we close an institution which would be vital in the situation I have just described, but which of course we hope will not develop, either in the immediate future or at any time? It could happen here.

This protest meeting was attended by representatives of such organizations as the Saskatoon board of trade, the Saskatchewan associated boards of trade, the medical profession, the Canadian Legion and the general public. It was agreed unanimously that if this hospital disappears as such it would cost as much to convert the seven buildings into quarters and an air force hospital as it would to erect a new building.

It is not only the people in my own particular town who are concerned about this; the people throughout the whole district have expressed themselves in connection with this matter. The Prince Albert branch of the Canadian Legion sent assurances to the Saskatoon branch No. 63 of the Legion of its active support in opposing any move to close these hospital facilities. As to the Saskatoon branch of the Legion, I have here a copy of a resolution which was passed and sent to the Department of National Defence and the Department of Veterans Affairs. I also have a circular letter sent out by the patients under date of March 22, 1949. This was at a time when the original proposal to close the hospital was made known. The patients were very concerned. They had been accustomed to having their relatives come to visit them there. May I say these are all men who suffered injury through their contribution to the cause of this nation in the last war. They feared at that time that they were to be moved, and in a letter addressed to Legion branches, and indeed to members of parliament, they made a touching appeal to be allowed to remain where they were so that they could be available to their friends. They are asking now that no change be made in the present situation at least until the veterans wing of the Saskatchewan university hospital is completed when they could be moved there together with the staff which is in attendance upon them at the present time.

I should like to put on the record at least a part of the resolution which was passed by Saskatoon branch 63 of the Legion. It is as follows:

Whereas the closing of the D.V.A. hospital in Saskatoon will create a serious hardship on relatives and friends living in northern Saskatchewan who wish to visit veterans undergoing treatment in Regina general hospital, by reason of increased costs of transportation and loss of time in travelling the longer distance.

And whereas there is no alternative accommodation available in Saskatoon . . .

I am just reading a part of it so as to make my point and not take too much of the time of the house.

And whereas hospital accommodation throughout Saskatchewan is now taxed beyond its limits, which situation the closing of the D.V.A. hospital in Saskatoon will further aggravate;

And whereas the present staff of the D.V.A. hospital in Saskatoon, numbering 106, is composed largely of older veterans, many of whom will find it extremely difficult to secure employment of the type they can perform due to such ages and disabilities;

And whereas many of these employees own their own homes in Saskatoon or are purchasing them . . .

And whereas there is plenty of land available to construct such additional buildings as may be required by the R.C.A.F. station in Saskatoon;

And whereas it is not likely that the veterans wing of the university hospital will be ready for occupancy until late in 1953—

That is their estimate, and of course it can only be a guess.

Therefore be it resolved: This Saskatoon branch No. 63 of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League strenuously opposes the closing of the D.V.A. hospital as additional accommodation for potential R.C.A.F. patients can be provided with very little expenditure by utilizing another available building outside the confines of the present R.C.A.F. station but adjacent to the present hospital, and we therefore urge that the present D.V.A. hospital remain in operation until such time as the veterans wing of the university hospital is ready for occupancy by veterans requiring remedial treatment, and we further urge that the proposed building of a veterans home in Saskatoon be proceeded with to provide accommodation, supervision and attention for veterans requiring veteran care (class 6) so that when the present D.V.A. hospital is closed such veterans may be assured of the care to which they are entitled in a departmental operated home.

With respect to the last reference to the need for a veterans home, that is something that I would urge upon the department and the government. It is a thing we have needed there for a very long time. In view of the representations that have been made by these organizations, by individuals, and by members of parliament of all political faiths, because I know that such representations have been made by them, I hope that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and his colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) may be successful in urging upon the government that the hospital be left as it is at least until these other circumstances, such as additional and necessary room, are cleared up.

FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES OF FRUIT FARMERS OF OKANAGAN VALLEY

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I too should like to bring a grievance before the house, and I do so on behalf of the fruit farmers of the Okanagan valley. The grievance has to do with the difficulties they are having at the present time in financing, and particularly in raising mortgages or loans on their farms. I refer especially to the farmers who suffered heavy losses because of the frost a year and a half ago. Naturally these people, having lost a good deal of their assets, are not very attractive to the orthodox organizations for making capital loans, especially to the banks. I well remember that a short time ago the banks were advertising very widely throughout the dominion, particularly in our own province, to this effect: Visit your friendly banker; call on your friendly banker for assistance, aid or advice; lending money is our business; bring your problems to your banker; and so on. What they were trying to emphasize was: This is your bank; we are here to help you along.

I feel that the public were beginning to fall for that type of advertising and were really beginning to think that the bankers were nice friendly people. I feel that this policy brought a great deal of progress and prosperity to our dominion. The homes of the people, farms and farm buildings were improved. New equipment was purchased, and both town and rural areas showed the benefits of the new prosperity brought about through ability to borrow from the banks. Young people got married with the hope and faith that they had a friendly bank behind them for support. Farmers also felt that they had the added security of being able to deal not only with the banks but with the farm loan board which also showed a great deal of friendliness at that time. The board was even more generous than the banks, and it was meant to be. I feel its object is to build up our farm economy by financial assistance.

All avenues of capital loans functioned well in the few years of prosperity since the war, and to a certain extent during the war. To some extent the use of capital loans obtained through the farm loan board and the banks was the cause of our prosperity, but for sheer inconsistency the laws governing the granting of capital loans are a puzzle to me. Immediately people are really in need of financial help as they are today, of the friendly banker or a benevolent farm loan board, these very people draw right back into their shells and place a most unfriendly sign at the entrance, borrowers not wanted.

According to information I have just received from a very reliable source in my riding, loans are ten times more difficult to obtain now than they were a year ago. The house is fully aware of the disaster that befell the fruit growers of the Okanagan valley a year and a half ago as a result of frost damage causing losses running into millions of dollars. Some farmers were placed in the unhappy position of not being able to win even a smile from the friendly banker, but they thought that surely they had a friend in the farm loan board.

The federal government had already refused direct financial assistance to rehabilitate these unfortunate victims of what to my mind was an act of nature beyond their control. I feel that individuals in our valley suffered as much as if not more than individuals suffered in other disasters of recent times, for example, the Fraser valley, Rimouski, Winnipeg, Cabano, and so on. In these latter cases the government did generously assist, but in the case of the tree fruit growers there was no assistance forthcoming from the federal government. However, these farmers were encouraged to believe, and the information they received led them to believe, that government agencies such as the farm loan board would soften the blow by relaxing their usual credit requirements somewhat. Even that hope is now dashed to the ground. My information is that the farm loan board is turning down applications for loans one after the other every week.

There may be cases where such action is warranted, but there are many good hard-working farmers who are urgently in need of money and cannot obtain it from the farm loan board. I am not discussing the banks because that is hopeless. I would ask the government to change its policy and instruct its agents in that area to make generous loans based on the character and the ability of the applicant rather than on his assets. I have told you already that they have no assets. They have not the asset requirements for a loan, and I have already explained why. The people there are seeking loans to re-establish themselves. The people seeking these loans are the finest types of citizens to be found anywhere in Canada. They will meet their obligations, as they have always met them in the past. Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the government, through you, to act at once by instructing the farm loan board to grant loans to these people on the basis of character and ability, in order to rehabilitate men of known skill and experience. These men have the skill of twenty or thirty years in the growing of fruit, and now they have no trees on which to grow fruit. I feel that rather than waste the money to establish newcomers from central Europe, who in many cases get fed up with the land and go into the larger towns, the government should lend money to these needy people. These people want to stay on the land, and the government should instruct the farm loan board to consider the application of these men on a different basis from that of the ordinary applicant for a farm loan. I feel sure that if the government will send out instructions to reconsider the applications of those turned down, they will re-establish a fine bunch of farmers on some of the finest farms in Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

56. Departmental administration, $208,564.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

140. Departmental administration, $281,298.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned last evening I was discussing the subject of the Newfoundland seal fishery and what had happened during the past season, owing to a number of foreign ships entirely disregarding the sealing laws. A cruel slaughter had taken place, and it was in that connection that I closed my remarks. It is quite evident, Mr. Chairman, that the whole sealing industry is being gravely imperilled by what took place last year, and what may very well take place again in the years to come. It is for that reason that I hope the commission that has been set up, the north-west Atlantic fisheries conservation commission, discussed this topic at their last meeting in Washington a short time ago. The Canadian representatives on that commission are excellent men. I believe they are the deputy minister, Mr. Bates, Mr. Gushue of the Newfoundland fisheries board, and the past president of the fisheries advisory board, Mr. J. H. McKichan. I do hope that they have taken this matter in hand. The Norwegian representatives were present at the meeting, and I hope they discussed it, Mr. Chairman, because unless there has been some international agreement on this matter it appears to me as though Canada will have to step in quite strongly, otherwise not only are we going to have that happen again but we shall also have foreign trawlers coming in to the Grand Banks and imperilling the lives of Canadian trawler operators. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I do say that if nothing has been done in the way of an international agreement, Canada should step in and take control of the waters in which our cod fishery and seal fishery are conducted. I trust the minister will refer to that when he speaks.

There is another angle on this fisheries problem to which I referred before on a couple of occasions, and that is the question of salmon conservation. When I refer to salmon conservation, I am referring to the Atlantic salmon and not the Pacific. In that connection, the annual report of the fisheries research board of Canada for 1949 at page 41, appendix II, has this to say under the heading

"Fish (Salmon) Management, by A. G. Huntsman". He is referring to the low catches of salmon in particular in Shubenacadie lake in Nova Scotia. This is what he says:

Apart from this, the stock of fish may be low, since natural stocks of salmon in southern waters both in Europe and North America have been lower during the past decade than ever before known.

That again is a very serious matter. I appreciate that the fisheries board have been taking a number of steps by way of distributing young salmon, but I believe they have to go further to the root of this matter and try to take care of it in a natural way. The suggestion I made before—I do not know whether the minister approved of it, but I am going to make it again—is in this form. I suggest that he take a river, particularly a river such as the Gander river in Newfoundland, and I suggest it for two or three reasons. It is a large river and covers a large stock of salmon. It is intensively fished by sportsmen and tourists. The approaches to that river are quite narrow, and very easily overseen. There probably would be about twenty fishermen fishing at the approaches to the river—I mean commercial fishermen. They take a very large amount of salmon. I feel, Mr. Chairman, it would be much cheaper for the department to subsidize these fishermen not to catch fish than it would be to operate a fish hatchery. It would be well worth the experiment for a year or two at the very most. Over three or four years you may have to pay a man the average value of his salmon catch. It might be about $400 per person per year, but I doubt very much whether it would go beyond that. The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay would be in a better position to describe the actual amount than I am, but I believe that would be the figure. If we say there are twenty of those fishermen at $400 each, that would be a very small amount indeed to pay for an experiment of this type. I would heartily recommend it to the minister for his serious consideration.

Another angle in connection with salmon conservation results is dealt with in the report from which I previously quoted at page 42. Mr. Huntsman is referring to young salmon and he says:

It may be possible to increase the numbers of native smolt—

As the minister knows and I imagine hon. members know the "smolt" is a young salmon, the next degree to a parr.

—that descend from the streams, by largely eliminating the eels that prey extensively on the parr in the streams. It is now concluded that there is no likelihood of selling the eels to offset part of the cost of capture.

[Mr. Higgins.]

Consequently, simple and cheap methods of catching and using them on the spot to enrich the comparatively barren streams are being sought. This is to convert the parr's enemy into fertilizer to increase its food.

I think that is a suggestion that is well worthy of consideration because, as the minister and his associates well know, one of the greatest enemies that the salmon has is this particular type of eel that attacks not only the mature salmon itself but the young parr and the young smolt in great numbers indeed. If some scheme could be worked out whereby these eels can be caught and made into fertilizer to enrich the streams, I think that would be a wonderful way indeed to handle the problem.

I have only one more general observation to make before I can get down to some problems that I want to put to the minister. As he himself outlined some time ago on three or four occasions, I believe, Canadians eat annually approximately ten pounds of fish per person as compared with a per capita consumption of 45 pounds annually by Europeans. That, Mr. Chairman, is just about the ratio in which fisheries problems rate with the government of this country as compared, we will say, with those of agriculture.

The fishing industry is the oldest North American industry, but the past century has shown a marked contrast in the development of fisheries and the development of agriculture in this country. As we all appreciate, agriculture has a huge national effort behind it. All we have to do is to look at the expenditures of the Department of Agriculture, and these various services—the experimental farms and the illustration stations—and we can see the truth of that statement borne out. But when we look at the fisheries, what do we find? It is the neglected stepchild of the government, unwanted and unloved. I will concede, of course, in all honesty and sincerity, that under the present minister and his department great steps indeed have been made with regard to the outlook for the fisheries and in the interest that is being shown in them by members of this parliament. Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, the fisheries are not receiving the treatment they should receive from this dominion. As I say, I appreciate the work the minister and his associates have done but it seems to me that it is going to be a long haul before the fisheries are put in their proper position.

One of the great problems of the industry is one that the minister has been stressing on more than one occasion, namely the problem of conservation. I have already referred to it briefly, and I referred to the international northwest Atlantic fisheries conservation convention, and the establishment of the international commission. I understand that at the next meeting it is going to make a decision, one way or the other, that either Halifax or St. John's, Newfoundland, will be the established headquarters of the commission. I do not want to miss the chance to put in a plug for St. John's. In this case I can do it in all honesty. Of the two places, I think that St. John's would be the more suitable. I do not know what the Nova Scotia members will say about that.

In that organization I understand that Canada, Denmark, Iceland, the United Kingdom, the United States and Portugal are at present members and that France, Italy, Norway and Spain have not yet signified their agreement to ratify the Atlantic fisheries conservation convention. That is the last information I have, but the minister probably has further information in that connection. As I see it, the importance of that commission, particularly in reference to the fisheries that we usually associate with the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, is indeed great; because the indications are that of recent years there is a serious depletion taking place on those banks. In that connection, I only recently read an editorial in the Daily News, a small part of which I am going to read, which strikes me as most important. Complaint was made of the great damage done to the fisheries by the wastage of young fish being caught on the Grand Banks and not being made use of. All these nations whose representatives are taking the fish are, as I say, or hope to be, members of this convention. This is part of the editorial from the Daily News of April 26:

> Reports from the Grand Banks of wasteful fishing methods have assumed serious proportions and indicate the urgency of bringing about sensible regulation as a means of conservation. The wastage of young fish taken in trawls has been described as little short of appalling and its continuation is bound to exercise harmful effects upon the resources of the Newfoundland banks.

The minister is well aware of the situation. He saw what fishing did on the American banks. He saw the tremendous damage that has been done to those banks by overfishing. I believe that, to all intents and purposes, they are almost useless as compared with their value in the past. Certainly we do not want to have that take place with regard to the Newfoundland Grand Banks which are so important to the economy in the whole of Canada in the matter of fisheries.

The last time that I was speaking on this matter, I believe that I referred to what somebody had written about the Grand Banks, to the effect that they were like a meeting of the United Nations in the daytime, there were flags of so many various types. The latest description comes only the other day. One of the skippers makes this comment. So great is the congestion on the fishing grounds that one Newfoundland dragger skipper recently had compared the banks at night to a well-lighted Christmas tree. It is therefore easy to see why measures must be taken, and taken quickly, if the heritage that we know as the Grand Banks of Newfoundland is going to be successfully preserved.

The other part of the editorial to which I referred is also important. In the editorial in the Daily News of April 26, with respect to the food for fish, it is stated:

> It is clear that the supply of animal proteins is failing to keep pace with demand and that fish will have to be consumed in far greater quantities in the future. But the supply of fish can also fall much below the demand if the principal ocean reserves are not carefully conserved and ratification of the Atlantic convention by all the countries concerned is the only common-sense and efficient way in which this can be achieved.

That is all I wish to say on the general subject itself. I now want to go into a few particular matters with the minister, in the hope that he may see his way clear to comment on them in passing. He made a broadcast on October 27 of last year over the C.B.C. station in Newfoundland, in which he made some pertinent comments on the fisheries which I want to draw to his attention and concerning which I want to ask him some questions. At that time the announcement had been made of price support for Labrador fish. This is what the minister said:

> We're arranging a plan to let the salt codfish association and NAFEL take in the fish from the fishermen right away. The government, through the prices support board, is giving a guarantee to the trade that will allow them to give to fishermen an initial payment of $7 per quintal on the genuine Labrador fish of either semi-dry or ordinary cure. Mark you, I want to stress that this is an initial payment. The merchants will take in this fish, will process and pack it for market at cost. They are anxious to help solve the problem and they have agreed to handle the fish at no profit to themselves.

Rightly or wrongly, that was understood to mean what the minister at that time said, namely, that there would be no profit of any kind to the merchants taking in that fish. I agree, Mr. Chairman, that that was contrary to the way business has to be done and certainly contrary to what most people expect, but at all events that is what the minister said. In an order for return to a question of mine which was tabled the other day, the department does give an entirely different picture. The price paid for handling costs of these $7 a quintal fish is given. The question was:

What were the arrangements made with exporters or others for handling the fish produced by the fishermen?

The answer was as follows:

Merchants

The following costs, f.a.s. bulk per quintal, for the handling of the fish including labour, overhead, cartage, wharfage and shrinkage, by areas, were allowed: St. John's $2.43; Bonavista $2.07; Conception Bay $2.32; North of Cape Bonavista $1.92.

It might be simpler to put the small table on Hansard, as it is, because the minister has it already, if there is no objection.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Higgins: That is all right so far as Labrador is concerned. When the minister is replying perhaps he will tell me when it is proposed to make this extra payment to which he refers in his statement. I take it the initial payment is $7. Are the Labrador fishermen to be paid any more? That dealt with the Labrador fish. In the same broadcast the minister referred to the shore fish and he said this:

I'll turn now to the shore fish. Substantial sales have already been made by the exporters. There is, however, a higher production in the world at large, and export prices will be down somewhat this year. Our Department of Trade and Commerce is making every effort to keep markets open for our salted fish and it is looking forward to the removal of some of the obstacles that now stand in the way. In the case of shore fish, the prospects are much brighter than for Labrador, and we expect the fishermen to move this fish into the exporters' hands without delay. We will also expect merchants around the coast to give the fishermen a satisfactory price.

