HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

FOURTH SESSION—TWENTY-FIRST PARLIAMENT

15 GEORGE VI, 1951

BEING THE 92ND SESSION FOR THE PERIOD 1867-1951

VOLUME IV, 1951

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE FOURTEENTH DAY OF MAY, 1951, TO THE TWELFTH DAY OF JUNE, 1951, INCLUSIVE

INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

OTTAWA
EDMOND CLOUTIER, C.M.G., O.A., D.S.P.
PRINTER TO THE KING'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY CONTROLLER OF STATIONERY

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 14, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

HOCKEY

WINNING OF ALEXANDER CUP BY VALLEYFIELD BRAVES

Mr. Robert Cauchon (Beauharnois): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. No doubt the house would like to know that the Valleyfield Braves hockey team, from my constituency and home city, won the Alexander cup. I am sure my colleagues from the city of Toronto and surrounding district expected me to make this announcement.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO PERMIT PERFORMANCE OF SERVICES FOR DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 284, to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act.

Mr. Knowles: Expain.

Mr. Howe: This bill provides for a number of minor amendments to the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act, several of which are required as a result of the establishment of the Department of Defence Production, and several for purposes of clarification of clauses relating to general operations.

This amendment defines the minister as the Minister of Defence Production, and removes any legal doubt that may exist as to the corporation's authority to perform such services as may be authorized by any other statute, for example the Defence Production Act, even though such authorities are not specifically set out in the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act. It redefines, for clarification, the revolving nature of the advances which may be made to the corporation from the consolidated revenue fund under the act.

In keeping with a reduction in the number of members of the board of directors from nine to six, all of whom are engaged in the work of the Department of Defence Production, this amendment reduces the number of directors required for a quorum from five to three members.

Finally, it is considered that a number of its officers and staff should be brought under the Civil Service Superannuation Act, as are the employees of other crown companies and agencies. Consequently, this bill gives the governor in council power to designate certain officers and employees of the corporation to receive the benefits of superannuation under the latter act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PROFITS FROM PARTICIPATING POLICIES AND VOTING BY PROXY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 285, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for two amendments to the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. One relates to the provision in the act which now limits to ten per cent the proportion of profits from participating policies which may be transferred to shareholders' account. In point of fact, that ten per cent is the maximum. In the case of smaller companies that proportion is transferred; but over the years the larger companies have voluntarily reduced that proportion, in the case of the largest company the proportion being 2½ per cent. It is considered desirable now to limit by statute the proportion which may be transferred to shareholders' account from the participating policy account, and the limitation will be substantially in line with the present practice.

The second amendment extends to participating policyholders the right to vote by proxy. Under the act as it stands at the present time, in the case of life insurance companies, policyholders may vote in person but not by proxy. Both of these proposed amendments are, I think, a further protection to the participating policyholder.

As is usual in dealing with bills of this kind, I would propose that on second reading it be referred to the banking and commerce committee.

Private Bills

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a second time?

Mr. Abbott: If the house were to give unanimous consent—I do not know whether there is a desire to debate the bill—I would move second reading today and have it referred to the banking and commerce committee; otherwise it could stand over. I do not think there is any controversial question involved in the bill.

Mr. Graydon: Has anybody seen the bill?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Graydon: It is a bad precedent to give a bill second reading before anybody has seen it.

Mr. Abbott: Next sitting.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman unanimous consent to move second reading now?

Mr. Abbott: No, Mr. Speaker; next sitting.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 268, to incorporate the Polish National Catholic Church of America in Canada.—Mr. Croll.

Bill No. 269, to incorporate Independent Pipe Line Company.—Mr. Welbourn.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—ENLISTMENTS, POSTINGS AND RELEASES, APRIL, 1951

Mr. Fulton:

1. What were the totals of enlistments in the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian army (active) and the Royal Canadian Air Force respectively, for the month of April, 1951?

2. What were the totals of releases from each service as above for the same month?

3. How many were posted within the Canadian army (active force) to the Canadian army (special force) in April, 1951?

Mr. Blanchette:

1 and 2.

	Enlistments	Releases
Royal Canadian Navy..	421	98
Canadian Army	802	334
Royal Canadian Air Force	1,229	86

Note: These figures are subject to final verification when documentation is received from commands and units, which will be about the end of May.

3. Two officers and sixty-seven men.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION—SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER

Mr. Knight:

1. What irrigation projects, and at what locations, on the South Saskatchewan river immediately south of Saskatoon, have received assistance from P.F.R.A.?

2. What are the arrangements by which these ditches are constructed, maintained and used?

3. How are the costs shared as between the federal, provincial and local authorities, and the individual farmers?

4. How long has such irrigation been in operation?

5. How many acres have been involved for (a) pasture or forage crops; (b) grain?

6. Has the scheme been successful in terms of increased yields of crop?

7. Are there plans for extension this year?

8. To what extent have existing ditches or equipment been damaged by the Pike lake flooding this spring?

9. What arrangements have been made for repairs necessary due to flood?

10. How would such flooding be affected by the construction of the proposed South Saskatchewan dam?

Mr. Gardiner:

1. Pike lake—townships 32 to 36, range 6, west 3; Valley park—sections 27 to 34, township 33, range 6, west 3; Frenchman flats—townships 32 and 33, ranges 5 and 6, west 3.

2. P.F.R.A. assisted in construction of the main works only. Operation and maintenance is the responsibility of local water users' associations, formed under provincial statutes.

3. P.F.R.A. constructed the main works for source of water supply to be delivered to the distribution system constructed by the province.

4. Pike lake, three years; Valley park, two years; Frenchman flats, two years.

5. (a) Irrigable Pike lake, 900 acres; Valley park, 1,200 acres; Frenchman flats, 1,800.

(b) Cultivation and cropping; see answer to No. 7.

6. Very successful in two crop seasons.

7. Main canals completed. Extensions would be planned by local and provincial authorities.

8. Main works not damaged. Provincial distribution system in lower section reported damaged, but not seriously.

9. Provincial authorities advise distribution system will be repaired immediately.

10. South Saskatchewan river project would prevent such floods caused by main river flow, but would not affect such floods caused by local run-off.

P.E.I. FISHERIES PATROL SERVICE

Mr. McLure:

1. Has Mr. Andrew Hutchinson, of Belle River, Prince Edward Island, been discharged from the fisheries patrol boat service?
2. If so, when, and for what reason?
3. How many fisheries patrol boats are operating in Prince county, Queens county and Kings county, Prince Edward Island?
4. What are the names of men employed in this service, and when was each appointed?
5. How many are veterans?

Mr. MacNaught:

1. No.

2. Employment is seasonal. Mr. Hutchinson was employed in the 1949 season, but was not re-engaged for 1950.

3. Prince county, two; Queens county, three; Kings county, one.

A seventh boat patrols both Queens and Kings counties.

4. Name	Date appointed in 1951
A. McPhail	May 1
H. Campbell	April 16
R. B. Betts	"
Wm. MacDonald	"
W. B. Dyment	"
A. DesRoches	May 1
L. Noye	"
W. W. Glover	"
G. H. Watts	"
T. A. Gauthier	"
V. T. Doucette	"
J. Llewelyn	"
N. MacIntosh	"
A. Gallant	"

5. Ten served in the armed services.

NORTH RUSTICO, P.E.I., BREAKWATER

Mr. McLure:

1. What steps are being taken in connection with repairs at North Rustico harbour breakwater in Queens county, Prince Edward Island?
2. Will tenders be called for this work, or will it be done on a cost plus basis or by day's work?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Contract plan and specification for this work have been prepared.

2. It is expected that a call for tenders will issue within the next month. A portion of the repair work is not suitable for performance by contract, and it is proposed to proceed with these additional repairs by day labour.

NEWSPRINT

Mr. Bertrand:

1. Has the government an estimate of the probable newsprint output in Canada for the year 1951?
2. If so, what is such estimate, and does it represent an increase over previous years, and in what proportion?
3. What proportion of the increase, if any, will be for (a) domestic or national consumption; (b) the export trade?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Yes.

2. Subject to raw material shortages and unforeseen difficulties, total newsprint production in Canada in 1951 is estimated to be approximately 5,450,000 tons. This will be an increase of 171,000 tons or 3·2 per cent over production in 1950.

3. As there are no government quotas or restrictions on the distribution of newsprint, distribution depends on contract positions and sales policies of individual manufacturers.

Mr. Bertrand:

1. Are the newspapers published in 1950 now subject to quotas in the allotment of newsprint?
2. Is the quantity of paper necessary for the normal publishing of newspapers ensured by the said quotas?
3. If not, what steps are being taken by the government to ensure an adequate supply to such newspapers?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. There are no government quotas or restrictions on the distribution of newsprint. In some cases individual newsprint companies, unable to fill in full the demands of their customers, are understood to be allotting available production to them in an equitable manner based upon their individual contract positions.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Newspapers are obtaining their supplies in the normal way. The government has not heard of any cases of Canadian publishers with a contract for supply who are not expecting to receive all, or nearly all, of the amount for which their contract provides.

Questions

Mr. Bertrand:

1. Has the government any information as to the probable average cost of newsprint in the year 1951?

2. Has the government formulated any plans to deal with a possible increase in the cost of newsprint?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. No.

2. No.

SUGAR

Mr. Balcom:

1. How many tons of raw cane sugar were imported into Canada for refining during the calendar year 1950?

2. What was the dollar value of same?

3. From what countries, and how much from each country?

4. Has the government carried on any recent negotiations with the Acadia sugar refinery at Woodside, Nova Scotia, with respect to the reopening of their plant?

Mr. McIlraith:

1, 2 and 3.

	Tons	Value
British East Africa	76,430	$ 9,590,431
British Guiana	110,531	13,649,767
Barbados	63,764	7,275,841
Jamaica	141,192	16,364,279
Trinidad	65,958	7,602,346
Australia	82,995	10,966,777
Fiji islands	82,231	10,131,549
Cuba	4,465	414,467
Dominican republic	4,704	413,754
Totals	632,770	$76,409,211

4. No.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WESTERN GRAIN ELEVATORS—OVERAGES

Mr. Fair:

1. During each of the crop years 1945-46 to 1949-50, did the elevator companies operating in the prairie provinces have any overages of grain as a result of their operations?

2. If so, what companies showed such overages, and how many bushels by each company in each crop year?

3. How was the overage disposed of?

4. What is the approximate value of grain sold as a result of the overage by each company?

5. Did the companies receive full payment for the grain from the Canadian wheat board?

Mr. McIlraith: Return tabled.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—EMPLOYEES NOT BRITISH SUBJECTS

Mr. Gagnon:

1. Are there any employees in the Department of Agriculture who are not British subjects?

2. If so (a) what are their names; (b) respective positions; (c) nature of their work: (d) salary of each; (e) place of origin; (f) by whom and on what date was each recommended?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Return tabled.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE—PROFESSIONAL AND SPECIAL SERVICES

Mr. Fulton:

1. What was the total paid by the Department of Trade and Commerce for professional and special services in the fiscal year 1950-51?

2. What person, persons, firms or companies received payments of $10,000 or more under this heading in the said year, what was the actual amount of each payment, and for what service was the payment made in each case?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PORTUGAL COVE, NFLD., WHARF

Mr. Higgins:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government of Newfoundland, the resident engineer of the Department of Public Works at Newfoundland, the Department of Public Works, or any minister of the government, and any person, persons, or organizations since April 1, 1949, relating to construction or repairs of a wharf at Portugal Cove, Conception bay, Newfoundland.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to the passing of this motion, with the usual reservation that we get the consent of the province of Newfoundland.

STETTLER, ALTA., POST OFFICE BUILDING

Mr. Beyerstein:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Post Office Department, the Department of Public Works, or any minister of the government or employee thereof and any person, persons or organizations, since January 1, 1948, relating to the erection of a post office building at Stettler, Alberta.

CAMROSE, ALTA., POST OFFICE BUILDING

Mr. Beyerstein:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Post Office Department, the Department of Public Works, or any minister of the government or employee thereof and any person, persons or organizations, since January 1, 1949, in relation to (a) the erection of a new post office building; (b) provision of additional space or alterations to present building at Camrose, Alberta.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

TORQUAY NEGOTIATIONS—REFERENCE OF SUBJECT MATTER TO BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

On the order:

Government notiecs of motion—the Prime Minister—the following resolution:

That the subject matter of the Torquay negotiations, namely, the final act of Torquay; the decisions agreeing to accession; the Torquay protocol to the general agreement on tariffs and trade; the modifications of the schedules to the general agreement on tariffs and trade resulting from the Torquay negotiations; and the declaration on the continued application of these schedules, be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to press this motion, but if it is the wish of hon. members to have the matter referred at once to the banking and commerce committee so that they may get fuller information about it before having any debate upon it in the house, I should be prepared to move it now. If, however, it is felt that there should be a debate before the subject matter goes to the committee, we shall have to find an appropriate occasion for such a debate.

Mr. Drew: I think that it would be preferable to have this matter dealt with in the ordinary way, so that there may be an opportunity to consider the extent of the discussion that should take place.

Mr. St. Laurent: Then it will stand.

Order stands.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

REPRESENTATION OF PROVINCES AT DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Bater (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. What provinces have signified their intention to be in attendance at the conference next Monday with respect to old age pensions?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister stated last Monday that it was the intention, pursuant to the assurance given by him at the dominion-provincial conference last December, as soon as the provinces had intimated their willingness to agree to a constitutional amendment, to provide for a continuing committee to discuss the matter of old age security legislation in so far as it concerns the provinces. That day, under the Prime Minister's name, a telegram was sent to each of the provinces asking them if it would be convenient for them to attend the proposed conference on May 21. All provinces have signified their intention to attend a conference. However, the acting premier of Quebec has indicated that May 21 would not be a convenient date. As a result, his request has been communicated to the other provinces suggesting that we meet on May 23.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? In view of the Prime Minister's statement a week ago Friday that the possibility of an amendment to the British North America Act to provide for a three per cent turnover tax was still open to consideration, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether there has been any indication from any of the provinces that their ability to carry out this program would be dependent upon tax resources other than those now available to them?

Mr. Martin: I have no such information.

FISHERIES

CONVERTIBILITY OF STERLING FOR PURCHASE OF NEWFOUNDLAND SALT CODFISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. On March 12 I asked the Minister of Finance a question regarding the convertibility of sterling into Canadian funds. Since then I understand the Minister of Fisheries has been looking after the matter. My question is this. The fishermen of Newfoundland are most anxious to know the results of negotiations with the government of the United Kingdom for an extension of the arrangements to sell Newfoundland salted codfish in European markets for sterling. Can the Minister of Fisheries indicate the position at this time?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, evidently a number of Newfoundland members were at church yesterday and offered a word of prayer that this convertibility would be a reality. In coming here today they are looking for an answer to the prayer. I am glad to be able to say that it has been effective.

Mr. Drew: I am glad there is one method by which we can get action from this government.

Mr. Mayhew: I am happy to inform the hon. member for Trinity-Conception that we have today received word from the United Kingdom, through the Department of Finance, that they have agreed to extend the arrangement for another year covering the catch of 1951, subject to an over-all ceiling of $4 million. This will provide for sales to Portugal, Italy, Greece and Spain at levels comparable to those from the 1950 catch. It will be recalled that at the time of union the United Kingdom agreed to an extension of this arrangement for one year only. Agreement to further extensions has been most helpful, particularly to Newfoundland.

This special arrangement with respect to the sale of salted cod for blocked sterling represents a temporary solution pending the more basic reorganization of the fisheries being worked out by the joint federal-provincial fisheries development committee. Already much new private capital is being invested in filleting and freezing plants.

HUMAN RIGHTS

ENACTMENT OF LEGISLATION AND APPROVAL OF UNITED NATIONS DECLARATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the government comply with the recent request of a delegation consisting of Mr. B. K. Sandwell and others for the introduction in both houses of parliament this session of a resolution approving the inclusion in the Canadian constitution of a declaration of human rights and liberties, and that pending appropriate legislation such approval should affirm parliament's acceptance on behalf of Canada of the United Nations declaration of human rights?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): As promised the delegation consisting of the Canadian committee for a bill of rights and associated organizations, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and I reported to our colleagues the representations that had been made. The question calls for a statement of government policy in that regard. I am not in a position to make that statement of policy today. I hope to be able to do so within the next few days.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EMPLOYMENT OF WORKERS AT GOOSE BAY AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the unemployment insurance office at Amherst, Nova Scotia, arranging for the employment of men for construction work for the United States government at Goose Bay airport?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Orders for workers have been received, not from the United States government but from the Canadian office of Drake, Merritt and Piper, of Moncton, New Brunswick, who are contractors for the work on the airport. These orders have been placed through the Moncton office of the unemployment insurance commission and have been cleared through various offices, of which Amherst, Nova Scotia, is one.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Monday, May 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That votes No. 84 to No. 111 inclusive, and vote 566 of the main estimates 1951-1952 be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): On the last day that this debate was held I challenged the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to justify a certain statement that he had made. Since then I have had an opportunity of reading his remarks in Hansard. I believe they are somewhat different from the words that he used, according to my notes, but there is no difference in the sense. According to Hansard he said, as reported at page 2754:

It is also sometimes loosely said that the United Nations forces are fighting in Korea to defeat communism. There is perhaps some colour for this mistake, since the aggression perpetrated is by the communist states, and has its roots in the totalitarian communist nature of those states. Free men everywhere must be determined to resist communism. But it is a confusion, I think, of categories to think that communism as a doctrine or form of government must be fought by armed forces, or that such is the purpose of United Nations military action in Korea.

Then he went on to say:

Communism itself, as a reactionary and debasing doctrine, must be fought on other planes and in different ways.

I realize, sir, that the minister is trying very subtly to show a distinction between communism as it exists in theory and what we are fighting in Korea, but I wish to submit to him that there is no distinction between communism as it exists in the world actually and communism as we are facing it in Korea; that communism and aggression in Korea are synonymous terms. In support of that I should like to draw attention to observations made by his colleague who sits next to him, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), in the debate the very next day, when he used this expression, as reported at page 2800 of Hansard:

This is a fight, Mr. Speaker, in which international police action is working to stop communist aggression, communist gangsters.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs himself, in his speech before the United Nations on September 27, had a somewhat different approach, and was not so subtle in making a distinction. He said:

This war in Korea is but the continuation by armed and open aggression of the policies which communist imperialism has been pursuing by other means in other states. It is part of the theory of communism that the disruptions and dislocations of a post-war period give to a communist minority its best chance to seize power by force and maintain it by the terror and repression of the police state. Systematically the forces of communist imperialism, in these last years, have been trying out these theories in the four corners of the world.

I think, sir, the observation of the Minister of National Defence, and that speech from which I have just quoted of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, are more in line with reality than the observations made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on May 7. It is very confusing; the ordinary man or woman cannot follow the argument that tries to distinguish between actual communist aggression and the communistic doctrine or form of government.

In his speech at the United Nations on September 27 the minister, describing the attack in Korea, also said this:

In Korea, where the Soviet army had been present in force and where a communist minority was established in power in part of the country, conditions seemed admirably suited for communist seizure of the whole country. This time, however, the attempt was more open and violent than usual, and this time it met with collective United Nations resistance. This is what makes the aggression in Korea stand out. Despite all propaganda camouflage, the fact that North Koreans invaded the Republic of Korea was clear. This was not a coup d'état engineered by a minority as in Czechoslovakia, nor a regime imposed by an occupying force as in Roumania. This was armed invasion. As such, it came as a shock to peace-loving nations. But it also acted as a stimulus to them. A swift and sudden assault on a peaceful nation had an obvious meaning for us all.

Mr. Speaker, I submit it still has the same meaning, but the Secretary of State for External Affairs and some of his associates seem to be forgetting that it still carries the same meaning. Communism is not and has not been for thirty-four years merely a doctrine or form of government. It is a diabolical dynamic thing. It is a comprehensive policy with many doctrines aiming at the destruction of all the freedoms and the inherent and hard-won rights of man. It is the darkest and direst shadow that has ever fallen upon this earth.

Winston Churchill, in his book "Great Contemporaries", 1937 edition, at pages 199-200, discusses this point. I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs must be familiar with the passage. I apologize for its length, but it seems to me it is most appropriate to be used in reminding the minister about communism and what it means. Mr. Churchill says:

But communism is not only a creed.

A creed is a little more than a doctrine, because a creed embraces many doctrines.

It is a plan of campaign. A communist is not only the holder of certain opinions; he is the pledged adept of a well-thought-out means of enforcing them. The anatomy of discontent and revolution has been studied in every phase and aspect, and a veritable drill book prepared in a scientific spirit for subverting all existing institutions. The method of enforcement is as much a part of the communist faith as the doctrine itself. At first the time-honoured principles of liberalism and democracy are invoked to shelter the infant organism. Free speech, the right of public meeting, every form of lawful political agitation and constitutional right are paraded and asserted. Alliance is sought with every popular movement towards the left.

The creation of a mild liberal or socialist regime in some period of convulsion is the first milestone. But no sooner has this been created than it is to be overthrown. Woes and scarcity resulting from confusion must be exploited. Collisions, if possible attended with bloodshed, are to be arranged between the agents of the new government and the working people. Martyrs are to be manufactured. An apologetic attitude in the rulers should be turned to profit. Pacific propaganda may be made the mask of hatreds never before manifested among men. No faith need be, indeed may be, kept with non-communists. Every act of good will, of tolerance, of conciliation, of mercy, of magnanimity on the part of governments or statesmen is to be utilized for their ruin. Then when the time is ripe and the moment opportune, every form of lethal violence from mob revolt to private assassination must be used without stint or compunction. The citadel will be stormed under the banners of liberty and democracy; and once the apparatus of power is in the hands of the brotherhood, all opposition, all contrary opinions must be extinguished by death. Democracy is but a tool to be used and afterwards broken; liberty but a sentimental folly unworthy of the logician. The absolute rule of a self-chosen priesthood according to the dogmas it has learned by rote is to be imposed upon mankind without mitigation progressively for ever. All this, set out in prosy textbooks, written also in blood in the history of several powerful nations, is the communist's faith and purpose. To be forewarned should be to be forearmed!

And then Churchill says this, about his own writing:

I wrote this passage nearly seven years ago: but is it not an exact account of the communist plot which has plunged Spain into the present hideous welter against the desires of the overwhelming majority of Spaniards on both sides?

And may not I comment, is this not an exact account of the communist plot which has plunged Korea into the present hideous welter against the desires of the overwhelming majority of not only Koreans, but also Chinese, and, I would say, Russians as well?

Communism exists only in theory. As we know it, it contains a militaristic element without which it could not exist and has never existed. Communism is but a name to cover tyranny, injustice, malice, hate, international enmity and persecution of religion. It is a movement centred in Moscow that plots and plans and aims relentlessly to control the lives of all the people of the world. Korea is an example of how that works. Therefore to placate or to appease in Korea, or with the Chinese communists, would in my opinion be a more serious disaster than was Yalta, and with more serious consequences. The plan in Korea is not a solitary instance, but part of a pattern, a proposed Asiatic or eastern pattern, for world domination. Therefore a negative statement of policy such as we have had from the minister, and which we now hear from statesmen in the United Nations, gives little hope to the enslaved peoples of the world.

MacArthur therefore was a symbol. He was recognized by the free peoples of the world as a symbol, because he stood four-square to all the winds that blew. He had a definite policy. He was sure of himself, and his definite policy was the reason for his being hated by the communists.

A most interesting commentary respecting MacArthur's attitude is found in an article which appears in the United Nations World for May, 1951. This article, entitled "Four Shots in Teheran," describes the assassination of the late prime minister of Iran. Referring to the cause of his death, the writer states:

> One fact over which he had no control decided the issue—the Korean war.

Then it goes on to say:

> In the days following the murder, when the mobs paraded in Teheran, one cry was heard above all others. It was not a cry for bread or tractors; it did not ask for social liberty; it was not directed against the rump parliament, the Shah, or the landowners; it was directed against a general then living in Tokyo. However improbable it seemed, the mobs were shouting "Down with MacArthur!"

In today's issue of the Ottawa Citizen there appears an article on the front page entitled "Ridgway feels U.S. does not understand issues." It is a dispatch from the Associated Press, New York, and says:

> In a letter to his church, General Matthew B. Ridgway, supreme allied Far East commander, said the United States does not seem to understand the issues in Korea.
> The letter was read Sunday by Right Rev. Paull T. Sargent, rector emeritus of St. Bartholomew's Protestant Episcopal Church. He said the United Nations commander wrote from Korea:
> "Would God the American people might see a full length movie of current events here in their true setting. It would, I think, make crystal clear the issues for which their sons fight and are content to fight. Yet America seems not to know.
> Hundreds of thousands of poor people, the old, infirm, infants, the sick, fleeing night and day across country, over the ice of frozen streams in temperature at zero, no shelter at night but that obtained from huddling together and from such of their belongings as are on their backs or ox or small two-wheeled carts, driven to all this by one seemingly overpowering fear, the fear of government by communists.
> Is not the issue truly whether some day our women, our babies, our sick and our aged, are to be driven forth by Asiatic masters, or now while yet there's time, this America and our allies may extinguish all petty issues and unite with all they have to destroy the greatest peril we have ever known?"

Communism is a colossal fraud and is deserving of our highest contempt.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

There is another article, in the same issue of the United Nations World, by Eugene Lyons, an experienced newspaper reporter who has spent many years in Moscow. He criticizes other correspondents who, with the assistance of the Russian government, have written articles and books praising the Russian experiment. He calls the Russian people the neglected item in the world equation. He states that the Russian people are prisoners in a colossal penitentiary and subjected to all the inventions of tyranny. They have to suffer many cruelties. They are not permitted to go outside their country or to have contact with other countries. They are not permitted to know the truth about what goes on in the outside world. A colossal fraud and injustice is being perpetrated upon the Russian people.

This article draws attention to the moral responsibility resting upon the statesmen at the United Nations and upon the statesmen of the world generally. Should the people behind the iron curtain be abandoned to their doom? The people of Poland were once allies of the United States and of the United Kingdom, but after the conference at Yalta they were progressively handed over into the hands of their former enemies, the soviet rulers. Do we think that these people and the other peoples in the eastern countries should remain for ever under that tyranny and under that injustice?

I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is familiar with the enlightening statement made by Stalin to President Roosevelt at Yalta when President Roosevelt was advocating free democratic elections in the countries in eastern Europe. Stalin said:

> A freely elected government in any of these countries would be anti-Soviet, and that we cannot allow.

That applies to all countries behind the iron curtain, and in Asia, especially in China, where a communist government is in power at the present time. It applies to Russia, where a communist government exists. I should like to direct attention to a pamphlet issued by the Foreign Policy Association as part of its headline series. It is entitled "Face to Face with Russia." It was written by Philip E. Mosely, and it says:

> From the point of view of soviet leaders, war and peace are continuing, if not alternating, aspects of one continuous, inescapable struggle. The nature of the struggle and of the contending forces may change, as they see it. But the struggle cannot be wished out of existence. And "compromise" has an evil sound in the Russian political vocabulary.

Then at page 48 he states:

> But does the soviet concept of continuous struggle—a struggle which must last until the soviet form of socialism is adopted throughout the world—mean that war is literally inevitable?

Victory for the United Nations forces in Korea would be a setback for communism and would cast the deepest gloom over the Kremlin. But victory for the communist forces, or even a stalemate which might be paraded as a victory, would give them the greatest joy.

We have noticed recently changes in the foreign policy of the United Kingdom. It has changed its attitude in some respects, perhaps as a result of the terrible suffering inflicted on a British regiment in the recent communist drive. Whatever the cause, the United Kingdom is prepared to change its attitude. Last year the United Kingdom sold $350 million worth of goods to communist China while British soldiers were over there fighting communist troops and laying down their lives. I think the iniquity of such a proceeding is now being recognized. The United Kingdom also is reported to have changed its attitude on the bombing of bases in Manchuria. I believe it is now generally recognized that if large air forces should come from Manchuria and inflict serious damage upon the United Nations forces, the United Nations air force would be permitted to pursue them across the border into Manchuria and bomb the bases from which they come.

There are certain other matters in connection with foreign policy about which we know the general attitude of the United Kingdom, about which we know the attitude of the United States, about which we certainly know the attitude of the Soviet republic, but about which we do not know the attitude of Canada. I am going to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he does not think that this house should be informed on these questions and that the people of this country should be informed as to where Canada stands today. Here are the questions:

1. What is the attitude of the government toward the recognition of the communist government of Red China?

2. What is the attitude of the government toward seating communist China in the United Nations?

3. What has been the attitude of the Canadian government toward handing over Formosa to Red China?

The government of communist China is a tyranny which has been imposed upon the Chinese people contrary to the wishes of the great majority. Neither in China nor in Russia would the government consent to have elections on any kind of a democratic basis, because they know they would never be returned. Let us avoid making any mistake that might enlarge the area now controlled by the communists. Let us rather give consideration to restoring freedom or enlarging the area of free government.

I must confess that I agree with General MacArthur and General Ridgway, that the place to begin is in Korea. I hope that the minister, who has expressed his dislike at Canada being an echo of anybody else, will adopt an original line at the United Nations and call for a widening of the bounds of freedom. Did he read the statement made recently in Frankfurt by the mayor of Berlin? He said:

> It is not the strength of communist Russia we fear so much as the weakness of the western nations.

That weakness is not so much military or material as it is moral and spiritual. They fear the vacillation, the wavering and uncertainties that leave the people of the world in doubt as to what they may expect from the United Nations. If the poor suffering people of Korea, of China, of Russia, of all the countries behind the iron curtain, could only speak to us today, they would ask us to adopt a positive attitude such as was advocated not long ago by a very distinguished soldier whom I consider to be a great statesman.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate for the purpose of emphasizing one aspect of our external policy. I refer to what seems to me to be a failure on the part of the government in connection with its foreign policy. I believe the time has come when the government should grant substantial economic assistance to the backward and underdeveloped countries of the world. The government should introduce a measure to provide economic assistance to India in order to alleviate famine in that country.

I want to say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) that his statement of a week ago was very disappointing to me, not so much for what he said but for what he did not say. His statement was divided into two sections, and he devoted approximately equal time to each. The first section had to do with friendly relations with the United States. Our relations with the United States seems to me to be generally satisfactory. I believe they have been fairly satisfactory in the past, are quite satisfactory today, and in my opinion are likely to continue that way in the future. Nevertheless the minister drew fine distinctions, emphasized fine points, and took half of his time to talk about our relations with the United States. In the second section of his speech he dealt with the situation in Korea, and on this matter I am in general agreement with him.

I feel, however, that he should have added to his statement a third section equal in length to either of the first two, and that section should have dealt with the whole question of economic assistance and technical aid to underdeveloped countries. He should have dealt at some length with the present famine situation in India, and he should have told parliament and the country what reason the government has, if indeed it can have a reason, for its failure to act in a generous manner toward India now in its time of need. Therefore I criticize the Secretary of State for External Affairs, not so much for what he said, but for what he omitted to say in his statement of a week ago. That omission underlines the basic difference between the foreign policy of the government and the foreign policy supported by the C.C.F. party. We believe that far greater emphasis should be placed now on the need for economic and long-term technical assistance to the underdeveloped countries of southeast Asia.

On May 2 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) whether the government would consider a grant of food to India or a grant of money with which to buy food. The answer was that no policy in that regard had yet been decided upon. Eight days later the same question was asked by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), and he was given the same reply. In other words, the government has no policy to help meet the situation in India where millions of people are confronted with the threat of starvation. I do not think I have to emphasize the situation existing in India today. It has been reported in the press many times in the last few months. Officials of the Indian government in Canada and in the United States have pointed out that millions of India's citizens are today facing possible death through starvation, that in some areas the cereal ration, which had been twelve ounces per person per day, has been reduced to nine ounces, and in other areas to a meagre six ounces.

As I say, that situation is well known to the government, to members of parliament and to the people of Canada, and for the life of me I have no idea why the government has not acted in a generous way by helping India in this her time of need. Other countries in the world have taken action. Great Britain, with its austerity, and labouring under a severe defence burden, found it possible as long ago as October to divert to India 42,480 tons of wheat that she had purchased from Australia. She not only diverted that large quantity but provided the tonnage for its shipment to India. While the United States administration has not been too effective so far in its efforts to help, it has done its duty by calling upon congress to pass the necessary legislation to supply two million tons of wheat to India.

Recently we learned that China is likely to provide a million tons of food grain in addition to 50,000 tons of rice. Even Russia is supplying 50,000 tons of food, and the Prime Minister of India has said that he hopes he may get 500,000 tons in all. As a producer of surplus food, Canada is certainly in an excellent position to be generous to India. Surely we do not have to leave help of this kind to Great Britain, China, Russia, or to the United States. Surely on humanitarian grounds, if for no other reason, a Christian nation like Canada should be prepared to help human beings in any part of the world facing a situation such as prevails in India at the present time.

In order to emphasize that point, I should like to say that I received, as did other hon. members, a letter dated May 12 and sent from the chaplain's office, Hart House, university of Toronto. It reads as follows:

> In view of the increasing indications that famine in Bihar and Madras will become critical by the end of May, we would again urge our government to send substantial supplies of food to India at once, even at the risk of depleting our own stocks. We urge that this food be sent on humanitarian grounds, regardless of political considerations, as evidence of good will to fellow members of the commonwealth; we urge that it be sent as a gift, or on terms acceptable to the government of India.

The letter is signed by Patrick Daniel for the food for India committee. The names of the members of the committee are on an attached page. Among them one finds dignitaries of many of the great churches of Canada, the Y.W.C.A., heads of departments at the university of Toronto, and other well known citizens. On the second page of the letter there is the following:

> We are also aware that theoretically Canada's situation is such that we have no other wheat available. But our concern, which we believe is the concern of a large number of the Canadian people, is that nothing should be left undone to get food to India as rapidly as possible.

The Canadian people, generous and Christian as they are, are prepared to make a substantial sacrifice if necessary in order that large quantities of food may be shipped to India to prevent starvation. In my judgment the only thing that stands in the way of action by the Canadian people at this time is the government's indifferent attitude. The government alone appears unwilling to grant large quantities of food to India, or to take such other measures as may be necessary to see that such large quantities of food do reach the Indian people.

In addition to humanitarian grounds, there are ideological grounds which would warrant the Canadian government taking whatever steps are necessary to help meet this situation. I believe that members in all parts of this house are aware of the threat that communism presents to the free world. If we are to protect democracy as it exists in the world today, if we are to have that democracy extended, then we must help provide for every nation in the free world the economic basis upon which that democracy can flourish. In my opinion you cannot have democracy in a nation where millions of people face starvation.

In addition to the humanitarian reasons, I suggest that as part of the battle in stemming communism throughout the world, this government should take action now to provide the Indian people with large quantities of food. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the government should make a grant of at least $100 million. This might purchase approximately 50 million bushels of wheat.

I know the minister of external affairs may say that we offered India some of the only kind of wheat we have in surplus supply, and India turned it down. As I understand it, the quantity of wheat that Canada has already offered to India was attached to the Colombo plan and its $25 million. The government said India could take that wheat and sell it to the Indian people, then use the currency she obtained in return for the purchase of $25 million worth of goods to be used for technical assistance. I believe a quantity of wheat could be obtained from Canada now of a grade that the people of India would find it possible to use for human consumption. We in Canada, as was suggested by the leader of this group, the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) a week ago, should be prepared to accept a loaf made from wheat of slightly lower milling quality. By that means we could provide a quantity of wheat for the Indian people, even though it might not come anywhere near the 50 million bushels which I suggested.

Then again, I think it might be possible for the Canadian wheat board to put our No. 4 and No. 5 grade wheat through machines equipped for the purpose and have it separated into its various component grades. At least a portion of the No. 4 and No. 5 grade might be brought up to grades 2 and 3, even though the balance would thereby be placed in grade No. 6 or feed.

If that is not a practical suggestion, I have another suggestion to make. The United States has surplus wheat on hand. If the government were prepared to grant to the Indian nation $100 million, that money might be used for the purchase of high grade wheat in the United States. If the United States government felt that its surplus of wheat must not be reduced because this year's crop might be lower than average, or next year's crop might be lower than average, then I say the Canadian government should tell the United States that when the 1951 wheat crop comes along the Canadian government will sell to the United States an equivalent amount of wheat of the same grade.

I have made these three suggestions, Mr. Speaker, to point out that if the government really wanted to help India it would find a way. If the government had the will it could certainly find the way. We have found it possible—I am not complaining about it, rather I support it—to make $1,600 million available for defence. Surely $100 million to prevent death by starvation amongst millions of our fellow citizens in the commonwealth should not be an insurmountable task for either the government or the Canadian people.

So far this year we have exported fairly substantial quantities of whole and skim milk powder. Of the approximately 9,244 hundredweight of milk powder exported from Canada in the first two months, only 100 hundredweight was shipped to India. In other words, of the quantity of milk powder we have been exporting, India has received only slightly more than one per cent. Milk powder when it is reconverted to milk is as wholesome a food as the whole milk. A large quantity of milk powder sent to India might prevent the death of tens of thousands of infant children from malnutrition and starvation. I certainly believe that is another suggestion that the minister of external affairs, the Prime Minister and the government might consider.

When the minister of external affairs speaks in closing this debate, I should like him to give us some good reasons, if he can, why the government has not done something. I plead with him, with the Prime Minister and with the other members of the government, not to wait any longer, to recognize that Canadians are a generous people, and to bring down a measure which will provide for an immediate contribution of food to India.

Mr. H. A. MacKenzie (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this debate, but since it has run into the second day I feel that I should like to make a few observations. I shall try to be as brief as possible, having in mind what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said the other day about avoiding repetition. I shall try to avoid repeating what I have said on former occasions.

Last December I was one of the members privileged to attend the fifth session of the United Nations at Lake Success. I found this one of the most interesting experiences in my life. I want to commend the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) for the great contribution the Canadian delegation has made towards this world organization that is striving so hard to stop aggression and to contribute something to justice and peace in our time throughout the world. I was indeed pleased to see Canada so well represented by a delegation of at least twenty-five young, highly-trained special officials from the Department of External Affairs. In my opinion this is one of the most important branches of government that we have in Canada today. The Canadian delegation also included members of parliament representing all political groups in the house. At times some of these were assigned to committees of the several branches constituting the United Nations, to represent Canada, and they did their work well. It was most interesting to me, when the nine o'clock conference was held each morning, to have the chairman of these several committees give a review of the developments that had taken place the day before and to report progress.

I am sure that I am speaking what is in the mind of everyone who has attended the general assembly at any time when I say that Canada's permanent delegate to the United Nations, the late R. G. (Gerry) Riddell was a most capable and conscientious young man. He was held in high regard by all who knew him and his passing was indeed a great loss not only to his own family but also to Canada. His place will be most difficult to fill. We all wish the young Canadian, Mr. John Holmes, who is taking his place as acting permanent delegate to the United Nations, all possible success.

I think I should at this time pay tribute to the chairman of the Canadian delegation, our own Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), who is held in such high regard by all, and to commend him for speaking openly and aboveboard of Canada's views on international questions. Because Canada is a member of the United Nations, there is no reason why we should just be a "yes" organization or that we must agree in its entirety with every proposition that is presented by other nations. I am sure his prestige in Canada and elsewhere has been enhanced rather than lessened by his stand that Canada as a member of the United Nations should be consulted with regard to policy in Korea or in other parts of the world.

I think it would be helpful at this time to review just briefly some of the history of China; and I am going to devote the few minutes I have at my disposal to giving some of the background and some of the experience that I had in that country in the Far East. China is one of the oldest civilizations in the world and dates back to some six thousand years ago. It was formerly governed by groups or dynasties. Usually after many years of court life and luxury they became so weak and corrupt that another group would overthrow them and set up a government of their own. This last form of government was held by the Manchu dynasty. They held power for over two hundred years and became so weak and so corrupt that in October, 1911, this dynasty was overthrown, and the Chinese republic still observes that day as a national holiday. It is designated or named the double tenth day, or the tenth day of the tenth month that the republic was formed. But it was not until February 11, 1912, that the first republic was actually established. The first president was Li Yuan-hung. Nevertheless, Dr. Sun Yat-sen played the leading role and a few years later he was chosen as president.

It was most difficult to establish a republic for which neither the people nor the leaders had any previous training nor any program to follow. However, the government worked fairly well until the death of the founder, Dr. Sun Yat-sen. After his death in December, 1925, a three-sided war raged to see who would have control. This was between war lords or so-called war lords: Chang Tso-lin, the anti-communist at that time; Feng Yu-hsiang, the communist, and Chiang Kai-shek, who was then considered a so-called moderate.

Sometime early in 1927 Chiang Kai-shek was in command and was chosen president of their republic; and he held that position until 1949, when his armies and his government were defeated and he fled to Formosa. His government had failed to implement the reforms he had promised each year for the twenty-two years during which he was president, and he had lost the confidence of the people.

It should not be forgotten that China is a vast country, over one-third larger in area than the United States, with nearly five hundred million people, and a total of thirty-seven or thirty-eight provinces, or probably thirty-nine including Manchuria. It has frequently been said that Mao, who is now in charge, was Moscow-trained. The same, of course, could be said of Sun Yat-sen; and it is also a fact that Chiang Kai-shek was trained in both Japan and Moscow.

It is further claimed that one reason why the present regime could not be recognized and given a seat in the United Nations is that the present government came to power by revolution and not by the people's choice; again, this is the very same method by which the former regime came into power.

On arriving at Lake Success the first morning we attended a meeting of the security council. As hon. members well know, this is composed of five permanent delegates and six non-permanent delegates, who are appointed by the general assembly each year for a period of two years; and I was surprised to see that the occupant of the permanent seat for China was a man that I knew well in China, namely Dr. T. F. Tsiang, who was the director of CNRRA operations in China. This organization was directed and appointed by the nationalist government to handle the supplies that were contributed and sent to China. They had charge over the allocation and the distribution of the $550 million worth of supplies that were shipped to China for the relief and rehabilitation of the ravaged and war-stricken areas in China, conditions caused by the recent war with Japan.

The terms of this agreement were explicit. They were that these supplies must be distributed without discrimination as regards race, creed or political differences; or in other words the United Nations organization as such was not taking part—and did not wish to do so in any way—in the civil war that was then taking place in China.

I am not going to elaborate on some of the difficulties that we ran into in the distribution of these supplies, any more than to say that there was a good deal of hostility with regard to the distribution of the supplies and even with regard to some of the supplies that were not distributed. Let me just give two instances. One was the United Nations endeavour to rehabilitate the fishing industry in China. They had purchased on the Pacific coast some 23 million or 25 million feet of the best lumber that could be procured, such as Douglas fir and oak. I did not believe that timber like that existed anywhere in the world. I wrote a special report on this matter, and I have the original copy. This lumber was bought and shipped to China in order to rehabilitate the fishing industry of China; in addition, many modern diesel-powered boats were to be sent. This lumber was to be sawed, to provide fishing junks for the people that could not possibly operate those larger boats. It was estimated that at least five thousand fishing junks could be produced. This timber landed there in good time and was piled up; and when I left in December 1947 there was not one stick used at all and there was not one junk built. Why, I do not know.

Another thing that caused a good deal of hostility was the fact that some of the supplies that were purchased by the UNRRA organization were war surplus supplies. In one particular shipment there was included about 50 tons of vinegar, Worcestershire sauce and lemon flavouring. That stayed in the warehouse for at least a year; and through our own organization, through the inspection and investigation branch that I was associated with, we urged that these supplies must move out to the war stricken and war ravaged areas. We were amazed when we knew that the same organization had shipped these 50 tons of vinegar to a relief organization in Shantung province in a communist area as a measure of food to restore the people to some sort of living standard at least.

You will say that that was a large organization, and probably mistakes could be made. Well, that is quite true, but what I am trying to say is that this man who was sitting there in that permanent seat was the man who was the director of this CNRRA organization when I was over there. So when the Peiping government officials appeared before the security council the spokesman, General Wu, delivered what was generally regarded as, and indeed was, a very belligerent and hostile speech, one that followed very closely along the same pattern of the Soviet union delegates. It was quite evident that his feeling towards Dr. Tsiang was very bitter, as he made accusations against him. That the Peiping delegation did not feel kindly towards this man was understandable, for he represented a party that was driven from the mainland of China by the Chinese people themselves; and now he was representing and speaking for the Chinese republic of 475 million to 500 million people on the mainland, while Dr. Tsiang himself was living in Formosa.

Another problem that was most contentious and has been given a good deal of publicity in the press is the future of Formosa. I think I should read into the record the Cairo declaration of 1943. This is the Cairo declaration of December 1, 1943:

> The three great allies are fighting this war to restrain and punish the aggression of Japan. They covet no gain for themselves and have no thought of territorial expansion. It is their purpose that Japan shall be stripped of all the islands in the Pacific which she has seized or occupied since the beginning of the first world war in 1914, and that all the territories Japan has stolen from the Chinese, such as Manchuria, Formosa and the Pescadores, shall be restored to the Republic of China. Japan will also be expelled from all other territories which she has taken by violence and greed. The aforesaid three great powers, mindful of the enslavement of the people of Korea, are determined that in due course Korea shall become free and independent.

That was signed at that time by the United States of America, whose president was the late Franklin D. Roosevelt, Winston Churchill and Chiang Kai-shek. It would appear, then, that according to the provisions set out in the Cairo declaration, if the Peiping regime were recognized and given a seat in the United Nations Formosa should be conceded to the Chinese republic.

If reports coming from Formosa and also from Hong Kong are credible there is considerable discontent against the present regime. Guerrilla forces are operating and people that offer any resistance to the government are being liquidated every day. It is further stated in the reports that the Peiping government are not able to cope with the bands of guerrillas and bandits, as no other government in China has ever been able to do. With a fairly large scale war raging, heavy taxes to support the army have caused grumbling, and the land reform program has met with a good deal of resistance.

No doubt a good deal of that is true, and again it is three years since I have been in China and conditions may have changed since then, but the former nationalist regime had also a great propaganda machine. If you recall, in the period from 1930 to 1940 the government was appealing for foreign aid and were stating that their enemies were almost exterminated—when the very opposite was the case.

I well remember reading, while in China in 1946 and 1947, headlines and press reports, almost every day, that the nationalist armies were achieving notable victories and continued daily successes, and any paper in China that told of any losses or reverses was immediately suppressed and confiscated.

When I left China in December, 1947, Chiang Kai-shek and the nationalist government had large armies at their command, and had control of all the major cities such as Shanghai, Peiping, Nanking and Canton, as well as all transportation, and Chiang Kai-shek made daily claims of his successes. But his regime collapsed a short time after that date, so that naturally reports coming from Formosa must be discounted. A few minutes ago I heard somebody mention the fact that about 50 thousand tons of rice had been supplied by China to India. I do not believe that that report can possibly be true. They could not possibly do that unless they stripped the food from their own people to do it. I do not believe they can feed their own people. Therefore these reports cannot be taken at face value.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he aware that that was Premier Nehru's announcement, and the rice was on the way?

Mr. MacKenzie: It is true that that was in the report, but again I cannot see how that report can be correct. I am aware that that was the announcement, but I cannot see how it could be true.

It has been said by many citizens of the United States, when speaking in this country, that if the western powers had supplied the nationalist government with modern war equipment and supplies, this trouble in China would never have occurred. While it is true that the communists obtained a great deal of war supplies from Russia, yet it was United States equipment that played a large part in the defeat of Chiang's armies. It is a matter of record that whole regiments who were supplied with United States army equipment deserted and went to the communist army in a body.

At the moment there seems to be no alternative government for China in the near future. It is either the old discredited government headed by Chiang Kai-shek, or the present Peiping administration. It is claimed that the present government was not chosen by the people, and that it was brought about by force. That was equally true of the nationalist government.

We should not forget that communism in Asia has not the same meaning or significance that it has in the western world, and any attempt to line up all Asiatic people in a frontal attack on communism seems futile. To the Asiatic mind this is just a political name and offers a better standard of living, and as they have nothing to lose they accept it.

It seems to me that if we could convince the Asiatic people that this whole scheme is a Moscow plot, with its motive to promote Russian imperialism and aggression and world domination, we should have much greater chance of success.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will the hon. member permit one question? Has he seen the testimony of General Marshall, who visited Chou En-lai, and who stated that he was a communist, and had pictures of Stalin and Marx in his encampment where he visited him?

Mr. MacKenzie: I am talking about the situation in China when I was there. That was the situation as it appeared to me, and that was the information that I got after making very careful inquiries. That was the situation as it was then. I was fortunate enough to meet General Marshall in Shanghai, when he made a visit there. I do not know anything definite about what has taken place since that time.

It is a mistake to proclaim too loudly that China is a satellite of Russia. China, I believe, is firmly in the Russian camp at present and regards Russia as her friend. But the oriental mind is always suspicious of the foreigner and once they realize that they are being dominated by Moscow she will leave her orbit very quickly without much prodding from abroad.

I want to state here briefly some of my own experiences while I was in China. I reported in Washington in the fall of 1945, and I spent a full month there.

When I got badly depressed, which I did once in a while, I went in to have a little visit with the then Canadian ambassador, who now happens to be Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), and I always felt better after I came out. I want to add this, that in the training we received in Washington before we went to China, while we were not told this in so many words, the general belief with respect to the over-all picture was that we must support the regime that was there.

I went over to China fully convinced that the government that was there was a modern Moses that would lead the people to the promised land, and that that was the only way we could get peace and harmony in China. I remember distinctly reading an article which appeared in the China News of February 16, 1946, and entitled "Soong Lauds Canada for Loan to China". The China News was a daily publication in English, that had a Chinese edition as well, and was printed by the Soong interests. I think Dr. Kung really was the owner. At any rate it was published daily in China. This dispatch, dated at Chungking, states:

> Commenting on the Canadian loan of U.S. $60,000,000 that has just been completed with China, Dr. T. V. Soong, President of the Executive Yuan, said:
> Canada had an enviable war record. Literally from scratch, she developed the munition industry that, despite her small population, made her the third or fourth largest arsenal of democracy. During the war, she was most generous and forthcoming in sending assistance to her allies, and China's war efforts were greatly benefited therefrom.
> In giving to China her first post-war foreign loan, Canada, under the leadership of Prime Minister Mackenzie King, is carrying on the co-operation between China and Canada into a new era of reconstruction, and it is fortunate for us that, along with the United States, she constitutes our next door neighbours across the water.

I read that with a good deal of pride, and kept it, as I did many other clippings from China, and brought it home. In six months' time, after living with the people and after visiting the major cities in China, I was convinced we could not possibly win with the government that was there. It was my conviction that we were backing a government that could not possibly succeed.

Indeed, I was so convinced of that that, believe it or not, I wrote letters in the matter. I wrote weekly or monthly letters, and certainly always occasional letters to the press which, occasionally, were published. I was not surprised to find that the press did not publish all of them, because I am not a good letter writer, and I appreciate fully the fact that all of them were not worth publishing.

Mr. Martin: Did the hon. member write in Chinese?

Mr. MacKenzie: However, quite a few of them were published. I should like to read an excerpt from a letter of June 9, 1947. I kept copies of my letters, of which this is one. My good friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) knows that some of my letters appeared in the Windsor Star. This is one that did, and it is part of it I shall read.

At the time in question there was a large quantity of raw cotton in China. UNRRA had sent in 1946 about 540,000 bales of raw cotton. Much of this was not sold and the suggestion was that permission be given to sell it so as to get enough money to keep the army of the Chiang machine going. My letter was, in part:

> For many months support from the U.S. had been proposed in the nature of a $500,000,000 loan and this would doubtlessly help, but temporarily only, as it would only be a dollar each, which in my opinion would only be a spot on the blotter and doomed to ultimate failure, unless the government is willing to put into effect immediate and sweeping reforms that will put its governing and fighting machinery on an honest and efficient basis. The facts are that the vast majority of the thinking people of China have little confidence in the present administration.

Bear in mind that this was written after I had been there a little more than a year. Later in the same letter I wrote:

> The army is very poorly paid, and when the troops pass through a district they take their living from the land. Can you imagine how the farmers feel when their crops and all farm produce are confiscated? Communism surely thrives under such conditions. In any event it seems that the time has come when we must admit there is virtually no hope of foreigners settling this question. The Chinese people and the government must realize that they cannot go on indefinitely asking for and receiving help, for China must get on her own feet, and soon.
> UNRRA has shipped huge relief supplies into China, up to the present over two million long tons.

When I returned to Canada I stated publicly and in many places that my views had changed. I had changed my mind—and I do not see anything wrong with changing one's mind. It is clear that people throughout the country do that. I am sure many people in Canada must have changed their minds between the elections of 1930 and 1935. I see no reason why an individual should not change his mind, if he is convinced he is wrong.

When I returned to Canada I stated publicly in many places that a foundation could not be built on sinking sand, and pointed out that there was no foundation in China upon which to build. I pointed out there was no hope of restoring peace and unity in a country as large as China, particularly when it was as corrupt and totally incompetent as China was.

I remember saying in the house in 1949 that I believed the Peiping government should be recognized and given a seat in the United Nations. By doing that we would not have been approving or disapproving of the type of government in that country. Such action would not have been an expression of that kind on our part. It would have been only a recognition of the acknowledged fact that here were a people who had come into power, as had happened in many other countries, a people who had control of the councils of the country, who had put some reforms into effect, and who had obtained a measure of obedience from a people who represent almost a quarter of the world's population.

I believe that at that time such a move would have been comparatively easy. But it is a much different story today. It would be most difficult if not impossible, in view of the situation in Korea and the fighting that is taking place there, to do it now.

The question is often asked whether it would have made any difference if communist China had been recognized. That is a question no one can answer. It seems to me there is no use elaborating upon it, because no one knows the answer. I think all will agree however that conditions could not very well be any worse. I appreciate that nothing can be gained by reviewing that situation now.

I believe I was right in speaking as plainly as I could on the occasion I have indicated. I attended a Rotary Club luncheon today, and heard a gentleman refer to the definition of a realist. When I was in China I tried to be a realist. It is said that at the dinner table the optimist says, "Please pass the cream"; the pessimist says, "Please pass the milk", but the realist says, "Please pass the jug."

While in China I felt I was looking at the situation as realistically as I could. I have a high regard for those hon. members who have expressed contrary opinions. It was the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) who cautioned us not to be sentimental, not to be emotional. I listened to Madame Chiang Kai-shek when she was here in 1943. At that time I was one of her staunch supporters. Indeed I almost reached the point where I felt I should go home, mortgage my farm and give her what I had. Of course I did not go to that length. I changed my mind when I reached China and saw the situation there. When I saw the conditions in China I felt I could not possibly support an outfit like that, one which obviously was lacking in democracy, Christianity and liberty.

I will say this, that I have a high regard for the people who expressed an opinion different from mine, and said that the nationalist government headed by Chiang Kai-shek had fought communism for years, and had fought Russian aggression for years. But it is my opinion that the nationalist government in China, which has been headed for the last 22 years by Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, has done more to create and spread communism than all other factors combined. I have nothing to say about the personal integrity of Chiang Kai-shek, but if you are the manager of a ball team you are responsible for the behaviour of its members. In the same way with the government of Canada, if the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) goes wrong—

Mr. Martin: No danger of that.

Mr. MacKenzie: —the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) of this country has to take the responsibility. The nationalist government headed by Chiang Kai-shek must accept responsibility for what has been done.

I do not wish to say anything further at this time about the merits or demerits of the former regime in China. British policy is based on the belief that the main reason it was driven from China was that it no longer commanded general support and the only way it could ever return to Peiping would be by a major conflagration, involving large-scale intervention by outside powers or by the United Nations as a whole on the mainland of China. In other words, all the hopes for the former regime returning to power are based on the failure of the western powers to achieve a peaceful settlement.

Economic aid is vitally necessary, but instead of being used to bolster up discredited regimes, it should be accompanied by social planning to remove the grave injustices of a system in which the great mass of the peasants are in the grip of landlords and usurers. Economic aid should not be used to interfere in the internal affairs of backward and undeveloped countries, but remedy of social abuses should be made a condition of its being granted. And it must be clearly stated what is the democratic way of life.

Peace is not in sight and troublesome days lie ahead. The last five years have been years of frustration. Russia and her satellites have attempted to block every move for world co-operation. Russia's attitude, whether the reason is fear, suspicion or a deliberate attempt to create international chaos, has been most discouraging. Anyone who has attended the United Nations can readily see that Russia and her satellites do not want to co-operate but are merely using the United Nations as a propaganda outlet in order to have the 700 million people to whom their speeches are broadcast believe that they are fighting for their liberty and welfare.

Indeed it is my belief that Russia does not want communist China seated at the United Nations, but is using this opportunity simply to endeavour to curry favour with them. The only hope of the world lies in the success of the United Nations, and the Canadian people must support wholeheartedly every move to strengthen this body.

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few brief observations in this debate. Considerable discussion has taken place in this chamber with reference to the Korean war. Hon. members of the opposition have stated their views, which I think can be summarized briefly. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) has criticized the United Nations policy in Korea because it has tried to achieve its objective without a clear-cut plan. The C.C.F. group, with the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) as their spokesman, suggested a five-point proposal and stated that the time was now ripe to end the Korean conflict by means of negotiations. I think we all wish that the solution of the Korean war was as simple as that. I think it is clear to all of us, from the statement made on February 2 last in this house by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), that attempts have been made from time to time to end the Korean war by means of negotiations.

Another view with regard to the Korean war was expressed on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), for both of whom I have the greatest respect. They seem to have adopted the MacArthur plan for extending the Korean war to China.

It is quite evident that the fighting in Korea while vicious is at the same time indecisive. Under the circumstances there appears to be no end in sight. However, I think it would be a fallacy on our part to believe that we have not achieved anything in Korea. It must be borne in mind that the prime consideration of the United Nations in participating in the Korean war is to resist aggression. This is in compliance with the principles laid down in the United Nations charter.

Until now the United Nations have continued to resist aggression at the point where such aggression is taking place, and at the same time they have made every effort to preserve the peace and avert a new world war. I believe that our achievements in Korea have been quite substantial. To begin with, the United Nations forces have held back the aggressors. The United Nations forces have saved South Korea, which was the original purpose of going into the war. Although up to date we have been unable to reach the objective of unifying all Korea under a democratic government, we have upset the communist timetable for conquest and have relieved pressure in such areas as Indo-China, Malaya and various parts of Europe.

Furthermore, some of the experiences of the United Nations forces in Korea have led to the necessary reorganization and reorientation of our strategy and tactics. Korea has been available to us as a proving ground for this purpose. Above all, the Korean incident has awakened the western world to the dangers and menace of international communism and Russian imperialism.

In the event that we should fail to arrive at a negotiated peace in Korea in the near future there are probably several other courses which may be open to us apart from the present policy of a limited war. The United Nations could withdraw their troops from Korea, recognize red China as a member of the United Nations, and turn over Formosa to red China. This is exactly what Moscow insists upon, along with the communist sympathizers throughout the world including the Moscow stooges here in Canada.

The withdrawal of the United Nations forces would in effect mean the throwing in of the towel. It would be a let-down, not only to the South Koreans but to all anti-communists in Asia. It would be a violation of the principles laid down in the United Nations charter and would in effect be the death knell of that world organization. It would have a most undesirable effect politically and psychologically, not only in Asia but throughout the world in general. Communism would certainly spread in Asia and this would amount to unconditional surrender to Russian imperialism in that part of the world.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs has pointed out, in Korea we are resisting aggression instigated by international communism. It is important, however, that the spread of communism in Asia be halted, and in halting aggression in Korea we are at the same time halting the spread of communism in Asia. Although we give priority to Europe, Europe cannot be saved by losing Asia to Russian imperialism. The plans for world domination, as laid down in the Kremlin, are global in scope and not limited merely to Asia alone.

Then there is another course of action that can be adopted, the unlimited extension of the Korean war to China even at the risk of Russian intervention. This of course would be in line with the MacArthur plan. As a Canadian, I do not propose to take sides in the debate which is going on in the United States between President Truman and General MacArthur, but the extension of the present Korean war, and a possible third world war, are the very things that the United Nations are trying to prevent.

With nearly half a billion Chinese people to contend with, now under the control of the communist government, even if Soviet Russia did not formally enter on the side of the Chinese in Asia, we in effect would be shadow-boxing with our real opponent, Russia, if we engaged in a war with China. This would leave the Russian imperialists in Moscow relatively free to make their moves in Europe and in other parts of the world. In the event of Russian intervention in China, let us bear in mind that we are not ready to deal with that situation.

Only a few days ago General Bradley made a statement to the effect that we are now "buying time" in our preparation against a third world war. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in his report to the house a few days ago emphasized that the United Nations are fighting to repel aggression in Korea. This of course is in compliance with the principles and the spirit of the United Nations charter, namely, that aggression should be halted by any form of collective action, including military collective action. The minister further pointed out, as reported at page 2754 of Hansard:

> . . . it is not an aim or objective of the United Nations in its Korean policy to interfere in the internal affairs of any Asian country, to replace one regime by another. Its aim, as I said, is to defeat aggression . . . by proving that aggression does not pay.

He went on to say:

> Communism itself, as a reactionary and debasing doctrine, must be fought on other planes and in different ways; by the use of economic, social, political and moral weapons.

Personally I am a great believer in the use of political weapons. On a previous occasion in this house I endeavoured to point out that international communism is being used by Stalin as an instrument to further Russian imperialism. I am also convinced that the apparent unity which exists in Soviet Russia today has only been made possible through slave camps, liquidations and mass extermination of racial, ethnical and religious groups as such. We can feel quite certain that the rulers in the Kremlin, in order to maintain unity within their borders or that so-called unity within the Soviet union, must resort to further mass exilings, slave camps and liquidations. There are today throughout the Soviet union hundreds of thousands of families one or more of whose members have been either liquidated or sent to slave camps for political reasons.

The Soviet union's weak spot is to be found in the smouldering opposition of the population against its oppressors in the Kremlin, which once aroused can become an effective weapon in favour of the free world. That an open revolt has not yet erupted is due primarily to the fact that the peoples of these unhappy countries are totally disarmed. The dictatorial regimes are not only fully armed but would not hesitate for a single moment to put down in a most brutal fashion any revolt or any signs of revolt. In addition of course there is Titoism, which we should also exploit by the use of political warfare. I only hope I understood the minister correctly when he agreed that among the weapons we should use against Russian imperialism or communism is the political weapon, and I believe that it should be utilized, and utilized effectively, without delay.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) closes the discussion at this stage, I wish to make some observations. Before dealing with the more general problems of international affairs, I wish to deal with two specific aspects of the work of the Department of External Affairs. First I shall refer briefly to a subject mentioned earlier in the present session, the number of conferences that the government is attending through representation on a large or small scale. I do not raise this point in any manner of harping criticism but rather in the belief that we must be prepared to examine the utility of every step that is taken by the government at this time. In the printed report of the Department of External Affairs for 1950, we find on page 61 that an international conference section was set up in January, 1950, to deal with invitations to international conferences. That is merely an indication of the extent to which conferences of all kinds have become the habit of the day. The record shows that Canada was represented at a total of 168 conferences and meetings during 1950.

I am sure that a great many of them were very important. I know that many of them will have a profound effect upon the future of this country and the general attempts to establish a sound basis for collective action. On the other hand, I think that an examination of the meetings shown as having been attended by representatives of the government suggests that at a time like this, when it is so important to economize in every way, we should consider exactly what value is obtained from some of these conferences, and also whether some of them are meetings which should be attended at all by government representatives.

It is not enough to say that only one or two people attended these conferences in some cases, and that in others they travelled fairly short distances. In other cases many people attended conferences and they travelled very great distances. These conferences were not all conferences which can easily be recognized as having any real importance at this time. No matter how short or long the trip may be, no matter how many may attend, it is the principle that is important, the example that it offers to the people of Canada as to the real necessity for economy; and the fact remains that every saving that can be effected should be made. It is in that light that I raise some question whether in such times as these we should be sending a government representative to the international congress of chocolate and cocoa manufacturers at Lausanne, to a meeting of the directing council and sanitary conference of the Pan-American bureau in the Dominican Republic, to the society of vertebrate palaeontology and the palaeontological society at Washington, to the third assembly of the world federation of mental health, to the third assembly of the world congress on cardiology, or to the meeting in Paris to discuss the problems of foot and mouth disease.

That is only to mention a few of the conferences dealing with subjects which it would seem are perhaps more a matter of concern for the professional organizations related to these activities and business organizations, or in the case of health meetings dealing with specified subjects which are under the provincial governments they might well be the responsibility of those authorities. I am sure that a careful examination of this report will suggest many places where a distinction should be drawn between the function of government and the function of the professional organizations and businesses concerned.

I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not questioning the standing or qualification of those who were sent. In the case, for instance, of the conference on cardiology, one of the recognized leaders in cardiology on this continent was sent. In the case of mental health a thoroughly competent representative was there. In other cases, the same observation is equally true. I am suggesting that the habit of sending government representation to every conference with the idea that, indirectly and in some uncertain way, some benefit may accrue is not in keeping with the necessity for economy, and does ignore the fact that the great professional organizations dealing with subjects of this kind, and business organizations interested in such problems as the manufacture of chocolate and things of that kind, will be fairly certain to see that they are appropriately represented at such gatherings.

Then I come to a matter referred to on page 49 of the department's report. In this case I am referring to something which has been a subject of discussion for some time, and which I think does call for a comprehensive, clear and definitive statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The report I mentioned refers to the shortwave broadcasts of the international service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I have no doubt whatever that this service has a useful place in the struggle for men's minds which is taking place in the world today. On the other hand, it should be remembered that, quite apart from other activities of this nature, the specific provision for international shortwave broadcasting in the estimates amounts to $1,928,600. That in itself, even in these days of huge expenditures, is not an insignificant sum. What I am even more concerned about is the measure of supervision that is being exercised by the Department of External Affairs over this particular branch of the broadcasting activities of this country. There has been a considerable amount of criticism of some of these broadcasts. Naturally, it is not an easy subject for the minister or his department to deal with. The broadcasts in fourteen different languages, many of which are particularly directed to the countries behind the iron curtain, are naturally difficult to supervise and check because of the language difficulty, if for no other reason.

I do not minimize for a moment the difficulty of the minister and his officials in supervising this particular activity. On the other hand, I do think we should have much more information concerning the specific allegations which have been made by responsible people for some time that these broadcasts have been rather sympathetic to the communist point of view, and that men with known communist associations still have something to do with some of these broadcasting activities. I would not raise this point were it not for the fact that these allegations have been made by very responsible individuals, and also were it not for the fact that I have from other sources information which inclines me to believe very strongly that there is a great deal in the allegations which have been made.

Not in any way to suggest that these remarks apply exclusively to these particular broadcasts but rather to offer an example, let me specifically refer to the broadcasts beamed to Czechoslovakia. The allegation has been made by different speakers on different occasions that Mr. Martin Dudak, who is engaged by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for some parts of this work, has had an active communist association in Czechoslovakia before coming here. One of the more recent statements to that effect which I have read was the report of a speech made by Robert Keyserlingk, which he made over the radio in a very comprehensive summary of this subject a short time ago. In that and in other statements I have heard and read, it was stated that Mr. M. J. Hronek, head of the communist radio in Bohemia, was welcomed by the C.B.C. with open arms when he visited Ottawa, and generally given very close contact with the Czechoslovak section of the "Voice of Canada". As recently as March 26 last, there appeared in the Montreal Gazette a letter from the Canadian editor of the Free Czech information service of London, England, in which he enlarged upon these same allegations.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that in view of the fact that substantial capital expenditures have been made for the facilities which are required for this work, and the fact also that an increasing amount is apparently required each year for the services of those who carry out these broadcasts, and also in view of the obvious fact that we now have in Canada many people from all the countries to which we direct these broadcasts who have known and vigorous anti-communist sentiment, we should have the most unqualified assurance that it is the anti-communist group who are being consulted concerning the nature of the broadcasting that should be done. In the explanation given as to the nature of these broadcasting activities, it is explained that they are intended to be of an informative, entertaining and instructional nature in so far as Canada is concerned. It states that they are intended to be objective, and to give a clear picture of what is happening here. The charge is made that, in the case of the Czechoslovak broadcasts as well as other broadcasts, there has been a noticeable absence of anything that would indicate that the "Voice of Canada" is being used for positive anti-communist propaganda. I believe we must decide whether this broadcasting is for the purpose of encouraging immigration to Canada, or whether it is for the purpose of legitimate Canadian propaganda being directed to the countries behind the iron curtain.

These broadcasts which are sent to countries outside the iron curtain from which we may expect immigrants would be, I should think, properly of the type that would encourage those people to come to Canada. On the other hand, it unfortunately may be a very long time before the broadcasting behind the iron curtain can have that as its purpose or intention. In that case, it would seem to me that the broadcasting should definitely have a clear propaganda purpose, and the propaganda purpose should be the undermining of confidence in communism, and to demonstrate that we in Canada are determined to have nothing to do with communism, by all the methods that are open to the people of a free democracy. It is said that, as an example, during the extremely critical and important elections in Italy, when one of the great cradles of our civilization stood at the crossroads, the broadcasts at that time were so objective that it would have been difficult for any Italian listening to the broadcasts in Italy to have the slightest idea as to whether or not we really objected strenuously to communism. Nevertheless, at that particular time most thoughtful Canadians were deeply concerned about the outcome of that election. I would agree that it would have been unwise for us to have appeared to be intervening directly in the Italian elections. On the other hand, I believe we should have been using our propaganda mechanism to demonstrate, by every legitimate device, how thoroughly undesirable communism is, and how untrustworthy every real communist is in any country in which he carries on his activities.

Those comments with regard to those two specific subjects I leave with the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the purpose of bringing them to his attention, in the hope that they perhaps may receive consideration and that he may be in a position, now or at a later time during the present session, to give us some information as to the intention of his department with regard to them.

I should now like to refer to the broader aspects of external affairs. I am sure that it was reassuring to all the members of this house to hear the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the opening part of this debate, in which he spoke in the warmest and most unreserved terms of our relationship with the United States. Those remarks, however, did not explain away the statements he had previously made outside the house.

It is not a case of anyone in this house seeking to find in his remarks some meaning that they did not contain. It would not be enough for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to say that what he has said in this debate represents his real sentiment with regard to our relationship with the United States and that any interpretation which has been placed on any other remarks he has made, and which would give a contrary impression, was obviously the result of taking a meaning which he did not intend to convey.

There is no hon. member in this house who does not recognize the strain imposed upon cabinet ministers who are called upon to assume the administrative responsibility for their departments in these difficult times while at the same time they are asked to accept invitations to speak at a great many meetings in other parts of the country. Certainly there would be no disposition to overemphasize the importance of any single statement, separated from its context, where it appears that such a statement might have been made inadvertently, under the pressure of making many speeches, and without any opportunity to give full consideration to its possible effect. On the other hand, the members of this house have no right to disregard statements, made by ministers of the crown outside this house, which give every appearance of being the result of clear consideration and of being part of some established pattern.

If the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs before the Empire club in Toronto on April 10 stood by itself, there perhaps would be no reason to refer again to what he said at that time, particularly in view of what he has already said in this debate. But the speech does not stand by itself. The Secretary of State for External Affairs made other speeches at that time and since. They are speeches which must be regarded as carrying the importance of speeches made by the spokesman for the government of Canada with regard to international relations. For that reason one cannot disregard the apparent persistence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in trying to create the impression that the people of the United States are much too unaware of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I must say that the twenty million people or thereabouts who in a single year cross the border, coming from the United States in to Canada, seem to demonstrate a fairly active consciousness of Canada in the United States, as does the fact that probably no other country in the whole world seems to be quite so well informed about its neighbour and about the attractiveness of the neighbouring nation which its people visit. The enormous number of border crossings by automobile, by aeroplane—and I am speaking of private aeroplanes in this case—and by other means of transportation indicate a vivid consciousness of Canada. Nearly every important publication in the United States is carrying frequent references to what is taking place in this country. I mention this matter because it seems hard to explain just why there is this recurring emphasis on the failure of the people of the United States to understand or to know about Canada.

That, however, is a detail relating more to general information. What is perhaps much more important, and certainly more important to the subject now being discussed, is the nature of the comments which have been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs about the policies of the government of the United States and the manner in which they do business; and also the way in which some of that criticism is conveyed by those officials who remain anonymous but who are customarily described in press reports as "usually reliable sources". I noticed a rather startling choice of words in a speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Renfrew on May 3. I am reading from a report in the Ottawa Journal of the following day. In that may I read one paragraph which appears under the subheading "Hoop-La Diplomacy", and is as follows:

> The external affairs minister decried what he termed "hoop-la" diplomacy. By this he meant conducting negotiations in the presence of television cameras and banks of microphones. It was to be hoped, he said, that diplomacy would retain dignity and not descend to or counterpart the elements of the vaudeville stage.

Having regard to the particular time when that speech was made, and having regard to the things of which we were all fully aware, there could be no doubt in the mind of any reasonable reader what diplomacy the Secretary of State for External Affairs was referring to when he referred to "hoop-la" diplomacy, or what place he had in mind when he referred to television cameras and banks of microphones.