The Chairman: Am I to understand that the hon. member has the consent of the committee to have the documents printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mayhew: The statement to which the hon. member is referring is already on Hansard of May 21.

The Chairman: It is already on Hansard.

Mr. Mayhew: I am not objecting to its being put on, but I point out that it is already on Hansard of May 21.

Mr. Higgins: I do not think it is on Hansard. It was an order for return. It did not actually appear on Hansard.

The Chairman: Agreed.

[Mr. Higgins.]

Mr. Higgins: The table follows:

	St. John's	Outports
	$ per qtl.	$ per qtl.
Semi-dry to hard dry	2·02	1·73
Ordinary cure to semi-dry	1·75	1·49
Ordinary cure to hard dry	2·92	2·63
Ordinary cure to 40 per cent	2·20	1·91
Semi-dry to 40 per cent	1·46	1·17

I now continue with the minister's broadcast:

We would ask the fishermen to move the fish under our assurance that the prices support board will review the shore fish situation as the season advances. Should it happen that the fall in price to fishermen has been so great as to merit support action, the board would recommend to government that a deficiency payment be made on shore fish. I am confident that, with this assurance, the fishermen and the salt codfish association will be able to arrange a price that will allow the fisherman to move his fish into the exporters' hands.

I do not believe I have to argue with the minister on that, because I believe that statement means what it says; because in answer to the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine at page 2158 of Hansard the following appears:

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In his statement to the house yesterday the minister said:

It is only under special conditions that government action under the support act should be contemplated. There is, in our opinion, no need for such special action at this time.

Will the minister tell the house whether this statement applies only to the 1951 catch or also to the 1950 catch?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): The hon. member gave me notice of the question. I think it is quite apparent from the statement I made that I was referring to the 1951 catch. We have already given support to the 1950 catch in buying Labrador codfish. We have also agreed to make an investigation of returns to fishermen on shore fish for 1950. That investigation is now proceeding, and it will probably be July before it is finished. We are not going back on anything that we have promised to do. In my statement I was referring to the 1951 season.

Therefore I am going on the assumption that the minister is reviewing the deficiency in payments received by fishermen last year for their fish, and that some time next month the amount they should have received will be made up by the federal government. That I take it is what the guarantee means.

In connection with the fishermen not making their money last year, the minister has announced very little carry-over of last year's fish and suggests that they are starting off with a pretty good year in sight. That I agree with for the reason that the fish is sold. I shall read now from a speech of the president of the Newfoundland salt codfish association, delivered on February 13, 1951. One extract from this speech is quite explanatory of what happened. This is Mr. H. V. Earle speaking:

> In the salt trade we can truthfully say that the position at this time is a great deal improved over what it was nine or ten months ago when we were faced with a very serious carry-over of fish of 1949 production. When some of us were in Ottawa a little later than this time last year, at the invitation of the federal government, discussing the problems facing the industry then, I can safely say that most of us thought the situation was desperate. Today, thanks to the splendid work of NAFEL, the position is very much better and there should not be the same problem to face this spring. It should be remembered that this was only brought about through drastic reductions in the prices of salt fish in the markets with the resultant hardship to fishermen and trade alike. In my opinion, in view of the steadily increasing competition from fish from other countries, we have no reasonable grounds to hope that prices will be much if anything improved during the approaching season.

That was in February and the minister may be better informed in the past couple of months, because he made a statement in May saying that the prospects looked very good for better prices. What I want to draw his attention to again is that it is quite clear that in the sale of that fish last year the fishermen did take very much lower prices than they normally would have, and that applied to merchants as well. In view of his statement I hope he will see to it that no loss will be occasioned to the fishermen or the merchants in that connection.

I have just a few more minor points. In my remarks yesterday I asked for a guaranteed floor price, and I said I thought it should be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $12. I knew that I had seen somewhere some reference to $12 a quintal. I now find it appeared in a special dispatch to the Evening Telegram from a fishermen's organization. The statement comes from a place known as Ireland's Eye. I imagine they have a pretty good eye and they are not so green. This is what the dispatch says. It is dated May 26, 1951:

> A meeting of the Ireland's Eye local of the Newfoundland Federation of Fishermen passed resolutions here this week calling for a floor price of at least $12 per quintal for shore fish, and also called for set prices on essential fishing equipment.

The formal resolution follows. I want to draw that to the minister's attention. That is the price that some sections of the island, at all events, feel should be paid.

There are only two other matters I should like to mention. First of all, on March 6, I asked:

> Has the government given any consideration to amending the Industrial Development Bank Act to enable the bank to make loans for fisheries development?

At that time the answer was given in this way:

> The Industrial Development Bank Act permits the making of loans for the processing of fish. Any amendment to this act to broaden its scope is a matter of government policy, and it is not the practice to forecast government policy in answering questions.

I do not know that the matter of government policy has been cleared up, but perhaps the minister would be prepared to make some further statement in that connection.

The last point I would raise is that old hardy annual, unemployment insurance for fishermen. I do not think I need go further into the arguments, because the minister must be familiar with them. The statement has been made on many occasions as to why unemployment insurance should be granted to fishermen, and he probably is familiar with all the arguments against it, as well. I raise the point now in the hope that he will be able to enlarge upon his reply to a somewhat greater extent than we have had thus far. I hope that when the minister has an opportunity to reply he will deal with these matters.

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Chairman, last night when discussion opened on these estimates I thought I might make a statement. However, the hour was late. It may be however that this is not the proper occasion for my making any lengthy statement with respect to the operations of the Department of Fisheries. I lean to the view that this is the time when hon. members from the different constituencies, who are particularly interested in fishing, might be in a position to ask any questions they have in mind, with the expectation of receiving reasonable answers from me either at once or after consultation with my officials.

I would hope that we might proceed with a discussion of these estimates by first having hon. members make their statements. Whatever questions they ask will be noted. Then, when I believed the debate had run its course, I would be in a position to answer those questions one by one, and in the order in which they had been asked. This would shorten the time. There would be no repetition of questions and answers, as we have had in previous years. However, I have no desire in any way to hurry through the estimates although, like all hon. members, I want to get away, and I certainly would not want to talk too much on my own estimates.

I shall answer some of the hon. member's questions at this time, although I found that in most of what he said he was either making statements as to facts which do not require any reply, or statements which might be controversial—although I did not notice any of that kind in particular.

However, he did refer to seal fishing, and spent considerable time in discussion of that matter. This is an international affair. We have no control of the seas beyond the three-mile limit and, if the Norwegians so wished, they could fish seals outside that limit without committing any violation. I noticed that the hon. member laid emphasis upon the fact that the seals were caught and scalped when they were very young, perhaps only a day old. From the standpoint of conservation it would not matter whether a seal was one day or six months old. There would be no difference, although it may have a certain appeal when the statement is made in the committee that young seals are being slaughtered.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There is a vast difference between a seal one day old and a seal two or three weeks old. The difference is in weight. Therefore there is a difference in the capacity the ship can carry.

Mr. Mayhew: The hon. member has lost my point. I am talking about conservation.

Mr. Higgins: I believe I also said that seals were being killed before the young were delivered.

Mr. Mayhew: I regret the whole incident, and I wish to assure the committee that already representations have been made to Norway in the matter. I believe that before long some arrangements will be made whereby this practice will not continue. However, I would not like to be any too sure that the fishermen from Newfoundland do not engage in the same abuses. If we are going to say very much to Norway we would like to know that our own skirts are clear. My statement today is that we are making progress in connection with this matter of the slaughtering of seals before they are mature. This matter will probably be dealt with at a special meeting to be convened with the other countries concerned, particularly Norway. At any rate I can assure the hon. member that it has not been forgotten and is being attended to.

He also referred to salmon conservation. This matter, whether it refers to the east or west coast, is one in which the department is definitely interested. In Newfoundland this year we have spent a sum of money on stream clearing. Our program, known as the multiple stream development plan, applies to Newfoundland as well as to other parts of eastern Canada and to western Canada. Last year we spent $15,000 on stream clearing and fishways in Newfoundland, and this year we will spend about $30,000 on the same kind of work.

We find a ready sale for this species of fish, and I have said on many occasions in the House of Commons that we should be endeavouring to conserve and propagate such species as fast as we can. I assure the hon. member that in this regard Newfoundland will not be forgotten.

The hon. member asked whether there would be any further payment in connection with Labrador fishermen. Up to date, while we took in 150,000 quintals we have been able to market in the ordinary way some 100,000 quintals. The balance of it was given to different charities. Indications are that there will be a loss of about $327,000 in that operation—and it may be more. I said further that an examination was being made of the returns of fishermen, both from Labrador and shore-caught fish, and that these returns will soon be in. They are beginning to come in now, and they are being tabulated as they come. This tabulation should be completed toward the end of July, at which time we will be able to determine what the returns have been to the fishermen, and what further aid, if any, we will be able to give them.

I want to make only one other statement, which I think can be considered a statement of good intentions. As far as I am concerned, the fishing industry would not be of much interest if I did not have a keen desire to do something to increase the standard of living of the fishermen, no matter in what province of Canada they operate. They should have a standard of living which means simply having a little more than just enough to eat and a place to live in. They engage in an occupation which entails the maximum of gambling but which is of vital interest to this country. I am sure that those who sit behind me and represent other departments of government are just as anxious as I to bring about this result.

The hon. member spoke about unemployment insurance for fishermen. I think he will realize the difficulties that would be encountered in providing unemployment insurance for six or seven months in the year and having a fishing season of only three or four months. While the problem is difficult, it has not been neglected so far as thinking about it and worrying about a solution is concerned.

The hon. member referred also to the industrial bank. The question he raised has been passed on to the Department of Finance; this is something that rests entirely with the industrial development bank and the Minister of Finance. Several parts of the fishing industry in the east and west have been helped by the industrial bank.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I have a particular interest in fishermen and since my constituency joins that of the minister I imagine he is familiar with most of the problems facing the fishermen on the west coast. I was pleased to hear the minister indicate his keen interest in raising the standard of living of the fishermen. I am quite certain that he is sincere and I can say that his endeavours in that direction are appreciated by the fishermen of Vancouver island.

One of the most urgent problems, and something that will contribute to raising the standard of living of the fishermen, is the need of adequate safeguards from the storms and elements in order that boats and equipment may be protected. Many times a fisherman has to watch his boat all night when there is a storm and no adequate protection. That means that he must leave his house and family during what should be a period of rest. In his endeavours to raise the standard of living of the fishermen, I hope the minister will realize that it is essential for their ease of mind that they be provided with reasonable berthage and secure harbours in which to tie up their boats.

There is another matter which I should like to bring to the minister's attention and I am sure he will be able to give me an answer. Toward the end of February I wrote to the department and asked for information concerning the proposed revision of the halibut treaty. The deputy minister replied on February 28 that the halibut commissioner was in hospital, but that as soon as he came out I would have full information and the matter would be discussed. I do not know whether Mr. Clark has come out of hospital, but I sincerely hope that he is better.

Is the minister prepared to make a statement regarding the halibut treaty? During the past few years the season for halibut has been extremely short which has been detrimental to the industry, to the consumer and to the proper conservation of the fish. A short fishing season means that the fisherman must work long hours in order to catch his quota in a limited number of days. When the bulk of the halibut are caught in a couple of weeks the consumer across Canada is able to get fresh halibut only during that short season, the rest of the catch having to be put into cold storage. There is evidence from the biological side that it is not in the interests of conservation that the catch should take place during such a limited period. This is a matter of considerable concern to the fishermen on the west coast. They have asked for what is known as a split season and that the fishing season be extended. I do not know what has happened since, but at the beginning of the year the fishermen expressed concern over the fact that in the draft of the new treaty there was no provision for an adequate curtailment program. Can the minister state what progress has been made with the revision of the halibut treaty and whether any steps will be taken to provide a split season for halibut fishing?

Mr. Mayhew: I think the hon. member has one of the best fishing floats on the west coast which is located in Nanaimo.

Mr. Pearkes: That is only one.

Mr. Mayhew: I think that I was responsible for that being placed there when the hon. member was fighting the battle for freedom in the war. Several others have been built since. The first one that I know of was built in Victoria about 1935, largely at my suggestion when I was a member of the chamber of commerce. It was erected almost opposite my door. I believe that these floats are of great value to the fishermen and their number have been increased since that time.

If we were to go fully into the question of a split season for halibut we would have to get down the maps and go into many details for which I am afraid we have not the time at the present moment. A suggested treaty was drawn up by Canada after the meeting of the halibut commission last fall. Although that has been done, the Americans have not yet seen fit to reply to it, or have not had time to reply. I do not know what the reason is. However, we are engaged this year in what might be called a split season. After all, a split season means two seasons in one. This year we have divided area 2 and taken the part of area 2 where it has been said that the fish come in later and therefore we might be able to get an additional halibut catch. That area has now been set aside for later fishing with no limit, for a period of ten days in order that we may study the results of just what will happen in a case of that kind. I am sure, however, that hon. members will realize that in an operation of this kind the department is guided by the biologists, by what they say is there and what it will be safe to catch.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should also like to say how pleased I was to hear the minister's expression of good intentions towards the fishermen. I have always believed he had those good intentions from the first time that he visited Newfoundland. I believe he realizes the difficulties that fishermen in our part of the country have to face. When we see farmers from Saskatchewan getting up to speak in this house people say: "We are going to hear about wheat", and people are a bit bored hearing about wheat. When a member from Newfoundland gets up people say: "We are going to hear about fish," and I think people are even more bored hearing about fish. There is a big difference between the discussion of wheat and the discussion of fish. The people who grow wheat seem to make fortunes but the people who catch fish always seem to be in difficulties.

Mr. Sinnott: You never grew any wheat.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The fisherman very seldom becomes a wealthy man whereas the farmer very often seems to be surrounded with luxury. I do not intend to cast any reflection on the wheat farmers, but I do want to get the minister to maintain the good will that he has towards fishermen, especially the fishermen of Newfoundland who during the past year and a half have had such a hard time.

The minister was talking about seal fishery. I am not sure that I caught all his remarks correctly, but as I understood him he said that the Norwegian sealers were killing seals only a day old, and he was not satisfied that the Newfoundland fishermen had not been doing the same thing, that we had to have our own skirts clear before we could make any complaint about the conduct of the Norwegian sealers. He also made the remark that, so far as conservation is concerned, it did not matter whether the seal was killed when a day old or a month old, or words to that effect. Sir, it does, and I interjected to that effect when he was speaking. It makes a big difference because of the number of seals which the vessel can take.

The seal grows very rapidly, about two or two and a half pounds a day, so that a seal that is two weeks old weighs about twenty-eight pounds. I am not exactly sure of the number of pounds, but it has been the practice in our country for at least thirty-five years to have a date set when the sealers are allowed to leave port so that they will not get into the seals before the seals are a certain age, and then to have a certain date on which killing may begin. That has been in effect for thirty-five years. When the steamers come in with their catches of seals, as I have often seen them, the average weight would be thirty-five or forty pounds.

It can easily be imagined that a seal a day old is a very small thing comparatively, and I am quite satisfied that our fishermen would not dream of killing seals that age because they would not get any benefit from them. The benefit that the Newfoundland sealers get from the seals has depended on the weight of the fat. Up to a year or two ago they got no credit for the fur. They were paid according to the weight of the fat, and it would be absurd to kill seals when they only weigh a few pounds and not to wait until they have become much heavier and thus provide a much higher return.

In replying to my colleague, the minister said that the returns for the 1950 catch being obtained by the royal commission in Newfoundland and the fisheries prices support board here would be finished about the end of July. That seems to me to be a very long time for the fishermen to have to wait. I understood from the minister and his officials that at the latest these returns would be in by the end of June, and that they should be in a position to make a report within a couple of weeks from that time.

However, I do not intend to deal at any length with this subject because the minister has spoken on it and has given every encouragement to the fishermen of Newfoundland that they can expect to be treated fairly with respect to the 1950 catch. After being persuaded, probably by the Secretary of State, the government gave a guarantee for the Labrador fishermen, and decided that they would keep the shore fishery under review. I have no doubt therefore that they are keeping it under review, and the fishermen expect that. They were very disappointed, however, that when the Secretary of State attended the fishermen's convention in April, there was no statement forthcoming from him. When I asked him in the house if he had been present there in an official capacity he said he had not, and he would not give us any statement of his impressions of that convention, although I suppose it is the most important thing that has taken place in Newfoundland with regard to the fishermen for a great many years.

This year representatives of the fishermen were summoned to St. John's from about 200 localities to hold a convention. They held that convention, and there was no official pronouncement from the government to give them any encouragement with respect to what they may expect as a result of the investigations into the 1950 catch, or any guarantee of what they may expect for the 1951 catch. As long ago as 1833, the governor of that day made a rule that the merchants should, before a certain time in the summer, indicate to the fishermen what price they were going to receive for their catch. The fishermen have no idea, and they should have a very good idea because costs of outfitting fishermen have risen. I have a letter here from which I should like to read one or two sentences. It is from a very intelligent and successful fisherman who says that the cost of fishery supplies has advanced considerably. The letter reads in part:

"Manila rope—"

Which is used very extensively by trap fishermen.

—which sold last year for 28 cents per pound is now 48 cents per pound. Cod trap twine last year was 80 cents per pound; now it is $1.02 per pound.

He wrote this letter on May 13. I do not know if any concessions in the budget would make any difference in these prices. The letter continues:

The price of other fishing essentials has increased considerably. Some are even double the 1950 price.