Then there is another paragraph in the same report which I think indicates a point of view which bears consideration. It reads as follows:

> When exposed to the full glare of radio, television and headlines, he told the gathering, diplomats became actors and acted out their parts sometimes to the detriment of their real objective.

Mr. Speaker, already this afternoon there has been a wholly unwarranted attempt to attribute to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) participation in a particular point of view in the United States which was not justified by anything they said in their speeches. May I say that it would be equally justified to suggest that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is taking a rather direct interest in what is going on in an important and friendly country, something which is out of keeping with our desire to maintain the friendliest possible relationship with them. I shall not enlarge on that because I should prefer to believe that we shall have come to an end of these attempts to hold up to ridicule the procedure which I am afraid is not going to be changed by what the Secretary of State for External Affairs may have said at Renfrew or elsewhere.

I suggest that when we are referring to the conduct of the business of that government which today is carrying the greatest load of any of the free governments of the world, we should not describe their activities as hoop-la diplomacy, and it would be much more desirable that their own particular methods be recognized as their own particular methods, and that we be more concerned with the extension of our own discussion in our own country, down to the last detail of our own affairs in that wider field.

The statement, however, did not even stand alone as there have been a number of statements related to those of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On April 19 the deputy under-secretary of state for external affairs, speaking at the university of Maine, reflected some of these same ideas and some of our apparently increasing sensitiveness to things which are being said or not said about us in the United States. In a more carefully guarded speech, as was to be expected from his official office, the Canadian ambassador to the United States, speaking in the United States on April 23, made some reference to the same aspect of our relationship.

This is a time, Mr. Speaker, for us to make sure that we do all within our power in this country to keep our differences behind closed doors in friendly discussion, where they will serve a useful purpose. On the other hand, if there are positive problems in the dealings between ourselves and the United States, then let them be stated in this chamber in clear and specific terms. Why be so critical of the people of the United States? Do the members of this house know with complete clarity what Canada's foreign policy is? If all Canadians know what Canada's foreign policy is, then that would be the time for us to be critical, if any people in the United States are not aware what it is. Do the members of this house, let alone the rank and file of Canadians from coast to coast, yet know exactly what we have undertaken to do under the North Atlantic pact? Do members of this house know what undertaking we gave in regard to the defence of Europe? True, it was announced just over a week ago that we were going to recruit for Europe a brigade which may possibly be ready by the end of this year. Was that what we undertook to do? Was there anything else? Was that the time within which we undertook to do it? Have we any other undertakings not yet disclosed to this house?

These are not merely details of foreign policy. They are details which directly affect the major consideration now before the house, namely, the voting of supply; and certainly before we raise any question as to the adequacy of the knowledge of the people of the United States about our affairs, we should be perfectly sure that the people of Canada have full knowledge in regard to these very important matters, which have such a profound bearing upon the immediate future of this country.

What does the Secretary of State for External Affairs mean when he raises objections about being told by the United States that we are not bearing our proportionate share? Has the government of the United States directed such an objection to the Canadian government? If it has, let us know what the main features of that objection were. If it has not, then what was the Secretary of State for External Affairs talking about? Surely he was not referring to casual and uninformed criticisms by individuals in the United States. We would not expect the Secretary of State for the United States to deal so formally with similarly casual and uninformed criticism of the United States by individual Canadians, or by individuals of other countries. Either there is something we do not yet know here in this House of Commons, and something which we are entitled to know, or the pattern of criticism emerging from the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs is related to personal pique or some other motive with which our international policies should not be concerned at any time.

When I speak of this pattern emanating from the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I am referring to the similarity in a number of the speeches I have mentioned, and to the very much wider and more frequent statements which are being made to the knowledge of most hon. members of this house by those officials who remain anonymous but are quoted from time to time, and quite properly, by the press of this country.

There has been a tendency to engage in smug criticism of the discussion and the debates which are taking place in the United States at the present time, and to suggest that we would not be guilty of conduct of that kind, or what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has described as hoop-la diplomacy. It is suggested that much of what is coming out of Washington at the present time will greatly aid and comfort the men in the Kremlin. That criticism is being made not only in Canada but in the United States and in other countries. I question very much, Mr. Speaker, whether any of the information that is coming out from Washington, after censorship of the discussions which are taking place behind closed doors, is really disclosing anything that was not fully in the possession of the men in the Kremlin before these meetings began.

One thing has been conveyed, however, to the men in the Kremlin which may have a very valuable effect. With all its faults, with all its tendency to magnify apparent mistakes for political advantage, with all the embarrassment there undoubtedly has been to high-ranking officers and government officials, the mighty processes of democracy in the most powerful democracy in the world today are demonstrating to the rulers of Russia that free men and women are not afraid of free speech.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that there is much more to fear in the suppression of discussion in the United States, in Canada, in Great Britain, or in any other democracy than there is in complete freedom of democracy so that out of the exchange of ideas and the examination of weaknesses there may be greater strength for the long struggle which lies ahead.

All the records that related to that subject which were so fully disclosed in the trials at Nuremberg showed beyond all question that the greatest weakness of the German dictatorship was the fact that, with their suppression of free speech, a nation which has boasted great scientists, yes, and over the generations great humanitarians as well, had so completely suppressed freedom of speech that neither were the scientists able to develop the strength of which that country was capable nor had the humanitarians, who had lived there and had sacrificed life for their humanitarian ideas in the past, had any opportunity to check the bestiality of that vile regime that was in power and which visited so much horror and destruction upon the world.

As between too free speech and too little freedom of speech, the choice is all on the side of freedom. And I think that we in this country would be well advised not to be unduly critical of those who seek full information on matters of public concern, but rather to examine our own affairs and see whether we are quite as fully informed here in regard to all matters of public importance as we should be, at this extremely critical time.

I think there are many issues which call for very free and frank discussion here. Our method is different; we pride ourselves on the effectiveness of our parliamentary system. I think it would be well for us to demonstrate that our parliamentary system is receiving the full opportunity it should have to examine every fact of public importance which is not limited by genuine terms of secrecy.

Actually we in this country are not being informed as to details of the activities of the government in a way which would suggest that the Department of External Affairs and the Department of National Defence are really dealing with the issues of the day in the belief that there is the great emergency of which we were told at the beginning of this session. Either we are being made ridiculous by being called upon to give such vast emergency powers to the government, and to vote such enormous sums to meet an emergency, or we do face grave and urgent threats to our freedom which demand the most vigorous and most effective action.

We are being lulled into a sense of false security. The statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs gave no impression of the compelling demands upon every Canadian, if the emergency is really what it has been described to us as being by those who asked the emergency powers in the earlier part of the session.

Time is the most precious thing there is in Canada today—far more precious at the moment than metals, wood, machines of war or even men. Yet, time is being tossed around as though we had so much of it that it did not matter. The postponement of decisions that affect the life of every Canadian, and pretending it is not safe for people to know what the facts really are, is a sorry reflection to free men and women on their capacity to maintain the vigour and full power of democracy.

It does not seem that we in Canada have yet recognized in all its implications the full extent of the change which has taken place in Canada's relationship to the rest of the world. The old position of diplomacy was very different from that which it occupies today. The man who is still generally regarded as the greatest writer on military affairs, Clausewitz, was merely restating an ancient military maxim when he said that a shooting war is merely an extension of foreign policy.

That statement was made when there were only a few very restricted international alliances, and most of the nations in fact carried on their affairs by themselves, shifting their position from day to day, trying to follow a somewhat uncertain course, but always with the hope of preserving peace—unless they were one of the few aggressor nations which have emerged in history from time to time.

In very large measure it was the absence of any clearly stated course, any clearly defined undertakings, which were responsible for the outbreak of the first world war in 1914 and the second world war in 1939. There is reason, and good reason, to believe that if in 1914 Germany had been convinced that an attack on Belgium, Holland and France would have brought together a great world partnership of nations in arms, the attack would never have been launched in the first place. And there is equally good reason to believe, without much doubt, that if Germany had known that an attack on Poland in 1939 would ultimately have brought together the United Kingdom, France, the United States and most of the nations of the western world, that attack might never have been launched or even contemplated. It has in fact been commonly stated over and over again that both the first world war and the second world war were avoidable and could in fact have been avoided if the democracies first of all had been sufficiently armed and, secondly, had left no doubt whatever that they would act to prevent aggression.

The primary purpose of the formation of the United Nations organization was to bring together all nations who wished to preserve peace in a great international partnership which would carry forward the same ideals but avoid the weaknesses of the league of nations. This time there was to be no doubt; there was to be positive action to deal with aggression, and the thing that was going to preserve peace was the certainty that an aggressor would face the combined strength of those nations which believed in peace.

That was the core; that was the spirit; that was intended to be the driving power behind the United Nations. The hope of finally bringing to an end the age-long nightmare of recurring wars lies in the acceptance of that principle.

Two world wars in one generation carry to the minds of all human beings some realization that scientific advances have brought within measurable reach the destruction of civilization itself, unless further world wars can be avoided. This has brought us to the position in which we find ourselves today. For the very first time in history, Canadians are committed in advance to active participation in whatever combined effort is necessary to preserve the freedom of western Europe and prevent Russian aggression. Under the North Atlantic pact that commitment has been made, with the full knowledge of the Canadian people, and with the almost unanimous approval of members of the House of Commons.

It is however necessary for us to remember that Canada's active participation in the Korean war, and Canada's participation in the united effort of the Atlantic nations to prevent a war in Europe, are two different forms of commitment.

There was no commitment in advance so far as Korea was concerned, except the general acceptance of the obligations set out in the charter of the United Nations. When the communist army in North Korea suddenly launched its unprovoked attack under Russian direction on June 25 last year, it was necessary for the United Nations represented on the security council to make a decision as to what was to be done. That decision was made; and it was a result of that decision relating to the specific act of aggression in Korea which has resulted in Canada's participation in the efforts of the United Nations to preserve the freedom of Korea and deal with this act of naked aggression. Because of the fact that the Korean war raises special issues and that the action of the United Nations was not related to any more specific obligation than the general obligation to which I have referred, uncertainties as to the course to be followed and the differences of opinion about policies and the extent of participation were only to be expected. They are perhaps only natural and they will be resolved only by a constant and active and clear-thinking review of the situation in Korea in the light of changing events.

The situation in Europe, however, is entirely different. The twelve nations which signed the North Atlantic pact have joined in a positive declaration that they will take appropriate military action to prevent further Russian aggression in Europe and will combine their military and economic strength in every way possible for that purpose. There is no uncertainty, or there should be no uncertainty in the Kremlin as to what the commitment is. It is to be hoped that there is no uncertainty in the minds of the Russian people as to the decisions which have been reached and which have been accepted, and readily accepted, by the free peoples of the western world.

Because those decisions are for the purpose of preventing war and not for the purpose of dealing with a war already under way, as in the case of Korea, full publicity in regard to the nature of the agreements, the extent of the commitments and the manner in which all the member nations of the Atlantic community are carrying out their obligations is in itself part and parcel of the commitment to preserve peace and prevent a third world war. There may be reasons for secrecy in regard to our activities in Korea, but these should not lead us into thinking that the same reasons impose upon us the same considerations of secrecy in trying to preserve peace and prevent war in Europe.

One of the things which perhaps will prevent war is the extent to which the Kremlin, as well as our own people, is informed as to just how far we are going, how far we are prepared to go and the way in which we are carrying out our obligations so that they may realize the full strength that they will encounter if they should challenge the free nations of the western world. For that reason any secrecy or fast verbal footwork which may seem justified by an actual state of war cannot be justified in discussing or dealing with the decisions and action which are designed to prevent war by the extent to which we communicate fully to our only possible enemy exactly what may be expected if there is an act of aggression in Europe.

The decision to join in this full-fledged military alliance was made long before there was any sign of war in Korea. If war in Korea ended tomorrow we would still have great obligations to carry out for the preservation of peace in Europe and throughout the rest of the world. As long ago as October 1949 the first meetings were held in Washington to discuss an agreement of this nature. Then in December of that year the Atlantic nations met in Paris and agreed on a basic strategic concept. In March of last year at The Hague, still some time before the Korean war started, a general agreement was reached in regard to the allocation of tasks in dealing with the threat of Russian attack. There has been little secrecy, and there should be little secrecy as to what took place at those meetings because this is an association of free peoples freely asserting their partnership in this great cause.

That is the great distinction between our task in Europe and our task in Korea. The commitment of the member nations of the North Atlantic pact is one which relates to any Russian act of aggression in Europe at any point. No doubt has been left on that score. The commitment in Korea refers specifically to Korea and one of the major problems of dealing with the situation there is the fact that no matter how far the same nations might be prepared to go to deal with any act of aggression against any nation in the Pacific ocean or bordering on it, there seems little possibility of any general pact affecting Asia at this time which would create a general commitment in that area such as has been accepted in Europe.

For that reason the uncertainties which exist in regard to Korea and Asia generally should not lead us to the conclusion that similar uncertainties are in any way a natural counterpart in considering the steps to be taken to preserve peace in Europe. In Korea the forces of the United Nations are waging war. Let us never forget that grim reality. It is war in all its ghastliness. In Europe, on the contrary, the forces brought together under General Eisenhower are waging peace. We should never forget that hopeful reality. We should always impress upon the minds of our own people and upon the minds of our great potential enemies that we are waging peace in Europe and that peace is the one purpose of the strength that we are jointly trying to build.

No man can say for how many generations humanity still must live in an atmosphere of war, waste and insecurity before the dawn of that great peace to which all our efforts should now be directed. But certain it is that in the long search for some practical plan to bring to an end the aimless destruction of war, the North Atlantic pact is one of the greatest milestones in the long history of mankind. I for one am certainly most ready to express my appreciation of the contribution made by our own Canadian representatives to the drafting of the details of that vitally important international agreement. That pact is a challenge to stir the imagination of freedom-loving people, whether they live in the countries that are now free or are in slavery behind the iron curtain.

One of the things which it seems to me we must keep in our minds, to an extent that has not been true in the past, generally at any rate, is that it would be a very uncertain picture of future peace which we could build up before our own people, if the most we could hope for would be an armed camp on this side of the iron curtain with the nations on the other side of the iron curtain continuing their form of slavery indefinitely through the years ahead. I think that in addition to preserving peace for ourselves the ultimate ideal in the mind of every one of us must be that out of that peace which we preserve for the people who are now free there will also in due course come freedom to those nations which are now enslaved.

To us in Canada comes a unique challenge. As one of the strongest nations of the British partnership and the closest friend of the United States, geographically, sentimentally, and by ties of blood, we have an opportunity to play a role out of all proportion to our population. Since we have neither the immense responsibility of the United States nor the close geographical proximity to Russian power of the United Kingdom it should be possible for us to guide our course in a way which will help to bring together in closer and closer harmony the two most powerful nations in the western world.

The first consideration in all our dealings with the United Kingdom and the United States should be the negative policy of doing nothing which will cause friction or misunderstanding, or fan the dangerous flame of criticism which is already threatening to consume some of the good will and mutual confidence which has been so successfully built up in both those countries during the years of war and since that time. In the case of both the United Kingdom and the United States, there has been criticism by members of the government recently which has not increased harmony at all between ourselves and those two nations, or between those two nations themselves. Unwarranted criticism of the good faith of the British government in connection with any contract between Canada and the United Kingdom, or criticism of the government of the United States for any supposed slights upon Canada at this time, will not help to build that positive good will and understanding which should be the main purpose of Canadian diplomacy and of all the work of the Department of External Affairs.

If there are facts behind the criticism which has been directed toward the government of the United States, then let us have them out in the open now. Let us discuss them frankly, let us say what should be done, and then let us hope that we may for all time put an end to petty bickering of this kind at a time when the very survival of civilization and all that we hold dear in Canada and throughout the free world is challenged as it is at this hour. Then let us proceed on a positive and clearly defined course of calm, sustained and vigorous effort to create harmony and good will, and to employ our unparalleled opportunity here in Canada to be the friendly interpreter and the strong linchpin between the United States, Great Britain and the whole continent of Europe.

At a time when communist propagandists are doing their utmost to create distrust of the motives of the United States in countries for which the United States has done so very much in these past few years, let it never be said that without due regard for the consequences we should ever appear to give succour or to give supporting evidence to those who are trying to create the impression in Europe and elsewhere that behind United States charity the ambition of world imperialism lurks in the minds of their government.

The supreme challenge facing free men and women throughout the whole world today is to do all that is humanly possible with the utmost speed to establish that measure of true international unity which is the one hope of stemming the tide of communist aggression, no matter how quickly we may be able to build up the combined force of arms of these nations. I am sure that it will be the hope of all of us that we may be able to establish a completely united policy for Canada in international affairs. I have been critical of comments which it seems to me might actually assist those who are seeking to undermine day by day the full understanding and confidence between the governments of the United States and Canada as well as between the peoples of the United States and Canada. The last thing I would suggest is that any such purpose was in the mind of the Secretary of State for External Affairs or anyone else who made a similar speech.

I believe it was my duty to express the opinion I have expressed because I have read, as many others have read, surprised editorials in friendly newspapers in the United States as well as very bitter editorials in newspapers of the United States which are not quite so friendly. I have also read editorials in those newspapers of the United States which seem to take an unholy joy in trying to create distrust of the government of the United Kingdom in spite of all that they have done in the past few years and for centuries in the cause of freedom. Whatever the purpose may have been, let no member of this house suggest that there has not been an unfortunate interpretation placed upon these remarks. However, these remarks are past as long as they remain past, and as long as they remain a closed book which is forgotten in the positive evidence we give at all times in the future that our great desire is to build unity and friendship on the widest and strongest basis not only with the governments of the United Kingdom and the nations of the commonwealth, but with the government of the United States which shares to such a great extent common ideas and common habits of thought and speech.

Whatever our differences in regard to domestic policy in Canada may be, I would hope that we can find common ground upon positive and clearly defined international policies which at all times will make it possible to state the Canadian position as one and indivisible. If the government gives clear, certain and positive leadership along sound and constructive lines fully understood by the members of this house and by the people of Canada, then I am sure that there will be support from all parts of this house and from all parts of Canada for policies designed to create the greatest measure of international harmony, unity and good will. Behind policies of that kind there will be a united House of Commons, and there will be a united Canada.

Mr. Hansell: If the minister is going to reply at eight o'clock, I should like to ask one question. According to this evening's paper it appears that the situation in Iran is growing worse. In his reply would the minister mind telling the house what Canada's position is with respect to that situation, or what the United Nations' position may be, Canada being a member thereof.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the house will, I know, expect me, in winding up what has been a very interesting discussion on this resolution, to deal with some of the detailed points that have arisen in the course of that discussion. I shall also try to make a few general observations before I sit down. In his speech before we rose this afternoon, the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew), indicated, and I agree with him, that the diplomacy of Canada should be conducted in a frank way, but without provocation. He also indicated, and I certainly agree with him, that our foreign policy should be clear and decisive; that parliament and the people of Canada have the right to know where the government stands on the big issues in foreign affairs in these difficult, and indeed dangerous, times.

He said that we did not know that in 1914, and we did not know it in 1939, but if that knowledge had been possessed by the dictators of those years it might have been that war could have been avoided. He believed we should not make the same mistake this time. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that we are making that mistake. This time I believe those who would disturb the peace know where those stand who would defend the peace. This afternoon the leader of the opposition said our obligations are precise and definite under the North Atlantic treaty organization. There is no room for any illusion in the breast of any dictator as to what will happen if he commits aggression against any member of that organization. We also know that the charter of the United Nations is more than words, and that the United Nations can act as well as talk. What is happening in Korea today certainly proves that.

The leader of the opposition went on to say the government should tell more to parliament and to the people of Canada about its policies. I agree that frank and full information should be made available in these times to the people of Canada in regard to their foreign policy, and in regard to the manner in which the government is conducting its diplomacy. This government tries, I believe, Mr. Speaker, to do just that. We do not need to apologize about the way we are explaining to the people of our country our policies in the field of international relations. I would have welcomed an application of that principle of full and frank information this afternoon by the leader of the opposition, especially in regard to the attitude of the official opposition to the developments in the Far East, more particularly in Korea and in China. I would have particularly welcomed that because of certain statements that have been made by members of that party. While the leader of the opposition, Mr. Speaker, complained, if "complained" is not too strong a word, in rather general terms about the absence of information on certain vital matters, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) complained in regard to the absence of detailed information concerning specific matters, and he mentioned two. He mentioned Formosa and the recognition of communist China.

Mr. Speaker, the policy of the government of Canada in regard to these matters has been made clear more than once in this house, outside this house and at the United Nations. If the hon. member is not satisfied, I would repeat to him—because I think it describes in a nutshell our policies in regard to these matters—the last paragraph of the statement of principles adopted by fifty-two members of the United Nations, including the United States of America. It deals with the Far East problem in general, Formosa and recognition in particular. We are bound by this paragraph because we accepted this statement of principles. The last paragraph reads as follows:

> As soon as agreement has been reached on a cease-fire, the General Assembly—

That is the general assembly of the United Nations.

> —shall set up an appropriate body which shall include representatives of the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the People's Republic of China, with a view to the achievement of a settlement, in conformity with existing international obligations and the provisions of the United Nations charter, of Far Eastern problems, including among others those of Formosa (Taiwan) and of representation of China in the United Nations.

As we rose this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I was asked by an hon. member opposite whether I could say something about the situation in Iran. This would be one occassion, I think, when it would be inappropriate and inadvisable for one in my position to talk about this particular subject at this particular moment. It is one of the most difficult and dangerous problems, affecting not only Iran but many other countries as well. I think it would be unwise on my part to say anything about it at this time, except to express the hope that these problems can be settled in a way which would be consistent with the national aspirations of the Iranian people and the legitimate interests of other people who have ministered to the well-being of Iran in administering the oil industry of that country which they have been instrumental in developing.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, there were various questions, brought up during the debate this afternoon, and on the previous day when we debated this resolution, which I shall try to deal with at not too great length. The leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew) this afternoon was critical about the expenditure which the department over which I preside for the time being had been making on international conferences. He was worried because of the possibility of extravagance in this regard. I do not admit, Mr. Speaker, that there has been any extravagance; but if there has been, there will be ample opportunity for members of the committee, when it meets, to go into every detail of every conference and find out where that extravagance was.

It is true that we are attending a great many international meetings these days. There are a great many international conferences. I wish there were fewer of them. But the fact that there are so many is, I think, a proof of the complexity and the importance of international life, and of the necessity for international mechanisms to deal with international problems.

I cannot resist the temptation to suggest that while the leader of the opposition criticized our attendance at many conferences, we have also been criticized in the past because we have not ourselves initiated conferences. I might add that we have had a great many more invitations to attend conferences than we have accepted. We go to these conferences and we try to be represented effectively at them, when they are of practical interest and benefit to the Canadian people. I know that someone will undoubtedly be saying to himself at this point: What about that now notorious conference of international chocolate and cocoa manufacturers in Switzerland? When that matter was raised some time ago by the leader of the opposition, he got a good laugh from his followers and some other hon. members; and I do not begrudge him that. But I think he will admit that it was a cheap laugh when I tell him that that conference in which the Department of Trade and Commerce was interested cost the Canadian taxpayers $8.99.

I know something about conferences myself, Mr. Speaker, because it has been my fate to attend a great many of them. I know how desirable it is to keep down the number of conferences at which we are represented to those in which our interests are affected. The leader of the opposition this afternoon talked about the increasing cost to Canada of these international conferences. If he had checked his figures—and he could have done so—he would have found that in 1947-48 the vote for international conferences was $400,000; in 1948-49, the vote was $300,000; in 1949-50 the vote was $225,000; and in 1950-51, the vote was also $225,000. For 1951-52 the vote is also $225,000 but would have been reduced to $200,000 if the United Nations assembly had not decided, against the vote of the Canadian delegation, to meet next autumn in Paris instead of at Lake Success. The cost of international conferences, therefore, is not increasing, Mr. Speaker; it is going down, or at least it is holding its own, and I hope that it will continue to hold its own. We do not want to spend money on unnecessary things these days.

The leader of the opposition, before six o'clock, also dealt at some length with the international service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Since six o'clock I have not had sufficient time to go into these matters in detail, but I have known something about the operations of this service and I have been able to get some information on some of the points that he quite properly raised in the house.

In taking down a few notes on what he said, I noticed that his charges—I withdraw that word—his comments with regard to the C.B.C. international service divided themselves into two parts. One was a general criticism of the tone and the content of the broadcasts of the service; and that was I think of a rather vague and general nature. The hon. gentleman referred to the statement of Mr. Keyserlingk on this subject; and there was indeed a strong family resemblance between the hon. member's statement and certain imputations which have been given circulation by Mr. Keyserlingk in regard to the objectivity of the C.B.C. international service. It is of course easy to give currency to criticisms of this kind which give a general impression of pro-communist sympathies to the organization of the C.B.C. international service. That service is, I think, doing valuable work for Canada and playing a useful part in the psychological war against communism—which, as the hon. gentleman mentioned this afternoon, is an important part of the total war against communism—the struggle or the battle for men's minds.

These general criticisms of course would be more convincing if they were more precisely substantiated; and that may be attempted when the committee meets. By the same token, Mr. Speaker, I might say that they would be easier to reply to.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to interrupt the minister—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; there may be an echo here of which I am not aware. I was going to say that the minister has quite misinterpreted what I said. I was sufficiently specific to give the name of the man who it was alleged in the speeches, in that one matter to which I referred, had a certain connection with the broadcasting corporation. Surely that is sufficiently specific to be dealt with.

Mr. Pearson: I will come to that, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. gentleman was listening, he would have heard that I said I was dividing my comments on this part of the subject into those which dealt with general criticisms of the C.B.C. international service and those which dealt with certain specific matters. I am now on what I thought was a rather general criticism of the tone and content of the broadcasts of that service.

The hon. member this afternoon referred to the supervision exercised by the Department of External Affairs over these broadcasting activities. At the same time he stated that in his view these broadcasts should have the purpose of undermining confidence in communism; and I agree entirely with him. In this connection, to show that is the objective which we who have some responsibility for this matter are attempting to achieve, I should like to refer to the policy guidance paper communicated by the Department of External Affairs to the international service of the C.B.C., under which these broadcasts to the behind-the-iron-curtain countries are being operated. I should like to quote a few sentences from this hitherto confidential paper, in order to deal with this point, because I know of no other way of dealing effectively with it than to quote from the policy guidance paper which is supposed to guide the operations of the C.B.C. international service in this field. In this paper it is stated that one of the purposes of these broadcasts is:

> Unmasking the hypocrisy of communist democracy in elections, trade unions, labour camps and religion and the hypocrisy of Soviet peace propaganda and its inconsistency in view of Soviet aggressive foreign policy, rearmament and concentration on heavy industry to the detriment of the Soviet standard of living.

That is a quotation from the policy paper. Another one is as follows:

> Keeping alive and if possible increasing a knowledge of and appreciation of democracy, the code of ethics which we have derived from Christianity and western civilization and thought.

Those are the general lines along which the international services are proceeding or are attempting to proceed in regard to the broadcasts to the behind-the-iron-curtain countries.

The hon. gentleman raised one or two specific points. I have not had time to look into all aspects of them, but I have had time to look into one or two and I should like to deal with them at this time; I may have an opportunity later to deal with the others. He felt that the C.B.C. international service broadcasts to Italy during the elections were not entirely suitable for the situation which Italy was facing at that time. The elections in Italy to which the hon. gentleman was referring took place, I think, in April, 1948; but the C.B.C. international service did not begin its broadcasts to Italy until December, 1949. And so I am at a loss to know what broadcast—there may have been some—the hon. gentleman was referring to.

I should also like to point out in regard to suspicion which has been attached to certain members in this service that every employee of the international service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is very carefully screened indeed. Mention was made of one employee, I think his name was Mr. Dudak, who was alleged to be a communist. It was stated by the hon. leader of the opposition in regard to this man that he is now engaged with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's international service. I believe Mr. Dudak was an editor of a Slovak newspaper in Canada, a free lance journalist. It is true that he was taken on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's international service for a time. He was investigated immediately after the coup d'état in Czechoslovakia. My information is that he has ceased to be an employee of the international service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation since April, 1948.

A good many other questions arose during the course of our discussion. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) dealt with the question of the St. Lawrence seaway. He expressed his own anxiety that this seaway should be commenced and brought to completion—an anxiety which we all share. More than one representative of the government has expressed that feeling recently. We want to see this enterprise brought to completion as a power and navigational project by the co-operation of the two governments most concerned; but we want to see it completed. If it cannot be completed on an international basis, naturally we shall have to examine the situation and see what other way it might be done. In discussing this matter the hon. member for Peel asked whether there were any treaty obligations which would prevent our charging discriminatory tolls on non-Canadian vessels as a way to pay the cost of construction of the canal and the power installations, if they were a Canadian enterprise exclusively. There are, Mr. Speaker, no treaty obligations binding on Canada which would be an obstacle to the imposition of tolls on Canadian canals in the great lakes-St. Lawrence system. There are treaty provisions, however, which affect Canada's ability to establish toll schedules discriminating between ships of Canada and those of another country, or between the ships of different foreign countries; so, as I understand, discriminatory tolls would not be possible.

During our discussion, Mr. Speaker, a good many members of the house made reference to international relief and rehabilitation problems, more particularly with reference to the Colombo plan and to famine assistance for India. I announced in this house not so very long ago that the government would ask parliament to appropriate $25 million as its contribution to the first year of the plan, provided that it was clear that other contributing countries would make appropriate contributions so that the broad objectives of the plan might be realized. Since that time we have been taking steps to make arrangements with recipient countries for the purpose of ensuring that so far as Canada is concerned the momentum of the plan is sustained.

The Colombo report contains in its appendices lists of projects for financing under the plan; and without waiting for the working out of the details of the plan, indeed without waiting for the plan to come into operation, we have asked the Indian and Pakistan governments to send over technically qualified representatives to discuss with our officials on a bilateral basis the projects in which we might assist, having in mind those items which Canada is best fitted to undertake; and in this connection we are doing all the preparatory work that we can to keep this movement going.

In the broader field of technical assistance we have played, I think, a useful part. We have participated, either through the headship of, or membership in, technical missions, in United Nations missions to Bolivia, Ethiopia, Burma, Colombia, Egypt and India, and the filling of requests for technicians received from Libya, the Philippines, Indonesia and Ceylon under the United Nations program is now currently under consideration; but it is not of course under present circumstances very easy to find suitable Canadian technicians for this purpose.

No technicians have yet been supplied under the Colombo plan, but approximately 50 requests have been received from India, Pakistan and Ceylon, and are now being examined by the technical assistance service.

More has been accomplished in making Canadian facilities available for trainees from abroad.

We have notified the bureau on technical co-operation in Colombo that we are prepared to accept twelve trainees from India, ten from Pakistan and six from Ceylon at an early date for placement in the following fields: road building, electrical engineering, pulp and paper, rail transportation and agriculture. The bureau in Colombo is being notified that we will accept three technical missions for a six to eight week tour of Canada during the summer in the field of hydroelectric power, road building and agriculture respectively.

During the February meeting of the commonwealth consultative committee in Colombo the member countries were informed by our delegation that Canada was prepared to grant fellowships to interested recipient countries in such fields as agriculture, engineering, forestry, education and medical research. Subsequently we made a specific offer of sixty scholarships and fellowships to the countries of south and southeast Asia.

Then there is the question which has aroused a good deal of interest in the house of assistance to India to deal with the very distressing and developing famine situation there. So that the facts on this matter might be clear, I should like to put into the record that the Prime Minister of India, Mr. Nehru, announced on May 10 that 50 thousand tons of wheat, purchased on a cash basis from the Soviet union, were on their way to India; 50 thousand tons only, purchased on a cash basis. He added that negotiations for the purchase of an additional 500 thousand tons of other wheat in exchange for certain Indian commodities were in progress. China has sent 50 thousand tons of rice as part of a barter deal, China receiving Indian jute in exchange; and India has also purchased from China 50 thousand tons of milo.

This afternoon reference was made to the United Kingdom contribution. It is true that the United Kingdom agreed to the diversion to India of some cargoes of Australian wheat out of its own purchases in Australia. Some 42 thousand tons of wheat have been so diverted to India and paid for by the Indian government. It was suggested this afternoon that the government were negligent in their appreciation of the terrible famine situation in India. It was suggested by an hon. member of the opposition that we should make a contribution of $100 million for famine relief to be spent in Canada, and that we could do it if we wanted to. Well, Mr. Speaker, we could of course do many things, but it would be very difficult at this particular moment—and I am not sure that it would be the best way to proceed at this particular moment—to make any such contribution to India for famine relief. Hon. members will recall that the government recognized as long ago as February of this year that a famine in India was likely to occur. At that time we offered wheat to India under the Colombo plan, and the purpose and meaning of that offer has led to some misunderstanding. The only wheat of this year's crop that was not already fully contracted for by purchasers was grade 5. The Indian government advised us last month that it wished to accept our offer of wheat under the Colombo plan but that it preferred to wait until our next crop was harvested before obtaining the wheat in the hope that a better grade would be available.

I should like to assure the House of Commons at this time that the government, as indicated by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the other day, is giving the closest attention to what Canada can do to ameliorate famine conditions which are rapidly developing in India. We are exploring every avenue, including some of the helpful suggestions which have been made during the course of this discussion, through which help might be given. I am very hopeful that we shall be successful in finding a number of ways in which we can contribute to the relief of starvation and suffering in India.

During the course of our discussion reference has been made by hon. members opposite, and particularly by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, to the negligence of the government in not taking the initiative in attempting to work out a Pacific security pact along the lines of the North Atlantic treaty. I should like to point out that the arrangements which are being negotiated now in the Pacific between Australia, New Zealand, the United States of America and possibly the Philippines do not constitute a Pacific pact of that type, and we have not been asked to participate in those arrangements.

Mr. Green: Have we asked to be allowed to participate?

Mr. Pearson: We have not asked to be allowed to participate in this arrangement for reasons I have already indicated in the house. The situation in the Pacific at this time is not exactly the same as that in the Atlantic. It is not the same, in many ways. And the fact that we have participated in the Atlantic pact is no reason that we should take the initiative in working out a Pacific pact at this time. Those who would be most concerned with that pact do not feel that that would be the best way to proceed. I am thinking of the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and Australia.

They have decided to work out their own arrangements under articles 51 and 52 of the charter of the United Nations, with the object of bringing about a mutual guarantee and security pact. We welcome those arrangements as a furtherance of general security. But I assure members of the house, though no assurance is needed, that this does not mean that we are not alive to the importance of general security in the Pacific. Our participation in the Korean campaign is surely sufficient evidence of that fact.

In this connection—

Mr. Green: May I ask a question? Why does Canada not ask to be allowed to participate in this pact which is being negotiated between the United States, Australia and New Zealand, with possibly the addition of the Philippines?

Mr. Pearson: Well, we do not ask to participate in bilateral arrangements between friendly countries. We usually wait for an invitation or we participate, or ask to participate, when our immediate interests are affected. This is a development between the three countries most concerned, but if it should lead into something wider in the Pacific, as I think I have already indicated to the house, we will be most interested in that development.

I do not think in this regard I could do much better than to quote the leader of the opposition this afternoon when he said:

> The commitment in Korea refers specifically to Korea and one of the major problems of dealing with the situation there is the fact that no matter how far the same nations might be prepared to go to deal with any act of aggression against any nation in the Pacific ocean or bordering on it, there seems little possibility of any general pact affecting Asia at this time which would create a general commitment in that area such as has been accepted in Europe.

Then, if I might deal for a few moments with some more general considerations that have arisen during the course of the discussion, I should like to turn for the moment to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), who, in his very interesting statement the other night, reproached the government—and his reproach has been repeated by other members opposite—because they displayed no sense of urgency in the face of the danger of the present position.

Well, all I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that we reject his assertion that the Canadian government has no sense of the urgency of the present situation. If there were time it would be simple to quote chapter and verses to show that we are aware of that urgency.

I do not think that we need also accept the assertion that the Canadian people are not aware of the seriousness of the situation; and I for one reject the suggestion of the hon. member for Broadview that young Canadians generally are represented by the school boys of whom he spoke the other night, as it is set out at page 2786 of Hansard for May 7, 1951. These are his words:

> They were boys who, I imagine, in the United States would have been subject to conscription, so I was interested in ascertaining whether it ever occurred to them to wonder why we were so free from anything of that kind; why they were not only free from conscription but they were even free from any sense of duty toward their country.

Well, I for one do not accept any statement that young Canadians have no sense of duty to their country.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the minister think that is quite fair? My whole argument was that they were not being called on to show this feeling.

Mr. Pearson: If that was the meaning of the hon. member, then of course I accept it. But I read his words, and they seemed to have the opposite meaning. He was implying that they were even free from any sense of duty toward their country. That was the conclusion I drew from his words. If it was a wrong conclusion, then I am sorry.

Mr. Coldwell: To whose remarks is the minister referring? Is it the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) or the hon. member for Greenwood. He said "Broadview".

Mr. Pearson: I meant the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Fulton: That is two mistakes.

Mr. Pearson: Well, I hope I never make any more serious than that. It is difficult to keep up with the hon. member for Greenwood. I thought he was a little over-pessimistic in his remarks the other night. I hope I do not do him an injustice, but I got the feeling that he seemed to take a sort of sad satisfaction out of the misfortunes which face us, and that he was indulging in what the Germans call "schadenfreude."

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, during his remarks he gloomed for some time over a speech I made in Toronto last month. There were remarks made by other hon. members in connection with that speech, and more particularly this afternoon by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Drew: That was not the hoop-la speech, was it?

Mr. Pearson: In that gloom the hon. member had some other company also because the hon. member for St. John's West considered it appropriate to say on April 23 last—and I quote from his remarks:

> It seems to me that we are copying the bad example of the Russians who, by their brazen, openly aggressive and even insulting tactics, have made diplomacy so difficult today.

Such a comparison, such a statement, indicates that the hon. gentleman does not know very much about Canadian diplomacy. The leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Greenwood did not go so far as that about our diplomacy, but they took an anxious line about this talk of mine and other talks on Canadian-United States relations to which they did me the honour to refer. The hon. member for Greenwood quoted from a couple of Canadian papers to support his words and he suggested, and I am quoting his words, that I left "a rather widespread impression that we in Canada have in fact a lot of grievances and that we feel rather edgy towards the United States of America." He thought that very unfortunate indeed.

The leader of the opposition went further when he spoke on May 1 and again this afternoon. On May 1 he said that concern had been occasioned as to whether we are still operating on a friendly and frank basis with the government of the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite may rest easy. I think nothing has been said by myself or any other government spokesman which would warrant the concern they have expressed. Our relations with the United States continue to be on a good and friendly basis.

I admit very frankly that the nature and purpose of the statement I made in Toronto have been misunderstood by some critics in the United States who have based their criticism on press stories and on press excerpts from what I said. Other critics, such as the newspapers owned by Colonel McCormick of Chicago, the columnist George Sokolsky and a United States weekly news magazine seem to have read the text all right but to have drawn unfounded and totally unwarranted conclusions from it.

On the other side were those in both countries who thought that the effect of a frank and friendly analysis of the problem of our new relationship with the United States could only be helpful in the present circumstances. For instance, the Akron Beacon-Herald was surprised that my Toronto speech had caused criticism. They thought it "gently phrased and friendly" and that it demonstrated "a greater degree of unity between Ottawa and Washington than exists between the Democratic and Republican parties." The Boston Post concluded that "happily" the speech "stressed the solidarity of the North American neighbours far more than their differences," while the Cleveland Plain Dealer welcomed the Toronto speech as "a sign of common sense and maturity in Canada." The Providence Journal had this to say:

> Our good friend to the north has just read us a lesson in maturity that, if taken in the spirit of maturity, should be of compelling benefit all around.

Then finally, just to reassure the hon. gentleman, I could quote from a good many Canadian newspapers in order to match their quotations, but I shall confine myself to quoting just one paragraph from an editorial which appeared in a newspaper with which my hon. friends will be familiar. The Sydney Post-Record had this to say:

> External affairs minister L. B. (Mike) Pearson has the support of all Canada in his firm but good-tempered determination to maintain the dignity and prestige of our country in her relations with the United States as well as with all other nations.

Apparently these papers and others did not think, to use the vigorous expression of the hon. member for Greenwood, that in that speech I, and I quote his words, "was banging the United States on the nose." I can assure the leader of the opposition also that in that speech and others I was not speaking from personal pique. I hope that when I speak as Secretary of State for External Affairs I shall speak as a Canadian anxious that Canada's views should not be misunderstood in these difficult times in international affairs and as a Canadian who sees Canada standing on her own feet but marching in step with her neighbours and her friends, especially the United States and the United Kingdom.

If I had more time I could devote some to the remarks this afternoon of the leader of the opposition about what he called "hoop-la diplomacy" and to which I referred in a speech which I made recently. He was directing my remarks to developments that have taken place recently in the United States. If the leader of the opposition had read my speech and not a newspaper account of the speech into the records of Hansard he might have come to a different conclusion concerning it.

I made that speech, first, some time ago in Toronto and subsequently in Renfrew. When I made the speech in Toronto none of these developments at which he was hinting this afternoon had taken place. I was talking about the difficulties of conducting diplomacy in this television age, and they are very real indeed. To explain those difficulties, to emphasize them and indeed to dramatize them, I quoted from a paragraph by the columnist, Mr. Walter Lippmann, written some weeks before these events. He was referring to a solution of the Korean conflict by negotiation through the United Nations and he said:

> The only hope lay in a quiet, confidential and secret effort to work out political proposals which reflected truly the real balance of military power in the Far East. Nothing so hard and so unglamorous and so unrealistic as that was conceivable if we continued with public diplomacy as it has evolved under the television cameras at Lake Success.
> For when statesmen become actors they not only stick to their parts in the show, but, it may be added, they are stuck with their parts. They can be more and more of whatever they have been. But on pain of unpopularity—even it might be of denunciation and Congressional investigation—they cannot appear to be a little bit less.
> Thus by the "hoopla" system of diplomacy—which some say is so wonderfully enlightening—every difficult issue, not infrequently a comparatively easy issue, is likely to become insoluble as each actor-statesman rises to such peaks of public righteousness that in public he cannot possibly descend again into commonsense.
> Then, there is no hope except to turn off the lights, to shut down the microphones, to take away the stage props, to wash off the make-up, to disperse the crowds, and to let a few men absent themselves from publicity awhile.

That seemed to me to be very sound common sense, Mr. Speaker, and that is why I ventured to quote it in one or two speeches that I have made recently. I agree entirely of course with what the leader of the opposition has said, that any statement on international affairs at the present time must be made in the light of the effect it will have on what we now call the cold war, and how it will be exploited by our enemies in that war. That must be in anybody's mind who makes any public statement at this time. But surely the hon. member will admit that that does not mean that we should not on occasion, as spokesmen for the Canadian government, speak our minds in a frank and friendly way outlining the issues as we see them and outlining the effect of these issues on our relations with our neighbours and with our friends.

In this connection I should like to quote again from the statement of the leader of the opposition this afternoon an excerpt which expresses exactly what I have in mind. He said:

> I think, Mr. Speaker, that there is much more to fear in the suppression of discussion in the United States, in Canada, in Great Britain or in any other democracy than there is in complete freedom of democracy, so that out of the exchange of ideas and the examination of weaknesses there may be greater strength for the long struggle which lies ahead.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should now like to say a few words about some questions of policy which have come up in the course of this discussion regarding the war in Korea.

I thought that in my earlier statement I had made fairly clear our own understanding of what the policy should be in this conflict, but since there still seems to be some confusion on this subject I will try to go over that ground again. Let me say at the outset, I may be wrong, but I do not think—having regard to the statements that have been made in this house—that there should be any misunderstanding as to the policy of the government in respect of these matters. I think however that there is real doubt as to what the policy of the official opposition is in this matter because of the apparent differences of view among its individual members.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) insisted the other day that our objective "should be to gain victory in Korea just as quickly as possible". To that end he recommended that enemy bases in Manchuria should be bombed, that a naval blockade should be imposed against communist China, and that the nationalist Chinese forces now on the island of Formosa should be incorporated in the United Nations forces in Korea, or the restriction on their use should be removed.

Mr. Green: If I may correct the minister, I said I did not see why they should not be used in Korea. With regard to the bombing of bases, if the minister will refer to page 2783 of Hansard he will find that I said:

> I suggest that we should not tie General Ridgway's hands in dealing with these bases. If it is necessary for him to bomb them in order to win the war, then let him bomb them.

An hon. Member: What is the difference?

Mr. Pearson: I am sorry if I misquoted or misinterpreted what the hon. member said. From his own reading of what he said he would give to the general on the spot the decision as to whether the Manchurian bases should or should not be bombed. I will let it go at that.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if that was not exactly what he said a few days ago in this house?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, it was not. If the leader of the opposition would read what I said he would find that I did not say that. Incidentally, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra did mention in the course of his very interesting statement the offer of three divisions of the Chiang Kai-shek nationalist forces for Korea on July 3. That is on page 2783 of Hansard, and on that page the hon. member said: "The offer was turned down." But he might have added that it was turned down at that time by General MacArthur. When that offer was repeated in October, and this time with General MacArthur's support and approval, it was again turned down, this time by the United States chiefs of staff.

The proposals which the hon. gentleman and others have made are based on the assumption—and I myself think it is a rash assumption—that action of this kind, limited though it may be, would cause the Chinese communists to withdraw from Korea and presumably sue for peace, without bringing about the intervention in this conflict in the Far East of the U.S.S.R. Those recommendations add up to the policy which has been outlined and recommended in other places. Yet in concluding his speech the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra expressed the hope that the Canadian government would "maintain and strengthen the British commonwealth." Surely it should be well known to him, as it is known to other members of the house, that no single commonwealth government has supported the policy advocated by the hon. gentleman and by certain other people in this country and across the line. Therefore I would suggest to him that if he wishes to maintain his usual consistency he will have to decide whether Canada should follow the policy that he has outlined as against Korea and China or the policy being pursued by the other commonwealth governments in this matter, and indeed by the government of the United States.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Green: In what manner does the minister suggest that victory is to be won in Korea?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: That is a very good question, and I hope I shall be able to come to that before I conclude my remarks. The hon. member seems to me in fact—I hope I am not doing him an injustice—to represent in respect of Far Eastern policy what I might call the more aggressive wing of the official opposition. I am not quite sure how extensive that wing is but it certainly includes the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne).

Mr. Green: We do not believe in appeasement.

Mr. Pearson: Yet I find it difficult to believe that the views they have presented so cogently in their participation in this discussion enjoy the official endorsement of their party. Certainly the policy in regard to Asia which they recommended that Canada should adopt seems to me at least to differ very markedly from the milder, and in my opinion much wiser, policy urged by other hon. members of the official opposition, notably the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). Therefore I think I am entitled to say that I hope we shall soon hear what is the official policy of the official opposition in regard to this very important question.

Mr. Green: You tell us how the war is to be won in Korea.

Mr. Pearson: Now, Mr. Speaker, I turn to consider once again what are our objectives in Korea and how those objectives can be reached. I hope that in doing so I shall be able to satisfy the hon. gentleman's curiosity, if not to secure his approval. A number of members, including the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and the hon. member for St. John's West, have asked what is the policy of the Canadian government in this matter. In opening this discussion I tried to answer these questions but I am quite happy to try to go over the ground again. I realize that in such a confused situation as does exist in Korea it is difficult to have a clear objective or to see the objective that we have clearly. It is now more important than ever that we should have as exact an idea as possible of what we are trying to accomplish in Korea, along with other members of the United Nations. The Canadian brigade group will shortly be in action, so not only they but every other Canadian will want to know what is their purpose in Korea and what is the policy of the Canadian government in regard to achieving that purpose.

Before I try to answer once again this crucial question, I should like to draw to your attention—this was done I thought very effectively this afternoon by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore)—the advantages which have already accrued to the cause of freedom from the United Nations action in Korea. In the first place, as was pointed out this afternoon, the military danger to many other areas in Asia has been greatly reduced as a result of the courageous and skilful campaign which has been carried on in Korea. Many of the best formations of the Chinese communist army have been committed to battle in Korea and have suffered very heavy losses in the process. As a result, the number of trained troops facing Indo-China, Formosa, Hong Kong, Burma and Malaya has been reduced, and the danger of successful attacks in those areas is now I think less than it was—although of course it has certainly not by any means been eliminated.

In meeting the onslaught of the Chinese communist forces then, the United Nations forces in Korea have suffered heavy losses but they have inflicted immensely heavier losses on the enemy. They can take pride in the fact that their heroic resistance has lessened the danger in other parts of Asia. I believe that is something that has already been accomplished by way of benefit to the cause of freedom.

Another way in which the cause of freedom has benefited through United Nations action in Korea is that the whole of the free world is now aroused, as was pointed out this afternoon, and alerted to the danger so that more rapid progress is now being made in increasing the armed forces in being in the free world. We have now some reason to believe that before long these forces may be large enough to deter any would-be aggressor. This improvement in our position we owe, I think, largely to the sense of urgency which the war in Korea brought us, and also to the energetic leadership of the United States of America.

This war in Korea has also been the occasion of another discovery which must be encouraging to free men everywhere. It is that collective military action against aggression is possible, and can be effective. It is certainly true even yet that three-quarters of the United Nations forces now fighting in Korea, apart from the South Koreans themselves, are being provided by the United States. But I think equally remarkable is the fact that no fewer than sixteen countries are now contributing contingents to the United Nations forces, and that all those contingents are being welded together in a strong and dependable United Nations army. It may be objected that all this is very well, but that if the United Nations army in Korea has not a clear mission which it can hope to fulfil, this whole grand exercise in international co-operation is futile. What, then, is the United Nations mission in Korea? Essentially, I think, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat what I said the other day, to defeat aggression, and by the lesson of that defeat to help prevent the outbreak of world war III.

If the aggression in Korea had been allowed to succeed without any attempt being made to resist it, other acts of aggression would certainly have followed. The strength of the free world would have been nibbled away piecemeal in accordance with the master plans of the Politburo. Eventually, a stage would have been reached when the remaining countries which were still free and independent would have realized that they had either to wage war with fewer resources and with much slighter hope of success, or else be engulfed under a wave of Soviet tyranny. Since they would certainly have chosen war rather than slavery, a third world war in those circumstances would have been inevitable.

To the infantryman slogging over the muddy fields of Korea, it may seem odd to hear someone say that his mission is to prevent a third world war. He may well be forgiven for not seeing very much difference between a world war and the bloody business in which he is now engaged. I certainly sympathize with that view. But it is necessary to remember that in the present circumstances a new world war will be very different from the campaign now being fought in Korea. It would be an atomic war which would result in the death of hundreds of thousands of people at one stroke, and which would leave the earth pockmarked and infected with radioactivity for years to come, even if it did not, as is conceivable, result in something far worse. That is the nightmare we are trying by every means in our power to avoid. When viewed in that light I believe that our soldiers in Korea, and the soldiers from other countries of the United Nations, will see that their task, however disagreeable and dangerous it may be, is supremely worthwhile.

Now, Mr. Speaker, exception was taken to my statement of our objectives the other day by the hon. member for St. John's West. He repeated his views this afternoon on my statement that our objective in Korea was to defeat aggression. That statement left him somewhat indignant, and he challenged me to uphold it, that the defeat of armed aggression was the sole military purpose of the United Nations in Korea.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I point out that the minister is not really representing what I said. My notes show that the minister has said some people are under the impression that we are fighting in Korea to defeat communism, but that is not correct. We are fighting to defeat aggression. The distinction between what the minister is now saying—

Mr. Pearson: I do not know what the hon. member's notes show. I know what is in Hansard, and Hansard is the record of this house. In any event, Mr. Speaker, he did challenge me. He will admit that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Oh, certainly.

Mr. Pearson: He challenged me to prove—I think I am right in saying this—that our sole military objective in Korea was the defeat of aggression.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, that we were not there to defeat communism.

Mr. Pearson: Well, I am willing to accept that. He challenged me—this is the way he put it and if he looks at Hansard he will change his mind—to justify my statement that our objective in Korea is to defeat aggression, and that is our only objective in Korea. All the hon. gentleman has to do to accept that fact is to read the resolutions of the United Nations which are the sole basis of our operations in Korea. I shall quote the resolution that covers our action there. It is the resolution of June 27, 1950, and it has been accepted by more than fifty members of the United Nations. This is what it says:

> The security council recommends that the members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area.

That is our objective in Korea. Last week General Marshall repeated for his government this same objective when he said:

> Our objective in Korea continues to be the defeat of aggression and the restoration of peace.

The hon. gentleman's leader this afternoon in the House of Commons said that it was the result of that decision, the decision of the United Nations relating to the specific action of the United Nations in Korea, which has resulted in Canada's participation in the efforts of the United Nations to preserve the freedom of Korea and deal with this act of naked aggression. That indeed is our objective in Korea. The hon. member would, I think, at least add, if not substitute for that, that our objective in Korea is the defeat of communism by armed force, because we are intervening with armed force in Korea. I say in all sincerity—and I know he will grant my sincerity in this matter—that there is an extremely dangerous confusion here, which should be cleared up, especially as it may be difficult to grasp the reasons for my statement, when Canadian troops are fighting Chinese communists in Korea, when other Canadian troops are being enlisted to stand on guard in western Europe against the threat from Russian communists, and when it is known that these various threats are interlinked and are unleashed or held in check at the orders of the Kremlin.

I admit all that. But as I understand it, communism is a dogma, a type of society and a military danger—all three. The dogma has influenced the type of society which has been created in Russia, in other cominform countries and in China. The totalitarian nature of Soviet society has facilitated and perhaps even necessitated acts of aggression. But communism as a dogma, I repeat once again, in my view, cannot be destroyed in Korea or elsewhere by military means. If we think it can, and if we think it should be attempted, we should have intervened in Czechoslovakia when the communists took over there. Such armed intervention at that time, however, or in Greece, or in connection with the Berlin blockade, could have and would have received no sanction of any kind from the United Nations. Communism as a dogma must be fought with other weapons and in other ways. But when its noxious doctrines, and when its perverted form of society takes arms and commits aggression against other peoples, then we must answer the communists with collective action including, when it can be made effective, collective military action; and that is what we are doing in Korea today.

What we are fighting in Korea and what we may have to fight in other parts of the world is what William Pitt the younger called "armed opinions", but armed opinions which have expressed themselves in armed aggression. I therefore hope that it will now be understood what I mean when I say that the United Nations' objective in Korea is not, by arms, to fight communism as an idea. Our objective there is to offer successful resistance to communist aggression and thereby to prevent, we hope, a third world war.

To conclude with the point that was raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), what can we do about the present situation in Korea? If we do not adopt additional measures, how can we ever hope to win? At the present time the advantages of two alternative methods are being urged. This is, indeed, the great debate. On the one hand it is said that total military victory is indispensable and that it can be achieved by permitting the bombing of China, by imposing a naval blockade and by employing nationalist Chinese forces outside Formosa. I do not want to repeat at this time why I believe that that policy would be a profound mistake—but I want to state my view that such a policy would not end the war in Korea at this time but might, on the contrary, lead from limited action to unlimited action, the result of which might bring in the U.S.S.R. If it did not, in my view it would almost certainly engulf us in a full continental war with 450 million Chinese people. I cannot myself think that that is the best way of ending the war in Korea. We would be playing for high stakes indeed if we took this kind of limited action in the hope that by such limited action we could end the war in Korea without going on if it did not succeed to unlimited action or without bringing in anyone else.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Green: Will the minister dispute the fact that his policy means asking Canadian troops to fight in Korea with one hand tied behind their backs?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: What a stupid question!

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not my policy; and certainly it is not the policy of this government or that of any government that I know of that has troops in Korea.

Mr. Knowles: Or of the United Nations.

Mr. Pearson: And it is not the policy of the United Nations. It may be that, in spite of all our efforts, the catastrophe of a third world war may not be avoided. It may be that, in spite of all our efforts, this conflict will extend to the continent of China. We may not have the control of that extension. But if the conflict is so extended, let the responsibility for the terror, the anguish and the devastation that it will cause rest in other hands than ours.

Mr. Green: It is a policy of fear.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pearson: That is the hon. gentleman's interpretation of it, that it is a policy of fear. As I see it, it is a policy of realism and of peace. What is the alternative policy? It is for the United Nations forces to continue inflicting heavy losses on the aggressors, as they are doing at the present time, and at the same time to avoid any measures which are not absolutely necessary from a military point of view, and which might lead to the spreading of the conflict.

As I said a few days ago in this place, there have been no recent indications that the Chinese communists are in any mood to negotiate. I cannot believe, however, that the Chinese government in Peking can be so blind to Chinese national interests as to continue indefinitely suffering the very heavy losses which are now being inflicted on their forces. So we must hope that a day will come when they will realize that it is not China but Russia which is being served by the aggression in Korea in which they have participated.

If that time comes, they may then be ready to enter into negotiations leading to a settlement in Korea and also to a settlement of other Far Eastern issues. Then, as now, the United Nations will stand ready to negotiate, as has been made clear many times, and most notably by the general assembly when it approved overwhelmingly the statement of principles drawn up by the United Nations' cease-fire committee. There is, I am afraid, no other answer than this that I can offer to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), who argued on behalf of his group that the time is opportune now for another attempt to settle the Korean question by negotiation.

No one would be much happier than I if negotiations could be opened tomorrow with a view to reaching an honourable settlement of the war in Korea along the lines suggested by the hon. member himself. But the steps which he proposed—and which he begged me to take up with the United Nations—were very similar to those I outlined when I spoke at the United Nations on January 26 last. There are a few differences in detail, and those differences will, of course, be carefully studied, and will be borne in mind if there ever is an opportunity for negotiation in the near future.

But it is necessary to remember, Mr. Speaker, that all the recent efforts of the United Nations—including this statement of principles to which I have referred—have been, to say the least, rudely rebuffed by the Chinese communist regime. The approaches made by the good offices committee have been rebuffed, and unofficial feelers by individual countries have not been any more successful. The hon. member for Kootenay West suggested that we might propose to the Indian government that they contact the Peking government with a view to entering into negotiations. The Canadian government has kept in constant touch with the Indian government on this question, and the Indian government in its turn has been vigilant in watching for any sign that the Peking regime might be willing to discuss a settlement in Korea and in the Far East generally on any terms that we could even consider. Although it would certainly be improper for me to reveal what the Indian ambassador in Peking has been reporting to his own government, I can say that his inquiries in Peking have not given any grounds for believing that the Chinese communists are yet ready to negotiate on any terms that could conceivably be acceptable to the United Nations. And that is what I meant when I said that for the time being, especially while the Chinese military offensive is going on, it would appear that there are no further steps that could be taken, either by the United Nations collectively, or by any other members individually, to bring the Chinese communists to the conference table on any conditions that we would consider.

But I should like to assure the house, Mr. Speaker, that the possibility of securing an honourable settlement by negotiation is never being overlooked by any of the governments, any of the free governments, which are concerned with this matter; we will all continue to search for any indications that the Peking regime may be ready to discuss a settlement, and we will be energetic in taking advantage of any opportunity that we might be able to discover. Meanwhile, however, I can only repeat what I said the other day, namely, that until we get that indication in some form from Peking, and while the battle is going on, diplomacy must for the time being take a second place to arms. We can only hope that the use of those arms by the United Nations will be so effective and do so much damage to the forces of communist aggression that before long they will see reason. It may then be possible to negotiate with them on United Nations terms, and the danger of a third world war arising in that part of the world will, at least, have been avoided.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I just want to deal with two matters that were raised, and which I did not wish to pursue at that time so that I would not interrupt the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In the first place I might point out that the Secretary of State for External Affairs repeated several times that I had made certain allegations. If he will check the record he will find that I referred to the fact that certain allegations had been made by responsible individuals, and that I felt an explanation should be given. I repeat that statement, and I do repeat also that they are responsible individuals and that I think they deserve an explanation.

The second matter was in regard to a point that I raised later when I suggested that the possibility of air action against the Manchurian bases to which the hon. minister was referring did not seem inconsistent with what he had said on an earlier occasion. I would refer to what he said on April 26 as reported at page 2397 of Hansard in reply to a question which had been asked him, and these were his words:

> However, it is of course possible to visualize a situation where immediate retaliatory action, without consultation, might be unavoidable in pursuing enemy bombers back to the Manchurian air base from which they came. The decision on the spot to take such immediate retaliatory action would presumably be based on overriding considerations of military security.

It was to that statement that I was referring.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VETERANS BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL LOANS ACT—EXTENSION OF APPLICATION, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act to make the act applicable to a greater number of veterans and to enlarge the period within which guaranteed loans may be made under the act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister or the parliamentary assistant say a word as to the history of this act?

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I shall be very glad to say a few words, giving the history of this act. This resolution introduces a very simple bill to amend the present act and to extend the deadline for the making of loans from January 15, 1952, until January 1, 1955. The act itself is the consequence of recommendations of the veterans affairs committee in 1945. They were considering the veterans charter at that time. The veterans charter, you will recall, provided for cash gratuities to all those who served in the armed forces. It provided for reinstatement in civilian employment to those who had it on enlistment. It provided for re-establishment credits to those who wanted to use extra money for setting themselves up in business or for home furnishings, and also provided for professional and vocational training, and the Veterans Land Act.

The veterans affairs committee found that there was one group who were not provided for, namely, those who wished to use their cash gratuities or their re-establishment credits to go into business for themselves, and they made a recommendation to the house which the government accepted. That provision was made for business and professional loans to veterans. The bill was introduced in 1946, and was based on the same principle as the Farm Improvement Loans Act, which we have already dealt with this session.

The government itself does not make any loans to the veterans, but guarantees loans which are made by the chartered banks, the reason for this being that the ordinary branch managers of the chartered banks of Canada are certainly the best judges of whether or not the enterprise which the veteran was considering launching himself was likely to succeed in the community in which he was situated. The total amount of loans which were to be guaranteed by the government was $25 million. The terms of guarantee were rather more generous than in the Farm Improvement Loans Act, where the guarantee was up to 10 per cent of the loans made by each bank. In the case of this Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act, the government guaranteed each bank up to 25 per cent of losses on the first million dollars of loans by the bank, and then 15 per cent on loans beyond that, the loans to be made up to $3,000, the veteran being required to have one-third down himself. The interest is 5 per cent simple, and payments were expected not less frequently than quarterly. That maximum time of loan repayment was ten years. There is a schedule of repayment, depending on the size of the loan.

The loans were for a variety of purposes which are detailed in the act. Perhaps hon. members would like to have the same sort of summary put on Hansard as I gave when the Farm Improvement Loans Act was before the house; that is, loans by purposes, loans by provinces and loans by banks. Perhaps I should just read off loans by purposes for the information of hon. members so that they can see the type of thing which money is being loaned for. This is the period January 15, 1947, to December 31, 1950: 1,272 loans were made for the purchases of business to a total amount of $2,800,000; the purchase of interest in a partnership, of capital for a new partnership, 1,393 loans for $2,900,000; purchases of machinery, tools, instruments and other equipment, 1,011 loans for the amount of $1,400,000; repair of machinery, tools, instruments or other equipment, 12 loans for $14,600; construction, repairs or alterations of, or making additions to buildings or structures, 531 loans for $1 million; purchase of motorized units, 932 loans, for $1,200,000; making a total of 5,151 loans for a total amount of $9,424,378.96. If I may have permission of the house I should like to have the next two tables, showing loans by provinces and loans by banks, placed on Hansard, without reading them into the record.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sinclair: They are as follows:

	No.	Amount
Ontario	1,965	$3,553,780.69
Alberta	955	1,800,552.04
British Columbia	759	1,437,924.87
Saskatchewan	484	904,128.89
Quebec	338	609,463.00
Manitoba	306	584,386.36
Nova Scotia	148	224,652.73
New Brunswick	124	207,809.38
Prince Edward Island	67	89,257.00
Newfoundland	5	12,424.00
Total	5,151	$9,424,378.96

The Canadian Bank of Commerce	1,481	$2,692,875.52
The Bank of Nova Scotia	462	863,129.64
The Dominion Bank	248	432,525.70
The Royal Bank of Canada	1,179	2,116,082.60
Bank of Montreal	1,118	1,996,204.66
The Imperial Bank of Canada	268	546,370.54
The Bank of Toronto	301	584,897.30
Banque Canadienne Nationale	91	185,723.00
The Provincial Bank of Canada	1	3,000.00
Barclays Bank	2	3,570.00
Total	5,151	$9,424,378.96

I should like now to give a brief summary of the government's position, to date, so far as these loans are concerned. Since the inception of the act on January 15, 1947, to December 31, 1950, veterans received 5,151 loans for a total amount of $9,424,378.96. That is an average of $1,830 per loan. Of the total amount of $9,424,378.96 loaned to veterans since the inception of the act, $6,285,048.78 has been repaid. Roughly two-thirds of the loans made in this period have already been repaid.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is that up to schedule? Does that practically fulfil the requirements?

Mr. Sinclair: The best indication of that, perhaps, is the losses. Up until now there have been 102 claims totalling $109,127.77, or roughly $1,000 each for those 102 claims, upon which the banks have asked the government to make good the losses.

The government's contingent liability at the present time under the 25 per cent guarantee is $1,404,808.03. Under the 15 per cent guarantee, for loans in excess of the first million dollars, the amount is $570,775.73. Loans outstanding at the present time total $3,139,330.18.

The amending bill is a very simple one, in which three things are done. First of all there is the intention to extend the deadline from January 15, 1952, to January 1, 1955. The second point is to include in the provisions respecting those who may apply for loans, veterans who have applied for and perhaps received benefits under the Veterans Land Act, but who have paid back those benefits. The original act said that any veteran in receipt of a war service gratuity could apply for such a loan, except those who have received assistance under the Veterans Land Act. This latter group could apply under the Farm Improvement Loans Act for further loans, if necessary.

The third minor change is to change the provision for the security of the loans so that it will be the same as the security provisions under the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Are applications still coming in freely?

Mr. Sinclair: Applications have fallen off, as might have been expected. The main rush was in the two years immediately after the war. But last year, for example, there were four hundred odd applications made. The minister intends to refer the bill to the committee on veterans affairs, as soon as it is given second reading.

Mr. Cardiff: Does the veteran who had a loan before and who paid up his obligation have a certain advantage?

Mr. Sinclair: No, that is not quite right. The original qualification for a loan was that a man should be a veteran in receipt of gratuity, but not in receipt of any benefit under the Veterans Land Act. If a veteran had applied for a loan under the Veterans Land Act, and then decided he did not want to go in for farming and paid back the loan he had received under the Veterans Land Act, he can now make application for a business loan, if he wishes to launch a business.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Might not that principle apply to the case mentioned by the hon. member for Huron North? If a veteran had had a loan, and paid it off, why could he not get another loan under this act?

Mr. Sinclair: There is no reason at all under the act why that can not be done.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Oh, I misunderstood.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question about the figures he gave in his introductory statement. I think he said that there had been a record of failures in the repayment of loans numbering only 102 thus far. I would understand that the banks have made application to the government to make good on the guarantee. I believe the parliamentary assistant said the total amount was $109,000. Is that the amount the banks are actually asking the government to pay, or is that the total of loans upon which there have been defaults, and concerning which the government's obligation will not exceed 25 per cent of the amount?

Mr. Sinclair: No; those are the losses the government actually has made good. It is not 25 per cent of any individual loans. It is 25 per cent of loans made up to the first million dollars. Then it is 15 per cent beyond that.

To put it on another basis, the cost of the program to the government has been about $20 per loan because, from the figures I gave, we have made over 5,000 loans, and we have lost $109,000.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I did not understand the point correctly, but it is my understanding that the government is not liable for only 25 per cent of a loan. If a bank has made loans of $1 million, and there is default in respect of a loan of $3,000, the government must pay the whole $3,000?

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: Then, another question: If a veteran borrowed money under the act and repaid it on schedule to the bank, is he then debarred from getting the benefit under the Veterans Land Act? The parliamentary assistant said he could get another loan. Does he have the option to switch and get the benefits of the Veterans Land Act, if he has paid up in full?

Mr. Sinclair: That is a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. The only qualification we in the Department of Finance have is that a veteran who is receiving benefits under the Veterans Land Act cannot qualify for a business loan.

Mr. Herridge: I am pleased to see this resolution introduced. I am sure the parliamentary assistant will agree that this was considered experimental legislation in 1945. There is no doubt it has been helpful to many veterans. I know of a number of veterans in my own constituency who have taken advantage of the act, and it has assisted them in re-establishment.

I am pleased to see an extension of the period in which the application can be made. Apparently the losses to date have been relatively light. How do they compare with the losses experienced by banks who make loans to civilians under normal conditions?

Mr. Sinclair: I would say offhand they are very much higher. They are over five times the amount of losses under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Naturally a young veteran launching out into business is not as good a risk as an established farmer would be. That was why the government guaranteed 25 per cent on the first million of loans by each bank in this case, whereas we guaranteed only 10 per cent in respect of farmers under the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Mr. Fulton: Have representations been made asking that the amount permitted to each veteran be increased? If so, what consideration was given and what decision was arrived at? It is represented to us from time to time that, with the increases in the cost of machinery, and in the prices of things the veteran will need in business, as in the case of the Veterans Land Act, the initial maximum loan which may have been adequate at the time it was first asked for is no longer adequate to give the veteran a chance to make a good start. What is the situation there?

Mr. Sinclair: A similar type of question was asked in connection with farm improvement loans. The same director in our department supervises the two types of loans, and he said there had been no representations, to his knowledge, for an increased ceiling. The fact that the average loan is about $1,800 is one indication.

Mr. Green: Did the parliamentary assistant say $1,800?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, $1,830. A veteran would have to have $1,500 in cash to get a $3,000 loan which, in itself, is a fair deterrent to the young veteran who is starting up in business for himself. But that, again, can be discussed at length when we have the administrator before us on the committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. Johnston: I have not followed this too closely, but I understand that the lending company will not suffer a loss until the total losses have exceeded $250,000?

Mr. Sinclair: Quite right.

Mr. Johnston: I understand that the government assumes all losses up to that point. Have the lending companies suffered any losses under this legislation?

Mr. Sinclair: In order to suffer a loss a bank must lose more than $250,000. Since the total losses of all banks combined have been only $109,000 no bank has reached the $250,000 limit at which its losses would start. The whole intent of the government guarantee was to use the business ability and knowledge of the managers of the chartered banks across Canada who could assess the business risk. Under this guarantee the banks could extend much more generous credit than they normally would, and at a five per cent rate.

Mr. Johnston: Twenty-five per cent of the loss is rather high and the fact that it is high might cause the banks to be a little less discreet when paying out money. They would not care whether it was lost or not.

Mr. Sinclair: I think that was the hope of the veterans affairs committee.

Mr. Johnston: It could be tightened up so that a veteran would not have a chance under this legislation, but it seems to me that when you guarantee 25 per cent you are making it impossible for the other fellow to lose anything.

Mr. Sinclair: The fact that $9 million in loans have been made so far with losses of only $109,000 is an indication that the banks are not giving away money. I was a member of the veterans affairs committee which made this recommendation and I remember one of the things we were most keen about was to make sure that there would be such underwriting that the banks would be much more generous in making loans than they ordinarily would be. I remember also when the Farm Improvement Loans Act was before us there was a call from hon. members for a more generous guarantee than the ten per cent guarantee under that act so that the banks might be still more generous.

Mr. Wright: Does the department receive from the banks or the lending institutions returns which would indicate the number of veterans who had applied for loans and been refused?

Mr. Sinclair: The same problem was raised in connection with the Farm Improvement Loans Act. We have only two ways of judging. One is by letters from veterans to the Minister of Finance or to the administrator stating that they have been refused. Those have been few in number. An even better indication is given by members of parliament. In the last four years very few hon. members have made complaints that veteran constituents have been refused loans. This indicates the judgment used by the local bank managers. There is nothing that permits the Department of Finance to force a bank manager to make a loan. But the fact that the guarantee is as generous as it is gives the bank a fairly wide discretion.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It would appear as though the legislation had been successful. On the one hand, as the parliamentary assistant points out, there have been few complaints and, on the other hand, a substantial amount of business has been done with the losses fairly moderate. When it was stated that the cost had been $20 per loan, was that based on the losses only or did it include administrative costs?

Mr. Sinclair: I was speaking very generally. The actual loss to the government as far as the guarantee is concerned is about that amount. The administrative cost is quite small. There is a total staff of 16 which handles the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act. That could be brought up when we are in committee.

Mr. Herridge: I realize that we shall have full opportunity to ask questions when the bill is before the committee, but I do want to state now that I have personal knowledge that there was some dissatisfaction in the early months after this legislation became effective. There appeared to be some misunderstanding on the part of local bank managers, but since that time I have not heard of any dissatisfaction. When we consider the purposes of the act and the circumstances under which it is used I consider it has been most satisfactory.

Mr. Green: Will there be an amendment to the act so that it will apply to men serving in the special force?

Mr. Sinclair: The fact that it is being extended to 1955 would indicate that to my mind. This is getting into the field of the Department of Veterans Affairs. I am dealing with the financial aspects. I am quite sure that when the bill is before the veterans affairs committee hon. members will be able to question the minister or the parliamentary assistant as to that.

Mr. Green: The intention is to make its benefits available to men serving in the special force?

Mr. Sinclair: I cannot say that. That would have to be stated by the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

The Deputy Chairman: If that question is not within the scope of this resolution perhaps it should not be asked at this time.

Mr. Green: Surely it is within the scope of the resolution. That is what we want to find out, whether the legislation to follow this resolution will apply to men serving in the special force. Surely I am in order in asking that question.

Mr. Lapointe: Perhaps the hon. member would agree to wait until we are discussing the resolution which is to follow this one, and which deals with benefits to be given to members of the special force. At that time I shall be able to explain just what is being done in connection with the different pieces of legislation which form the veterans charter, part of which we intend to make applicable to the members of the Korean force.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): On a quick look at the present resolution I do not think it would include them as it now stands.

Mr. Fulton: The resolution states that it is intended to amend the act to make it applicable to a greater number of veterans, and that I think raises the question whether or not veterans of the Korean force would be entitled to benefits under this act. Perhaps it can be left until we are dealing with the next resolution, but I think the question should be answered at some stage.

The Deputy Chairman: I might state to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that I did not rule out his question. I was merely asking if it was within the scope of the resolution. The Minister of Veterans Affairs has given a reply which may or may not be satisfactory.

Mr. Green: I cannot tell from the reply whether it is satisfactory or not. I cannot understand why the minister is not able to say whether this legislation is to be made applicable to the men serving in the special force.

Mr. Lapointe: Surely I cannot be asked to deal with a bill which has not yet been distributed to the house and which is being brought into the house by a department other than my own.

Mr. Green: I am not asking about something contained in another bill; I am asking whether the benefits under this particular measure are going to be available to the men serving in the special force. I submit that the Minister of Veterans Affairs should be able to answer that question.

Mr. Lapointe: My answer would be that it cannot be made applicable to members of the Korean forces without an amendment to the present legislation which can be made only after the other resolution on the order paper is passed. Perhaps the hon. member will permit me to explain when that resolution is before us what it is intended to do.

Mr. Fair: I wonder if we have any lawyers in the house? That question arises because of the discussion we have had on both sides.

Mr. Green: Has there been any consideration given to extending this act to the case where a veteran buys an interest in an incorporated company? As I remember it, when the act was originally passed there was no provision made for a loan under circumstances of that kind. The veteran could only get a loan if he was going into a partnership as distinct from an incorporated company. Has any consideration been given to making a change to make it possible for a man to get a loan in order to buy into a company?

Mr. Sinclair: There was a very long discussion of this matter before the veterans affairs committee in 1945. The objection was that if the veteran was a minority shareholder in an incorporated company he would have no control over the business operation, nor would the bank, and that the banks themselves would not make loans under such circumstances. That was the stumbling block, and as far as I know no further consideration has been given. When the matter is before the veterans affairs committee the director of the branch can give evidence on that point. This act has worked very well in the case of the individual veteran establishing himself in his own business or in a partnership where of course he has a measure of control.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe (for Mr. Abbott) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 286, to amend the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time?

Mr. Sinclair: If it could be read a second time now we would refer it to the veterans affairs committee immediately.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By leave of the house.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

SPECIAL FORCE VETERANS

PROVISION FOR EXTENSION OF BENEFITS TO MEMBERS OF SPECIAL FORCES

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to make certain rights, privileges and benefits applicable to persons serving in that part of the armed forces of Canada designated as the special force and to certain other members of the Canadian forces.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that on April 4, when I introduced the resolution to set up the veterans affairs committee, I referred in my statement to a bill that would be sent to that committee to provide certain benefits for the members of the special forces. It will be remembered that section 7 of the Canadian Forces Act, which section expires at the end of this session, authorizes the governor in council to designate certain forces as special forces and to extend to them such benefits of the veterans charter as might be found appropriate. The present resolution envisages legislation along these lines. It will make provision for the extension of certain benefits to the members of the special forces, to persons enrolled for service, and to men and officers who have become members of the Canadian forces for a term not exceeding three years.

In addition it is proposed to provide authority for the governor in council to extend all the benefits of the veterans charter to all persons who, subsequent to July, 1950, were on service in a theatre of operations with the Canadian forces. As I said, this resolution refers to certain benefits which were made available to the members of the forces of world war II. After that war, as hon. members will recall, there was a certain relationship between the benefits given to those members of the forces who had served overseas and the benefits given to those who had served in Canada only. It will be realized, I am sure, that it is very difficult in this uneasy period of half war and half peace to determine just what this relationship should be at the present time.

The bulk of the men in the armed forces are serving under regular engagement, and only a portion of them are members of the special force and are enlisted as such. Rates of pay and other factors have changed, and all these things make it undesirable in the view of the government to legislate finally at this time for the general re-establishment of the veterans to be of what we now call the special force, and those others who might be called upon to serve outside Canada. As hon. members know, while some members of the special force are at the present time in action fighting in Korea and others will be joining them in a very short time indeed to participate with them in action in that field, others have not yet served overseas, and in fact some of them are not likely to do so.

However, I am sure that it will be the feeling of the house that when the men who have been in action or have served overseas in a manner comparable to the veterans of world war II are discharged from the services they should be granted the benefits of the veterans charter which apply to their particular service. The benefits required to date for the re-establishment in civil life of members of the special force so far discharged have been made available by order in council by virtue of section 7 of the Canadian Forces Act, to which I referred at the beginning of my statement. It is the intention to confirm those benefits by the legislation which will follow this resolution.

There are, however, other benefits of the veterans charter, especially the War Service Grants Act, the Veterans Land Act, and the training sections of the Veterans Rehabilitation Act, which have not yet been made applicable for the reason that the problem has still to be met. Here I might try to answer the question which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) raised a few minutes ago. The way we are proceeding is similar to the course followed during world war II. We have set up a committee with representatives of the Department of Veterans Affairs, Department of National Defence and Department of Labour. At the present time we are going through the whole of the veterans charter in order to determine the manner in which the provisions of that charter can be made applicable to the veterans of the special force. I believe all hon. members will recall that was the way it was done during the last war. In fact, by the time the war was concluded, I believe there were sixty-nine or eighty-nine orders in council covering the bulk of the veterans legislation, which were afterwards incorporated in statutory form.

At the present time this committee is going through this legislation, particularly with regard to the rehabilitation part of the legislation to which my hon. friend referred. It must be realized that although it is quite easy to make some of the provisions of this charter applicable to members of the forces, such as the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act and the Unemployment Insurance Act, and the Pension Act, there are other provisions which need special examination and investigation. For instance in the case of the Veterans Land Act a question will arise in connection with a veteran who has already received benefits under that act. If he is discharged after two or three years' service we shall then have to decide to what other benefits he could be entitled under the Veterans Land Act. Similarly, if that veteran is a man who has received training under the rehabilitation program following world war II, has become a medical man, served in the special force and is then discharged after two or three years' service, a question will arise as to what benefits he will be entitled to for professional training. Such a man may decide he no longer likes the medical profession but would prefer to become an architect, and whether he would be entitled to further training under the act is a question to be decided. For that reason we are now examining the whole of the veterans charter to make it applicable to the special force veterans.

As I mentioned, some of these benefits have already been extended to them.

Mr. Wright: Could the minister list those benefits that have been extended?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes, that is what I intend to do. Legislation which will follow this resolution will incorporate for the members of the special force the terms of the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, by virtue of which a veteran who has worked for three months for an employer before his enlistment may claim his job within three months after his discharge. It is exactly the same as the legislation which existed after world war II, and which proved to be so beneficial. As a matter of record, I believe there were not more than two or three prosecutions under that act throughout the whole country. This was due to the co-operation of employers, and I have no doubt that in the present emergency employers will co-operate as well as they did after world war II.

We have extended the Unemployment Insurance Act to cover these veterans. Hon. members will recall that following world war II provisions were made to pay what was called an out-of-work allowance. Experience taught us that the efficient administration of this out-of-work allowance was dependent upon the use of the unemployment insurance commission machinery, and the employment service provided under that commission. It has been thought that it would be more beneficial for the veteran himself if we were to extend to him the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Contrary to what has been stated, these benefits have been extended to a special force veteran who has served for three months, for which service he can claim a minimum of fifteen weeks' benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Of course a longer period of service, and the fact that he may have been in an insurable position previous to enlistment, would extend the period of time for which he is entitled to draw unemployment insurance.

We have, by order in council, extended the benefits of the Pension Act under the same conditions generally as now apply to world war II veterans. This means that pensions will be payable for any disability or aggravation of a disability, or for death arising during or as a result of service. As in the case of world war II veterans, the insurance principle applies.

Mr. Green: Even to those who only serve in Canada?

Mr. Lapointe: Members of the special force, yes.

One further group to receive assistance under the provisions of this legislation will be those who come under the Civil Service

Superannuation Act. It will mean that a permanent civil servant who is given leave of absence to enlist in the special force will have his seniority protected and superannuation payments made on his behalf, the same as was done during world war II.

There is one further item of protection which does not appear in any act to which I might refer. It appears under the regulations made under the Department of Veterans Affairs Act, and relates to post-discharge medical treatment. Through an order in council amending medical treatment regulations, members of the special force have been placed in the same position in regard to post-discharge medical treatment as were the veterans of world war II. For this purpose we have revived treatments under class II and class III. Hon. members will recall that class II treatment covers the care of those discharged from the forces who need continuing treatment. This is provided as of right, and while under treatment the veteran receives pay and allowances identical with those he received during his service in the special force. Class III provides free treatment for any condition during the twelve months following discharge, and that is similar to a provision which existed for world war II veterans. Hospital allowances are paid during the period of this treatment for a time equal to the length of service up to a maximum of one year. Those receiving disability pensions as a result of their service in the special force will, of course, be entitled to treatment for their pensionable disability as of right; and others who served in a theatre of actual war are eligible to apply for treatment for any other condition if they are unable to provide treatment for themselves. That is what existed for world war II veterans. I do not think there is any more that I wish to add at this stage, Mr. Speaker. It is, of course, the intention to refer the bill to the veterans affairs committee for study.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Did I understand the minister to say that he expected or hoped that all the benefits of the veterans charter would at some time be extended to the special force?

Mr. Lapointe: I am sorry, but I was not able to follow that question.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I was not quite clear as to what the minister said. I understood him to say that it was expected or hoped that all the benefits under what we now call the veterans charter will at some date be extended to the veterans of the special force. Did I hear that correctly?

Mr. Lapointe: I think what I said was that I was sure it would be the feeling of this house that the men who have seen action and served overseas, in a way comparable to world war II veterans, would have extended to them the benefits which were extended to world war II veterans.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Then I should like to ask the minister if it is correct that the bill which he will introduce following this resolution will really cover only minor benefits such as civil reinstatement in employment, unemployment insurance, the benefits of the Pension Act which they would automatically get, and the same benefits that would accrue to anyone in the civil service. Surely the minister must feel that that is hardly sufficient at the present time, because injured boys will be coming back from Korea, and they will be discharged, and if those are the only benefits that they will be eligible to receive—

Mr. Lesage: We are not in committee. If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps it would be better to go into committee; then hon. members may ask questions and receive answers.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Perhaps the minister can answer my question now.

Mr. Lapointe: As I explained earlier, Mr. Chairman, in drafting this benefits legislation for veterans of the special force, we are following the same course which was followed during the last war. As we will be incorporating some of these benefits, in a definite fashion, in a statute which will follow, we are asking to be authorized to make applicable by order in council the balance of the legislation which is included in a schedule. The bill includes the schedule in which is mentioned all the veterans legislation which is not incorporated in the act itself. We are asking authority, by order in council, to make applicable to the members of the special force such of this legislation included in the schedule as is found to be appropriate now. Furthermore, as I mentioned previously, we have this committee sitting continuously; and at the present time it is looking into the legislation pertaining to rehabilitation particularly. As the committee draws conclusions and makes recommendations the government, by order in council, under the authority which we are seeking under this resolution, can extend these benefits. I think that is the manner in which the government proceeded during the last war. It permitted a flexible procedure as cases arose and circumstances changed. As soon as any of these orders in council have been made applicable, in a subsequent session they will be incorporated into statutes, in accordance with the procedure that was followed during the last war. I do not know whether or not I have answered my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Wright: The minister has stated, if I understood him aright, that there is now an order in council which protects, with regard to reinstatement in civil employment, the men going into the special force.

Mr. Lapointe: That is correct.

Mr. Wright: There are two questions I should like to ask. The first is this. Does that protection extend to their pension rights in the employment they are now in? Are those pension rights protected, so that they do not lose anything? They might be re-employed but they might lose their pension rights. Does the reinstatement in civil employment include protection of the pension rights? The second question is this. Does this order in council apply to the men who are now being called to enlist in the force for Europe? Is that considered as part of the special force, and will this legislation or any part of it cover the men who are enlisting in the special force for Europe?

Mr. Lapointe: The terms of the order in council extending the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act to those people simply makes applicable to the special force the act as it is now in the statutes. I should not like to make a definite statement, but I am not aware whether it covers pension rights that might have been acquired in previous employment. I shall have to find that out. I am sure that in committee I shall be able to give my hon. friend the answer to that question. But reinstatement in civil employment is being extended to those who are now enlisting in this second Canadian brigade which is being formed.

Mr. Wright: What other provisions are, by order in council, provided for the men now enlisting in the European force?

Mr. Lapointe: At the present time there is that provision for reinstatement in civil employment; the unemployment insurance benefits, which I explained exist for the special force, will be extended to them. The provisions of the Pension Act will be extended to them, to the appropriate degree; but I am not aware of any new order in council. As my hon. friend knows, this new brigade just began to be recruited eight days ago; and we are working on that matter at the present time in this committee to which I have made reference. I am sure that I shall be able to make an announcement shortly with regard to further extension of benefits to these people and to members of the special force.

Mr. Fair: Will legislation be introduced to make the benefits under the Veterans Land Act available to members of the special force that is being recruited now for service in Europe, and also the benefits of the War Veterans Allowance Act?

Mr. Lapointe: I seem always to be giving the same answer. I mentioned before that the Veterans Land Act was one part of the whole veterans legislation which was being looked into at the present time in order to find out in what manner it should be made available to members of the special force. There would be no difficulty for a veteran who has not yet benefited from the Veterans Land Act, but we know there are some who are serving in the special force at the present time and who are beneficiaries under the act, who obtained leave from the department, left their farms, and who are serving now. They possibly will have acquired certain rights by the time they are discharged. In what manner will you permit them to apply these rights to their property that they have now under the Veterans Land Act? Would you permit them to credit certain amounts to their account, or would you give them a further extension on their property? That is something that is being looked into now. I am quite sure I shall be able to give a more satisfactory answer to my hon. friend before very long.

Mr. Ross (Souris): When we were discussing the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act the minister was going to explain whether, as the act is now set up, if one had a loan under that act and had paid it in full, he would be eligible to benefit under the Veterans Land Act. Even that pertains to the soldiers of the other wars, without these complications of the new service.

Mr. Lapointe: If the War Service Grants Act is extended to the members of the special force it would be logical to extend the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act also.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Is it the intention of the government to extend that?

Mr. Lapointe: Well, we are looking into it now. Certainly some parts of it will be extended. Whether it will be extended as the legislation exists in its entirety, or whether changes will be made, is something we cannot say now, but it will be extended.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Even without extending it, it was not just clear as to the soldier of the last great war. If he had a loan under this Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act and repaid it all, would he then be entitled to the benefits under the Veterans Land Act? If we had that clear then we could carry on and see what would happen with the new force.

Mr. Lapointe: I would think, Mr. Chairman, that if he is otherwise qualified for benefits under the Veterans Land Act he could make use of that, having reimbursed the loan under the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act.

Mr. Ross (Souris): At this stage this whole scheme seems to me pretty much narrowed. Nothing is very clearly set forth as to just what benefits these men of the special force will receive under the veterans charter. That is just in the process of study by this committee, if I understand the minister.

Mr. Lapointe: That is right.

Mr. Ross (Souris): This has to do with the new force. As I understand it the terms of reference of this committee are not broad enough to go into any other legislation such as the War Veterans Allowance Act, and things of that nature.

Mr. Mutch: So far as the bill about to be introduced is concerned, what it does in fact is to make into a statute the four orders in council which have been passed pursuant to the legislation of the short session last August, and to extend the power by statute for a further extension by order in council of all or any of the benefits of the veterans charter as they should become applicable to the veterans of the Korean special force. There is no limitation on the extending of the benefits of the veterans charter proposed in the act. What it does do is to provide for the orderly application of the legislation of the veterans charter as the need becomes apparent. For instance, hon. gentlemen will realize that at the moment there is a relatively small pressure for a decision in the matter of rehabilitation legislation, since scarcely any except those who have become injured and perhaps pensionable are now going back into civil life under disability pension. There is a provision made by order in council to extend training to them now. That was done last week. As these various pieces of legislation become applicable to the applicants of today, the power will be taken in the bill, which is to be put before the house, and then referred to the committee, to secure the orderly application of each and any of these benefits as they may be required. We are at the beginning of a war now. Hon. members will recall that, in spite of the work done during world war II, it was almost two years after the cessation of hostilities before we could tailor the old legislation, plus about 80 orders in council, to fit the need of that day, and we cannot be sure at this time that the legislation of the veterans charter, as it exists at the present time, will exactly accomplish the will of the people for those other boys. This is just being left for the advice of the interdepartmental committee and an opportunity will be given for our own committee to give their advice, when this bill is introduced to them, to tailor it to do the job. Provisions are in the bill to provide for that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Following that up—perhaps the minister may have said this, but I did not get it clearly—I presume it will be the intention to set up a veterans affairs committee at the next session to continue its study.

Mr. Mutch: We have not finished with this one yet.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I do not think it is nearly broad enough. I do not think the terms of reference of this committee are broad enough, and the membership of the committee is not as large as those of other sessions. The terms of reference are very much narrower than those of other veterans committees. Because of that there is a fear as to what we may expect it to bring forth in the interest of these boys. It is very important that the thing should be broadened and a wider study given to all of these benefits. To me it is a narrow set-up right now.

Mr. Green: May I point out to the committee that in the advertisements requesting enlistment in the Canadian special force last summer it was very clearly set out that all these men who enlisted would get the full benefits of the veterans charter. I do not believe that that can be contradicted. These men have gone into the army believing that they would get all the benefits of the veterans charter. I do not know whether similar terms were used in the advertisements for the European brigade or not. I presume that the intention was the same.

It is important that we start out by keeping faith right up to the hilt with these men who enlist in either of these forces. I suggest the Department of Veterans Affairs should be very careful to see that that undertaking is carried out without any delay and without any question. I think the statements of the minister and his assistant may be summed up as indicating that some benefits will be given but there still must be consideration given to the various amendments that are needed in the legislation; and that nothing in a statutory form can be passed now; we must wait; that it took several years during the last war, and so on and so forth. The result of this policy is pretty clearly indicated, I am afraid, in a dispatch contained in the press just eleven days ago. I hold in my hand a dispatch from the Vancouver Sun of May 3. It is headed: "No benefits; way to civvy street unpaved for war veterans", and it continues:

Korean brigade soldiers found this week the road back to civvy street hasn't yet been paved.

There are as yet no re-establishment credits, educational grants, Veterans Land Act, debarkation leave or clothing allowances for men discharged from the special force.

Only unemployment insurance benefits are available and these only to men with over nine months service—

Mr. Lapointe: That is not right.

Mr. Green: That may be wrong. What is the proper time?

Mr. Lapointe: Three months' service.

Mr. Green: I continue:

Only unemployment insurance benefits are available and these only to men with over nine months service—which few men of the brigade can yet claim.

A few medical discharge cases now being "processed out" at Jericho army base get their pay, but nothing more.

"If a man declares himself destitute he may get a $30 voucher to obtain clothing, but this is supposed to be deducted from the army pay owing to him," an army spokesman explained today.

Discharge of men of the special force was being handled in "exactly the same way as we deal with regular active force discharges."

In other words, in the same way that men who had enlisted three or four years ago with the Canadian active army are dealt with. It continues:

Department of Veterans Affairs officials said Ottawa is now considering what reestablishment credits will be made available to veterans of the new war.

"So far we have no directive for aiding these men to re-establish themselves in civilian life," said a spokesman. "Until parliament decides what benefits are to be made available there's no point in the Korean ex-servicemen even applying to us."

We all know that hundreds of men have been discharged from that special service force. Perhaps the figure runs into thousands. I do urge upon the minister that steps be taken to see that the undertaking given to these men is lived up to fully—in other words that they get the same gratuities, the same educational rights, the same rights under the Veterans Land Act and under the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act, and the other legislation included in the veterans charter.

I realize it may be difficult to provide for that by statute at the present time. I can quite understand the difficulty of making statutory provisions. But let it be done by order in council—although I do not have much use for that kind of legislation.

Mr. Mutch: The bill seeks that power.

Mr. Green: I am not satisfied, from what has been said this evening, that the intention is to give these men the same benefits that the men in the second world war received. I do not believe the Department of Veterans Affairs has fully realized what a definite undertaking was given in asking these men to enlist.

Time means a lot; some of these men now have been eight or nine months in the special force, and require help when they are discharged. I do hope it will be possible to see that they will get all these benefits upon discharge, without having to wait around for a matter of months or longer than that.

Unemployment insurance is quite different from a gratuity. The gratuity is payable whether they are working or not, while unemployment insurance covers them only if they are out of work. That was not meant to be one of the main benefits under the veterans charter; it was only a supplementary benefit.

All these other veterans charter benefits should be extended to these men without further delay.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Green: Could I have an answer from the minister as to whether it is the intention that these men will get now the benefits they would have received under the veterans charter after the last war?

Mr. Lapointe: I do not think I can at this time say definitely to what degree any benefits will be extended to these men. That is why we are proceeding in this way—because we have found through experience of the last war that it was the most practical way to proceed, and the one from which the veterans benefited most.

I think that is the course of wisdom on our part. The hon. member referred to commitments made when the special force was recruited. I think if he will look at the terms of the advertising, the wording of that advertising, he will find that it refers to veterans benefits and to reinstatement in civil employment.

Mr. Green: How does it read?

Mr. Lapointe: "And other appropriate benefits under the veterans charter, as extended by parliament". I believe that is what it says. That is what we are going to do, and what we are in the process of doing at the present time. As I have told other hon. members, I hope within a short time to make a further announcement respecting the extension of certain of the benefits to the members of the special force, as we find them applicable and appropriate for their rehabilitation to civilian life.

Mr. Green: Are the benefits to apply also to the men who have not been able to go abroad with the special force?

Mr. Lapointe: This bill provides for members of the special force, and certain other groups.

Mr. Green: Will it apply, even if they have not served overseas?

Mr. Lapointe: I am not in a position to say that. In fact, I do not personally know what the terms of enlistment of these men are, because that is the responsibility of the Department of National Defence.

I am asking for the extension of benefits to members of the special force. But I did say, if the hon. member will recall, that I was sure it was the hope of every member of the house that when any of these members of the force shall have served or have been in action, or have served overseas under conditions comparable to those under which veterans of world war II served, they will be given the same benefits as would have applied to veterans of the second world war.

Mr. Green: Benefits were also given to the men who served only in Canada. Is that to be true in respect of these men?

Mr. Mutch: The insurance principle is already incorporated in the pensions.

Mr. Green: I am asking if that is to be true of the men who enlisted in the special force?

Mr. Lapointe: I did say at the beginning of my statement that at the end of the last war there was a certain relationship between the benefits to veterans who had served overseas and those who had served in Canada only. At the present time, in the present state of the world, and the conditions under which these men are enlisting, it is impossible —perhaps I should not say "impossible", but it is undesirable to determine right now what will be the benefits to be given to men whose conditions of service we do not know as yet.

We know in respect of some that they are fighting in Korea, and it is the intention to extend to them all the benefits given to world war II veterans. But we do not know what will be the conditions with reference to other members of the forces because, as I did mention, the bulk of the armed forces at the present time are under regular engagement.

Mr. Gillis: I do not wish to open up a discussion. I am a member of the veterans affairs committee. The executive heads of the Legion will be meeting with that committee on Thursday of this week. It was my hope that all the bills with respect to veterans might be turned over to the committee as quickly as possible so that the executive heads of the Legion may be able to see them and have a look at them. In this way they would be in a position to express their opinion, as the direct representatives of the men affected. This might be done within a week or so.

The resolution tells us nothing, any more than that it is the intention of the minister to bring in a resolution designed to relate to the special force, and other forces, which may include the European brigade. The best way of getting information from the Legion is to allow this resolution to pass so that we can get the bill. I should like to facilitate the passage of this resolution so that we can get down to business.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 287, to make certain rights, privileges and benefits applicable to persons serving in that part of the armed forces of Canada designated as the special force and to certain other members of the Canadian forces.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CHILDREN OF PENSIONED WIDOWS, BURIAL GRANTS, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Pension Act to make more adequate provision for children whose mothers are pensioned as widows; to increase the payment in respect of burial grants; to advance the marriage date line for world war I pensioners and to eliminate the said date line in certain cases; to provide also for the removal of the means test where the children of a pensioner are continuing their education beyond the statutory age limit; and to provide further for the salaries of the pension commissioners and for certain other administrative purposes with a view to enlarging the scope of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, in introducing this resolution I shall confine my remarks to the general features of the legislation which is to follow, as I believe a more detailed examination could more profitably be made by members of the committee. As hon. members are aware, representations are made from time to time to the department and the government by the organized veteran bodies asking that changes be made in the Pension Act to make it more equitable and workable in view of changed circumstances. The officers of the department and the pension commission with their long experience in handling veterans legislation have recommended that certain changes be made.

We have come to the conclusion that the children of pensioned widows should be provided for more adequately and it is proposed to increase the allowances paid to such children. Similarly, we intend to extend the educational facilities available to children of men who have died or been disabled in the service of their country. At the present time the pension paid to a child stops at the age of sixteen years in the case of a boy and seventeen years in the case of a girl. There are provisions at the present time to permit this award to be continued to the age of 21 years provided the child is making satisfactory educational progress and that those responsible for his maintenance are without adequate resources. In order to encourage the pursuit of higher education the government proposes to remove what might be referred to as the means test with regard to adequate resources and the pension will be paid to the age of 21 years to all children of pensioned widows and disability pensioners as well as to orphans. The only requirement is that they must be satisfactorily pursuing an approved course of education.

The other amendments will be to extend the dateline for the marriage of world war I veterans to May 1, 1950, and to provide for the cost of the last illness and burial, increasing the amount already payable under the act, and providing also for the erection of standard headstones where needed.

Mr. Wright: I should like to say a few words despite the fact the hon. member for Cape Breton South seems to be so anxious to get this to the committee. Unfortunately this year a number of hon. members are not on the special committee because its numbers have been reduced from other years.

Mr. Mutch: Would the hon. member permit the suggestion that there will be full opportunity for debate on the second reading? If we can get the resolution passed and the bill introduced, it could be distributed.

Mr. Wright: I suggest that the changes proposed in the Pension Act introduce certain new principles. The minister has stated that there will be an extension of certain rights already provided by the act and I commend the department and the minister for that. I offer special commendation for the extension of the educational facilities to children of veterans. When I was a member of the committee I urged that greater provision in the way of education be made for the children of veterans. Then it is also proposed to change the act to provide that special grants with respect to unemployable veterans—

Mr. Lapointe: I wonder if the hon. member will allow me to interrupt? The supplements to which he refers are not paid under the authority of the Pension Act. They are being paid under the authority of the Department of Veterans Affairs Act. I believe it is section 6 (g) of the act which authorizes the payment of this supplement. It is being done through the supplementary estimate which is now before the committee, and the administration of the Pension Act has nothing to do with that.

Mr. Wright: I realize that. I realize it is one of the methods being used to avoid introducing a new principle into the Pension Act. Nevertheless it does introduce a new principle with reference to veterans legislation. I have a copy of the May issue of The Legionary here and I should like to refer to what is stated by Mr. T. D. Anderson, secretary of the Canadian Legion.

Mr. Lapointe: What number is that?

Mr. Wright: May, No. 12. He is dealing with the statement by the minister when he was referring the matter to the veterans affairs committee. Mr. Anderson says:

> With reference to this statement by the minister we would point out that, regardless of whether the special allowance is paid under authority of the Pension Act or the Department of Veterans Affairs Act, it would appear that the pensioner in order to become eligible for the special allowance will be required to establish need. If such is in fact the case, then the pensioners will certainly look upon this requirement as a means test. Up to this time Canadian war disability pensions have always been based on the degree of disability suffered without regard to other income or financial need. The Canadian Legion has strongly opposed the introduction of a means test in any form.

It is not my opinion that I am giving. It is the opinion of the Legion, and I think they should be in a position to judge this matter.

Mr. Lapointe: At the time the article was written the item mentioned had not been placed before members of the committee. I think that anyone who has followed the statements made and the explanations given in the veterans affairs committee after the introduction of this item will realize that speculation did not turn out to be absolutely correct.

Pension Act

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, is it in order to permit a discussion of legislation that is before the veterans affairs committee at the present time? If you do, then there are many other members of the committee who will have something to say about it. I am on the committee. We have been discussing this matter for two meetings. I can tell the hon. member for Melfort that whoever wrote that article and has summed it up as introducing a means test is completely in error.

Mr. Green: Not so far.

Mr. Gillis: He is completely in error.

Mr. Wright: It is the general secretary of the Canadian Legion.

Mr. Gillis: I do not care who wrote it. I have been present at two meetings of the committee where this matter has been studied in detail, and I have been dealing with pension matters for a longer time than the general secretary of the Canadian Legion. I do not want to get into any discussion because in the committee we have postponed any decision, and the amendment we are trying to make to this particular legislation, to give the Legion a chance to come and give us the benefit of their opinion. I do not want to gum it up at this time by a two minute discussion. If hon. members are anxious to get this legislation through, if they agree with all the good features in it, then let us pass these bills so that they can be sent to the committee, put in final shape, brought back into the house and passed so that we may start to pay the benefits.

The Deputy Chairman: The point of order raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South is very well taken. I did not understand that what the hon. member for Melfort was referring to was legislation which is now being discussed by a committee and which has not been reported to the house. The hon. member should not refer to it.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I should like to ask the minister what is proposed in the matter of further salaries for the commissioners. Is there any suggestion to appoint new commissioners, or is it an increase in salary for those who are there?

Mr. Lapointe: I do not think I am permitted to give the details of the bill at this stage. Actually what is proposed, and what is referred to in the resolution, is to put into the statute the actual salaries paid to the commissioners. These salaries were increased last year or two years ago, but it was done through an estimate and not by way of amendment to the Pension Act. As we are now opening up the act we want to put into it the actual salaries they are being paid.

Mr. Ross (Souris): To the present commissioners?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 288, to amend the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will take up first the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 188, an act to amend the Yukon Act. They have added two words to the bill as passed by this house. We had said "by permission of the commissioner" and the Senate has amended it to read "by permission of the commissioner in council". We will ask concurrence in this amendment. The government is satisfied with it. Then we will take up second reading of Bill No. 285, an act to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932. I understand it will be referred to the banking and commerce committee. Then we will take up the two resolutions in the name of the Prime Minister concerning Laurier house and Kingsmere park; the resolution in the name of the Minister of Labour concerning the Government Employees Compensation Act. Then we will revert to these three veterans measures, Bills No. 286, 287 and 288. These are the bills based on these three resolutions. If time is left we will start the study in committee of Bill No. 79, an act respecting Indians.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON MAY 14

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wish to draw your attention to a statement, as reported in Hansard, made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) last night. I had referred to a speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs made on May 2 in Renfrew, as to which the press report carried the statement that he had referred to "hoop-la diplomacy" and vaudeville performances; and I had indicated my belief that these words did not properly describe the type of diplomacy that was being discussed. Then the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as reported at page 3007 of Hansard, said this:

If the leader of the opposition had read my speech and not a newspaper account of the speech into the records of Hansard he might have come to a different conclusion concerning it.

In view of that statement, I sent to his office this morning for a text of the speech and was informed that there was no text. The newspaper report was therefore the only record available. But in reading the text of Hansard I also noticed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs had said that he made a similar speech in Toronto on April 10; and I obtained the text of that speech. In his remarks last night—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt if the debate which was closed last night should be revived at this time. If the leader of the opposition wants to make a brief statement, I think he should be allowed to do so; but I would not want him to extend his remarks so that the result would be another debate on this subject that has been closed.

Mr. Drew: I have no intention of reopening the debate, Mr. Speaker. I am simply correcting the record. The Secretary of State for External Affairs last night, in reference to my statement that the term "hoop-la diplomacy" had been used, said:

I quoted from a paragraph by the columnist, Mr. Walter Lippmann, written some weeks before these events.

He then quoted that columnist. On reading the text of the similar speech to which he referred as having been substantially the same as the one in Renfrew, I find that while later in the speech he quoted from Mr. Lippmann, these are his own words:

In the circumstances of the present, it will, I think, have a better chance of reaching these goals if we abandon what has been called "hoop-la diplomacy," at Lake Success, at Ottawa, or, I hasten to add, at Tokyo.

He then went on to use further words, and in the latter part of the paragraph he said:

That is only one reason why I hope that in this country we will resolutely refuse to countenance the methods or the atmosphere of the circus or the vaudeville theatre in our conduct of popular and democratic government. Dignity is an important element of democracy.

I have read these quotations, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of privilege in order to correct the record; and may I suggest that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would be well advised to be more accurate in the comments in his speeches.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be permitted to add a word to what the hon. gentleman has said, inasmuch as he has mentioned my name and has made certain suggestions about the accuracy of what I said last night. The hon. gentleman is quoting this afternoon from a speech which I made in Toronto, not one which I made in Renfrew. Last night, Mr. Speaker, I believe that I said that what I had said in Renfrew was substantially the same as what I said in Toronto. But that does not give the hon. gentleman the right to quote textually from the speech I made in Toronto. If he had been at Renfrew, as I was, and if he had had the notes of my Renfrew speech, as I have, I am sure he would have come to the conclusion that what I said last night was strictly accurate.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

PRESS REPORTS OF ARRIVAL AT TRENTON OF TRAINING PLANES FROM THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): May I address a question to the Minister of National Defence? Has the minister's attention been drawn to a statement appearing in the press that large numbers of training planes from the United States of America are arriving at Trenton in accordance with a new loan agreement as yet unannounced? If so, will the minister make a statement as to the nature of that plan, if any?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I have not seen the press report, but in connection with the very largely expanded air training plan we shall be borrowing from the United States a number of Harvard aircraft to supplement those which we have either in active service or in store, which are being refitted. These later will be replaced by Harvards out of our own production, which will be well advanced toward the end of this year.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? Is the North American F-6 trainer a Harvard?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, it is the Harvard with the latest modifications.

FREIGHT RATES

GENERAL INQUIRY BEFORE TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS—APPLICATION FOR FURTHER INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? Have hearings by the board of transport commissioners in the general freight rates inquiry, which were supposed to open tomorrow, been postponed until the fall? If so, what is the reason for that delay?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of this question, but I received it only before coming into the house. I saw in the press report this morning that the board of transport commissioners had adjourned until September 10 its general investigation into freight rates. I do not know what the reasons are, other than those which I saw reported. I presume that the railways and the other parties concerned were not prepared to submit evidence until such time as the legislation concerning equalization had been studied by the house.

Mr. Green: Can the minister make further inquiries into that question and let us know, perhaps tomorrow? At the same time I would also like to know whether there is to be a similar postponement of the application of the railways for a further increase in rates.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall be glad to make inquiries.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO FLOOR PRICE FOR SALT CODFISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Is it proposed to establish a floor price for salt codfish?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): This matter will be considered by my colleagues some time this week, and toward the end of the week I hope to make an announcement.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

NATIONAL FILM BOARD EQUIPMENT IN CORRIDOR ON FIFTH FLOOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): In the absence of the Minister of Resources and Development I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Why is the national film board cluttering up one end of the corridor on the fifth floor with their equipment? Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs having his picture taken, or what is the idea?

Mr. Cruickshank: They are taking mine.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have not been up to the fifth floor to see what picture they are taking, or the equipment, with which I have little to do.

Mr. Fraser: It is all outside the minister's office.

CRIMINAL CODE

CHEMICAL TESTS IN DRUNKEN DRIVING CHARGES —QUESTION AS TO AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I asked him a question some weeks ago about this matter and he said that it was then receiving consideration. Is it his intention at the present session to introduce any amendments either to the Canada Evidence Act or to the Criminal Code with respect to drunken driving and the use of scientific tests for the determination of drunkenness?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The amendments to the Criminal Code are under consideration by the cabinet, and it is expected that the result of their deliberations will shortly be laid before the house in the form of amendments, possibly covering the subject matter to which my hon. friend refers.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PRINTING BUREAU—REQUEST OF ONTARIO PRINTING TRADES UNIONS FOR RIGHT OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State? Has his attention been called to the request of the Ontario federation of printing trades unions that the employees of the federal printing bureau be accorded the right of collective bargaining? Will consideration be given to this request?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I shall be glad to take the hon. member's question as notice and give him a reply as soon as possible.

YUKON ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE THE NUMBER OF MEMBERS OF THE TERRITORIAL COUNCIL—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Resources and Development) moved the second reading of and concurrence in the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 188, to amend the Yukon Act.

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PROFITS FROM PARTICIPATING POLICIES AND VOTING BY PROXY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 285, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

LAURIER HOUSE

PROVISION FOR ADMINISTRATION OF THE MACKENZIE KING TRUST ACCOUNT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the administration of Laurier house, in the city of Ottawa, and of an account to be set up in the consolidated revenue fund to be known as the Mackenzie King trust account to which shall be credited the sum of $225,000 given by the will of the late the Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King, P.C., O.M., to the government of Canada, to be expended for the purposes of such administration.

Laurier House

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members, will recall the circumstances which are responsible for the legislation the government is proposing in this resolution, and in the accompanying resolution concerning the Kingsmere property which I propose to bring forward as soon as this one has been disposed of. I am sure, however, that all hon. members would wish to have the sequence of events set out in the permanent records of parliament. It is as follows:

On August 7 last I was given a copy of the last will and testament of my predecessor the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. On August 8, when Mr. King's will was made public, I gave a statement to the press which I should like to read. It is as follows:

I was advised yesterday by his executors of the disposition which Mr. Mackenzie King had made in his will of those properties which with forethought and generosity he determined many years before his death should become a trust for the people of Canada.

I at once recommended to my colleagues in the government that we should formally express our grateful acknowledgment of these bequests, and a minute of council has duly recorded our appreciation and our readiness to accept in the name of the Canadian people the necessary transfers and trust deeds. I am confident that all future governments will be as pleased as we are to see that Mr. King's wishes respecting the use of these public trusts are completely fulfilled.

The statement went on:

Their creation is a further evidence of Mr. King's high ideals of service to his country. The people of Canada will always be grateful for the endowment of the national capital by the perpetuation of the historic treasure which Laurier house has already come to be, by the generous provision towards the cost of its care and maintenance, and by the magnificent addition of the Kingsmere properties to the national domain.

The dedication by Mr. King of the residue of his estate for post-graduate scholarships will also commend itself to all who knew him, as a most fitting way to commemorate his deep interest in education, and the scholarly tradition which was so dear to him. Mr. King's will is a most notable example of the careful stewardship, the sense of history and the love of country, which distinguished his life and now enriches our Canadian heritage.

I should like also to read the text of the minute of council referred to in the statement. It is as follows:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report dated August 7, 1950, from the Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, the Prime Minister, submitting that he has been advised by the executors that the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, in his last will and testament, bequeathed the property in the city of Ottawa known as Laurier house, together with a capital sum to assist in its upkeep, and his properties at Kingsmere, to become public trusts for the benefit of the people of Canada.

The Prime Minister recommends that the executors be advised of the grateful acknowledgment of these bequests by the government on behalf of the people of Canada, and that the appropriate authorities be duly authorized to accept the necessary transfers and trust deeds from the executors.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

Some weeks later the executors initiated discussions with the government to arrange for the formal transfer of property, and we began at the same time to give consideration to the most appropriate means of administering the bequest of Laurier house and the property at Kingsmere. In view of the quite different purposes of the two bequests, the government felt it would be preferable to introduce separate measures covering each. The resolution under consideration relates to the administration of Laurier house.

It might be helpful in consideration of the resolution and of the bill founded upon it if I were to read the portions of Mr. King's will relating to Laurier house. They read as follows:

13. For many years it has been my intention to bequeath Laurier house to the government and people of Canada, in the belief that as the years pass, the citizens of Canada will take an increasing interest and pride in the preservation of a house occupied through many years by two of Canada's prime ministers and reminiscent of an environment that was a part of their daily lives.

14. It has been my hope that such a bequest might serve also to remind my fellow Canadians of the close association I enjoyed with Sir Wilfrid and Lady Laurier, and what I owed to their personal friendship; also to emphasize the unity of heart and mind among the Canadian people which Sir Wilfrid and I throughout our years of office, sought to preserve in the administration of Canada's national affairs.

15. The maintenance of the residence as a place of historic interest and contemporary record of days that are gone would also serve the interests of the Canadian people in other ways. The residence might appropriately, I think, be given an immediate association with the Public Archives of Canada. Responsibility for its continued preservation, supervision and use might be placed upon the dominion archivist. Accommodation for scholars engaged on work of research in Ottawa is at present most inadequate both at the archives and at the library of parliament. In the years of my occupancy of Laurier house, I have done most of my work in the library and adjoining rooms on the top floor. I should particularly welcome the continued use of this portion of the house for purposes of study and research. A direct association with the archives would not only serve to emphasize the historic significance of the residence, but would help to ensure the interior being maintained such as it is, and would lead naturally to a more appropriate display of important documents and other objects of special interest. I should hope that the dining room and its furnishings, paintings, etc., would be retained much as they are.

16. I therefore give, devise and bequeath to the government of Canada in trust for the people of Canada the house situated at 335 Laurier avenue east in the city of Ottawa, and all the contents of the said house except such papers, books, furnishings and other things for the disposal of which I have made provision otherwise in this my will.

17. I also give, devise and bequeath to the government of Canada in trust for the people of Canada the sum of two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars ($225,000), the interest thereon to be used to assist in the maintenance and care of the said house. The said sum of two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars ($225,000) represents moneys which the Hon. Peter C. Larkin and other friends contributed, after the reconstruction and refurnishing of the residence was completed, to assist me in its upkeep throughout my life, and in meeting, to the end of my life, other personal and public needs, especially such needs as would arise in years of retirement.

I think it will be apparent that, as the resolution itself puts it, it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the administration of Laurier house and of the trust fund bequeathed by Mr. King to assist in the maintenance and care of Laurier house.

I feel it would be preferable for me to reserve any further observations until the house has disposed of the resolution and there is available for the consideration of hon. members the bill setting out the provisions which we think would be appropriate to carry out the intentions of the will. I should then be quite happy to try to explain any of the provisions which might not be felt to be self-evident.

I should like to conclude by expressing the conviction that hon. members in all parts of the house will wish to associate themselves with the government in making appropriate provisions for the administration of this permanent memorial of two of our country's former prime ministers.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one or two comments. First of all, may I say that I think all hon. members feel it is appropriate to take this action at the present time. I am sure there will be approval of the provision made by the Minister of Public Works, when the bill is passed, to see to it that this house, which has historic interest for the people of Canada, will be properly maintained and that any necessary improvements in the house and the area it occupies will be made. I pass Laurier house every day, and two or three weeks ago I was pleased to see a group of men working to improve the grounds. The new hedge, the tulips, the flowers and so on will make the house and grounds much more attractive. But the Minister of Public Works should see that the exterior of the house is gone over, because as it is now it does not look like a very appropriate memorial. A good deal of repair and renovation is needed on the outside.

I merely intended to say that we wish to associate ourselves with the remarks of the Prime Minister in regard to this matter, and to express the hope that Laurier house will be used as a place of study and research by those who are interested in a most important period in Canada's history which coincided with the prime ministership, not only of Mr. Mackenzie King but of his great predecessor, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I am sure that hon. members are most happy to see progress made with this measure and steps being taken to create this memorial of the late prime minister.

Mr. Fulton: Is it believed that the $225,000 to be credited to the trust fund will produce sufficient revenue to maintain the foundation within the limits in which it is now visualized, or is it expected that the expenses will be such in future years as to require aid from the general funds of the country?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, I do not think it would be prudent to say that it is expected that the revenue from the $225,000 credited to the consolidated revenue fund will cover everything in connection with this foundation. The purpose is to make it available for the use of students, under the care and administration of the dominion archivist. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has a copy of the bill, but it provides that the upkeep and heating of the property shall be the responsibility of the Minister of Public Works, and that the grounds shall be maintained by the federal district commission. There will be no separate account kept of the portion of the time of the employees of the federal district commission which is devoted to that particular work. There is no doubt that the testator felt that the creation of this fund of $225,000 in the consolidated revenue fund would be a substantial help toward the achievement of his purpose, which was to have Laurier house available for Canadian students as a place where they might engage in historical research work.

Mr. Fraser: Will there be persons in the building who can advise students who go there for research work where they will find what they require?

Mr. St. Laurent: It is intended that the house shall be in the keeping of the dominion archivist, who would naturally provide, as he does in other places where dominion archives are kept, assistants who can make the treasures there available of real use to those who have a serious interest in them.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 289, respecting Laurier house.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Kingsmere Park

KINGSMERE PARK

ADMINISTRATION OF BEQUEST TO GOVERNMENT OF CANADA UNDER THE WILL OF THE LATE MR. MACKENZIE KING

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the administration of Kingsmere park by the federal district commission and the management and control of the buildings in the park and the yards, orchards and appurtenances thereto by the Minister of Public Works in accordance with the will of the late the Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King, P.C., O.M., with authority in the governor in council to set aside any part of the park as a country home for the holder of the office of prime minister, such park to be deemed included in the properties described in the schedule to the Prime Minister's Residence Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving this resolution I feel there is little I can add to what I have said already on the previous resolution respecting Laurier house, but I think it would be helpful in this case, as in the other, to place on record the relevant portions of Mr. Mackenzie King's will concerning Kingsmere park. They are as follows:

24. The cherished objective of being able to present my Kingsmere properties as a thank offering for what has come to me in the way of opportunities of public service, I believe I have been able to realize, and I hereby bequeath to the government of Canada as a public park in trust for the citizens of Canada, subject to certain reservations hereinafter referred to, my several properties at Kingsmere, in the province of Quebec, amounting in all to nearly five hundred acres, and the houses and other buildings erected thereon. The precise boundaries are set forth in the several deeds attached hereto.

25. In making this bequest, I express the wish that the lands at Kingsmere may be maintained as nearly as possible in their present state; that they will be developed as parkland, and that they will form a wild life sanctuary and will continue to have the character of a natural forest reserve.

26. Believing that my successors in the office of prime minister may find, as I have found, a renewal of strength in this quiet place, as well as exceptional opportunities for conference on national and international affairs, I hope that the government of Canada will consider the possibility of setting aside a part of the Kingsmere property as a country home for the holder of the office of Prime Minister of Canada.

27. Inasmuch as relatives and friends of mine have spent their summers, or part of them, at Kingsmere as my guests or tenants, I hope they may continue to enjoy the summer homes to which they have become accustomed; and that other appropriate use may be made of them. I would therefore ask that the government should authorize my trustees to provide that, for a period of three years after my death, the cottages and such of their contents as are mine and are not otherwise disposed of in accordance with this my will shall be available, rent free, for use by my sister and the members of her family, by the members of my late brother's family, and by such other persons as may be designated by my trustees.

28. My trustees are hereby authorized to dispose of all my possessions in the cottages and other buildings or on the property as they believe will be most in accord with my own wishes; and to meet such expenses as may be necessarily incurred for the maintenance of these cottages for a period of three years.

I am sure hon. members will agree that the federal district commission, which has the responsibility of the development of the national capital and of the Gatineau park, is the appropriate body to be entrusted with the administration of the properties which will constitute Kingsmere park and ultimately form an integral part of a parkway system, the whole of which will help to preserve the memory of Mr. Mackenzie King and of his interest in the creation of this parkway system around the national capital.

I do not feel there is anything I need add in moving the resolution, as it will obviously be more convenient for hon. members to discuss what is proposed when they have the text of the bill before them.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I said something about Laurier house, and I am sure it is with much pleasure that we see that property set aside for the purposes indicated. Nevertheless I think this is a more important bequest to the country in many respects than Laurier house. It has not the same historic significance, but it is a valuable addition to the national capital project. I think those of us who are familiar with the beauty of the area on the Quebec side of the Ottawa river thus bequeathed to this country will appreciate to the fullest extent what this will mean in the days to come to the people of Ottawa and the people of Canada. The people of Canada should be fully informed of the value of this bequest, one of our beauty spots, to the nation. I suppose that one day, which probably none of us here will see, Canada will possess the most beautifully situated and developed capital in the whole world. There is no lovelier site, and this bequest is certainly an important addition to the federal district. I hope that the people of Canada will appreciate what it means.

May I also say that the provision in the will requesting the setting aside of a piece of this property for a country home for present and future prime ministers is a suggestion that is well worth while. Before the resolution passes through the committee stage, may I say again that this is probably one of the most important bequests that has been made to our country. I am quite sure that in the days to come many thousands of Canadians, indeed through the years many millions, will learn to love the beautiful area which includes the Kingsmere property in the delightful Gatineau district.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 290, respecting Kingsmere park.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES COMPENSATION ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ADVANCES TO COMPENSATION BOARDS, ADMINISTRATION CHANGES, ETC.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947, to provide authority to make accountable advances to provincial workmen's compensation boards on account of expenses incurred by such boards in the investigation and adjudication of claims undertaken by arrangement with the federal government; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution announces the intention to make a few amendments to the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947. That act made provision for the payment of compensation to employees of the crown in right of Canada where the employee is caused personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, or is disabled by reason of an industrial disease due to the nature of his employment. In case of death of the employee resulting from such an accident or industrial disease, his dependents are entitled to compensation under the act. The provisions of the act also apply to employees of corporations, commissions, boards or agencies established to perform a function or duty on behalf of the government of Canada, who are brought within the scope of the act by order of the governor in council.

The general principle of the act is that the compensation benefits payable thereunder shall be the same as is provided in the case of employees employed in private industry, or dependents of a deceased employee under the law of the province in which the accident occurs or the industrial disease is contracted. The application of the present act to employees in the Northwest Territories required the enactment of special provisions therein, in view no doubt of the lack at that time of adequate local workmen's compensation legislation in the general area.

The present act provides in effect that compensation shall be payable to employees of the crown ordinarily resident in the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories, and to dependents of deceased employees who were so resident, in accordance with the compensation legislation in force in the Yukon Territory. This has had the effect of providing uniform treatment and benefits for employees of the crown resident in these unorganized areas. However, it has been strongly represented by departments of government who have resident employees in the Northwest Territories that these provisions of the act do not provide adequate benefits for employees in the area under present-day conditions, and provide less favourable treatment for employees in both the Northwest Territories and the Yukon than is provided under the act for employees of the crown elsewhere in Canada.

The provinces are able to provide and administer more comprehensive compensation benefits under their workmen's compensation legislation on a self-sustaining basis than it has been found feasible to provide in the Yukon and Northwest Territories under the workmen's compensation legislation in force in these areas. Consequently the discrepancy between the benefits payable under the act to employees of the crown ordinarily resident in the territories and the benefits payable to employees of the crown under the act elsewhere in Canada is serious and substantial.

Following a review of the situation, in the light of the representations which have been made the government has considered it advisable to introduce amendments to the act which will bring the provisions for compensation benefits for employees resident in the Yukon and Northwest Territories in line with benefits payable under the act to employees of the crown resident elsewhere in Canada. The major amendments here proposed give effect to the foregoing by providing that hereafter employees of the crown ordinarily resident in the Northwest Territories or the Yukon Territory, and dependents of deceased employees who were so resident, shall be entitled to compensation under the act in accordance with the provisions of the laws of the province of Alberta applicable to employees in private industry.

The provisions of the Alberta legislation have been designated as applicable for the purposes of the act because of the proximity of this province to the territories, and the fact that to an increasing extent the greater part of the movement of personnel and the normal lines of travel and communication in and out of the greater part of these territories are by way of Alberta. Moreover, in the administration of the act for the benefit of employees in the territories it is felt that claims arising in the territories can be dealt with and adjudicated with a minimum of delay by the application of the Alberta compensation provisions. The provisions for compensation under the Alberta legislation are considered to be appropriate for application to employees in the territories. The provisions will continue to ensure uniformity of treatment for employees resident in either the Yukon or Northwest Territories.

It may be recalled that up until 1950 the claims of employees of the crown employed in Prince Edward Island were dealt with under the provisions of the neighbouring province of New Brunswick, because of the absence, prior to that time, of comprehensive provincial workmen's compensation legislation in Prince Edward Island. This is a similar administrative provision which is intended to be adopted in this case.

The other proposed amendments to the act are of a minor and technical nature.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the minister for this progressive legislation. We have known workers who were hard pressed while living under compensation; and when workers and their dependents are protected by the Department of Labour, I think we should say, thank you.

Mr. J. A. Simmons (Yukon-Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in support of this resolution, which precedes legislation amending the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947.

First may I commend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) for bringing in this legislation, which no doubt will correct an iniquitous situation affecting government employees in the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory. At the present time if an employee of the federal government meets with an accident while in the performance of his duty in any province, he is generally entitled to such compensations as would be paid under the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act of the province in which the accident occurred, or the province in which he normally resides. However, where an employee ordinarily resident in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory meets with an accident, he receives such compensation as is provided for by the workmen's compensation ordinance of the Yukon Territory.

Whatever the reason or excuse, there is no doubt that the provisions of the workmen's compensation ordinance of the Yukon Territory are much less generous than similar legislation in the provinces adjacent to the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory. Under the terms of the ordinance there is no provision for the payment of any pension whatever to the dependents of a workman who is fatally injured, or to a workman who may be permanently injured; and that is a sad state of affairs. The ordinance does provide that in the event of the death of a workman resulting from injury, his dependents shall be entitled to receive the sum of $5,000, with $750 to each dependent child of the deceased under the age of sixteen, the total not to exceed the sum of $8,600. When a workman receives an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment as a result of which he is totally and permanently disabled, he shall be entitled to receive as compensation the sum of $6,000. Certain stated lesser amounts are payable in the case of other injuries. For instance, the loss of a hand or foot is valued at $3,000, while an arm or leg is valued at $4,000. There is no workmen's compensation board to administer this ordinance, and to which the injured workman or his dependents may apply for compensation. Every employer is required to enter into and maintain a contract of insurance providing for the payment of compensation to his employees and their dependents, and they must take proceedings for recovery. The ordinance makes no provision for the medical or surgical care of the injured workman, nor does it apply where less than five workmen are employed in the same general employment.

It is grossly unfair that federal employees and others whose duties take them to the more northern parts of Canada, where by the very nature of things, owing to the remoteness and lack of transportation facilities, the hazards of employment are greater than in the more settled parts of our country, should be further penalized by having to come under the provisions of such deplorable legislation as the Yukon workmen's compensation ordinance if they are so unfortunate as to meet with an accident. Let us take an actual case.

Dr. Michael Feniak was resident geologist at Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories for the geological survey of Canada, a man of high professional qualifications, active in community life, and altogether an admirable Canadian of whom we might all be proud. In July, 1949, he was drowned while employed on hazardous governmental work. He was a young man, with a wife and two small children, one of whom was born only a few days prior to his fatal accident. He had not been long enough in the government service to build up much credit under the superannuation act. All his widow and children were entitled to was $5,000 for the widow and $750 for each of the children, or a total of $6,500, under the terms of the workmen's compensation ordinance of the Yukon Territory. This was the pittance this family received as compensation for the loss of a husband and father. However, I am pleased to say that the federal government gave a special gratuity of $2,000 on compassionate grounds in 1950, authorized by this parliament. This very fact is an admission that the present legislation covering compensation for government employees in northern Canada is inadequate, and I welcome this amending legislation as a means of alleviating this deplorable condition.

During the course of my remarks I have mentioned some of the inadequacies of the present legislation covering workmen's compensation in the Yukon Territory. I am told it is not much better in the Northwest Territories, and I would bring the situation to the attention of the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), who is responsible for the administration of the northern territories. I am aware of the difficulties presented by the sparse population and the relatively small number of employers and employees as compared with some of the provinces. These same difficulties make it expensive for insurance companies to operate in the territories; therefore the rates for adequate coverage are high. These difficulties should be and can be surmounted.

I am pleased to learn that the Department of Resources and Development has a committee of officers studying the problems of workmen's compensation in the Northwest Territories. The committee has held several meetings already, and has obtained information from provincial compensation authorities and from insurance companies writing compensation business. It has also ascertained the opinions of employers of labour in the provinces and the territories in the mining, lumbering, fishing and transportation industries.

Though the terms of the workmen's compensation ordinance of the Northwest Territories are much more favourable than those of the Yukon Territory, the present system is inadequate. The Northwest Territories ordinance provides for compensation by insurance, with a limit of $15,000 for any person and $105,000 for any accident. These limits in the past have proved insufficient, and I believe the problem under consideration is how to render the system adequate. This resolution provides only for compensation for government employees killed or injured in the course of duty in the Northwest Territories or Yukon; it does not provide compensation for non-government workmen in those territories on a scale comparable to that provided in the other provinces of Canada. With the exception of the province of Prince Edward Island, all the other original provinces have a reasonably comparable system of compensation for workmen killed or injured in the course of their employment.

A general summary shows that on an average, based on a maximum salary of $2,500 per annum, for compensation purposes, workmen during their period of incapacity receive 66⅔ per cent of their average earning up to the maximum allowable of $2,500. Funeral expenses varying from $125 to $175 are allowed. Widows receive from $40 to $50 per month, with from $10 to $15 per month for each child, depending upon the province.

If the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory are to expand, as we all expect they will, the fact that adequate workmen's compensation is not available will definitely tend to discourage capable workmen, who are conscious of their obligations to their wives and families, from seeking employment in those territories; and these are of the type the territories should encourage to settle there.

I believe the solution is to establish in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory a full-scale workmen's compensation scheme in accordance with the provision contained in workmen's compensation acts in the other provinces of Canada, preferably British Columbia. I prefer British Columbia for the reason that the mining industry of the north is largely an extension of that in British Columbia. Therefore legislation providing compensation for employees engaged in placer mining, deep lode mining or smelter or mill occupations should be the same in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory as in British Columbia. I refer particularly to silicosis and lead poisoning as occupational diseases which are provided for under the British Columbia Workmen's Compensation Act. I see no reason why the good people of our north country should not be entitled to receive the same benefits as those received by people residing in the several provinces. The legislation now in force in the territories is nothing more than rank discrimination and surely should not be tolerated any longer.

I am strongly of the opinion that, owing to the similarity of the conditions and types of industry in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, a workmen's compensation scheme should apply with equal benefits in both areas.

The north, which is the last reservoir of mineral resources in North America—it has hardly been scratched, or even thoroughly prospected—is now coming into its own with the opening of new mines and the expansion of older ones. All this will lead to an increase in population which will make it easier to put into operation more generous legislation affecting workmen's compensation, with the ultimate object of having properly organized workmen's compensation boards in operation. This will have to be done if we are going to get people to go into the north to develop its resources; and now is the time to start doing something about it.

I am therefore glad to support this resolution, which is an honest endeavour to correct this injustice in so far as it relates to government employees; and I hope that similar legislation will be enacted at an early day to provide proper benefits for non-government workmen on a scale comparable to those provided in the provinces of Canada, preferably British Columbia.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask the minister a few questions. Is it clear that the effect of this resolution will extend only to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories? From what the minister said, as well as I could hear him, I take it that there is nothing in the bill now proposed that alters the provisions of the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947, with respect to government employees in the provinces. Is that correct?

Mr. Gregg: Yes. This applies only to government employees, or employees of commissions or boards responsible to the government, resident in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon.

Mr. Knowles: For example, the minister's reference to what the situation used to be in Prince Edward Island was merely given as an example?

Mr. Gregg: That was just an example of the compensation board of a neighbouring province being used in an area that had not yet established its own act.

Mr. Knowles: All right.

Now may I say that I listened with interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River, and I noted that he expressed approval of the measure forecast by this resolution. But he also indicated that there were further steps that might yet be taken. In particular, he expressed the hope that the day might come when there would be for all workmen in the Yukon and Northwest Territories workmen's compensation legislation similar to that which obtains in the provinces. May I ask the minister to indicate whether consideration has been given to that aspect of the matter?

Further I should like to ask, what is the situation with regard to labour legislation generally? Does the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act apply in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories? If it does, does it apply only to the categories of employees covered in other parts of Canada, or does it apply to all employees in that area? If it does not apply to all employees in that area, is there any legislation in the Yukon or the Northwest Territories corresponding to what we call labour codes in the dominion and in the provinces? My reason for asking that type of question is, I think, clear. It leads into this other question as to who should bear the responsibility for workmen's compensation legislation for all employees, including non-government employees, in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Gregg: I should like to point out, as I perhaps should have done in my statement, that the Department of Labour in this instance is acting for other departments, particularly the departments of resources and development and of transport. As my hon. friend knows, under the Department of Resources and Development there is a system of local government, increasing in responsibility. My colleague the minister of that department introduced certain measures to that end. The hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River expressed the hope that these amendments might lead to a uniform compensation act being worked out for non-federal government employees in the two areas. I know full well that that is also the hope of the Minister of Resources and Development. It will, of course, be appreciated that the councils which act as the local governing bodies in those two areas would need to consult with employers in industry within the areas and with the people themselves in order to bring that about.

Now, as to the more detailed question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with regard to other labour legislation, perhaps he would allow his question to stand on the record, and we shall see to it that it is replied to in detail when we come to the bill itself.

Mr. Knowles: Following that may I ask one or two other questions? I note that the government decided to base the compensation rates and the other regulations to apply in the Yukon and Northwest Territories on the situation in Alberta for the reason that the minister gave, namely, the proximity of the areas concerned to the province of Alberta and so on. Could the minister put on the record either now, or at a later stage in this legislation, the comparable rates and provisions of the various provinces, say in particular the western provinces? The hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River, while he welcomed this legislation, said he would prefer to have seen it based on the British Columbia pattern. I think I heard the hon. member say that the rate paid to a person who is disabled as a result of an accident is 66⅔ per cent of his normal wages. I take it that is the rate in Alberta. What is the rate in British Columbia? What is the rate in Saskatchewan? What is the rate in Manitoba? In other words, was consideration given to placing this legislation not on the basis of the nearest province but on the basis of the best scheme available, say in western Canada?

One other question, and unless the minister says something that prompts more, these will be my last at this stage. What will happen if Alberta changes its workmen's compensation regulations? Will the federal provisions of the Yukon and Northwest Territories be tied to what they now are, or will they be governed by any changes that Alberta might make.

Mr. Gregg: I shall try to answer my hon. friend's questions. I shall answer the last one first. My understanding of it is that they would follow whatever changes were made in the province of Alberta; the two areas would follow the same rates.

On the other, I should be glad to give the hon. member a comparative statement later on of rates in all the provinces of Canada. Perhaps it would be of interest to him at this juncture, however, if I referred to what the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River outlined as to the present situation in Alberta and the present situation in the Yukon with regard to permanent disability. On the one hand, in Alberta at the present time the weekly payment for permanent total disability during a man's lifetime is equal to two-thirds of his average weekly earnings up to $2,500 ceiling per year; a minimum payment of $15 a week, or full earnings if less than $15 a week. In the Yukon at the present time for total disability a lump sum of $6,000 is paid. At this point I should like to refer to the question whether it should be tied to the Alberta act or to the act of some other province—British Columbia or Saskatchewan—was very carefully considered by the interdepartmental committee that studied all the factors affecting it. Perhaps I could do no better than to read a short paragraph on that in the submission made to that committee by the Department of Resources and Development. It reads as follows:

Transportation routes from the Keewatin district of the Northwest Territories lead mainly into Manitoba. Transportation routes from the Mackenzie district lead almost entirely into Alberta. Freight traffic of the Yukon Territory tends to come largely from the province of British Columbia. In the latter case, however, the construction of the Alaska highway and the trend of air transportation routes has resulted in an increased traffic through Edmonton to the north. I believe the future will increase this traffic to the extent that the great majority of the passenger traffic to the Yukon will pass through Alberta.

The number of federal employees in that portion of the Northwest Territories serviced through Manitoba is negligible as compared with the number of federal employees in the Mackenzie district of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory. The selection therefore of the Workmen's Compensation Act of the province of Alberta will give the desired uniformity of legislation and will also meet the situation as it actually exists and will continue.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I point out that whoever got out that report did not keep in mind all the factors with respect to transportation facilities. The Yukon Territory particularly is served from Vancouver. Also from Edmonton the point of juncture is at Fort St. John in the Peace river country, so that there is extensive traffic from the city of Vancouver to the Yukon, passing through British Columbia throughout.

Back of this is a very dangerous precedent, it seems to me, to tie in that great north country with Alberta. The natural outlet for that country is British Columbia, and the ports of British Columbia. We in British Columbia devised a workmen's compensation act, which is one of the finest that exist today in Canada or out of Canada. We have met and dealt with the problem of the hard rock miner, the man who suffers from silicosis. We have dealt with the problem of lead poisoning. All these mines in the Yukon and in the Mackenzie will be deep lode mines as time goes on, and also of course there will be placer mining. But the industrial problem there will be identical with that in British Columbia. It would seem to me that it would be much more in order to tie it in with British Columbia than to tie it in with the agrarian province of Alberta. I see a tendency these days to tie a great deal in with Alberta. There is a movement now to annex a portion of British Columbia. I refer to the Peace river block area. These are all straws in the wind. I hope the minister will regard the thing very broadly before he saddles the whole administration of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories onto the province of Alberta.

May I point out also that there are hard rock deep mines in the province of Manitoba. They are at Flin Flon and elsewhere. I am sure that there is a good workmen's compensation act in effect in the province of Manitoba. I think the whole thing leads to this. The time is not far off when you will be obliged to have a new province in the north, and this matter of industrial relations and workmen's compensation will be merely one of the matters that will have to be tackled by that new province. In the meantime I do not think any preference should be shown. and no measures should be taken to tie up that country to any particular provincial pattern.

Mr. Johnston: I want to say a word on this. I think that the action taken and the principle of the amendment to the act as proposed by this resolution are sound. I should like to see the people of the Yukon have their own labour legislation, but I think it would be impracticable at the present time. I was wondering about the difference in rates between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia. The minister has explained that in part, but perhaps he would put on Hansard the table from which he just quoted so that we would be able to see more in detail the difference between the rates of compensation in British Columbia and Alberta.

I was interested in hearing what the hon. member who has just taken his seat had to say, because we have been aware of the fact for some time that the northern part of British Columbia has made representation to the provincial government to have that part of British Columbia annexed to Alberta, and I do not blame them for that. I think it is a very wise suggestion, in view of the fact that we have a splendid government and splendid labour legislation in Alberta. But I think it goes even beyond that, that even part of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon want to be annexed to Alberta. I think that shows their good judgment, too. I am quite familiar with the labour legislation in Alberta, but I am not as familiar with that in British Columbia. We have never had serious objections to the labour legislation in Alberta, particularly as it applies to compensation.

The hon. member referred to silicosis. We have had quite a problem in our province in that connection. Whether the payment in British Columbia would be better, or the legislation in that regard would be better than that in Alberta, I cannot say. However, we will find that out if the minister places on Hansard the table to which he referred a moment ago.

Generally speaking I think the legislation proposed by the resolution is commendable. The minister has something on his side when he proposes to use the province nearest to the neighbourhood in question. He pointed out that that was done in other cases. From the reports we have had from some people in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, as well as northern British Columbia, I think they would be only too glad to know that the minister has chosen Alberta as the administrative point in respect of labour legislation.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Chairman, so far as the Mackenzie river valley is concerned, I would point out that it is tributary to the city of Edmonton. I am glad to hear an hon. member supporting the Social Credit party saying that they are willing and anxious to take over the Peace river area in British Columbia.

Mr. Johnston: No; they want to come in.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): No doubt the people up there will be glad to hear that they are being rescued in this way. I still think however that the headquarters for the industrial government of that part of the world should not be established until we discuss thoroughly the position of British Columbia, and the cities of British Columbia in relation thereto.

Mr. Herridge: I support the legislation, but I rise also to support what has been said by the hon. member for Cariboo and the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie river in suggesting that the workmen's compensation board of British Columbia should be used by this government in having assessments made on industrial diseases and in connection with accidents occurring to those working in the Yukon and in the Mackenzie district.

Mining conditions as I understand them, and as they are explained by the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River, are similar to those occurring in the greater portion of British Columbia. That is, they are hard-rock mining operations. I believe it is safe to say that the workmen's compensation board in British Columbia has done more research and investigation on the question of silicosis than any other compensation board in Canada. I believe that can be said without question; it is a generally recognized fact.

Owing to the fact that there is a large smelter at Trail, and that other smaller and similar operations are being carried on, a great deal of work has been done in connection with lead poisoning and other industrial diseases. Not only has a large amount of work been done by scientists, doctors and others trained to do research work in these matters, but the whole question has been followed closely by the labour unions and the workers involved. They have co-operated with management in making proposals to the compensation board to assist in the investigations made by that board respecting the complex questions surrounding a proper assessment in connection with silicosis and industrial diseases, and in stipulating what are to be classified as industrial diseases.

I believe the minister should take note of what has been said to the effect that it would be fairer to the mining areas of the Yukon and in the Mackenzie district to have their compensation assessed by the workmen's compensation board in British Columbia, which has had so much experience in assessing the type of disabilities which occur from that kind of occupation, and which also has done a great deal of work in classifying various types of accidents.

Mr. Gregg: Let me assure the committee there is no intention on my part either to begin or to renew any controversy in respect of the extension of provincial sovereignty in the west. The reason I took pains to mention Prince Edward Island in relation to New Brunswick was to assure hon. members that there would not be any possibility of an extension of sovereignty coming about, due to this mild little amendment of mine. Because I can assure the committee that the fact that "The Island" made use of the New Brunswick compensation act did not extend the influence of that province over Prince Edward Island one iota.

But let me say this, that when the commissioner and councils which govern these areas—under the federal government—come to the point where they can work out a scheme of their own on workmen's compensation for that area, they will at that time absorb within that scheme workmen's compensation for the federal employees who happen to be in that area.

So I think we are crossing a bridge some time before we have come to it. This amendment is merely to take care of federal government employees in the area. However, I shall be glad to bring to the attention of my colleague the Minister of Resources and Development the comments which have been made here this afternoon.

Mr. Knowles: The minister indicated that at a future stage he would give information concerning rates across the country. By any chance has he that information with him now in tabular form? If so it would be useful to us in debate at a later stage if it could be placed on Hansard today.

While I am on my feet I would point out that the minister's observation, to the effect that the council of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories may in due course take over directed towards the Indian bill as such, there will be opportunity for extended debate on Indian administration later in the session.

Mr. Drew: I am not particularly concerned about the time at which the statement may be made, but I should like to make a short statement which is directly applicable to the bill. I accept the suggestion of the minister in the spirit in which it is made; and so far as any extended remarks are concerned, I shall reserve them for the estimates.

I wish to make a brief statement in relation to the bill because I believe this is the time to draw attention again to our policy in an effort to find a real solution for this whole question. I can only repeat what I have said before. As I indicated earlier in the session, and in previous sessions as well, I have a strong conviction that there is great inconsistency in asserting our belief that full equality should be established for the peoples of other lands, asserting that as though we thought that principle could be carried into practice in other lands, when in this democracy of ours we have failed to solve this one problem which has to do with the measure of equality that is to be extended to a very large number of our own citizens.

I would point out that the number affected by this bill is not insignificant. It happens that the number is almost the same as the total population of Iceland, an independent nation with a long and proud history. I employ that comparison only by way of illustration to point out that we are dealing with a large number of human beings who have all the qualifications to become equal citizens in every respect of this country of ours.

I realize that some opinions are held among the Indian tribes that they do not wish the treaty relationships to be unduly disturbed. They regard these as sacred contractual rights which they wish preserved, along with all the privileges and protections of certain kinds which they receive under the treaty contracts. On the other hand, whatever views may be expressed, either by members of the Indian tribes affected or by other Canadians, we cannot be satisfied until we have established a basis of absolute equality for all Canadians in this country.

Once again I simply want to place on record, while the bill is under consideration, the opinion that no hon. member should have in his mind the thought that we have done more than improve an unsatisfactory situation. Undoubtedly the amendments that have been placed before the house, and that have been improved by reference to the committee which has spent some time on the bill, will be to the advantage of the Indian population of Canada affected by this measure.