I have been constantly referring to the plight of the fishermen when this subject has come up for discussion in the house because the fisherman works at a great disadvantage. Unless he can get a fair return for his catch he becomes dependent on the government or he has to leave his home and seek work elsewhere. As a result of the poor fishing in 1950 many fishermen have given up fishing this year. Here is what this man says with regard to the 1950 catch:

To say the least they are disappointed and disillusioned. I am quite sure that not more than fifty per cent of those who fished here in 1950 will return to the fishery again this year. Also, the same attitude seems to prevail elsewhere as may be seen from the northern settlement which announced that they will not launch any boats unless the government guarantees a reasonable price for fish caught in 1951, and the fishermen owner of a schooner and three cod traps, whom a friend of mine found looking for a job at Fort Pepperell.

That is a United States base. Other fishermen have written to me along the same lines. These are men whom I am proud to know, and in whose opinion I have the greatest confidence.

Another gentleman writes that the fishermen's convention was disappointing, because there was no information given about the floor price for the 1951 catch. He said that if they had known what they were likely to get for the 1950 catch they would have gone home satisfied. Then he continues:

From what I can hear the fishing will be better this year anyway. I am going fishing again, but if I have to sell at a low price I expect at least there will be one on the doorstep of the fisheries price support board.

Then he says that they heard a lot about the prices support board during the talk about confederation, but it has not resulted in much benefit to them so far. He continues:

There will be a lot that won't be fishing this year. I heard some of the larger boats have a job to get sharemen, in view of what happened with the fish last fall. If we are let down this year, I fear it will see the end of the dried cod fishery.

These are very serious statements to be coming from a man of mature years, who I know is held in high respect by everyone.

Here is another letter from a man who is a justice of the peace as well as a fisherman. He says:

The cost of outfitting is so high that many of our young fishermen are giving it up and going to Greenland, Goose Bay, etc.

I feel that the minister is really sympathetic, but I have never felt sure that he realizes how important it is that the fishermen not only get a good catch but that they get good prices for the fish. An experiment is being conducted in the district of the Secretary of State by having some long liners out. I do not know why it is so desirable that an event of that kind should take place in the constituency represented by the Secretary of State. There are other places which I believe would be much more suitable. I would say there are places along the southern shore, which incidentally happens to be in my riding, which are really more suitable for an experiment of that nature. The southern shore is much nearer to the banks of Newfoundland than Bonavista. It would seem to me that long liners operating out of ports along the southern shore such as Ferryland, Cape Broyle and Renews would give very much quicker results than any experiment made from Bonavista. However, I am glad to know he is making an experiment with a drier in Bay Bulls.

Mr. Mayhew: That is in your district?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, that is in my district, but it is nearer the banks. Any place which is nearer the banks means a quicker visit to the banks and a quicker return. The banks of Newfoundland have been famous for four hundred and fifty years. The fishermen from Spain, Portugal, Italy, France, England and the United States are coming there every year. These other places are really experimental. However, I am glad to know the minister is making that experiment with the drier. I feel sure that from a scientific standpoint the presence of the nine engineers he has mentioned may be a good thing in the long run. What the fishermen are concerned with now is what they can get from the 1950 catch, and what they can expect for their 1951 catch. I understand that no floor price has been set for the 1951 catch, but as the market promises to be good there is every reason to hope that this year the returns will be better than last year. I want to impress upon the minister the desirability of getting those 1950 returns in as quickly as possible so that if he is going to make a payment, it will be made soon. I have every reason to believe he is going to make a payment to the fishermen because of the extremely low prices they received.

I have sent the minister copies of the returns of some of the fishermen. He has probably seen others, and in any event the fisheries prices support board has seen them. The board knows that after September the price of fish went down. The prices which the fishermen received for their catch were far too low. They were not able to do anything more than barely pay the expenses of the fishery up to that time, and the men had nothing upon which to live during the winter. Fish was selling at an average of $5 or $6 a quintal, which was a drop from the previous year of $13.45. It does not require very much imagination to know that the fishermen are up against it. I want to repeat that the fishery is the most important industry in Newfoundland from the point of view of the wide distribution of the returns when they are good. Fishermen are settled in various places all around Newfoundland, and therefore when good returns come in from the fishery they are spread throughout all those villages. Industry is concentrated; the mines are concentrated, and the paper mills are concentrated; but when the fishery gives good returns there is prosperity throughout the country. I believe the minister realizes that, and I trust that he will do all he can not only for the 1951 season but in regard to the 1950 season, so that the fishermen get the compensation which they need if they are to get a living wage from their catch.

Mr. Bryce: With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I should like to extend to the member for St. John's West an invitation to visit the prairies. I know that I can look after him if he comes to Winnipeg, and I am sure that some of my colleagues in this corner would look after him in Saskatchewan and Alberta. We would try to show him something of the trials and tribulations of the wheat farmer. Perhaps then he would not speak in this house of the wonderful money the wheat farmer makes. We will show him something of the fishing on the prairies. He may not know anything about that, because we do not have an opportunity of raising Cain with the Minister of Fisheries. So far as we are concerned, it is a provincial matter.

I hope the member for St. John's West will accept my invitation. I know that if he does he will not talk about the easy money that the wheat farmers are making, especially when we explain to him about the drought, hail, frost, rust and so many other things that I do not want to take up the time of the house to list.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

141. Information and educational service, $138,572.

Mr. McLure: Item 141 covers information and educational services. I notice there is a decrease in this vote of some $47,000. Evidently the department must have found that its policy was rather out of date. Some drastic change must have been made when they discussed the vote for it. I notice that there is one editor. I do not know what he can be editing now. He is at a salary of $4,000. Then four more information officers are added. The permanent positions have been increased from four to six, at nearly double the total salaries. I think there are a few items in this vote as to which we might have some more details. Possibly we could be told the reason why these expenditures are decreased. If so, let us hear from the minister.

Mr. Mayhew: The decrease here is because, as you know, there was pressure on us to cut down as much as possible. We have cut out one film or picture and we have reduced our advertising. There is a reduction there in the latter item of $15,000. There was an increase there of two information personnel. The total staff is down by four.

Mr. McLure: As to printing costs, have you cut out your advertising to a certain extent? I see that the printing costs there are three times what they used to be or what they were last year. The estimate for printing costs is $22,700 this year as against $7,700 last year. What new publications are being printed or are expected to be printed this year?

Mr. Mayhew: The items about which the hon. gentleman is inquiring are as follows: printing of the department's annual report, $3,000; processing of Trade News, twelve issues, $1,500; printing of Canadian Fish Culture, four issues, $2,000; pamphlets and booklets for school and general educational use, $15,000, and informational material $1,200.

Mr. McLure: There is another item there for films and displays. I notice quite a reduction in that item, from $119,000 last year to $64,500. What part of that campaign did the minister find out was not of any benefit to the department, causing him to make this drastic cut? Was it in the form of the advertising or was it in the displays? Is it in those items that you are now reducing the costs?

Mr. Mayhew: We did not find out that any of those were not of use, but we found out that it was necessary to cut some place and we felt that we could probably spare those better than anything else. We therefore cut out three exhibitions, some films and some advertising.

143. Administrative expenses of the Newfoundland fisheries board, $35,366.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to ask the minister if any fish was sold to Spain last year after Mr. Gushue's visit there. There was supposed to be an agreement made, but was the fish actually shipped?

Mr. Mayhew: No. No fish was sold to Spain.

Mr. Higgins: Why the decrease in that amount? We are on item 143, are we not?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Item 142 did not pass.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Higgins: Item 143 is not carried yet?

The Chairman: No, we are on item 143.

Mr. Higgins: I was asking the minister why there was a decrease in the amount?

Mr. Mayhew: The reason for the decrease here is that practically the whole staff except the board members has been switched over to the federal department. As the hon. member knows, the Department of Fisheries has arranged to transfer to trade and commerce the board's foreign representatives. They were formerly paid by this department and now they are paid by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): You are making fairly rapid progress here, Mr. Chairman. I should like to say something on items 142 and 143. They are under the same general heading. Item 142 shows a large increase. Some of the other estimates are down. That one shows an increase of $91,348. I think we all agree on the necessity for extending the markets for the fisheries, from the standpoint of the producer and of the consumer in every part of Canada. There has been a general complaint that while Canada is a fish-producing country it is not a fish-consuming country in regard to its population. I therefore do not think that there will be much criticism of the minister for increasing the appropriations for marketing, if he is getting results. I should like to know what addition there has been to the staff in his department, and what their special duties are, having regard to this appropriation. I should also like to hear from the minister what results his department is obtaining from its expenditures and its activities.

Mr. Mayhew: At the present time we have the already-mentioned investigation going on in Newfoundland as to the price of shore fish and the returns to fishermen. We also have in Newfoundland the development committee under Sir Albert Walsh. We also have another development committee in Prince Edward Island. As to both of them, we are proud that they are going on and are happy to have them at work. They are working closely with the provincial governments, each representing a joint committee of federal, provincial and trade representatives.

Mr. McLure: The main part of that increase of $91,000 in item 142 or the whole of it is for salaries. There is no increase in anything else.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. McLure: No, not yet.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

General services—

144. Industrial development service, $25,000.

Mr. McLure: What is meant by technical services to fishermen and fishing industry? There does not seem to be any detail at all given here.

Mr. Mayhew: Probably I could read the explanation that is in the book here. In the statement of government policy issued by me on May 5, 1949, the following is included:

The federal government is continuing to expand its research work on the development of the fishing industry. It should also take special steps towards encouraging the application of these scientific results to industry particularly in those areas of the country where development has lagged and the standard of living of the fishermen has consequently suffered. Some of these areas are rich in resources and it is possible to raise the standard of living by improving techniques. The federal government should encourage the application of modern techniques by increasing its technical services to fishermen. It should also consider capital assistance where necessary. In these areas attention should be concentrated on the improvement in fishing methods, in the types of boats and gear, improvement in the shore plants, in the layout of plants, in canning techniques in freezing and in smoking, and in special cases in the encouragement of the establishment of reduction plants. For the further improvement and development of our service during the current year, a position of director of industrial and development services was established, but up to the moment we have not been able to complete the arrangements for the filling of this position.

Where it is being spent this year is in the Bonavista area of Newfoundland. The two ships that we had down there last year were long liners. They were there last year, but they are there this year operating on a truly commercial basis. Last year they were exploring. This year we are endeavouring to see if they can fish profitably in that area.

In answer to the hon. member for St. John's West, may I say that they were sent to Bonavista because the largest number of fishermen was in that area and because the fishermen were farther away from the bank fishing. They had to depend more on getting their catch inshore. We were carrying on the investigation where the greater number of people could have the advantage of seeing the operation for themselves.

Another service that is going on at the present time is at Bay Bulls, where we are installing a drier for light salt fish. If that has as great success as the one that was put in at Fortune for heavy salt fish then I think we will have accomplished a very great deal in these experiments for the people of Newfoundland.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Did the department have two boats in the Bonavista area last year or one?

Mr. Mayhew: We had two boats there last year.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): These are the same two boats?

Mr. Mayhew: They were doing more exploring than fishing.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I was aboard one of the boats and I must say that it was a very fine boat. If they were a little larger they would be better.

Mr. Higgins: What did the operations cost?

Mr. Mayhew: One of the boats down there this year is larger than the one we had there last year.

Mr. Higgins: What did the operation cost?

Mr. Mayhew: Last year it cost $18,000.

Mr. Higgins: Why the reduction to $25,000? Is that the reason?

[Mr. Mayhew.]

Mr. Mayhew: Is the hon. member referring to the total?

Mr. Higgins: The total vote last year was $50,000; this year it is $25,000.

Mr. Mayhew: We have not a director set up for this department, and it was one place where we could obey the commands of the Minister of Finance for some curtailment, and we thought it would be—

Mr. Higgins: It is the director's salary?

Mr. Mayhew: Well, the director's salary is some of it.

Mr. Gibson: I would think that they would be able to catch $25,000 worth of fish with these large boats; otherwise I am badly misinformed about the richness of the fisheries there.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): These items that we have been passing more or less overlap. I asked the minister a question as to the results of the marketing efforts of the department last year, and I had special reference to the production in Nova Scotia. Will he advise the committee what has been the increase or otherwise in the quantity of fish produced in Nova Scotia and marketed in Canada, or marketed in the United States or elsewhere, and what has been the relative value of production in Nova Scotia, say in the last two years.

Mr. Mayhew: At the moment I have not the figures for Nova Scotia separately: I have the figures for the whole east coast. In 1949, $28,927,000; in 1950, it was $32,764,000, quite a substantial increase.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): An increase in value. What about volume?

Mr. Mayhew: The volume was 675,197,000 pounds in 1949; 735,132,000 pounds in 1950. Therefore both the volume and value have had a substantial increase.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I would like to have it for Nova Scotia if the minister could give it. Every part of Nova Scotia is interested in the fishing industry, some of the counties more than others. My county is not greatly interested, except in lobster fishing, smelt and shad fishing. If I could get these figures for the province of Nova Scotia later it would be all right. I do not want to hold up the estimates.

Mr. Mayhew: I would be very happy to get the figures for Nova Scotia for the hon. gentleman and other hon. gentlemen. If I am unable to get them before the estimates are completed I will at least see that they are handed to the hon. member.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Can the minister make a general statement as to the prospects for an increase in the markets for eastern Canadian production of fish, especially Nova Scotia, an increase in the volume of fish that can be sold in Canada or elsewhere, in the year 1951 as compared with say the last two years?

Mr. Mayhew: A little while ago I said that I did not think the minister should be making long speeches. Probably I had better say something generally on this subject. For the year 1950 there has been a general increase in volume, poundage, and dollars all the way across Canada, with the exception of Newfoundland, and there we have the difficulty of marketing to which I will refer later. But the volume both in quantity and dollars is only one indication. In volume this year we are crowding two billion pounds. In dollars we are crowding two hundred million for the industry. I am satisfied that in the year we are approaching, that is, 1951, both these records will be broken. That is certainly the indication at the present time.

In addition to that there is the more substantial measurement: the per capita consumption of fish in Canada has increased approximately one pound in the last year. I think that is more significant than the figures I have quoted to the committee. In my opinion we have not by any means reached the volume that we should be eating in Canada, but nevertheless it is a substantial increase. But what is even more encouraging is the fact that the retail merchants all across Canada are taking a greater interest in their own establishments. They are installing better freezing equipment and building better fish stores. They are putting in tile floors and are making their stores as attractive as you would a dairy. We should like to see more of that kind of fish store in Canada. There is no reason why anyone in Ottawa, or in fact anywhere else in Canada today, cannot get fresh fish of good quality. There are still a few stores which have not been modernized, and which at times may have some carry-over. But from all these directions there is clear indication of encouragement.

Perhaps it would be sufficient to say that, so far as Newfoundland is concerned, there has been a great improvement. A greater variety of fish is being sold. More people are turning to the frozen fish fillets and to fresh fish. Then, a large quantity has gone to the driers to which I referred. We hope to give greater encouragement to salmon and lobster fishing, and I believe that in a very short time Newfoundland will have a tidy and well-balanced fishing industry, in fact just as satisfactory a fishing industry as will be found in any other of the Canadian provinces. This is coming about, not gradually but rapidly, if one may judge by the number of people who are entering the fresh and frozen fish business.

I am not one who believes that the salt fish industry is ruled out of the picture. I believe we have to apply new methods to the marketing of salt fish; we have to have new techniques and have the fish put up in different ways. I believe that with this commodity we can give the working people of Canada and the United States the best possible value. We can give them the best possible breakfast with the smallest cash outlay, if I may put it that way. We have not convinced the people of that, up to this point, but I believe it will be done. I do not think I will see it, but perhaps it will come about in three or four years. I do not expect I will be here that long. However, someone will do it, and I am sure it will be carried on successfully.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, I know all members are pleased with the encouraging report given by the minister. This is true particularly of those hon. members representing Nova Scotia and Newfoundland constituencies. I do not believe there ever was a time in our history when there was a greater scope for encouraging the production and marketing of fish. This arises from the very high cost of competing meat foods. I was informed this week that beef was selling at $37 a hundredweight on the hoof. The prices of fish to the fishermen have been notoriously low over the years—too low, I would say.

What has been the relative value obtained by the fishermen of Nova Scotia over the last few years? Satisfactory returns, above everything else, will encourage the fishermen to produce. There is an unlimited scope for increasing the market throughout Canada and also in the United States, if proper encouragement is given by the department to the supplying of fish in central Canada and American points, in proper condition. In the last two or three years what amount per pound has been received by the fishermen of Nova Scotia?

Mr. Mayhew: I am afraid we cannot answer the question as the hon. member would like to have it. However, there has been no falling off in prices of Nova Scotia fish. As a matter of fact the prices have been more stable in that province than anywhere in Canada.

With regard to production in Nova Scotia, I would say that in 1949 it amounted to 354,650,000 pounds, with a value of $17,951,130, while in 1950 there were 359,628,000 pounds, to a value of $21,071,730. The fishermen had an increase of something less than $4 million.

Mr. Brooks: I have not heard anything about the fisheries of New Brunswick. While I am not from a fishing constituency I would ask what the situation is in that province. How has the Torquay agreement affected the fisheries of the maritimes? Are we retaining our market for salt fish in the West Indies? I notice that we have increased our trade with Cuba, and I am wondering whether that means that we have increased our market for fish. What kind of fish would they take from us in the Cuban and West Indian markets, and from what part of the maritime provinces does that fish come?

Mr. Mayhew: The fishing industry of New Brunswick has shown a substantial increase. In 1949 there was a production of 186,119,000 pounds, whereas in 1950 it was 239,318,000. My recollection is that the Torquay agreement has not affected the fresh fish industry, but it has opened some markets for the sale of canned fish.

Mr. Brooks: Is not Cuba a large market for salt fish?