I wish to express my own belief that the minister has approached this subject with a real desire to improve the lot of the Indian members of the Canadian population. No hon. member of this house and no Canadian with the full rights of citizenship can ever be satisfied that this bill will achieve what all of us should desire. While we adopt the bill, to whatever extent it is adopted, as a measure that will improve the position of those affected by it, I wish to leave the thought that all of us should be directing our attention to the way in which we can bring the Indian population fully into the regular citizenship of Canada, protecting them in so far as their basic rights are concerned but at the same time giving them the opportunities of education and of ordinary citizenship which I am convinced they are capable of accepting and of carrying forward with success in the years ahead.

Mr. Fulton: Before the clause is carried I should like to say a word or two, not by way of any extended remarks but first to support to the full the remarks just made by my leader on the attitude which should inspire us in our relationship with the Indians and in our efforts to bring them into full equality and citizenship. Judging by the way in which those remarks were received in the house they were acceptable to and can be taken as reflecting the attitude of all members in this chamber.

While it is undeniable that the Indian affairs committee did a tremendous amount of work in not a very long time, and the substantial number of amendments made in that committee have, as the minister himself has said, improved the bill either in detail or in some cases in general principle and application, nevertheless I want to record at this stage my regret that the committee did not see fit to call on Indian representatives to appear before it to give the members of the committee, who are members of the house, an opportunity to hear at first hand the views of representative Indians with respect to Bill No. 79.

It is true that there were extended hearings two years ago and three years ago by a committee which considered the subject of Indian affairs generally. It is also true and only fair to say that that committee heard many representatives of the Indians themselves who had a full opportunity to present their views and to submit briefs which were incorporated in the proceedings of the committee. But that committee, Mr. Chairman, was not dealing this field, leads me to observe that the council is likely to be guided by whatever has been established as federal government practice. If the federal government has adopted a practice which calls for payment at the rate of 66⅔ per cent rather than 75 per cent, as I believe is the case in some other provinces, the council would likely follow suit.

I still think it would have been better to have picked some other province, for that reason. However we can discuss that later. Has the minister a table at hand now which could be placed on Hansard at this time, so that we would have the information before we come to second reading of the bill?

Mr. Gregg: No; I have just a comparative statement of the classifications of rates of compensation for accidents as between Alberta and the Yukon at the present time. However I shall be glad, when we are in committee of the whole on the bill, to give the rates for all the western provinces.

Mr. Knowles: Is 66⅔ per cent the rate in Alberta? What is the rate in British Columbia?

Mr. Gregg: I know that is the rate for Alberta, but I am not prepared to give the exact British Columbia rate at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: I believe it is higher.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Gregg thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 291, to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VETERANS BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL LOANS ACT—EXTENSION OF APPLICATION, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 286, to amend the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act.

Mr. Sinclair: It is the intention that this bill be referred to the special committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I would suggest that this bill be permitted to stand until nine o'clock, because it was distributed only after the house met. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs told me that he would agree to both veterans bills standing until that time.

Mr. Speaker: This will stand until later this day.

Motion stands.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I presume that both bills standing in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs will stand until nine o'clock, and the next order of business would be that the house go into committee of the whole on Bill No. 79.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION—PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO BAND FUNDS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 79, respecting Indians.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be useful if the minister would summarize the amendments which were made in committee so that the public, and particularly the Indians, may know what changes have been made since the bill was first introduced.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, the amendments made by the special committee are underlined in the sections where they occur in the reprinted bill. In some cases the amendments were of a strictly legal nature and were intended to place a better complexion upon the section. Others were efforts, and successful efforts, by the committee to improve what we have been trying to improve for many months. They were all directed toward making the act clearer to those who would read it and to make the administration of the act more simple. Where a matter of policy was involved I think it is correct to say that in every case we tended toward granting the Indian greater opportunity for self-government in one form or another.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I believe it is appropriate on section 1 to make any general comments about the bill. I have no intention of making extended remarks, but as this will be the last opportunity during the present session to discuss the whole problem of Indians living in Canada I should like to make a few observations directed toward the future consideration of this extremely important problem.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Without desiring to interrupt my hon. friend, may I indicate to him that we have not yet dealt with the estimates of the Indian affairs branch. While I know that what he is going to say will be with Bill No. 79. Bill 79 had not been formulated; it had not been introduced. No legislation amending the Indian Act was before that committee, so that all the committee had an opportunity to do was to give general consideration to the question of Indian affairs and to ways in which the former Indian Act might be amended.

Then we had Bill No. 267 introduced last year. I believe it is perfectly accurate to say that Bill No. 267 was not found to be acceptable. You will remember, Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee will recall, that the bill was not proceeded with after its introduction late in the spring of 1950. Now we have Bill 79 which again in fairness must be said to be an improvement in certain respects over Bill 267. The minister did call nineteen representative Indians, I think it was, to a conference. That conference, however, was held with the minister and officials of his department. No members of the house were in attendance, and there was no opportunity for the Indians themselves as a body to appear before the house or a committee of the house to present their views.

Therefore when the present Bill 79 was before the special committee set up this session there had been no representations by Indians to that committee as to their attitude with respect to the bill and how it might be further improved. It is an unfortunate fact that there are a large number of responsible Indians who feel that Bill 79 does not go as far as it might to improve the general position of Indians in this country. The bill, however, was fully considered by the committee, and I do not propose at this time to repeat all the arguments which were advanced in the committee, because after all it is the purpose of such a committee that these arguments shall take place so that the bill may receive detailed consideration. Generally speaking, although not in any sense depriving members of the house of the right to full expression in the house, certainly it is at least logical to expect that the house will accept the work of such a special committee.

That being the case, I think it is doubly to be regretted that Indian representatives did not have an opportunity to appear before the committee. I might say at this point that twice during its proceedings motions were made that Indian witnesses be called, once at the first sitting of the committee before we embarked upon the detailed consideration of the bill, and the second time when the committee had considered the bill clause by clause and was about to bring its proceedings to a close. On each occasion it was formally moved that the committee, in addition to any other witnesses who might be heard, should call upon Indian representatives to come and give us the benefit of their views with respect to this legislation. On each occasion these motions were defeated by a majority of the members of the committee.

I think it is a pity that the bill, which is so important to the Indians, should be passed first through the committee and now through the house without that opportunity having been given. The history of the Indian Act, as I recall it, shows that the act has only received major amendment on an average of about once every twenty years since it was first enacted. That is a very rough average, but I think it will be found to be the approximate interval between major amendments of this legislation. Therefore this is long-term legislation.

This is legislation under which a very substantial number of men, women and children living in Canada will be governed. Therefore, now that the problem of Indian affairs has been brought before this house in a way it has not been for twenty years, at any rate now that our attitude toward Indian affairs has made a considerable advance, as I believe it has, and now that we are coming to believe, to insist and have it generally accepted that Indians can and should be made equal, it seems to me doubly important that the very people who are going to live under this legislation should have had the opportunity to appear before the committee and express their views as to the details of the legislation under which, if past history is anything of a guide, they will have to live for perhaps the next twenty years.

It is true that the committee did pass a resolution, in the form of an amendment to one of the motions to which I have referred, in which they said that the Indian Act should be reviewed at the end of two years. When the motion was made that we hear Indian representatives an amendment was moved that we should not hear the representatives at this time, but that the committee was of the opinion that the Indian Act should be reviewed at the end of two years. That, however, was only an expression of opinion by the committee, and I think I am correct in saying it does not have the force of law. It rests with the government and minister to decide whether or not the act will be subject to a general review at that time. So there is no assurance in that amendment that Indians will have an opportunity as a body, through their organizations, to have a thorough review of this legislation at the end of two years. As I say, past history shows that this legislation is not thoroughly reviewed and subject to major amendments on an average of more than once every twenty years.

I express this opinion because, while I do not wish to dissent from the work done by the committee in so far as it improved the legislation, I do wish any acceptance of this legislation on my part at the present time to be subject to the reservation that it probably could have been further improved if the Indian representatives had been brought here and heard, and also to the further reservation that in that case no Indian or anyone else could suggest that the Indians were not fully and properly consulted and their views and wishes ascertained with respect to this legislation.

I should like to ask the minister what assurances can be given or whether in fact he will give an assurance that so long as he is minister he intends to accept that recommendation of the Indian affairs committee that the act be subject to review at the end of two years and that a parliamentary committee be set up at that time to hear from the minister and his officials on the operation of the new act we are putting through the house today.

Mr. Richard (Gloucester): After listening to the remarks of the last speaker I do not know whether those who sat on the committee for the last three or four years share the opinion I hold. I believe representatives of all Indian tribes throughout Canada were given every opportunity to place their problems before the committee; and I think the committee did marvellous work. Now the hon. member seems to wish to leave the impression with the house that all Indians were not given full opportunity to bring their problems to that committee. I do not believe the last speaker was a member of the old committee, and I do not think he can have read all the evidence that was adduced before that committee. The members of that committee sat patiently during many sessions; and if this year it was not thought desirable to re-examine all the subjects we had already covered so thoroughly it was because we did not want to delay the legislation, which we thought implemented all the conclusions at which the committee had arrived. So I do not think the impression should be left with this house that the Indians did not have full opportunity to make their representations. I dare say the legislation is not perfect, but as with any other legislation it can be corrected in future if any correction is necessary.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I do not think my recollection of the proceedings of the committee is quite in accord with that of the hon. member for Kamloops. We discussed the matter of the further revision of the act, and on more than one occasion I gave the assurance that we would not have a long period between revisions. When we discussed the question of again interviewing the Indians I gave a categorical answer to a question put me by one of the other members of the committee. That appears at page 280 of the committee's proceedings. I was asked if another conference similar to that held with the Indians in February and March would be held within a period of two or three years, and I gave the assurance that the government would reconvene such a conference within that period of time.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister not recall that on the last day of the committee's sittings, I think it was, I introduced a motion that Indian representatives be now called? Then what was described as an amendment was moved, that they be not now called but that the committee was of the opinion that the Indian Act should be reviewed at the end of two years. I have not the exact words before me, but I have a very vivid recollection that this was the effect of the amendment to the motion I had moved.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The resolution reads:

> This committee is of the opinion that no further evidence is now required for our purposes, but that we recommend that further consideration be given to the Indian Act in two years' time.

I gave an assurance that in that period we would convene a conference of Indians similar to that of last winter. I hope to bring in amendments to this bill next session. I am not going to wait for two years to amend the act, if it requires amendment.

Mr. Fulton: It seems to me the wording of the resolution goes a little further than that, in that the committee recommended that the Indian Act be reviewed in two years' time. I am quite sure that every member of the committee would agree that the officials of the Indian affairs branch, through the very fact of exercising their functions, must have the act before them every day, and to that extent it is being reviewed constantly. In the light of that fact the recommendation of a special committee of the house considering whether or not we should hear further evidence now, which expressed the conclusion that we should not hear further evidence now but that the Indian Act should be reviewed at the end of two years, I think must be taken to mean much more than a mere departmental review. I think it must mean the opportunity by a committee of this house to review the act at the end of two years. Certainly that is the sense in which

I took that resolution. I wonder if I am right in taking from the minister's latest answer that he understands the motion merely to mean that the act should be reviewed by the department, possibly with Indian representatives called in from time to time, or whether he does not think it means that the members of this house should have an opportunity in two years' time to make a further detailed study of the Indian Act.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The hon. member will recall that there were certain difficulties about voting on the various motions at that time. Later in the proceedings I find that the amendment was reworded, and it now reads in this way:

> This committee is of the opinion that no further evidence is now required for our purposes, but that we recommend that further consideration be given to the Indian Act in two years' time.

Having stated earlier that the government would reconvene a conference of Indians, I assumed that was what the committee had in mind. I did not take this to be a direction that a special committee should be appointed; but if that is what hon. members had in mind I am quite sure they will bring it to the attention of the government in two years' time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Unfortunately I was away when most of the discussion took place on this matter. But certainly my reading of the evidence that was taken and of the discussions that took place indicated to me that there was to be a review of the whole situation, not by the members of the Indian department but by the House of Commons.

I can say this, Mr. Chairman. I have been in western Canada during the last few days; and during my absence I have received letters from various chiefs in western Canada who are not at all satisfied with the situation under the act as at present amended. I feel that if the review is to be restricted to the members of the Indian department, such a review is worthless from the point of view of protecting the rights of the Indians in this country.

The Indian Act has been before the members of the department over the years. To say that any changes, alterations or suggestions as to improvement are to emanate from the members of that department certainly will hold out little hope that many beneficial changes will take place. Indeed, I have here a letter from a chief, written within the last few days, wherein he sets forth that various chiefs are even now meeting, or have been meeting within the last few days, with a view to making further representations. I speak of the descendants of the chiefs who made No. 4 and No. 6 treaties in the province of Saskatchewan. I have had representations from chiefs in Manitoba. I also have them here before me. They understood there was going to be a further review in two years—

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): So there is.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —not by the members of the Indian department but by members of the House of Commons, with a view to bringing about changes and improvements.

I know that the experience of the hon. member for Essex West would go a long way in the convening of another committee to bring about the necessary changes that must be made. From my own experience I know there are in western Canada Indian tribes who have the right to ask for justice which, up to the present time, has been denied them. I think of the cases in which Indian tribes, within the last fifteen years, have been denied the right to take action against His Majesty the King. I know of one case that was taken—and successfully taken—arising out of highly improper conduct in connection with the handling of money belonging to the reserve. I refer to the Mistawasis case. A justice of the Court of King's Bench in Saskatchewan allowed substantial damages for the wrongs that had been done; and from that date on, no right of action has ever been granted to any Indian tribe in Saskatchewan that made application for a fiat that justice be done, so that action could be commenced.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member would not want to misinform the committee. That statement is not a fact.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right. I understand that statement is correct. I was the one who made application for the fiat; and that is fifteen years ago. From the time that action was taken in the Mistawasis case before Mr. Justice McLean in Saskatchewan, fiats have not been granted. But we do not have to worry about fiats any more; for in the next few days when the act is passed—if it is passed—through this parliament doing away with the need for a fiat, the rights of all His Majesty's subjects, whether Indians or others, will not be dependent upon the caprice of any minister as to whether or not action is to be commenced.

I bring this matter to the attention of the minister at this moment and I say this. Will he consider carrying out the request of the Indian chiefs—and I think it has been brought to his attention on more than one occasion—for the setting up, with regard to these reserves where there are claims of injustices, a royal commission for the purpose of investigating whether or not there is justice in the request of these Indians, to the end that every possible feeling of injustice on their part will be removed by a judicial or semi-judicial inquiry? If that was done, I think much improvement in morale would result.

During the period that the minister has been in office I know that he has brought the various Indian chiefs to Ottawa, that they have discussed the matter with him and with his departmental officials, and that improvements are taking place. But there remains in the hearts and the souls of many Indians throughout the western provinces an abiding feeling of injustice. Under treaty they turned over everything they had to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, and they feel that the promises that were made by her Britannic majesty's representatives have not been fully carried out. I feel that if such a course were followed by the minister it would go a long way towards removing that feeling which prevails among many of these bands and tribes, namely that injustices that have accumulated over the years have not been satisfactorily eradicated or removed or that compensation for wrongdoing has not been given. Realizing that the act as it is being amended today by this bill will remove some of the injustices, in all seriousness I ask the minister to give consideration to the appointment of a royal commission so that whatever other financial injustices may exist may be determined and proper compensation may be given to those affected.

This act has been in effect—I speak from recollection now—for approximately seventy years, with few changes. The revamping of this act has been an unusually difficult and trying job. It has required the co-operation not only of the committee of two or three years ago but of the departmental officials. It has received the co-operative assistance of the minister. But I feel that one thing still remains to be done. I feel that everything possible should be done to remove from the hearts and souls of Indians everywhere, particularly those in the western provinces—and of them only I speak—the feeling of having suffered what they believe to have been injustices.

I remember so well, in 1934, when the Indians gathered near Duck Lake on the sixtieth anniversary of the signing of the treaty that ceded those great western claims to Queen Victoria and her successors, Lord Tweedsmuir met with the descendants of those Indian chiefs, some of them sons of the chiefs who had been signatories to that treaty that gave to the British crown that great area extending from the western shores of Hudson bay and thence to the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains. Those chiefs, some of whom were sons of the chiefs who were the signatories to that treaty, one after the other raised the question as to instances of what they believed to have been injustices for which they and their bands would be entitled to compensation. I remember so well that Lord Tweedsmuir, as His Majesty's representative, promised them in the name of His Majesty that any injustices and unfairness that may have existed would be removed. Of course he had to speak within the limits of his constitutional position. I make this appeal to the minister. Let us not only make this act work, but let us also do something to remove that feeling that does exist—and I think it rightly exists—that in too many cases, as a result of the law being what it is, and as contained within the Indian Act, promises that were made to these people, the aborigines on the western plains, have in fact not been carried out in accordance with justice and just dealing, as promised at the time the treaties were made.

I ask the minister again, has he given consideration now, since a new act is about to be passed, to the setting up of such a commission, free of and removed from the Indian department, judicial, if you like, in its nature, to the end that the claims for compensation, if they have any legal basis, will once and for all be determined by a judicial body, and, if there is any legal basis for the claims of these Indians, that compensation be given?

Mr. Brown (Essex West): I do not want to create the impression that I am an expert on Indian affairs. As a matter of fact I do not know of any experts on Indian affairs in this house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thank goodness this is one department that has no experts.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): However, I do think that the impression that has been given by the hon. member for Lake Centre is not fair either to himself or to the members of the Indian administration. As I said, I do not know of any experts in the house, with probably one exception, namely, the minister himself who has within a very short period of time taken such a keen interest in the affairs of the Indians that he has grasped the situation among the Indians, as I see it, in a commendable way. I do believe that in fairness to the Indian administration, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Peace River, this matter is one primarily of administration. In that regard the Indian problems have largely, if not dissolved, at least lessened in the past few years. This has happened, as the hon. member for Peace River has pointed out, since the committee was formed.

Under the able assistance of Mr. R. A. Hoey much was done to improve Indian affairs. I think that the Indians of this country, and the people generally, owe him a deep debt of gratitude. He has been succeeded by Major D. M. MacKay, who is now director of Indian affairs. He comes to the administration after many years in this work, and after having lived for some time among Indians on the west coast. He has done a remarkable job in improving Indian administration. I think we are very fortunate in Canada to have an administration of this type and an administration headed by a person of such integrity and ability.

Mr. T. R. L. MacInnes has had many many years of experience. He is well versed in the history, lore and habits of the Indians, and has a great sympathy for their problems. I know that the hon. member for Lake Centre has, with me, a very high regard for his integrity and his ability.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is correct.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): I would not have it appear that there is any reflection whatever on the department heads. I could go on all through the department and point out individuals who have sacrificed considerably to be of service to the Indians.

There is another matter which has been brought up, and which I think should be referred to, namely, that we have not given the Indian an opportunity to appear before the committee. The committee formed in 1946 took as its theme that we were going about to help the Indians help themselves, and I think they have adhered strictly to that policy. We brought to Ottawa to appear before this committee Indians from all parts of Canada. When we could not get the Indians to agree we brought different factions from different provinces. In addition to that, a select group of the committee, ten in number, went down to the maritime provinces, and there heard every individual Indian who had anything to say on Indian affairs. I personally, and at my own expense, I may say, went out to the west coast to see how the Indians lived, to hear them and as much as possible to observe their habits and customs. I know, too, that the minister has travelled across this country hearing and seeing the Indians, and has tried to get a greater knowledge of their problems.

You will recall too, sir, that early in the session Indian representatives from every province in the dominion were brought to Ottawa, and they met with the minister in closed conference to discuss the bill which is before the committee now. It may be argued that there were some there who were not representative. Well, those who have any knowledge of Indian affairs will realize that it is very difficult to get one person to represent any large group of persons, and it is no exception among Indians, but I feel sure, from the knowledge I have of the representatives who attended that conference, that the persons who were in attendance did truly represent the large majority, and by far the largest majority, of the Indians in the provinces from which they came. They were in conference for several days. They went over this bill, clause by clause. I was not in attendance myself. What I am saying is hearsay. They went over the bill clause by clause and voiced any objections that they might have, and these objections were brought before the committee of this house which has considered this bill, so that when it is said that the Indians have not been heard, it is not quite correct.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, I had the privilege of serving on the Indian committee for a number of years. While the redistribution in 1949 took away most of the Indians it was my honour to represent, I still take an interest in Indian affairs.

I entered the chamber too late to hear everything the hon. member for Lake Centre said; but from those few remarks I did hear it appeared to me he was suggesting that a claims commission should be set up.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

Mr. Bryce: I do not wish at this time to go over the ground I covered before when speaking in the house. My remarks at that time were lengthy, and anyone who wishes to know what I said will find them recorded in Hansard.

I still think however that if we are going to convince the Indians that we are giving them a new deal we will have to correct their thinking. If one argues with them he will find they still think, indeed they are positive, that we owe them something, and that we are keeping something back from them.

The minister has heard me say many times that the Manitoba Indians will quote what they were promised back in 1871. They continue to tell their families that these are the things the white man or the Queen Mother promised them, and that the obligation has not been fulfilled.

I have never thought in terms of a royal commission, but I do believe a claims commission such as that suggested by the hon.

member would be useful, so that whoever was placed in charge of it could get these matters straightened out once and for all. The Indian population is increasing, and as it does so there will be more who will believe that there has been an injustice.

I believe all hon. members realize it was necessary to revise the Indian Act. While I did not always get my own way in committee, I was content to accept the rule of the majority. I would have liked to see the Indians back here in Ottawa, so that I would have had the opportunity to talk with them and to ask them some questions. They, too, would have had the opportunity to ask questions. A majority in the committee however ruled to the contrary, and I feel one must abide by the decision of the majority.

To let hon. members know what I have in mind I should like to place on record a telegram I received. We were led to believe that when the Indians went home they were satisfied they had got everything their own way. This telegram addressed to me at the House of Commons states:

> Informed special committee passed bill seventy-nine without incorporating recommendations from conference Indian representatives. If report true deeply regret and strongly protest such action. Urge reconsideration of contentious clauses during debate. Urge amendments suggested by conference be included. Consent of governed in principle concern.

That is from the Indian Association of Alberta, one of the men who were here to meet the Indian committee. I should have liked to see these Indians again. I did not have the opportunity to speak to the Indians from Manitoba. It is possible that, had they been here, we would not have got any further, but I believe that opportunity should have been given.

I shall not take more time in speaking on this occasion. There are one or two questions I should like to ask at a later time. We must realize however that the Indians have gone home and that they are still not satisfied. Some of my friends will say that we will never satisfy them. My reply however would be that we could go a long way toward meeting more of their grievances; and I think a claims commission would be one way of helping to straighten out their thinking which, it may be, is not always in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to speak at length now, because on a previous occasion I did discuss the matter more fully. I believe however there are some points which ought to be made before we proceed to discuss the bill in detail.

It is my view that in large measure the value of the bill will depend upon the general attitude in the minds of those administering the act. If the attitude is taken that the rights of the Indians ought to be extended, and that on all occasions they should be given the benefit of the doubt, then I believe the act will pretty well take care of itself. However if the opposite view is taken we shall require an exceptionally good piece of legislation to prevent considerable damage being done to the Indians.

To make it perfectly clear to those who may read my remarks that I am not suggesting in any way that those who are now administering the Indian Act are negligent or deficient in their general attitude, let me say at once that, so far as I can see, the present Indians branch has the right idea, and is working forward progressively. I believe that should be said.

Almost anyone must agree that the present bill is much superior to any bill of a similar kind presented to any Canadian parliament heretofore. I believe anyone who knows the facts must agree that the minister in charge of Indian affairs has far surpassed anyone charged with a similar responsibility in the whole history of the Dominion of Canada. As such he deserves the credit and honour due a man who discharges his duties in a statesmanlike manner. I believe history will give him credit for what he has already done, and what I believe he still will do.

Perhaps I should add that I am not alone in the opinions I express. A statement from the Alberta Indian Association, issued since the bill was published, states that the new Indian Act in the present revised form is an excellent piece of legislation. It points out that the government has made the most serious study of the Indians themselves, and seems genuinely interested in giving these people a charter that will ensure their steady progress and development.

In those sentiments I heartily concur. Yet I believe there are some words of warning which ought to be uttered on this occasion.

There appears to be a belief among a good many people that the day ought to come by and by when the whole matter of Indians can be written off as finished business in Canada. People entertaining such views take the general point of view that we ought to integrate the Indians with the whites just as rapidly as we can. We might even have regulations to impose enfranchisement upon the Indians as one means of achieving that objective. Such people hold also that we should disintegrate and ultimately eliminate the reservation, and they have in mind certain devices whereby that objective could be attained, even by using the present Indian Act.

Between me and the men who take that attitude there is a sharp and I might almost say violent opposition in point of view. I do not believe the day will ever come, at least in our time, when we can write off the Indian as finished business. If we are not to write him off as finished business we must make provisions for expanding our services to the Indian down to the latest generation. Once that principle is laid down and followed our whole approach to the Indian problem will change.

There are certain rights which I believe the Indians possess. First of all, the Indian has a right to remain an Indian and to have his children and his children's children remain Indians to the latest generation if they so desire. There are certain reasons why this is the case. Indians are very religious. Their traditions go back through the millenniums. They do not want to see themselves disappear as Indians any more than the members of the tribe of Judah desire to see themselves cease to be members of the tribe of Judah. Those who understand the Indians know that they are just as tenacious in their feelings in this respect as are the descendants of Judah. No people, no officials can disregard that profound and far-reaching fact without doing violence to sacred beliefs among the Indians. If some day Indians outgrow those beliefs then the situation will be different. But as long as they maintain those beliefs which have been handed down to them by their fathers, we have a reality there, even though it may be an intangible reality, which we must not lightly treat.

The Indian has the right to have his reservation preserved inviolate as a place of refuge for his children and his children's children whenever those children may find themselves unable to compete successfully with non-Indians in the struggle for existence. Let us consider just how serious that can be in the fearful times through which we are going. Every hon. member knows that it is next to impossible today for the most qualified non-Indian to get employment if he is thrown out of employment at 65 years of age. A great many people, regardless of how skilful they may be, find it next to impossible to obtain employment when needed after 50 years of age. If we are going into that sort of thing it must be obvious that the Indian is going to be under a most serious disadvantage when he attempts to compete in the economy of the non-Indian.

To me this is a most solemn consideration, and I think all hon. members will agree with me. If the white man, the non-Indian, insists on so managing his affairs that there is little use for our own people after they are 45 or 50 years of age, he must realize that he has a responsibility toward the Indian which must be assumed. If we are going to indulge ourselves in the luxury of supporting a financial and economic system like that, we at least should see that the Indian does not have to pay the price.

The Indian has the right to remain out of our wars if he sees fit. We say that the Indian was born here, that he is a Canadian and therefore has a responsibility to defend this country. That is one point of view. But in most of the original treaties there was a stipulation that the white queen would never call upon the Indians to fight her wars. That was a sacred promise. We must take into consideration along with that fact the fact that these wars that we fight generation after generation are of our own making or the result of the economic system under which we choose to operate. That is known to all well-informed people. The Indian should not have to go and shed his blood to fight our wars.

The Indian has the right to the highest degree of training of every kind. Up to the present we have not begun to give the Indian that right. In only a very few cases scattered far and wide has there been even an approximation to doing that. Yet some people are thinking of pushing the Indians out into the stream of economic competition where they will have little or no chance at all. The boys and girls of even our race are going out into that stream of competition and are finding that at 45 or 50 years of age they are unable to compete successfully!

All we have to do is remember what happened during the depression when Canada had a million and a quarter of her people unemployed, not because they were not able to work, not because they were not willing to work, not because there was not a tremendous amount of work to do, but simply because we insisted on following a financial and economic system that made it almost impossible for men to get work under the best of circumstances. If we insist on keeping that financial system, how in the world can we justifiably expect the Indian to suffer for that?

The Indian has a right to adequate rehabilitation. It is too late now to train many Indians who are 45 or 50 years of age, even those of 25 years of age, but surely something ought to be done for these people. Until such time as we are positively certain that Indians can be fully qualified for participation in the economic struggles of our time it seems to me this right ought to bear a special cogency in our minds.

The Indian has a right to compensation for the injustices that have been done him in the past. The hon. member for Lake Centre, the hon. member for Peace River, the hon. member for Selkirk and a great many other hon. members have said things which indicate they are in general agreement with that statement. How are we going to give the Indians compensation for the harm that has been done them during the 150 years or so we have been in this country? The first thing we have to do is to find out what that harm has been and its impact upon the Indian of today. Therefore it becomes necessary to address ourselves to the problem of discovering the solution to this situation.

Some people say: Certain groups of Indians have no treaty rights, and therefore we have no further obligation to them. For example, I am told that a great many Indians in eastern Canada have not been fortunate enough to be treaty Indians while the Indians in the western provinces have become treaty Indians. There are people who say that because we did not sign any treaties with those Indians in the east they are not entitled to as fair consideration as our Indians in the west. I think such people overlook the important fact that our fathers had become a great deal more civilized by the time they dealt with the Indians of the west than their fathers were several generations before when they dealt with the Indians in the maritimes.

We talk about the Indians becoming civilized. The white man had to become civilized, and the average white man among us has a long way to go yet before he is really civilized if you take the word "civilized" to mean thoroughly prepared to co-operate with his fellows in obtaining the betterment of all, and that is the only sound definition of "civilized".

Some people say that the Indians have no special legal rights, and why bother about such Indians? I confess that such arguments seem to me quite unsound. The Indians' rights in my judgment result from the fact that America was the Indians' promised land. Maybe that does not mean as much to certain other members of the house as it does to me. Judging from the expressions on the faces of the members present I think however it does mean as much to them.

This land was their land. The land of both North and South America was the Indians'. They owned it by prior right. The Indian settled here first and had been here for thousands of years before the whites ever came. We must never forget that. Then the white man came to this promised land of the Indian. He did not conquer the Indian. He negotiated with him as an equal. Then he killed the Indians' buffalo with his guns. He caught the Indians' fish with his advanced methods of fishing. He cut down and ruined the Indians' forests with his advanced methods of cutting them down. He burned them down by devices which he had and which the Indians either did not have, or else knew a whole lot more about how to take care of. He spoiled the Indians' pastures. He trespassed on the Indians' hunting and camping grounds. He dried up and polluted the Indians' rivers and streams; he fenced off the Indians' trails.

Every single step in that unhappy process rendered it more and more difficult for the Indians to survive. Will anyone seriously argue that the Indian was not establishing rights by indirect measure when all that was occurring? Will anyone seriously argue in his saner moments when he is no longer a politician that when the white man did all these things he did not assume a responsibility to the Indian which the white man's children should at least endeavour to discharge? As a result of all these things the white man did against the Indians, the Indian was left with inadequate means of adjusting himself to the white man's economic life. Generally speaking the white man did nothing about it at all except to beat the Indian whenever he could.

An hon. Member: Beat?

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, beat. At this point let me read a short passage from this same document of the Indian Association of Alberta just to show what the white men have done. I am taking it right out of its context but it is appropriate. It is as follows:

> And in the late 1800's, when Indians were being brought into treaty, both Indians and mixed bloods were offered land scrip in exchange for treaty rights. This scrip entitled the holder to crown lands, and of course was valuable. Unscrupulous whites cheated many an illiterate and simple Indian or "breed" out of his or her scrip by offering in trade a bottle of rotgut whiskey, a few yards of print or some gaudy trifles. And of course the victims kept on living with the band, for they couldn't do anything else. Eventually, in P.C. 1182, 1901, Hon. Clifford Sifton, minister of the interior, ruled that these people could be taken back into treaty, with the value of their squandered scrip to be deducted from their annuities. But Bill 79 states outright that no recipient of scrip or any of his descendants may be registered as an Indian.

That is painting an ugly picture in big broad splashes, is it not? Every member of this house who has any genuine contact with the Indian situation at all knows that this kind of thing has occurred and occurs today. In my judgment there is only one way in which we can deal with this whole situation satisfactorily. That is by doing what I suggested the last time I spoke, namely, setting up two specific commissions. These commissions would not be set up under the Indian Act, but would be commissions which would work in co-operation with the department in administering the Indian Act. The first one would be an Indian claims commission that would probe into history, find out the facts, and then find out what the impact of those facts is upon the Indians today and what measures ought to be taken to reimburse or recompense the Indian so that his children may know that something was done at least in our generation to be fair to him.

Then we should have an Indian rehabilitation commission, as I suggested before. No Indian department could do this work. The personnel of the department are so overworked now that all you have to do is to look at them to see that that is so. You can step into the office of almost any one of these men and you will see that they are positively overworked. How in the world can men like that, burdened with thousands and thousands of administrative details for many of which they have no guide to follow, use the imagination and initiative which is necessary to enable them to adapt the Indians to the particular circumstances surrounding them? Let me give an illustration concerning the Indian reserve which I have the honour to represent. In our area there is a beet growing section for which there is need for a great number of beet workers. If the appropriate officials could come and train the Indians to be beet workers, as they could, as skilfully as the Indians of Caughnawaga have been trained to become steel workers, then as long as the beet sugar factories remained there the Indians would be assured of good jobs off the reservation every year. They would learn to be just as successful at that kind of work as the d.p.'s who come from Czechoslovakia, Poland, Hungary and other places, and fit right into that scheme and prosper among the beet fields. This is only an illustration; there must be countless instances from coast to coast in Canada. An Indian rehabilitation commission would undertake to discover these possibilities of training Indians to adapt themselves to the economic life surrounding them and in due time would make them a far happier and more useful people both to themselves and to us.

Indians of today have still other grievances. With all the other things we have done to the Indians our government now insists on taxing them on the income they make off the reserves. Numbers of my fellow members in the house seem to think that is all right, but to me it is positively revolting. We say to the Indian in effect that we simply defy him to adapt himself to conditions outside the reserve and make a success, but that if he does we will tax him for the privilege of doing so. I do not see how anyone can face with equanimity a proposition like that, it is so outrageous. Let us take the Caughnawaga people, for instance; suppose they are able to make a pretty good income off the reserve. They could return to the reserve and improve it; buy more land, do reforestation, restock the streams, and all that sort of thing. They could do it if they could take back to the reserve the income they earned elsewhere, but no; as soon as they make any money the white man steals it from them in taxes so they go back practically impoverished, just as the white man in general goes back to his home with a pay envelope altogether inadequate to meet his needs.

The situation thus confronting the Indian is quite hopeless. The white man insists on doing this also; or, if he does not exactly insist on it, there are indications in this legislation that he may do so! If an Indian does excel, if he establishes himself in a conspicuous manner as a success among the white men, the government might say, "Well, you have done very well. You can get along without assistance. We do not need to help you any longer. We will enfranchise you and turn you loose among the whites." It will not matter at all if that Indian's grandchild should not be as successful as he was. The grandchild may not be successful at all; nevertheless he will be enfranchised and to the end of time all the privileges and rights which were guaranteed to him as an Indian will be taken away because he had an ancestor who happened to be successful. Is that not almost unbelievable for intelligent men in 1951 to be contemplating? Yet that is the sort of thing presumably facing the Indians. They are very bright and keen, and though they do not talk very much about it they understand how serious it is. It fills them almost with dismay, all over the land.

I promised, Mr. Chairman, that I would not speak too long. I intend to keep that promise, but I want to say one further word which will perhaps offer a ray of hope. I want to project myself now into the minds of those men who say we have to get to the point somehow where we can write off these Indians, because if we make it possible for them to multiply the first thing we know we shall have millions of them and we shall not be able to take care of them. They think we are going to have more old age pensioners. Now that we are bringing the pensionable age down to 65, the first thing you know we will have to bring it down to 60, then to 55; and they want to know where in the world we are going to end. I realize men are thinking in such terms today; but let me assure people from coast to coast in Canada and the members of this house that if we would adopt a realistic financial system these worries would disappear at once. Then we would not ask where we were going to get the money to do all these things for the Indians, for our aged people, and others. We would ask whether we in Canada can produce the milk and the cream and the butter and the eggs and the meat and the lumber and the clothing and the fuel. Can we produce enough of those commodities to take care of all those who will be born to us and to the Indians? The answer must come back a thunderous "Yes". Well, all we have to do is adopt a financial system that will be realistic in respect to our productive capacity so the financial system will reflect the facts of our production. Then we shall have no cause for any anxiety as to our ability to advance the welfare of our Indians to the very end of time, or as long as the good Creator wills that we remain here as a free and independent people.

Now may I close with one more word of commendation to the minister. I cannot put into language, without seeming to overdo it, my admiration for the kind of work the minister has done during the last year; nor can I convey to the government all the appreciation it would be fitting to express. By reason of what it has done for the Indians, on paper at least, and by reason of the attitude I find in most of its members, I believe the Liberal party deserves high commendation. I think it stands unique in the history of Canada in its manner of treating our Indians.

With these few words, which I utter sincerely and from my heart, I shall conclude. I wish the minister greater and greater success and greater and greater vision. I wish the men of his department also greater vision; and I hope they will have a minister of finance before long who will be able to make the financial system reflect the physical realities of Canada.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

On the order for private bills:

Mr. J. W. Welbourn (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, if I have the unanimous consent of the house I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore), that Bill No. 269, an act to incorporate Independent Pipe Line Company—letter D-8 of the Senate—be dealt with as the first order of business at this time.

My reason for making this request on behalf of a Canadian oil-producing group who desire to build an oil pipe line over an all-Canadian route from the Edmonton area to Vancouver, is that all engineering and other preliminary work in connection with this proposal has been completed and the sponsors of this bill would appreciate having an early opportunity to appear before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman unanimous consent?

Mr. W. A. Robinson (Simcoe East): If I may be permitted to do so, I should like to say a few words in connection with the motion of the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Welbourn). I should like to draw Your Honour's attention to the present condition of the order paper, especially with regard to private bills. At the present time there appear on the order paper as items Nos. 30 to 91 a number of divorce bills. Following those divorce bills, as item No. 92, appears a bill to incorporate Border Pipeline Corporation, sponsored by myself. Item No. 93 is a bill with respect to the British Columbia Telephone Company, sponsored by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite). Item No. 94 is a bill sponsored by the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Ross). There then follow a number of divorce bills, and then items Nos. 162, 163 and 164 which are bills other than divorce bills.

Last week we spent two evenings—Tuesday evening and Friday evening—on a discussion on second reading; and I think in that time we disposed of only five divorce bills. At this rate of progress, it is extremely doubtful whether the other private bills which I have mentioned would even be heard in the course of this session, although most of those bills appeared on the order paper before the divorce bills which are now at the top of the order paper.

I want to make it quite clear that, as far as I am concerned, I do not withhold unanimous consent requested by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson. At the same time, however, I feel that the house might be disposed to give some consideration to the plight of these other bills that I have mentioned. If I might make a suggestion, I think that the hon. member might enlarge his motion, to have his bill appear at the head of the order paper and to have those private bills other than divorce bills move up ahead of divorce bills, from the position they at present occupy on the order paper.

It would appear that in this session there is going to be some substantial discussion with regard to the divorce bills. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated that such a discussion might well take place. I should like to say here and now that I feel that that is the sole interest of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and that he is not in any way attempting to delay or to hinder in any way the consideration of the bill which I am sponsoring or those which are sponsored by any of the other hon. members to whom I have referred. But in view of the situation with which we are undoubtedly confronted, I feel that the house might wish to give some consideration to the plight of these private bills I have just mentioned.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am concerned with regard to the hundred and thirty divorce bills that are now before the house. I think there is nothing more vital than the need for dealing with these bills here and now; and I shall have to object to giving unanimous consent for any change in the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Under the rules, unless there is unanimous consent, we shall have to follow the order set forth in the order paper. I will not make the ruling immediately, but I am sure that unless there is unanimous consent I cannot put the motion which has been made by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Welbourn). I understand that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) wishes to speak.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I appeal for unanimous consent for the motion that has been introduced. I have no interest in that particular motion, but I am the sponsor of a bill which appears as item No. 162 on this order paper. It is a bill that will be completely non-controversial. I should think it would take a matter of only a moment or two for the house to deal with it; it is for the incorporation of a religious organization. If the pattern followed last week in the two hours devoted to the discussion of private bills is pursued this week and succeeding weeks, it means that bills such as the one I am sponsoring will not be reached during this present session. I think that would be a deplorable result.

To facilitate dealing with urgent business, I would urge that the house might well give effect to the request made by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Welbourn) for unanimous consent to proceed with his bill, and then permit bills like the one I am sponsoring, which are not controversial in any way and are brief, to be proceeded with similarly by unanimous consent.

Mr. Croll: Mr. Speaker, I am sponsoring Bill No. 268, which appears as item No. 163 on the order paper. It is just as important as the bill being sponsored by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). But I am prepared to wait. There is no problem here at all. All we need to do is to pass these divorce bills. Then we can get on with our business. I am prepared to wait until these divorce bills are dealt with.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. Accordingly, I cannot put the motion which has been proposed by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Welbourn).

EMILY RITA ROWLANDS SIMPSON

The house in committee on Bill No. 111, for the relief of Emily Rita Rowlands Simpson—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Gagnon: I wish to say that I will vote against this bill. No one has the right to ask for a divorce. There are cases in which an annulment—

The Chairman: Order. Before proceeding with this debate I would ask all hon. members to proceed in accordance with standing order 58. Paragraph 2 says:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Therefore I shall ask all hon. members to confine their remarks to each particular clause of each particular bill.

Mr. Gagnon: No one has the right to ask for a divorce. There are cases in which a marriage annulment can be allowed by the religious and civil authorities of my province; but the Quebec law states very clearly that marriage is indissoluble. I will not undertake to give the reasons justifying such legislation, but I can say it is in our statutes to stay forever. The speeches of my C.C.F. friends the last time this matter was before the committee will not make us change our minds in that regard. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said that whether or not we agree with the principle underlying divorce—

The Chairman: Order. The principle of the bill may be discussed on second reading, but in committee hon. members must confine their remarks to the particular clause under discussion. We are on clause 1 of this bill.

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Chairman, I am quoting what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said when this bill was discussed last Friday. I said that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said last Friday that whether or not we agreed with the principle underlying divorce was an immaterial point. By showing so little interest in a social problem which involves such disastrous consequences he reveals, I believe—

Mr. Coldwell: On a question of privilege, I followed that statement by saying that we had divorce now. By leaving out those words the hon. member is changing the meaning of what I said. We have it now. It is immaterial whether we believe in it or not, we have it with us.

Mr. Gagnon: I quoted exactly what the hon. member said.

The Chairman: Order. We are considering clause 1 of Bill 111. I will read the clause:

> The said marriage between Emily Rita Rowlands and James Arthur Simpson, her husband, is hereby dissolved, and shall be henceforth null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

That is what we are discussing.

Mr. Gagnon: In this case, as in every similar case, it is the fate of the family which is at stake, and I cannot be the accomplice of the instrument of its destruction. Divorce strikes at the very root of family life. It is the victory of selfishness over sacrifice. In serving the people by helping them to find stability and security in the home we are directly serving the nation. That is the reason I ask for the rejection of this bill.

IVY LUCAS LEVITT

The house in committee on Bill No. 112, for the relief of Ivy Lucas Levitt—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words with respect to clause 1 of this bill. This is a case which I feel deserves the support of this house, and I for one not only intend to vote for this bill, but I feel that all hon. members should vote for it.

I shall take just a moment to indicate in brief the circumstances. This is a case of a woman living in England—she is still there. A Canadian soldier went overseas during world war II and married her. They lived together while they were both in England, and they had one child, a son. After the end of the war the soldier appears to have deserted his English wife and returned to Canada. For a number of years she did not hear from him or about him in any way. Later she learned that he was back in Montreal and had married again.

Some time after this second so-called marriage the second wife discovered that her husband was already married to a lady in England, and so she obtained an annulment of her marriage in a Quebec court. That annulment was granted on December 19, 1946. When the lady in England learned of the situation she took steps to get a divorce from her Canadian husband. The woman who became the so-called second wife appeared as the chief witness for the deserted wife. She appeared at the Senate and gave evidence that she, not knowing that this man had been previously married, went through a form of marriage with him, and subsequently lived with him. On the basis of that evidence the Senate committee had no hesitation in approving of this divorce.

This is one of those human tragedies about which we all feel very sad. It is unfortunate that nothing can be done to force this man to contribute to the support of his and his wife's child in England, but surely the least we can do for this English girl is to see to it that she gets this divorce. This is one case where I felt I should not mention any of the names involved. I do call upon the house to support this bill.

Mr. Hansell: I should like to say just a word or two about this bill. I support the views of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in suggesting that this house should pass this bill. However, there are one or two things I should like to say about it. The point I would like to make now I do not want to be regarded as any reflection upon the committee of the other place that heard this evidence.

I notice that the acting chairman was Senator Fogo. I understand that he is rather an outstanding barrister, and perhaps—

An hon. Member: I would not say that.

Mr. Hansell: I do not know. There may be other opinions. That is my understanding. Perhaps I will have to take his authority for it. But there is one place in the evidence in which the marriage record—that is the second marriage record—is presented, and the acting chairman says: "It is not a record of marriage, because it was not a marriage at all, but a form of marriage which she went through."

I am one member in the house who has performed a good many marriage ceremonies; and I have never performed one yet, and had it registered, where I did not feel pretty certain that the marriage, as performed, was more than a form of marriage. It may be a technical point, but I would point out, as was pointed out in the evidence, that this certificate of marriage was also registered in the superior court, district of Montreal. If anyone wished to apply to the superior court for an abstract of that certificate, he would have proof enough that this woman was married to the man, even though he had no right to marry a second time.

During the first world war I was called up under a certain category for military service. It happened that I was married, and should not have been called up in the first category. When I saw the authorities I told them I was quite prepared to go into the services at the proper time. However they wanted proof of my marriage, and so I submitted to them—

The Chairman: Order. It seems to me the hon. member is not directing his remarks to the first section of the bill.

Mr. Hansell: I realize that the evidence to which I am referring is not a record of my marriage. I was only illustrating that the military authorities at that time would not accept the marriage certificate as proof of marriage.

What happened? I had to obtain an abstract of the registration of marriage, and that abstract was what proved to the satisfaction of the military authorities that I was married.

The second marriage of the bigamist in this instance was registered with the superior court, district of Montreal. I say that it was something more than a simple form of marriage. Another point I would make is that this woman was separated from the man when she realized he had been married before, and was still married. She got a separation, and there was produced in evidence a document issued by the superior court annulling that marriage. Therefore I say this divorce is based upon a recognition that adultery had been committed.

I should like to ask the sponsor of the bill if any steps were taken whatsoever to charge the person named in the bill with bigamy, and to punish him for it?

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, I must reiterate what I said earlier, that the evidence is before every member, and has been mailed to every member. As a rule, bills are distributed in a hit or miss fashion. In respect of divorce bills however the distribution is made in a very orderly manner. I can only repeat that all the evidence is before every member, and he may read it for himself.

Section 2 agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. Graydon: A member is up and wants to speak.

(Translation):

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to declare myself emphatically and unalterably opposed to the passing of any divorce bill. I do not intend to labour the point. The divorce question has been amply threshed out in the house.

Nevertheless, I wish to say that no man-made law will ever destroy the indissolubility of the sacrament of marriage, which we consider absolutely inviolable.

I was anxious to make this profession of faith because I feel that I am in duty bound to object to the passing of these bills, on behalf of my constituents and even of the citizens of my province. I wanted to let it be known that I shall vote against any and all divorce bills introduced in this house.

MARGUERITE MARIE RITA FOURNIER COOK

The house in committee on Bill No. 113, for the relief of Marguerite Marie Rita Fournier Cook—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, this is another case which it seems to me should have been dealt with by a court. However, as the matter stands it is before us and I think hon. members should be made aware of the particulars of the case. As the sponsor has pointed out, every member receives copies of the evidence; but it appears they do not read it.

As a matter of fact I have read more of them in the last few days than I read in all the years I have been here. My only reason for doing so is that if parliament has decided we are going to deal with cases like this, then we should deal with them in a responsible way, and I for one will do my part.

This is the case of a young woman by the name of Fournier who married a man named Cook. They had one child. Mrs. Cook is now living in Toronto, and Mr. Cook is living in Hull. According to his own evidence he is living there with an unmarried woman by the name of Miss Fleming. In his evidence before the Senate committee Mr. Cook admits his relations not only with Miss Fleming but with other women.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Furthermore, when the respondent, Mr. Cook, was before the Senate committee it appeared he had no sense of shame whatever, either for his behaviour or for the irresponsible way in which he was treating his wife and child.

I shall read from the evidence only those questions and answers which relate to the question of support of the child. I am refraining from reading some of the other questions and answers in the evidence because, while they are public property, I do not like to put such evidence upon the pages of Hansard. The following questions and answers are pertinent to the point I have mentioned.

By the Acting Chairman:

Q. In the period that you have been living apart from your wife, have you supported the child?

A. No, sir, I have not.

Q. Or Mrs. Cook?

A. No, sir.

Q. Not at all?

A. Not at all.

I find nothing in the evidence to indicate any attempt on the part of the Senate—I realize their helplessness; indeed I emphasize it—to do anything to get this man Cook to face up to his financial responsibility in connection with the support of his child. This story is a very sordid one. I feel, as I said the other night with respect to another case, that this woman who lives in Toronto and is looking after her child has the right to be freed from her marriage to this man. But it seems to me that parliament should know what it is doing and we should concern ourselves with finding a better way to deal with cases like this, particularly when the interests of a child are concerned.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that no one wishes to interfere with the rights involved in a case of this sort, or in a case like the one we discussed a few minutes ago. What I want to emphasize is that we are going to pass these bills. In the last two bills there were children involved. Neither the other place nor this place has any say in having the man in each of these cases made responsible for his own child.

If this was before a court I know that under the law that exists in some other places, including the United Kingdom—some of our provinces follow United Kingdom procedure—the court would order that some payment must be made by the father for the support of the child. We punish the innocent woman in cases like this because there is no proper court which could deal with these problems adequately and in a humane and proper manner. A few minutes ago an hon. member objected to divorce, but the fact is that we have divorce now. We cannot say that there is no divorce in the province of Quebec or the province of Newfoundland because these bills are before us.

Let us do this in a manner that will protect innocent parties. It should be done by proper judicial proceedings and not in the manner adopted by parliament at the present time. Admittedly the man in this case is a bigamist but there is no evidence that he has been dealt with according to the laws of our land. I am persuaded that if the case had come before a court some instructions would have been given and the man would have been dealt with. We are not denying redress to people who need redress, but the fact is that we have neither the time nor the opportunity to go into these cases. There are 130, 140 or 150 before us, with more coming in every day.

I am not criticizing the other place for the manner in which they have dealt with this bill. I think the hon. gentlemen in the other place do the best they can under difficult and awkward circumstances. But surely the time has come when this parliament should remove these matters from its jurisdiction and have them properly and adequately dealt with. That is the point we are trying to get across to this committee, to this parliament and to this country.

Mr. Croll: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has stated that his purpose is to draw attention to the manner in which these bills are handled. Speaking the other night the hon. member for Vancouver East said that there was no other way we could do it except as it was being done at the present time. I rather agree with him and I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar who says that the purpose is to protect innocent children. But innocent people are being hurt by virtue of what we are doing tonight in discussing these bills in the way we are. Those people are entitled to more consideration than they are getting. Here is the fallacy of the argument presented by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The only possible thing that we can do, the only authority that we have—

Mr. Robinson: I rise to a point of order. we are on a section of the bill and the hon. member is entering into a general discussion. If we are going to consider these bills one by one then I ask Your Honour to direct that the discussion be relevant to the section before us.

The Chairman: The point of order is well taken.

Mr. Croll: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said that he wanted a court to deal with this matter, and that is pertinent to the bill. The only court that we could clothe with jurisdiction would be the exchequer court.

Mr. Robinson: I rise again to a point of order. We should discuss the section of the bill which is before us.

Mr. Croll: I am merely following the example set by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and he never gave me a wrong steer before. If he was right, then I am right, and I agree that he was right in following that course.

The Chairman: I ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to section 1.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Important as these cases may be, we are Christian people and we are living in a Christian country.

The Chairman: Order. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the particular section of the bill.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I bow to your ruling and I say that—

The Chairman: I think the hon. member for Spadina still has the floor.

Mr. Croll: When the hon. member for Simcoe East rose to object to my remarks I was indicating that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had thrown out what I thought was a proper suggestion, and I felt it only right that it should be amplified and explained. This section reads:

> The said marriage between Marguerite Marie Rita Fournier and Peter Frederick Cook, her husband, is hereby dissolved, and shall be henceforth null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

Some body clothed with authority to deal with the matter of marriage has come to a conclusion and I submit that it is pertinent for me to discuss some other body that we might create to deal with the matter of marriage. That is all I am doing. The suggestion was made that a court should deal with this matter rather than the Senate.

The Chairman: The hon. member is discussing procedure in general.

Mr. Croll: No, no. I am not discussing procedure in general. I am saying that a court may be delegated to perform this duty, and that the exchequer court, a specific court, should be delegated to discharge this particular duty. All I want to say is, if it is the desire of the house to deal with the matter in that fashion, then all right. On two other occasions the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre introduced a bill. The first time it was talked out and the last time it was defeated on division. He is a very capable authority on procedure and he knows full well how this can be brought about. All we require to do is to have the Senate pass the necessary legislation setting up the exchequer court—

The Chairman: Order. I think the remarks of the hon. member are out of order.

Mr. Croll: I am in favour of passing the bill, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The world was recently shocked by the announcement of a divorce concerning Aly Khan.

The Chairman: Order. I would point out to the hon. member that there is nothing concerning Aly Khan before the committee.

Mr. Knight: If I may, I should like to take the discussion back for a moment to the question of the bill now before us. I think the hon. member for Spadina was getting away from clauses of the bill. I should like to speak to the bill and I should like to ask a question of our legal friends or perhaps of the sponsor. I am glad that the house has apparently decided to meet its responsibility to discuss these measures because I am tired of giving blank cheques so far as the passing of these bills is concerned. I should like to return to the question of the custody of children. I know nothing about law, and I should like to ask the sponsor if the court of the other place has any jurisdiction in the matter of the care of children or if it deliberately ignores such responsibility. I want to ask him first if it has any responsibility. If he can assure me that it has none, then of course I would not say that it is ignoring its responsibility because there would not be any. Can the sponsor answer that question? Then I should like to continue for another minute or two.

Mr. Winkler: I can give the hon. member no assurance.

Mr. Knight: The reason I asked the question was that I should like to refer to page 8 of the evidence concerning Bill 113. It has to do with the custody of the child in question. If the court of the other place has no jurisdiction over the custody and care of children, then I should like to know what court has. I should also like to know whether at a later date the husband, presumably the guilty party, would be able to use the processes of the courts to claim this child from the mother who has custody over a period of years. Questions were asked of the mother presumably by the lawyer in the case, and the part I should like to read is as follows:

Q. Who has the child?
A. I have, and I have supported him continually.
Q. You have supported that child continually and you are asking for the custody of that child?
A. Yes.

You will notice that the mother said that she was asking for the custody of the child. Then the evidence continues as follows:

Q. And he is now eight?
A. Nine years of age.
The Acting Chairman: She is not asking here for custody.

It is on the basis of that little interchange that I should like to know what is the responsibility of the divorce committee of the other place with respect to the question of the custody of children. Can the wronged person have any assurance when he or she appears before the other place that some arrangement is going to be made for the children, or is it a fact, as some hon. member mentioned the other night, that not only do these cases have to come before a committee of the Senate but other proceedings have to be instituted in order that there may be a decision with respect to who shall have the custody of the children? This is a point that I should like to have cleared up. Perhaps some of my learned and honourable friends would speak on it so that we may have the information if, as the sponsor says, he does not know.

Mr. Hansell: I should like to ask a question of the sponsor of the bill because I am a little confused. I find that the party in this case who is asking for relief lived in Toronto previous to her marriage, was married in Toronto, and since leaving her husband in 1948 has lived in Toronto. I should like to know why this woman who lived in Toronto, was married in Toronto, and now lives in Toronto, has to come to this place for a divorce.

Mr. Winkler: I have no information.

PAUL EMILE PIUZE

The house in committee on Bill No. 114, for the relief of Paul Emile Piuze—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, some of the hon. members are suggesting that I give more of the story this time, but this is a particularly sordid case and I do not intend to place upon the records of this house some of the evidence contained within these pages. I would point out that in this case both of the parties are residents of the province of Quebec, and I may say that there are children of the marriage. In this case it is the woman who has run out on her husband, and I use those words advisedly, having read the evidence. As a matter of fact this case, like the last two cases that we have had before us, is one in which no detectives have been called as witnesses.

The evidence seems quite clear that this woman has not only deserted her husband but has been committing adultery with various other persons. Yet I find that the husband, out of earnings of $75 a week, is still contributing $40 to $45 a week to his wife. Of course the main reason why he is doing that is to enable her to support the children. Apparently they are still in her custody, or at least they were at the time this case was heard before the Senate. He did say he was going to try to get the children at some future time. In view of the carryings-on of the woman in this case I certainly think it would be better for the children to be with their father rather than their mother, though in saying that I am aware of the very human tragedy involved in this case. I say it is very sad, and I certainly feel sorry for the man who reached the point where he had no alternative but to apply for this divorce.

Mr. Croll: Would the hon. gentleman answer a question?

Mr. Knowles: If I can.

Mr. Croll: I think you can. You brought up the question of children. Do you know of any method by which we could provide for the custody and control of children in any court the dominion government might establish?

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member's question is well put, if I can answer it without getting out of order.

The Chairman: In my opinion that matter is not at issue and the question is out of order.

Mr. Knowles: Even though the question may be difficult to answer satisfactorily I submit that it is in order, because in the evidence in this case there is reference to the children. The fact of the matter is that the only court I could suggest in a case such as is dealt with in Bill No. 114 is the Exchequer Court of Canada. That being a federal court it could not exercise jurisdiction as far as children were concerned; that matter would still have to be dealt with by the courts of one of the provinces. It seems to me, however, that if we get this matter of divorce dealt with in a court we are making a step in the direction of having the whole matter dealt with by a proper court on a legal basis. I know there are times when a party before the Senate will agree to support the children, but such an agreement is not always carried out. As a matter of fact I had a letter today concerning a case in which an agreement was made before the Senate, but once the man got away he refused to sign any such agreement. In other words the Senate has no power to bind or obligate the parties with respect to children. I recognize the pertinence of the question asked by the hon. member for Spadina, but I submit that if the divorce itself were being dealt with in a court it would make possible a more proper consideration of this question by another court later.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I ask the religious background in this case?

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I ask that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre give us the religious background of the case to which he has been referring.

Mr. Knowles: I know the background.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The religious background.

Mr. Knowles: I am not the sponsor of the bill; ask the hon. member for Lisgar. It is his bill.

Mr. Hansell: There is just another point or two I would like to bring out in respect to this particular case. In speaking about another case the other evening the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said there was a very strong suspicion of collusion. I suggest that this is a similar case, and I want to point out why I think so. When the man in this case found that his wife's behaviour was something that he could not countenance he refused to live with her. That was in January, 1949; but he continued to live in the same house, under the same roof. He lived with her in that way for a year and one month, during which time he had some trouble even to the extent of accompanying her to a hospital where she was examined because, the evidence states, she was afraid she had some social disease. He talked with her then and continued to live in the same house until eventually, according to the evidence, the woman went off with three men at the same time. Then he took proceedings.

During that time, and right up to the time he appeared before the Senate committee, he had supported her to the extent of $40 or $45 a week out of his earnings of about $75 a week. I would add that those who gave evidence against this woman were two of the men who accompanied her. I claim that such conditions would indicate that between this man and his wife there was either collusion or connivance; there is some technical difference between those words which I have not been able to fathom. There was collusion here. I am not suggesting that there may not be cause for divorce, but I do suggest that in many of these cases it might be as well for the committee to pay a little more attention to whether or not there is any suspicion of collusion.

Section 2 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Mr. Gagnon: I am asking for a recorded vote.

The Chairman: On what; on the bill?

Mr. Gagnon: Yes.

Some hon. Members: Nine o'clock.

The Chairman: Shall I report progress on this bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

THIRD READINGS

Mr. Winkler moved third reading of the following bills:

Bill No. 111, for the relief of Emily Rita Rowlands Simpson.

Bill No. 112, for the relief of Ivy Lucas Levitt.

Bill No. 113, for the relief of Marguerite Marie Rita Fournier Cook.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, and bills read the third time.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

SPECIAL FORCE VETERANS

PROVISION FOR EXTENSION OF BENEFITS TO MEMBERS OF SPECIAL FORCES

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 287, to make certain rights, privileges and benefits applicable to persons serving in that part of the armed forces of Canada designated as the special force and to certain other members of the Canadian forces.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Lapointe: I would move that the bill be referred to the special committee on veterans affairs.

Motion agreed to.

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CHILDREN OF PENSIONED WIDOWS, BURIAL GRANTS, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 288, to amend the Pension Act and change the title thereof.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I should like to say a few words on this amendment to the Pension Act. Under this amendment it is proposed, among other things, to provide that widows of members of the forces with children will be able to be paid on the basis of schedule B for orphans; in other words, that their pension for their children will be doubled. Under schedule B the payment for the first child is $228; for the second child, $180 and for each subsequent child, $144. On the basis under which they are being paid now, that of the orphaned child, there will be $456 for the first child, $360 for the second child and $288 for the third child. That is doubling the amount which will be payable under that clause.

The point that I want to raise with the minister is this. I do not see anything in the bill which gives any increase to an orphaned child. There are numbers of children who are orphans of members of the forces and they are receiving, according to the schedule which I have just read, $38 a month in the case of one orphan or $68 where there are two. I do not see anywhere anything to indicate that this payment is being increased. It seems to me that if we are doubling the amount that is payable to a dependent child, certainly we should be doing something with respect to the orphaned child. I would ask the minister to comment on that feature and tell us just why we should be doubling the one without giving any increase to the other, as I read the act.

The other matter that I wish to comment on is that of education for children of the veterans. Under this act we are proposing to continue the payment up to twenty-one years of age where the child is able to absorb the education, is passed as being able to do so, and requires further education. That is all to the good. But again I say that in the case of orphaned children we are doing nothing under these amendments to the act, as I read them. If I am mistaken in this, I hope the minister or his parliamentary assistant will correct me.

It seems to me that we in Canada owe a duty to these orphans of the men in our forces. It seems to me that we owe these orphans an opportunity to receive as good an education as they can absorb or are capable of attaining. If their fathers had returned to Canada we would have provided, under the veterans charter, for their training in specialized trades or they could have had up to four or five years in university. Where there are orphaned children, it seems to me that we should be prepared to give them an opportunity equal to that which would have been available to their fathers had they returned to this country. I see nothing in this act which provides for that.

I think it is a disgrace in this country if we are going to leave orphaned children of members of our forces in the position that that they will not have every opportunity of obtaining the best education that it is possible for them to have. I do not see any provision made for that under the act. I should like the minister to comment on those two matters before we give second reading to the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Wright: I was just asking the minister a question.

An hon. Member: We are not in committee.

Mr. Speaker: If there are questions to be asked, I would suggest that the minister answer them when he is replying and closing the debate. Has the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) completed his remarks?

Mr. Wright: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Then I would call on the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough).

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all sure whether the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) had reference to orphan children who are now in the care of grandparents. But if he did not have reference to that particular type of case I would ask the minister, when he is considering the matters referred to him by the hon. member for Melfort, to consider also those children who have been orphaned, whose grandparents are now looking after them and who have been receiving a pension. I have had a number of inquiries from people in these circumstances who have found the load increasingly heavy and have wondered whether or not they come under the provisions of this act.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Lapointe: In commenting on the remarks made by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), I should like to point out that heretofore the rates of pension awarded to orphaned children have been double those of the pension awarded to children of disabled pensioners or widows. The rate paid up to now to the children of disability pensioners and widows, as the hon. member knows, was $19 a month for the first child, $15 for the second and $12 for each subsequent child. At the same time the law provides that in the case of orphans being brought up by their grandparents—and I believe this would deal with the case just mentioned by the hon. member for Hamilton West—the grandparents are acting as guardians, and those orphans are paid the doubled rate. It is $38 a month for the first child, $30 for the second and $24 for each subsequent child.

What is behind the amendment which we are introducing this year is this: It was brought to our attention that in many cases young widows with children found themselves in great difficulty because they could not supplement their pension income by outside work and that, although they were the mothers and guardians of the children, they were getting just the ordinary rate. In order to help out these widows we are this year amending the act to give to the children of these widows the same higher rates which had been paid in the case of orphans. That is the purpose behind the present amendment.

Mr. Wright: There is no increase in the orphans' rate at all?

Mr. Lapointe: No.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee on veterans affairs.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VETERANS BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL LOANS ACT—EXTENSION OF APPLICATION, ETC.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 286, to amend the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee on veterans affairs.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION—PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO BAND FUNDS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 79, respecting Indians—Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce)—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to ask the minister a question in regard to Indians who have been off the reserve for some time. I understand from a letter that I received from Dr. Moore, director of Indian health services, that they are not entitled to medical services. Why should they not receive medical services? One man was mentioned who is receiving the old age pension of $25 a month, which is allowed under the act. But he has no money to look after himself so far as medical services are concerned. He cannot even buy medicine. He finds it hard enough to buy food for himself.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Perhaps we can discuss that better on the medical services section. I do not think I know too much about it. It is under national health and welfare, but I do know they have a regulation as to a time limit beyond which, if an Indian is off a reserve, he does not normally receive the service. If the hon. member would allow his questions to stand I will answer them on one of these sections, when we come to it.

Mr. Fraser: Yes. I have a letter here which says that if they are off the reserve for 18 months or longer they cannot get medical services. There should be a change there. I do not think it is fair.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Minister to administer act.

Mr. Fraser: Under which section do the medical services come?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): It is section 72 or 73.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Eskimos.

Mr. Charlton: I objected to this clause on the second reading of the bill, and although it has been amended in the committee all the objectionable features of the section have not been removed. There are many other things that the minister or the governor in council can do by proclamation that would be detrimental to the Indians all across Canada. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops, that subsection 2 of section 4 be amended by inserting after the word "may" in line 18 the following:

With the consent of the Indians or band concerned.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We had a vote on this in the special committee, and there is no change in the position of the government with respect to this section. It is designed to assist the administration of the Indian Act, and to assist in removing those restrictions in the Indian Act from an Indian or a band from time to time, as circumstances may require. It is action taken by the governor in council, which would be on recommendation of course of the minister, and we do not feel that it is necessary to have the consent of the bands in all cases.

Mr. Noseworthy: I should like to support the amendment. As a member of the committee may I say the fact that a majority of that committee favoured the government's position does not mean very much, except that a majority of the committee were simply following the minister's direction.

As I understand it, the purpose of this bill is to gradually encourage the Indians to become enfranchised and to assume their position as democratic citizens in Canada. One of the ways in which this can be achieved is by giving them such responsibility as they are capable of discharging.

One of the criticisms I have had is that in more than 70 clauses of the bill the responsibility rests upon the minister or the governor in council without consultation with the bands or with any of the Indian representatives. If we are aiming to educate these people, to teach them to assume responsibility, we must give them some responsibility and not place these matters entirely in the hands of the minister or the governor in council, without even consulting with the band or with the people concerned.

In this particular instance it would seem to me that it would be quite logical to consult the band in the case of people who have probably spent their lifetime on the reserve. I feel they should not be removed at the whim of the minister or the department, and particularly if there was opposition to that on the part of the band. For these reasons I would support the amendment.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, having seconded the proposed amendment, I should like to say a word in support of it. Section 4 as at present worded gives to the governor in council authority to declare by proclamation that this act or any portion thereof, except sections 37 to 41—and only five sections are excepted—shall not apply to any Indian, or any group or band of Indians. As I recall, sections 37 to 41 are those dealing with the surrender of lands. All matters outside the scope of those five sections can be dealt with by the governor in council by proclamation, if section 4 in its present form is accepted.

This means that the very matter of the status of an Indian can be dealt with by proclamation, without the consent of the Indian. The very existence of a band, their status as a band of Indians, and their continuance or otherwise as a band of Indians can be dealt with by the governor in council by proclamation, without consent of the band.

We have heard in committee, and in the house before the bill went to committee, that one of the efforts being made—and a very praiseworthy one indeed—is to achieve equality of status for the Indians; and not only to put it into legislative form but to convince the Indians that that is our intention. Indeed it is suggested that, by our example, and through the means of this legislation, we should encourage the Indians to assume equality of status with us, so that eventually they might graduate into full citizenship and absolute equality with the white man.

Surely it goes without saying that no municipality in Canada would give consent to having its status interfered with or changed by proclamation of the governor in council, without the consent of the municipality; and I am sure the House of Commons would not consent to any interference with its status on that basis. I very much doubt if the house would consent to authorizing the governor in council to make a proclamation changing the status of a white individual, without his consent. In most cases, so far as white people are concerned, before any change in status can be brought about, and before any penalties for breach of legislation can be imposed, or anything of that sort, legislation which must receive the sanction of parliament is required.

Here, however, it is not legislation; it is a proclamation of the governor in council. In view of the fact that there are so many administrative matters which must also be dealt with under this statute, I think it is quite acceptable to have the matter dealt with by the governor in council, and not to require legislation before anything can be done; but if we are going to place that tremendous power in the hands of council, namely the power of changing the status of individuals, groups or bands of Indians, then surely we must put in a safeguard that the change must be made with the consent of the Indian or band concerned. That is the effect of the amendment.

It does not make it impossible to make these proclamations. The section, if amended as suggested, would read that the governor in council may, with the consent of the Indian or band concerned, by proclamation declare that this act or any portion thereof, except sections 37 to 41, shall not apply to any Indians or any group or band of Indians, and so on. So it does not take away any of the ultimate power of the governor in council, nor does it in any way abridge the things that may be done by proclamation of the governor in council.

All it does is to require that before these things which affect the very status of Indians, whom we say we are trying to place on a basis of equality, can be done, this consent by all concerned must be obtained. I appeal to hon. members who, I am sure, are desirous of creating in the Indians a sense of equality, to give to the Indians some control or some say in their own affairs, and to require that their consent must be obtained before any change in their status can be brought about by proclamation by the governor in council.

Mr. Blackmore: This is one of the sections to which I referred in a general way when I spoke before six o'clock, and pointed out that in the Indian Act there were powers which, if used by an administration genuinely interested in the welfare of the Indian, could be instruments of benefit, but which, if they were used by an administration aiming to hurt the Indians, could become instruments of intimidation.

In effect, as I understand it, this section means that the department could excommunicate a band of Indians—and I use that word, not in its religious sense, but as it would be envisaged in connection with the operation of the act. Consequently if Indians, let us say on the Blood Indian reserve, which I have the honour to represent, became self-assertive, or endeavoured to insist upon their rights in certain respects, as time goes on officials could say, "You boys had better be good, or we will bring section 4 on your heads." That is precisely the possibility involved in this section, as I understand it.

I believe it was pointed out in committee and, as I recall, the minister, as well as officials in his department, assured us that a section almost identical with this one had been in the act from the earliest time. However the Indians had never known it was there and consequently were not greatly concerned. It was said that all through the years, since it was first put into the act, it has never been used as an instrument of intimidation. Perhaps that is correct; but it is no proof that at some time it might not be used as an instrument of intimidation. We know there are certain Indians who are quite outspoken. For instance the Six Nations are outspoken, and in that they are not doing anything more than their forefathers told them to do, through traditions passed down to them through the years.

If the Indians are to become the self-reliant, courageous and outspoken people we hope they will become, and if they are to enjoy the freedoms we enjoy, then certainly they should not be put in a position where they can be intimidated through a section of this kind.

I think I have expressed clearly the way this appeals to the Indians. I believe it will be found that the Six Nations Indians are very much afraid that this section will be used in exactly the way I have indicated. As I said in committee, the department would not lose any material advantage by accepting the amendment which has been suggested. I believe if they did lose any flexibility of action in the administration of the act, through the inclusion of those words, they would gain in confidence and good will of the Indians to an even greater extent.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word, not so much as to the merits of the amendment, because others are more competent to do that, but rather to point out that we did have a debate on this subject before it went to committee some weeks ago. At that time I believe it was stressed by the minister, and I am sure in perfect sincerity, that what we were wishing to do, among other things, was to raise the status of these fellow citizens many of whom, incidentally, had served their country so well in wartime, and who were therefore entitled to consideration of their status.

The bill went to a committee and it has now come back to us here. Many of us were not members of that committee. Reasons which seem to me to be most convincing have been given from this side for this amendment. If I remember correctly, the minister said that when the bill was before the committee this point had been raised and the committee had voted against it; that that was the government's view and they had not changed it. That seems to me to be an odd state of affairs. There are many on both sides of the house who have not had the benefit of hearing the discussion before the committee and surely we are not going to be left in a position where the matter is going to be voted on just because there is a majority without anyone on the government side undertaking to answer the arguments which have been made.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I regret that I did not make it clear in my explanation that I had discussed this particular section fully on second reading and gave them all the reasons which I believe I could give now as to why this section should remain in the bill. This section has been in the act since 1880, and, as the hon. member for Lethbridge has said, it did not cause concern to the Indians until the past few months when the matter was raised by some hon. members opposite.

The section is designed to aid in the flexible administration of Indian affairs so that the Indians may have the benefit of being removed from some of the restrictions in the act. If you did not have a section of this kind you would not be able to relieve the Indians from some of the restrictions unless the act was brought back to the house and it was done by way of amendment so that a particular section would not apply to a particular band. This is a salutary provision in the interest of the Indian and will be used for that purpose.

Mr. Fulton: I accept the answer of the minister which I believe is given in absolute sincerity, that this section is intended to be used for the benefit of the Indian. The minister's answer seemed to be based on the assumption that we were moving to strike this section from the act. No such thing has been suggested. It is admitted that there must be flexibility. I stated specifically that we were not trying to strike out this section because then you would have to have new legislation each time you wanted to make some change. I admitted specifically that it was probably necessary for administrative flexibility to do many of the things that are contemplated to be done by proclamation of the governor in council.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

The point of the amendment is not to strike out this section so as to make it necessary to have legislation to bring about any change. The point of the amendment is merely to require the consent of the band or the Indians affected before a proclamation is issued. The minister's answer has not dealt with that point at all. His answer has dealt with a situation based on the assumption that we are attempting to remove the section from the act, which of course is not so. We are merely attempting to ensure that the people whose welfare will be affected, whose status is going to be changed by the proclamations which are contemplated, must first give their consent.

Mr. Noseworthy: Will the minister state how in his opinion the adoption of this amendment will interfere with the carrying out of the objectives of this bill?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, that is a very simple matter to deal with. As the committee knows, as the house knows from the discussion on second reading, and as the special committee knows, the Indians have not been unanimous on many sections of this bill nor are they unanimous on how the Indian affairs branch should administer particular matters. Everyone here knows that the opinion of a band council of this year may not be the opinion of a band council next year. If you take the sense of a band at any given moment it may not be the sense that would be shown the following day.

Mr. Noseworthy: That is true of the Canadian electors.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Quite so. As the committee knows, in dealing with band affairs and Indian affairs a final decision must be made by someone as to what is in the interests of the Indians under all the circumstances. The power to make that decision is vested in parliament, and by the Indian Act is vested partially in the minister and partially in the governor in council. The final decision in these matters must rest in those hands rather than, in some cases, in the hands of the band council or of the individual Indian.

In some cases the sections give authority to the minister to do certain things with the consent of the band council. In other cases he may do certain things without the consent of the band council. I cannot recall a case, except in the surrender clauses, where the consent of the band is necessary. But certain privileges are vested in the band council, certain authority is vested in the minister, and certain authority in the governor in council.

If the time should come when a band would be benefited under certain circumstances by the action of the governor in council taken under this section then I think parliament would hold the governor in council responsible if he did not exercise his judgment at that time as to what was in the interests of the band.

I do not want to precipitate a debate on later sections, but I might mention that this is the section which might be used to alter the liquor regulations which are covered by sections 95 to 100. It might very well be in those cases that one would obtain the consent of the band council, but as I have said at any given moment a decision may have to be made in the interests of the band and, since the responsibility for making those decisions is vested here, we shall have to have the right to make them.

Mr. Noseworthy: All the minister has told us is that in the opinion of his department the Indians at no time can be trusted to know what is best for them.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. Noseworthy: The minister has indicated that the minister or the governor in council must under all circumstances decide that they know better than the Indians affected what is in their best interests. How in the world does the minister expect the Indians to become independent and responsible citizens so long as he refuses them the right to decide what is in their best interests under any given circumstances?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The provisions in the bill which give authority to the Indians and to the band council to exercise certain powers are the sections under which the band and the Indian may exercise those powers. If he exercises those and shows discretion in doing so—I know most of them are doing this at the moment—if he continues to learn the practices of democracy, we hope and believe that ultimately he will be not only ready but willing to accept the responsibilities for a much greater portion of self-government. Until that time there must be a division of authority among the minister, the governor in council, the band and the Indian.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think the minister has appreciated the point we have tried to make. The amendment merely seeks to safeguard the welfare of the Indian. Before any proclamation is issued that affects the status or welfare of individual Indians or bands, it is asked that those Indians or bands must be consulted and give their consent. The minister has given an example. He says that section 4, subsection 2, might be used to change the application of the liquor laws by exempting a certain band or group of Indians from the provisions of the bill. If one thing has been obvious in the consultations which members have held with Indians and with bands of Indians, it is that they are greatly concerned lest they should be subjected to wide-open liquor laws. Admittedly that is a question on which opinions vary considerably from band to band. It must surely therefore be a question which could most properly be dealt with in consultation with the band concerned. I understand that some bands feel now that they should be placed on a basis of absolute equality with white citizens. Other bands, as the minister has pointed out in his notes of the conference which he held with the Indians, feel that they should have a midway position, and there are others still where the majority feeling of the band is that they do not want any liquor on their reserves. They do not want their people allowed to buy liquor and they do not want the white man to be allowed to sell liquor to them. It is a case where opinion varies widely.

Surely therefore we should not give to the governor in council blanket authority to change the Indian Act with respect to liquor laws without the requirement that he consult first with the band and make the change only with the band's consent, in effect if the band first requests it, which would of course imply their consent. That is all the amendment seeks to do, not to take away from the governor in council the ultimate power to exempt a band from the specific provision of the bill by proclamation, but merely to ensure that that power is only exercised with the consent of the band concerned. I think the example which the minister himself gave is a most powerful example to reinforce the proposition that the band's consent must be obtained before these proclamations are issued.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I hope the minister has helped other people more than he has helped me because I am still in great difficulty. When the minister began his remarks I thought he was really going to take the position that there was such a vacillation of feeling backwards and forwards that you could not, to use the words I think he used, be sure that an expression of opinion you got one day would be valid the next. The hon. member for York South answered that fairly well, but then the minister to my surprise went on and apparently made it quite clear that I was quite wrong in taking that point from him because he went on to explain that in certain cases they did act on consent.

Indeed he surprised me still further by saying, if I got his words right, that in the case of any question of liquor, which I would imagine would be one of the most difficult and important involved, they might very well ask the consent of the band. That seemed to me to take the ground right from under the argument I thought he was making because he did not stick to what I thought was his first point, that you really could not get a consent that would stick. He does not maintain that point nor does he take the position that you must consult with the band only as to things that are rather unimportant—because surely the liquor question is not unimportant. Therefore I am really left quite at a loss, particularly in view of the explanation of the hon. member for Kamloops that this is only a minor restriction, to know what the argument is that the minister is making.

Mr. Charlton: After listening to the discussion on the amendment, it would appear to me that the minister does not want to agree to it because it is pretty obvious that he himself wants to do something that is going to be disagreeable to the Indians, or he would consent to it.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Charlton: That is the only conclusion one can draw.

Mr. Chevrier: Bosh.

Mr. Charlton: That is the only possible conclusion one can draw, because if he cannot get the consent of the band then it is obviously against their wishes. What would he possibly want to do against the wishes of the band that leads him not to agree to the amendment? What, for instance, would he want to do that would be so drastically against the Indians that he could not get their consent to do so? The matter of the liquor law is pretty important. The minister made the statement that they would probably get the consent of the band to make any change so far as that is concerned. In my estimation that is probably one of the most important parts of the whole act. In the case of some reserves it is more important than others. In some reserves he would not have any trouble getting the consent of the band to take the band out from under the act with respect to the liquor laws. In other cases it would be very difficult for him to do so. Would the minister suggest that he would want to do so against the wishes of the band? That is the only obvious conclusion we can draw.

Amendment (Mr. Charlton) negatived: Yeas, 23; nays, 63.

On section 25—Transfer where Indian ceases to reside on reserve.

Mr. Catherwood: Mr. Chairman, I was not a member of the special committee, but section 25 does not appear to be quite right the way I see it. Ownership of property has always been considered a very sacred thing. Under this section provision is made for compensation to the Indian for permanent improvements, but why should the land revert to the band without some compensation being made to the owner in the same way that compensation is made for improvements to the property?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): This is the case, Mr. Chairman, of an Indian who transfers to another band, or something like that, and ceases to be entitled to live on the particular reserve. He has made improvements on his land, erected buildings, and of course is entitled to receive compensation for them. The Indian Act, however, does not provide for anyone holding land on a reserve except a member of that band, with one exception which you will see later. Therefore his transfer rights are limited to persons who can take land on that reserve. If he is unable to sell the land within six months the provision is that the land will revert to the band, who will hold it and perhaps later dispose of it to some other Indian; but, that having been done, that the band funds should recompense him for the improvements he has put on the land.

Mr. Catherwood: He should be entitled to some compensation for the land itself, if it is his own property.

Sections 26 to 31 inclusive agreed to.

On section 32— Sale or barter of produce prohibited unless superintendent approves.

Mr. Catherwood: This section may have been meant as a protection to the Indians, but surely by this time they have come of age and should be capable of carrying on their own negotiations. I would like the minister to give the committee a little enlightenment on that point.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): In the first place this only applies to the western provinces, which are named in the section. This was a matter of some debate with representatives of my hon. friend's party on the special committee. Some of them favoured more restrictions on the Indian in disposing of his produce than are contained in this section. This goes back a great many years and has been a protection for the Indian in the west, where it has been needed at times. By subsection 2 we are providing that if the Indian desires, and if he has shown his ability to transact his own business, the minister may exempt him from the provision. In the special committee I gave the assurance that, as far as the administration of the section was concerned, we would try to exempt every Indian at the earliest possible moment.

Section agreed to.

Sections 33 to 42 inclusive agreed to.

On section 43—Particular powers.

Mr. Catherwood: What about property held by the Indian outside the reserve? Can the minister appoint executors to administer estates which contain holdings not within the reserve proper?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The minister can appoint the executor, but in order to convey the property the will would have to be registered in the registry office of the county in which the lands are situated.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Do I understand the effect of sections 42 and 43 is that Indians themselves may not make wills at all?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Where do you read that?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am asking the question. Section 42 says "all jurisdiction and authority in relation to matters and causes testamentary is vested exclusively in the minister". Then section 43 says that without restricting the generality of section 42 the minister may appoint executors, and so on. I am not making a statement; I am only asking a question. Is this merely a provision to take effect in certain cases where Indians have not themselves acted, or does it take away their right to act?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): If my hon. friend will look at section 45 he will see that the opening words are: "Nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent or prohibit an Indian from devising or bequeathing his property by will". Section 43 in effect constitutes the minister a court for the purpose of probating wills, appointing administrators, and generally dealing with the estates of Indians.

Mr. Fulton: Is it the practice in dealing with the estates of Indians under this and succeeding sections to deal with them in conformity with the laws of the province in which the property is situate, or is a standard practice followed throughout the dominion? The thought behind my question is that if we are eventually to make Indians absolutely equal with us, sharing the same citizenship, the time will come when in respect to these matters of wills, succession to property and so on they will be subject to provincial law. So I am wondering if the administration of this and subsequent sections is now in accordance with the law of the province in which the property is located.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We take our legal advice, of course, from the deputy minister of justice, who advises us on the particular points. The general rule is that we follow the common law in the province concerned. My hon. friend has raised a question, however, that is not settled in the Indian affairs branch. It may well be that we shall soon have to adopt a uniform practice throughout the dominion or, alternatively, have all these matters dealt with in provincial surrogate courts under provincial law; and I must say I am studying that at the moment.

Mr. Fulton: If a recommendation will be of any assistance at this time I would like to express the personal opinion that the move should be toward bringing these things under the same system in effect in the province so that there will be no eventual problem and no adjustments required in that regard.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I think that is logical, and we are looking at it in that light.

Mr. Charlton: Is it true that in his will an Indian may not provide that his widow shall have a life lease on his land and property, and that it shall go to a son or daughter, as the case may be, on the death of the widow?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): That is a rather interesting point of law. It relates to the right an Indian has in land under his location ticket. That is not the full right of a fee simple, as we know it in Ontario, for example; and it has been suggested that since the Indian has what is in effect a right somewhat less than that, he may not be able to establish a life interest but can only establish a permanent interest the same as his own. I believe the particular point my hon. friend has in mind actually arose because of the unusual will in that case. I would prefer to put my answer this way, that we are trying to find a method by which Indian wills and the disposition of Indian lands will be comparable with the provincial registry laws, as the hon. member for Kamloops suggests, or something akin to that, so there will not be a distinction.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): First of all I have to ask the minister a question because I am not as familiar with this act as I should be. Section 45 (3) states:

No will executed by an Indian shall be of any legal force or effect as a disposition of property until the minister has approved the will or a court has granted probate thereof pursuant to this act.

There may be some qualification of those words I do not know about; but assuming that a court has granted probate, notwithstanding that has the minister all the powers contained in section 46?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No, Mr. Chairman. The minister may direct that probate of a will be proceeded with through the surrogate court. If he does that he divests himself of any control over the ordinary administrative processes in that estate except as it relates to land on a reserve, because a will cannot take effect to transfer land on a reserve without the minister's consent, since the minister must sign all transfers whether of land willed or sold or otherwise.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then may I assume that there is a section somewhere else in the act providing that the effect of a court granting probate is what the minister has just said, in other words that he will not have all the powers contained in section 46?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): That is in section 44 (2) and (3). Section 44 (2) gives the minister permission to direct probate through a surrogate court, and 44 (3) says the court may exercise this jurisdiction but not with respect to lands until the minister has intervened.

Section agreed to.

On section 44—Courts may exercise jurisdiction with consent of minister.

Mr. Noseworthy: Just under what circumstances would the minister likely be called upon to give consent for the court to exercise jurisdiction?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): There might be a complicated will which we might decide should be determined in the provincial court. The greater part of the assets of the deceased might be situated outside the reserve or something of that kind.

Mr. Noseworthy: Have the descendants or the heirs the right to ask that the case be settled by the court? Have they that right to take the case from the minister to the court?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No; they have not that right. But since we do this work without charge, if the heirs ask us to transfer it to a provincial court, and if in doing that there were no great inconvenience to all the parties concerned, I am sure we would be glad to get rid of it.

Section agreed to.

Section 45 agreed to.

On section 46—Minister may declare will void.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not for the moment saying whether section 46 is right or wrong; but it seems to me that we may as well face the fact that we are really just taking away any rights of any kind. I go on to section 47 because an appeal is provided for there. But how realistic is it to talk about an appeal with regard to the people we are talking about and whom we deal with in the words used in section 46? First let me read one or two subsections of section 46 to show how utterly illusory their rights are. You can hardly use the word "rights" with regard to them. I should like to read from the beginning of the section:

46. (1) The minister may declare the will of an Indian to be void in whole or in part if he is satisfied that—

Then I go on to paragraph (c):

(c) the terms of the will would impose hardship on persons for whom the testator had a responsibility to provide,

(d) the will purports to dispose of land in a reserve in a manner contrary to the interest of the band or contrary to this act,—

That seems to me to be absolutely wide open. Then finally:

(f) the terms of the will are against the public interest.

My comment, Mr. Chairman, is that provisions of that kind seem to me to be utterly repugnant to the declared intention, as I recall it, of the minister when he spoke to us first about this act. We would not treat children in that way.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I think my hon. friend has overlooked the fact that the minister has been constituted a court under the previous section. This section in a general way provides jurisdiction in the minister comparable to that of a surrogate court judge or a supreme court judge in any action which might be brought with respect to a will. That does not answer the one particular question about the interests of the band; because there you interject a thing which would not be present in a lawsuit between non-Indians. But my hon. friend must remember that band councils and bands feel strongly at times about the disposition of land on their reserve. There are many reserves where all the land is allotted, where the allotments have been held by families going through several generations, and the thoughts of land tenure which are common to most of us here are held by those Indians. But there are other reserves where the thought of allotment itself is opposed today and where, if there is a limited allotment, and if an Indian in his will purports to dispose of that land in a manner quite contrary to the commonly-accepted policy of that band, it might be in the interests of harmony and good relationship, and perhaps not affect really the interests of the heirs, to have this power which would not be exercised unless there were all these circumstances I have described.

I agree that it is repugnant to most ideas that we ourselves entertain; but my hon. friend will have to accept my word for it that there is a great deal of opinion that the band council should have the sole word as to any lands on a reserve; and many band councils today insist that no will be looked at and approved of by the minister until they have looked at it to see whether it affects the land tenure on that reserve.

Sections 47 to 65 inclusive agreed to.

On section 66—Expenditure of revenue moneys with consent of band.

Mr. Fulton: What I have to say really applies to all three subsections of section 66. Is there any safeguard to make sure that, if band funds are expended for these general benevolent purposes, Indians will not be deprived of benefits which they might hope eventually, at any rate, to receive under the general social security laws of the country? What I have in mind is this. Perhaps the answer will be self-evident, and perhaps I should therefore put it rather in the way of a suggestion for the future. Now that social security legislation is being made of universal application, but yet there are still means tests preserved in some of our social security legislation, as the Indians are brought along to a position of equality with the white man and, as I hope before long, are made the recipients of old age pensions, I would hope that the use of band funds for benevolent and charitable purposes and to look after the sick and the indigent and so on, that is provided for under this section will not in any way complicate the situation with respect to the means test; in other words, I hope it would not be counted as part of the income of an Indian for the purpose of disqualification for any social security benefits that he might otherwise be entitled to.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): When this government raised the allowance for the aged from $8 to $25 last July 1, we found that in some cases band councils had been distributing money to their aged people on a monthly basis; this distribution was perhaps generous enough that we found the application of a means test somewhat embarrassing to some of the bands. We have not been able to work out a perfect formula yet. But as to all that my hon. friend has said, it is the intention of the department to work that out in one form or another as our legislation improves.

Section agreed to.

Sections 67 to 71 inclusive agreed to.

On section 72—Regulations.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, I raised this matter before.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, my understanding is this, although I qualify it by saying that this is a matter for national health and welfare. I understand that when an Indian leaves the reserve, for the first eighteen months after he leaves he is entitled to the medical care that he normally would have on the reserve. After that time it is presumed that he has made other contacts and other arrangements in the community in which he is living. But if he returns to the reserve, he immediately resumes the position he had when he left, and is entitled to all the medical care he had before he left.

Mr. Fraser: I have a case of an Indian who is off the reserve, and who has been off it for several years. The reason he went off the reserve is that he is an old man. He had nobody to keep him except himself. He was unable to work owing to illness. He is receiving $25 which is really all that is allowed; it is just really an old age pension. If he was not an Indian, he would be allowed $40, but being an Indian he gets $25. He has to live with his daughter in order to live at all, and he is not allowed medical attention. It comes pretty hard on him. Some provision should be made for these people who are off the reserves. There is no living on the reserve for them. They have to get off. I have the case of an elderly woman who is off the reserve and living with her relation because she cannot live on the reserve; yet she is not allowed medical attention. There is no place on the reserve where she can go and live.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We would have some difficulty in providing this medical service to persons who are scattered all over. Part of the advantage of being on the reserve is that the people are there and you can administer to them. If my hon. friend will give me the particular cases we shall look into them and see if something can be done.

Mr. Fraser: I took the case up with the director of Indian services.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I realize that. Let me know about it again.

Mr. Fraser: It went to the director of Indian health services.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I know. Let me have them.

Mr. Fraser: Nothing was done. I really believe that something should be done for cases like these because they could use the same doctor who attends to the Mud lake reserves. I will let the minister have the case again.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Thank you.

Mr. Bater: Section 72, paragraph (g), provides for medical treatment and health services to Indians. At this time I should like to commend the minister, his department, and also the special committee which has been acting for some time on behalf of our Indians.

In connection with the treatment and health services for our Indians, I should like to mention that in my home city of North Battleford, on the North Battleford airport, we have a splendid hospital that is entirely for Indian patients from the reserves of, I think, the Meadow Lake constituency and the constituency of The Battlefords. I should like to read into the record with respect to this hospital an item of Mrs. C. Wetton in the Star-Phoenix of April 20, 1951. Mrs. Wetton is special correspondent of the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix and also an authority on Indian history in our part of the province. This article carries the dateline North Battleford, August 22, 1876, and reads:

> . . . and the third day of the Fort Carlton treaty-making:
> "I have spoken much to you. Now I wish to hear the voices of your chiefs, or of those chosen to speak for you."
> Governor Morris paused before the assembled tribesmen.
> Poundmaker arose, to deliver an impassioned plea for aid for his people in the great task confronting them as they turned their footsteps to the white man's way of life, pleading at its close. "The children yet unborn, I wish you to treat them in like manner, as they advance in civilization like the white man. This is the voice of the people."
> "I have heard the voice of the people," said the governor. "Those that come after us in the government, will think of your children, as we think of you."
> How that pledge, so solemnly entered into in those far-away days at Fort Carlton is being fulfilled, is the story of the Indian hospital here.
> It is a story of selfless endeavour; of men and women with wide experience, working in unison under the superintendency of Dr. P. W. Head for a better and fuller life for the descendants of those treaty makers; of the application of the latest in medical and surgical techniques, and nursing skills to the improvement of their health standards; and of kindly guidance, in abundance, that has achieved more for the Indians here than anything else in their long story.
> Indians are not demonstrative. But eagerly, now, they are seeking its benefits. No longer do they regard it as merely a government hospital for the Indians. "It is our hospital," they would have the world know.

At the last conference held here in Ottawa, called by the minister, there were two Indians down from my constituency, one chief Favel, representing the Queen Victoria protective association of Indians, and the other John Tootoosis, who is president of the Saskatchewan association of Indians. They advised me at the conclusion of their conference that they thought much good would come out of the conference and that it would be something for the betterment of the Indians of the future in the whole of Canada. After speaking to our two chiefs who were down I came to the conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that Bill No. 79 is the Magna Carta of our Indians.

Sections 73 to 78 inclusive agreed to.

On section 79—Regulations respecting band and council meetings.

Mr. Catherwood: This whole bill is constituted to encourage the Indians to assume responsibility. If we expect them to claim the status that section 79 would give them, such as that of acting as presiding officers at such meetings, dealing with notices of meetings, the number of persons required at the meeting and so on, I think the representative of the department should sit in as an advisory counsel. I do feel that there is an opportunity here to give those Indians that responsibility, particularly at their own meetings of their own band. I should like the minister to consider that point.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I quite agree with all that the hon. member has said.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I refer to the work of the chairman of the special committee. The Lord Chief Justice of England, in his most exalted moments, was never more thoughtful than the chairman of that committee. The hon. member for Essex West gave all of us on this side of the house, or the other side of the house, an opportunity to express our opinions. Out of this discussion has grown the bill we have now before us, and I hope it will be an act which will be unanimously supported by the parliament of Canada. In the work that he has done, the hon. member for Essex West has rendered a tremendous service to Canada.

Section agreed to.

Sections 80 to 85 inclusive agreed to.

On section 86—Property exempt from taxation.

Mr. Gibson: I am sure we all agree, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is not perfect, but I must say that I myself feel it is as nearly perfect as we can make it in our first attempt to amend the Indian Act.

Subsection 2 of section 86 is what I consider to be the most vital part of the Indian Act. I refer to the right to vote or the right not to vote. I must say that this is the only section in which I found myself in complete disagreement with the minister. He himself holds very strong views on this matter, and I respect him for it. On the other hand, I feel that there is only one way in which the Indians will be able to bring before parliament effectively their desires of any worthwhile amendments to this legislation in due course. That will be done by virtue of the fact that they will have a vote. I have been long enough in politics, Mr. Chairman, to realize that people without a vote do not really have a great deal of power when they speak to a member of parliament. On the other hand, I notice that since the province of British Columbia gave the vote to Indians in provincial elections there has been decidedly a great deal more interest taken in Indian affairs by the members of the provincial legislature, and indeed by the government of the province of British Columbia.

This may be the only time I shall speak in the debate, and in doing so I should like sincerely to congratulate the minister upon the extremely fine job he has made of this revision of the Indian Act. He was not a member of the special committee which sat in 1946, 1947, and 1948. But I must say, as was pointed out today by the hon. member for Essex West, that he certainly outstripped us all in a very short time with his intense application to the job. It is my view that the Indians of Canada are most fortunate in having a man of his capacity to look after their interests at this time, when the act is before parliament for amendment.

In my lifetime I have had a unique experience with Indians and with the officials of the Indian affairs branch. My experience extends over a period of more than thirty-five years. I have had many business dealings with the department, both before coming to Ottawa as a member of parliament and since that time. I can only say that in all that time, both as an outsider and as a member, I have always received the fullest co-operation from the officials. I feel they are doing a wonderful job in the administration of Indian affairs. I would express to them and to the minister on behalf of a very large number of Indians in my riding our thanks for and appreciation of the work done on behalf of those Indians.

While I hesitate to do so, I feel I must move, as I did in committee—

That subsection (2) of section 86 be deleted.

It seems to me that in subsection 1 we recognize the claim by the Indians to exemption from taxation. And yet, at least in my opinion, in subsection 2—perhaps the minister will not agree with this—we ask the Indian to barter his right to the exemption for the privilege of voting in a federal election. That is something which I feel is fundamentally and basically wrong.

We inquire why this is done, and the minister says he does not want to set up a special category of Indians. It seems to me there are about one hundred Indians in reserves in Canada—and I give that figure only as a rough guess—who are earning taxable incomes, or incomes that would be exempt under our present legislation. I would be very pleased to have the minister correct me if I am wrong. In other words we are disfranchising about 125,000 people, or at least making it difficult for them, and asking them to waive some of their rights, in order that the Department of National Revenue here in Ottawa may collect some revenue from about one hundred Indians.

Let me point out that there are a great many people in Canada who do not pay income taxes. I look at one of our greatest provinces and realize that in it there are probably 200,000 farmers who enjoy the right to vote, who enjoy the privilege of receiving $40 a month old age pension, and all the amenities and other privileges enjoyed by white people; perhaps I should name the province of Quebec where there are perhaps another 200,000 farmers who pay the sum total of $50,000 in income tax, or about 25 cents each per year; yet we give them all these rights.

In order to go ahead and collect from one hundred Indians who might or might not have taxable incomes, the government says, "You must give away these fundamental rights"—rights which we have already acknowledged under subsection 1. We ask them to give away the rights they would enjoy under this legislation, in exchange for the privilege of voting.

I do not think this has been explained to the average Indian—because, after all, not many of them have much knowledge of or familiarity with the workings of the Department of National Revenue. Most of them do not realize that the greater proportion of the money they receive from their reserves will be in the form of capital, and would not be taxable. I do not think we have ever explained to those people that money coming in from oil or timber is a capital receipt and, as such, would not in any case be subject to income tax.

At least half the Indians in Canada will be afraid to sign this waiver in order to gain the right to vote because they will feel that they are losing something. As I said in committee, it seems to me we are straining at a gnat in an effort to collect income tax from perhaps one hundred Indians.

If there is any flagrant abuse of exemptions from taxation, by people opening up large manufacturing establishments on Indian reserves, then that might become something in the nature of a racket. I could then understand the minister's concern about something that might develop through time. So far as I know, however, that has not yet developed. Even if it has, perhaps we could go ahead and say that we would put a ceiling of $5,000 on the tax exempt income of an Indian on a reserve. Perhaps that would be reasonable.

On the other hand, if a business bringing in half a million dollars a year is developed, I am sure the Minister of National Revenue or the Minister of Finance could not resist the temptation of moving in and securing some of that revenue. It seems to me that this subsection would disfranchise Indians, perhaps because of their lack of knowledge of the manner in which the Income Tax Act applies, and that all this would be done to catch only a few Indians. This in my view is fundamentally wrong.

I hope that if the amendment is turned down tonight, it may be considered again in two or three years, when we see how the arrangement works out.

Mr. Applewhaite: Mr. Chairman, it is with regret that, entering the debate for the first time, I find I must oppose the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I feel however that in this instance we should place our views on record in connection with the amendment proposed by him.

I am going to vote against his amendment, and for two reasons, the first of which is purely technical. At the last session of parliament when amendments were made to the Dominion Elections Act a certain principle was accepted. My understanding is that at that time we set up, as a matter of law, the condition under which Indians as such, under the Indian Act, were entitled to vote at dominion elections. Through our own inadvertence we accepted the principle and placed it in the elections act, without taking the steps necessary to make that principle operative.

[Mr. Gibson.]

In other words the Dominion Elections Act says that an Indian may vote if he signs a waiver, but no statute has said what effect the waiver to be signed would have. Therefore this is really only a complementary section to a principle already adopted when we passed the amendments to the Dominion Elections Act.

My second objection is more serious, and perhaps is not a popular one. I would ask the committee to believe that I am just as sincere in my objections as I know the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is in offering his amendment. The effect of the amendment to the Dominion Elections Act in this subsection is not to persuade the Indian to barter away anything; it is to persuade him to accept at one and the same time the rights, privileges, duties and responsibilities of a full-voting Canadian citizen.

I am sure the hon. member who has spoken did not intend to convey the impression, one which I gained from some of his remarks, that the subsection is here to enable the Department of National Revenue to catch up with some Indians. I do not think he meant to convey the impression that our purpose in putting such a section into the laws of this country was in order to collect the few dollars which we might collect.

He has suggested as a basis for his argument that we are taking away from the Indian certain rights which were his of exemption from certain forms of taxation. I suggest that those rights, if that is the proper expression, were given to the Indian as a quid pro quo, as compensation for the fact that we have refused him permission to take full part in the government of this country by expressing his opinion by means of the ballot. I could talk on this for a long time but I am going to conclude with one sentence which I hope will convey my feelings. In this country over a long period of years in recent history we have gradually come to lay more emphasis on rights, ignoring our duties. I suggest that if we are making a real effort to assist the Indian we shall help him to regard duty and rights as going hand in hand.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, since the discussion has become somewhat general on section 86 I should like to try to lay before the committee what I understand to be the views of the Indians with regard to whether or not in order to receive the vote they should have to give up what had previously been their exemption from taxation. Whether or not we agree with the stand of the Indians it does seem to me that there is a duty on the committee to try to appreciate their point of view.

We must remember that he is an Indian; he is not yet a fully qualified citizen. Therefore I think there is some merit in his contention that he is entitled to an exemption which might confer privileges over and above those enjoyed by white people for the time being. But there is a great deal of substance of right to the Indian's claim. I agree with most of the argument of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, although I am not certain that I agree with his legal argument, that revenues from oil and timber rights would necessarily be capital and therefore not definable as income to be taxed.

Mr. Gibson: That is correct; that is the best part of the argument.

Mr. Fulton: I am not sure as to the merits of the hon. member's legal argument. Revenue from oil rights might be derived from lease rentals or simply from the receipts of outright purchase. It seems to me that the part of the hon. member's argument which was most impressive, if he will forgive me for putting it that way, was that part which dealt with the merits of the Indian's claim to be exempt from taxation.

The Indians take the position that they were the original inhabitants of this country, that the white people came and took over the lands and confined the Indians to certain areas and reserves. Those reserves were created by treaty in some cases and in other cases by processes of allotment. Generally speaking, the Indian's argument was that he should be compensated, not only for the loss of the possession of his lands but also for the loss of the general hunting and fishing rights over the lands from which he had derived his living. As compensation we gave him certain privileges which he enjoyed on the reserve. The Indian did not ask to be confined to the reserve; we confined him to the reserve. There is no doubt about that. We must not kid ourselves about this. The Indian did not ask to be put on the reserve; we put him there.

In partial satisfaction of a sense of justice we said to the Indian, "You will enjoy certain privileges on those reserves." The Indian's position throughout the years has been that those privileges which he enjoys in connection with his reserves and in his status as an Indian were conveyed to him in perpetuity in compensation for the losses which he suffered at the hands of the white men when they took over the country.

That being the case the Indian says, "Now you come to us and say that you wish to make us citizens by amending the Indian Act; that you wish to bring about a set of circumstances under which the Indian may become enfranchised"—I am using the word "enfranchised" in its proper sense, not merely as conveying the right to vote. "You have told us you want us to be enfranchised, you want us to enjoy equal status with the whites and you want us to accept equal obligations. You say you are doing this for the future of the Indians. You tell us that we should exercise the right and privilege of voting. The first thing you do when you ask us to accept these so-called privileges and to embrace these duties is to give up a privilege which has been ours ever since there were Indians, ever since there were bands and reserves established in the country."

The Indian does not think it is a strong argument when we say that we are trying to encourage him to become a citizen, to enjoy all our benefits and to assume full equality with us when as a first condition we tell him he must give up certain privileges which were given to him in perpetuity. He is unable to appreciate the logic of the argument just put forward by the hon. member for Skeena. I have to confess that were that argument applied to white people its logic would be inescapable, but I do suggest strongly that, when it is applied to Indians who are not yet our equal in status or in many respects our equals in appreciation of logic, it loses much of its force.

We have to deal with this matter to a certain extent from the Indian's point of view. If we want him to be fully equal to the white man, if we want him to assume willingly the duties which go with citizenship and equality, then we might make this one small concession, particularly, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, when there would only be a small proportion of the Indians in receipt of taxable income on the reserves. I think it is proper to compare the situation in Canada with what exists in the United States. I have here a pamphlet issued by Theodore H. Hass, chief counsel of the United States Indian Service, entitled, "Should Indians Vote?" I should like to read one passage, which is as follows:

> In 1924 all Indians born in the United States, who had not become naturalized by treaty or statute, were made citizens by an act of congress. About 125,000 Indians were affected by this law. As a consequence of attaining national citizenship, Indians automatically became citizens of the state where they reside. Yet on January 26, 1938, seven states still refused to let Indians go to the polls. As a result the solicitor of the department of the interior issued an opinion on the question of whether these state actions were constitutional. The opinion concluded:
> "I am of the opinion that the fifteenth amendment clearly prohibits any denial of the right to vote to Indians under circumstances in which non-Indians would be permitted to vote. The laws of Idaho, New Mexico, and Washington which would exclude Indians not taxed from voting in effect exclude citizens of one race from voting on grounds which are not applied to citizens of other races. For this reason I believe such laws are unconstitutional under the fifteenth amendment. Similarly, the laws of Idaho and South Dakota which would exclude Indians who maintain tribal relations from voting are believed to be unconstitutional as such laws exclude citizens from voting on grounds which apply to only one race."

Section 1 of the fifteenth amendment to the United States constitution, which was adopted on March 30, 1870, provides:

"The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state or account of race, colour, or previous condition of servitude."

I know, Mr. Chairman, that we are not governed by the United States constitution or the United States bill of rights, but I do suggest that we are here endeavouring to do that thing which the United States apparently has already done, make the Indians full citizens and give them the right to vote. It is argued by the minister, and by such hon. members as the hon. member for Skeena, that the Indian who—and I will put it on their basis—as a previous condition of servitude enjoyed tax exemption cannot be allowed to vote unless he gives up that tax exemption. I would hope that we are not behind the United States in our ideals of citizenship. We have not the fifteenth amendment or anything like it, and it has been argued by ministers of the crown opposite on other occasions that the reason why we do not have these written bills of rights is because they are inherent in our constitution and in our way of life. Yet it seems to me that if we do what is contained in subsection 2 of section 86 we will in effect be denying the right of citizens of Canada to vote on account of race, colour or previous condition of servitude. That is what we will be doing, the thing which the United States, in accordance with its traditions of freedom and democracy, has made it impossible to do under their fifteenth amendment.

Here in Canada of course I think there is another significant factor, and that is that at least two of the provinces have given the Indian the right to vote in provincial matters. British Columbia, and I believe Saskatchewan, both allow the Indians to vote. Perhaps I should speak only for my own province and say that British Columbia now allows Indians to vote. Whether they live on reserve or off reserve, whether or not they pay income tax, the province does not attach any conditions to the right to vote, and surely this house will not be less generous in its treatment of Indians than one of the provinces of Canada.

In the United States, again according to this pamphlet, apparently the situation was the reverse. The federal government first made them citizens and gave them the right to vote, and certain states denied them that right. The pamphlet dealing with this question contains a passage having to do with a case where one of the states denied Indians the right to vote. It points out that this case was brought before a court, and the court pointed out that the provision designed to prevent people who are unfit or unqualified from voting in an election was not intended to exclude Indians. Then the pamphlet goes on to say:

Three weeks later a three judge federal statutory court granted a permanent injunction in the case of Trujillo vs. Garley restraining an election clerk from refusing to register a Pueblo Indian and others similarly situated because of a provision of the New Mexico state constitution excluding from the franchise "Indians not taxed."

New Mexico had attempted to restrain Indians from voting unless they gave up their exemption from taxation, and the United States court gave the opinion that this could not be done under the American constitution. Apparently in Canada, in spite of the fine things which are said about this act—and I think the spirit behind the act is a fine spirit—we are going to deny Indians the right to vote unless they give up exemption from taxation. As I pointed out, at least one province of Canada has given them the right to vote with no strings attached. Under the constitution of the United States, having previously enjoyed tax exemption, it has apparently been held that when given the right to vote they shall have that right without the necessity of giving up their tax exemption, and states have been restrained from preventing Indians from voting on the ground that they are tax exempt.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, we can see the force of the Indian argument which I attempted to outline earlier when it is reinforced by the practice and the principle laid down in the United States, which has an Indian problem at least similar to ours. In that country they have accepted the principle that Indians when made citizens shall be given the right to vote without giving up these privileges which we gave in perpetuity in compensation, in the Indians' eyes, for other and vastly greater privileges, the privilege of sole ownership of this country which we took away from them. I would hope that this parliament would be guided by principles and inspired by charity no less than that which appears to guide the citizens of the United States.

The Chairman: Before going any further, perhaps you would be good enough to examine the legal aspect of the amendment. Mr. Gibson moved:

That subsection 2 of section 86 be deleted.

The amendment is negative if we are considering subsection 2 separately, and I should like to refer hon. members to Beauchesne, third edition, citation 341. I should like, however, to ask the opinion of hon. members.

Mr. Fulton: As I understand the motion made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, it was simply that section 86 should be amended by deleting subsection 2. In considering this bill in committee we have not previously dealt with sections except as a whole. In other words, we have not yet broken down the sections and dealt with them subsection by subsection. I would certainly accept your ruling without question if the motion were that section 86 be deleted, because that would be a straight negative; but we are not asking that the whole section be deleted. We are suggesting that it be amended by deleting a subsection, which does not defeat the whole of the section. Then the other point arises that there is no chance of dealing with subsection 2 of the section unless Your Honour were to call section 86, subsection 1, and deal with that, and then section 86, subsection 2, so that we might deal with that by a negative vote. I submit that, since Your Honour has called section 86 as a whole, it is in order to move that the section be amended by deleting a part, and that the amendment does not fall within the principle laid down in Beauchesne.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, it happens that I want to move an amendment to subsection 1 in any event. I wonder if we could adopt the suggestion that has been made, call subsection 1, and deal with that. Then if the committee wishes to vote on subsection 2 as such, we can have the vote without the amendment. I do suggest that we avoid taking future sections by subsections. If any hon. member wishes to oppose a subsection, however, we can dispose of it by calling it and voting upon it. If you will call subsection 1, Mr. Chairman, I will move an amendment.

The Chairman: Very well; subsection 1 of section 86.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): There is some doubt as to whether subsection 1 does carry out the intention of the section to give the desired tax exemption, and we have prepared the following words to be added as an amendment at the end of subsection 1. The subsection will just continue, adding the following words after a comma:

nor shall any such property be taken into account in determining the duty payable under the Dominion Succession Duty Act on or in respect of other property passing to an Indian.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection 1 as amended agreed to.

The Chairman: We come now to subsection 2 and the amendment moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. Fulton: Could we dispose of it by a vote?

Mr. Knowles: Now that you have called subsection 2 by itself the amendment is not necessary; we vote either for or against the clause.

The Chairman: Shall subsection 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Subsection agreed to: Yeas, 45; nays, 21.

Section agreed to.

Sections 87 to 109 inclusive agreed to.

On section 110—Sale of lands of enfranchised Indians.

Mr. Charlton: Subsection 2 of this section reads:

When an order of enfranchisement issues or has been issued, the governor in council may, with the consent of the council of the band, by order declare that any lands within a reserve of which the enfranchised Indian had formerly been in lawful possession shall cease to be Indian reserve lands.

The council of the Six Nations Indians take very strong exception to this section, and always have. They say it will simply dot the Indian reserve with white owners. Even though the minister has inserted the words "with the consent of the council of the band" they are still fearful that the reserve may become infiltrated with white owners, which in their view would be a very bad situation. If in connection with land bordering the reserve the council of the band were in agreement I can see no reason why such lands could not be taken out of the reserve; but to pinpoint any reserve with white owners would be very objectionable, and I think would mean the ultimate end of that reserve. Surely the minister could do something in this section to prevent any such thing happening. If the whole band wanted to give up their reserve that would be all right; but to pinpoint it with whites would only mean that the reserve would be broken up and the only home the Indians feel is theirs would be gradually taken away from them.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Blackmore: I am not prepared to have this section carry.

Section stands.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up Bill No. 289, respecting Laurier house; Bill No. 290, respecting Kingsmere park; Bill No. 79, respecting Indians; Bill No. 291, to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947; Bill No. 195, to amend the Consumer Credit (Temporary Provisions) Act; and Bill No. 284, to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act.

Mr. Drew: Is the minister in a position to indicate when we shall be returning to the consideration of the defence estimates?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would prefer to take this as a notice. I have not discussed the matter, and I am not in a position to give an answer just now.

Mr. Knowles: What about the budget resolutions?

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 16, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds) presented the first report of the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, and amendments thereto, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE IN DEALING WITH DIVORCE BILLS

Mr. J. H. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have had a communication from my constituents who are very much concerned about the present world situation, and particularly the situation here in Canada. They feel that our time here is not being properly occupied, when for two, three or four nights we use the services of this highest court in the land to discuss matters which concern perhaps two or three or four hundred individuals, regarding their marital relationship, when we could be discussing matters of great concern to the 14 million people in Canada. They have asked me, and I ask through you, sir, whether the government would not give some consideration to calling in the law officers of the crown and others who may be required in order that we may cut some of the red tape which is holding up the proceedings of this chamber at this time of stress and strain in the minds and hearts of all our people.

It does not matter if we have to stay here until Christmas; let us divorce ourselves for another year or two from the bills to which I refer and get down to the hard facts of cold-blooded business so far as Canada is concerned.

My specific point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, is to ask those charged with responsibility, and all the help that they have around them here, there and beyond, and some over on this side, to get together and slash some of this red tape so that we may get on with the business of Canada.

NORTH FRASER HARBOUR COMMISSION

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO PROVIDE FOR TWO ADDITIONAL COMMISSIONERS, ETC.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 292, to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act.

Mr. Green: Will the minister give an explanation?

Mr. Chevrier: The object of the bill is to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act so as to provide for additional representation on the board by means of two commissioners appointed by the governor in council, and also to provide for the payment of the remuneration of the commissioners out of harbour dues.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

NATIONAL PHYSICAL FITNESS ACT—NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Balcom:

1. Has an agreement recently been entered into between the federal government and the province of Nova Scotia in respect to the National Physical Fitness Act?
2. If so, on what date, and what are the terms?

Mr. Martin:

1. Yes.

2. Agreement date, March 30, 1951; ratified by order in council P.C. 1930 of April 18, 1951. The terms are as follows:

"1. The province will at all times during the currency of this agreement, through the organization, co-operate with the national council on physical fitness in promoting the physical fitness of the people of the province of Nova Scotia.

2. The province will during the currency of this agreement develop the physical fitness plan, which has been approved by the minister, with such supervision in the performance thereof as the minister may require.

3. The province will as soon as practicable after the 1st day of April, 1952, submit to the minister evidence satisfactory to him:

(a) that the province has during the fiscal year 1951-52 carried out its obligations under this agreement; and

(b) of the amount actually expended by the province during such fiscal year in developing the physical fitness plan hereinbefore referred to.

4. The dominion will, if the province carries out its obligations under this agreement and produces evidence thereof, as provided in paragraph 3 hereof, pay to the province within three months of the production of such evidence, out of the national physical fitness fund, to the extent of moneys therein or appropriated by parliament therefor, either one-half of the moneys actually expended by the province during the fiscal year 1951-52 in carrying out its said physical fitness plan, or the sum of $11,301.75, whichever is the lesser.

5. This agreement shall come into force on the first day of April, 1951, and shall terminate on the 31st day of March, 1952."

R.C.M.P. VESSEL MP-30

Mr. Gagnon:

1. What waters are patrolled by the R.C.M.P. vessel MP-30?
2. How many persons make up the crew?
3. What have been the operating expenses for each year since the said vessel was put into operation?
4. How many seizures of contraband goods were made each year?
5. What is the total value of such seizures?
6. What duties are performed in this connection?

Mr. Garson:

1. The R.C.M.P. vessel MP-30 is known as the Fort Pitt, and is based at Bagotville, P.Q., during the season of navigation and carries out patrols in the Saguenay river. The patrols are mostly confined to the Port Alfred and Chicoutimi area.

2. Sixteen.

3. This vessel commenced operations on June 8, 1949. Expenses for year ended March 31, 1949, $17,914.78; expenses for year ended March 31, 1950, $31,300.34.

4. 1949, 70 seizures; 1950, 57 seizures; 1951 to date, 2 seizures.

5. Approximately $1,813, based on value for duty of seized smuggled goods before Canadian duties and taxes are applied. In addition, fourteen vessels were seized for having on board dutiable goods unreported at customs; these vessels were released on penalties totalling $1,275, subject to final decision by the Department of National Revenue.

6. The enforcement of the Customs Act involving the search of deep-sea vessels and the seizure of any dutiable goods which have not been reported to customs, as required by the act. During the season 1949, 775 vessels called at Port Alfred, and approximately 300 of these were 10,000 ton ships direct from foreign ports.

[Mr. Martin.]

HEALTH GRANTS—ST. ANNE'S HOSPITAL BAIE ST. PAUL, QUE.

Mr. Maltais:

1. Since 1945, has the Department of National Health and Welfare made any grants or given any subsidy to St. Anne's hospital at Baie St. Paul, county of Charlevoix, province of Quebec? If so, how much per annum?

2. Since the said year, has the department made an annual grant or defrayed in part the fees of a physician attached to the above-mentioned hospital? If so, what is the amount of such contribution?

Mr. Martin:

1. Yes.

1949-50
(a) Grant for the purchase of scientific equipment	$15,895.50
(b) Grant for the training of the medical superintendent of the hospital and hospital technicians	2,550.00
Total 1949-50	$18,445.50
1950-51
(a) Grant for training of technicians	$ 1,800.00
(b) Grant for purchase of laboratory supplies	500.00
(c) Grant for the employment of a part-time assistant physician	2,000.00
Total 1950-51	$ 4,300.00
1951-52
(a) Grant for the purchase of laboratory equipment and supplies	$ 767.23
(b) Grant for the training of hospital technicians	3,600.00
(c) Grant for the employment of a part-time assistant physician	2,000.00
Total 1951-52	$ 6,367.23

2. Yes. See item (c) above for the years 1950-51 and 1951-52.

USE OF SODIUM FLUORIDE IN PUBLIC WATER SUPPLIES

Mr. Bradette:

Is any action being taken by the Department of National Health and Welfare with respect to the use of sodium fluoride in public water supplies to prevent tooth decay?

Mr. Martin: The dental health division of the Department of National Health and Welfare is conducting, in collaboration with the provincial department of health and the city of Brantford, a well-controlled study of the dental effects of sodium fluoride. The division examines periodically 1,800 school children at Brantford, Ontario, where, since 1945, the local health authorities have been adding fluorine to the water supplies. For purposes of comparison 1,800 children are also being periodically examined by the dental health division at Sarnia, a fluorine-free community.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—PROFESSIONAL AND SPECIAL SERVICES

Mr. Fulton:

1. What was the total paid by the Department of Transport for professional and special services in the fiscal year 1950-51?

2. What person, persons, firms or companies received payments of $25,000 or more under this heading in the said year, what was the actual amount of each payment, and for what service was the payment made in each case?

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE—PROFESSIONAL AND SPECIAL SERVICES

Mr. Fulton:

1. What was the total paid by the Department of National Revenue for professional and special services in the fiscal year 1950-51?

2. What person, persons, firms or companies received payments of $10,000 or more under this heading in the said year, what was the actual amount of each payment, and for what service was the payment made in each case?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

MINISTERS AND PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS—EXPENSES

Mr. Hodgson:

For a statement showing the total expenses paid during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1951, to each (a) member of the cabinet; (b) parliamentary assistant.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on April 26 last I asked the Prime Minister about the probable date of the tabling of the report of the royal commission on arts, letters and sciences. He stated, as it is set out at page 2398 of Hansard, that the latest information was that the government might not have the report until about May 14. It is now past that date. Is there any further information the Prime Minister can give us?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have communicated not only with the secretariat of the royal commission but also with the chairman and one other of the commissioners, and they are as much embarrassed as I am by the fact that the report has not yet been received. They are doing their best to expedite the printing. They appreciate the fact that there are many hon. members who are as anxious as the hon. member for Eglinton to have the report.

I was told that the printing of the French version had now caught up with the printing of the English version, and that there was not going to be any additional delay because of any disparity in the dates when the two versions are ready. I can assure the hon. member that I am told by the secretariat—and this is confirmed by the chairman and one other commissioner to whom I talked about it—that everything possible is being done to expedite the matter.

Mr. Fleming: Has the government yet seen the report?

Mr. St. Laurent: The government has not seen the report. The commission recommended, and the government acquiesced in their recommendation, that they would themselves attend to the printing of the report, and that it would not be available even to the government until it was available for immediate distribution after it had been handed to His Excellency.

WHEAT

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF CEILING PRICE UNDER INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of rising costs of production and an increasing world price level, has the government made any attempt to have reviewed the present ceiling price under the international wheat agreement?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The international wheat agreement is an agreement among some forty governments. It is now in its second year of operation, and the only action Canada could take to vary its terms would be to denounce it. Canada has no intention of denouncing it, nor has it any desire to do so.

Mr. Argue: Could the minister not say whether any effort has been made to call in the countries and to talk it over?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Without there being any repudiation of the international wheat agreement, could not the government give consideration to communicating with the signatories to the agreement with a view to a revision in prices, having regard to increased costs?

Mr. Howe: There are three producing countries involved in the agreement, and at least thirty-seven consuming countries. My hon. friend is optimistic if he thinks that the wishes of the three would prevail against the wishes of the thirty-seven. I presume that the signatories to the agreement would have equal standing in the agreement.

FREIGHT RATES

GENERAL INQUIRY BEFORE TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS—APPLICATION FOR FURTHER INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Transport undertook to make inquiries concerning the postponement of the general freight rates inquiry by the board of transport commissioners. Is he in a position to make a statement in the matter now?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Following the inquiry of the hon. member I asked the chairman of the board of transport commissioners to give me a report as to what happened. I am informed that counsel for the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company stated that the railways' studies on equalization of freight rates had not been completed, that the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation as to equalization differ in important respects from the plan on which the railways' studies were based, and that the extent to which the recommendations of the royal commission are to be implemented by legislation and the extent to which new studies and changes in the railways' plan will be required will not be known until legislation is introduced. Counsel for the provinces represented before the board urged an adjournment to enable the provinces to see the proposed legislation. The board adjourned the matter to September 10, 1951, and directed the railways to file, not later than August 20, 1951, six copies of their plan for equalization with the board and the provinces appearing in the matter.

The hon. member also asked as to the present position of the application by the Railway Association of Canada for freight rate increases. The position there, as reported to me by the chairman of the board, is that the date fixed for the hearing of the application is June 11, 1951, and that no request for an adjournment has been made.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

NEWFOUNDLAND—ECONOMIC SURVEY—DEVELOPMENT OF INDUSTRIES, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. On Wednesday, February 21, I asked whether any application had been made by the government of Newfoundland for an economic survey, and if so what action had been taken. My question was passed as an order for return. This was almost three months ago. I should like to know when I may expect the return.

LAURIER HOUSE

PROVISION FOR ADMINISTRATION OF THE MACKENZIE KING TRUST ACCOUNT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 289, respecting Laurier house.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if the Prime Minister has anything further to say at this time?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, I have not. I shall be prepared at the committee stage to answer such questions as are asked and as I can answer.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, there are a few remarks that I think should be made at this stage of the bill. I am sure that no one will be disposed to object to any generosity shown by the late Mr. King to the people of Canada. Indeed I think everyone will be inclined not only to agree that the financial objects of his will are praiseworthy, but also to confirm the general sentiments and objectives that he himself expressed, that although he had done much for this nation, it too had done much for him and had been generous to him, and that it was fitting that he should make some gift to the nation which had elevated him for so long to the office of first citizen and done so much for him while he occupied that office. I am sure we shall all agree that that was a worthy and proper motive.

But such enthusiasm as we may have for this proposal should not blind us to the realization that it is not likely to be carried out without some considerable expense to the taxpayer. After all, we have but recently had under consideration a project for a house for the present and future prime ministers which was approved by parliament on the basis of one estimate, but which was realized only at a cost to the taxpayers of well over $500,000 more than the amount first indicated. I think we should beware lest this project in connection with the home of a past prime minister should also cost the taxpayers vastly more than is at first indicated.

The right hon. gentleman who is the leader of the present government, in the answer he gave to my question yesterday, said that the sum provided under the will of the late Mr. King will not be sufficient to carry out the full cost of his monument, and that the public treasury is to be diminished also to bear the cost of bringing to their full fruition Mr. King's bequest and his ideas as to how his house should be used. Therefore we should make some inquiries as to how the project is to be administered and how much the annual cost to the taxpayer will be.

I should like the Prime Minister to indicate, if he will, just how this cost is to be met. Will it be met by way of an annual item in the estimates under the federal district commission, or under the dominion archives?

I think we should receive further particulars when in committee. We shall have an opportunity to ask questions at that time. I should like to know what the estimated cost of the alterations is. What staff will be necessary to operate the research centre? What will be the cost of acquiring and installing and storing the various historical materials? These are subjects to which our minds should be directed, so that we may know how much the actual bequest of cash made by the late Mr. King will fall short of the requirements necessary to carry out the project envisaged in this bill.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add just a word to what the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has said. As the hon. member has stated, there are two aspects of this matter. The first is the gift to the people of Canada, which we respect and welcome, and the other is the expenditure of money by the people of Canada, in connection with which I think we should be fully informed.

(Translation):

Mr. J. A. Bonnier (St. Henry): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few remarks on the bill which deals with the home of the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. That house was left to him by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. King himself bequeathed it to the government just as he had previously given his summer cottage at Kingsmere. He also willed a few hundred thousand dollars to be spent on the upkeep of these properties, something the leaders of the Conservative party at that time unfortunately never did. It is unfortunate that former leaders of the Conservative party did not show the same generosity on their departure. The Right Hon. Mr. Bennett went to Europe and left his money to England instead of to Canada. That is the difference between the two parties. They were led by two bachelors; one of them was attached to his country while the other was not.

(Text):

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Coldwell: Is the Minister of Public Works in a position to make any estimate as to what it will cost to put this house in proper repair? As I suggested yesterday, I do not think that any very expensive work is required on the outside of the building. If my reading of the portion of the will which was placed on the record by the Prime Minister is correct, I think it was the late prime minister's desire that the interior of the house should remain pretty much as it is now. That is to say, it would not need a great deal of expenditure on structural alterations as was the case with the new residence of the Prime Minister.

Perhaps the Minister of Public Works could give us some information that would be useful in the light of the suggestion made a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Kamloops. Can the minister indicate approximately what it is proposed to do, and what the cost will be? I do not think a very large outlay is needed at the present time.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, I must admit that after looking through the bill I would assume that our duties with respect to Laurier house will be to maintain it in a good state of repair. We have not visited the place to make an estimate as to what is actually needed, but as it is an old building I am sure we shall have to spend money every year to maintain it in a good state of repair.

Mr. Fulton: I am interested in this question, as I know many other hon. members are. As the hon. member for Greenwood has said, the matter is approachable from two angles. First there is the gift to the nation. So far as that is concerned, it is welcome. But there is also the question of the upkeep or expense to the nation which may be involved in carrying out the terms of this bequest. We have had experience recently in embarking on projects in connection with houses without knowing what the total cost was going to be, and then having the unpleasant shock, which has given rise to unpleasantness all round, of finding that the cost has greatly exceeded what we were led to believe at first would be the approximate figure. I can hardly credit the fact that the government would actually be introducing legislation to go ahead and set up this project without some estimate of the cost which will be involved. I think the Minister of Public Works said that they had not looked into it at all, that they do not know what the cost will be. I am certain that the minister would not wish to make that approach to legislation. I hope I misunderstood him. I hope I misinterpreted him, and I trust there is some plan of the way in which the project is to be administered. I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether any plan has yet been made and any estimate prepared of any structural alterations, either interior or exterior, to place the house in such a condition that it can fulfil the terms of the bequest.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If I understand correctly our position under this measure, it is to maintain the house in a good state of repair. We will consider Laurier house in the same way as we consider other public buildings in Ottawa belonging to the federal government. Estimates will come before the house. If the repairs are minor in character, the cost will be taken out of the general vote. They will be examined by the treasury board, and reported in the Auditor General's report. If they are extensive repairs to the building, there will be a special estimate. I intend to wait to see in what condition the house is. Before going into this property we had to accept ownership of it. This having been done not long ago, I did not think it was my duty to interfere with the property and have estimates prepared in advance of the bill, so I am not in a position to give the amount to be expended nor to go into the details.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps we have a fundamentally different approach to this problem.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That of course does happen.

Mr. Fulton: Based on past experience, however, I think we should be more careful. Are we to take it from the reply the minister has made that no preliminary inspection has been made of the house, and that no preliminary plans have been drawn up or any preliminary decision made as to whether it will even be necessary to effect any structural alteration either to the interior or to the exterior of the building to place it in such a condition that it can fulfil the purpose of the bequest? Have any such preliminary inspections or plans been made?

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, probably the house will have to be redecorated, and we shall have to do some work on the exterior. We are not going to change Laurier house into another kind of structure, or enlarge it. We are going to try to keep it the way it is, in order that it may be the memorial it is intended to be. As to the expense, I will invite my good friend to my office some morning and we will look into all the details. We will go over the rooms and get some expert to give the hon. member the exact amount needed to do the necessary work.

Mr. Fulton: I can assure the minister I shall be pleased to accept his invitation whenever it is extended, but I think it might have been more timely if the invitation had been extended before the bill was introduced rather than after, so that we could have had that information before us. I should like to ask the minister a further question. What staff will be necessary to operate the research centre under the dominion archivist when the scheme is operating?

Mr. St. Laurent: There has has been no preliminary plan made as to that. The will was communicated to the government. The government felt it was proper to accept the bequest, and that it was proper to come before parliament and recommend that the dominion archivist be put in charge of Laurier house, and that he be assisted by a curator to conserve the property. I know that up to the present time there has been some preliminary inspection, and I am told that something is being done about some bit of electric wiring in the house which, for the safety of the premises, should be attended to. I was told that was all that was required as a matter of urgency. There has been no plan determined. As a matter of fact the inventory of the contents of the house to be turned over by the executors to the government has not yet been completed. It is still in process.

The title to the real estate was conveyed to the government as of the first of January, but there is a representative of the executors still on the premises, and, together with Mr. Handy, who is a civil servant and was Mr. King's private secretary, he is drawing up the inventory of contents which will remain a part of the property. The executors and Mr. Handy did look over the house to see if there was anything urgently required for its preservation. I was informed that all that was urgently required—and it was being attended to—was some bit of wiring in the electric lighting system that might have constituted a danger.

With respect to the manner in which the house will be used, that will depend upon what is subsequently determined. I think the dominion archivist is a gentleman who enjoys the confidence of all Canadian students, and I think that Canadian students and the Canadian public will be satisfied that he will not recommend anything in the way of facilities to be provided to students that would not be worth what it is going to cost the country. This bill is the preliminary step. The suggestion that is being made is that Laurier house be heated and maintained by the Department of Public Works, that the dominion archivist be in control, and that he have a curator under him to look after the place.

A question has been asked as to when the house is to be open to the public. I was told recently on behalf of the executors that they did not think it could be opened to the public until quite late this summer, that they are still proceeding with their sorting out of the contents of the house, and that it is not possible to be specific about that matter.

With respect to the grounds, the recommendation is that they be maintained as a part of the parkway system that the federal district commission maintains in Ottawa. Whenever anything is required that will be beyond the cost of the ordinary upkeep, there will have to be an appropriation by parliament. There will have to be a recommendation to parliament, at which time the plans and details will be communicated to parliament. Unless parliament is going to say this bequest should not be accepted, it is necessary to proceed in this gradual fashion and not attempt to communicate to parliament any suggestions at this time as to what would be the best way to take advantage of this property as a research facility for students, but to obtain the considered recommendation of the dominion archivist. That is what the government plans to do.

Mr. Fulton: From the remarks of the Prime Minister I understand that title to the property already has been transferred under the will to the government?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, but of course that is subject to repudiation by parliament, if parliament sees fit to do so. The government felt that parliament would not wish to repudiate it.

Mr. Fulton: I wanted the question of ownership established, as it now has been, because obviously it was not necessary, in order to convey the property, that this legislation be passed. The Prime Minister has said that the property was conveyed and title taken even before the introduction of this legislation. Therefore, for myself at any rate, I express regret that the government has seen fit to introduce legislation asking parliament to accept the full principle of maintaining and administering this property before the completion of the preliminary surveys to which reference has been made. According to the statements of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works, it is only after those surveys have been completed that the government will be in a position to indicate to the house their plans for the administration of the bequest and some idea of the cost of that administration. The position at the moment is that we are being asked to accept this legislation without any minister opposite being able to tell us the detailed or even the general plans for the administration of the project, or any idea of what the cost may be. I regret exceedingly that this course was followed, and that the legislation was not deferred until the government were in a position to enlighten the house.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I ask the Minister of Public Works whether important committees such as those selecting Rhodes scholars will be permitted to use this property for research work?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the public archivist was consulted before the government decided to accept the bequest.

Mr. St. Laurent: The public archivist was not consulted, but the public archivist knew of the terms of the will. He knew that it was the intention of the government to ask parliament to make him responsible for the custody of the house.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am speaking of the practicality of the scheme. Did he approve that?

Mr. St. Laurent: Will the hon. member please repeat his question?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Was the public archivist consulted about the feasibility of carrying out the intentions of the testator?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, he was not. It was taken for granted that it would be feasible.

KINGSMERE PARK

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 290, respecting Kingsmere park.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Federal district commission to administer Kingsmere park.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think I should just point out with respect to this section that we are asking that the governor in council have the right to describe Kingsmere park, because, though a survey has been in progress for some time, it has not been completed. A survey was required, because while this property is all in one block it had been acquired in different parcels, and it was felt there should be a survey so we would be able to transfer to the federal district commission something described by proper metes and bounds. It is for that reason that these bills were not introduced before this. We hoped to get the survey in order to make it a schedule to the act, as it is in the case of Laurier house, but we were unable to have the survey completed. Therefore subsection 5 of section 2 will authorize the governor in council to give a proper description when he gets it from the surveyors.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION—PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO BAND FUNDS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 15, consideration in committee of Bill No. 79, respecting Indians—Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce) —Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 110—Sale of lands of enfranchised Indians.

Mr. Charlton: Can the minister assure us that he will not see these reserves become pinpointed with white settlers? Just before adjournment last evening I made a few remarks on this section and pointed out that danger. Will the minister comment on that point?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We recognize that some Indians might be concerned about this section. Until they have read its provisions they might conclude that there could be pinpointing of reserves, as my hon. friend has termed it; but when this section is read along with a previous section it becomes perfectly obvious that there are several safeguards to prevent that from happening. In the first instance, land must be allotted to an Indian. That action is taken by the band council, with the approval of the minister. At a subsequent time, if he chooses to become enfranchised, he may apply to the band council and to the minister for the privilege of retaining the ownership of the land which has been allotted to him. Then there is a further safeguard that, nevertheless, he does not obtain title to that land until ten years after that date. It is true that at that point he may then sell it to anyone he chooses. This is a change from the old act, designed to meet the objections of some Indians, and in particular an objection made before the special committee by a distinguished former member of the Six Nations from Brantford, that it was unfair to the Indian that he should have land allotted to him, work on it and improve it, and that when he wants to become enfranchised—it is admittedly our policy to encourage him to do that—he should nevertheless be penalized at that point and be restrained from becoming enfranchised because he would then have to sell his land to a limited number of people, namely, the members of that particular band.

Strong representations were made before the special committee by Brigadier Martin that that was unfair. Similar representations have been made to me since that time by individual Indians. Other compassionate representations were made, one of which was that Indians, as my hon. friend has said, on the outskirts of a reserve might wish to become enfranchised and one could not distinguish whether they were on or off the reserve. But it was decided to continue the provisions of the present act, which are there but which have not been used, in such a way that an Indian could become enfranchised and at the same time reside on his land on the reserve. As I say, we have built up all these safeguards; the initial allotment which must be approved by the minister and the band council, the application for enfranchisement which must be approved by the minister, the application for land which must be approved by the band council and the minister, and then the ten year waiting period. So I think under those circumstances the numbers who will take advantage of this will be small. If there are some, they should have this right.

Mr. Charlton: I do not think that people living off the reserve should stipulate to Indians who are living on the reserve, as in the case mentioned by the minister. I do know of an Indian who has a very good farm, but he cannot will his land to his daughters if they marry non-Indians. I know that situation has arisen several times, and it does appear to be a little bit hard on those persons. I know of one Indian who is in that situation, and he cannot will his land to his daughters because they have all married whites. He lives north of the Grand river, as a matter of fact, bordering on white land. I suppose in certain cases it cannot be helped, but as I mentioned before, I hope it will not result in pinpointing the reserve. I do not believe the minister has ever had anyone come to him from the Six Nations council making this request.

Sections 111 to 125 inclusive agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, in connection with the preamble and the general substance of the bill as amended I suggest to the minister that in order to protect the rights of Indians covered by this act, no Indian should be denied recourse to the courts under the provisions of this bill. I ask the minister whether or not he would be prepared, having already taken the stand that there is no denial of recourse to the courts, to accept an amendment which reads as follows:

Nothing in this act or elsewhere shall in any way be deemed to remove, abridge or otherwise restrict the rights of Indians to full access to the courts of the land, and every Indian and every band of Indians shall have the full right to appeal to the appropriate court of the province which would otherwise have jurisdiction, from any decision of the minister hereunder.

I believe such a provision would be salutary in its effects. It would assure to the Indians a position of responsibility, coupled with an opportunity to preserve their rights against anything which they believed to be administrative lawlessness.

If there is one thing more than any other that I think should be assured to the Indians, it is the right to do what all the rest of us can do—to seek out the king's courts with a view to protection against what they consider to be wrongs. There would certainly be no harm to the administration of the act. The court would have no authority to review discretionary orders. The power of review would be the power to remedy wrongdoing wherever wrongdoing existed.

I make this request of the minister in the interests of the more than 100,000 Indians of this country. They should not be placed in the position of having their rights determined not in courts of law but by administrative officials or by the minister. Nothing is more important today than preserving the full rights of the individual under the law.

If my view be correct, we have in this country 125,000 native born Canadians who cannot, if injustice be done to them, seek out the king's courts for the preservation of their rights. If the minister's view be correct that the Indian has that right—I say with great deference that the Indian has no such right today under this act—then the amendment that I ask him to accept will add nothing to the rights of these people. If on the other hand my view be correct, then it will actually assure the Indian of something that over the years he has been asking for, namely, the rights that Canadian citizens and others who are not Canadians or British subjects enjoy—recourse to the king's courts.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, this brings up a subject which has been a matter of considerable astonishment to the minister since he took over the administration of the Indian Act. I never knew that an Indian could not sue in the courts of Canada in the same way as any other person—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Against administrative order?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I did not know that when I became minister of this department; I do not know it now. Indians have the right to sue in courts, and have been exercising those rights at all times that I am aware of, and nothing in the present Indian Act, or in the revised Indian Act now before the house, would abridge that right in any way. For that reason I would reject the amendment, not only because it might be considered unnecessary, but because it leaves the inference that in the present act, or in the revised act, there may be, or there may have been, an abridgement of that right.

This matter was referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre in his speech on Bill No. 267 last summer, when he said that an Indian, or a band in Saskatchewan—I am not sure which it is now—had been refused the right to sue the crown. As he said yesterday, there was a case in Saskatchewan in which damages were assessed against the crown by a court, I think it was in 1935. He said yesterday that as a result of that judgment others had been refused a fiat since to sue the crown. Now, both after he made the speech last year and yesterday I asked for and had a search made of our records, and with the exception of one case that I have been able to find, not in Saskatchewan, but in Manitoba, we have no record whatever of a fiat having been refused. It may well be—my hon. friend said he was counsel, and of course he knows—it may well be that there have been other cases, but if he was referring to the Manitoba case, then I am quite prepared to understand the point he made. The one case in Manitoba is well known to members from that province.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Sinclair case; I know the Manitoba one.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): In that case there had been certain transactions over forty years ago, which gave rise to debates in this house spread over a number of years. In the end a statute was passed by parliament settling the matter, at least in the view of those who were then responsible for the government of Canada, after negotiation and some form of settlement. Ultimately when it was sought to sue the crown on the basis of the prior matters having to do with that band, a fiat was refused in 1936 because parliament had already dealt with the matter and had presumably disposed of it.

So far as I know, that is the only case in which an Indian or a band council has been refused a fiat in recent times. There may have been some many years ago. When I visited Saskatchewan I met representative Indians, both in the northern part and in the southern part, and I did find an opinion there that they were not free to sue the crown. I told them that I thought they were more progressive than that. They were Canadian citizens; they had all the rights so far as access to the courts was concerned that I could think of, and that if anyone in the hall wanted to sue the minister or the crown all he had to do was to go outside and retain a solicitor to do it. We have not had any lawsuits since. I have repeated that statement in every meeting that I have had with the Indians. The right to sue the crown is well known by the Indians. Let there be no mistake about that.

I agree that there have been many complaints about maladministration, and there have been occasions in the past when perhaps if they had taken action they might have obtained damages in cases other than the one I have referred to. But these matters are adjusted. If complaints are made in or out of parliament, the Indian affairs branch does try to meet those complaints and in some way to make compensation for what might appear to be injustices. Nevertheless, I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that lawsuits are going on at this moment between Indians and the crown. There is no bar to them except the obtaining of a fiat, and that, as my hon. friend has pointed out, may be removed by action of this parliament; I think it is on the order paper. For that reason, sir, I would not want to give any credence to the suggestion that in the past there has been any objection to an Indian taking action against the crown, nor would I want to import into this bill the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the minister for his explanation. I know of the case in Manitoba. The solicitor in the case was the late Richard Mulcaster, K.C. The case in Saskatchewan to which I referred was in 1936, and was an application made by him, with myself to be counsel, in the case of the Mistawasis Indians. The application was made to the Department of Justice.

The minister referred to the case in Manitoba. I know the facts in connection with it. Indeed I read the debates in parliament long before I came to this house. If I recollect aright, the late Mr. Bradbury, M.P., of Selkirk, Manitoba, made a lengthy speech about millions of dollars that allegedly were owing to the band there by reason of the appropriation of certain lands in Manitoba that were taken over by the crown many years before. Again, speaking from recollection, I seem to recall that an action was started in the Exchequer Court of Canada about 1908 or 1909—the minister may correct me if I am wrong—and the action never came to trial. Is that not so?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): That is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes. I am speaking from recollection. I know that case very well. But the minister has not grasped the significance of what I have in mind. I do not say that an Indian has not the right in ordinary matters of recourse to the courts, but what I say is he has not the right today, except in the specified sections that allow an appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada, to appeal against administrative orders, except those specially covered by this act. In other words, he is in the position of being subject to order and direction under the act, except in so far as the three or four sections which allow an appeal to the exchequer court are concerned. He is in the position of a person whose rights may be determined, whose responsibilities may be declared, but at the same time, whether acceptable to him or not, he has no recourse to the courts, either by action, by prerogative right of mandamus or prohibition or certiorari.

These are the cases that I have in mind. These are the matters on which I am asking that the Indians be placed in a position equal to the rest of us. These are the rights. The right of appeal against an order of the king's ministry should be preserved to the individual. There is a case in that regard, reported I think in 1940 Supreme Court Reports, where in Saskatchewan a minister of the crown failed to discharge his responsibility under the natural resources act. The individual whose rights were interfered with had no right of action against the crown. I point out that he was not an Indian. His counsel carried the matter to the courts, by the use of the king's prerogative right to preserve the king's subjects from the tyranny of the king's ministers. That matter came before the court of appeal in Saskatchewan, and the court decided that every person within the king's dominions has the right of appeal to the king, and that the king in turn will ask that his ministers or his servants shall not diminish, interfere with or abrogate the rights of the subjects.

That is what I have in mind under this act, where tremendous powers are vested in the minister. Those powers can be exercised by the minister without right of appeal to the courts, except under certain specific sections which grant that right of appeal. For instance section 47 refers to authority conferred upon the minister by other sections, one of which deals with the testamentary disposition of property, the descent of property and the like.