Mr. Mayhew: Yes; but last year there was an upset in the West Indies market, chiefly in Trinidad, due to the operations of the Scottish co-operative society which made some sales there. I believe however that they may be unable to fulfil their contract. The result is that the market is proving fairly stable, so far as the maritime provinces are concerned.

Mr. Brooks: As I understand, we are gaining markets in Cuba and are not losing any of the markets in the British West Indies; is that correct? There have been some statements to the contrary.

Mr. Mayhew: So far as we can see at the moment, what the hon. member says is substantially correct.

Mr. Higgins: A few minutes ago the minister said that Canadians were eating one pound more fish per person per year. Has there been any increased consumption throughout the rest of the North American continent?

Mr. Mayhew: We have no figures, but our understanding is that there has been a corresponding increase in the United States.

Mr. Higgins: On December 6, 1949, the minister made a statement, which I believe he still adheres to, to the effect that if the people of North America would each eat one more pound of fish per year the fishing industry would hardly begin to meet the demand.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

Mr. Mayhew: I think that statement has been borne out by the facts because that is about the position we are in today. Most kinds of fish are in short supply rather than long supply.

Item agreed to.

Fishing bounty (chapter 74, R.S. 1927), $160,000.

Mr. McLure: I realize that this is a statutory item, but I understand it is customary to ask for information on such items. I should like to know what bounty has been paid in each county in Prince Edward Island, and the number of fishermen receiving the bounty?

Mr. Gibson: Politics.

Mr. McLure: I can tell the hon. member one thing; it is not independent politics. I would be on one side of the fence or the other.

Mr. Mayhew: Probably the hon. member will be surprised that I can give this information for the different counties. It is as follows:

	Number of men	Number of boats	Amount of bounty
Kings	128	104	$1,166.40
Prince	598	350	5,313.40
Queens	222	116	1,958.60

Mr. McLure: Is the bounty paid to oyster fishermen or just to regular hook and line fishermen?

Mr. Mayhew: The regulations provide, first, that he must be a British subject engaged in deep-sea fishing in Canadian vessels or boats for at least three months. He must have caught not less than 2,500 pounds of sea fish and have fished in a boat measuring not less than 12 feet along the keel, and with not more than three men, including the owner, who will be allowed as claimant.

145. To provide for transportation, dressing and dyeing and other expenses incidental to receiving and disposing of fur seal skins accruing to Canada pursuant to provisional fur seal agreement between Canada and the United States by exchange of notes dated December 26, 1947, $500,000.

Mr. Gibson: How many seal skins were processed for the department and what was the total net profit?

Mr. Mayhew: For 1950-51 the net revenue to the Department of Fisheries was $558,532. If customs and excise duties are considered the revenue is $820,788.

Mr. Gibson: How many skins?

Mr. Mayhew: Twelve thousand, nine hundred.

Mr. Gibson: I should like to read into the record for the information of the minister a letter which I received from Paul Sam of the Ahousat band. I know this Indian quite well and I do not know whether the minister has met him. If the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration were here I am sure he would be quite proud of the progress that is indicated as having been made by these people who are now capable of writing a letter of this kind. I remember Paul Sam's father quite well, and under our educational system the son has made considerable progress. This is addressed to me under date of May 22 and reads:

Dear Sir:

This is to inform you of the fur sealing issue now at hand, and which has come to a climax here in Ahousat.

About the 12th of this month a notification, by radiophone and by word of mouth, went out to seven of our seal hunters to appear in court on May 18 in Tofino, British Columbia.

It so happened that several of our boys had been out hunting seals for food as there has been a critical scarcity of salmon here on the coast all spring, and seal meat is a great medium for fish to us Indians as you know.

We were not interested in the fur seal commercially until a seal fur buyer—Mr. Stanley Roberts of Vancouver, B.C.—came to Ahousat some time first week of April.

This man Roberts had a seal buying permit from the fishery department and also from the Indian agent to reside here on the reserve for a few weeks.

With the scarcity of salmon this year for food and commercially, who would overlook $10 a skin for seals as that is the price given by Stanley Roberts? He had government tags for all seals bought, and these fur seals were inspected and O.K.'d by the fishery officer, Mr. Fred Shaughnessy of Tofino.

Incidentally, a very capable and efficient officer.

The seals were inspected and the money paid after that, but the funny part is that Mr. Shaughnessy never notified us of the confiscation of skins, and even the buyer doesn't know when they were seized. The buyer Roberts says that they might have been taken at Tofino from the s.s. Maquinna on the way down. There were seven hunters involved and 12 skins confiscated.

According to the statistics there are about 4,000,000 seals on the Pacific coast.

Is that about the right figure?

Mr. Mayhew: About 3 million.

Mr. Gibson: This is the Indian's point of view on this matter. The letter continues:

To feed these seals from January to June passing through British Columbia waters, require (roughly) one salmon while passing through our waters. That means that our fishing industry is out 4,000,000 salmon.

We will reduce that to 3 million.

Surveys by the fishery department, 15 years ago, have shown that one seal requires eight pounds of fish per day. So you see what a menace these fur seals are to our industry and also to our existence. Compared to the fur seal, the sealion and hair seal is just a handful and still the government has a bounty on the hair seal.

That letter is signed by Paul Sam and Philip Louie, the secretary of the association. The minister has stated what the revenue is and I presume it is a gross revenue because if these seals had been taken by our Indians we would have received excise and customs duty. There were 12,000 skins taken and we have a net profit of $820,000. The Indian's point of view is that if there are 3 million seals going through our waters and they eat one salmon apiece—they are there about 90 days—it will cost us about $3 million. I think that would be a very low figure. I would think it would probably be closer to $6 million. There is the fact that seals eat about eight pounds of fish a day. I think we could put it at $5 a ton, and that would be worth about $6 million, plus the $3 million for salmon which would amount to about $9 million that they maintain the seals take out by way of food. The Indian says that despite the fact that the government gets $820,000 in return the seal food is costing approximately $9 million. Even an Indian can figure out that that is a money losing proposition. When I first went up the west coast the Indians used to use seals as a regular part of their diet. I can well remember the great cast-iron pots. You could stuff a missionary in them. They used to be bubbling away at night.

Mr. Stick: Did they cook the missionaries?

Mr. Gibson: No, there were enough seals. We never had to eat the missionaries. As I say, the seals used to be a regular part of their diet. When I first went to Ahousat that small village produced about 1,000 sealskins every year. That was a part of their general livelihood. It was never the Indian who depleted our seals. I do not think the fisheries department has ever contended that it was the Indian who cleaned up our herds of seals. It was the white man with his very intensive exploitation of the seals in the Pribilofs who did that.

The Indian says that he is restricted to the use of a small canoe and a spear when he goes out to catch seals. That used to work very well in the old days when the seals were not molested by anybody. In those times they used to come into the inside channels, and the Indians could take them quite easily. It would seem to me that the minister might very well discuss this matter with the United States authorities because they must have the same problem. They have Indians around Neah Bay and along the shores of Washington and Oregon, and their Indians must make the same representations to their government that our Indians make to ours.

An hon. Member: And they vote.

Mr. Gibson: And they vote. I think probably our Indians are going to vote. That is why I was so keen about having them accorded the right to vote. I have always said that I feel that people who vote get more consideration, but that does not apply to the present minister. I know that he is going to give this matter very serious consideration. I should like to think that he will recognize the fact that our Indians have some aboriginal rights. I think the Indian is the first one to say that probably a sufficient quantity of our seals should be maintained or protected, but when that whole herd of three million seals goes past they figure they have a vested aboriginal right in them, and I think it is a little too restrictive not to allow them to take any of them.

As a suggestion, I would say that when the minister discusses this problem with the United States authorities he might say to them: We have probably 1,000 male Indians out on the coast who originally had access to these seals. Suppose we give them the privilege of taking fifteen skins apiece each year.

Mr. Mayhew: Who would police them?

Mr. Gibson: After all, they would only have a permit to take fifteen skins so that is all they could sell. It would be reasonable enough.

Mr. Mayhew: Have you never heard of bootlegging?

Mr. Gibson: I do not think our Indians would go that far. It would seem to me that we would have a reasonable argument if we would say to these people: We recognize your aboriginal rights. With the great white father in the United States and the great white father here in Canada the Indians say that now they are not allowed to have any more interest in these seals. The government is getting $820,000 in taxes, and I am sure the Indian will look at that with a very jaundiced eye. It seems to me that some agreement should be reached with the United States so that our Indians, who have these aboriginal rights, will at least be able to get some of these seals not only for food but also for their value as fur. Nothing would be lost to anybody, and it would seem to me to be reasonable if that course were undertaken.

Mr. Mayhew: What the hon. gentleman is suggesting is that we give the Indians the right to pelagic sealing. That is something that we do not give the white man. We are trying to make the Indians real Canadian citizens and give them all the rights of Canadian citizenship, but surely they are not going to ask for greater rights than other Canadians.

[Mr. Gibson.]

Mr. Gibson: We allow them to fish salmon for food in the fall. You give them a permit for that.

Mr. Mayhew: We do not allow any pelagic sealing. We do not allow anyone to kill seals while they are in the water.

Mr. Gibson: You do not allow him to go and catch dog salmon in the fall either, but the Indians have certain aboriginal rights.

Mr. Mayhew: We are not taking any of those rights away from them, but I do not think this is the time to give them something different so far as sealing is concerned. They have a right now that no white man has. They can catch seals by certain methods, with a boat and harpoon, and some of them have done not too badly. I would not think that the hon. member would be serious in saying that they should be given the right to pelagic sealing.

Mr. Gibson: Of course if the contention is right that the $820,000 we get costs us $6 million in the form of salmon or other fish when the seals are going through, there may be no validity to that argument at all, but it certainly costs something to feed these seals.

Mr. Mayhew: That has nothing at all to do with Indians engaging in pelagic sealing. That is an entirely different question. In the only examination that was carried out it was found that the seals were living on squid and herring, and not on salmon.

Mr. Gibson: No salmon?

Mr. Mayhew: No salmon, although I think if they were hungry they would catch a salmon. I think we should know more about the habits of the seal, and we intend to find out more.

Mr. Gibson: After all, I do not think we are making any actual profit on this. I would not like to see the seals extinct, but on the other hand it seems to me there is not too much profit in the whole business. Besides that we are making a lot of bad friends among the Indians.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: I notice that there are two pipe line bills on the order paper which are to be considered by the house in committee of the whole. Is it the pleasure of the house that both of these bills be referred to the committee of the whole on the one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INDEPENDENT PIPE LINE COMPANY—CHAMPION PIPE LINE CORPORATION LIMITED

Mr. J. W. Welbourn (Jasper-Edson) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 269, to incorporate Independent Pipe Line Company, and Bill No. 321, to incorporate Champion Pipe Line Corporation Limited.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: First we shall consider Bill 269.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, when this bill was before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, the sponsor called various persons interested in the proposed company, including an engineer and financial authority. I believe the members of the committee generally were satisfied that the project is very much worth while. This group plan to pipe oil, as distinguished from gas, from west of the Edmonton area down through the Yellowhead pass to Kamloops, thence to Merritt and through the Coquihalla pass to Hope, and on to the vicinity of greater Vancouver. The committee was informed that at the present time there are only about 50,000 barrels of oil per day available in Alberta for shipment to the west, the balance of the production being required for shipment through the pipe line to the east and for local consumption on the prairies.

I believe the fact that there are only 50,000 barrels available for a west coast line is very significant. The market in Vancouver and surrounding area can absorb about 35,000 barrels per day. There would be a very small amount of oil left over for export to the United States, for storage purposes or for use in some other way. The point is that if this line were going through the United States first, obviously there would be no oil left over for the Canadian Pacific coast.

Personally, as a member from a British Columbia riding, I am strongly in favour of this bill. I believe that the applicants are putting forward a very worth-while proposition. They are committed to build their main line entirely within Canada, which of course is what we have been asking throughout the debates which have taken place in the last two or three years. There was one small amendment made to the bill in committee, and I would ask, Mr. Chairman, to have that read to us when we reach that particular section.

The Deputy Chairman: The amendment which has been proposed to this bill is to section 4, subsection 2. The amended subsection will read as follows:

The company may, by by-law, change the place within Canada where the head office of the company is to be situate.

The Deputy Chairman: We shall now consider Bill No. 321, an act to incorporate the Champion Pipe Line Corporation Limited. An amendment has also been moved to clause 4 of this bill, and the amendment is the same as the one we considered in the previous bill. Section 4, subsection 2, has been amended by adding the words "within Canada" after the word "place" in the first line. It now reads as follows:

The company may, by by-law, change the place within Canada where the head office of the company is to be situate.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Green: This bill also received the unanimous consent of the members of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. One significant feature about the plans of this group should be pointed out, and that is that they propose to build a natural gas pipe line from southern Alberta to the Pacific coast by an all-Canadian route. They are prepared to build that line through southern British Columbia, over a route which they say is feasible, although last year other groups who were planning to go through the United States to the Pacific coast took the position that it would not be practicable to build a gas line through British Columbia. This year we have a group of responsible Canadian coming before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines and stating that they believe it is a feasible and financially sound proposition to build this gas line from southern Alberta through the southern portion of British Columbia to Vancouver. Any surplus gas would be sold to the United States, and no one has any objection to that, provided of course that Canadian needs have first been met.

I believe that the applicants for this charter are genuinely committed to building a Canada-first route. Personally, I think they should be given every encouragement.

Bills reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Speaker, I think the sponsors of those two bills which have just been passed owe the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) their fullest support in the future because these bills went through so rapidly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Croll: You mean that he did not block them.

MOTION FOR SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 332, for the relief of Marion Agnes Kelsch Cleghorn.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 343, for the relief of George Keith Henderson.—Mr. Winkler.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that both these bills should receive second reading at the same time?

Mr. Knowles: No, Mr. Speaker; one at a time.

MARION AGNES KELSCH CLEGHORN

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bill No. 332, for the relief of Marion Agnes Kelsch Cleghorn.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on two previous occasions when this bill was called, I asked that it stand because the evidence had not yet reached us. That evidence came to hand yesterday and such study as I have been able to give to the evidence convinces me, if I needed any convincing, that this is not the kind of business that this House of Commons should be dealing with at all.

The evidence in this case runs to 34 printed pages. I have read it carefully, but I confess that the more consideration one gives to this case, the more confusing it becomes. I discover that the case was contested before the Senate committee. I discover also that when the counsel for the respondent pointed out that the petition was in extremely general terms but that the case before the Senate was particularized as to the charge of adultery, on the basis of that statement a considerable portion of the time given to this case by the Senate committee was devoted to the question of whether or not there should be an adjournment of the case. If one goes through the evidence he finds the hon. senators repeatedly expressing the view that it looks as though the case will have to be adjourned so that the respondent can have the opportunity to subpoena the co-respondent whose name was not given until the first day's hearing in the other place. Finally, the Senate committee agreed that an adjournment was in order, and the case was adjourned for one day.

As one reads the evidence, when he comes to that point it looks as though the argument is fairly heavy on the side of the respondent. Then the next day, when the respondent's lawyer appears at the adjourned meeting, he reports that although he has tried to get in touch with the co-respondent in order to subpoena her to appear before the committee he has been unable to do so. She appears to have moved from the address he had for her. One does not know how hard he tried, but certainly he makes the statement to the committee that this person had moved and that he was unable in so short a time to get in touch with the co-respondent. As one reads the case, one finds that it comes to a very sudden conclusion. All through the book it looked as though there was a good deal to be said on the respondent's behalf. Then all of a sudden the case is closed and the Senate committee recommended that the divorce be granted. To be objective, I must say that against the respondent there are one or two references in the evidence to a sum of money being transferred in return for the case not being contested. That fact is not proved, but the references are there. All told, it adds up to a story of considerable confusion. If one takes the statements made under oath before the Senate committee, the evidence is contradictory. Certain detectives bring in evidence of adultery on the part of the respondent with a certain person who is named. The respondent himself under oath denies that allegation. So there it is—a state of confusion right down the line.

It is an odd case in that it is the wife who is suing for the divorce and it is the husband who is contesting the divorce. I want to say quite frankly and quite openly, Mr. Speaker, that my study of the case and my discussion of it with some other members around the house to whom I have talked about it, leaves me quite undecided. I do not know what we should do about this particular divorce case. I think it underlines clearly the fact that we are not a competent court to be dealing with these matters. Because of that fact I felt that I should draw the particulars in this case to the attention of the house; and I suggest to hon. members that they consider seriously whether we are doing the right thing to continue to deal with these cases in parliament. In my view these cases should be transferred to a proper court.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I too have read the evidence, although perhaps not as carefully as has my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. But I am less confused than he is. Thinking that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would continue to be a divorce commentator again tonight, I thought that I would read the evidence in order to get at least a fair smattering of it. There is no question that the evidence is overwhelming. I am not going to read any part of it. The top of page 33 and other portions of it speak for themselves.

The hon. member made reference to the opportunity that was given to the respondent to bring in a witness, and the case was adjourned for some days.

Mr. Knowles: One day.

Mr. Croll: One day, in order to give the respondent an opportunity to bring in a very important witness. He was not able to do it. On the other hand it was suggested that the witness was available, and the argument centred around whether the witness was or was not available. The witness was not brought there. My point is that every opportunity was given to the respondent in this case to bring in whatever witnesses he could procure, and he did not bring them in.

As I have said, I think the evidence in this case is overwhelming, and if I can help settle my hon. friend's mind, this is a proper case for divorce.

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): At the request of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I had a look at this evidence. I suppose we should look at all the evidence that comes before us if we are to be regarded as a court; but I have not reached the same conclusion as the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) has reached on this matter. I have some reason for thinking why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been so confused. The case was tried on grounds that I do not quite understand at all, and I want to say that I have tried a good many divorce cases myself.

If I was trying this divorce case, Mr. Speaker, I would not feel convinced that the petitioner had overcome the burden that was put upon him; that is, to prove by convincing evidence that this respondent was guilty of adultery. The Senate committee may have taken a different view, but two of the senators who were hearing this case did on one occasion say that the evidence was not sufficient to convince them.