Section 47 says that a decision of the minister made in the exercise of the jurisdiction or authority conferred upon him by section 42, 43 or 46 may, within two months from the date thereof, be appealed by any person affected thereby to the Exchequer Court of Canada, if the amount in controversy in the appeal exceeds $500, or if the minister consents to an appeal. Then, the second subsection states that the judges of the exchequer court may make rules, and so on.

There are a few provisions in which appeals are allowed, but many sections deny the right of appeal from the minister. There can be no appeal from the minister's decision unless, as in section 47, the power is actually granted. I am asking the minister to grant to Indians affected by administrative regulations or rulings the right of appeal to the king's courts, in order to preserve the rights of the individual against the possibility of injustices on the part of the minister or his advisers.

The minister takes the broad and general view that there is a right of appeal to the courts by Indians. Certainly, they have a general right; but within the Indian Act they are restricted and are denied an appeal, except where it is specifically given. There is no disagreement between us that an Indian can appeal if a decision in a criminal case is made against him, or if he wishes to take action in the courts. But the right of appeal under the Indian Act, in so far as administrative matters are concerned or, indeed, in so far as declaratory orders by the minister are concerned, is denied, and that right exists only where specifically given, as set out in section 47.

I am glad the minister has brought the matter up in this way. There is never any disagreement between us that the Indian has a general right of recourse to the courts. The disagreement arises when it is realized that, under the Indian Act, except where granted the special right of appeal, he has no rights in the courts of the country. If he had the right, as the minister insists, there would have been no section 47 granting him a specific right in certain circumstances. Owing to the fact that in respect of various types of orders under the act that right of recourse is not available, I made application to the minister to give consideration along the lines suggested.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I appreciate what the hon. member has said; but I wonder if we have not narrowed the field of discussion from that indicated in his opening remarks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I gathered from his preliminary statement that there were few rights, if any, in an Indian for access to the courts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, I did not say that.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Then I misunderstood the hon. member. We have now confined ourselves to section 47, as an example of an appeal, under conditions to which I shall refer later. Section 47 is in the act because the minister is created a court in respect of certain probate and administrative matters. Provision is made for an appeal roughly equivalent to the appeal which exists in surrogate courts, in connection with ordinary estates work.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Excepting to a different court.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Yes, as my hon. friend says, excepting to a different court. So that one would expect it to be there in order to get the proper administration of estates.

However the other subject he mentioned, namely the case in Saskatchewan affecting a minister of the crown, I thought closed the argument against the amendment. I think the decision in that case was made on the broad basis he stated, namely that the right to a prerogative writ is not abrogated unless there is specific legislation saying so. And since there is no such provision in the present bill, I suggest that any court would hold just as the Saskatchewan court did with respect to those rights.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES COMPENSATION ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ADVANCES TO COMPENSATION BOARDS, ADMINISTRATION CHANGES, ETC.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 291, to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—General administration expenses.

Mr. Herridge: Would the parliamentary assistant explain the procedure under section 2?

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, up until April 1 last there was a difference in the administration of this act as between Quebec on the one hand and the other provinces on the other. The situation now however is much the same throughout the country. The Minister of Finance pays into the fund of each provincial compensation board a certain amount each month to take care of the administrative costs incurred in connection with the administration of the act through provincial boards. I do not know that I can add much to what I have said and I hope it satisfies my hon. friend.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): Mr. Chairman, yesterday when we were at the resolution stage the hon. member for Bow River said that he was quite familiar with the Alberta labour legislation and stated that he thought it was splendid legislation. I know something about labour legislation in Alberta and I want to state that labour has not been too well recognized in that province. There is not even a minister of labour in the provincial government.

This legislation is going to be tied in with the provisions of the Alberta act. When a workman is injured he is interested in three things. First, he wants to know how quickly he can get back to work. Second, he wants to know how much he is going to receive when suffering from his injuries or his industrial disease. Third, he wants to know when he is going to receive it. In Alberta an injured workman is faced with a five-day waiting period after which he is paid compensation on the basis of 66⅔ per cent of his average weekly earnings. In Saskatchewan he needs to wait only one day after which he receives 75 per cent of his average weekly earnings and the same is true in Ontario.

I understand that the Alberta act is to be reviewed this year and I sincerely hope it will be improved. I was pleased to hear the Minister of Labour state yesterday that whatever improvements are made in the Alberta legislation would apply to the two areas covered by this bill.

CONSUMER CREDIT

CONDITIONAL SALE CONTRACTS AND ENFORCEMENT PROVISION—AMENDMENT OF ACT OF 1950-51

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 195, to amend the Consumer Credit (Temporary Provisions) Act.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, before we go into committee, when we shall be able to ask questions in more detail, I wish the parliamentary assistant would say something as to the effectiveness of the act passed last September. Perhaps he could give us some figures in that connection and indicate in a general way whether there is a pattern of weakness that has developed and which is to be dealt with by these amendments. It seems to me that the amendments are more or less directed along the one line.

Mr. Speaker: As the parliamentary assistant is acting for the minister, if he speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement now, and when we get into committee I will answer any question that may be asked. As far as the first request of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) is concerned, it is a little difficult, from the statistics assembled by the dominion bureau of statistics, to say what has been the full impact of the restraining effect of these consumer credit restrictions.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wonder if the parliamentary assistant would refer specifically to the regulations which were passed in the autumn and to those which were passed shortly after the turn of the year?

Mr. Sinclair: Last fall after the passage of the act the first set of regulations were brought into effect. These provided for a down payment of one-third in the case of automobiles, with 18 months to pay, and a down payment of 20 per cent, with 18 months to pay, in the case of other goods described as consumer goods. That was not greatly out of line with the type of credit which was being extended at that time by the larger business concerns in Canada. Some of the smaller dealers, especially those dealing in household appliances, had been extending more generous credit.

The initial step was taken to set up the administration and endeavour to have the various associations in Canada concerned with the sale of consumer goods, such as the Retail Merchants Association, the Canadian Automobile Association, and the finance companies, understand the type of regulations we were going to apply. Those regulations had just a mildly restraining effect according to the records of the dominion bureau of statistics for the last quarter of 1950. Each quarter the bureau publishes a report dealing with retail consumer credit, the last one being for the quarter ending December 31, 1950. I have the figures in manuscript form for some of the principal commodities for the next quarter, ending March 31, 1951.

Because the restrictions first in effect were found to be only mildly effective, on March 19 the rates were raised to a down payment of 50 per cent on automobiles, with 12 months to pay, and one-third down on other consumer goods. There was a slight difference in the treatment of these two groups. When a new automobile was purchased the trade-in value of the old automobile could be applied on the down payment, but in the case of furniture or other commodities the trade-in value was taken off the total selling price, after which the regulations applied.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Why the difference?

Mr. Sinclair: I think the main reason was that in the case of the purchase of a new automobile the trade-in value of the old car generally represents considerably more than the down payment, especially when a person turns in a car only three or four years old. But the trade-in value of furniture is quite low and encouragement might have been given to placing a fictitious value on old furniture being turned in if it was going to be taken as part of the cash down payment.

The hon. member asked about the impact of the regulations upon the sale of these commodities. The first regulations came into effect on November 1 of last year. I think if I gave the sales of automobiles and then the break-down of the percentage of advances for different months it would give some indication of the trend. The sales of new cars were as follows:

October	35,779
November	32,880
December	29,309
January	33,759
February	43,080
March	49,404

Mr. Gibson: Before the budget.

Mr. Sinclair: The March figure of course undoubtedly does reflect accelerated buying before the budget. Of these the great bulk were sold for cash. The figures as to those financed in the same months are as follows: October, 11,919, or 33 per cent; November, 10,958, again 33 per cent; November, 9,257, a decline to 31·6 per cent; January, 8,348, or 24·7 per cent, quite a marked decrease in instalment purchases; February, 8,730; 20·3 per cent of the cars sold in that month were financed. Then in March, with the sharp rise in sales no doubt in part due to the expectations held as far as the budget was concerned, there were 25·8 per cent.

Mr. Drew: How many cars?

Mr. Sinclair: Of the 49,404 cars sold there were 12,745 sold on instalment buying in that month. There has been a steady increase in the sales of cars since the regulations were introduced, but there has been quite a noticeable decrease in the percentage of cars sold under instalment buying. The other figures are a little more difficult to ascertain because the dominion bureau of statistics takes quite a bit longer to assemble them from all the trades concerned. Members undoubtedly have studied the figures given in the report covering the last quarter of 1950. Since the last quarter of 1950 included a month in which there were no consumer credit regulations as well as two months in which there were consumer credit regulations, the picture perhaps is not shown very accurately. The new report on consumer credit will be out in the next two or three days. From the manuscript, which unfortunately is not completed, I can pick out certain representative sales. These sales are given in percentages.

For example, in the period October to December inclusive of last year 68·7 per cent of all department store sales were for cash, 13 per cent on instalment buying, and 18·3 per cent on monthly charge accounts. We now have the figures for department stores for this quarter. They show an increase to 69 per cent in cash sales, quite a marked drop of 2·3 per cent to 10·7 per cent in instalment buying, and an increase in charge accounts to 20·3 per cent. Therefore there has been a drop in instalment buying through department stores, which are one of the principal methods of sale by instalment and credit accounts, a slight rise in cash sales and a rise in charge accounts.

The amendments in the present bill are quite minor. The first amendment has to do with a fairly new device used mainly by department stores. Most department stores have charge accounts which people are expected to settle at the end of each month. If they are in arrears two months of course the store takes the usual credit action. I have a table here showing the extent of days outstanding in department stores. For December, 1948, the figure for average days outstanding on charge accounts is 65, for 1949 it is 67, and for 1950 it is 71. However, these charge accounts are not instalment buying in the ordinary sense.

As well as ordinary instalment buying where a definite contract is arranged for each piece of equipment or furniture sold, department stores and other large stores have set up revolving credit accounts, six month accounts, where the customer establishes with the company a line of credit. Take, for example, an individual who is able to establish to the satisfaction of the credit manager that he can pay a line of credit of $240 in a six month period. He is expected to make an immediate down payment of one-sixth, $40. If he does not buy anything from the store that month there is no need for him to make the next payment. If he makes any purchase whatsoever, then he must at the end of the first month pay the second one-sixth, or $40. That system is carried on throughout the six month period.

The loophole, so far as consumer credit was concerned, however, was that there was no conditional sale of the particular article which he might have purchased. He pays his $40 down, and then a week or two weeks later may decide to buy a small stove, for example. The stove is sold to him purely on the credit card which he has for his revolving credit account. The lawyers felt that was a loophole, and that the definition of conditional sale should be expanded to cover revolving credit accounts. The problem is a minor one because these revolving credit accounts limit the credit to six months whereas under our present regulations we allow conditional sales to be made over a twelve month period. It is true that the down payment in this respect would be only one-sixth, that is, the first month's payment, rather than the one-third which we ask for under a conditional sale, but that one-third of course applies to the whole year. Therefore the actual loophole to be closed is a very small one.

The second loophole which has been disclosed is the matter of payment under a contract for hire of consumer goods. There has always been a perfectly legitimate business in renting refrigerators and household furnishings of various sorts for short periods to people who may be transients or only want to rent furniture for a while. However, since the introduction of consumer credit regulations, both in Canada and the United States, a new device has appeared. Let us take a television set costing $600. Under our present regulations the purchaser would have to pay $200 down and pay the balance of $400 in the next year. There have been some merchants who have said to customers: We will rent you this $600 television set for the next thirty months. You will not have any down payment to make. You will just pay $20 a month for the next thirty months, and at the end of that time we will cut the rental rate down to $1 a year.

This practice is not very widespread yet in this country. However, it became quite widespread in the United States. They stopped it by not authorizing such rental agreement beyond the fifteen months which they allow for conditional sales. They also required a one-third deposit by the person renting on which the company must pay the customer interest. Therefore they have solved the problem quite nicely in that way. That does not in any way affect the perfectly bona fide rental of ordinary household furniture for three or four months such as conducted in most of the large cities by furniture stores.

The next amendment has to do with contracts for work and labour. Let me give two examples. First there is the example of a man taking a car to a garage and having a new engine installed. The claim was made that that was a work contract and that the regulations requiring one-third down and payment within a year did not apply. The same sort of argument was raised where a plumber would instal an automatic washing machine. He would supply the washing machine and instal it, and then claim that since his labour was involved it was a labour contract which did not come within the scope of this legislation. That, of course, was most unfair to ordinary appliance dealers and stores selling the same article, and being forced to sell it under this consumer credit act. So that, too, has been brought into the amendment with the thought that if it is desired the labour can be separated from the material content of the consumer goods involved, and the payments for labour can be whatever the person supplying the labour wishes, but the actual sale of the consumer goods content will be subject to these regulations.

The third change has been the requirement that loan companies who are not directly concerned with sales but who advance money to finance sales must keep records of loans for the purchase of consumer goods in the same manner as we require of the stores who actually sell the goods. The last amendment is to authorize the officers not only to inspect books but to take books to court if necessary, providing they must be returned within 90 days.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—"Conditional sales contract."

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to make one or two general comments on this and then have something to say about the wording. Regret has been expressed in this house on previous occasions that the restrictions of last autumn were so inadequate. As a matter of fact I think the parliamentary assistant used exactly the right phrase this afternoon when he said they had a very 'mildly restraining effect.' I do not propose to dwell further on that at the moment, but will come to the wording of section 1. The parliamentary assistant has already given some explanation of it, and I am referring to the words which are underlined: "whether or not the seller retains any property, interest or lien in respect of the goods." When I read that I thought it was to deal with a slightly different situation from that mentioned by the parliamentary assistant. I thought it dealt with cases in which the vendor gave up all title and in that way sought to escape the effects of the act. In other words he trusted the man and abandoned any legal remedy. Am I wrong in thinking this is intended to cover that case as well as other cases? If that is not so, would the parliamentary assistant again specify exactly what section 1 does?

Mr. Sinclair: That situation has not been drawn to my attention nor, I believe, to the attention of the administrator. If the vendor should abandon all claim to future payment he would put the purchaser of the equipment in a pretty nice position.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I did not mean he would abandon all claim but that he would abandon property, interest or lien, which I suppose he could do. However, let us not talk about something which it is not intended to cover.

Mr. Sinclair: The intention here is to cover the revolving credit plans of department stores. They present no real problem actually, since they are for a period of six months rather than a year and are therefore well within the terms of this legislation. The only point of difference is that their first payment is only one-sixth instead of the one-third we require. On the other hand their period of repayment is only six months instead of the period of up to one year we permit. The intention is to bring them under the regulation. In that case there is no specific contract between the seller and the buyer covering the article that has been purchased under revolving credit.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then is it the hon. gentleman's understanding that in those cases the seller does lose title and has to depend upon the willingness of the creditor to pay?

Mr. Sinclair: That would be my interpretation. It is the same as an ordinary charge account in any store. There is no actual contract of sale for the purchase of anything you may buy, food or clothing, on a charge account. What the revolving credit plan actually does is eliminate the necessity of the customer dashing up to the credit office to establish his credit for every major purchase he may want to make.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I feel that we are in danger of being shipwrecked in a sea of unlimited credit. It is a very good thing to extend credit under certain conditions, but I feel that credit today is unrestricted. You have only to look at the daily newspapers to see page after page of advertisements covering goods very often sold on credit. I reside in a country where credit is very limited. We are fifty miles from a railway, and the trust companies and banks will not loan money on land. You must have very good assets in order to get loans of any kind. The same situation prevails in many parts of Canada far from the great commercial centres. The further you get from St. James street and Bay street the more limited your credit becomes; and because these people are denied credit they are self-sufficient, they stand on their own feet, they are prosperous and happy. I would like some of our city dwellers to think that over.

An hon. Member: City slickers.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): No, I do not use the word an hon. gentleman has used. We are victims of habit. We are gregarious. We gather in cities. We like to be together. We like to go to picture shows and to have all the attractions of Sparks street, Bloor street, and so on. I believe credit is destroying this country. If I were writing a new charter for Canada one of my first acts would be to teach children in the primary schools the dangers of signing a promissory note. As far as a mortgage is concerned I would place it in the same category as any other dangerous thing. My hon. colleague from Oxford is not here. He is a pharmacist, and he would tell you that in his place of business poison is labelled in a very prominent way. I think the grief and misery we have in this country are due to people signing mortgages without a second thought. Take a young man whose father leaves him a farm free of debt. Some smart salesman comes along and wants him to buy this, that or the other. He tells him, "You can pay for it over a long period of years; just sign here," and the farmer signs on the dotted line.

I see some of my C.C.F. friends are waking up to this. I wonder why the opposition in the house does not take up these matters which are so vital to family life in this country. Look at the indebtedness of Canada—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member will realize that this bill does not cover the whole field of investment and credit. The examples he has cited, such as mortgages, are quite in order as long as they prove a point which is related to the bill, but the hon. member should not expand upon these examples to such an extent that he loses sight of the fact that we are dealing now with consumer credit. The principle of the bill is not now under discussion, and his remarks must be strictly relevant to the section before us.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I thought I was in order in discussing consumer credit, and that my remarks were pertinent to this matter now before the committee. I say that it extends to other fields within the nation. If the nation goes into debt, the province accumulates vast debt, the municipality and so on down to the family. I believe it is a matter which should be very prominently before this house. The curbing of credit would help us win many victories in Canada.

Mr. Jones: I am in full sympathy with this bill, and I support it wholeheartedly. It has been drawn to my attention that a little injustice is being done to the motor car dealers of British Columbia. I have some correspondence from the Motor Dealers Association of British Columbia with headquarters in Vancouver, as well as from several independent garages in the interior of the province. They cite their experience since this measure was introduced. In order to give some indication of what they have in mind, I shall quote briefly from one letter which is typical of the others. It reads:

> The recent credit regulations have certainly accomplished the aim of the government to restrict unwarranted spending. They have also put a serious obstacle in the way for a man that is compelled to purchase transportation in order to enable him to get to and from his work. They do not hinder a man of means, who can purchase a new car each year, but they do seriously hurt the worker that must have essential transportation.

The letter continues along that line. It points out that the generally high freight rate to British Columbia severely handicaps British Columbia dealers, and puts them at a disadvantage on each car that is sold. For example, the freight from Windsor to Vernon, B.C., is approximately $300, whereas the freight on the same car delivered to Ottawa or Toronto would be $30 or $50. I believe the dealers have approached the government about this matter. They believe that there should be three distinct districts created for the purpose of the credit regulations on automobiles, and they ask for relief on that basis. They would divide Canada into three zones, one west of the great lakes, Ontario and Quebec, and the maritimes. They have asked that the zone west of the great lakes and the maritimes be given relief to the extent of a forty per cent down payment with fifteen months to pay. It is felt that credit regulations covering the whole of Canada, as they do, are unfair because they work a hardship on the purchaser of a car in British Columbia who would have to pay at least $125 or $150 more by way of down payment than the purchaser of the same car in Ottawa or Toronto.

With that in mind, they suggest that the government should give serious consideration to setting up these three zones now. I do not know if that can be done at this stage of the bill, or whether the parliamentary assistant has investigated the matter and found no practical solution. I do feel, however, that an extension of time should be given to those who are in the west or in the maritimes, and who have to purchase a car. In my riding the main source of income is the fruit, on which payments are made twice a year. Naturally, those people with a monthly income can meet their monthly payments much more easily than people who receive their income in one or two payments during the year. For that reason, I would ask the department and the parliamentary assistant to give serious consideration to the granting of the request of the association of motor dealers of British Columbia.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, I am particularly pleased to hear the member for Yale speak so well of the consumer credit regulations generally, because he has extensive knowledge of their workings in his own retail businesses. The problem of the impact of these regulations on British Columbia has been raised with the minister by the automobile association. Two points arise immediately. Of course, the argument raised applies only to Canadian cars. I am told that British-made cars are laid down in Vancouver at prices lower than any other place in Canada, including Halifax, because they generally come out as deck loads on the timber ships returning to B.C. The first step, therefore, in any regulation to cover this situation would have to be the singling out of whether the car was of Canadian or British make.

The other point it raises is the fact that once you try to get zones for consumer credit regulations based on independent things such as freight rates or local sales tax—the sales tax of three per cent in British Columbia is another factor which raises the price—it makes the regulations very difficult to administer. This time our regulations are even simpler than those in effect during the last war when we had a variety of rates for different commodities. The retail trade found it very difficult to keep abreast of these various rates, the various types of down payment and terms of repayment. It was for this reason that, after consultation with the retail trade of Canada, the department decided to make the regulations as simple as possible. In the case of a car it is a half down, and twelve months to pay; in the case of other consumer goods, one-third down and twelve months to pay. For these reasons the department decided that it would be best to have one national set of rules. Once you extended such considerations to the purchase of Canadian-made cars, you would I suppose have to give similar concessions to the sale of British cars in Winnipeg or Regina. Then, of course, you would be led into concessions to other heavy goods in which the freight rate is a substantial item, such as stoves and refrigerators.

The other point raised by the hon. member is already covered in the regulations. It is provided that in the case of a farmer, fisherman or other person whose annual income is derived mainly in one or two lump sums, he can make payment in that fashion, provided the terms of payment are still within the year mentioned in the regulations.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is any attempt made to distinguish between pleasure cars and the cars used in the course of a man's occupation? The objection one hears raised to the regulation is that they very often hurt the man who needs a car in the conduct of his business. I should like to know if that has been considered, or if it is thought possible to do that? My own feeling would be that if it were possible it would be a good thing. Whether or not it can be done on the basis of the cost of more expensive cars and less expensive, I do not know.

Mr. Sinclair: The criterion of distinction used there is whether the car is individually owned or owned by a company. A car owned by an incorporated company is primarily for business use, whereas cars owned by individuals are very often partly for pleasure and partly for business. There is an exemption in the regulations for cars which are used for business purposes entirely. We do not exempt a car which is used by an individual partly for his business and partly for pleasure.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There is no regulation whereby a man could satisfy you that, in fact, his car, although personally owned, is used for his business? There must be thousands of such cases.

Mr. Murphy: Can the parliamentary assistant clear that up, because I know firms who have representatives on the road, and the employee owns the car but uses it for his business. He also has a car of his own for pleasure use. What would be the ruling in that case?

Mr. Sinclair: If the company owns the car—

Mr. Murphy: I do not mean that. The individual owns the car, but it is used for business purposes. He owns a car for his own personal use.

Mr. Sinclair: I am afraid in that case both of them would be subject to these regulations. With regard to the other point raised, when an employee of a company has to have a car, and the company itself does not care to provide a car for him, I would think in most cases the company would certainly assist in whatever financing he would need himself to carry the down payment if that were necessary. Here again there is the great problem of making a national law simple, effective and understood. We try to keep our administration staff down to as small a number as possible in the interest of economy. If we had to investigate each of the thousands of claims that a privately owned car was used more for business than for pleasure it would require a very much bigger and more costly staff than we propose to have, and it would have to be on a widespread national basis.

Mr. Low: Will the regulations which apply to new cars also apply to used cars?

Mr. Sinclair: That is so if they are financed. New cars of course are wholly sold through dealers. The bulk of the used car trade is one individual selling to another individual. We have no control over that at all; but if cars are sold on the instalment plan through regular dealers, exactly the same regulations apply.

Mr. Murphy: Does it apply to the dealer who takes back a refrigerator, a stove or something like that?

Mr. Sinclair: The same regulations apply to used equipment. With the regular conditional sale, which is financed on the instalment plan, the regulations apply; but the personal arrangement between individuals is different. It might be desirable to apply it, but the actual job of policing it or enforcing it would be beyond any reasonably staffed government bureau.

Mr. Fraser: That is a hardship on the regular authorized dealers. Would they not feel the effects of it?

Mr. Sinclair: The actual division of cars which are sold through dealers and cars which are sold through individuals has not changed very much since the regulations were introduced. The ordinary person who is trying to sell his car personally generally wants cash. It is to the dealer that a person goes if he wants more generous treatment in the way of cash payment than he can get through an ordinary private sale. If you look at the evening papers you will see that most used cars offered by individuals are for cash, or at the outside on six months terms. If an individual wants it financed he sells to a dealer, or finances through a loan company, and so the sale becomes subject to these regulations.

Mr. Low: The volume would be small.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Jones: Can the parliamentary assistant tell me what method is to be adopted to enforce these regulations? Are you going to depend on individuals to enforce it, or are you going to appoint a staff to supervise enforcement?

Mr. Sinclair: The number of administrative officers here, both in the last war and so far, has been comparatively small because of the very great co-operation we have had from the trade associations. We have ten inspectors in the field, and a total staff of eight here at Ottawa. Groups like the Retail Merchants Association, for example, are the very first to report what they consider to be infractions by merchants. The merchant in the small town who is obeying the regulations can very quickly tell if his competitor is, by evasion of regulations, getting customers whom he had, or customers who he knows have not the down payments. That is where our field men move in immediately. So far this has been a comparatively quiet period in which the trade and the customers have been getting used to the regulations. There have not been any prosecutions as yet, although seven cases are now before the Department of Justice for their opinion. There have been quite a number of minor infractions which have been reported. Most of those infractions were made in ignorance of the regulations, not through a deliberate attempt at evasion, and they have been adjusted and contracts redrawn in line with the regulations; but the co-operation received from the actual industry, the department stores and retail merchants across the country, has been exceptional.

Mr. Quelch: I cannot quite understand why there should be credit restrictions on the sale of used cars. In most parts of the country they are a drug on the market. After all, if people spend their money on used cars they will not be able to buy other goods, and to that extent they will relieve inflationary pressures in other ways. Many of the dealers who in the past have had new cars now find great difficulty in selling them because of the requirement of 50 per cent down and the balance in twelve months. Would it not be possible to relieve the situation in so far as the used car is concerned?

Mr. Sinclair: One of the most immediate problems would be the definition of what is a used car. That of course was a great problem under price control during the last war. If credit curbs are to be applied to the sale of cars, I think it is only fair to the automobile manufacturers and to the new car dealers at least that the same curbs be applied to used cars as to new cars. The curbs of course are less onerous in terms of dollars on used cars because, the price being lower, the down payment is lower and the monthly payment is lower; but one of the main difficulties would be to define what is a used car.

Mr. Low: And yet I think the hon. member knows that the price of a car one year old is almost as great as the price of a new one.

Mr. Sinclair: That depends of course at the present time on the make of the car. It depends on cars which are still in short supply, the manufacturer's supply.

Mr. Low: If a person goes to one of the used car lots in this city today and finds a 1950 car with a mileage of 10,000 miles or 15,000 miles he will find that it is priced almost as high as a new car.

Mr. Graydon: Like wine, it improves with age.

Mr. Drew: Has there been some evidence of an accumulation of used cars to a degree that would cause a measure of concern at the present time?

Mr. Sinclair: Not to the knowledge of the dominion bureau of statistics. Unfortunately, on used cars our figures are not nearly as accurate as they are on new cars, because it is dealer sales which are reported, and a great deal of used car sales are not through dealers, but the sale of used cars has kept step pretty well with the sale of new cars across the country. Let me give first of all the financing of used cars by numbers in the first quarter of each of these years, 1948, 1949, 1950. Here are the number of used cars which are sold under finance, and that is the only record we have, because we have no record of private transactions: In 1948, 17,488; in 1949, 23,658; in 1950, 37,160; and in 1951, 56,256. In fairness again I must point out that there was a quite marked increase in the sale of used cars as well as new cars in the month before the budget.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Meanwhile, can the parliamentary assistant tell us what is the rate of production of new cars?

Mr. Sinclair: I have not got the rate of production of new cars, but I have the rate of sales of new cars, and that figure I gave earlier.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I was going to refer to that figure. Just running roughly over it, the figures that were given were as follows: October, 35,000; then going up to 37,000. In December it was down to 29,000. In January, it was 33,000; in February, 43,000; and in March, 49,000. In the face of those numbers one would say that the restriction has not been very effective, but there may have been strong offsetting influences at work. Can a word be said on that?

Mr. Sinclair: The restrictions of course were designed to cut off the buying of cars and other commodities by people who really did not have the money, who were in a credit range far beyond their grasp; but it was also designed to encourage the payment of cash rather than borrowing, and the fact that the instalment purchase has fallen in the same period from 33 per cent in October, 1950, which was the normal month before the introduction of these consumer credit regulations, to 20 per cent, and even in the month before the budget with accelerated buying to 25 per cent, shows that these restrictions are encouraging more cash sales and less credit sales.

Mr. Fraser: You have not the figures for April?

Mr. Sinclair: They are not out yet.

Mr. Fraser: You will find a great drop in the sale of cars. They are a drug on the market now.

Mr. Sinclair: That is of course to be expected. That happens with the sales of almost every commodity in which there is to be an expectation of tax changes. It would happen in the month before. It is to be expected that people may hurry their purchases to the month before the budget. At the same time it would have an effect upon instalment buying, because those people are not so likely to have the cash available and they might have to turn to credit to finance the purchase of a car in March which they had not expected to purchase until April or May.

Mr. Fraser: I understand the reason there was such a demand for cars in March was that the workers in the automobile factories understood that nickel and chrome plate were not going to be put on cars after a certain date, so that they asked that they be given their cars before the budget came down, or before the restrictions on nickel took place.

Mr. Hosking: Did I understand the parliamentary assistant to say that cars that were not financed through finance corporations could be financed beyond the limits controlled by the corporations?

Mr. Sinclair: No, I did not say that. What I said was that the sale of a car from one individual to another might be affected in this way: for example, if I decided to sell my car tonight, put an ad in an Ottawa newspaper and found a customer, the actual arrangements which I as an individual might make are not controlled by the act. If they had to come within the framework of this measure, enforcement would be difficult. The actual fact however is that in connection with those personal sales the general expectation of the seller is to have all cash, which is the desire behind this legislation. Certainly the ordinary private seller of a car is not in a position to extend credit for six months, a year or eighteen months to some purchaser generally unknown to him. That is why such sales are not much of a factor when it comes to curbing credit.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to return to the question of wording, and to the explanation given. If I understood the information given about the revolving fund, that has to do, it seems to me, with the relations as between debtor and creditor, between vendor and purchaser. Does the parliamentary assistant agree that I am right in my understanding of what he said?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It has nothing to do with title to the goods. It is really more in the nature of a banking relationship. If that is so, then I would ask hon. members to look at the words of the amendment, which have to do wholly with the title to the goods, where it says "whether or not the seller retains any property, interest or lien in respect of the goods." If I have understood correctly the explanation given, then I am not able to understand why this amendment, which has to do with the question of title, has any effect on the other relationship, which is one of debtor and creditor. I am wondering whether that can be right.

Mr. Sinclair: Well, this being a point which was raised by lawyers in the Department of Justice, I am not competent to discuss it with the hon. member, so far as the legal aspect of the matter is concerned. But earlier in the same section we find the words, "under the terms of which a buyer is to obtain possession of any goods without paying the price thereof in full". This covers the case of the revolving fund.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): But again, that is not a question of title; it is just a question of possession. I am not much of a lawyer, either, but it does seem we are dealing with two entirely different things. With deference I suggest that possibly this section might stand until the lawyers explain what they mean. Unless I completely misunderstood the explanation given—well, as the saying goes, "Dem two tings don't paralyse."

Mr. Hosking: In Ontario title to the car is sold with the licence. That is the title to the automobile. The note or lien on the automobile is held by way of a lien mortgage, which is something separate from the title. In connection with the title of an automobile in Ontario, there is no registration of a lien note in any way. The title is clear, once the car is sold. Title must be given to the new owner.

Mr. Sinclair: Title is covered by the terms of conditional sales. But, to get back to the revolving fund, the definition in the act of a conditional sale did not include that type of sale. The underlined words here make it quite clear.

The point is largely academic because, with the revolving fund, since they limit themselves to six months they are still within the scope of the legislation in any case. But the department, in order to make it clear that even in those cases where a separate contract was not executed for the sale, for example, of a refrigerator, where the purchase was made under this revolving fund, has made it so the conditions of credit under this act would still apply.

Mr. Jones: Where a person sells his car on his own terms does he have to comply with the act?

Mr. Sinclair: So long as he has owned the car six months, on a sale he arranges himself. If he has owned the car six months the sale is his own responsibility.

Mr. Jones: It does not come under the act?

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Mr. Jones: Does that not leave a wide opportunity for abuse? The ownership of the car can be retained until it is transferred. I am only suggesting that it seems to me that a private car owner could hang on to his car, and sell it within a two-year period if he liked.

Mr. Sinclair: First of all he must own it for six months, and secondly, one thing the individual wants is cash. If he goes to a finance company or a lending institution he must make certain arrangements. If he wishes to make a private arrangement for the sale of the car, that does not come within the act. The main purpose of selling the car, as a rule, is to raise as much cash as he can. Certainly he would not normally be content to wait one or two years for his payment.

Section agreed to.

On section 2.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am bearing in mind what the parliamentary assistant said about the mixture of work and goods. He gave an instance of a man having work done on his car, and of goods supplied. Is this provision to apply only to the goods, or also to the work done?

Mr. Sinclair: The provision applies only to the actual goods put in. If the contractor wishes to render two separate bills, one for labour and one for goods, his bill for labour can be spread over ten years. That is his concern. However, the bill for goods must come within the confines of the act. What generally happens is that a store sells just one thing, namely the goods and the cost of installation. They want the whole cost included under this credit regulation. But if an individual wants to separate the goods from the labour, then the consumer credit regulation applies only to the goods. The regulations will be drawn up after this measure is passed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then I would direct attention to the last two lines of the section:

> Engages in the business or makes a practice of lending money.

Would that include the chartered banks?

Mr. Sinclair: It includes the chartered banks and the small loan companies, yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then are they to be required to keep accounts in a special way; or would the ordinary accounting of the chartered banks, for instance, be sufficient for these purposes?

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed by the superintendent of insurance that the ordinary records in the chartered banks, and in connection with personal loans of finance companies, are perfectly satisfactory. All this says is that they must have such accounts available in connection with consumer regulations as well.

Bill reported.

Canadian Commercial Corporation

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO PERMIT PERFORMANCE OF SERVICES FOR DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production) moved the second reading of Bill No. 284, to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, when the new Department of Defence Production was set up at the start of the current fiscal year it took over the task of the procurement of supplies for the three armed services, which function up to that time had been performed by the Canadian Commercial Corporation. The corporation was then left with the task of carrying out transactions for other governments and of attending to certain bulk purchases. The change in its duties was quite considerable and as a result certain changes are required in the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act.

These changes do not involve matters of principle, they involve only matters of clarification. Perhaps it would be more desirable if I dealt with them in committee, but at this stage I could indicate what they are. The first amendment simply clarifies the definition of minister. There was some doubt as to whether the next amendment was legally necessary, but it does make clear that the corporation has the legal capacity to perform the functions authorized by other acts of parliament. The third amendment clarifies the language used with respect to the revolving fund authorized under the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act. It does not add any new power to what was stated to be included when the section was originally passed by this house, but it does clarify the language.

The next provision is to permit a smaller quorum at the meetings of the directors, reducing the quorum to three. The number of directors is being reduced from nine to six. The act authorizes a board of directors made up of from five to nine with a quorum of five, which will be reduced to three by this amendment. The concluding section makes it possible for certain employees of the corporation to be brought under the benefits of the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Canadian Commercial Corporation

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wonder if the parliamentary assistant could make some general remarks about the scope of the work of the Canadian Commercial Corporation. I understand that since 1946 its work for the Department of National Defence has become vastly more important.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): If the parliamentary assistant speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. McIlraith: If I may be permitted to continue my remarks. Perhaps I could give that information by indicating the number of contracts let during the last three fiscal years. In 1948-49 the number of contracts awarded by the corporation on behalf of the Department of National Defence was 65,308 with a value of $145,033,051. In 1949-50 the number of contracts was 84,600 with a value of $221,538,679. In 1950-51 the number of contracts was 112,000 with a value of $676,286,512. The figure for the number of contracts placed in 1950-51 is subject to final check, but I think it is accurate.

The values of the contracts placed on behalf of foreign governments and relief agencies for the same three years were as follows:

1949-50	31,194,138
1950-51	102,937,447

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Those would cover what agencies?

Mr. McIlraith: On behalf of foreign governments, and including certain agencies.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I thought the parliamentary assistant referred to relief agencies.

Mr. McIlraith: The United Nations relief and rehabilitation administration was the one I had in mind. I just forget whether it was still in existence in 1948. But in any event it would cover any international organizations outside our own government. I can give the administrative expenses in connection with the contracts placed on behalf of the Department of National Defence, along with the percentage of the total contract value. These figures are as follows:

		per cent
1948-49	$ 773,811.07	·53
1949-50	999,783.52	·45
1950-51	1,394,302.00	·2062

It will be noted that the administrative costs in terms of the percentage of the contract values is quite small in the case of 1950-51, and out of fairness I think I should say that with buying increasing in the last few months of the year there might be a lag in the amount of administrative work. Hon. members perhaps should appreciate that, when considering the precise figures for the percentages. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that there is much more I can usefully deal with that would illustrate the work.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think the rest will come in questions.

Mr. McIlraith: I think anything else can perhaps be dealt with in the committee stage.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Minister.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask a general question about the relation between the Canadian Commercial Corporation and the Department of National Defence having regard to what actually happens when the Canadian Commercial Corporation, on behalf of the Department of National Defence, lets a contract for the preparation, construction and manufacture of goods for the Department of National Defence. What I want to be clear about is, what is the division of function? The Department of National Defence reaches the conclusion that it wants certain things, and it asks the Canadian Commercial Corporation to procure them. This matter has arisen in the public accounts committee. From that point on I am anxious to know exactly where the responsibility lies. I find it a little difficult to understand. Indeed it seemed to me there was perhaps a danger of duplication. I should like to be informed just what the division of responsibility is from that point on.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, there has been a change in the system of defence buying, particularly in those purchases that require new facilities or new arrangements to produce. The Department of Defence Production has been established, and a good many of the duties formerly performed by the Canadian Commercial Corporation have been taken over by the production branches of the Department of Defence Production. For instance, the aircraft branch of the department is responsible for all procurement in connection with the aircraft program. Defence construction is handled apart from the Canadian Commercial Corporation. A separate crown company is responsible for defence construction. Similarly the gun division handles all procurement in connection with guns except for foreign orders. Orders from foreign governments are routed through the Canadian Commercial Corporation for the reason that production has to be financed for a time before outside payments are received.

The scope of the corporation has been reduced. A number of men formerly employed by the corporation have been taken over by the procurement branches. For instance, Mr. Trethewey, formerly head of the aircraft branch for Canadian Commercial Corporation, is now one of the heads of the aircraft production branch.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask a question at that point. On the face of it, it appears that administrative expenditure for 1950-51 for the Canadian Commercial Corporation, if I understand the matter correctly, is about $400,000 larger. Is the change that the minister is describing just taking place now so that it will alter that? The figures given by the parliamentary assistant show that.

Mr. Howe: The change in organization took place in the late months of 1950. The Department of Defence Production was only officially organized as of April 1, but its activities began to function during the late months of 1950. If my hon. friend will note the size of the contracts placed by the Canadian Commercial Corporation he will understand why in that year there was a considerable increase in staff and in expenditures. I presume for the year 1951-52 the volume handled by the Canadian Commercial Corporation and the expenses involved will be down instead of up.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What comes from the minister's answer is that there are now really three organizations. There is the Department of National Defence, the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and the Department of Defence Production, and as I understand it the duty of defence production is to do a good deal of the work formerly done by the Canadian Commercial Corporation. Is that right?

Mr. Howe: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My basic question still remains. Just what is the division of responsibility between the Department of National Defence, which gives the order so to speak, and the Canadian Commercial Corporation or defence production which I suppose we can say does the arranging to get the goods? As I understand the matter in the public accounts committee, the Department of National Defence naturally is deeply interested in what is being obtained, and I presume in a way it is the final judge and even the expert as to what it needs. As I understand it, it concerns itself with following through when airplanes, guns or tanks, for example, are being built. It follows through and keeps in touch with the work. It is that relationship between it and defence production, which the minister says is in charge of these things, that I want to get at. What does the minister consider is the division of responsibility?

Mr. Howe: Relations between the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production remain unchanged. Requisitions come from the deputy minister of national defence to the deputy minister of defence production. How they are handled in the Department of Defence Production is a matter of departmental organization with which the military side is not concerned. The division of the work of the two departments is that the defence department specifies what is required. They say what they want, when they want it and where they want it. In other words, any plans prepared for buildings are prepared by the Department of National Defence. Any specifications for goods to be purchased for the Department of National Defence are prepared by that department.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let us take airplanes.

Mr. Howe: They set out the type of airplane. Of course the actual development of airplanes is not carried out directly by the Department of National Defence, but nevertheless that department sets out the over-all specifications and works with the Department of Defence Production in following the development through to the final mock-up. After that it becomes a matter solely for defence production. However, the Department of National Defence has another function, that of inspection. In other words, the Department of National Defence must say that the article is satisfactory. For that purpose there is an inspection branch of the Department of National Defence which is responsible for inspection. They say what they want, when and where they want it, and they decide whether the article delivered is up to their specifications. If not, they have the right to reject it.

Mr. Fraser: Does the Department of Defence Production also have inspectors?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: Then it is duplication.

Mr. Howe: It is not duplication. There are certain matters that we inspect by agreement, but the final decision as to whether an article is up to specification rests with the Department of National Defence. In some cases, as in the case of aircraft, there is some division of the inspection work, but there is no duplication. There was duplication in the last war. There was plant inspection and the British inspection. That has been eliminated.

While there is inspection of all stages, in some cases by agreement it is performed by inspectors of the Department of Defence Production, and in other cases it is inspectors of the inspection branch of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Drew: Would this be the organization that would negotiate the contract under which Sorel Industries now occupy the arsenal across the river?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Drew: Would this organization have nothing to do with that contract?

Mr. Howe: You mean the contract for guns for the United States?

Mr. Drew: I mean the contract for guns that was under discussion, by virtue of which Sorel Industries are making certain guns in the arsenal at Longueuil.

Mr. Howe: No; that was an arrangement made by the department, and Canadian Commercial Corporation would have nothing to do with that. The only interest Canadian Commercial Corporation has in the manufacture of guns is that orders from foreign governments—in this case an order from the United States government—are placed with the Canadian Commercial Corporation and serviced by them. Arrangements as to where the guns will be manufactured and negotiations with Sorel Industries and the plant at Longueuil would be matters for the gun division of the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. Drew: Just so I may understand the procedure, do I gather that in the case of a contract for the manufacture in Canada of a certain type of gun or guns such as are under consideration in this case, the Canadian Commercial Corporation would negotiate the contract with the foreign purchaser and carry out the arrangements in Canada for the production of guns on behalf of that foreign purchaser, and that the details then would be worked out by the department for the actual production?

Mr. Howe: That is correct.

Mr. Drew: Then may we take it that in this case the government of the United States negotiated a contract through Canadian Commercial Corporation for the purchase of guns of a certain type and that the corporation then entered into arrangements with the Department of Defence Production for the manufacture of those guns. Is that the way it worked?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Drew: Then the Department of Defence Production would make the arrangements which were under discussion whereby, in this case, Sorel Industries would plan the actual production in their own plant and in the arsenal which has been taken over?

Mr. Howe: That is correct.

Mr. Fraser: In regard to orders from foreign governments, does the external affairs office have to O.K. those orders before they are put through?

Mr. Howe: Yes, Mr. Chairman, every order for munitions of war placed by a foreign government must obtain the approval of the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I listened to what the minister said about there being no danger of duplication, and all I can say is that if there is no duplication he is a wizard, because we have all the makings of it. When we started this discussion I did not fully realize the complexity of the situation. I thought we were dealing primarily if not exclusively with the defence department and Canadian Commercial Corporation. Now we have the other organization in the picture, and for the life of me I cannot understand why we need the two other organizations in addition to the Department of National Defence.

The minister has made clear what happens in the case of contracts of certain kinds, and I am not going over that ground again. What he has not made clear, to me at any rate, is why we need these two organizations. I think the minister will agree as a matter of general principle that when you have three or four people working on one job there is prima facie a great danger of duplication, and frankly I do not understand the reason for what is taking place. We have had Canadian Commercial Corporation built up to us as a very useful organization, and let us assume that is so. Now apparently its functions are being diminished; it is to be considerably less important, and we find a new organization coming in. I confess that the matter disturbs me. This afternoon we are going to be asked to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act to give the minister the very fullest powers under it, but we are still left with what seems to me a multiplication of agencies. I would like the minister to tell us further why we need them all.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps the point raised by the hon. member for Greenwood could more properly be discussed on the administration item of the estimates of the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No.

The Deputy Chairman: I have listened to the discussion that has gone on for the last few minutes; I have read the various sections, and we are in committee of the whole on this bill studying section 1 at the moment. I wonder if at this time it would be in order to discuss the matter of duplication because of the existence of one or two or three corporations. There is no mention in any of the sections of this bill of Defence Construction Limited, for instance. So I think this point should be cleared up if the discussion is to be proceeded with in an orderly fashion.

Mr. Howe: With all respect, Mr. Chairman, I think I can put my hon. friend's mind at rest in a few words. Defence Construction certainly is not mentioned in the bill, but I brought it in, and I think perhaps I could make that relationship clear.

First let us take inspection. The duty of inspection technically rests with the Department of National Defence. I think my hon. friend will appreciate why that should be so, because after all the defence department certainly should be entitled to say whether the article for which they are paying is satisfactory.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And they have an expert staff to do that.

Mr. Howe: Yes, they have a branch of their department for that purpose. However, that branch is not large, and it is not easy to recruit new members quickly. They found that in connection with the inspection of buildings they just did not have the engineering staff available for the purpose; so by arrangement, to which we both agreed, we augmented the inspection staff by recourse to the staff of Central Mortgage. My hon. friend will understand that. Central Mortgage acts as consultants, really, or inspectors for Defence Construction.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This is another agency.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend may laugh, but he is accustomed to dealing with corporations. The reason I like corporations is that we know how they keep their books. Everyone understands a corporation; everyone understands a corporate statement. If the departmental organization is carried too far it becomes very difficult to follow. The government's method of keeping books is not the method of a businessman, as my hon. friend will agree; and if we have a big job to do I prefer to handle it in a corporate structure where bookkeeping methods are well defined and well understood by everyone. That is the reason for the two corporations.

As to the point in which my hon. friend is interested, while the corporation we are discussing here was a very effective means of handling defence requirements in peacetime, it is not capable of expanding to the extent required to take care of new productive facilities and all the ramifications of a $5 billion defence program to be completed in three years. What we have done is take from this corporation certain functions such as aircraft production, gun production, chemical production and so on, which it formerly performed; and these are now peformed by branches set up for those specific purposes. I hope I have made myself clear.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes, Mr. Chairman, the minister has made it clear, but I still want to ask this. He has told us there is a competent engineering staff in the Department of National Defence who lay out the work to be done, who follow it through and inspect it. Am I right in assuming there is also a competent engineering staff in defence production? Will the minister speak on that?

Then, we have had it indicated to us that the Canadian Commercial Corporation has been shorn of a good many of its functions. The question naturally arises, and I am appreciating what the minister said about his preference for corporation books rather than government books, but it does not necessarily follow you need two corporations instead of one just for that purpose. Why could not either the Canadian Commercial Corporation have been given the necessary expert assistance to do what is now being done by defence production or vice versa? Why could not defence production take over the whole thing? Is there a natural division between the two?

I come back to my first question. Will the minister say what engineering staff there is in defence production, and whether or not there is any in the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. Howe: The engineering staff of defence production is small, but engineering services available to Defence Construction Limited are retained for the purpose of inspecting construction.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): They remain in the Canadian Commercial Corporation or the other company?

Mr. Howe: They are retained by Defence Construction Limited. Defence Construction Limited is responsible for the building carried out by the armed forces, and Defence Construction Limited retains the engineering services that are made available to it by Central Mortgage and Housing.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is merely to do that building?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think a while ago we were considering the functions of defence production in connection with aeroplanes and things like that.

Mr. Howe: Well, an aeroplane order is handled by the production branch of the department. There is a branch that devotes itself exclusively to the production of aircraft, and they have everything to do with the production of aircraft.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Howe: No, the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): But the minister has already told us that the Department of National Defence also concerns itself with that.

Mr. Howe: They decide what aircraft they want, and they follow the production through to determine they are getting it. They perform certain inspection services, the major inspection services in that particular case.

Mr. Drew: I understand the difficulty of the chairman in regard to the field that this is covering, but I would point out that section 1 which is under consideration is the general section, and also the section which defines the minister under this particular act as the Minister of Defence Production. I believe, therefore, that this is the one place where we can get some rationalization of the need for the amendment, and also possibly the question as to whether other amendments might even be desirable from the point of view of simplifying the relationship between these different bodies.

From what has taken place, I understand that the Department of National Defence, as a government department, is making decisions in regard to military requirements, as a result of which certain contracts are then made by other agencies. These agencies may be the Department of Defence Production, acting as a department, or the Canadian Commercial Corporation or Defence Construction Limited, both of which corporations come under the same minister. The thing which I find it difficult to understand is why, with the immensely wide powers conferred upon the Department of Defence Production, it is necessary to have the Canadian Commercial Corporation at all. Secondly, why, if it is necessary to have the Canadian Commercial Corporation, it is necessary also to have Defence Production Limited, in view of the extremely wide powers that are conferred and would be extended by this amendment.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Howe: It is not essential, but it is desirable we think. In the last war we had a similar corporation which was called War Supplies Limited. War Supplies Limited handled all contracts made by the United States government or other governments with the Canadian government. These contracts were processed by the old department of munitions and supply. It is much easier for a foreign government to do business with a corporation having offices in the country than it is to do business between governments. The latter is more cumbersome. War Supplies Limited had an office in Washington, and I think the Washington office handled $2 million or $3 million worth of United States orders that were carried out in Canada. It also had an office in London.

The Canadian Commercial Corporation has offices in Washington, London and several offices across Canada. Instead of winding up this corporation, which we could have done, we have made it responsible for booking foreign orders and for handling foreign business. Those are pretty well its duties today. They have been whittled down to that, but it is still handling very large orders and is performing a useful function. The staff of the department has largely been transferred over into one of the production departments or into the general purchasing departments of defence production.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I observe it is almost six o'clock, but I am going to suggest that I believe it would help us in considering this complicated and rather perplexing problem if we could have a list of the staff of each of the organizations we have been talking about this afternoon. When I say a "list", I am not concerned with having every name, but I do want to have a convenient list showing how many engineers, accountants and what-not are available, so we shall get an idea of how much talent there is, and how it is divided.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I could answer the question about personnel right now. There seems to be a little misconception about the bill. The staff of the corporation in March of this year was some 660. I do not know what it is today but if it is not down in the neighbourhood of 40 it will be down to that in a matter of a few weeks. Perhaps that will give an effective picture as well as anything.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I meant something more than that. I meant the Canadian Commercial Corporation, defence production, defence construction—of course, when you come to national defence, I realize one must limit it there. I suppose we should have whatever is the relevant unit there, the engineering unit or whatever it is.

Mr. Howe: I am trying to be reasonable, but we are discussing a corporation that has a personnel of about 40. My hon. friend wants to bring in a list of the personnel of the Department of Defence Production that probably has a staff of 1,200. Let us keep the proportion. If the committee wishes to discuss the estimates of the department, we shall be glad to give you the names and talents of each man. I do not know who is an engineer, and who is a lawyer, but I do not think it is pertinent to this particular bill. I am quite willing to show the relationship of this corporation to anything the hon. member likes, but I am not prepared to discuss the Department of Defence Production as a whole on this bill.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Could I just make this point. After all, it is true we are now considering an amendment to the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act, but nevertheless it brings in very directly the Department of Defence Production because the Minister of Defence Production is going to exercise some powers under this act. It may be, evidently it is the case, that the Canadian Commercial Corporation has become very much smaller, and in one sense the minister may say we are trying to get all the detail we can. It seems to me it is a perfectly natural thing for us to ask these questions because I do not see how we can properly consider a smaller and shrunken Canadian Commercial Corporation unless we know why it is shrunken and what is the cause of its present situation, and I hope the minister will take that view. It seems to me this is a convenient time to do it. It is a thing that might very naturally happen here. I do not see why it should not happen here as well as elsewhere. The same questions will be asked and answered by the same people.

Mr. Howe: I will ask the chairman to think over the ruling. If he can think of any reason why I should explain the Department of Defence Production on this bill I shall be very pleased to do it at the next sitting.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have great confidence in the chairman. I hope he will think of a good reason.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up third reading of Bill No. 79, respecting Indians. Then we will go into committee of ways and means and continue the consideration of the budget resolutions.

Mr. Fraser: As separate items?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Well, we are nearly through with the customs resolutions, and the income tax resolutions will come next. After these resolutions have carried we will take up the Canadian Commercial Corporation bill. That will be the first item after the resolutions. Then we will take up Bill No. 198, to amend the Customs Act, and then Bills No. 191 and No. 192.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, while it may be an extension of the practice that has developed in regard to announcing business for the following day, I do think that for obvious reasons, at this stage of the session, it might be helpful if the business of the second day could also be indicated, because with the number of committees that are being arranged for, many hon. members will be called upon to be present at those meetings.

Mr. Chevrier: Why not all week?

Mr. Drew: In response to the statement made by the minister I must say that that would be extremely helpful, and I believe the business of this house would be proceeded with in a much more orderly manner if it could be so arranged, but I am dealing only with Friday at the moment.

Mr. Chevrier: Apart from today, the business of the house has not moved very expeditiously.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would be ready to lay out a program for a week's work but I would not succeed in having any work done during the week. Last week we did not get through one single item, although I had announced a whole lot of things.

On Friday, if the hon. member for Greenwood would be with us, and would be interested, I would suggest to the Prime Minister that we take up the resolution in regard to the Torquay agreement, and that it be sent to the banking and commerce committee. That would be an interesting subject, and I would be ready to bring the matter up on Friday. Perhaps we could then take up the estimates of labour and of some other department.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would think even more highly of the minister if he could put it on, on Monday.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will have to revert to estimates on Friday. If the Minister of Labour is here I would ask him to proceed with his estimates. He has been on for a whole day and I suppose we would make some progress. If I can get the Minister of Justice also we would proceed with estimates on Friday.

It being five minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Fourth report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

FISHERIES

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO SALT FISH MARKETS AND PRICES SUPPORT

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement on salt fish markets and prices support. At this time last year there was, particularly in Newfoundland, much doubt about salt fish market prospects for the 1950 catch. Today prospects and outlook for 1951 are, however, more optimistic.

Last year there was a substantial carry-over of salted fish from 1949 still in merchants' hands. The government took action to help dispose of this fish and thereby to relieve the whole Canadian salted fish trade from the pressure of over-supply. We bought substantial quantities for distribution through relief agencies. The fisheries prices support board provided guaranteed prices to fishermen for the Labrador cure. The government undertook to review the results of the 1950 marketing season on shore fish as well, and the study covering returns received by the shore fishermen in Newfoundland is now under way.

At present, prospects for the 1951 season are encouraging. In the past year in Newfoundland all the 1949 carry-over and the 1950 catch have been sold. At present forward sales are being made for fish still in the sea—a marked contrast to the situation at this time last year. There is practically no carry-over of old fish. The world supply of salted fish is likely to be slightly under last year's production. Markets are more buoyant. I was able to announce only a few days ago the sterling convertibility arrangement for Newfoundland, so that the way has been cleared for sales to Europe. Arrangements have been made to permit full sales of Gaspe cured salted fish to Italy for dollars.

We understand that the Newfoundland salt codfish association will meet this month with the Newfoundland fishermen to set minimum prices, with an undertaking to meet together later in the year with the fishermen's groups to work out final payments. This brighter outlook for Newfoundland sales should strengthen the export position of the maritime and Quebec salt fish trades.

As to the 1951 season, therefore, with market prospects good, the prices support board could see no justification for general prices support action in salted fish. During the year there may be some localities where, because of poor fishing, or poor quality fish, returns may not prove adequate to the fishermen. That, however, is more a question of local relief than of national prices support action.

We, along with the departments of finance and trade and commerce, will continue to be ready to help overcome marketing difficulties abroad, should these arise, and to encourage the expansion of the domestic market. Keeping in touch with the market, however, should not put us in the fish business. The responsibility for production and marketing in the Labrador cure, as well as in others, rests with the industry itself, with both fishermen and merchants. It is only under special conditions that government action under the support act should be contemplated. There is, in our opinion, no need for such special action at this time.

I have on several occasions discussed in this house the alternatives to prices support —the constructive plans for future development of our fisheries, particularly on the Atlantic coast. I am greatly encouraged by the fact that joint federal-provincial fisheries development committees have been established in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island. These committees are seriously studying the problems of these provinces, and I believe they will give us sound and practical advice towards securing a better-balanced fishing industry. This better balance is already being achieved by the fishing industry in the eastern provinces. In Newfoundland, while cod provides the basic income, fishermen's earnings from flatfish, salmon, lobsters, capelin, and herring are continuously growing. Improved fishing techniques are providing more such varieties and also better sizes for marketing. New mechanical driers are producing better standards of quality in salted fish. The industry has built, and is adding this year, several new freezing plants for fillets. It has added oil and meal plants. It is such development we want to encourage.

In the meantime, and while the development committees prepare their recommendations, we are aiding by research and application the modernization of both the salted and the fresh and frozen fish trades in eastern Canada. For example, in Newfoundland this summer we shall have nine research board engineers—some engineering new fish plants, others checking present installations in freezing plants, in smokers, and in cod liver oil plants. We are installing a new experimental drier for light salted fish at Bay Bulls. We have arranged for two Nova Scotia long-liners to fish with their special techniques in Bonavista, both as an experiment and as a demonstration of techniques.

For the shore fishermen throughout eastern Canada we are expanding our assistance to help them modernize their vessels. The federal government assistance to the construction of draggers and long-liners is now applicable to Quebec and the Magdalens, as well as to the maritimes, and it can be made available to Newfoundland on agreement with the provincial government. The regulations have been changed to increase the assistance. Whereas the payments were formerly made to draggers or long-liners fifty-five feet and up they are now available to vessels forty-five feet and up. This should greatly extend the scope of the grant, which is $165 per gross ton; and it is available to single fishermen or to groups.

We believe that the progress of our Atlantic fishing industry is dependent greatly on the successful application of modern techniques, both in fishing and in processing, in doing old things in better ways, or in doing new things —new methods of fishing, processing, and distributing. Federal assistance in these directions, rather than prices support, will redound to the long-run benefit of the fishermen and their families as well as to all the coastal communities.

Mr. Higgins: I understood the minister to say that government action is contemplated under special conditions under the Fisheries Prices Support Act. What would those special conditions be?

Mr. Mayhew: I am sure the hon. gentleman would not want me to list the various possibilities. We will meet the conditions when they arise.

Mr. Higgins: Could we not have some idea?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The minister mentioned that arrangements had been made for sterling convertibility in connection with Newfoundland. Will the same provisions apply to the maritimes?

Mr. Mayhew: That applies only to Newfoundland. It was arranged specially by the United Kingdom, not by Canada.

QUESTIONS

LEVEL CROSSING ACCIDENTS

Mr. Catherwood:

How many persons were (a) killed; (b) injured in level crossing accidents in Canada during each of the years 1945 to 1950, inclusive, and during the months of January, February, March and April, 1951?

Mr. McIlraith:

Level Crossing Accidents in Canada

POSTAL SERVICE LIAISON OFFICERS—COST OF MAIL HANDLED

Mr. Noseworthy:

1. Has the Post Office Department a group of employees known as liaison officers?
2. If so, how many such liaison officers does the Post Office Department employ?
3. In what post offices are these maintained?
4. What are the duties of liaison officers?
5. What salaries are these officers paid?
6. Does the Post Office Department periodically make a cost ascertainment of all mail handled?
7. If so, has this cost ascertainment been made monthly, quarterly, half-yearly or yearly?
8. In what post offices are these cost ascertainments made?
9. What is the annual cost to the Post Office Department of these cost ascertainments?
10. Has this cost ascertainment revealed that the Post Office Department is losing money on any particular type or types of post office service?
11. If so, on what types, and what was the ascertained deficit on each type for the last fiscal year for which information is available?

Mr. Rinfret:

1. Yes.

2. 17.

3. Victoria, B.C., Vancouver, B.C., Calgary, Alta., Edmonton, Alta., Regina, Sask., Saskatoon, Sask., Winnipeg, Man., Toronto, Ont., London, Ont., Hamilton, Ont., Windsor, Ont., Ottawa, Ont., Montreal, Que., Quebec, Que., Saint John, N.B., Halifax, N.S., St. John's, Nfld.

4. To undertake public relations and educational work in relation to postal service.

5. Montreal and Toronto, $3,888-$4,212 per annum; other offices, $3,240-$3,567 per annum.

6-11. The question of cost ascertainment and the dissemination of information obtained as a result was dealt with in the house on March 7, 1951. See Hansard, page 1000.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CANADIAN ARMY SPECIAL FORCE—GRATUITIES, CLOTHING ALLOWANCE AND LEAVE WITH PAY ON DISCHARGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence about a matter which has just come to my attention. Are members of the special force who are discharged on account of sickness after service in Korea entitled to gratuity, clothing allowance and leave with pay?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): A similar question was addressed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs a few days ago, and his reply was that these matters were receiving the consideration of an interdepartmental committee.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs if any decision has been reached?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I think I did say at that time that medical treatment under class 2 had been extended to these veterans. They can be discharged to the Department of Veterans Affairs, receive treatment, and in the meantime receive the pay and allowances which they were getting during their service in the army.

Mr. Coldwell: They can receive pay and allowances?

Mr. Lapointe: That is right.

MERCHANT MARINE

CANADIAN DEEP-SEA SHIPPING INDUSTRY—NORTH ATLANTIC SHIPPING POOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister make a statement to the house at an early day setting out the policy for the present fiscal year with regard to the Canadian deep-sea shipping industry, and also outlining the progress made in setting up a north Atlantic shipping pool? As the minister knows, the policy announced by the Prime Minister on December 9, 1949, was a temporary one for a period of one year only.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I had hoped to be able to make a statement on that question during the consideration of my estimates, but all the items in the department, with the exception of that one and a few others, were approved by the house and I did not get the opportunity. I am still hopeful that the opportunity will be provided in the not too distant future, and if it is, I shall be glad to make a statement.

Mr. Green: I understand that the remaining estimates may not be reached for a considerable time yet, and this is a very pressing matter. The former chairman of the Canadian maritime commission made a speech about the north Atlantic shipping pool a few days ago in Vancouver. I would ask the minister to give consideration to the possibility of making a statement at an early day.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall be glad to do so. I should say in fairness that I did not delay the passing of my own estimates, and I am still disposed to give the statement at the opportune time.

Mr. Green: Could the minister's estimates be brought up at an early day?

Mr. Chevrier: I am prepared to go on at any time.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE

INQUIRY AS TO INVITATION TO SEND OBSERVERS TO MEETINGS OF CONSULTATIVE ASSEMBLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has an invitation been received from the consultative assembly meeting at Strasbourg to send observers to additional meetings of the assembly? If so, has the government yet decided what course it will follow?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. The answer to the first question is that no invitation has been received from the consultative assembly meeting at Strasbourg to send observers to additional meetings of the assembly. We understand that a resolution has been under consideration by the consultative assembly whereby an invitation might be addressed to the Canadian parliament to be associated more closely with the Council of Europe, but this has not yet been received. If and when such an invitation is received it will, I presume, be a matter for consideration by parliament. Since the creation of the Council of Europe, Canada has been represented at the sessions of the consultative assembly by an observer. The observer for the present session is Mr. T. C. Davis, head of the Canadian mission in Bonn, Germany.

EXCISE TAX

INQUIRY AS TO RETENTION OF INCREASED TAX BY AUTOMOBILE DEALERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to direct a question either to the Minister of National Revenue or to the Minister of Finance. It arises out of a complaint of one of my constituents about the increased taxes on automobiles. Apparently many cars were purchased before the budget and held for delivery later. Is the minister in a position to collect from dealers the increased tax collected by them?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): As the hon. member is aware, the tax is imposed at the wholesale level. What the contract may be between the dealer and the customer I am not in a position to say.

STEAMSHIP SERVICES

QUESTION AS TO SUBSIDY FOR MAINTENANCE OF ARROW LAKES, B.C., SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the government or the Minister of Transport received any representations or communications from the government of British Columbia with respect to proposals for a joint subsidy toward the maintenance of steamer operations on the Arrow lakes?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): When I last looked at that matter, which was some weeks ago, no representations had been made, and it may be that they have been made since that time. I shall be glad to look into it again.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ARMY—MINIMUM AGES FOR ENLISTMENT AND OVERSEAS SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Are men under eighteen years of age being enlisted in the active army? If so, what is the minimum age at which they are being sent overseas?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Speaking from recollection, because I did not have notice of the question, men are being enlisted in the active army from the age of seventeen up, but only with their parents' consent. The minimum age at which they are sent overseas is nineteen.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION—PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO BAND FUNDS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the third reading of Bill No. 79, respecting Indians.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, before the bill carries I should like to make a further attempt to have two changes made in this legislation. The first concerns section 4, subsection 2, and the second concerns the question of allowing any Indian or band of Indians to appeal to the courts against a ministerial decision. These subjects have both been debated fully and I therefore do not intend to go over the ground of the discussion and present in full the merits of the case in support of the amendment which I propose to move. I wish as briefly as possible simply to outline the effects of the amendment, and then leave it to the decision of the house whether or not the amendment should be supported.

In the Indians of Canada we have over 125,000 subjects of His Majesty. Their whole future life is to be governed under the Indian Act, and they differ from the rest of us in that way. This House of Commons must direct its mind to the question whether or not we are giving justice to these Indians, whether we are doing everything we can to place them on a basis of equality and in a position to protect their rights.

With respect to section 4, it is desired by those of us who support the amendment which I am about to move that the Indians should be given the right to have a say in decisions which are taken affecting their whole status. Section 4 gives the governor in council the power to issue proclamations which would exempt from the provisions of the bill, except sections 37 to 41, any Indian or group of Indians or Indian band. Such proclamations may be issued without prior consultation with the band. There is nothing at all in the statute which makes it essential that the Indians themselves should be consulted before these proclamations are issued.

Anything affecting the status of Indians, anything affecting the question whether or not Indians should be on the Indian list, anything affecting the right or disability of Indians to obtain liquor, anything at all except the very narrow category of subjects dealt with in sections 37 to 41 involving surrenders of land, can be changed simply by a proclamation of the governor in council.

I wish to emphasize that it is not argued that the process by which these changes are made should be altered. It is not argued that it should require a further bill or further legislation to make the changes which the minister now contemplates will be made by proclamation. We realize fully that in administering the act, day to day problems will arise. There are problems of details. There may be problems affecting only one Indian or a small number of Indians, and it would not be appropriate to insist that each of these changes must necessitate a bill and all the legislative process of passing an act of parliament. It is perfectly proper to leave those things to be done by proclamation, but it is contended that before such proclamations are issued the consent of the Indians or the band concerned should be obtained.

That seems to me a very simple proposition, and there should not be an attempt to sidetrack it by saying this would mean a process of legislation every time it was desired to take any administrative action under this act. That is not the suggestion at all, and if the amendment were adopted no such result would follow. It would mean that the Indians themselves, who are so vitally affected, would have the safeguard that before their rights could be abridged, before any change could be made in their status which might have very serious consequences for them, must be first consulted and their consent obtained. I do not believe this house would pass a bill giving any government or minister power to change the status of a white person or white community in this country by proclamation without the requirement of prior consultation and consent on the part of the person or community whose status might be changed; nor do I think we should do that in connection with the Indians.

I am not moving the amendment formally at the moment, but the motion will be simply that the bill be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that the committee have power to amend it by inserting in section 4(2) the words "with the consent of the Indians or band concerned." That is all it is. It does not say that it has to be by any other process, or that it cannot be by proclamation. It simply says that the consent of the Indians or band concerned must first be obtained.

The other part of the amendment I intend to move relates to the right of Indians to appeal to the courts. I am not going to attempt a legal argument in any detail, but I think it was agreed yesterday by the minister and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who has been the prime proponent of this amendment, that many administrative decisions and orders are made by the minister from which there is no right of appeal. To that extent the Indians are entirely different from and in an inferior position to the white population. Surely, if we are going to make them equal at all, one of the first respects in which we should make them equal is by giving them equality under the law with white citizens, one of whose most valuable rights is the right to free recourse to the courts whenever they think themselves aggrieved.

Under the Indian Act there are a number of instances in which the Indian, whose future and fortune can be vitally affected by administrative decisions made by the minister or his officials, has no recourse to the courts and no one further to whom he can appeal for the redress of grievances. This not only places the Indian in a position of inferiority, which he is entitled to resent and which in many cases he does resent, thereby imposing another barrier in the way of this equality we wish to create, but it is nothing short of an injustice to place and keep the Indian in this inferior position in comparison with the white citizens of this country. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth (Mr. Charlton):

That the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house with instructions that such committee have power to amend the same by inserting in clause 4 (2) thereof, after the word "may" at line 18, the following words: "with the consent of the Indians or band concerned."

And further that such committee have power to amend the said bill by inserting the following as section 123:

"Nothing in this act or elsewhere shall in any way be deemed to remove, abridge or otherwise restrict the rights of Indians to full access to the courts of the land, and every Indian and every band of Indians shall have the full right to appeal to the appropriate court of the province which would otherwise have jurisdiction, from any decision of the minister hereunder."

And by renumbering present sections 123 and 124 as 124 and 125.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask that the amendment be not adopted by this house but that the bill in its present form be permitted to go into effect. With respect to section 4 and the non-existent section the hon. member would propose to add, from my point of view, as representing a riding in which there is a large number of Indians at various stages of development, at the moment I would prefer that the discretionary power to bring into effect the provisions of section 4 should remain with the governor in council, advised, as it doubtless will be, by the experienced men in the Indian affairs branch. I would point out, though I admit this is not a strong argument, that should the governor in council make a mistake in the application of this act, upon that mistake being brought to its attention the last line of this section also permits the revocation of any such proclamation by the governor in council.

As for the addition of a section such as was so well asked for recently, by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), which would state as a fact what the minister has told us is now the law, I think the reply by the minister to the hon. member for Lake Centre should satisfactorily dispose of that argument. However, the point I wish to make at the moment I think is of considerable importance when considering this bill as a whole. This bill is far from perfect, as I am sure the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) would be the first to admit. But as yet its imperfections are largely unknown. Until we have some experience with the new sections of the bill we cannot say definitely where it has fallen short or where it may have gone too far. I took it upon myself to ask the minister in the committee whether, if this bill went through, he would undertake within a period of approximately two to three years to call together, not necessarily a committee of this house but a representative group of Indians from right across Canada, similar to that which was called together at the end of February last, with a view to going into the way this act has operated so that such corrections as might be found necessary could be made on the basis of experience and not conjecture. May I read into the record this part of the minister's reply:

> Now, I did not go the step further, and tell the conference that they would be reassembled in two years' time, but I am prepared to give the committee the assurance, within the limits stated by Mr. Applewhaite, that it would be the intention of this government to invite representative Indians to another conference similar to that held in February last.

Under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I submit, and I think I have the interests of the Indians fully at heart, as I know the member for Kamloops has, that the best way in which we can show our desire to make improvements for the Indians of Canada is to pass this bill, which has been thoroughly investigated by a committee, and get it on the statute book.

[Mr. Applewhaite.]

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, just to illustrate that the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has not been without some justification in making this motion, I should like to read into the record a press report which appeared not so long ago. As I recall it, it appeared in the Ottawa Citizen, and the heading is "Act threatens extinction of Indian people." There is a question mark following that title. The article reads:

> A three-man delegation from the Six Nations Indian reservation near Brantford warned here yesterday that passage of the Indian Act in its present revised form would threaten the Indian people with extinction in two years' time.
> They said if the act became law, the Indians across Canada would become "bitter enemies" of the present federal government.
> The delegation centred its fire on the compulsory enfranchisement clause of the act.
> Under this clause, a government appointed committee may enfranchise an Indian whether or not he has applied for such enfranchisement. Once he is given the vote, the Indian loses special reservation rights such as free schooling, free hospitalization and exemption from taxes.
> The delegation objected to section 4 of the act giving the minister (in this case, citizenship and immigration minister Walter Harris) unlimited powers with no recourse of appeal.
> Criticism was also voiced of the provision under which an Indian who asks for the vote must sign a waiver eliminating his exemption from taxation.
> Members of the delegations who saw Mr. Harris, were: E. P. Garlow, chief councillor of the Six Nations Indian council; A. C. Moses, council secretary, and James Powless, councillor.

Perhaps these men were extreme in their views, but I am concerned lest the opinion which is expressed by these men is the opinion held by altogether too many Indians across Canada. Consequently, I am not sure that the member for Kamloops has not done the country a service in bringing this matter to the attention of the house. I do not see why there should not be a provision giving the Indians, when threatened with the application of these clauses of the act, the right to defend their rights in court against the will of the department.