Many statements were made by counsel for the petitioner which, if it was necessary to show that, were not evidence at all. For example, he turned to counsel for the respondent and said: "Your client wanted to get a thousand dollars to call this case off." I am hopeful that that did not have any influence on the senators who were hearing this case. It does look to me as if during the whole of the proceedings the case was badly tried. There were too many statements allowed to be made by counsel for the petitioner which were not evidence at all. If there was a jury present it would have had a tremendous amount of influence upon their minds. All I am saying is that I am hopeful that it did not have the same influence upon the good senators.

I am not going to make any remarks about this matter at all. If the good people who tried this case in the other place feel there was a case made out then their consciences are clear. But in looking over the evidence I find one or two statements made by perhaps two of the senators which would indicate to me that they could not exactly overcome the idea that there was not sufficient evidence in this case. Perhaps it is none of my business, but what I want to say is that I would bring to the attention of the committee to which this bill will go the importance of giving it very serious consideration. I have no doubt that they always do that. They should give the respondent the opportunity of bringing from Montreal the witness that he attempted to get.

I want it distinctly understood that I am not talking on this case because I am against divorce as such. My opinions in that regard have been placed before this house on one occasion previously. I myself have tried many divorce cases, and granted many divorces.

Mr. Fulton: Will the hon. member permit a question at this point? He has referred to his reading and interpretation of the evidence before the committee of the other place. May I ask him whether in his opinion there were any signs or indications that there may have been collusion in this case?

Mr. Carroll: Well, I do not know; I could not say that offhand. Two or three things were said, but they would not be enough to satisfy the judges over there that there was collusion, or anything of that kind. The thing that surprised me was why the petitioner did not call this lady. That has given rise in my mind to a suggestion that he perhaps could not get the evidence from her—I do not know. That is all I have to say. But I would like to see the committee to which this bill will go give it at least the most sincere and considered opinion and consideration that they are able to give it.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I agree with the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll) with regard to this case. I have read the evidence carefully, and it was more or less of a legal point between two lawyers. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) has the advantage over some of us in that direction.

I can perhaps answer the question which the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) put to the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond as to whether there was any suspicion of collusion in this particular case. I of course am not qualified to judge, but I did notice that in this case a separation had been granted by the civil courts some years before the divorce action was brought. When the separation was applied for the question of adultery was not one of the reasons given for such separation. On the strength of that one of the lawyers did allege condonation in this particular case. I think that answers the question asked by my hon. friend.

Mr. Fulton: Very strong suspicion.

Mr. Knight: I am not qualified to go into this whole matter, but I want to point out that there was considerable doubt in the minds of some of the senators who adjudged this case.

In reply to the hon. member for Spadina, I would say that the acting chairman felt that an adjournment should be granted in this case if it were asked for. It was asked for, but I would point out to my hon. friend that the adjournment was for only twenty-four hours, or one day, and that the lawyer acting for that particular party felt that that time was not sufficiently long, nor did he feel that his client could afford on the spur of the moment to get the money to handle the necessary expenses.

The acting chairman also said—and this again is a legal point—that he thought the petition had been very poorly drawn. The Hon. Mr. Kinley is reported in the evidence as saying: "I suggest that the evidence is pretty weak." On that basis, sir, I think there is reasonable doubt in the matter. I would have said nothing about the particular case if it had not been for the statement of the hon. member for Spadina and the question of the hon. member for Kamloops. But as a matter of fact, I do want to draw the attention of the public to the cost of this bill and its mates. I have made some investigation into the cost of the printing of these particular bills and the evidence, and also as to the disposition of the bills and the evidence when so printed. This particular bill, and others like it, would appear to cost for printing, presentation and distribution somewhere in the neighbourhood of $125. I am informed this bill is one of 590 which have been passed from January 1, 1949, to the end of December, 1950. I am also told that some of these fees are decreased from the regular fee of $210 to the sum of $125. I was curious to find that the amount to which the fee was dropped was always $125, and I was told that that is the estimate of what one of these divorce cases costs by way of paper, printing, distribution and other details.

It is interesting to note the sum total of costs of this bill and others like it. I have here a statement supplied me by the Clerk of the House in which he has set down information which he, in turn, received from the Clerk in the other place. In answer to my question as to what was the total cost of printing the evidence, and of the paper on which it is printed, between January 1, 1949, and December, 1950, it is pointed out that the cost of printing and paper for evidence in divorce cases as taken from accounts submitted by the Senate for payment, January 1, 1949, to December 31, 1950, was $91,926.29. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that is a large amount of money to transfer to the waste-paper baskets, which I believe are their common destinations.

Then, as to distribution, it is interesting to note that a copy of this evidence is not available to the public; and I am glad of that. I notice however that twenty-five copies of the bill and the evidence pertaining thereto are preserved in the care of the Clerk of the Senate over a long period of time, presumably for the purpose of having it available for those who would require it. If the bill is not available to the public, then I cannot see the point of hiding away twenty-five copies of it. I cannot imagine how it could be of any use, if it cannot be given to the public. While this is not a large item, yet I suggest it is a large amount of money to be spent in this direction.

Mr. Lennard: May I ask the hon. member a question? Did the hon. member in the return receive any statistics showing what the applicant paid for appearing here?

Mr. Knight: Yes, I believe I have that. The parliamentary fee—and I should imagine that is the information the hon. member wants—payable on divorce petitions, under rule 140, amounts to $210.

Mr. Lennard: In each case?

Mr. Knight: Yes, in each case. In cases where it is shown to the satisfaction of the committee on divorce that an applicant is unable to bear this expense, the fees are usually reduced to $125. That is the sum I mentioned earlier. This decrease is made because, in round figures, it covers the out-of-pocket expenses. In a few special cases the fee has been reduced to as low as $75.

It might interest the hon. member to know that, of 280 petitions heard to date in the present session, in seventeen cases the fees were reduced to $125, in eight cases to $100 and in four to $75.

Mr. Higgins: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knight: I love questions, if I can answer them.

Mr. Higgins: What is the average all-in cost of divorces?

Mr. Low: All-in?

Mr. Hatfield: That is the sixty-four dollar question.

Mr. Speaker: May I remind hon. members that the debate is assuming a general tone. The discussion would appear to be on divorce generally and does not relate directly to the bill before us. I have not stopped the hon. member, nor do I propose to do so. However, I trust the discussion will not go too far afield.

Mr. Knight: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thought that perhaps in the debate on second reading one might have a little leeway in the matter of general discussion, provided it had reference to the bill. As I said earlier, I have read the bill thoroughly and could discuss it for an hour if necessary. I thought the facts I was placing on record were of more interest to the house and country. However, in view of your admonition perhaps I should say no more about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knight: What I have said is on the record.

Mr. Speaker: As I pointed out, I had no desire to stop the hon. member, but I would remind the house that the discussion should be pertinent to the bill. However, now that the hon. member has begun his speech, I feel he should be allowed to conclude it.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member for Saskatoon completed his remarks?

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, I could talk for a long time about this case, but I do not think I have anything further to say for the record.

Hon. members may be interested to know that $10 is paid by the applicants in these divorce cases for the translating and printing of the bills. I take it from this return however that that does not cover the evidence. Six hundred copies in English and two hundred in French are printed, and I cannot see the necessity for that number. They are in stereotyped form, and perfectly uniform. In view of our advocacy of another type of court, I suggest that this procedure of having a court of 102 judges in the other place and 262 here who have to be supplied with all this evidence might well be replaced, and certainly more cheaply, by a court in which there would be less judges.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

GEORGE KEITH HENDERSON

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bill No. 343, for the relief of George Keith Henderson.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the house for more than a moment, but I should like to ask a question of the sponsor. I know we are not in committee, but before going into committee I would ask him to answer a simple question. Can the hon. member tell me from what city the petitioner George Keith Henderson comes?

Mr. Winkler: I cannot tell the hon. gentleman that.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended speaking on this bill but since a question has been asked and apparently no answer can be given I feel obliged to say that it should be given. The domicile of the petitioner in this case is Montreal while the respondent is living in the United States. The printed evidence here runs to 57 pages. I have read it, and I know one or two other hon. members have read it, and it appears to be most confused. The case was contested before the Senate committee and I hope our committee on miscellaneous private bills will go into it very carefully.

One reason for the confusion that exists is the fact that one wonders why it was contested. When a case is contested there is usually a motive, and that motive is generally quite clear. Many times the question of money seems to be involved, but in this case both parties appear to have plenty of money. They already have a separation and have no desire to live together, and yet the case was contested. It would appear to me that the woman in the case is anxious to clear her name. Certainly she denies categorically under oath the charges made against her in the petition. I shall say no more, but I do hope that the committee will look into this case carefully.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

INDUSTRIAL LOAN AND FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal) moved the second reading of Bill No. 335, respecting Industrial Loan and Finance Corporation.

Mr. Green: Would the sponsor of the bill be good enough to make a statement?

Mr. Macnaughton: The purpose of Bill No. 335 is simple and clear. With the consent of the house it is intended to change the name of the corporation from Industrial Loan and Finance Corporation to Community Finance Corporation. There is only one section to the bill which preserves all the rights and liabilities of the company.

The reason for the proposed change is that the present title is not a correct description of the type of business carried on. This company carries on a personal loan business under the federal Small Loans Act. There is considerable confusion owing to the fact that another corporation with a more or less similar name carries on a refinancing business. Consequently we are asking for permission to change the name to Community Finance Corporation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 351, for the relief of Archibald Kenneth MacLean.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 358, for the relief of Marion Evelyn Peak Collins.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 361, for the relief of Eugenie Marjorie Ross Finley.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 363, for the relief of Ruth Mary Halsey Shaw.—Mr. Winkler.

MISSISQUOI AND ROUVILLE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. Henri A. Gosselin (Brome-Missisquoi) moved the second reading of Bill No. 366, to incorporate the Missisquoi and Rouville Insurance Company.

Mr. Low: Will the sponsor of the bill explain it?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Gosselin: This is the usual bill for the incorporation of an insurance company. Immediately after second reading I intend to move that the bill be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Green: Could the hon. member not give us more details than that?

Mr. Lesage: This is the usual bill asking for the incorporation of a company.

Mr. Green: We are entitled to an explanation of the bill on the motion for second reading.

Mr. Gosselin: The Missisquoi and Rouville Mutual Fire Insurance Company was organized in 1835 under a provincial act. It has been in business ever since in the county of Missisquoi. The head office was at one time at Phillipsburg, but it has been located at Frelighsburg for over 75 years.

Under the old act the company could be organized as a mutual company, and the company started as such and did business in that way until 1888, when it was organized to do business under the cash system. Later it took advantage of some clauses of the same act to subscribe a sustaining capital and such capital was subscribed and it has been doing business since as both a mutual and cash company under the mutual system and the cash system.

In order to do business in other provinces than the province of Quebec it has to obtain a licence and make a deposit in each province. As the business extended this has been found to be inconvenient and the company has asked for the present bill in order to satisfy its clientele, and to extend its business.

Similar bills have been granted to the Stanstead and Sherbrooke, which was organized in 1835 under the same provincial law and which followed exactly the same progressive steps as the Missisquoi and Rouville Company. This federal charter was obtained in 1940. The Mercantile, with head office at St. Hyacinthe, organized under the provincial law mentioned above, obtained a federal charter in 1939. The Wellington Fire of Toronto also obtained for the reasons given above a federal charter around 1939. The Waterloo, the Gore, the Perth and other companies in Ontario followed the same procedure.

A large part of the insurance business is reinsurance. The Missisquoi and Rouville reinsures a number of Ontario companies and cedes part of its insurance to these same companies. It will make it much easier for it to obtain reinsurance by having a federal charter.

The company is now carrying on business in British Columbia, in Ontario and Manitoba and in the eastern provinces, and it is felt that its business will be facilitated if it obtains a federal charter.

The management of the company will not be changed by obtaining a federal charter and will have no more power than it has under its present set-up, but the transaction of its insurance will be facilitated.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

CO-OPERATIVE FIRE AND CASUALTY COMPANY

Mr. F. H. Larson (Kindersley) moved the second reading of Bill No. 367, to incorporate Co-operative Fire and Casualty Company.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May we have an explanation?

Mr. Larson: Mr. Speaker, this bill is to incorporate the Co-operative Fire and Casualty Company. The people who are asking for incorporation are co-operatives spread from one end of the country to the other. I understand the financial set-up is very similar to that of the normal corporation or company. The bill has had the approval of the superintendent of insurance, and when it is referred to the committee the people who are interested in it will appear before the committee and give the details of the incorporation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

MOTION FOR SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bills Nos. 368 and 369.

Mr. Knowles: We have no evidence yet in these cases.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

IVY GRACE BARNSDALE MOORE

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bill No. 370, for the relief of Ivy Grace Barnsdale Moore.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to say one word or perhaps two—

An hon. Member: Three.

Mr. Knowles: —in connection with this case. The evidence has come to hand, and incidentally it makes it clear that there were no detectives called. In fact the only witness was the petitioner herself. The evidence seems pretty clear that her husband deserted her some time ago. In fact he went through a form of marriage with another woman in the United States. The Senate committee seems satisfied that that was sufficient evidence. One of the interesting comments that I ran across was to discover in the evidence this sentence: "The respondent was called but did not appear." When one reads the evidence one finds why the respondent did not appear. He discovers that the respondent is serving a term of seven years in the Ohio state penitentiary for bigamy.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—SENATE BILL

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bill No. 371, for the relief of Dorothy Chaffee Caduc.

Mr. Knowles: The evidence in this case has not yet come to hand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

BORDER PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Friday, June 8, 1951, consideration of the motion of Mr. Robinson for the second reading of Bill No. 118, to incorporate Border Pipeline Corporation, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Herridge.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I believe the last time this matter was discussed I had the honour of moving the adjournment of the debate. Some people are born great, some achieve greatness and some have greatness thrust upon them. In this particular case I think probably it was thrust upon me. I am on the third strike now, but I am very willing to accept whatever blame there is in this matter.

An hon. Member: There is no blame.

Mr. Higgins: As the hon. member very properly puts it, there is no blame. It is a very worthy object to engage in this debate in every way. I understand that four or five bills of a somewhat similar character have already been passed this session, and that their purpose is to take products from the same locality as is proposed by this measure. There is very little difference in these bills with one exception. The exception is involved in the word "but" in the amendment, and has to do with a clause in the amendment that is in the other measures but is not in this particular one. "But" is a very small word indeed. It has three little letters, b-u-t, but it makes a tremendous difference in the minds of members of the house who are opposed to this type of measure. From talking with various members who are not in accord with the measure now before us, I am quite certain that they would be quite prepared to vote for it if it included the provision contained in the amendment and commencing with the word "but".

An hon. Member: They did not ask my advice.

Mr. Higgins: They did not ask your advice? That is not fair because I think everybody else has been asked about this matter, and if the hon. member has not been asked there must have been an omission in some way. I am certain that the sponsor of the bill would not want the hon. member to be passed over in any way.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Siphoned off.

Mr. Higgins: Siphoned off. I must say that I have been trying to look at this thing honestly, and I can see no objection to including the amendment. Some hon. members have asked me where I come into the picture, and why I should be interested in a matter of this nature at all. This bill deals with oil, and we have an awful lot of oil, fish oil, in Newfoundland. I presume, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) stated the other day, we could call it a kindred subject. Oil is oil, although I doubt very much that we will ever have to construct a pipe line to bring our fish oil up here. But if there is a possibility of using such oil I would have very great pleasure indeed in asking parliament to adopt such a bill, and I certainly would include in it that it should be an all-Canadian route.

If somebody would guarantee that there would be sufficient fish oil used, then I would be quite prepared to introduce a bill and to ask that the measure include the policy of Canada first, which is the only objection to the bill now before us. I think, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot talk much longer because it is nine o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Higgins the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

General services—

145. To provide for transportation, dressing and dyeing and other expenses incidental to receiving and disposing of fur seal skins accruing to Canada pursuant to provisional fur seal agreement between Canada and the United States by exchange of notes dated December 26, 1947, $500,000.

[Mr. Higgins.]

Mr. McLure: Before the committee recessed at six o'clock, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was speaking on this very important question. I did not desire to interrupt him in any way at that time, but I should like to learn from him the source of the information he gave the committee with respect to the destruction of salmon by the fur seals of the north. This is the most astonishing information I have ever heard with regard to fur seals. If his information had been that the fur seals were eating the whales and porpoises of the north, where the fur seals live for two and a half months of the year, then that would really be news. However, nobody knows where the fur seals come from or where they go. The only time they can be located is for two and a half months from June on, and then for nine or ten months they disappear. Nobody knows where they spend that period of ten months. I want to make a few remarks about this matter because it is a very interesting subject. Before doing so, however, I should like to ask the minister a question. What is the cost of machining, dressing and dyeing—I do not want anything for cartage, carrying charges or anything like that—of the different firms namely Martins of England, Martin-Schnaufer of Toronto, and the Fouke Company of St. Louis? If the minister will give me that information now, I shall proceed with the matter later.

Mr. Mayhew: I suppose the hon. member realizes that some of the skins go to the Fouke Company of St. Louis, some to Martins in London, and some to the new plant of Martin-Schnaufer of Toronto. Dressing and dyeing for the St. Louis company amounted to $165,620.60.

Mr. McLure: Can you give it per skin?

Mr. Mayhew: No, you would have to divide that by 7,210, and that would give you the answer. Dressing and dyeing for Martins in London amounted to $13,744.80. You divide that by 3,605 to get the amount per skin. For Martin-Schnaufer of Toronto, it amounted to $49,959.68, and you divide that by 1,203 skins.