Notwithstanding what the minister has said, and notwithstanding what the past history has been, the Indians do not possess an effective right to appeal to the courts in respect of matters of this kind. One of the main reasons is that the average Indian on the average reserve in Canada is by no means a wealthy man. As a matter of fact I believe it could be safely said that the average Indian on our reservations is a very poor man. The average band on a reserve would have much difficulty in raising sufficient money to enable any Indian to defend successfully his rights in court. Since this condition obtains it must be obvious that whether or not an Indian has the legal right, he has not the financial strength to enable him to defend successfully his case in any court.

I should feel much better about the whole situation if some commission or some body were set up which would take a part comparable with that which is taken for a veteran by the pensions advocate. The government would put at the disposal of the Indian, men who would be highly trained, and whose business it would be to defend the Indian. By appointing such a commission the government would acknowledge the disability under which the Indian now labours, through no fault of his own, and would express complete willingness that everything should be done to defend the position of the Indian. I think, Mr. Speaker, that anything less than that is not sufficient in our time, having in mind the condition which obtains throughout our Indian population at present. I would be prepared, therefore, to support the amendment moved by the member for Kamloops.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Fulton) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. McIvor: I was late in entering the chamber, but I was engaged in the king's business. Had I been here, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I was paired with the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken I should like to say a few words more as regards this important measure.

We of this parliament are now taking a last look at Bill 79, an act respecting Indians. We have toiled long and earnestly. The task we have wrestled with has not been, and is not now, an easy one.

The problem connected with Canada's Indians, admittedly a highly complex one, complex if not baffling, is not a problem of this generation's making. We have inherited it; it has been left on our doorstep, so to speak. I urge upon all, both non-Indian and Indian, patiently to bear this important fact in mind.

There is too much of a tendency I fear on the part of a number of our Indians and non-Indians to feel unkindly toward each other. There is no justification whatsoever for any bitterness between the two groups of Canadians. We must simply recognize that we have a difficult problem to solve, and we must face this problem frankly and honestly, and without passion, and do the very best we can to solve it in the interests of all.

No blame can be attached to the men and women of our time for the mistakes that may or may not have been made in days now gone, or for the weaknesses that may have manifested themselves in the relations between the two groups. On the other hand no credit is due us for the noble achievements of our fathers, both Indian and non-Indian, whose efforts preceded ours—and there were noble achievements, on both sides.

In debates centring around the Indian Act much has been said which might seem to reflect upon the fathers of our nation, both Indian and non-Indian. In so far as any such impression as that might have been gained through anything I have said, I wish here to disavow any intention of reflecting in any way upon the men and women of earlier times in Canada. I believe that on the whole they did the best they could, and, as I have said noble achievements must be credited to them.

Understanding, forbearance, prudence and skill were manifested by Indian and non-Indian in those dangerous days, while we were learning to adjust ourselves to each other. And there was confidence, hope and faith on both sides. Splendid efforts were made both by Indian and non-Indian, and those efforts in great measure were crowned with success—a success for which all of us have cause to be deeply grateful to our forebears.

To realize how much truth there is in what I have just said, all we need to do is to recall the difference which generally prevailed in the feelings between Indians and non-Indians in Canada, and the feelings which prevailed in relations between Indians and non-Indians in the United States. My father and mother came to Canada from the United States in 1892 and were well qualified to impress upon me how splendidly different was the situation in Canada from that in the United States. My father told me that while he was in Idaho, where he lived before he came to Alberta, he never went into the wilds without having a rifle and a six-shooter within reach. When they came to Canada they found there was no danger whatsoever. The mounted police seemed to have everything well in hand and the Indians seemed to be happy that they had.

It rests upon our generation to do its full part in the light of the knowledge and facilities at our disposal. We have far greater knowledge and we have far more facilities and therefore we can give the Indians far better times in the days to come if we only realize how to use the resources which have been placed at our disposal by the Almighty.

I feel we in this parliament have done a workmanlike job. I want the Indians who may be reading this to know that that is how I feel.

Recently I read to the house an excerpt from an article entitled, "Who is an Indian?" which was reprinted from the Albertan of Calgary, Alberta, of April 25, 1951. This article is signed by John L. Laurie, secretary of the Indian Association of Alberta. I want to give Mr. Laurie all the credit which is his due. I know of no man who has more selflessly and indefatigably exerted himself in the interests of better times for the Indians than this same John L. Laurie. He is a schoolteacher by profession and has done his work for the Indians on the side. He risked his health and in fact has impaired his physical condition to a dangerous point. I believe the Indians of Canada could well afford to set up monuments to Mr. Laurie on every reservation from coast to coast. In the opening paragraph of this statement, Mr. Laurie said:

> The new Indian Act, in its present revised form, is an excellent piece of legislation. The government has met the most serious objections of the Indians themselves, and seems genuinely interested in giving these people a charter that will assure their steady progress and development.

I agree fully with every syllable of that statement. This does not mean that I believe the bill is all that could be desired, neither does it mean that I think the attitude of the minister, of the department or of the government is all that could be desired. I am not sure that the position of the Indians is appreciated adequately even yet. I think the minister has done literally wonders in training and conditioning himself since he took office, and he is entitled to those words at least, if not to stronger words. But he will be the first to maintain that there might be room for improvement.

As an illustration of what I have just said about appreciation may I refer to the case of the Six Nations Indians who are very unhappy about the situation generally at the present time. May I read to the house a statement which was made on May 11, 1914, by the Hon. Frank Oliver, as reported on page 3537 of Hansard. The Hon. Frank Oliver was a prominent Liberal and one of the finest men ever produced by western Canada. His words are worthy of note by the minister and his department and by the people generally throughout Canada. He said:

> But there are bands of the Six Nations Indians located on the Grand river in Ontario who, I maintain, are in a different legal position from any Indian bands who are native to the country. These Indian bands on the Grand river had their original home in the United States. At the close of the war of the revolution they emigrated to Canada and were given lands under a special treaty, not as subjects of Great Britain, but as allies of Great Britain, and I maintain that the holding of these Six Nations Indians on the Grand river is of such a kind that this parliament has no right to interfere with it. I admit that parliament has the power to interfere with the rights of Indians under treaty made with this government, but I say that this parliament has no right to interfere with a treaty made between the imperial government and the Six Nations Indians.

It is to be granted that this creates a difficult situation for the minister and the department, but difficult situations have been met in former times. After all, the men of our country who have got along with the Six Nations Indians since Canada became a nation have in the main shown pretty well the way in which we can get along with these great people without violating any of the things which they hold sacred.

There are other considerations which I have referred to and which I believe I should elaborate on to some extent before I resume my seat in what is perhaps the closing speech of this debate. I have referred to the fact that traditionally the Indians revere the memory of the great white god who visited America. In order to appreciate the Indians and in order to appreciate the position of the Six Nations Indians we have to bear that fact in mind. I wonder if Canadians generally appreciate the historical and religious background of the Six Nations Indians, and also the background of the other Indians in this country?

May I read from a document which was placed in my hands by the Six Nations Indians which rather emphasizes what I have just said. This document is entitled, "Traditional History of the Confederacy of the Six Nations" and was prepared by a committee of the chiefs and presented by Duncan C. Scott, F.R.S.C., and read on May 16, 1911. I read from page two as follows:

> There is no doubt in the mind of the writers of this preface that many of the ancient traditions of the Six Nations have become much modified and some have been long relegated to oblivion owing to the fact that in the earlier history of these people there were for a long time no members of the band capable of rendering these traditions in writing and thus preserving them intact to their posterity.
> It is, however, a noteworthy fact that the league of the Five Nations confederacy (now known as the Six Nations) as constituted centuries ago by De-ka-nah-wi-deh and his associates, has been maintained in accordance with the rules of the confederacy as laid down by the founder of the league; and that the installation of the lords or chiefs as rulers of the people, laid down in these unwritten rules hundreds of years ago, is still strictly observed and adhered to by the chiefs of the Six Nations and people.

If a person weighs those words carefully he will look upon the unrest which presently exists among the Six Nations Indians with a considerable amount of sympathy. Who might this De-ka-nah-wi-deh be? I am told that the meaning of the word is "miracle child" which immediately suggests our Saviour, the Lord. Was it Christ? It could have been. Christ could have come over to America after he was resurrected. As far as I can see, there is no sufficient reason why anyone should suppose he could not have done that or did not do so.

May I turn to the Bible for a minute or two in connection with this matter? I am going into some detail here because I do believe that there is danger of unhappy relations existing between the minister and the department and the Six Nations Indians, and that probably these fine people may not be properly understood. Consequently I am holding up the progress of affairs this afternoon so that this other aspect of the matter may be considered by the Canadian people. We find that in the book of John, chapter 10, verse 16, there appear the following words—and Christ is speaking:

> And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold and one shepherd.

At no place in scripture is it indicated where Christ went to find these other sheep which were not of the fold in Palestine. Who is to say that the people of America were not these sheep, and that Christ did not come to these people? No one can definitely say that could not have been the case. May I now turn to Matthew, chapter 15, verse 24, for a statement which also has some bearing on this matter. It is referring to Christ and reads:

> But he answered and said, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

If it should be found that the Indians are descendants of a branch of the Israelites, then considerable meaning can be derived from those two passages of scripture.

Having said as much as this, I think I should give some evidence from the history of America. It will take me about five minutes to do so, and will be of value to those who may read these remarks and desire to check the validity of what I have been saying. There are about fifteen or twenty great writers who have given much attention to the aborigines of America seeking to find out what their beliefs were, and what their origin was. Among these are A. H. Verrill, Lord Kingsborough, H. H. Bancroft and the Marquis de Nadaillac. I should like to give brief quotations from the works of each of these men before I close. Let us begin with A. H. Verrill. He wrote a work entitled "Under Peruvian Skies", published in 1930. In his works we find these words:

> Among the Mexicans, the Mayas and the pre-Incan and Incan people of Peru there was a persistent, universally believed tradition of a bearded white man who visited their lands, taught them their civilizations and religions and then mysteriously disappeared. The tradition tells of this bearded god having reached Mexico and Yucatan in a "magic ship," and the tradition of the first Inca—"Manko Kapak"—having appeared from lake Titicaca and having declared himself the "Son of the Sun."

Lord Kingsborough in his monumental work, "Antiquities of Mexico" in nine volumes, published from 1830 to 1848, has this important statement to make bearing on the subject I am discussing:

> The Aztecs have a tradition of a god suffering and crucified named Quetzalcoatl, and of one preceding Him to prepare the way and call them to repentance. Tezcaltlipoca offered Him a cup, calling him "my Son," of his unwillingness to taste and weeping bitterly after having drunk its contents; forsaking temporal kingdoms for spiritual, being called away by the Father. At His departure there were four earthquakes. He promised to return again and redeem his people.

Anyone who cannot see quite clearly indications of the story of Christ there will probably be unfamiliar with the story of Christ as given in our bible. May I turn now to H. H. Bancroft in his rather remarkable work, "Native Races", in five volumes, published in 1883. I should like to refer to the following passage:

> Although bearing various names and appearing in different countries, the American culture-heroes all present the same general characteristics. They are all described as white, bearded men, generally clad in long robes; appearing suddenly and mysteriously upon the scene of their labours, they at once set about improving the people by instructing them in useful and ornamental arts, giving them laws, exhorting them to practice brotherly love and other Christian virtues, and introducing a milder and better form of religion; having accomplished their mission, they disappear as mysteriously and unexpectedly as they came; and finally, they are apotheosized and held in great reverence by a grateful posterity. In such guise or on such mission did Quetzalcoatl appear in Cholula, Votan in Chiapas, Wixepecocha in Oaxaca, Zamna, and Cukulcan with his nineteen disciples, in Yucatan, Gucumatz in Guatemala, Viracocha in Peru, Sume and Paye-Tome in Brazil, the mysterious apostle mentioned by Rosales in Chile and Bochica in Colombia.

There are some of the names by which this great white god is known in various parts of America. In every case this great white god possesses the same characteristics. They are closely similar to those possessed by De-ka-nah-wi-deh, who is revered in the traditions of the Six Nations.

May I quote one more short passage on this matter, this time from de Nadaillac's work, "Prehistoric America", published in 1885. There will be those of course who will think that the Indians got these ideas about Christ from missionaries who came to this country. The following passage will disabuse the minds of such. It reads:

> No dissemination of merely Christian ideas since the conquest is sufficient to account for these myths.

The Marquis de Nadaillac has given thorough study to this matter and supports his statement adequately. There is no need here to refer to the elaboration in which he indulges in his work. Those who are interested can get the work. Some of these books are in our parliamentary library, where those interested can study these matters themselves.

Having said thus much, Mr. Speaker, in the hope that we may come more and more to appreciate the Indians and sympathize with them, I will close by saying that our generation will do well to take up the Canadian Indians as a solemn obligation and a sacred responsibility.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. Resolved, that schedule A to the customs tariff, being chapter forty-four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended, be further amended by striking thereout tariff items 216f, 296e, 386(p), 403(e), 409f, 410g, 410h, 410i, 410j, 410l, 410o(i), 410p, 410q, 410r, 410s, 410t, 410u, 410v, 410w, 410x, 410z, 435, 440k, 475, 523g, 682, 705 and 708 the several enumerations of goods respectively, and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of the said items, and by inserting the following items, enumerations and rates of duty in said schedule A:

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, when we were considering the customs tariff resolution the other evening the hon. member for Eglinton, the hon. member for Acadia, and perhaps some other members, asked that an opportunity should be provided to discuss the Torquay agreement. The hon. member for Greenwood asked me if any of the items in the customs tariff resolution were related in any way to the Torquay agreement, and I told him they were not. I promised at that time to take up with my colleagues the question as to whether it would not be desirable to afford an opportunity to consider the agreement. Hon. members will have seen on the order paper a motion in the name of the Prime Minister asking that the Torquay agreements and related matters be referred to the banking and commerce committee. If it meets with the convenience of the house, I would hope that we might be able to bring on that motion for consideration early next week at which time members who wish to discuss the question generally might do so. Then the motion could be passed and the agreement referred to the banking and commerce committee. There Mr. Hector McKinnon, who was the acting head of the delegation, would be available to hon. members for detailed discussion. But I repeat what I said to the hon. member for Greenwood the other evening, that the particular items here are not in any way related to those agreements.

Mr. Green: There are two matters I should like to place before the minister. The first has to do with this matter of including in item 409f sprinkler irrigation systems. We had some discussion about that type of equipment when this resolution was last up for consideration, and I find now that there was considerable discussion in the house at other sessions. For example, on November 10, 1949, at page 1630 of Hansard, we find a statement by the parliamentary assistant in reply to a question raised concerning sprinkler irrigation systems, in which he said:

> I do not think that this matter comes under the Department of Finance, but I am quite sure that if this new equipment—

He was referring to sprinkler equipment.

> —which apparently is being used so successfully in western Canada, reaches any real volume of sales it will not be very long before the industrialists of eastern Canada will be using Canadian aluminum to satisfy the demand. That is perhaps the only argument we have for the retention of such an item.

There the parliamentary assistant was arguing that if Canadian manufacturers could build up their resources so they could manufacture this equipment and sell it at reasonable prices, they were to be encouraged to do so. The following year this equipment was again discussed, and at page 2579 of Hansard for May 17, 1950, we find the parliamentary assistant saying:

> The question was raised a year ago by the hon. member for Kamloops and, I think, the hon. member for Calgary East, with respect to the complete portable irrigation equipment. That situation has been adjusted; there is an ample supply available in Canada today. I am told, however, that there is a temporary shortage of sprinkler heads. This has been brought to the attention of the department and they are trying now to see that a satisfactory supply is made available; or if that cannot be done an adjustment in regard to the tariff will be carefully considered. There is no adjustment in this tariff.

There the parliamentary assistant was enunciating government policy as being the encouragement of the production of these systems in Canada, just as had been done the preceding year. As the minister knows, Canadian firms are now in a position to supply the need. Then the hon. member for Kamloops asked:

> Then do I understand that if an adequate supply of sprinkler heads cannot be made available domestically the department will consider an adjustment in the tariff for future years?
> Mr. Sinclair: That is one of the items for discussion at Torquay this summer.

There we find the Torquay negotiations coming into the picture. The other evening the minister explained that Canada had not been successful in getting any consideration from the Americans on this type of equipment in the negotiations at Torquay, and of course such equipment is not included in the agreement between the two countries. It does seem to me that in view of these facts, first that the producers of equipment have been led to believe that they should get themselves in a position to produce these sprinkler systems, and second that Canada did not get any concession in this connection from the Americans at Torquay, in all fairness these sprinkler irrigation systems should not have been included in the changes set out in item 409f, and I would hope the minister might see his way clear to withdraw that type of equipment from these changes.

The other matter about which I would like a statement is the proposed dumping duty on British cars. For some time these cars have been coming in without the imposition of a dumping duty, but some weeks ago a statement was made that the provision which relieved them of the danger of having a dumping duty levied was to be withdrawn at either the end of April or the end of May.

Mr. Abbott: The end of May.

Mr. Green: What is to be the policy? It does seem to me that the importation of these British cars has served a very useful purpose. I know many hundreds of them have been imported into Vancouver, where they have been sold at prices very much below the prices of cars made on this continent. This business has greatly helped the British, in that as a result they are in a much better position to purchase Canadian goods. I would doubt the wisdom of stopping that trade by means of a dumping duty. I would ask the minister to deal with these two questions.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend has pointed out, the question of the sprinkler systems has been under consideration for two or three years. I understand they are a relatively new development. When the matter was first raised in the house I think, they were very new as far as Canada is concerned, and I believe they are still quite new here. My information is that it is only recently that manufacturers here have commenced to manufacture this type of equipment. I had the officers of my department make a very careful investigation of the business, the sources of supply and that sort of thing. It was clearly demonstrated to my satisfaction that this equipment was used primarily in agriculture rather than for irrigating golf courses and things like that, and I therefore came to the conclusion that it came within the broad group which Mr. Ilsley announced in 1944 would be admitted to Canada free of duty.

Before we decided to take it off the list and admit it free we did ask our negotiators at Torquay to ascertain whether the Americans would be prepared to give anything in return for such a concession. We found they were not; and rather than allow an industry to be created in Canada behind a tariff wall which might be even more difficult to remove at a later date, we came to the conclusion that the tariff should be removed this year; and to that decision I think we would have to adhere. In the case of the one manufacturer in particular whom I saw personally, and with whom I know the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is acquainted, I am looking into the question of whether some relief can be afforded in connection with the parts which were imported prior to the introduction of the budget, but that is still under investigation.

As to the question of the dumping duty, I am very happy that my hon. friend has raised the question because I should like to make a fairly comprehensive statement as to the position of the dumping duty, more particularly as it relates to British motor cars. As the committee is probably aware, the basic provision of Canada's anti-dumping legislation is section 6 (1) of the Customs Tariff, which reads as follows:

> In the case of goods exported to Canada of a class or kind made or produced in Canada, if the export or actual selling price to an importer in Canada is less than the fair market value or the value for duty of the goods as determined under the provisions of the Customs Act, there shall, in addition to the duties otherwise established, be levied, collected and paid on such goods, on their importation into Canada, a special or dumping duty, equal to the difference between the said selling price of the goods for export and the said value for duty thereof; and such special or dumping duty shall be levied, collected and paid on such goods although not otherwise dutiable.

As the committee again will probably recall, Canada's first anti-dumping legislation was introduced in 1904 by the government of the day headed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Details of that legislation have been amended from time to time, but the present clause is substantially as it was established in 1904, and subsequently maintained by other low-tariff Liberal prime ministers. The anti-dumping legislation, as it will be appreciated, made it possible for tariff rates to be reduced greatly without leaving Canadian producers open to unfair competition from dumped goods. The committee will recall that as long as an article is imported into Canada at no less than the fair market value in the country of origin, the dumping duty does not apply.

The provision introduced in 1904 complemented Sir Wilfrid's policy of consistent tariff reduction, and indeed during the forty-five years since then the anti-dumping clause has formed an integral part of the traditional Liberal policy of having low tariffs, but at the same time not sacrificing Canadian industry and agriculture to unfair competition from abroad. As the committee is aware, automobiles enter Canada from the United Kingdom free of customs duties, as well as from other British preferential sources. I suggest it would be difficult to defend this exemption from the regular duty if dumping in Canada were to be permitted permanently.

Canada's anti-dumping duties have never affected the importation of British automobiles appreciably. They are not applicable unless dumping occurs, and normally British cars are not dumped in Canada. However, in 1948, home market values of British automobiles in terms of sterling were high in relation to the price of Canadian cars at the then exchange rate of $4.03 to the pound. Consequently British motor vehicle producers found it necessary to export at prices below the home market value if they were to expand their sales in Canada to the desired extent. Thus if Canada's anti-dumping legislation had been kept in force and had been applied rigidly in 1948, it would have had an adverse effect on the sales of British cars in Canada. In view of this situation the Canadian government took action by order in council to suspend the application of section 6 of the customs tariff in respect of automobiles. This suspension also applied to some other kinds of goods where the circumstances were similar.

Under the circumstances that prevailed in 1948 and early 1949, there was a real need for this action. However, since the devaluation of sterling in September, 1949, there has been no need for British automobile manufacturers to dump their products in Canada. Most of them, virtually all of them, have not done so. Accordingly the reinstitution of the Canadian anti-dumping provisions under present circumstances will not affect the principal makes of British automobiles at all. My information is that there is only one or two of the more expensive cars which, at the present time, would be affected. I have no doubt that will be rapidly corrected. As I say, there may be one or possibly two British companies who may be affected to some extent, but they can quite easily conform to the provisions of the law.

When the anti-dumping duties were suspended in 1948 the suspension applied to imports from any country. The suspension could not be limited exclusively to British cars, because the general agreement on tariffs and trade forbids discrimination in matters of this sort. However, the need to make the suspension non-discriminatory did not occasion any difficulty until recently because imports of cars from the United States and certain other foreign countries were limited by quota under the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act. As I have pointed out to this house on other occasions, that gives a most decided advantage to the British motorcar manufacturers.

Since the government suspended automobiles from the anti-dumping provisions in 1948, conditions have changed in two important respects. The import quota restrictions have been removed from cars from the United States, and sterling has been devalued by about thirty per cent. British cars can now be sold in Canada readily without resort to dumping. There is no longer any need to continue the suspension of dumping duties in order to help imports from Britain. Moreover, there is a danger that if these exemptions were continued indefinitely they might be abused by exporters in other countries.

The following considerations, Mr. Chairman, are I think relevant to the government's decision to terminate the suspension of the anti-dumping provisions in respect of automobiles as of May 31 next.

First, after the devaluation of sterling in September, 1949, it was no longer necessary for British automobiles to be dumped in Canada. Second, imports of United States and other foreign cars are no longer subject to any quantitative restrictions. Accordingly, continuation of the suspension of anti-dumping duties might benefit foreign cars more than those from Britain. Third, if the suspension were continued indefinitely, Canadian automobile manufacturers would be convinced, and might be able to convince others, that they had a legitimate grievance because their competitors would be able, if they so desired, to dump in Canada at will. This would make it difficult to defend the continued free entry of British automobiles. Fourth, the action which the government took in 1948 to suspend the application of anti-dumping legislation to automobiles and certain other products was regarded from the start as a temporary measure rather than a permanent change in government policy respecting dumping. There was no intention of continuing this suspension any longer than required in order to deal with a particular condition that no longer exists.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, some months ago I had something to say about these dumping duties on cars, so I was interested in hearing the minister's remarks this afternoon. But I still cannot go along with him in his explanation of the reasons for reimposing these dumping duties. If British competition in the form of these small cars was hurting the Canadian automobile industry in some way, I could understand it. But in Canada today I think I am correct in saying there is little or no unemployment in the automobile industry. They are working at capacity, and you still cannot get a Chevrolet, Plymouth or a Ford without waiting for it. I believe there have been record sales for these cars—

Mr. Cruickshank: Might I interrupt the hon. member to ask a question?

Mr. Thatcher: Yes.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is the hon. member in the market for a Chevrolet? I have an excellent one.

Mr. Thatcher: I am talking about new cars, not second-hand ones. However, Mr. Chairman, the Canadian automobile industry today, I think I am correct in saying, can sell all the cars it can make. I suggest that Canadian consumers are having a difficult time paying the prices that some of these Canadian car manufacturers are demanding.

These English cars fill a place in the low price field, and I believe they are really needed. If the time comes later when these British cars—

Mr. Abbott: None of these low priced cars are paying any dumping duties now because the manufacturers have stopped dumping. They are coming in free.

Mr. Thatcher: Then why not leave the dumping duties the way they were?

Mr. Abbott: If my hon. friend would like an answer to that now, I can give it. I thought I had made it clear that the dumping clause in the Canadian tariff is and has been for forty-five years a fundamental part of the tariff. Its purpose, and its sole purpose, is to prevent unfair competition. Any exporter in another country can send his products to Canada, and if he sends them here at a value which is not below the fair market value in the market in which they are produced the normal rates of duty apply or they come in free. There have been long discussions in this house in years past as to the very serious effect there may be upon Canadian domestic producers if people in foreign countries can dump their surplus production in Canada at prices which bear no relation to the value of the article.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, I accept the statement of the minister, but I still cannot agree with him. For many years I have listened to the Liberal party say that they believe in freer trade. The minister says, we are going to give you freer trade but we will have to have these dumping duties. It does not seem to me to be a consistent policy. I have heard the Minister of Finance tell the British car industry to get their prices down and become competitive, to produce a product that would sell on the Canadian market. Then he said they can earn dollars for England and in turn can buy your wheat and your farm products. It seems to me that the British automobile industry has done this, and the minute that they have got their prices down to that level, Canada goes and puts this dumping duty on. I say that this dumping duty is completely undesirable, that it is inconsistent with Liberal policy of freer trade, and that I think it should be put back in the same state as it was prior to May 31.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister if he can give us this information? Let us take the case of an Austin car which sells for around $1,400, I believe. Has there been any difference in the selling price at which that car was sold in Canada prior to the restoration of the dumping duties and the price at which it sold in Canada after the restoration of the dumping duties? Can he give us a concrete example?

Mr. Abbott: The actual situation is that the dumping duties are still suspended and will be suspended until the end of this month. But the export price of Austin cars, to which my hon. friend refers, to Canada, now is such that, if the dumping duties had not been suspended, it still would not make any difference because there would not be a dumping duty applicable. In other words, the export price of the particular car to which my hon. friend refers is a price which represents the fair market value in the United Kingdom; and I believe that has been the case ever since sterling was devalued.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Did the minister not say that there was one exception to that?

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that there is; but until the first of June I cannot prove that. I think that it will be found that in the case I mentioned—and perhaps I may mention the name—namely the Vauxhall car, which is a more expensive car, it is still being exported to Canada at a price which would attract a dumping duty if the dumping duty were still applicable.

Mr. Herridge: On May 3, when this resolution was under discussion, I brought to the minister's attention the fact that the Americans were subsidizing apple exports to other countries at the rate of $1.25 per box. At that time I said that included Canada, but I was mistaken. I should have said that because of the large volume of exports going out of the United States, the greater volume of apples exported received a subsidy of $1.25 a box, which makes it possible for the United States exporters to dump apples into Canada at an extremely low price. The minister at that time said that he would have the situation checked. Has he any information to give us at this time?

Mr. Abbott: I believe that my parliamentary assistant has some information.

Mr. Sinclair: The Department of Agriculture and the Department of National Revenue looked into the situation and found out that the United States' subsidy is not paid on sales on the North American continent. The subsidy was mainly for ECA shipments and for assistance in getting rid of a large surplus of apples which the Americans had. There is an excellent statement on apple holdings in the Canadian Grower of April 23. I do not know that it is necessary to put it on record. But Canadian growers themselves feel that British Columbia apples in particular are holding their own on this eastern market. It is the same problem as the Canadian growers have, because in the Okanagan valley there is a surplus of McIntosh Reds at the moment.

While I am on my feet, I might say that there are two small amendments—

Mr. Fulton: If the parliamentary assistant will permit me to interrupt, may I say that I think that statement should not be allowed to go unamplified. The reason British Columbia apples held their own on eastern markets in recent months is that, in order to hold that market, the producers sold them at less than the normal price. They sold apples at $1 a box, I think it was; although it is true that they sold apples on this market, they had to sell them at the low price of $1 a box because of what amounted to a dumping duty by American producers.

Mr. Cruickshank: And they are better apples too.

Mr. Fulton: I agree with the hon. member for Fraser Valley that they were better apples; and if it were not for dumping duties, subsidies or things like that, they could hold their own and win in any market in the world.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear.

Mr. Laing: I think an important factor in this apple business is that British Columbia delivers her apples to one particular level in the United States market; and the removal of the lower price United States apples from the market has resulted every year in a sale by British Columbia—as it has since last year, of two and a third million boxes—at the highest price of any apples exported from British Columbia. They demand there an extremely high grade, particularly of Delicious, a few Winesaps, and some McIntosh Reds. They go principally to several acknowledged and long-time markets in the United States, like New Orleans. Prices as high as $3.55 a box, f.o.b. Okanagan, have been paid for those apples, all extra fancies. The removal of the lower grades from the United States I think has kept that market open for our highest grades, longest-priced British Columbia apples.

Mr. Abbott: I have forgotten how the question of apples arose. I know that my hon. friend asked a question about them, but they are not actually included in these tariff schedules.

Mr. Herridge: I have obtained the answer.

Mr. Abbott: I think the matter arose in connection with the Torquay agreements; and it was following that discussion that I arranged to have placed on the order paper a resolution which I hope we shall discuss on Monday.

Mr. Wright: There is one question I should like to ask the minister with regard to item 409f.

Mr. Abbott: Before my hon. friend does that, Mr. Chairman, what is the wish of the committee? Does the committee desire that we should pass the items en bloc or consider them item by item? When we come to the schedule in the bill, it is customary to pass tariff items item by item; but I am in the hands of the committee, and it is up to them to decide whatever they want to do. I do not imagine that most of the items have any special interest.

Mr. Fulton: Item by item.

Mr. Knowles: Agreed.

Mr. Abbott: All right.

The Deputy Chairman: I understand that the hon. member is asking a question in connection with item 409f?

Mr. Wright: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Am I to understand that we are to call each tariff item?

Mr. Abbott: After we have completed the general discussion, following the usual practice I thought we would run through the items, and then pass the resolution at the end.

The Deputy Chairman: Is that the wish of the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Thatcher: I have just one general question before you start to do that, Mr. Chairman. The minister answered the hon. member for Eglinton, as reported at page 2675 of Hansard, to the effect that he could not tell the exact amount of revenue that would be lost by these tariff decreases. I was just wondering if, in his budget speech, the fact that he has forecast revenue from customs duties next year of $315 million, the same as last year, means that there will be relatively no decrease in revenue.

Mr. Abbott: I said I could not answer at that time. In the meantime I think we have obtained some information.

Mr. Thatcher: Will you give me that?

Mr. Abbott: My parliamentary assistant will.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member for Eglinton asked what effect the tariff changes proposed in this resolution would have on the revenue. It is a difficult thing to ascertain from existing records, because quite a few of these items are listed out of what might be called basket items; for example, unfinished parts of mining machinery are now to be found in one general item in which there are a great number of other types of equipment. When we remove it without a detailed examination of every invoice, it would be difficult to find the effect; and most of the effects are of that nature. But with the new plastic items,—there are many other reductions; there is one increase—the over-all effect is this. It is estimated, as closely as it can be estimated by the department, that there will be a reduction of not more than half a million dollars a year.

Mr. Shaw: While we are dealing with the general item, there is a matter which I should like to bring to the minister's attention and certain information which I should like to procure. Within my constituency there is a dealer who handles American-made hearses and busses. Last month this man crossed into Canada at Windsor with a new hearse. He paid $1500 duty on the vehicle. He remained in London, Ontario, for a day or two and proceeded to Sarnia, there to cross into the United States. He was forced by the Canadian customs officials at that port to search out a bondsman and secure a bond guaranteeing that he would not sell that vehicle in the United States. In his communication to me he states that on ten previous occasions when he or his drivers had crossed in a similar manner, either going from east to west or from west to east, this situation had not occurred. It is conceivable that this matter has been straightened out. It has been indicated to me that he wrote to the deputy minister. I think that in view of the fact that this is the first time such a thing has occurred, and the further fact that he is a reputable dealer, the action was somewhat peculiar. I would ask for an explanation.

Mr. Abbott: Inasmuch as it is a matter relating to administration, I would ask the Minister of National Revenue to answer it, or to look into it.

Mr. Shaw: It was taken up with the deputy minister. I am not familiar with the explanation that has been given. Possibly I should be informed in the matter, but I have not been.

Mr. McCann: I am not familiar with the case, and would have to see the files before I could give an opinion. However, it appears to me somewhat unusual that a Canadian officer should concern himself with the disposition of the article in the United States. I think it will be found that there is some slip-up somewhere, either in the information the hon. member has received or in the action of the officer.

Mr. Shaw: He was the driver, himself.

Mr. Abbott: The hearse was empty, I suppose.

Mr. Shaw: I imagine it was. Trying to smuggle a body from this country to the United States would be difficult.

Mr. McCann: It has been done before.

The Deputy Chairman: As the general discussion seems to be complete, I shall call item 216f.

Item 216f agreed to.

Customs tariff—238. Synthetic resin sheets, film or sheeting, not less than 6 inches in width, n.o.p. synthetic resin lay-flat tubing not less than 6 inches in circumference, n.o.p.

(a) Phenol-aldehyde type, not further manufactured than cast: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

(b) Acrylic type, not further manufactured than moulded or cast: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

(c) Polyethylene type

(i) Plain, uncoated, undecorated: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

(ii) Other: general tariff, 15 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

(d) Vinyl type, except vinylidene,

(i) Plain, uncoated, undecorated: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

(ii) Other: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

(e) Vinyl type, vinylidene,

(i) Plain, uncoated, undecorated: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

(ii) Other: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

(f) Other type

(i) Plain, uncoated, undecorated: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

(ii) Other: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. Sinclair: There is an amendment to be offered to item 238. This is a new item covering plastics, and it is introduced as the result of two years of study by the tariff board. Since the resolutions have been printed, however, doubt has been expressed as to whether or not it was clear that this applies only to plastics made from resins, and not plastics made from cellulose. To make it clear that cellulose plastics still come under their old item, namely item 711, we are offering an addition to item 238, and I would ask my colleague to move the amendment accordingly.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That tariff item 238 in the resolution of April 10, 1951, relating to schedule A of the customs tariff be amended by the addition of the following proviso:

"Provided that, for the purposes of this item, synthetic resin shall be deemed not to include cellulose derivatives."

Mr. Fulton: Why are the two types of plastics subject to different tariff items?

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed there are a great many items in the tariff dealing with plastics in various groups. In its finding so far the tariff board has dealt only with plastics from resins, and that is what they have asked us to include in the item. Perhaps next year there will be another item bringing in a different terminology with respect to cellulose.

Mr. Fulton: At the present time the cellulose plastics are under item 711. I understand that gradually they will be sorted out, and dealt with in particular?

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: Is there not a typographical error here? I am looking at the resolution as it appears in Hansard of April 10 at page 1817. Should not the word "nor" be "not"?

Mr. McCann: It is "not" in the resolution.

Mr. Sinclair: In the resins resolution it is "not".

Mr. Abbott: Unfortunately in Hansard of April 10 it is "nor".

Mr. Knowles: But it should be "not".

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: The word "not" appears in the item.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—277. Oils, hydrogenated, blown, dehydrated or sulphonated, not including blown or hydrogenated fish, seal or whale oils: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. Wright: There may be a simple explanation, but the rates in effect prior to the present suggested rate state that to August 27, 1950, the rate was 20 per cent, and from August 28, 1950, that it was "various". What is the meaning of "various"? In what conditions are the tariff rates varied?

Mr. Sinclair: That applies to the item as it was before. It will be noted that in the proposed item we set out specific rates. The reason for this item arises from a tariff board ruling on August 27, 1950, disallowing the former distinction in that raw oils had different tariff rates from these hydrogenated, dehydrated or sulphonated oils. Naturally we permit the entry of raw oils at a rate lower than the finished product, because we would hope that Canadian manufacturers would do the finishing. This item makes it clear that from April 11 these refined oils or partly processed oils, as described in item 277, shall have the tariff rates set out there, namely, a British preferential tariff rate of 15 per cent, a most-favoured-nation rate of 20 per cent, and a general tariff rate of 25 per cent. The old "various" rate varied according to the type of oil.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have been interested in this matter. I see it is only ten minutes after five, and I shall not be engaged in anything until between eight and nine o'clock tomorrow night.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Don't get mixed up with the pipe lines.

An hon. Member: Get going.

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, I am being told to hurry up. Some of these people are not interested in the 550,000 dairymen of Canada. However, I am trying to help the dairymen I represent. I shall just get on the record, if I can pronounce some of these words in item 277, just how these rates apply. It refers to "oils"—how do you pronounce that word; someone will have to help me there?

Mr. Abbott: Hy-dro-gen-a-ted.

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes, "Hydrogenated, blown, dehydrated or sulphonated"—I was going to say suicided—"not including blown or hydrogenated fish, seal, or whale oils." Now, we will get the whole thing on the record so that the dairymen can read what we are discussing here. The first heading is, "British preferential tariff, 15 p.c."—and I hope Hansard gets it in that way. Then, the next column is "Most-favoured-nation tariff, 20 p.c." and the next—

Mr. Knowles: Is that Progressive Conservative?

Mr. Cruickshank: Carrying on from there we get the general tariff at 25 p.c.—and I would like to have this printed in Hansard the way it reads in this delightful little document—"rates in effect prior to rates proposed in this budget: British preferential tariff, 15 p.c."—and then under that the word "various". You know, these people who do not appreciate the dairy farmers are delighted to put the word "various" in there. It covers a multitude of sins. I believe Adam himself used it.

Then, we move along to the next column: "Most-favoured-nation tariff; to August 27th, 1950, 20 p.c.;" and then we have under that,

"From August 28th, 1950," and under that the word "various" again. Then, under the general tariff item there is, "25 p.c." and under that the word "various".

"Various", I suppose, refers to these oils which are coming into Canada in an endeavour to put the 550,000 dairymen out of action—as well as many creameries. From correspondence I have received from various ridings in Ontario and Quebec, I believe there are a few dairy farmers in those two provinces who are interested in dairying. Then, judging from editorials one sees in the Ottawa Journal, among other newspapers, it would seem that there are a few farmers in eastern Canada who are interested in the dairy industry—although surprisingly little is said in that connection. Still I must commend my good friend from Lanark who, in my opinion, made the best speech on behalf of the dairymen that has been made in this House of Commons in the last ten years.

Let me point out to the committee in connection with item 277 that in 1950 the amount of oils brought in per month amounted to 670,000 pounds. This year in the first quarter the importations amounted to 1,500,000 pounds per month. That is quite a large increase. Of course we hear these alibis when we talk about the high cost of living in connection with the price of butter, when it goes up a little, but when the cost of living goes down a small percentage we do not hear that the Canada Packers have decided to lower the price of butter they had in storage to the detriment of the people of Canada. You do not hear that advertised particularly.

I am not going through the list of these different oils. I am not a Rhodes scholar and there are a couple of words that I cannot pronounce, nor do I know what they mean. The item states, "not including blown or hydrogenated fish, seal or whale oils." I do not know what they mean by "blown".

Mr. Abbott: I wonder if my hon. friend would permit me to interrupt for a moment. This item relates largely to non-edible oils, and the principal oil under it is castor oil which is brought in, not for medicinal purposes but for use in industrial processes, paints, textiles and the like. I am not a technician in connection with hydrogenated oils, but the fact is that this item maintains the existing tariff on these processed non-edible oils used for industrial purposes but excludes, as is stated, hydrogenated fish, seal or whale oils. The oils are, to a large extent, not fit for human consumption.

Mr. Cruickshank: I thank the minister for his description of the oils that are customarily used in the manufacture of margarine, but I am afraid the Minister of Finance is not keeping up to date on what goes on in this city of Ottawa where they are trying to ruin the dairy farmers. As far as I am concerned, many of the things that I get go into my wastepaper basket, but here is one that I received which reads:

The Tariff Board

Canada

Public sittings of the tariff board will be held at 541 Sussex street, Ottawa—

That is the street where you cannot make the left-hand turn.

—for the hearing of the undermentioned appeals under the Customs Act and the Excise Tax Act.

The first paragraph refers to an appeal in connection with logging companies. I need not say anything about that as there are a few representatives around here to protect the logging interests. But I could speak for them because we log 282 million feet annually in my riding, and the logs are of such a size that it takes four men and a boy to jump over them. But they are being well looked after.

The next paragraph in this notice refers to an appeal by Canada Packers Limited. I am certainly going to attend that one. I have heard of divorce courts and appeal courts, but I understand at this hearing I will not be able to say anything. The member for Fraser Valley will not be able to get up and say a word about the dairy farmers. The paragraph reads:

Wednesday, June 13, at 10 a.m. (D.S.T.)

That means daylight saving time.

Appeal No. 236 by Canada Packers Limited—

The parliamentary rules do not permit me to say just what they are limited in.

—from a decision of the deputy minister of national revenue that a mixture of hydrogenated cottonseed oil (80 per cent) and hydrogenated soya bean oil (20 per cent) imported under Winnipeg entry No. 35785-A, December 8, 1949; West Toronto entry No. 29251, November 16, 1949 and Vancouver entry No. 49605-A, February 16, 1950, from the United States in tank cars for the manufacture of margarine is dutiable under tariff item 711 at 20 per cent.

I cannot help but think of the $3.86 I have to pay for a hundred of these little pills, and yet here is a case where they are bringing in these oils in tank cars. That is what is being done by this colossal giant which is trying to ruin the dairy farmers. Yet they have the audacity to appeal and waste the time and money of the people of Canada by taking up the time of this board. This could be decided in room 565 without any delay at all.

I do not know where else I could bring up this matter. The two words are alike and I think the two oils are alike. The appeal is in connection with cottonseed oil.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member could speak to it under tariff item No. 711.

Mr. Knowles: Item 711 is not in here.

Mr. Cruickshank: I knew there would be a joker somewhere when I am trying to protect the dairy farmer. If I moved an amendment I would be ruled out of order. It is seldom that I ask Hansard to be put away and preserved in family archives but I hope that the dairy farmers in Ontario and Quebec who happen to get Hansard in their homes will put it away and then five years from now read what I have said about these imported oils and the like and then consider the returns they are getting from their dairying at that time.

I wish I could move an amendment, but as I cannot I have taken advantage of the only opportunity I have to bring this matter before the committee. The fact that last year the importations amounted to 670,000 pounds per month as compared with 1,500,000 pounds a month this year shows what is happening. I understand from the minister that they are taking some impure articles out of it to put directly into margarine and they are putting it into cod liver oil or something.

I do not want to take up any more time of the committee. I should like to move an amendment because it would be quite simple. I would go right across the board, 15 per cent, 20 per cent, 25 per cent, 15 per cent, 20 per cent, 25 per cent and make it quite simple for those people who make so many mistakes down here. They should go to the Fisher high school and get somebody to teach them how to multiply because I would suggest that all rates be multiplied by three. We would then have a proper tariff on imported oils which are now being brought in in an attempt to ruin the dairy farmer.

Mr. Fulton: The minister stated that the tariff was changed on August 27, 1950; that prior to August 27 there had been a uniform rate and that after August 27 there were various rates made applicable under the most favoured nation tariff. I do not recollect that the house was in session on August 27 and perhaps the minister could explain how this happened.

Mr. Abbott: On August 27 last the tariff board on an appeal from one of the paint companies stated that dehydrated castor oil was not properly included under item 711. This particular item, castor oil, forms an important part of our trade agreement with Brazil. It was always intended that the raw product would come in free of duty. It was never intended that the processed product should come in free of duty. In virtue of the decision of the tariff board, however, it became necessary to insert this item in the tariff to make it perfectly clear that raw castor oil comes in free but that if it is dehydrated, hydrogenated, or whatever other processes are mentioned here, the existing tariff rates will apply, and that is all.

Mr. Fulton: How would it be that the item was inserted in the tariff? I can understand that the decision would make inapplicable the rate which had previously been thought to be applicable, but the minister says that the item was inserted in the tariff. My understanding was that could only be done as a result of a resolution.

Mr. Abbott: We are inserting item 277 as a new item in the tariff, and have carved it out of item 711.

Mr. Fulton: This change is not now in effect, and will only be in effect, and dated back to August 27, after this is passed?

Mr. Abbott: It has been effective since budget night. Between the 28th of August and the night I announced my budget changes, various rates, as indicated in the three columns to the right, were in effect, but from budget night, assuming that this act passes, this new item will apply.

Mr. Hatfield: The minister says that this item does not cover edible oils. What oils does it cover?

Mr. Abbott: It largely covers inedible oils.

Mr. Hatfield: What do you mean by that?

Mr. Abbott: Just what the item says. These oils are, to a very large extent, not for edible purposes, and my hon. friend will note that fish, seal or whale oils are specifically excluded. I should like my hon. friend to take my assurance, which is based upon the positive assurance of the officials who know, that this item does not, in practice, cover edible oils to any great extent.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to ask a question. Is castor oil not edible?

Mr. Abbott: Not in this form. It may be edible in its raw state. I do not know.

Mr. Cruickshank: I do not think we should pass something concerning oil when nobody knows what it is and what it is not. Just before I came in a member of this house told me that they have to import oil to put up herring of all things. We do not have that problem in the province of British Columbia.

Out there herring have oil in them. An hon. member told me that right behind these curtains.

Mr. Knowles: That makes it official.

Mr. Cruickshank: I want to know what these oils are. The minister said they are going into castor oil. If they are going into castor oil they must be edible.

Mr. Abbott: No. I am informed that the basic product of most of these oils is castor oil. Castor oil is brought in in its raw state. I understand that it may then be processed for medicinal purposes or for industrial purposes. It is used in paint, certain textile processes, tanning, and so on. I am not a technical expert with respect to other oils, but what is being done here is not to change the existing duties at all but to maintain the free entry of the raw oil. There are several items for all other oils such as cottonseed oil. There is item 711. There are numerous oil items in the tariff.

Mr. Hatfield: I should like to ask the minister what the duty is on edible oil such as cottonseed and peanut oil.

Mr. Abbott: My parliamentary assistant has the figures.

Mr. Sinclair: For coconut oil the British preferential tariff is 12½ per cent, most favoured nation 17½ per cent, general, 17½ per cent. For peanut oil the British preferential tariff is 15 per cent, most favoured nation 20 per cent, general 25 per cent. For cottonseed oil the British preferential tariff is 12½ per cent, most favoured nation 17½ per cent, general 17½ per cent. For soybean oil the British preferential tariff is 15 per cent, most favoured nation 20 per cent, and general 25 per cent.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): There has been some reference by the hon. member for Fraser Valley to edible oil being used in the sardine industry. I can assure the hon. member that hundreds of thousands of gallons are used each year in the sardine industry in the maritime provinces. I am not aware whether or not it is used in British Columbia. At the present time that oil is being imported from the United States. There was a time when we got quite a bit of cottonseed oil from Great Britain, but today it is coming in from the United States. It is brought in in tank car lots, and there are hundreds of thousands of gallons used every year.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am still glad we have better fish in British Columbia.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Items 296e, 386, and 403 agreed to.

Customs tariff—409f. Grain crushers; grain or hay grinders; grain or hay dryers; milk coolers; steel stanchions for confining livestock either in pens or individually, including complete equipment for milking parlors; automatic stock watering bowls; barn litter carriers and track; sprinkler irrigation systems; barn hay forks, carriage, pulleys and track; all the foregoing for use on the farm for farm purposes only; hay loaders, hay tedders, potato planters, potato diggers, fodder or feed cutters, ensilage cutters, post hole diggers, snaths, stumping machines, grain loaders or elevators with a capacity not exceeding 40 bushels per minute and all other agricultural implements or agricultural machinery, n.o.p., and complete parts of all the foregoing.

Mr. Wright: This item deals with certain types of agricultural machinery or equipment which are now being classified as agricultural machinery and consequently will come in free. It sets out here that among other things there is included equipment for milking parlours. Would that include the stationary gasoline engine which is a part of the equipment in a milking parlour where power is not available? The item also refers to grain loaders or elevators with a capacity not exceeding 40 bushels per minute. Those grain elevators will only operate if there is a gasoline engine attached to them. Will gasoline engines that are attached to such grain loaders come in free of duty?

Mr. Sinclair: Regarding separate or attached gasoline engines, the answer is, generally, no. However, attached gasoline engines meeting the provisions of tariff item 409q are free of tariff.

Mr. Wright: Then I must ask the further question why they are not included. These small portable gasoline engines are pieces of farm equipment which are used on at least ninety per cent of the farms of western Canada. They are essential to the operation of the equipment which you are now placing on the free list. I would urge the minister to give serious consideration to the placing of such engines on the free list especially if they are brought in as part of such equipment, where they are attached to part of the equipment and form a part of it.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is aware that the question of the tariff on gasoline engines is one of long standing. They are covered by a number of items in the tariff, and as my parliamentary assistant has said those items do not provide for the free entry of gasoline engines although they may be used as part of these milking parlours, unless, of course, the provisions of tariff item 409q are complied with. As to what may be done another year of course I am not in a position to say. I will be glad to take my hon. friend's representations under consideration.

Mr. Wright: I may say that this matter was brought to the minister's attention two years ago, I believe. I am wondering if any consideration has been given to it, and what the result of that consideration is. These engines are an important part of farm equipment today. We are not living back in the days of the ox cart when everything was done by hand. Today on our farms, especially on those farms which are not equipped with electricity, people have to use these small gas engines for a great many purposes. I think they should be classified as a piece of farm equipment. I would certainly urge the minister to give consideration to this matter.

Mr. Fulton: For the benefit of myself at any rate, and possibly one or two other western members in whose constituencies there are dairies and dairy farms, I wonder if somebody would tell me what a milking parlour is. Out there our cows are not so delicate that they have to be brought into the parlour for milking. I do not know what a milking parlour means.

Mr. Sinclair: I must confess that I felt the same surprise when I first saw the item. Apparently this is a phrase commonly used for the complete room and equipment used in the operation of mechanical milking. It is a trade name, a phrase used in the industry.

Mr. Fulton: I suppose purebred cows would not like to have their milk taken in anything but a parlour.

Mr. Major: If the hon. member would go out through the country once in a while he would see what these milking parlours are.

Mr. Fulton: In my part of the country cows are milked in a milk room, not a milk parlour.

Mr. Cardiff: For the benefit of those who do not know anything about a milking parlour, we have them on the more up to date farms in our part of the country. It is a room especially equipped, with everything nice and clean. The cow is cleaned before being brought in, and instead of being milked in her usual stall she is brought into this milking parlour. The machine is turned on, and after she is milked she is driven out and another cow is brought in. Anyone who has the opportunity to go into a modern dairy barn will find one of these rooms, right up to date and very clean.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Once before I asked a question on 409f. I understand that all the articles under this item come in duty free.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Hunter: Can the minister say what the rates were on the various items now being brought in free?

Mr. Sinclair: There were varying rates of duty applying to the different articles which are now being included under this item. The hon. member can find what they were by looking up the customs tariff. However, no matter what the previous rate was they are all free now.

Item agreed to.

Items 410a, 410g, and 410h agreed to.

410i. (1) Miners' rescue appliances, designed for emergency use in mines, where artificial breathing is necessary in the presence of poisonous gases, including high pressure oxygen pumps for use exclusively in connection with such appliances, and automatic resuscitation apparatus for artificial breathing to aid in the saving of human life, and parts of all the foregoing.

(2) Combustible gas indicators, for detecting explosive gases or vapours; methane detectors, carbon monoxide detectors and continuous indicators and recorders; carbon monoxide alarms; pyrotannic detectors for determining the presence and quantity of carbon monoxide in the blood; inhalators for use in reviving victims of carbon monoxide poisoning; pocket gas respirators, dust respirators, paint and lacquer spray respirators, fume and smoke masks, and hose mask outfits complete with face piece, harness, air line and air pump or blower, designated for the protection of firemen and industrial workers; special safety goggles, designed for eye protection of miners, welders, foundrymen and other industrial workers employed in hazardous work; parts of all the foregoing, British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister for a further word of explanation about this word "various"? He gave an explanation before, but it left one or two questions still in my mind. Does it ever happen that the tariff board or the government fixes rates, various or otherwise, higher than the rates that have been approved by parliament?

Mr. Abbott: No; the executive cannot increase a rate approved by parliament. Subject to the provisions of the Customs Act it can reduce rates under certain conditions, but it cannot increase them. When the word "various" is used in the ways and means resolutions it usually indicates that where a number of items are put on the free list and included in a general item you do not attempt to indicate what the different rates may have been on the various articles. To answer my hon. friend's question directly, there can be no increase of a tariff by executive action.

Mr. Knowles: I notice also that while the word "various" appears quite a number of times, it seems to appear only in the columns under the heading "rates in effect prior to rates proposed in this budget." Am I right in assuming that we never legislate for various rates?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, the word "various" never appears in the column which indicates the new rates being brought into effect?

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is quite right.

Mr. Sinclair: The only change in items 410g to 410z is the phrase about parts. Now unfinished parts may also be brought in free and finished in the mine machine shop itself. That is the effect of 410g to 410z, with the single exception of 410l dealing with coal crushers. One of the reasons for the various rates was that forgings and castings had different rates before. Now unfinished forgings and castings together with parts for mining machinery are going to be dutiable at the same rate as the machinery itself.

Item agreed to.

Items 410j, 410l, 410o, 410p, 410q, 410r, 410s, 410t, 410u, 410v, 410w, 410x and 410z agreed to.

435. (a) Locomotives and motor cars for railways, of a class or kind not made in Canada, and parts thereof (including motive power and parts thereof, of a class or kind not made in Canada), for use exclusively in mining, metallurgical or sawmill operations, free.

(b) Diesel switching locomotives, including motive power, and parts of the foregoing, of a class or kind not made in Canada, free.

Mr. Cruickshank: Would it be possible to discuss fire equipment under this item?

Mr. Sinclair: This is not the item.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is there such an item?

Mr. Sinclair: Not in this amendment.

Item agreed to.

440k (1) Engines and complete parts thereof, n.o.p., to be used exclusively in the propulsion of boats or in hoisting nets and lines used in such boats bona fide owned by individual fishermen for their own use in the fisheries, under such regulations as the minister may prescribe, free.

(2) Diesel engines and complete parts thereof, to be used exclusively in the propulsion of boats or in hoisting nets and lines used in such boats for use exclusively in bona fide commercial fishing operations, under such regulations as the minister may prescribe, free.

Mr. Wright: Are these rates changed or reduced from what they were before, when these engines are used in fishing boats?

Mr. Sinclair: The only change in this section is that now we admit diesel engines free if they are going to be used in fishing boats. We still tax gasoline engines, but we admit diesel engines free. That is the intent of the change in 440k.

Mr. Fulton: Under the general tariff they are to be subject to a duty of 15 per cent, are they not?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, I am sorry. They are free under the British preferential tariff and the most favoured nation tariff, and the two sources from which we obtain these engines are Britain and the United States.

Mr. Hatfield: Why are diesel engines free when used in fishing boats but not free when used in agricultural machinery when they are part of that equipment? I am not objecting to their being free for use in fishing boats, but I want to know why they are not also free when used in agricultural equipment.

Mr. Sinclair: Under item 409q diesel engines for agricultural equipment are now free. That item reads:

Auxiliary internal combustion engines incorporated in or attached to agricultural implements or agricultural machinery: free, free, free.

This is just bringing the fishing industry in line with the exemption given to agriculture.

Mr. Wright: Why are diesel engines allowed in free while the tariff is maintained on gasoline engines? The gasoline engine is used more than the diesel engine.

Mr. Sinclair: I cannot speak of the east coast, but on the west coast they are turning more and more to diesel engines for their fishing boats. That is a much more expensive engine to purchase initially, but of course it has a much lower cost of operation. I think this is a step forward. Diesel engines for the fishing industry are now free, as they have been for agriculture. The time may come when further consideration may be given other engines, but at the moment the fishing industry is very grateful for the opportunity to bring in these diesel engines free from Britain or the United States.

Mr. Wright: I quite agree with that; but are any of these engines made in Canada?

Mr. Sinclair: Some small diesel engines are made in Canada, but they have been used only to a very limited extent in the fishing industry. Big diesels are made here for use in power plants, but of course that is a different engine. The diesel used in a fishing boat of course is not comparable to the one used in a power plant.

Mr. Wright: I point out that you are prepared to bring in diesel engines free, though they are made in Canada, while apparently you are not prepared to bring in gasoline engines free. Have the gasoline engine manufacturers some special reasons for this?

Mr. Sinclair: There is one important point. In order to have a ruling like this there has to be a sufficient production within the country to satisfy normal demands. That is certainly not the case with diesel engines for the fishing industry. On the other hand, as the hon. member knows, we have a very large manufacture of gasoline engines in most of the provinces of Canada.

Mr. Bater: May I ask if the recent Torquay agreements make any changes in these tariffs.

Mr. Abbott: No. That question was asked the other evening, and I explained that the Torquay agreements do not relate to these changes at all. It was for that reason the motion was placed on the order paper in the name of the Prime Minister to refer the Torquay agreements to the banking and commerce committee, and I hope we will discuss that matter on Monday. A discussion of the Torquay agreements is not relevant to these items, because none of them tie into those agreements.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I would like to congratulate the minister on having the duty removed from diesel engines. That is something which is very much appreciated in the maritime provinces, owing to the fact that 90 per cent of the diesel engines used down there are imported from the United States. It is considered that the type of engine made in Canada is not of the same quality as the United States engine. This is something the fishermen have been asking for years, and I congratulate the minister on having brought it about.

Mr. Cruickshank: I would like to join with my hon. friend, and to add the hope that the maritimes will adopt the same spirit in connection with the dairy industry.

Mr. Wright: I want to say one more word about these gasoline engines. We have manufacturers in this country, the Massey-Harris and the International Company, who are manufacturing these engines in the United States. They are sending them in here, and we are paying a tariff on them. Why can these engines not be made in Canada at lower prices so we can afford to buy them? They are being sold in the United States at prices which are twenty-five per cent lower than we have to pay for them in Canada. It seems to me there is something wrong. We have been bringing this to the attention of the minister year after year. If these tariffs were taken off these companies would manufacture in Canada, and we would have a Canadian industry. Why should we pay to bring them in?

Mr. Abbott: As I said before, this is an old subject and we have discussed it at length in the house before. It may be that gasoline engines should be put on the free list. I think that you would find in a good many parts of Canada a good many people might object to that. Be that as it may, the government has not yet decided it is appropriate to do so. Broadly speaking, our tariff is very much lower than the United States tariff. I have had occasion to say before in this house that unless I am convinced it is clearly in the interests of the Canadian people, we do not give away any tariff concessions unless we are getting something in return. Once you have given a concession you find that your bargaining position is pretty low.

The record of the party of which I am a member has been one, over the years, of consistently lowering tariffs. I do not think any party in this country can show a better record. But I am not prepared to go into a long discussion now on the merits or demerits of taking the tariff off gasoline engines. It is not being taken off in this budget.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, we appreciate the tariff reductions that have been made, but what the minister has said is reminiscent of the brick for brick policy that I heard the Liberal party criticize so strongly from 1930 to 1935 when they were in opposition. It seems to me it is a big departure from the old tariff discussions we used to have on the prairies when most of the elections were fought on tariff issues. After all, these engines are used very extensively by the farm population of this country, and by others as well. I believe the plea that has been made is one that should receive consideration, and I hope the minister will consider it in spite of the fact he believes in an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth tariff policy.

Mr. Abbott: Under item 409q gasoline engines are brought in free under certain circumstances if they are for farmers. To answer my friend's general observation about the brick for brick policy, I think he will be fair enough to recognize that we have been taking down the bricks in our tariff structure faster than other people have been taking them down. The brick for brick policy was a building up, and we have been lowering our tariffs unilaterally—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What about 1930?

Mr. Abbott: Well, 1930 was—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister say that about 1930?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Abbott: In 1932, there were some things done which would not apply to that. Let me suggest that the brick for brick argument does not apply to what I have been discussing now.

Mr. McLure: A few moments ago I understood the minister to say that they never gave any tariff concession unless they got some return—

Mr. Abbott: No, I said unless I was convinced it was in the interests of the Canadian public to do it without a quid pro quo.

Mr. McLure: I was going to say that there was one item, furs which are allowed free entry, and yet the United States put on a 50 per cent ad valorem duty.

Item agreed to.

Items 475, 523g and 682 agreed to.

Customs tariff—705. Settlers' effects, viz: Wearing apparel, books, usual and reasonable household furniture and other household effects; instruments and tools of trade, occupation or employment, guns, musical instruments, domestic sewing machines, typewriters, bicycles, carts, wagons and other highway vehicles, agricultural implements and livestock for the farm, not to include livestock or articles for sale, or for use as a contractor's outfit, nor vehicles nor implements moved by mechanical power, nor machinery for use in any manufacturing establishment; all the foregoing if actually owned abroad by the settler for at least six months before his removal to Canada, and subject to regulations prescribed by the minister, British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Provided:

(1) That, subject to the exceptions stated hereunder, any dutiable article entered as settlers' effects may not be so entered unless brought by the settler on his first arrival, and shall not be sold or otherwise disposed of without payment of duty until after twelve months' actual use in Canada;

(2) That the six months' ownership requirement as specified in this item shall not apply in the case of bona fide brides' trousseaux and wedding presents; and

(3) That with respect to bona fide settlers' effects imported from countries named by the minister that are applying restrictions on the transfer of emigrants' capital to Canada, the six months' ownership requirement specified in this item shall not apply and notwithstanding the first arrival requirements specified in this item a reasonable amount of the effects of a settler may be entered from such countries during a period of three years from the date of the settler's first arrival, subject to such regulations as the minister may prescribe.

Mr. Sinclair: I have a small amendment to this item 705. The first part is exactly the same, but the change is in section (3). The purpose of this amendment is to extend the provisions which allow a settler to bring his effects into the country when he comes here. When countries began putting up barriers so far as the movement of capital was concerned, it became very difficult for settlers from these countries to bring in very much by way of personal effects, which is the reason for this amendment. The section which we have here provided that settlers from countries where there were restrictions, which were going to be designated by the governor in council, could bring in equipment which they had, and they did not have to have it for six months as have other settlers. More than that, they could continue to bring in equipment for the next three years. Some of these countries allow one to bring out so much every year.

This provision has the added advantage of allowing the settler in Canada to look around and see what sort of equipment he should bring here. It was pointed out that this three-year rule would be rather unfair to those immigrants who came out in 1945, 1946 and 1947, who would not get any benefit from it. So, the purpose of this amendment is to carry out the three-year thought so far as settlers coming in the future are concerned, and at the same time give those who came in the past one year in which to bring in their effects. So far only Holland has agreed to such a plan, and it will be of great help in bringing out more Dutch immigrants.

Mr. McCann: I move that the third section of the proviso to tariff item 705 in the resolution of April 10, 1951, relating to schedule A of the customs tariff be amended to read as follows:

(3) That with respect to bona fide settlers' effects imported from countries named by the minister that are applying restrictions on the transfer of emigrants' capital to Canada, the six months' ownership requirement specified in this item shall not apply and notwithstanding the first arrival requirements specified in this item a reasonable amount of the effects of a settler may be entered from such countries under this item

(a) during a period of three years from the date of the settler's first arrival, or

(b) where the settler's first arrival occurred between April 10, 1945, and April 11, 1949, during the period ending April 10, 1952, subject to such regulations as the minister may prescribe.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Cruickshank: Does that rule out section 2 of item 705?

Mr. Abbott: No, it revises section 3.

Mr. Cruickshank: Section 2 has not carried as yet, and I should like an explanation of section 2 of item 705.

Mr. Sinclair: In countries where there is no restriction on capital, a settler is expected to have owned his effects for six months before bringing them into this country. Obviously a bride could not be expected to own her trousseau for six months. There is no change in this provision. The only change is to the subsection in which we are applying a different procedure to those countries which have exchange restrictions.

Mr. Cruickshank: I was asking for an explanation of what that consisted of, and I thought the parliamentary assistant could tell me.

Mr. Cardiff: How much are they allowed to bring in?

Mr. Sinclair: That is for the country of origin to say. They are the ones who put on the restrictions. We have no limit to our settlers' effects so long as they come within the type described in the old section 705. The Netherlands are being fairly generous over the three-year period in permitting Dutch immigrants to bring goods forward without restriction. The country of origin puts on the restrictions.

Mr. Adamson: Did I understand the minister to say that only the Netherlands have agreed to this, and the United Kingdom has not agreed?

Mr. Sinclair: So far the agreement is only with the Netherlands. It can be expected to cover any of those restricted countries where there is an agreement.

Mr. Adamson: Where there is currency control?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Cardiff: This has to do with material, but what about money?

Mr. Sinclair: That again is not a restriction of ours but of the country of origin.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—708. Arms, military stores, munitions of war and other goods the property of and to remain the property of a British commonwealth country designated by the governor in council or of a foreign country that is a party to the North Atlantic treaty and is designated by the governor in council; goods consigned to military service agencies and institutions designated by the governor in council where the goods are for the personal use of or consumption by nationals of countries designated under this item who are employed in defence establishments of those countries in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Provided that the governor in council may prescribe regulations for all the foregoing and may order that any of the privileges granted under this item be withdrawn in any case where a country does not grant corresponding privileges to Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask a question under item 708. I read this near the end of the paragraph:

. . . goods consigned to military service agencies and institutions designated by the governor in council where the goods are for the personal use of or consumption by nationals of countries designated under this item who are employed in defence establishments of those countries in Canada.

Does that mean all kinds of personal goods without limitation? In other words, as I understand the privilege of diplomatists, it treats them practically like diplomats.

Mr. Abbott: I am informed, for instance, that this would include goods sold through what are described as American PX stores at an American base at, say Churchill, or at some of the bases in Newfoundland. This section was inserted at the suggestion of the Department of National Defence primarily. My understanding is that it was to facilitate the transfer of arms and equipment between the countries with which we are associated in the North Atlantic treaty.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the minister satisfied that it is administratively watertight and that it will be limited in the way that he indicates? Suppose that we get in the country large numbers of people like those described in this section, and you found you would open the door much wider?

Mr. Abbott: As to that, of course, it will be administered by the deputy minister of national revenue, customs and excise, Mr. Sim. The wording which is used here is the wording which he in fact prepared; and he assured us that he could administer it. In part, of course, it is to eliminate obsolete phraseology in a similar item going back to 1906, which refers to such things as the imperial government, His Majesty's imperial navy, and so on. But it is intended to broaden the application to our allies in the North Atlantic treaty.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Have we in fact had some similar arrangement, either during the wartime or otherwise, and has it worked out satisfactorily?

Mr. Abbott: We have had it in respect of the United Kingdom, but we have never had it with respect to other countries with whom we have been allies.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions 2 and 3 agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the resolutions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Abbott: Call it six o'clock. Perhaps in the five minutes that remain I might introduce the bill based on this resolution. Would that be appropriate?

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I should remind the minister that we have the income tax resolution to consider. They have all been moved into committee of ways and means at the same time.

Mr. Abbott: They are all before the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: I should not have said just now: "Shall I report this resolution?" We still have this income tax resolution to consider.

Mr. Abbott: I think that is correct. It might be well for me to introduce all the bills at the same time. Then of course my intention would be to allow them to stand on the order paper for several days in order to enable hon. members to study them, particularly the one with regard to income tax.

The Deputy Chairman: Then at this time I will call the income tax act resolution.

INCOME TAX ACT

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, amongst other things:

1. That, in respect of income earned after the commencement of the 1951 calendar year, a corporation shall pay a defence surtax for the year equal to 20 per cent of that portion of its ordinary income tax for the year that is computed at the 38 per cent rate, or the 33 per cent rate if applicable (before allowance is made for tax credits), subject to a right to a refund of such tax to the extent that it would reduce the corporation's taxable income after payment of ordinary income tax to an amount less than 5 per cent of its capital employed.

2. That an individual shall pay a defence surtax equal to

(a) for the 1951 taxation year, 10 per cent and

(b) for each subsequent taxation year, 20 per cent of his ordinary income tax (including investment surtax) for the year before allowance is made for tax credits.

3. That, for the purpose of computing income from an office or employment for the 1951 or a subsequent taxation year, there may be deducted certain amounts paid in respect of

(a) travelling expenses that the officer or employee was required by the contract of employment to incur,

(b) professional membership dues where the officer or employee was required by the contract of employment to maintain his professional status,

(c) office rent or salary to an assistant or substitute required by the contract of employment to be paid by the officer or employee,

(d) supplies consumed directly in the course of the employment for which the officer or employee was required by the contract of employment to pay, or

4. That the governor in council be authorized to make regulations under which the income tax of members of the armed forces on their service income will be paid in full in respect of the pay and allowances of each pay period by a deduction therefrom in accordance with a special table subject to the right of any member to file a return on an annual basis.

5. That the right to elect to pay the 15 per cent tax on its undistributed income now enjoyed by a private company

(a) be extended to all other corporations, and

(b) be withdrawn, effective April 10, 1951, from a corporation that is controlled by another corporation except in respect of its undistributed income on hand at the end of the 1949 taxation year.

[Mr. Abbott.]

6. That for the 1951 and subsequent taxation years the provision under which the 15 per cent tax rate on the first $10,000 of income of a corporation applies to only one of several related corporations be amended so as not to include in the class of related corporations those controlled by persons not dealing at arms length unless such persons own shares in the capital stock of both corporations.

7. That for the 1951 and subsequent taxation years, payments made for insulin, cortisone, adrenocorticotrophin (ACTH), liver extract injectible for pernicious anaemia and vitamin B12 for pernicious anaemia purchased under a physician's prescription may be included in the medical expenses for which a deduction from income may be made for the purpose of computing taxable income.

8. That special deductions from income to taxpayers whose principal business is the production, refining or marketing of petroleum or petroleum products or the exploring or drilling for oil or natural gas or mining or exploring for minerals, be allowed for expenses incurred in the 1954 operations on the same basis as for expenses incurred in the operations in the years 1951 to 1953.

9. That special deductions from income and taxes to taxpayers whose principal business is production, refining or marketing of petroleum or drilling for petroleum be allowed for expenses incurred in respect of deep-test oil wells in 1952 operations on the same basis as for similar expenses in 1950 and 1951 operations.

10. That the exemption of the income from a metalliferous or industrial mineral mine for the first three years of production now applicable to mines that came into production during the years 1946 to 1952 be extended to mines coming into production in the years 1953 and 1954.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps we could agree on the procedure to be followed. Is it the intention to call these clauses separately?

Mr. Abbott: I would not have the slightest objection, speaking for myself, to adopting the suggestion which was made the other night by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I think it was, namely that we should consider the various paragraphs of the income tax resolution, paragraph by paragraph, subject of course to the right of any hon. member of the committee who wishes to go back to one of the items in order to get information about the corporation tax, union dues or whatever it may be; and when that procedure has been completed, that we should adopt the resolution as a whole. It would, of course, be open at any time during that procedure for amendments to be moved to the resolution, if those amendments were otherwise in order.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the procedure outlined by the minister agreed to?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to raise one other point which might be disposed of now; it will not take half a minute. My understanding is that at the time of second reading of the income tax bill, it will be open to have a discussion of the references in the budget to changes in the depreciation provisions, and that we may discuss them then and on item No. 1 of the income tax bill.

Mr. Abbott: I think that would probably be the most convenient way of doing it. There is nothing in the income tax resolution dealing with it, but I agree that an opportunity should be afforded for discussing it. Probably it would be better to discuss it in committee where questions could be asked. It is open to any hon. member to make a speech about it on second reading; but perhaps on the title of the bill to amend the Income Tax Act we might agree that those who wish to discuss the new depreciation regulations, if there is no other appropriate section, should do so on section 1.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will there be provision in the income tax bill or elsewhere giving effect to this, or is it proposed to give effect to it purely by regulation?

Mr. Abbott: No. There is an appropriate section in the income tax bill, so that there will be ample opportunity to discuss it.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the procedure outlined by the minister agreed on?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'colck.

The Deputy Chairman: When business was interrupted at six o'clock we were considering the first clause in the resolution.