Mr. McLure: I have not worked out that arithmetical problem, but I understand that the cost of machining, dressing and dyeing in these three plants is practically the same. I said a moment ago that this was an interesting item, especially to the Department of Fisheries, because it is one item on which they make a real profit. The government, through the Department of Fisheries, makes one hundred and ten per cent on its investment. If all the departments were as good in business as the Department of Fisheries, the government would soon be paying off our country's debt. If the suggestions made to the government last year and the year before had been followed to the letter in 1950, I am quite sure the department would have made over two hundred per cent profit. As it is they are making one hundred and ten per cent profit, and if they are careful to see that these skins are properly processed I am sure they will make a great deal more.

According to the details given here the returns are not yet complete, but it is expected that the returns will total $1,141,169. It costs $445,000 to produce that $1,141,169. As I said a moment ago, if the Department of Fisheries will look carefully into this business and follow it through, there is no doubt that they could make two hundred per cent on their investment instead of one hundred and ten per cent. This processing is peculiar work and something that takes years of experience in order to produce a high-class article. I have mentioned already that there are three different firms in the business of processing sealskins into fur seal skins. There is a small company in the United States that we have not mentioned before but the government does not deal with them so we will leave them out of the picture. The three big concerns are Martins of London, England, Martin-Schnaufer Company of Toronto, and the Fouke Company of St. Louis. The other small firm is in Chicago, and it does a little of this work.

In my opinion the mistake that is being made, and I believe the trade shares this opinion, is that the article is not uniform. This is due to the fact it is made under three different processes. If one attends these auction sales the regrettable part of this business is immediately apparent. For instance, the Canadian skins are stamped "Canadian" and that is supposed to indicate the quality of them. If they are processed in St. Louis, in Toronto or in London, England, they still bear the stamp "Canadian". You thus have three different qualities of your own product on the market which brings three different prices. Just to demonstrate this may I say that at the last sale I attended on December 8, 1950, I found that there were 1,500 skins of the St. Louis dye. They sold for $82.68 on an average. At the same time there were 1,700 skins—you can check me to see if the amounts are correct—processed by Martin-Schnaufer Company the same type of skins, and they realized $61.02 on an average. There was a difference of $21 or more between these two groups. Now, that is too much to lose because it amounted to some $32,000 or $33,000 on that one lot of skins. Further on, in that same sale there were some black skins, and the black are the most profitable dyed ones at the present time. The market is clamouring more for the dark ones than for the safari and the matari. When these skins were sold at the auction sale on December 8, 1950, the Canadian-dyed machine skins brought $82.68 while the black skins of the St. Louis firm brought $135.53. I made a mistake in the first price. It was only $79.08 on an average. Here was a difference on our own Canadian product of $56.45 per skin. That is the reason I say to the minister and his officials that we should have, for our product or our share of the northern seals, a processing that is all the same.

If you want to sell them at a lower price, then process them in the plant that gives you the poorest article. But if the department wants to hold their trade and have a good article, then process them where you get the best article, stamp them "Canadian", and have only one fur of that kind on the market, with a "Canadian" stamp on it. It is strange to go into an auction room and find at these fur sales three different qualities of the same article, with the variation in quality all due to the difference in the processing system.

I am bringing this matter to the attention of the department because they might as well make two hundred per cent as one hundred and ten per cent. As I told them in 1946, a good many years ago, when they were not making any money at all on this article, they could realize a million dollars. I was rather scoffed at at the time for making that statement. We are now almost up to that, and I am sure they could easily make a million dollars profit out of the sale of these skins, even if the take-off is only small. It is unfortunate that our 1950 quantity of skins is not all sold yet. Am I right in that?

Mr. MacNaught: Yes.

Mr. McLure: They are not all sold yet?

Mr. Mayhew: No. There are 14,500 skins unsold.

Mr. McLure: They are not processed yet, are they?

Mr. Mayhew: They are in the hands of the processors.

Mr. McLure: Yes; and they are not likely to be processed before the fall, so far as I know. They will not be processed in time for the early sales. However, I do not object. I want the department to understand that I am British enough to say that I do not want to take any of the business away from a British company. If the Department of Fisheries are satisfied to pay a quarter of a million dollars or more to build up a plant in Canada, that is a different consideration. Besides doing that, they are lessening the quality and the demand of the trade for a good article. I give this information to the minister as something which I hope he will look into. If he wants any further assistance, and if he thinks I can give it, I shall be glad to help him make two hundred per cent instead of one hundred and ten per cent.

Mr. Mayhew: I am grateful to the hon. gentleman for his advice. I understand that he has had a great deal of experience, especially in the fur seal business. I appreciate his remarks. We should be extremely pleased, of course, to make two hundred per cent rather than one hundred and ten per cent. It has been the policy of the government, however—and I think it is a fairly good one—that we have some competition in the business. I am satisfied that if all these skins were going to one place, even to London or to St. Louis, we might not get the best out of any of them. We think that it is wise to handle the matter in this way, even if there is for the time being some little loss.

As to saying that there should be one type of skin, I think that is quite impossible. Even from the Fouke people themselves, there is quite a variety. When there is nothing else but the Fouke skins at the auction sales, you will find quite a difference in the price per skin. The situation therefore is not just exactly as the hon. member described it. The price last year went all the way from $74 to $160 per skin.

Mr. McLure: I know that.

Mr. Mayhew: There is quite a variety and, as the hon. member says, it is the matter of quality.

Mr. McLure: That is not variety.

Mr. Mayhew: I beg your pardon?

Mr. McLure: It is quality and size that does that.

Mr. Mayhew: Yes; quality and size.

Mr. McLure: But the variety is all the same.

Mr. Mayhew: Only ten per cent of the skins we have go to the Toronto firm, and they are rapidly building up a high quality skin. I think that is the only place where we are really experimenting to try to build up an industry in Canada. When our estimates were up for discussion two years ago I remember that we were criticized for not endeavouring to establish an industry of this kind in Canada. We are giving some encouragement to a Canadian industry and they are beginning to do very well indeed.

Mr. McLure: I think the minister's argument defeats itself when the actual goods are sold. If they are putting up a quality of processing equal to the others, I do not think there should be $56 of difference in the price that the skins command on the same market. As I said a moment ago, however, I am satisfied if the department wishes to send them all there, wipe out their one hundred and ten per cent and make a loss; but the trade will not be satisfied.

Mr. Mayhew: The average price of the skins by Fouke was $82.68. That is in the December sale. The average for the skins from Martin of Toronto was $61.22.

Mr. McLure: I gave the minister those figures.

Item agreed to.

Field services—

146. Field services administration, $362,398.

Mr. McLure: Does the patrolling of the fishing areas come under this item?

Mr. Mayhew: That comes under item 147.

Mr. Riley: I want to say a word on this item of field service administration. It comes somewhat in the nature of criticism, but not too harsh, of the manner in which some of the field services are being administered in my province. From time to time I have had occasion over the past two years to make contact with the various officials in the province of New Brunswick, and the maritimes generally, and I cannot always say that the reception to my representations, logical and reasonable representations, and to my requests, has been all that I would want or that the people of my constituency would want.

I have no criticism to offer of the officials here in Ottawa, but I would suggest to the minister that he investigate the attitude of some of the officials in the field, and more particularly in the maritime provinces, toward the representatives of the people, the duly elected representatives of the people, who go to them seeking information which they are entitled to receive.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. member will have to come over to this side of the house.

Mr. Higgins: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is it correct that he is organizing a maritime bloc?

Mr. Riley: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that you call the hon. member to order because he is not speaking on the particular item on which I am speaking at the present time.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Riley: Some months ago I had occasion to address a request to the Department of Fisheries in respect to a weir licence, for which application had been made by some constituents of mine. It took me until the other day to learn that the officials of the Department of Fisheries, for some reason unknown to me, were not prone to divulge the information which I requested in connection with this weir application. I had made representations on behalf of two fishermen who wanted to build a weir at a certain location in the constituency of the hon. member for Charlotte. I knew that no previous licence had been granted for this weir site. I asked for confirmation of this from the officials of the department. I gathered that the officials here in Ottawa were exerting their best efforts to obtain that information, but for some reason unknown to me—I hope it can become known to the minister—this information was not available.

It came to me indirectly that these officials believed that there was already a weir licence granted for this site. I finally learned the other day that no such licence had been granted and that the site was wide open for any application. I hope that in the future the minister will be able to persuade his field men that as public servants they have a duty in respect to the public whom they serve, and to the member of parliament in any riding who represents the public within his constituency. I hope that when I seek information from the department in the future it will be forthcoming a little more expeditiously than it has been in the past.

Mr. Mayhew: If the hon. member would care to give me the information at another time—perhaps he does not want to say more in the house—I will be very glad to look into it for him.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): There are just a few remarks I want to make on this item. In years gone by when this item came up I stated my views with regard to the authority that was given officials of this department. I refer now particularly to young men who are taken into the department with no knowledge of the fishing industry, no knowledge of the conditions under which the industry is working. Apparently they take quite a lot of responsibility upon themselves, and they interpret some of the regulations to suit themselves, and they carry on in that manner. I have had cases brought to my attention. I want to mention one or two and I will resume my seat.

Only a short time ago a sardine canner of my county was building a new factory. They had built many to my memory. I would say that every one they have built to date is of two storeys. As officials of the department know, usually they have their packing room upstairs and their salting sheds and so on on the first floor. This particular factory was being built and the second storey was partly completed when a young employee of this department, who had been with the department for a year or a year and a half, drove over in his car and told them they would have to stop building and tear down what they had above the first storey. There was no co-operation. There was no reasoning with the chap at all. He just said: "You have got to stop; you can have only the one storey. You might as well do it now as at any other time". I know the foreman of the plant very well. I know he called the Halifax office and he told them that they were building regardless of what the junior inspector might have said.

I do not believe that action of that kind meets with the approval of this department, but it is the same old story that I have been bringing to their attention. There is too much authority given to junior members of the department. They are all young men, as I say, with no experience in the fishing industry, and they have the authority to go in and put the shutters on a man's fish curing plant or whatever it may be. You can investigate further but the onus is placed on the fish processor. He has to prove that everything is in order.

I do believe that there are members in the department who should have that authority, but I do not believe it should be vested in these young men without experience.

There is one other matter I want to bring to the attention of the minister. In the county of Charlotte there is an extensive sardine industry which has been carried on there as long as in any part of the North American continent. I know that there are weir privileges that have been in my own family for thirty or forty years. They are built each and every year, and they have been operating each and every year. In the last two or three years when you paid your licence fee to the young officer—it is only a dollar—he would take your dollar and he would give you a receipt, but he would inform you immediately that it was impossible to get a licence until they were ready to operate. I cannot find any regulations of that kind in the fish regulations here and I wonder where they get the authority to take that responsibility on themselves. It has created a lot of ill feeling because the regulation that applies to one part of the county does not apply to another. The regulations that apply in Charlotte county may not apply in Saint John county under the same regulations here in Ottawa. I do feel that in employing young men on these particular jobs the fisheries department should be very careful to see that they are not power mad. From my experience I would say that a few of them, not many, when they find out they have this authority, do not hesitate at all to use it. I believe it is something that should be very carefully considered.

Mr. Riley: Harking back to the criticism which I offered of some of the officials of the minister's department a few minutes ago, I want to make it quite clear that that criticism was not directed to junior officials in the field but to the seniors.

Item agreed to.

Field services—

147. Protection branch; operation and maintenance, $2,435,661.

Mr. McLure: The minister has said that illicit fishing comes under this item. I should like to have some information with regard to patrolling in my own province. How many patrol boats are used to do the work in Prince Edward Island, and how many men are employed? Early in the winter I wrote to the minister about a very capable man, a veteran who had served in the army, and I received a satisfactory reply from the minister in which he said he would see to it that this veteran was placed back on the job he had been squeezed out of. However, as time went on I found this man did not receive the appointment, although appointments were made in Queens county which he could have filled. They were filled by men from Prince county. I say this was most unfair to the veteran in question. He has complained ever since that veterans do not get a square deal. I would ask the minister to look into the matter.

This veteran stated to me in a letter that he was squeezed out because in his patrol work, in connection with illicit lobster fishing, he captured too many of the traps and gear, thus bringing upon himself the displeasure of some people who thought he was too efficient in his work because, as a result of his efforts, they were being driven out of illicit lobster fishing activities, which go on continuously in my province, with the exception of the winter season.

I bring these three points to the attention of the minister, in the hope that, even if he cannot give an answer tonight, he will look into them and give some further information.

[Mr. Stuart (Charlotte).]

Mr. Mayhew: In Prince Edward Island we have four of our own boats on the service and three chartered boats. These are all two-man boats.

Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer again to a matter I brought to the attention of the minister and his department before. The first occasion was in December of 1949. I refer to a problem which has been in existence for some time, particularly in the southwestern section of Nova Scotia. I have in mind the diverse points of view as to the use of draggers and trawlers.

For a period of two years or so I have been receiving dozens of resolutions, and I can state accurately hundreds of letters, from people who are closely connected with the fishing industry, with respect to the use of draggers, and the alleged damage they are doing. I do not propose this evening to read many of these resolutions or any of the letters, but I should like to deal with the different points of view and to place on record as briefly as I can the views presented by those in favour of draggers and trawlers as well as the views of those who are opposed.

Those who oppose the use of draggers claim that they destroy other species of fish, and they refer particularly to lobsters. They claim draggers destroy large quantities of small fish, that the use of draggers damages the bottom, and thus indirectly damages the fishing industry. They claim that the draggers destroy fixed and set gear.

I should like at this point to mention only one resolution, a brief one which reached me recently from the municipal council of Digby. This resolution was moved and seconded by men who have been in the fishing industry all their lives. The resolution reads as follows:

Whereas the Fundy tides—

That is, in the bay of Fundy—

—are too strong to permit marker buoys to float at all times and

Whereas draggers operate at all times of the tide, this makes it extremely hazardous for fishermen to operate with "long line" or "trawl" for overnight or over-tide sets.

Be it further resolved that this board request the Hon. R. W. Mayhew, Minister of Fisheries, to have immediate regulations made to have all Canadian draggers (otter trawl) operate outside of the three-mile limit until such time as the preceding resolutions shall have been considered. By the adoption of the foregoing resolutions, the economy of this fishing area would be assured."

That resolution is similar to the one referred to by the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings about two weeks ago, when he made reference to a resolution passed by the affiliated boards of trade of the Annapolis valley. He said at that time that he understood that a copy of the resolution had been, or was being, sent to the minister.

The opponents of the draggers also claim that they break up the herring and haddock schools. Then they bring up the matter of the twelve-mile limit for large Canadian trawlers, and the three-mile limit for all other trawlers.

On the other side of the picture those who are in favour of the use of draggers claim that if it were not for their use there would not be the great increase in volume there has been in recent years. They claim that in order to have continuity of supply we must have the draggers. They say that those who are in the fish business cannot wire their wholesalers or retailers a day in advance and say, "We are sorry, but the weather is bad and there will be no fishing boats out today. Therefore there will be no fish."

In other words their argument is that to have continuity of supply we must have the draggers which can fish in much heavier weather than the small boats. They state that it was only two years ago when the fishermen in the St. Mary's bay area were opposed to the use of draggers for flounders; yet today that opposition has almost completely disappeared.

Indeed, I have here another resolution contained in a wire which reached me only a few days ago stating that the trawl and gear fishermen of the St. Mary's bay area had made a request that dragger fishing be stopped, and then they qualified it by limiting it to haddock dragging, thus approving the practice in connection with flounders.

Those who are in favour of the draggers say that the proportion of small fish caught and thrown back is very low, varying between five and fifteen per cent, depending on conditions. They admit that the dragging brings forth rocks—and we know that it does, but they say there is no proof that this is damaging the fishing grounds, and suggest that the use of the dragger may have the same effect on the fishing grounds as do the plow and the harrow in agriculture.

They claim that set gear is not damaged, or if so only on rare occasions, because, under the terms of the licence granted, a dragger cannot go within half a mile of fixed gear, or of a boat using handlines.

Of course all this brings up a great many questions. In going through my constituency—and, as the minister knows, the chief industry of southwestern Nova Scotia is fishing; the production of fish in the counties of Yarmouth and Digby stands fourth and fifth respectively in Nova Scotia—one of the first questions which comes up is this: Is the twelve-mile limit fair? It is my understanding that the twelve mile limit is a Canadian law applying to large Canadian trawlers, and that under section 56 of our Fisheries Act they are not allowed to come within twelve miles of the shore. By the same token, draggers can come in from other countries and fish up to within three miles of our shores. I understand that the idea of section 56 when it was first promulgated was that it would provide protection for our own inshore fishing industry and would conserve our fishing grounds. Yet what we are doing today is reserving the area from the three mile to the twelve mile limit for draggers of countries other than Canada.

I am told by the fishermen that only a few years ago Norway endeavoured to set up a four mile limit, but this was opposed by the British government and brought before the international court at The Hague. In view of the problems that are being brought to my attention by those in the fishing industry and in view of the divergent points of view that exist I should like to ask the minister some questions which I should appreciate his answering before his estimates are finished.

In connection with the fishing limits, I should like to know whether the twelve mile limit is purely Canadian in nature, and whether draggers from other countries are allowed to fish within three miles of our shores. Is the trend toward the use of draggers and trawlers universal in so far as fishing countries are concerned? What is being done in other countries in order to protect inshore fishing grounds?

What results have been obtained by the biological research board concerning investigations as to the number of fish caught and thrown back and as to whether or not the fishing grounds are being depleted. Has there been an increase in the volume of the catch, and can that increase be credited to the use of draggers and trawlers? Is the department watching closely the situation as it affects these two large groups which have opposing points of view?

I realize, as do all the fishermen of southwestern Nova Scotia, that this is an extremely difficult situation, not only from the economic but from the social point of view. There are hundreds of fishermen who own small power boats and have $2,000, $3,000 or $4,000 tied up in boats, engines and gear. I realize that the problem is complicated further by the fact that out of 62 licences for trawlers and draggers granted in Nova Scotia, some 38 have been granted in the counties of Yarmouth and Digby, 32 of these being in Digby county alone. It is from Digby county that most of the objections are being received.

I would appreciate it if the minister could clarify this situation before his estimates are completed, for the benefit not only of the fishermen but of the people generally. The people in that part of Nova Scotia are divided in their opinions but they are trying to arrive at a fair and objective decision as to whether or not the use of trawlers and draggers is in the best interests of the fishing industry and as to whether or not their use is going to be permanently injurious to those who are hand-lining from small boats.

Mr. Mayhew: Mr. Chairman, the twelve mile limit is set up by a regulation governing our own nationals, and has to do with boats over 100 feet long. That regulation can be amended only by this House of Commons. Personally I cannot see the justice of allowing people from other countries to fish up to the three mile limit when our people must stay beyond the twelve mile limit. It was put into effect for the benefit of the inshore fishermen.

I would ask the hon. member to read this pamphlet which was put out by the fisheries research board. If he does I think he will get answers to most of his questions. We are constantly studying the matter and are not losing any time on it. It is a most interesting problem. We are trying to reconcile two factions and it is not easy. You get that problem quite often in the fishing industry. Everyone who catches one type of fish feels that the other fellow is doing wrong.

Mr. Higgins: Can the minister state whether or not there is any worth-while depletion taking place on the Grand Banks?

Mr. Mayhew: I am told that there is no evidence of any depletion on the Grand Banks.

Mr. McLure: I should like to make a few observations about the lobster fishing industry in Prince Edward Island. Certain regulations have been laid down for the conservation of lobsters which provide considerable revenue for our fishermen. However, illicit catching and trapping of lobsters is going on continually in the province and this is liable to destroy the industry. I do not know what effort the minister is making to get proper officers to enforce the law, but I do know that he will find that poaching and illicit fishing is proving a real menace to our lobster industry.

[Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth).]

The parliamentary assistant will bear me out when I say that this illicit fishing begins immediately after the regular season closes. These people are unable to operate canning factories openly, so they can the lobster in shacks and the product that goes to market is not very good. In most cases when you open a can prepared in these small factories you are able to tell immediately that the lobster has been caught illicitly.

Is the department going to get after this illicit fishing and protect those fishermen who are not engaging in that type of operation? I know of one fishing community where the fishermen themselves do the patrolling. They watch over the fisherman to see that he leaves no gear out when the season ends. If he put out a trap he would be reported immediately. I think it would be an easy matter. I understand that you have aeroplanes flying over the sea to locate traps. Then you have your men on shore. These commodities are not all to be eaten right there. They have to be sold to the wholesalers and should be traceable. These people are ruining the lobster industry for the real fishermen of the province.

Mr. Mayhew: D-day for lobster poaching is the 10th of August, and there is going to be a fight. We expect to win the fight because we are going to use more boats, instructors and other people who know the job, to try to win the fight. It is not only lobster fishing in the province of Prince Edward Island and the maritime provinces generally. There is also poaching in the province of British Columbia from which I come. I do not know of any more despicable occupation than for a man to engage in that kind of poaching. We are spending large sums of money every year to protect the fisheries, and we are not going to be beaten by a few fellows who are trying to spoil the industry for future generations.

Mr. McLure: How many fines were collected in Prince Edward Island for illicit lobster fishing last year and how much gear was destroyed? There were quite a few men employed in patrolling, and they did not seem to get anywhere in what they were doing.

Mr. Mayhew: I cannot give the hon. member the answer to that question tonight. I am informed we have the information and I will get it for the hon. member some time before we finish.

Mr. Kickham: On the matter of poaching, speaking for the riding which I represent, there is no poaching at all. As evidence of that, last year there were nine fish guardians, and eight of those were appointed to the constituency represented by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries, and one I believe for the constituency represented by the hon. member for Queens.

Item agreed to.

Protection branch—
148. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $154,583.

Mr. Sinclair: Item 148 is exactly the same phrasing as item 150. To be quite sure that I am talking on the right item, I will speak on item 148. As you know, I represent a very large fishing riding. First of all I want to express my delight that for the first time in my time in parliament the estimates of the Department of Fisheries have not been brought up at the last minute. The minister has very wisely brought his estimates forward earlier in the session. In recent years the fisheries items were brought up in the last day or two, and members like the hon. member for Peterborough West would be calling "carried, carried".

Mr. Fraser: Oh, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member never heard me call that at any time.

Mr. Sinclair: I do not suppose there are more than a dozen members here who represent fisheries ridings. I am sorry that the hon. member for Lethbridge is not here tonight because he would always listen to us with great attention even on the last day of the session when we would be telling our story about fisheries. I must first compliment the minister for having arranged for the estimates concerning this primary industry to be brought up early for once.

The second thing I want to say—and members in this house know I am not one given to flattery; unfortunately I have a rough tongue—is how pleased the fishermen of my riding are with the progress the fisheries department has made in recent years, and not just under the present minister. When Frank Bridges was minister some years ago he put the fisheries department on a good footing by recruiting very bright young men from the army, air force and navy for the fisheries service, and lifting the department up to a high rank in the public service. I am proud to say that the present minister—and after all he represents British Columbia as well—has carried that work forward by bringing to the Department of Fisheries his ability in business administration which has made him one of the better known industrial figures in British Columbia.

Mind you, there was not the same great need for proper organization of the fisheries industry in British Columbia as there was in other provinces of Canada, but he has applied his industry to both the east and the west. That brings me to the particular point I want to speak about. I wish to discuss two dams. The first is the Capilano dam in my riding, and hon. members will understand my interest in it when they realize that the word "Capilano" is included in the name of my constituency. So far as this dam is concerned, I want to be on record as being entirely in accord with the stand taken by the minister. Most hon. members have been to British Columbia and to Vancouver, and those who have not are looking forward to their first visit. Vancouver is a great city. One of its greatest advantages is the fact that it has an extraordinary water supply from the Capilano and Seymour rivers arising in the mountains on the north shore.

We are seeking to build a larger dam on the Capilano river, and the sport fishermen are complaining that it will cut out a very small run of steelhead and cohoe salmon which are of use to sport fishermen but of no use to commercial fishermen. I feel, and most people in my riding feel, that the water supply to the lower mainland of British Columbia is of more importance than small sport fishing, and that the stand taken by the department is right. I know that they want to establish a small fish hatchery at the foot of the dam, but I think in fairness to the people of the lower mainland, and in view of editorials in the Vancouver press, the minister should make a short statement on the intent of the department to maintain a small sport fishery but not to stand in the way of Vancouver having an expanded water supply from the Capilano river.

The second thing I want to talk about is something I have talked about for five years, and I am especially sorry that the hon. member for Lethbridge is not here because in the last five years I think he is the only member who ever listened to me. I am talking about the Sakinaw dam. The minister is smiling because I even flew him over this little dam one day to show him how essential it was. There is in my riding a small fishing town called Pender Harbour, a town peopled almost entirely by the very best of all immigrants, Scots immigrants, men who observe the precepts laid down by my minister, the Minister of Finance, men who work long hours. They work from the beginning of the fishing season to the end of the fishing season, and now and again they start before the fishing season and quit after it has ended. They are eager producers. I know they go fishing afterwards sometimes because they are eager to produce, and as a consequence, so far as the Department of Fisheries is concerned, they are what the hon. member for Prince calls poachers. All they are are eager Scotch producers.

This is my long speech. One year I make a short speech and one year I make a long speech about this little dam, and this is my long speech. Men from this little fishing town of Pender Harbour go to sea and fish off the coast of the riding of Comox-Alberni. They fish off the Queen Charlotte islands in the riding of Skeena, and they fish in Bristol bay off Alaska. They come back in the winter to rest with their families. In years gone by the loggers built a small dam on that lake which held the salt water out. The sockeye salmon went up there, and as you know they go to fresh water lakes. When the dam was there 16,000 to 20,000 sockeye were caught right in the mouth of the little fishing town by the old men, who used to go to the west coast out in the open Pacific, and the children who learned to fish there. It was very satisfactory fishing.

Then the loggers were finished, the dam went out, and there was no more fishing. To these Scotch fishermen it was a pretty easy process of rationalization that when the dam was there the fish were there and when the dam went out there were no fish. Therefore they asked me as their member to have the little dam restored. The cost of the dam is $2,000. Any one of these fishermen with his family could have put in the dam in two days because the trees are there. However, there are various property rights involved and they would have to consult this and consult that. So I turned to the minister—it was not this minister but the third one before him—and asked for this dam to be built to protect the area. He had an investigation carried out. I am not against college graduates. I do not think anyone in this house spent longer at college than I did. The minister sent these college graduates, biologists and so on to investigate, and one of them fell off a log into the water and lost his notes. We have had more graduates in there looking at the area, but they could not find the fish. To get back to the business of the dam, all we know is that when the dam was there the fish were there, and now that the dam is not there the fish are not there.

I realize I am being unfair to the minister now, but each year there has been $5,000 in the estimates to replace this dam, and each year there was some reason why it could not be replaced. I write back to some of my Scotch friends at Pender Harbour to tell them why this dam has not been replaced. They say: But Jimmy, you know that when the dam was there the fish were there; now the dam is not there, and the fish are not there. Phooey on the department. Then they say: The Minister of Public Works put up a half million dollar small boat harbour for these people farther up the coast; why not this dam?

The Indians own the land on either side of the site of the dam, so I went to see them. I am glad that I am making this speech early in the session, because if it were the last day of the session members on all sides would be shouting "carried". Instead, they are listening to me make this speech. We went to see the head of the Indian band, and there was the secretary, who was a Scotchman, and myself who is a Scotchman. If it had been white men who owned the land on either side, they would have demanded a heavy rental. The Indians said they would agree to take a a fee of $25 per year to permit the dam to be built. I am backing what the minister has done for fisheries in British Columbia; I am asking his support of this project in my riding because I have failed completely to explain to the fishermen in my riding why the dam has not been erected. Members in this house know that I do not fail easily with words. I should like the minister to put on the record the reason why, for the fifth year, the little Sakinaw dam has not been built.

Mr. Mayhew: Mr. Chairman, I did have an opportunity of flying over the Sakinaw river with the member for Coast-Capilano. I did see it, but with extreme difficulty. I cannot imagine how any of our officials could fall into it unless he fell parallel with the stream. I am sure that if he fell across it he would have his feet on one side and his head on the other. We sent one of our officials up there to try to find the salmon, but he came back and said he could not find them. He said that if there were any there must have been too many Scotchmen there with taking ways, because there were not many fish left.

The real reason for the failure to re-establish the dam is due to the fact that we have negotiated with the Indians for the last three years and have agreed on a price, but we are now waiting for the approval of the band. This approval has not yet come to us. We cannot go there and put a dam across this creek until we get permission from the Indian band. If the hon. member can use his good offices to secure the consent of the band, we shall have his dam built inside of six weeks.

Mr. Sinclair: I do not want to be unkind, but some months ago I was at a meeting of the band during which they gave approval. The Indians were very keen for it, because they were great beneficiaries of this dam.

But if that is all that is holding it up, I hope that next year I shall not have to make this speech which I have made for the last five years on the Sakinaw dam.

Mr. McWilliam: Under this item, Mr. Chairman, I wish to bring to the minister's attention the vital need for adequate protection of the smelt fishing industry of the Miramichi. To show the importance of this industry to the people of the eastern part of the constituency of Northumberland, which I represent, I wish to read into the record some statistics from the annual report of the department of industry and development of the province of New Brunswick. The smelt fishing industry of New Brunswick produced in the 1950 season 3,857,300 pounds of smelts. This amount was a decrease of 251,600 pounds as compared with the 1949 catch. While the quantity of smelts caught in 1950 showed a decrease, the landed value nevertheless showed an increase of $88,294. This decrease in quantity meant a loss of $35,224 to the fishermen.

The Miramichi bay and river produce the vast majority of the smelts caught in New Brunswick, and the drop of 251,600 pounds can be directly attributed to the heavy losses of nets and gear suffered by the Miramichi fishermen in December, 1949, and January, 1950. These losses, caused by unseasonable thunderstorms and a run-off of ice, were estimated to be $100,000. I can assure hon. members that this is a big item for the fishermen. In many individual cases fishermen lost their entire outlay on nets and gear, which had dire effects. Many of them were unable to re-establish themselves, so could not continue fishing for the remainder of the season. In some cases fishermen have been forced to give up smelt fishing entirely. Government assistance was requested from both the provincial and dominion governments. However, the governments held the view that the losses were a normal risk of the trade, and as requests had been received from numerous other localities in the maritimes and British Columbia for compensation for similar losses, it was felt that a precedent could not be established because it would have to apply to all parts of Canada.

Protection is vitally needed for the smelt fishing industry of the Miramichi. Another loss such as that suffered in the 1949-50 season could mean the finish of the smelt fishing industry in that area. The cause of the run-off of ice during the winter months, which carries the nets out to sea, is stated to be due to the washing away of the shores of Portage island in Miramichi bay. This widens the channel at that point, with the result that the former natural barrier no longer exists, and in the mild weather the tides carry the ice, and the nets, through the enlarged opening into the gulf of St. Lawrence. In many cases not only the gear and nets were lost, but the fishing shanties and in two or three cases the horses were also taken out to sea. On many occasions requests have been made that artificial barriers be erected to stop the heavy run-off of ice, thereby preventing the heavy losses in nets and gear which are being suffered each year by the smelt fishermen of the Miramichi. I again appeal to the minister and, through the minister, to the cabinet, that immediate action be taken to provide that protection which is so vitally needed.

As to a survey of the situation, my information to date is that the Department of Public Works made an interim report on the matter and estimated that the cost for the works required would run in the vicinity of one million dollars. Before further consideration could be given to the actual construction, the Department of Fisheries felt that, as the matter is so important, a complete survey should be made of the fisheries of the Miramichi. I understand that this survey is now being completed.

I realize that the minister and his department are fully cognizant of the difficulties experienced by the smelt fishermen of the Miramichi; and while it has been suggested in some quarters that it is doubtful that even the works proposed will accomplish the desired objective, I strongly urge—and I make a strong plea on behalf of the Miramichi smelt fishermen—that the minister take immediate steps, in conjunction with the Department of Public Works, in the matter of providing adequate protection for the Miramichi smelt fishing industry, which is the chief means of livelihood for many good Canadians residing in east Northumberland.

Is the minister in a position to make any statement at this time?

Mr. Mayhew: The department is extremely sympathetic to this project. When it was referred to the Department of Public Works, the estimate for doing the job was fairly high, we thought, and we ordered a re-investigation. In fact, at the end of the hon. member's own statement he set out the position of the Department of Fisheries. That investigation will go on until we get some final answer with respect to the matter.

Mr. Higgins: May I ask the minister if the Minister of Finance is responsible for the reduction of the amount of this item as well?

Mr. Abbott: He has the wholehearted co-operation of all departments.

Mr. Noseworthy: The Minister of Finance can answer that question.

Mr. Mayhew: The reduction here is in the boat construction program in the acquisition of equipment.

Mr. Higgins: It was for boat construction?

Mr. Mayhew: Yes. We are not slackening the service because we have been able to charter boats and in the past ten years have built up the fleet.

Mr. Sinclair: Can the minister make a few comments with regard to the Capilano dam?

Mr. Mayhew: I intended to say something about that matter when I was on my feet last time, but I was thrown in the Sakinaw creek. The position has been known to the department for quite a considerable time. The greater Vancouver water board wanted to put a dam across the Capilano stream in order to provide the city of greater Vancouver with a supply of water. We have had engineers and biologists in there to make a study of he situation. They recommended that, for the amount of fish of all kinds that was going up there, the cost of building a fishway over a three hundred and twenty-foot dam was away out of proportion to what the fish would be worth. They therefore recommended that a fish hatchery be placed at the foot of the dam or in that area. That would be used for the propagation of the steelhead which is the sport fish and the fish that the Vancouver people are mostly interested in because many tourists come there merely to engage in sport fishing of the steelhead. It has been responsible for a good many dollars being left with the city of Vancouver or with the merchants of the city of Vancouver.

We are therefore recommending that the hatchery be built. It is at a cost of $75,000, I think, for the building itself, with an annual maintenance cost of $15,000. The lawyer for the water board was in Ottawa recently. We told him our position and he seemed to be quite satisfied with it. But he has not yet returned home to Vancouver. I will be in Vancouver, I hope, this coming Saturday and will be discussing the matter further with the board and with the game department of the provincial government.

Mr. Adamson: Where is the dam going to be built on the Capilano? Is it going to be built above the canyon or below it?

Mr. Sinclair: In the canyon.

Mr. Mayhew: In the canyon, about three and a half miles from the mouth of the river.

Mr. Adamson: Below the suspension bridge?

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Sinclair: Just above the suspension bridge.

Mr. Mayhew: Just above it.

Mr. Riley: I wonder if the minister will give us some information as to whether or not he has given any consideration to the re-establishment of a salmon pond in the vicinity of Saint John harbour. As the minister is no doubt aware, the Saint John harbour salmon is probably the most palatable—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Riley: —and the most appealing example—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I will ask the hon. member not to discuss the quality or the value of the fish in the various sections of the country. I remember that in a debate in a previous session, this sort of discussion was allowed and it was carried on for quite some time on the merits and the value of the various fish in existence here and there all across Canada. If the hon. member wishes to speak to the item under consideration, namely "Protection branch—Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment", he will have to disregard the quality of the salmon taken at Saint John.

Mr. McLure: It is always well to do a little bit of advertising.

Mr. Riley: It is extremely difficult to be silent on this subject, Mr. Chairman, but I bow to your ruling. The harbour fishermen of Saint John, who take these fish from the waters as they come in from the bay of Fundy on the way up the Saint John river, have in recent years become somewhat concerned over the problem of preservation and conservation. On various occasions, I believe, I have made their representations known to the minister, but to date we have not had anything concrete in the way of evidence that the department intends to do something about the re-establishment of this pond. We had such a pond a few years ago, but unfortunately it was destroyed. Unless some measures are adopted in the near future to rebuild this pond or to find another pond in the vicinity of the harbour, we feel that we shall probably be faced with a considerable loss of revenue on the part of our fishermen; and above and beyond our fishermen, the world at large will be a great loser.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May I ask the minister why his department puts four estimates of the same heading in different places, estimates such as: "construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment", which are items 148 and 150 and items 152 and 157, a total of $653,683. The minister should inform us what construction is proposed under each of these four items, and explain why they are placed in separate positions in his estimates in the items I have just mentioned.

The Deputy Chairman: I think what we should deal with now is item 148. It is the only item before the committee. The hon. member for Cumberland will notice that item 148 comes under protection branch; whereas the other item of construction or acquisition of buildings to which he referred, item 152, comes under the fish culture and development branch. It is always for a different branch. Therefore let us deal with item 148, which comes under protection branch and is for the construction or acquisition of buildings and so forth. Let us deal with this item now, and we can proceed to the other item.

Mr. Riley: Can the minister give me something in the way of a reply to my query?

Mr. Mayhew: I understand that some time ago they had a salmon pond in Saint John. It was destroyed and it was thought not advisable to build it again because it was interfering with some harbour works in Saint John itself. Not in my time has it been considered, but we shall be glad to take a look at it again and see if the situation has changed at all.

Mr. Riley: I would point out to the minister that where this pond was previously located such a thing did happen. Some harbour works that were going on did tend to render the pond useless, but in the vicinity of Saint John harbour, and in the vicinity of some of the coves of the bay of Fundy, there are ample locations for the building or the laying out of other ponds. Such a pond might also be set aside in Saint John harbour itself. I hope that in the interests of the fishermen in my constituency, and more particularly the fishermen in Saint John harbour itself, some real, active consideration will be given to this project.

Mr. Mayhew: This subject of the pond in Saint John has not been brought up in my time and the deputy claims it has not been brought up in his time. In reply to the hon. gentleman I said we would look at the matter again to see if the situation has changed. Possibly there are some other locations where it would be proper and right to do this kind of work. I cannot give the hon. member any other promise than that. Last year we did extend the hatchery in Saint John. When I was down there myself I did not think the hatchery was in very good shape physically and I suggested that we do some improvement on it. It has been improved and enlarged, and the other matter will be looked at as soon as we get a chance to do it.

Mr. Riley: I hate to differ with the minister or with the officials of his department. I know that this is something they cannot recall at the moment but I remember distinctly being in contact with one of the officials of the department and making the representations that were made to me by the fishermen who earn their livelihood by taking the salmon from Saint John harbour.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): There is one other matter that I want to bring to the attention of the minister. Perhaps it has been brought to his attention on many other occasions, but I have a suggestion to make. It is in connection with the size limit of lobsters in the maritime provinces. I am going to speak of the bay of Fundy area because I do not know the regulations that might be suitable in other parts of the maritime provinces. But I do believe that the department might well consider the idea of making a survey through their inspectors in the maritime provinces to determine for themselves the wish of the majority of the fishermen whether the size should be increased. I want to give a few examples of why in my opinion there should be an increase in the size of lobsters. The Conley Lobster Company, St. Andrews, New Brunswick, is the biggest exporter of lobster on the North American continent, and today they are selling in the United States of America about 95 per cent of the lobsters that they purchase. My contention has always been that you have to give the customer the kind of goods he wants regardless of whether or not you think he is right. Very recently I wrote to the manager of the company, and I want to put on the record the brief letter he wrote to me. He said:

> In reply to your recent letter regarding size limit of lobsters, we are enclosing this week's price card, together with one of March 19, which shows great discrepancy between one pound lobsters and select lobsters.
> However, this does not tell all the story, as we are now selling our excessive chickens for 35 cents which is below the current Boston market price, a copy of which I am enclosing. We are selling truck loads of chicken lobsters below the Boston price of lobsters as we are receiving more than we can handle of this particular size.
> W. L. Williamson

Two price cards were sent to me. I hold in my hand one for January 29, 1951, which shows select lobsters, which would be two and two and one-half lobsters, selling for 90 cents a pound on the American market; at the same time chickens, which are small one-pound lobsters, for 60 cents a pound. On March 19 select lobsters were 80 cents a pound, and the chickens were 55 cents a pound. On April 23 selects were 75 cents a pound and chickens were 50 cents a pound. On April 2 select lobsters were 80 cents a pound and chickens were 55 cents a pound.

The market in the United States today demands a larger lobster than we are producing. I realize that in areas of the maritime provinces where lobsters are canned there may be some argument in favour of a smaller sized lobster, but I do believe that if you made a survey in the bay of Fundy area today you would find the fishermen very much convinced that the size limit of lobsters should be increased. I base that argument on the fact that a lobster that weighs a pound this season, worth 35 cents, if left in the water a year and permitted to shed its shell another year, would increase in weight to a pound and a quarter or larger and would increase in value by 50 per cent. In my opinion that is a very fine investment, and I would suggest to the minister and the officials of his department that they could get the information with very little trouble through their inspectors in the various sections where the lobster industry is carried on, to determine whether in the opinion of the fishermen there should be an increase in the size of lobsters.

I want to emphasize once more that the United States market demands a two or two and one-half pound lobster, and more than half of the lobsters we are producing are of the one pound or one and one-half pound size.

Mr. Mayhew: What the hon. member is saying is correct in theory, I think. It is a very controversial subject and one that would be very difficult to administer. We are having great difficulty now in getting the fishermen to catch only the size limit; we would have great difficulty if we increased it another two inches. Our difficulties would multiply.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Does the minister find that difficulty in the bay of Fundy area?

Mr. Mayhew: I would not like to single out any. The only way I know of doing it would be to take a sort of Gallup poll in the district. We could investigate it in that way.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The minister has referred to the idea of having a Gallup poll. I realize that in years gone by the Department of Fisheries has obtained information through inspectors in different sections of the maritime provinces. Those inspectors get in touch with individual fishermen. They make reports, and those reports would come to Ottawa. Decisions could be based upon them.

[Mr. Stuart (Charlotte).]

Mr. McLure: Last year there was considerable talk about the building of a fish plant at Hunter River in Queens county. Evidently, after all the advance propaganda in connection with it, this matter died out. I understand now that a promise has been made to Prince Edward Island that a fresh fish processing plant is to be erected in the fall. I have here a letter from the board of trade of Souris, Prince Edward Island, stating that their town is better situated than any other for this fresh fish processing plant. Is the department going to build that plant in the province?

Mr. Mayhew: The department does not build plants anywhere; that is left to private industry. The industrial development bank has helped fishing companies, but not the department, to build such plants. I understand that at the present time one is contemplated at Souris, Prince Edward Island. However, that would probably be financed with the aid of the industrial bank.

Mr. McLure: How much financial support would they receive?

Mr. Mayhew: I cannot answer that; the directors of the industrial development bank would have to answer it. The company would make application to the industrial development bank, and it would be done having regard to the value of the plant. I cannot say offhand what it would be.

Mr. McLure: Would they not have to have the recommendation of the Department of Fisheries before they could go to the industrial development bank?

Mr. Mayhew: Not at all.

Mr. McLure: They would apply as a private concern?

Mr. Mayhew: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman, items 150 and 151, I suggest, might be considered together, because they both deal with the same subject matter.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee to consider items 150 and 151 together?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Field services—Inspection branch—

150. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $114,475.

Fish culture and development branch—

151. Operation and maintenance, $693,844.

Mr. Mayhew: This is one of the services of which we are particularly proud at the present time. It has to do with the streams service, predator control, modified hatchery production and oyster and clam culture. I am sure the hon. member would be interested in the oyster culture, because this item would be connected with the operation of the oyster farm of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Catherwood: Would a proportion of this expenditure for fish culture and development be spent in connection with the inland lakes and rivers of Canada, in conjunction with the work done by the provinces?

Mr. Mayhew: None of this amount is for inland lakes and rivers. They do not come under this department, but rather under the provincial government.

Mr. Catherwood: There is no contribution in this item for the provinces?

Mr. Mayhew: No, not for inland lakes and rivers.

Mr. McLure: What is the production of oysters in the maritime provinces, particularly Prince Edward Island? What quantity of oysters is shipped to the United States? Are we still importing from that country? What royalties are collected by the department, and what are the rentals on leases?

Mr. Mayhew: In 1948 from Prince Edward Island there were 15,464 barrels valued at $123,115; in 1949 there were 12,326 barrels valued at $100,426; and in 1950 there were 16,104 barrels valued at $105,375. The bulk of that is sold in Canada, and some shuck oysters are imported from the United States.

Mr. Follwell: I know the minister has said that his department does not have control of inland waters. However, the federal government would have control, I should think, of the export of fish. There is one condition which is causing alarm to many fishermen, and that is that Americans are coming to Canada with tank trucks, taking live fish back and seeding American lakes. It seems to me the department would do well to see how many live fish are being exported. Is the minister in a position to make a statement regarding the possibility of licensing the export of live fish, so that this seeding of lakes and rivers in the United States would not reach the point where American buyers would be able to secure all the fresh fish they required from their own lakes, instead of coming here?

Mr. Mayhew: What type is the hon. member referring to?

Mr. Follwell: I am referring particularly to bullheads.

Mr. Mayhew: Conservation is purely a matter for the provincial government. We are ready to co-operate if there is anything we can do, but the responsibility is that of the province.

Mr. Follwell: Would it be within the jurisdiction of the department to control the licensing of the exporting of live fish to the United States?

Mr. Mayhew: I do not think this department would take jurisdictional responsibility without a provincial request. I do not know whether the Department of Trade and Commerce would have any authority to prohibit export.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to refer briefly to the culture of oysters in the Malagash district. Last year the information given to the committee was very disappointing. When the department undertook the culture of oysters in that territory it held out great expectations for the people who were directly interested. The department acquired certain beds and had them planted and cultivated, but up until last year the results have been most unsatisfactory.

I should like to know what further activities have been carried on up to the present time and what the results have been. There is a large acreage of foreshore there and at one time large quantities of high quality oysters were produced. There would appear to have been a gradual deterioration in production in the area.

Mr. MacNaught: The situation on these flats is a most difficult one as the damage from ice is considerable. Back in 1937 approximately nine acres of the shore was reserved in the Malagash basin as an experimental farm. Experiments were carried on much in the way they are carried on in the United States and Europe. Dikes were built in an effort to provide sufficient water when the tide was out in order to keep the young oysters growing.

The great difficulty we find is the lack of interest by the people in that area. We believe that oyster spat can be collected with proper concrete containers and young oysters can be grown there. Of course, later on they would have to be transferred to other areas. If that is done the chances of growing good oysters are considerable. But as I said before, the chief difficulty is the lack of interest on the part of the fishermen in that area.

The production of oysters along the Northumberland shore from New Brunswick down past Pictou has gone up during the last ten years. In 1936 the production was approximately one thousand barrels, and in 1946 production had increased to four thousand barrels. The experiment to which the hon. member refers is going along slowly. It takes considerable time and expense to do anything on that foreshore owing to the killing of the oysters by ice in the winter.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Do I understand from the parliamentary assistant that there is more than a possibility of successful cultivation of oysters in that area?

Mr. MacNaught: I believe that that statement is approximately correct. I would point out to the hon. member that this is an expensive type of propagation. We have to build dikes to keep the water in and of course the problem of silting must be contended with. We feel that there are possibilities there, but the great difficulty is the lack of interest on the part of the people in that area.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The lack of interest to which the parliamentary assistant refers is due largely to the lack of success on the part of the department. The department undertook a certain responsibility in connection with the culture of oysters and they have not made a success of their venture. Therefore the people in the area are not interested. Do the experiments carried on indicate that there is a possibility of successful oyster culture in that area?

Mr. MacNaught: The only answer I can give my hon. friend is to read the last paragraph of a report which was prepared by one of our officials, and which is as follows:

> The more pressing problem is that of securing acceptance of what is now known. While it is true that new ideas are resisted by these farmer-fisherfolk, it is probably also true that the department has not given sufficiently wide publicity to its findings on this coast. In Prince Edward Island much the same problem was overcome by distribution of oyster farming circulars and by the holding of "field days" at which the latest culture methods were demonstrated. This latter method was the more effective. The time is probably overdue when the department should attempt something similar in this part of Nova Scotia.

Mr. McLure: What success has the department had in the culture of quahogs, or hard shell or cherrystone clams? There is a big demand for this product. Does it really take seven or eight years for them to reach the point where they are saleable?

Mr. Mayhew: I know Dr. Pritchard and Dr. Needler have been interested in this matter. I shall try to get more information for the hon. member.

Items agreed to.

153. Consumer branch, $55,490.

Mr. Riley: Item 153 has to do with the consumer branch of the Department of Fisheries. First of all I should like to express my congratulations to the minister on the very fine work that is being done all over the country by this branch in promoting the consumption of fish—

An hon. Member: What work?

Mr. Riley: —the different methods by which fish can be cooked and served, and generally by encouraging the population of our country to consume this very important natural product which abounds in our waters both inland and in the seas surrounding the country. I should like, however—and I believe I am in order when I say this—to deplore the absence of the different varieties of Atlantic fish from the parliamentary restaurant. I believe this is one place where the consumer branch of the Department of Fisheries might encourage the consumption of fish generally throughout the country by endeavouring to have the different varieties of salt water fish introduced to members of the House of Commons through their parliamentary restaurant.

In the past two years since I have been here I have occasionally had the privilege of eating some Gaspe salmon, but the main fare served to members in the parliamentary restaurant has been lake trout, Winnipeg goldeye—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member should make his representations to the parliamentary restaurant committee. There is a committee on the parliamentary restaurant, and I think he should address his representations to the members of that committee.

Mr. Riley: May I not direct my representations to the consumer branch of the Department of Fisheries through the minister?

Mr. McLure: Yes, go ahead.

The Deputy Chairman: It is a matter for the hon. member to decide. We are now discussing an item which is entitled "consumer branch" of the Department of Fisheries. The hon. member has made his point in his remarks, and I am sure the minister will do whatever he can to convey to the authorities in charge of the parliamentary restaurant the message of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert. Beyond that point I think he should address his remarks to the committee on the parliamentary restaurant.

Mr. Riley: I take it that when the item in the estimates affecting the consumer branch of the Department of Fisheries is being discussed it is an opportune time to bring out the point that I was endeavouring to make, that the best method of introducing the consumption of fish to the consumer of Canada is through their duly elected representatives in the House of Commons.

Mr. Stick: What kind of fish?

Mr. Riley: If I may not proceed, that is all I have to say.

Mr. Mayhew: I may as well say to the hon. member that the head of this branch went to the parliamentary restaurant after the press statements and made inquiries to find out if there was any truth in the statement that we were not getting proper fish, that the parliamentary restaurant was not buying the proper kind of fish. We found they were buying good fish but the facilities in the kitchen of the restaurant were not of the very best. If you want to order from the table d'hôte you will probably not get the very best, but if you put in a short order you will get a choice piece of fish. There again we can only go in and inspect these places to see if they are serving the fish properly. That is as far as we can go. We cannot tell them what to do. You yourself can determine what kind of fish you are going to eat in the parliamentary restaurant by asking for it. When there is enough demand for it they will order it.

Mr. McLure: In the details there is reference to a demonstrator and lecturer. Then there is reference to home economists. I should like to know what they do.

Mr. Mayhew: The home economists give demonstrations at various places in Canada mostly as to the cooking of fish. If the hon. member would care to come to the kitchen in the west block some afternoon we will give him a demonstration, and he will go home very pleased with it.

Mr. Riley: May I take it from the minister's explanation in reply to my question that if the hon. member for St. John's West were to ask for Newfoundland cod in the parliamentary restaurant he might have it, that if I were to ask for mackerel I might have it, or Saint John harbour salmon, or if the hon. member for Northumberland were to ask for Miramichi salmon or smelts he might have them?

An hon. Member: Or Saskatchewan whitefish.

Mr. Mayhew: If enough people ask for any species of fish they will be obliged to get them.

Item agreed to.

154. To provide for the destruction of harbour and gray seals, $30,000.

Mr. McLure: What is the reason for the decline in this item from $60,000 last year to $30,000 this year? Have you found that there are not as many harbour seals? I know that in Prince Edward Island they are greatly on the increase. This year, on account of the ice floes coming down from the north, you could pretty nearly say that the place was polluted with gray and harbour seals. For the protection of the smelt fisheries there I think we should still continue to have this bounty paid for the destruction of harbour seals.

Mr. Mayhew: There is a bounty on seals. Last year there were only enough seals killed to require $19,000, and we had $60,000 in the estimates. Because only $19,000 was used last year we have cut the estimate in two and put it at $30,000. I think that is the answer.

Mr. Higgins: The bounty is only 50 cents?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How much is the bounty?

Mr. Mayhew: Five dollars for pups, and ten for adult seals on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. Higgins: Where was the $19,000 spent last year?

Mr. Mayhew: In Nova Scotia $5,430 was spent; Prince Edward Island, $680; New Brunswick, $2,555; and British Columbia, $10,865. There was nothing in Newfoundland.

Mr. Higgins: Nothing at all?

Mr. Mayhew: No, they did not kill any.

Mr. Higgins: They certainly did.

Mr. Mayhew: They did not report it.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will proceed with the resolution in the name of the Minister of Agriculture concerning the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act; then Bill No. 357, an act to amend the Criminal Code (race meetings); then the resolution in the name of the Minister of Transport to authorize Canadian National Railway Company to construct a line of railway from Sherridon to Lynn lake; Bill No. 338, an act to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act. I understand these matters are not contentious, but here is the one that comes next, Bill No. 296, to amend the Income Tax Act. We could conclude by taking up Bill No. 194, an act to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