1. That in respect of income earned after the commencement of the 1951 calendar year, a corporation shall pay a defence surtax for the year equal to 20 per cent of that portion of its ordinary income tax for the year that is computed at the 38 per cent rate, or the 33 per cent rate if applicable (before allowance is made for tax credits) subject to a right to a refund of such tax to the extent that it would reduce the corporation's taxable income after payment of ordinary income tax to an amount less than 5 per cent of its capital employed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I have some questions to ask with regard to the first paragraph. First of all I would draw attention to the retroactive feature set out in the first line, where it uses the words, "in respect of income earned after the commencement of the 1951 calendar year." It is pointed out, and I think with some cogency, that that retroactive feature will work an inconvenience, and perhaps sometimes a hardship, on a company the fiscal year of which ended during these first months before the budget was presented, and which may have completed all its arrangements and may now be seriously embarrassed by finding out that it is subject to a tax about which it knew nothing when it brought its financial year to a close.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend knows, the higher tax will apply only to the months after January 1, 1951. I understand that, to that extent, there is a retroactive feature to the proposal which might cause some embarrassment. But in any case it was felt that in the circumstances the proposal was not unfair.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Well, I must say the minister is treating it lightly. I do not know what precedents there are for this procedure; but surely to face companies that have already made their disposition with a tax about which they knew nothing, is something which is not only unprecedented, or for which there is very little precedence, but which is also unfair. Actually, is the amount involved so great and the matter so important to the exchequer that it must inflict this hardship upon individual corporations which, after all, are being heavily taxed?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know how great the hardship may be, but I do not think it would be very great. There is plenty of precedent for it. In many years in the past increases in taxes have been made applicable to all companies whose fiscal periods ended after a certain date. In this case the increased tax will apply only to such portion of the fiscal period as accrues after January 1, 1951. Notice of this 20 per cent surcharge was given on April 10. I do not think the provision is inequitable.

Mrs. Fairclough: Is it intended that this tax shall be calculated and paid without regard to the right to refund? That is, does the company remit the tax and then later claim a refund on the amount it has paid in excess of the 5 per cent?

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member is correct. The tax, including the 20 per cent surcharge, is paid. Then the company must make application for a refund, and the income tax branch will have to satisfy itself, after examining the return, that in fact the payment of the surcharge would reduce the company's income below the 5 per cent mentioned in the resolution. They would get the refund for whatever amount was called for.

Mrs. Fairclough: Will that be handled by the income tax branch or will separate courts decide the amounts, or through whose hands will the transaction pass? I presume it will be necessary to make an examination of books?

Mr. Abbott: My information is that the Department of National Revenue contemplates that the application for refund would be filed with the return, and that the assessment would be made and the eligibility for the refund ascertained at the same time. Of course there would be the usual right of appeal if a taxpayer was not satisfied with the finding made by the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to raise a question as to the meaning of the expression, "capital employed", found in this section. Would the minister say a word on that? I have been looking at the relevant section.

Mr. Abbott: At the present time we are working on a definition that may be included in the bill itself as to what will constitute "capital employed", and I would prefer to defer discussing the terms of the definition until we have decided definitely whether or not this will be done. My hon. friend will recall that during the last war a definition was set out in connection with the excess profits tax. It may be that that definition, or something like it, will be settled upon in this instance. However, that has not yet been finally determined, and I would have to ask that the discussion be deferred until the matter is settled. It is a difficult and complicated question, and it is receiving the day-to-day attention of the offices of my department and those of the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It seems unfortunate that that which is so vital should not yet be determined. I was assuming—and it turns out that I was assuming wrongly—that one would refer to the definition existing in section 68 of the act which, as the minister says, refers to the excess profits tax. In face of what the minister says, we are now passing this section, if we do pass it, something after the fashion of having the play without Hamlet—because, after all, this is a very vital factor.

Mr. Abbott: At the present time we are only discussing the resolution. The broad principle is indicated there. When the bill is before the house we will have further opportunity for discussion.

My hon. friend will appreciate that this is a relieving measure, and that we are anxious to have a definition which will be fair and which will give the relief considered equitable. It is for that reason that my officials and those of the Department of National Revenue are examining the question closely in order that the definition used for "capital employed" will be one which will accomplish the purpose we have in mind.

Mr. Knowles: Does the tax referred to in the phrase "refund of such tax" refer to the whole of the corporation tax or just to the 20 per cent surcharge?

Mr. Abbott: Just to the 20 per cent surcharge. The refundable provision applies only to that. The rate which now exists, that of 38 per cent, will be paid. But in the case of the surtax, if there is a reduction to a point below the 5 per cent of the capital employed, as mentioned in the resolution, there will be an allowance to the extent it may be necessary to hold it to that level.

Mrs. Fairclough: Will the definition of "capital employed" be incorporated in the bill?

Mr. Abbott: Of that I am not quite sure. I should say frankly to the house that that is one of the most difficult problems we have to face in connection with this relieving measure. The bill as now drafted provides that the definition of "capital employed" shall be determined by regulation, which would have to be made public. My present view is that that would be desirable because I think we could examine carefully the actual results in connection with a wide range of companies and see what it is. I think I should say to the committee that I am particularly concerned with the type of public utility company whose rates are fixed by public authority. I am anxious that the imposition of an additional surcharge should not of itself necessitate an increase in rates.

That is one of the main reasons why I am anxious to see that a fair test be established. I want to be absolutely sure that the test is fair. In the bill as presently drawn provision is made for power to establish the definition by regulation. I think we had better discuss that aspect when we come to the second reading of the bill. It may be that my view will change on that before we come to second reading because, as I indicated this afternoon, I would hope to give hon. members a number of days, perhaps a week, to consider the provisions of the bill after it has been introduced.

Mrs. Fairclough: I would hope that this definition could be incorporated in the bill. While I recognize the difficulties with which the minister is faced, I would think that in view of the definitions that have appeared in other acts it surely would not be too difficult to frame a definition to cover the situation and give us some idea of what is proposed.

There are already two definitions, one in the Income Tax Act and the other in the Excess Profits Tax Act.

Mr. Abbott: For co-operatives, yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: It should not be too difficult a job to prepare a definition which could be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. Abbott: I hope it may be possible to do that, but I cannot give the assurance that it will be.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance will remember that on May 3 I suggested an alternative source from which he could obtain revenue, and as reported on page 2637 of Hansard I presented tables to the committee showing the net profits after taxes, made by, the dividends paid by, and the undistributed profits remaining in the hands of Canadian corporations. At that time I was told that the proper time to discuss that whole matter would be on the income tax resolution.

My suggestion was ruled out of order at that time, so at this time I should like to ask the minister one or two things about this whole question. I think the minister believes that the government should arrange its taxes so that they will be collected more or less on the basis of ability to pay. I think I am correct in that assumption. If I am correct, then I should like to know whether the minister honestly believes that the new taxes he is proposing in his budget will be collected strictly on the basis of ability to pay. I would ask him if it would not be sensible to go to the place where the money is in order to get increased revenues.

If his answer is in the affirmative then I should like to have him answer another question. Is it not true that he could easily obtain another $100 million from the undistributed profits of corporations? On May 3 I suggested that 1951 was not likely to be a worse year than 1950. I pointed out that in that year the net profits of corporations in Canada, after taxes, amounted to $1,402 million. The cash dividends distributed to Canadians and other individuals and corporations abroad amounted to $672 million. That left undistributed profits of $730 million. That was $129 million more than the undistributed profits in 1949, which was a good year. In that year the corporations paid quite substantial dividends of $570 million, which left in their possession undistributed profits of $601 million.

On May 3 I also pointed out that during the nine years from 1942 these corporations had accumulated undistributed profits to a total of $4,648 million. At that time I said that I was in favour of the profit motive because I believe that a reasonable profit perhaps is the greatest inducement for production, the provision of services and that sort of thing. But when I see individuals of this country being loaded with a 20 per cent income tax surcharge for defence needs; when I see them being faced with a 25 per cent increase in the sales tax; when I realize that they just have not in their possession accumulated savings from which to obtain these extra charges; when I realize that consumers of this country are having a terrible struggle to make ends meet under the impact of the highest cost of living in the history of this country; I wonder why it is there is so much indifference to the suggestion that the $100 million which the minister said he needs from the sales tax—I doubt it very much—could not be obtained by turning to the corporations and asking them during the next two or three years when profits might be expected to be buoyant that they pay, not a 20 per cent surcharge but a 40 per cent surcharge on their income tax.

I suggested on May 3 that by doing that he would obtain $100 million and yet would leave in their possession undistributed profits of not less than $500 million for 1951, which of course was calculated on the basis of 1950 performance. The minister's forecast pretty much substantiates what I said. I ask the minister if it would not be more fair to impose a 40 per cent surcharge this year on corporation profits, realizing that it would still leave them $500 million in undistributed profits, than to place this load on the taxpayers of this country in the form of an increased sales tax?

Mr. Abbott: The first question asked by my hon. friend was whether we should not go to where the money is. Of course we should, if we are aiming solely at revenue, which is one of the major purposes of the budget. Then he asks if that is the case why we should not go and take a full share of undistributed profits. In my budget speech I tried to make it as clear as I could why I think that as a general rule, and except in very exceptional circumstances, it is a mistake to attempt to take 50 per cent or more of profits from any organization. I think it makes for waste and inefficiency. In fact with this 20 per cent surcharge, if one includes the provincial tax of 5 per cent in the concurring provinces and 7 per cent in Quebec and Ontario, we are over that 50 per cent.

I think it should be realized that the undistributed profits of corporations are not in fact in cash. They are invested as a rule in plant, equipment, inventory and so on. Actually over the past four or five years in particular that has been one of the major sources of the increase in our productive resources, expansion of plant, equipment and so on. To answer my hon. friend's question directly, I believe that it would be most unfair to put a 40 per cent surcharge, as he has suggested, on corporation profits. After all, we have to remember that corporations are not individuals, and that those profits are taxed again when they ultimately get into the hands of the shareholders. In that sense it is double taxation and the corporation is only a vehicle for collecting taxes.

I think it should also be realized that under existing conditions taxes imposed on business concerns probably go into the price of the goods, and with demands as they are now I must say that my own view is that an excessively high corporation tax could provide an impetus to inflation. I do not know that I can add very much to that. One can argue indefinitely as to the merits and demerits of a particular tax, but the job a minister of finance always has is to try to spread the burden of the taxes which he has to impose as fairly as he can. That is what I have tried to do this year. At the same time I think he has to try to use taxes as a fiscal and economic weapon to check inflationary forces. That again is what I have endeavoured to do in this budget. As I have said before, I do not claim any monopoly on wisdom, but the budget this year does represent my best judgment as to how those two purposes can be accomplished, and it of course carried the judgment of my colleagues in the government.

Mr. Low: Could the minister obtain figures which would indicate the portion of undistributed profits that were turned back into plant investment and expansion, and at the same time the percentage of undistributed profits that have found their way into unproductive investment such as bonds and securities?

Mr. Abbott: I am told that there are probably no figures which would enable that to be given accurately. You would have to look at the balance sheets of the various business enterprises of the country. There is a real incentive under existing conditions to reinvest earnings in plant and equipment rather than keep them in low yield bonds. Speaking generally, I think it is fair to say that by far the greater proportion of the undistributed earnings of the business enterprises of this country have been reinvested in plant and equipment, bricks and mortar, machinery and so on. That has been demonstrated time and time again when you come to examine the record of a family business, for instance, over a period of years. You will find that it starts from small beginnings and it is largely built up by reinvested profits. I think that is probably pretty characteristic of the pattern in this country and in most other countries like ours.

Mr. Low: I think that is perfectly true in connection with family corporations, but it would be very interesting to look at the investment portfolios of many of the corporations. I attempted to go into that whole matter and to find some figures that would be accurate, but as the minister says it is difficult.

Mr. Abbott: I am told it is pretty well impossible to do it and do it accurately.

Mr. Low: But I have been wondering, since the minister has included in the budget some provision for restraining investment during this coming year, if he will not find that quite a number of corporations will take undistributed profits and invest in securities of some sort. If that is the case it would seem to me that he would be helping his purpose to a very great extent by taking this further tax that I have suggested.

Mr. Abbott: They will have less than 50 cents left out of every dollar of earnings to do what my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. Low: Of course, and I am thinking of farmers and individuals across the country who will have much less than 50 cents.

Mr. Knowles: Nothing at all.

Mr. Abbott: No. A man has to get into a fairly high income tax bracket even under existing rates before his marginal rate reaches 50 per cent. I do not know what my hon. friend's income is. I have not quite figured mine up yet but I hope I will not be quite at that point on my top dollar.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to have a few words to say on this point because the question of corporation profits is one of great interest to this group. It is obvious that we take a fundamentally different approach from the minister to this section of the Income Tax Act. The normal associations of this group are with working people and farmers, and it is quite reasonable to suppose that we would look at the question of taxation through somewhat different spectacles than the minister. I want to suggest that we in this group believe the minister suffers from certain budgetary astigmatisms which we trust some remarks on the part of the opposition will do something to correct. Before I proceed further, I might say that I am very interested to see that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is also interested in this question of the taxation of corporations.

In his replies to the hon. member for Peace River, the minister indicated what his reasons are for not agreeing with the suggestion that there be an increase in corporation taxes. He said that to take more than 50 per cent is unfair and that the balance was needed for reinvestment in industry, the maintenance and increasing of production, and so on. As I understood him, that was the general tenor of his remarks. When he introduced the budget the minister said, as reported at page 1808 of Hansard:

> The increases in corporation income taxes which I shall be proposing will drain off substantial amounts of corporate profits but the total volume of profits remaining in corporate hands will still be sufficient to maintain and, in some cases, to increase the capacity of corporations to plan additional capital investment without recourse to borrowed funds.

Mr. Gibson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: I hear the hon. member for Comox-Alberni saying "hear, hear" with relish. At page 1809 the minister went on to say:

> I shall not repeat what I said about the excess profits tax last September. I still believe that it is not a sound tax except under very special circumstances, and I do not believe we have reached that point. A part of what I said about the excess profits tax, namely, that it blunts the goad to efficiency and that it invites waste, applies also to high rates of corporation income tax. It is, of course, a question of degree. I say quite frankly, however, that I am not happy about corporation tax rates when they go over 50 per cent. I think it is bad psychology to permit people to say that more than half of any income earned, or any savings made, will go to the government.

I think it is bad psychology when it comes to the question of workmen but I do not think it is bad psychology in dealing with large corporation profits in the manner suggested by the hon. member for Peace River. In assessing the income tax situation we in this group believe that the minister would have been wiser, so far as the personal income tax is concerned, to exempt more of those in the lower income groups from the surtax in order to keep the cost of living down for them to that extent. We believe a graduated tax on excess profits also would have assisted in halting inflation and overcoming the shortage of certain goods caused by overinvestment in capital goods at this time. I think we can learn something from the experience of Great Britain in that respect. The minister has said that high taxation reduces output. It is generally recognized that through the years total taxation in Great Britain, both on individual incomes and on corporate incomes, has been much heavier than taxation in Canada.

Mr. Abbott: Not on corporate incomes.

Mr. Herridge: I am talking about the most recent and total taxes.

Mr. Abbott: Even with those.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to bring to the minister's attention the level of output per man in industry in 1949 as compared with 1938, which is taken as 100:

United Kingdom	118
Sweden	118
France	102
Italy	98
Denmark	97
Norway	94
Holland	81

I think this is evidence that the output per man in Great Britain under the circumstances, considering the war damage and the very difficult conditions they have experienced through the loss of a great deal of their overseas trade during the war and in the after-war period, has not been affected, nor has the total production been affected, by the high rates of taxation; because the total production is the greatest in Britain's history.

Mr. Abbott: It is away below our output per man.

Mr. Herridge: I am coming to that point later. Now what about commodity production per head of population? In 1949, in terms of dollars at 1938 prices, the figures were as follows:

Sweden	255
United Kingdom	226
Denmark	202
France	158
Belgium	155
Netherlands	145
Czechoslovakia	129
Germany	128
Iceland	122
Austria	105
Finland	103
Poland	101
Bulgaria	49

I remember the parliamentary assistant saying how much the Belgians had improved conditions in that country by working hard and endeavouring to rebuild its economy; yet on the basis of these figures it is far behind the increase in commodity production that has been attained in Great Britain. According to the United Nations economic survey of Europe the only country whose output per man has risen as much as Britain's is Sweden. Sweden was not in the war and did not have the task of converting industry to peacetime production. In 1946 Sweden's productivity already stood 11 points above 1938 whilst Britain's stood 3 points below. Since the war, therefore, the British worker has increased his output by 12 points compared with the Swedish worker's 7 points.

In that connection I want to make a point in reference to the remark by the minister about our total output per man and our total production. Since the war the British people have increased their output per man to a far greater extent than have the Canadians up to the present. Some time ago I believe a member on the government side suggested that the possibility of increasing the per capita production in Canada at this time was very slight indeed. In 1948 the output per worker in Britain was 8 per cent higher than in 1947; in 1949 it increased 5 per cent over the 1948 figure, and in the first quarter of 1950 it was approximately 10 per cent higher than the year before. Since total manpower had scarcely fluctuated, this suggests a further considerable advance in industrial productivity this year; and of course these remarkable achievements were carried out in the face of very high rates of taxation.

As a result of that increase in productivity under these heavy rates of taxation, what has been the situation with regard to the level of real income per head in Great Britain, taking the pre-war level as 100? The figures are as follows:

United Kingdom	118
Sweden	118
Norway	117
Denmark	106
France	101
Italy	92

As the minister knows, Great Britain has a higher rate of taxation than any of the other countries mentioned in that table. It is sometimes argued that a steep profits tax removes the incentive to the employer to increase production or expand his business. I believe the figures I have given will indicate that this is by no means the case, because since the end of the war taxes in Great Britain have constantly increased, and production has constantly increased as well. Profits are quite high enough even after taxation, even in Great Britain. Profits are not taxed until they are made. If the profit is not high, the tax is not high. Taxation is not a part of the cost of production. As far as Great Britain is concerned her productivity is limited to a great extent by the lesser amount of industrial power available per worker as compared to the United States, and by her difficulty in obtaining certain raw materials and access to natural resources.

In reply to the minister's suggestion that he does not like to take away more than 50 per cent of the profits of a company, and the need to leave at least 50 per cent of profits for capital expansion in Canada, I want to quote a few figures that have been mentioned from time to time in the Financial Post. These indicate the percentage increase in profits made by certain corporations in Canada as between the years 1949 and 1950; and I will give just a few illustrations:

	Percentage increase in profits, 1950 over 1949
Great Lakes Paper Company	55·0
Canadian Utilities Limited	13·8
Imperial Oil	21·3
Riverside Silk Mills Limited	56·4
International Paper Company	29·0
London Investment Corporation	24·2
Atlas Steels Limited	109·0
International Metal Industries Limited	54·0
Dominion Engineering Works	34·3
Modern Containers Limited	21·0
Dominion Fabrics Limited	13·0
Aluminum Limited	20·7
Famous Players	14·9
Monarch Mortgage and Investments	57·0
Canada Foils Limited	49·0
Wool Combing Corporation	260·0
Bathurst Power and Paper	54·0
Canadian Fairbanks Morse	16·4
Mining Corporation of Canada	50·0
United Service Corporation	44·0
Amalgamated Electric	143·0
McColl-Frontenac Oil	56·8
Lake St. John Power and Paper	65·0
St. Lawrence Corporation	59·8
New Brunswick Telephone Company	75·0
Quebec Power	43·0
British Columbia Telephone	71·3
Kelvinator of Canada	34·0
Robinson Cotton Mills	99·6

I see the minister's adviser laughing; I suppose he thinks this is an amusing debate so far as the taxpayers of Canada are concerned. I quoted the New Brunswick Telephone Company for the information of those from the maritimes; and when we see the profits of the cotton companies it is no wonder cotton prices are high. The net profits of all these corporations I have listed have increased tremendously between 1949 and 1950. We in this group believe there is an opportunity here to get the increased revenue we need as the hon. member for Peace River has said, instead of imposing the sales tax upon many of the things required by the working people of the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in further support of my contention I want to quote very briefly from a financial paper entitled "Canadian Finance". This is published in the interests of investment, banking, insurance, mining, trade and public affairs. This is the May issue for this year, and it is written for people who are interested in business. This article is entitled "Getting Tax-Free Surplus Secured; section 95A of Income Tax Act allows companies to distribute accumulation of profits painlessly". It reads as follows:

Fifteen per cent tax is not a very high price to pay for a substantial "melon" if you are running a small business, and quite a number of business proprietors have been using or are planning to use the facilities of last year's Income Tax Act amendments to get their accumulated surplus funds freed of future income tax liability at the minimum cost. While it is impossible to generalize about the effect of the new legislation there has been a great rush to investigate its merits and in many cases it appears that the capitalizing of surplus, thereby assuring a future personal tax-free income, outweighs the cost of getting the corporation's undistributed surplus into a form in which it can be either held or distributed without further liability.

Mr. Gibson: They have already paid tax on it.

Mr. Herridge: Just let me finish this article, you can gloat later.

The budget resolutions introduced at current session have extended the scope of the right to all companies except subsidiaries, thereby doing away with a use of legal fiction by which some public companies have converted themselves into private companies for the specific purpose of qualifying under the 1950 legislation. This change had already been requested by many competent taxation lawyers.

Specifically, part 1A of the Income Tax Act, passed by parliament on June 30, 1950, provides that a corporation which qualifies as a "private company" may elect to pay a special tax of fifteen per cent on undistributed income he[illegible]y it at the end of the 1949 taxation year, the [illegible]pitalize such undistributed income. With a few [illegible]ving refinements, this is a general principle. [illegible]uent years may each be treated separately a[illegible] has been cleared. The effect is to allow [illegible]wners of closely held companies to get ac[illegible]ed profits capitalized and therefore availab[illegible]later distribution into personal possession [illegible]g only a fifteen per cent tax. When it is [illegible] that the minimum personal income tax no[illegible]teen per cent on taxable income, and that it[illegible]lases the maximum rate payable may reach [illegible]la cent or more, the potential value of this n[illegible] can be visualized.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is obvi[illegible]t even this financial paper sees adva[illegible]n the present arrangements for the [illegible]ations concerned. We in this group fi[illegible]elieve there is a great opportunity for [illegible]nister to secure considerably greater r[illegible] from the corporations of this coun[illegible]thout damaging the operations of the [illegible]tions and without affecting seriously t[illegible]pan-sion, rather than increasing th[illegible]sonal income tax on some of the lo[illegible]ome groups with the twenty per cen[illegible]varge and the sales tax that has been un[illegible]ocus-sion. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, [illegible] to move that the resolution be am[illegible] deleting paragraph 1, and s[illegible] therefor the following:

(1) That, in respect of corporation inc[illegible] after the commencement of the 1951 cal[illegible], there be levied a graduated tax on exces[illegible] profits to the extent necessary to maintain the balance of ways and means.

We move that amendment, Mr. Chairman, to indicate our support for the principle of a graduated tax on excess profits rather than the taxation of lower income groups and the sales tax.

The Deputy Chairman: When the hon. member moved his amendment he indicated he was doing so for the purpose of showing his support of the principle of corporate taxes in this form. I believe he has also a clear understanding of the fact that previous amendments of the same character have been declared out of order. I shall ask the committee if it is prepared to give unanimous consent, and if so I shall be glad to put the motion to the committee.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, the only danger with these things is that they create a precedent. My hon. friend has made quite clear what he has in mind in moving the amendment. For reasons which I have already given several times, I would oppose it. I believe that any amendment of this kind to be effective would have to contain a definition of excess profits, and so on. I would oppose the amendment. If it is clearly understood on the records of the house that this is not a precedent for moving amendments of this kind, I do not want to get into a procedural tangle and waste our time in a procedural argument. I believe the amendment is out of order, and perhaps to be logical one should adhere to that position.

The Deputy Chairman: Are there any other hon. members who wish to speak to the point of order? Are the members giving their unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gibson: There is nothing before the committee, and there could not possibly be, which gives a definition of excess profits, without which no one would know what they were voting for.

The Deputy Chairman: I refer hon. members to two rulings which were made early last week and which appear in Hansard for May 3, 1951, at pages 2640 and 2655. The rulings then made, which were based on an earlier ruling of November 10, 1949, would apply to the amendment moved by the hon. member. The hon. member has nevertheless accomplished his purpose. So far as I am concerned, I have no alternative but to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Herridge: I bow to your ruling, Mr. [illegible]hairman, and I will try to draft a proper [illegible]mendment for second reading of the bill.

Mr. Hatfield: Will the minister say whether there is any advantage given to a corporation that reinvests its profits in plant and machinery?

Mr. Abbott: No, they are in the same position as anyone else. They can distribute them or reinvest them. That is a matter of business judgment.

Mr. Hatfield: Will the minister give the reasons for that? Why not make a corporation surcharge of sixty per cent, and then if the corporation reinvests in plant and equipment to give more labour to people, then allow the ten per cent or fifteen per cent.

Mr. Abbott: That is a special tax on distributed profits, and I do not see that is desirable at this time. The general level of tax which is established here is about as reasonable as one could expect.

Mr. Coldwell: Did the minister give any consideration to a graduated surtax so that smaller amounts of profit would have lower rates than the higher?

Mr. Abbott: In fact, that applies as my hon. friend knows in connection with smaller corporations—

Mr. Coldwell: I know it does with the smaller ones, but I was thinking of the larger ones.

Mr. Abbott: —but in my view, and I know it is shared by my financial advisers, a graduated tax in the case of profits of this kind is not sound. These are profits which are going to be taxed again. In essence, you have double taxation on these profits. The corporation is not a living individual. You tax it at a certain rate, and then when the profits are distributed you tax them according to ability to pay. You have a steeply progressive rate going from 15 per cent in the lowest brackets to as high as 80 per cent in the highest, leaving out of account the surtax. I am no tax theorist, but I am told that is a sound tax structure. Personally, I would feel that a general graduated tax of this kind on profits would be unsound.

Mr. Coldwell: What I had in mind was this. Where you have large profits and the corporation decides not to distribute those profits, if what the minister says is sound, namely that there is double taxation when you have the profits distributed, then it seems to me that there is a legitimate reason for suggesting something in the form either of a higher rate of taxation or of a graduated tax on the higher profits.

Mr. Abbott: Just in order that I may get it clear, what my hon. friend is advocating is really a tax on undistributed profits.

Mr. Coldwell: I was just going to say that it is in reality a tax on undistributed profits. In my opinion that is preferable to taxing by way of surtax the incomes of those who are finding it difficult to make ends meet. That is why, in the main budget debate, we moved an amendment suggesting that the exemptions—for the surtax only, of course—be $1,500 and $3,000 instead of $1,000 and $2,000. We had that end in view. With the tremendously high cost of living—and I am sure the minister must realize this—people in the smaller income brackets, as well as those who have incomes insufficient to be liable to income taxes at all, are feeling the pinch of high prices and inflation severely at the present time. What we are suggesting is that the minister might endeavour to find a way of getting the money, as the hon. member for Peace River says, where that money can be found rather than try to squeeze it out of many people who really have not any surplus at all; and who, if they were living at an adequate level of life, would indeed have a deficit every year instead of a surplus to tax. That is the point I am trying to make.

Mr. Abbott: There are two points of view as to what should be done with regard to corporation profits. I know that my hon. friend has a great admiration for the present government in England.

Mr. Coldwell: They tax undistributed profits.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Gaitskell, the chancellor of the exchequer, is proposing a 50 per cent tax on distributed profits and 10 per cent on undistributed profits; that is just the opposite of what my friend the leader of the C.C.F. party is advocating. So far as one can judge, that was done to discourage the distribution of profits; and he wishes to encourage the retaining of profits presumably because he considers that the retaining of profits is anti-inflationary. I can only judge by what he has done. But I tell my hon. friend that the present British system of taxing profits of this kind is exactly the reverse of what he is advocating.

Mr. Wright: I should like to bring one point to the attention of the minister in connection with this matter. Great Britain and Canada are in two entirely different positions. Great Britain found herself, when she came through the war, in the position that her industries were not properly adjusted to the production of goods as related to our production in Canada. Her industries were destroyed. Her methods were old. Mr. Gaitskell, through his budget—as indicated by the minister—is trying to get the industries in Great Britain modernized. That is why he is not taxing more heavily undistributed profits; it is so that it will be possible to modernize their equipment. We are in a better position here—

Mr. Abbott: We can always do with increased efficiency.

Mr. Wright: —in a country like Canada where things are already modernized.

Mr. Gibson: I do not know what is going on down at the other end of the chamber; I do not know whether the Socialists are going Social Credit or whether the Social Crediters are going Socialist.

Mr. MacInnis: You would not know.

Mr. Gibson: I think either thing would be bad. I have been rather surprised to hear the remarks made by my good friend the leader of the Social Credit party. He is a businessman. I think he knows what surpluses, as shown on company balance sheets, are. I think he knows it is not just money that is laid under a stump some place. It is not in the form of cash, as the minister has so clearly pointed out. It has all been reinvested in the business in most cases. Not many companies keep a great deal of cash hanging around. They usually have to borrow against securities in the bank to carry on their business. A surplus in these small companies is certainly the lifeblood of them, and the reinvesting of part of it into the business, putting it back into increased plant. If, in the first year they start to produce anything, the minister takes half of it to start with—and if there are any profits at all, they are invested in the company—the minister has a preponderant interest in it. Rather than tax surplus itself, I think maybe the profits that are not distributed should be taxed at a lower rate than distributed profits, and when they are taken out of surplus again, perhaps the tax could be larger than 15 per cent; but the minister has already covered that.

Mr. Coldwell: What happens under that sort of arrangement is this. Profits are left in the hands of companies who reinvest them in capital equipment and otherwise. In reality, you are taking from the public funds by means of profits and reinvesting them. In other words, the public are thus paying for the capital equipment; but the company owns the equipment and assets afterwards.

What I really rose to say to my hon. friend is this. There is one aspect of this problem that I think we are overlooking—it is one perhaps that concerns the present economic system rather more than it would a different system—and it is this. By means of this method, corporations are becoming independent of the savings of the great mass of the public, of the banks, of trust companies and of other financial institutions, with the result that power in our economy is becoming concentrated more and more in the hands of a group of industrialists. What we are really witnessing to some extent is a transfer of power from financial institutions and investors who did a normal business and performed a normal function in our economy years ago, and a concentration of that power into the hands of another group in our society. At the same time, they are preventing what was quite common prior to this important change, namely the small investor finding a place where he can invest his savings and his funds. He is narrowed down more and more merely to government bonds and other types of low-interest securities.

Mr. Gibson: He can go to the stock market.

Mr. Coldwell: My hon. friend says "Go to the stock market." He knows that the stock market is much more speculative than is the reinvestment of funds in the company which is controlled by directors who have at their disposal all the information that is necessary to decide whether the investment is likely to be worth while or not. The average man has to take a chance with the stock market. I am pointing that out because I think in the present development of our economy it is something that needs to be considered. It does not matter what your point of view is politically; there, I think, is a new and important factor; and is one of the reasons why I suggest that a tax on undistributed profits would be a good tax in this new country with a developing industrial economy.

Mr. Hosking: I feel that there is one point that the socialists have overlooked in this discussion, namely that the most important thing in the Dominion of Canada is full employment. Wages are only relative. It does not much matter whether a man earns $10 a day or $5 a day as long as the things that he buys are relative to his earnings. The minister's taxation policy on corporations is one means of creating full employment. Canada is growing, and we must have capital for our industries, if they are to grow too. This is one means of placing capital at the disposal of industries in a reasonable manner, thus creating employment. Anyone who is opposed to increasing industries is opposed to the creation of jobs for the people who live in Canada. Since our population is increasing it becomes more imperative than ever that we have more and more industries. I suggest therefore that any legislation such as this, which tends to create more jobs and to give more work to labourers and which tends to bring about the good times we are now enjoying, is sound legislation.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to speak on this complex question, because there are so many different views which could be expressed—and I have not the benefit of experts to advise me. However, after observing over some years the result of policies put into effect on the advice of experts, I have come to the conclusion that the experts can be wrong, too. If we have been following the advice of experts, and if they are not wrong, then I wonder how we have got into the mess we are in now.

Some hon. members seem to have strange views on the methods of increasing taxes, or of raising revenue. Several times each day I listen to newscasts—indeed, that is about the only radio program in which I am interested. I have noticed that, for the last while, every time I turn on the radio an appeal is made to the young men of Canada, most of whom have no property at all, to help save our free way of life. And, Mr. Chairman, if one may judge from what is happening in Korea today, saving our way of life may involve something more than paying some of our surplus money in taxes. It may, and sometimes does, involve the supreme sacrifice of life itself.

It seems to me that if we are to ask people to pay taxes, particularly if taxes are of such proportion as to involve a sacrifice, they should be told the purpose of the sacrifice. For most people paying taxes is a sacrifice, because they do not understand the purpose for which they are paying the taxes. Indeed, we have never told our people clearly why we must tax heavily. The result is that people complain that they are not going to work just in order that Doug Abbott may have a little more money. I do not take that position, because I know it is not the correct one to take. It is not Doug Abbott who gets the money; he is just the collector. The money is for Canada, and for all its people.

The criterion as to whether our taxes are heavy or light is not how much we pay but how much we have left after the taxes are paid.

When one considers the corporations that have 50 per cent of their not inconsiderable profits left, and compares them with the ordinary citizens of Canada who have not only nothing left when they have paid their year's bills, but have not had enough income in the first place to give them a decent standard of living, one realizes at once who is making the sacrifice. We know then where we should seek the money. We should look for it where it is, and we should not be taking it from people who did not have it in the first place.

[Mr. Hosking.]

Let us not forget that, as applied to a large proportion of the people in Canada, every cent we take from them in sales tax or other taxes, direct or indirect has to be restored to them through social services of one kind or another. That is the case because they are not paid a sufficient amount for producing the wealth of this country to enable them to live decently.

Mr. Abbott: You have to pay for the defence of the country, too.

Mr. MacInnis: Yes, we have to pay for the defence of the country. But in paying for defence consideration must be given to what one has to defend; and I say the corporations of Canada have much more to defend than have the ordinary men on the street who today may have jobs and who tomorrow are out of jobs.

Let us look at this picture as it is, and not try to talk about it from preconceived ideas that do not at all meet the situation we are dealing with today.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word on this matter. There have been times in the house when a matter of this kind has been discussed with a good deal of seriousness. Lately however it has not been. The reason is that when anyone rises to criticize the government he feels, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Lake Centre, like the little boy who has spit in the cathedral.

Mr. Abbott: Do you feel like that?

Mr. Gillis: The subject is almost sacred; one must not talk about it. "We have decided —and there are an awful lot of us." The opposition are hesitant, because those are the people who handle the payrolls and who give out the jobs. They are all-important.

That kind of thinking is out of date. Even in his day, Abraham Lincoln said, in respect of the question of capital versus labour, that labour created capital and wealth, and that labour came first, and that if it were not for labour there would be no capital. If I sit back and live off the sweat of another man's brow, I am not the emancipator: the reverse is true. If it were not for the fact that there are thousands of men and women in Canada who are content with their humble role of producing the country's wealth for very little in return, a great many exalted persons who are making large sums of money would be starving, because they could not produce enough for themselves.

I do not say that disparagingly, because we recognize this as the scheme of things. What prompted me to rise at this time was the remark of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, a very good friend of mine, and an old logger who went through the mill.

Mr. Gibson: Broken down.

Mr. Gillis: But finally his background has got away from him. He has gravitated down here and mixes among the exalted, so that he is beginning to forget where he came from.

Mr. Gibson: I sit in opposition, too.

Mr. Gillis: He said the hon. member for Kootenay West in moving his amendment had not defined what excess profits were. I would point out that that has been defined many times in the house. The government itself set the formula in 1940, 1941 and 1942 when it said, "If you were in business between 1936 and 1939 your normal profits will be struck in relation to those three years, and we will perhaps give you fifteen or twenty per cent more than that." Excess profits were considered at that time, and the provision worked out satisfactorily.

The fact of the matter is that most of the plant and equipment in Canada today was financed by the taxpayer and written off at accelerated depreciation. We do not own those goods; we gave it away; for three years we wrote it off. That is a very easy way of getting into business.

There would be no difficulty today in setting up an excess profits tax. The government could say, "We are going to go back to 1947, and make that your normal profit." There has been a skyrocketing of profits since 1947, as indicated by the table put on the record by the hon. member for Kootenay West. Do you want to allow him a little more on top of what he is getting today?

I think the hon. member for Vancouver East dealt with this quite properly. We are asking men to give up everything they have in this country to fight for us. Do not make any mistake about it, it is not the executives and the fellows who make the payrolls who are going to do the fighting in Korea or anywhere else. This fighting will be done by the man who works in the shop or the factory, the young fellow who is physically fit and who is making perhaps $2,000 per year. He is the one who is going to do the fighting; he is the one who has always done the fighting.

You are asking these fellows to put on uniforms to save the institutions of this country for as little as $2.35 per day, when they are swapping at least $10 or $12 per day in other occupations. He is asked in the final analysis to perhaps risk his life for $2.35 per day. In the face of the profits made today by large corporations across this country how can anyone justify asking these young men to do that kind of job unless he is prepared to make similar sacrifices?

In my opinion inflation is the greatest enemy we have. It constitutes the most serious defence matter we have to consider. We are spending $5,000 million in the next three years, and on the basis of present prices we are going to get only half value; we are going to lose in purchasing power about 50 per cent of the money we will spend on defence. The Minister of Finance has said that we must pay for defence. Certainly we must, but who is getting that extra money because of inflation? It is no one else but the fellow who is marking that ledger and skyrocketing profits. There is no doubt about it, he is price fixing. He sets his own prices. He calls the shots. All this leads to waste and extravagance and that kind of thing.

If that analysis is correct, it adds up to simple dishonesty. I have never seen it that way. I think of the progress we have made in pensions and all that kind of thing in the last ten years and I suggest that it is all due to the fact that these corporations decided they might as well pay out profits in that way rather than in excess profits taxes. If we had good stiff excess profits taxes I think they would go a long way toward stopping rising prices. There would be no incentive to raise prices if you could not keep your profits.

I think this matter will have to be considered seriously. We are only just beginning to siphon off manpower and buy our defence equipment. I think that is one particular spot the government should get tough with. I think the time has come when we should all consider it most seriously. The fellow who makes the payroll should not think he is all-important. I consider that the fellow who produces the payroll is the important man. Without him there would be no payroll. The fellow who is just writing figures and making a good profit out of them should consider himself very lucky in comparison with the man who produces the wealth.

I know we cannot do anything about these matters. As I said a moment ago, we are just bumping our heads against a stone wall. But it does not do any harm to have a re-examination of conscience every once in a while in the hope that we might be able to drive home to the Minister of Finance and his advisers that this is one matter they will have to tackle, if for no other reason that for defence and the encouragement of those whom we are asking to leave home and go to other parts of the world to make great sacrifices for us.

I should like to say a word to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni about the right to a profit on your investment. Sometime he should go to the library and get the Macdonald report on the British Columbia mining industry. He will see where these rights were given away for the building of a railroad and then capitalized at about $10 million. They got these rights for nothing, they marked up the price of coal in order to pay dividends on watered stock of about $11 million, and around and around it went just like a merry-go-round. That report offers a pretty good analysis of practically every corporation in this country. When you squeeze all the water out of their stock they will not find it hard to pay profits on the actual capital invested.

I hope this discussion will be taken seriously by the minister and he will come into the house shortly and say that his conscience has bothered him a little and he believes this is necessary.

The Deputy Chairman: May I say that in my view the discussion could be more closely related to section 1. Certain statements were made, then the minister gave some explanations, but from there on the committee has got into an academic discussion covering the whole field of economics within and outside Canada. If the discussion does not terminate shortly by the clause carrying I feel that, for the benefit of hon. members who are not participating in the discussion, I shall have to intervene and indicate that the discussion must be relevant to the item before the committee.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that we all agree with your observations and will want to abide by your ruling in respect to these matters. However, corporation taxes are somewhat involved. Speakers who have preceded me have attempted to draw a comparison between the justice of taxing the wage earner and those who produce the wealth and permitting corporations to pile up certain profits without similar taxation.

I should like to say a word to those who have preceded me. I think perhaps we are pursuing a wrong tack. Those who have spoken in this debate have spoken rather powerfully, but the minister has sat there without saying a word. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar referred to certain financial policies followed in Great Britain and the minister twigged a slight error that was not of great consequence and rose momentarily to point it out. However, he did not answer the argument. The hon. member who leads this group spoke rather powerfully, as did the hon. member for Vancouver East, and we have just listened to a plea for justice by the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

[Mr. Gillis.]

May I say to these gentlemen that I think the tack we should follow in our pleading with the minister is to say to the minister: Mr. Minister, do you agree with that? Is the soldier in Korea paid so much today and does he have to pay taxes? Do you agree with that? Is that right? If the minister says it is right then it will go right into Hansard. We should follow the same course right through because I can see that all the pleadings we may make with the very passions that flow from the innermost parts of our souls are not going to change the minister's mind. The hon. member for Cape Breton South hopes that the minister's conscience may prick him so that he will return later and reverse his policy. My, my, what a hope! Finance ministers come and finance ministers go, but the financial policy remains the same. Therefore I think, gentlemen, that we will have to go into a huddle and change our tactics to see if we cannot prick the minister's conscience enough for him to say right now: You have got me there, boys. I cannot keep back the tears. I must change this policy right away.

Mr. Fair: May I ask the minister whether any further consideration has been given to relieving the active service forces from having to pay income tax while they are on active service?

Mr. Abbott: I intend to deal with that at some length when we come to the section dealing with amendments to the income tax relating to the armed forces.

Mr. Bater: Mr. Chairman, most of the talking seems to be taking place on this opposition side of the house tonight, and I think I may as well get in a word or two for half a minute.

An hon. Member: You had better be careful.

Mr. Bater: One of the hon. members on my left stated that the public is paying, so far as these corporations are concerned. I should like to tell him that, so far as the government of Great Britain to which he referred is concerned, I think the people of Great Britain are paying. If I had known this discussion was coming up tonight I would have brought with me a letter that I received from a relative in Great Britain about three weeks ago, and I would have read it on this occasion. Another hon. member mentioned the mess we find ourselves in. I think there are many people in other countries of the world, which have a different system from our own, who are also finding themselves in a mess. While the socialists' idea is that they will get social security and economic freedom through a system different from ours, I think they will find that in the final analysis they will end up with no social security or economic freedom. I contend these are things that we should keep in mind when we are discussing this issue tonight.

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to take a minute or two to say something in this debate. I had not intended to, but after hearing the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Kootenay West I thought I should make my own position clear. In this party we can differ now and then, and I regret that I must say that I do differ tonight with some of the views that have been expressed by members of my own party. The corporation tax level in Canada and in my own province of Saskatchewan is now 51 per cent. I have a small business, and perhaps I am biased because of that. Nevertheless when I pay that 51 per cent I pay it in hard cash and the minister leaves me my stock in trade and bad debts, many of which may or may not be collected. I think that he is taking a lot more than 51 per cent from me at the present tax levels.

I also believe that when he stated that in England only 10 per cent of undistributed profits are taxed he had a very strong point. I could be all wrong but it seems to me that, so far as taxes on corporations in Canada are concerned, we have almost reached the saturation point in peacetime. If war comes of course a further excess profits tax may possibly be imposed; but at the present time, and speaking from my own experience, I do not think that taxes can go very much higher. I say that to make my own position clear. If more revenue is needed then I think it is going to have to come from greater production, perhaps from more people in the country or something of that kind. Perhaps we are even going to have to borrow if we need more money for defence. As I say, I could be all wrong but I do not think my colleagues will object to my making my position clear.

Mr. Coldwell: One of the great strengths of democratic organizations is of course that there can be differences of opinion expressed freely and openly.

An hon. Member: Hang on to the good ones.

Mr. Coldwell: I certainly do not deplore that sort of thing. I want to say, however, that I think my hon. friend is mistaken in one particular at least. This is not peacetime. What we are suggesting is a policy that in reality is a wartime policy. It is true that we are not engaged in the kind of war in which we were involved from 1939 to 1945, but we are spending as much money this year as we did in the early part of that great struggle. To that extent, while it is a defence effort, it is analogous in expenditure to a war effort. I am also going to say that I suggested when I rose a little earlier that we should have a graduated tax on corporations, as we have on individuals. The Minister of Finance pointed out that there was a certain exemption now for the smaller corporations. That is true, and I think that can be adequately defended, but what we are pointing out in our remarks tonight is that here we see these vast accumulations of money. It is all very well for my hon. friend to say that it is not in liquid form and therefore no part of it could be paid in taxes, but that is not wholly true. A great deal of it is in liquid form. It comes into their hands in liquid form. It can remain in liquid form, and it can be liquidated by the Minister of Finance.

I believe that we are expressing a point of view that is sound, just and fair. The hon. member for Cape Breton South pointed out very accurately and forcefully that we are asking thousands of young Canadians to offer to surrender not their profits but their lives, and when they do not surrender their lives, they risk their futures, for the defence of the democratic way of life which, regardless of our political views, we all profess and wish to defend. I do not want to transgress the rules, Mr. Chairman, but I want to say that I believe we are speaking, not only for our party but for a large number of people who are not of our party, when I say that instead of taxing the less fortunate individual, who is finding it very difficult indeed to get even the necessaries of life, we should call upon those who have accumulated vast amounts of wealth and of power to surrender, in this time of preparation for defence and high expenditures, some of that wealth and thereby relieve the people of this country from the great burdens that they have to carry.

Mr. Abbott: I do not want to hold up this clause, nor do I want to prolong this discussion on corporation profits; but I do not know whether it is generally realized that under this proposal the majority of Canadian corporations will pay a higher tax than they paid during the last war. Companies whose earnings did not exceed the average for 1936 to 1939 only paid 40 per cent of their profits during the last war; and that represented by far the greater number of corporations, both large and small. And at that time there were no provincial corporation taxes, because under the wartime tax agreement they were suspended.

Mr. Coldwell: But there was an excess profits tax.

Mr. Abbott: I do not know whether the public or the members of this house generally realize that the great majority of Canadian corporations will pay a higher proportion of their earnings in corporation taxes today than they did during the last war. I just wanted to make that point. I make it without argument, as an assertion of what I know to be the fact.

Mr. Coldwell: But in addition to the corporation tax during the last war a very substantial excess profits tax was imposed.

Mr. Abbott: Only if the profits exceeded their standard; that is my point. The minority of corporations, which had war contracts, paid an excess profits tax; but the great majority of corporations, the average corporations, paid 40 per cent and no more.

Paragraph agreed to.

2. That an individual shall pay a defence surtax equal to

(a) for the 1951 taxation year, 10 per cent and

(b) for each subsequent taxation year, 20 per cent of his ordinary income tax (including investment surtax) for the year before allowance is made for tax credits.

Mr. Knowles: I rise to protest against the application of this 20 per cent surtax to individuals at the low level to which it is made to apply. We have already expressed our opposition in the form of a subamendment during the main budget debate, but I repeat that we feel it is most unfair that married couples with less than $3,000 of income should be called upon to pay this 20 per cent surtax.

We all recognize the need to increase the income tax rates if additional revenue must be found. Indeed, when we were discussing the resolution having to do with commodity taxes we objected to taxes of that kind on the ground that they are not based on ability to pay. We argued that the fairer tax to employ is the income tax, because it is based on ability to pay. Therefore we assert that when larger revenues are required the proper kind of taxes to employ include a graduated corporation tax and a graduated personal income tax.

We contend, however, that you destroy the whole principle of graduating those taxes, and you defeat the aim of basing them on ability to pay, when you apply this 20 per cent increase right across the board starting with the very first dollar of income tax a person has to pay. At the present time the exemption levels are $1,000 in the case of a single person and $2,000 in the case of a married person. This means that a married couple without children, with an income of $3,000, have an exemption of $2,000 and pay income tax on $1,000. The amount of tax paid under the old rates was $150. This surtax will require that couple to pay an additional tax of $30. I point out that back in the period 1935 to 1939, when the dominion bureau of statistics worked out the cost of living index to which we make frequent reference, the income tax exemption level under the federal act was $2,000, just the same as it is now. In addition to that the allowance for a dependent child was $400 as opposed to $150 at present.

Mr. Abbott: It is $400 now if they are not in receipt of family allowance.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, but the child eligible for family allowance is computed at $150.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct. There was no family allowance then, of course.

Mr. Knowles: That is right.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend knows that this same couple paid $584 during the war?

Mr. Knowles: Oh, yes; but the minister cannot have it both ways. He cannot argue that we have not approached wartime conditions when he is talking about the corporation tax, and suggest that we make a comparison with wartime conditions when we are talking about the personal income tax.

Mr. Abbott: I have hit most of the corporations harder than we did during the war.

Mr. Knowles: You forgot to mention the wartime excess profits tax. But are we back on paragraph 1, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Abbott: Well, you raised the point.

The Deputy Chairman: We are on paragraph 2 and hon. members will please speak to paragraph 2.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. That is what the hon. member is trying to do. I was endeavouring to point out that during the years 1935 to 1939 when the cost of living index was worked out at 100, it was on the basis that the actual expenditure incurred by certain so-called average families amounted to $1,453 a year. When we talk of today's cost of living index being 181·8, it means that it costs 181·8 per cent of that $1,453 for that same basket of goods and services. Now I point out that when the recognized basket of goods and services cost $1,453 a year the income tax exemption for a married couple was $2,000. Today that same basket of goods and services costs well over $2,600, yet the income tax exemption level is still the same figure of $2,000.

If it were peacetime, today's high cost of living would make our case unanswerable that the exemption level for a married couple should be raised to $3,000 with comparable increases for children. I insist on that; if it were not for the wartime or semi-wartime conditions facing us, today's cost of living would make it essential that there be no income tax below the $3,000 level. In view of the situation we are in and the need for additional revenues, I suggest the least the minister should do is exempt those people with incomes between $2,000 and $3,000 from this surtax. The same argument applies with respect to single persons. Their exemption at the moment is $1,000. I should say that certainly the first $500 of their taxable income —the amount from $1,000 to $1,500—should not be subject to this 20 per cent surtax.

It would be very easy to work that out in the form of an amendment if there were any possibility of persuading Your Honour that an amendment would be in order. I recognize all the rulings that were made during the other debate, however, and I will not put Your Honour to the trouble of looking up the book to find ways in which to rule out of order any amendment I might make, but I will suggest the kind of amendments which it seems to me would be appropriate. Perhaps if I suggest them to the minister and leave him the privilege, he may move one himself. On the one hand it could be proposed that there be an amendment to paragraph 2 adding a phrase similar in spirit to the last part of paragraph 1. We remember that paragraph 1 had a qualifying clause to the effect that the surtax was not to reduce the income of a corporation below a certain point. I should like to suggest to the Minister of Finance, since he could move the amendment although I could not because it would be a money amendment, to add to clause 2 an amendment which would suggest that these taxes are subject to the right of refund where they reduce the net income of the taxpayer to a point below that necessary to maintain a decent standard of living at today's prices. Is that not just as fair a request as was contained in the qualifying clause with respect to paragraph 1? The minister wants to get additional revenue out of corporations. He wants to get all that he can but he wants to be fair. He must not go too low, so he puts in a qualifying phrase. The minister wants to get all the money he can out of the personal income tax. Why should he not be fair to the single person in the $1,000 to $1,500 bracket, and to married couples between $2,000 and $3,000, and add a qualifying phrase such as the one I have suggested based on the kind of qualifying phrase he put in paragraph 1?

If that sort of amendment seems rather hard for the minister to word in such a way as to define the amount necessary to maintain a decent standard of living, then he could do it very simply by means of another amendment which I would offer to him. It would read something like this: That this surtax set out in paragraph 2 shall not apply to the first $150 of tax paid by a married couple or to the first $75 of tax paid by a single person. That is a simple way to do it, and it achieves the proposal that we made in our subamendment during the course of the budget debate. The figure of $150 is the amount of tax paid under the present rate by a married couple on their first $1,000, that is the $1,000 between the figures of $2,000 and $3,000. I suggest that bracket should not be subject to surtax. In other words, the first $150 of tax paid by a married couple should not be subject to this 20 per cent. Similarly, in the case of a single person the first $75 paid is, to use the same kind of example, the tax he pays on the amount between $1,000 and $1,500; in other words, the first $500 of taxable income. There, too, I suggest that the surtax should not be paid.

I recognize, Mr. Chairman, that this proposal was made in our budget subamendment, but it was not discussed to any great extent during the course of the budget debate. I do not recall the minister replying to it. I feel that he should now deal with this matter, and indicate whether or not it is possible to give consideration to this suggestion. He brought down his budget on April 10, and at that time we had before us a cost of living index figure which was the highest in history. Another month end has gone by and that highest figure in history has gone still higher. I point out that this simply means that single persons with less than $1,500 income and married persons with less than $3,000 a year income are finding it still harder to make both ends meet. I believe it is a most reasonable request, namely, that the people in those brackets should not be subject to this defence surtax.

I wish to make it clear that I am not opposing the main part of paragraph 2. When we were discussing the sales tax we said that the income tax was a fairer method. Now that we are on the income tax, I support it. If it is necessary to make up for any loss of revenue because of my proposal that these lower income groups be not subject to the surtax, that could be made up in either one of two ways: either by increasing the percentage in the higher brackets or by going back to paragraph 1 and increasing the rates in the upper brackets of corporation income tax. Like the member for Macleod, Mr. Chairman, I hope that when we are making these proposals we are not just pouring out our hearts and making an impassioned plea which the minister is going to ignore. I am sure he will not. I am sure he will discuss this matter, and that he will find there is a pretty general feeling amongst members in all parties that it is unfair to impose this surtax at the low levels which this paragraph proposes it should apply.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to comply with my hon. friend's request and deal with his suggestion. There are two elements in connection with the imposition of any personal income tax; one is the level of exemptions and the other is the rate at which the tax is imposed. As is well known to all members of the house, our exemptions are very much higher than the exemptions in the United Kingdom, and higher than the exemptions in the United States. The tax that is imposed, even with the surtax which is now suggested, on the people in the group to which my hon. friend has referred, the $3,000 group and below, is infinitely less than the tax which is imposed in the United Kingdom, and very much less than the tax that is imposed in the United States. I take these two countries as being countries whose responsibilities for defence and other things are, to some extent, comparable with our own.

Now, it is perhaps unnecessary for me to say that in formulating my tax proposals I gave most earnest consideration as to what should be done with respect to exemptions and what should be done with respect to the rates. I came to the conclusion, as I said in my budget speech, that for this year I did not propose to touch the exemptions, and I did not propose to touch the graduated rate schedule. But I did propose to put a twenty per cent surtax on the amount of the tax payable. Now, that represented the best judgment I could come to as the fairest way of spreading this burden, after a great deal of consideration and a good deal of discussion with my advisers. My colleagues agreed with my recommendations. It would be pleasant if we could get all the money we needed from people with incomes of $5,000, $6,000 or $7,000 per year or more, but there are not enough of them in the country to provide us with all the revenue. I suggest to the committee that since our exemptions are already higher than those two countries I mentioned, since the actual tax which is imposed even after the increase which I am suggesting is still substantially lower than the countries to which I have referred, it is rather difficult to suggest that this is a manifestly unfair tax schedule.

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like to ask the minister what the intent is under clause 2 (b) with respect to the imposition of the surtax. Does this mean that the surtax will be calculated on what is described in the income tax form as net tax payable, or is it to be imposed before the allowance for the ten per cent dividends from taxable Canadian companies which is deducted from the tax? In other words, is it to be imposed on what is described in the income tax form as the total tax or is it to be imposed on what is described as the net tax?

Mr. Abbott: The surcharge will be imposed on the tax as calculated before any tax credits are taken. Of course, in arriving at the income taxable one will deduct charitable donations, medical expenses and the like. Then a calculation will be made of the amount of tax. We have all been doing that for some time. The surcharge will apply to that figure. Then, when the tax payable is arrived at these credits will be taken for foreign taxes payable and so on.

Mrs. Fairclough: On the tax form the ten per cent of net dividends from taxable Canadian corporations is not described as a credit. What is described as a credit is a credit for foreign tax. The 10 per cent, as I understand it, was allowed to correct a practice which had been common in the department in former years which amounted to double taxation. By the allowance of this 10 per cent deduction it was felt that this practice had been at least partially overcome. If it is the intention of the minister to revert to the former practice and permit this 20 per cent surcharge on the tax before allowance for dividends, then in effect what you are doing is going back to the former system and permitting at least some of this taxation in a double capacity. Twenty per cent of it, of course, would be double taxation.

Mr. Abbott: It is merely a simple way of calculation. Instead of changing the rate structure, we make a 20 per cent increase. It is merely a method of calculating your tax. There is no double taxation involved. I think my hon. friend is mistaken there.

Mrs. Fairclough: No. The only mistake I made is in not making myself clear, I am sure. I am thinking in particular of those people who have a small income almost entirely from dividends, from their savings. A great many of them were released from the obligation of paying taxes by reason of this allowance of 10 per cent against their taxes. Under this scheme, if it was a matter of $2,000, it means a difference of $40 tax to them, if the surtax is going to be imposed before the credit is allowed for the 10 per cent off Canadian dividends.

Mr. Low: I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has a great deal of merit.

An hon. Member: It is quite simple, too.

Mr. Low: Yes, it is quite simple. But I also think that the technique suggested by my colleague the hon. member for Macleod is a good one. In view of the fact that the Canadian dollar today is worth only about 55 cents in terms of the 1935-39 dollar, and consequently the $2,000 exemption for married people under the Income Tax Act would be worth only about $1,100, I am going to ask the minister if he does not think that the suggestion made by my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is sound. Does the minister not think that the individual taxpayer throughout this country ought to be given some consideration in virtue of the fact that his exemption today is not $2,000 but is actually $1,100? I am speaking of the married exemption. I should like to have an answer.

Mr. Abbott: I will answer my hon. friend's question in the negative. Since the $2,000 exemption before the war, we have fought a war and we have increased our debt some two or three times. We have all the additional charges imposed on Canadians as a result of the war. We have had a $400 million or $500 million addition to our social security payments. We must therefore raise more money from the taxpayers of this country.

As I said in reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, there are two elements to be considered in determining taxation. One is the rate of exemption and the other is the rate of the tax. Actually, the $3,000 married man with no dependents, to whom my hon. friend referred in his speech, paid $584 in taxes at the peak of war taxation.

Mr. Knowles: What year was that?

Mr. Abbott: That was in 1942-43. Then he paid $584.

Mr. Knowles: The cost of living index was 117 then.

Mr. Abbott: Let us leave the cost of living index aside.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no. And it is now 181·8.

Mr. Abbott: This year he will pay $150, plus 10 per cent surtax or $15, a total of $165. It is all very well to talk about increasing the exemption and lowering the rate. But let me reiterate—as I have had to do so many times before—that one must get the money from the Canadian people, and one must get it from the people who earn in excess of these exemptions which I have mentioned. There is no use talking about getting it from the millionaires, because there are not enough of them. As a matter of fact, we impose extremely stiff taxes on millionaires. Never mind the cost of living index, or what the index may have been since 1939; I reiterate what I said before, namely that in the United States and in the United Kingdom the exemptions are substantially lower than they are in Canada and the rates of taxation are higher.

Mr. Low: In reply to what the Minister of Finance has just said, namely, that the rates in both the United Kingdom and the United States are substantially higher, I would point out to him that food prices in both of those countries are substantially lower than they are in Canada. That makes a real difference.

Mr. Abbott: Has my hon. friend been in the United Kingdom lately?

Mr. Low: No. But what food people can buy there is substantially cheaper. There is not any question about that. I think my friend the hon. member for Selkirk, just a few days ago, put on the records of this house a table showing comparative prices of certain standard foods in the United States and in Canada; and without a single exception, they were lower in the United States than they are here.

Mr. Abbott: My friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North, I think it was, told me that he had lunch in the Senate restaurant in Washington where an ordinary piece of pie cost 35 cents and a steak cost $2.75. I would ask the hon. member to compare those prices with the prices in our parliamentary restaurant here.

Mr. Knowles: Wait till you eat in our restaurant on Monday!

Mrs. Fairclough: On this point which has just been discussed, I should like to ask the minister whether the rates that he quoted—and he takes the years 1942 and 1943—include compulsory savings.

Mr. Abbott: No. That was pure tax.

Mrs. Fairclough: To revert to my former question, I am still not clear whether the minister meant definitely that this surcharge would apply on the total tax.

Mr. Abbott: Let me make it as clear as I can. It is merely a method of calculating the tax. Suppose a person has a net taxable income of $1,000. His tax would be $150. Ten per cent added to that will make it $165. That is his tax payable. It could be done in another way. Instead of a 15 per cent rate, we could have made it an 18 per cent rate. With half the rate for this year, you would have got exactly the same result. That is the tax.

There is a variety of tax credits. The taxpayers can take credit for 10 per cent of the dividends received from common shares; and if they have received $1,000 in dividends from common shares, they can deduct $100 from that $165 tax, just as they could last year; and if they have paid certain taxes in a foreign jurisdiction, I suppose they could deduct those. There is no change in principle or practice at all. It is merely a method of calculating the additional tax. If this system prevails throughout next year you could, I suppose, with equal force say that the initial rate would be 18 per cent instead of the 20 per cent surcharge. That is as clearly as I can explain it.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is quite clear now. I was hoping that was not the case because, of course, as to those people who make just barely enough to get by, and when what they do make is the result of lifetime savings, it seems to me a great pity that they shall have to pay, the first full year, an additional $40. It is lifting them out of the non-taxable class and putting them into the taxable class.

Mr. Abbott: They could not have done that; because after all, there has been at least a 15 per cent rate on all income and the tax credit is 10 per cent.

Mrs. Fairclough: If they made $1,500 in dividends, they would have $150 exemption which is the equivalent of the total tax they would pay. If their income was $2,000, you can see where it places them.

Mr. Bater: The hon. member for Peace River mentioned food prices in Great Britain. But I do not think we should forget the fact that the taxpayers of Great Britain pay £410 million in subsidies for food.

Mr. Higgins: I agree in great measure with what the minister has said. In fact, I can hardly understand how he is going to raise this large amount of money without the taxes that he is imposing. I tried to follow the arguments of my hon. friends to the left of me; but I do not think there is enough money in the big corporations for the government to be able to take from them sufficient to raise the money that is needed here for a war effort.

That, again, is only my opinion, of course. But there is one part of the population which I feel has suffered a great injustice, and I am referring to those who are on fixed pensions. I am sure the minister has taken this into consideration, but I should like to have an explanation of how, with the cost of living index as it is today, a person on a pension fixed five or ten years ago can live in a normal fashion. I do not mean "normal" under present circumstances, but normal as we would expect he should be able to live. I do feel that in respect of fixed pensioners there is a great injustice, and that there should be a higher exemption.

Mr. Abbott: There is the $500 exemption for those of sixty-five years and over, which includes a good many pensioners.

Mr. Higgins: Many people on fixed pensions are not sixty-five years, but they still have to eat.

Mr. Abbott: That is considered the normal pension age.

Mr. Higgins: In other words they have to do the best they can until they reach the age of sixty-five. I think that is unfair.

Mr. Abbott: One would expect, unless they are incapacitated, that they would work until the age of sixty-five is reached.

Mr. Wright: In the discussion on paragraph 1 the minister established a precedent for doing exactly what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is asking him to do in connection with paragraph 2. The corporation making $10,000 or less in profits is not subject to the 20 per cent surtax. They pay only 15 per cent on their corporation tax, and do not come under this section at all. The precedent has been established whereby the small corporation does not have to pay the surtax. I do not see why the minister is not prepared to say that the man or woman on a small income should not be relieved from the 20 per cent surtax, inasmuch as the small corporations do not have to pay it.

Mr. Abbott: I cannot add anything to what I said a moment ago.

Mr. Blackmore: I wonder if the minister would mind telling us whether he is imposing these surtaxes or surcharges as an anti-inflationary measure, or purely as a means of raising revenue?

Mr. Abbott: I thought I made it clear in my budget speech that both elements were important. I need these moneys, both as a means of raising revenue and for the anti-inflationary effect which, I believe, will be the result from the raising of the tax. That is my view. It may be a mistaken one.

Mr. Blackmore: Does the minister assume there is a shortage of supply of the ordinary necessities of life in Canada?

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member's question covers a wide field. I would say there is a shortage of a good many essential materials, such as steel, which enter into the production of the normal necessities people have to have. I think it is fair to say that there is today in Canada a greater supply of spending power than there is of immediately available goods. That is a major reason for the present inflationary tendencies. But if one includes in necessities of life basic food products, probably not, although apparently we have not an over-supply of butter at the present time.

Mr. Blackmore: Has the minister any statistics or figures by which he can establish that there is a relative shortage of goods as related to the money in actual working circulation in Canada?

Mr. Abbott: I do not think I have. I believe one has to draw that conclusion from the cost of living index.

Mr. Blackmore: I wonder if the minister is justified in drawing that conclusion from the cost of living index, having in mind the fact that the cost of living has risen largely as the result of manipulation rather than as the result of spending power.

Just to refresh the minister's mind along this line, may I recall to him that in April of 1946 the government granted the steel companies of Canada the privilege of advancing the price of steel by $5 a ton. I think the minister would have a hard time establishing, even before his most sympathetic friends, that that increase of $5 a ton was because people were buying more steel than was available in Canada. That $5 a ton increase was actually just a gift to the steel companies. And that $5 a ton increase in the cost of steel increased the cost of production, to which the minister referred a moment ago, and thereby it actually forced up the prices of commodities in Canada.

Then the minister will recall that, following the increase in price, there was a strike of the steel workers. They demanded that they be given their share of that $5 a ton. The result of the strike was that there was a substantial increase in the wages of the workers which, again, raised the cost of production of all commodities.

Now, can the minister honestly say that these two increases in the cost of production were the result of a shortage of goods?

Mr. Abbott: I recall the incident to which my hon. friend refers, but it was in 1946, in the period of post-war inflation. I would hope that we might not have to enter into an extended discussion of inflationary forces of that time when we have before us this resolution relating to personal income tax. There was another debate on that subject earlier in the session, which arose from an amendment to a motion to go into supply. At that time the cost of living was discussed. I can only say that what I have expressed represents the opinion I genuinely hold. I am quite prepared to concede, of course, that others may hold a different view; but I cannot give a more specific answer than that.

Mr. Blackmore: The point is that people in the House of Commons should come to grips with the problem of inflation, and not talk in generalities. There are many assumptions in the minister's position which, in my judgment, cannot be substantiated by the facts.

The whole question as to the validity of this impost, so far as it is looked upon as an anti-inflationary measure, depends upon whether or not there is actually in Canada a shortage of goods in reference to the amount of working purchasing power. There is no doubt about that. If that is so, then there could not be anything more pertinent to the question than this very discussion of inflation. It would be quite impossible to have anything more pertinent or more relevant than that. I believe the minister would agree on that point.

Then I would ask the minister this, simply because the people of Canada deserve to have an answer: If it could be found that there is a surplus of goods in Canada over what there was six months ago, then would it not be feasible and sound to create money and to spend it into circulation—because that money would not cause any increase in price.

I do not propose to enter into a discussion of that matter tonight, but I do believe that before the discussion of these budget resolutions is concluded the minister ought to attempt to show the House of Commons that he is justified in these outrageous imposts. He can say the people in Great Britain are being heavily taxed and that the people in the United States are being heavily taxed but that is no reason why the Canadian people should be so taxed, unless the situation in Canada justifies it.

If production in Canada is such that we can create money, instead of demanding it from the people—

Mr. Hellyer: The wrong time.

Mr. Blackmore: Never mind whether it is the wrong time or not. With you it is always the wrong time to discuss these matters. It is always the wrong time with the hon. member, because he cannot answer this argument, and the minister cannot answer it.

Mr. Hellyer: I know more about your theory than you give me credit for.

Mr. Blackmore: If you know anything about it, then get up and show it, and we will find out then what you know.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I had to deal with this young chap over here. There are a lot of people who think they know a lot until they are asked to prove it. If it is possible because of our large production to create that money then obviously these taxes are not necessary. Time and again we have heard it admitted that we could get revenue from increased production. If we have increased production, why cannot we get the revenue without taking it out of the pockets of the people?

In fairness to himself I think the minister ought to furnish statistics to establish the validity of the position he has taken. I maintain that the minister cannot show that the increases in prices which have resulted in this thing we call inflation are the result of surplus money in circulation. They are the result of direct and deliberate manipulation. I mentioned before how the price of steel was manipulated. These men simply said that they were going to raise the price of steel $5 per ton. They did not care whether people needed steel. They did that and the government agreed with them and ever since then the people have been paying the shot. There is no question about that. That thing has pyramided until I wager it would be astonishing if the minister got the actual figures to show just how much the people of Canada have lost because of that increase of $5 per ton in steel. Until he is able to do so and until my brilliant young friend over here is able to do that I think it would be just as well for them to reserve judgment.

I do not think I shall say anything more about this. In the light of what I have said tonight I hope the minister will not say that this discussion is not relevant.

Mr. Abbott: I did not say it was not relevant.

Mr. Blackmore: I would not be surprised if before we got finished with these budget resolutions I asked the minister to indicate just how much knowledge his department actually has.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not like to renew a previous discussion, but the minister made a statement regarding United Kingdom taxes so I went upstairs to see if I could not find something authoritative on what profits taxes are imposed in Great Britain. I have that information here in rather short form. After depreciation the net profit is taxed in the following way: First, the nation takes 30 per cent of the profits which were to be distributed in dividends.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Mr. Abbott: That is before the last budget; it is now 50 per cent.

Mr. Coldwell: That 30 per cent is now 50 per cent?

Mr. Abbott: On the distributed profits.

Mr. Coldwell: I referred to the previous budget because I had the figures. Second, the nation takes 10 per cent of the undistributed profits; third, the nation imposes an income tax of nine shillings in the pound on what is left after the profits taxes and the depreciation allowances have been deducted.

Mr. Abbott: The taxpayer takes credit for that.

Mr. Coldwell: Then the nation takes another nine shillings in the pound from personal incomes of shareholders as well as extra sums from those whose incomes are subject to surtax:

Mr. Abbott: The nine shillings is a credit against the tax paid by the individual.

Mr. Coldwell: That is not the way I read it.

Mr. Abbott: That is confirmed by my officials.

Mr. Coldwell: In any event, take £1,000 to be distributed after depreciation and so on. If the minister's figure is right, and I presume it is, 50 per cent of the £500 to be distributed would mean that on the profits to be distributed £250 would be taken—£500—50 per cent—£250. Then £500 at 10 per cent would be £50. That gives us £300, which would leave £700 to be distributed. Then we have nine shillings in the pound—

Mr. Abbott: That £750 would be equivalent to our corporation income after taxes, available for distribution.

Mr. Coldwell: There is another tax of nine shillings in the pound which is collected.

Mr. Abbott: That is merely deducted by the corporation and the shareholder takes credit for it. There is no double taxation under that tax.

Mr. Coldwell: It is paid by the corporation.

Mr. Abbott: But the shareholder takes credit for it in his return. It is really a deduction at the source.

Mr. Coldwell: There is a different rate of taxation on earned and unearned income.

Mr. Abbott: That is right; we have that also through the investment income surtax.

Mr. Coldwell: Then there is the surtax. I am simply pointing out that when the minister made the statement that there was a 10 per cent tax he did not give the whole picture.

Mr. Abbott: That is in addition. What my hon. friend is saying now is that there is a 10 per cent profits tax on undistributed income.

Mr. Coldwell: And 50 per cent on the distributed income.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Coldwell: Then there is nine shillings in the pound for which the minister says the shareholder gets credit although this document does not indicate it.

Mr. Abbott: That is now nine shillings sixpence.

Mr. Coldwell: In any event it is a much more substantial tax than I think most of us understood the minister to say when he was discussing this at an earlier stage.

Mr. Abbott: I think the hon. member has proved the point I was trying to make.

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Paragraph agreed to.

3. That, for the purpose of computing income from an office or employment for the 1951 or a subsequent taxation year, there may be deducted certain amounts paid in respect of

(a) travelling expenses that the officer or employee was required by the contract of employment to incur.

(b) professional membership dues where the officer or employee was required by the contract of employment to maintain his professional status.

(c) office rent or salary to an assistant or substitute required by the contract of employment to be paid by the officer or employee,

(d) supplies consumed directly in the course of the employment for which the officer or employee was required by the contract of employment to pay, or

Mr. Knowles: I am sure the committee will not be surprised if I say that I welcome heartily this paragraph, and one clause of it in particular, namely the last one which consists of the two words "union dues". I welcome the fact that these are now to be allowed as an exemption for income tax purposes. I am grateful for the decision that has been made by the minister and I will not take the time to remind him of all that was said against this proposal on his behalf by his parliamentary assistant on February 26.

Mr. Abbott: And by myself over the course of years. I shall deal with that in a moment.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Finance opposed it in person in former years, but it just happened that on February 26 of this year it was the parliamentary assistant who led the attack against my motion asking for this change. However, I am not going to go into all that. As I said on one other occasion, it is good to know that persistence pays. It is good to know that by hammering away we can persuade the minister to see the justice of some of the things we are arguing for.

I was convinced when I raised this matter for the first time several sessions ago, as I have been convinced every time I have moved an amendment or motion respecting it, that the claim of trade unionists to have their dues allowed as a deduction for income tax purposes was a perfectly justifiable one. From correspondence I have had from trade unionists across the country since the announcement was made on the night of April 10 I can say this move on the part of the government is most welcome.

Mr. Abbott: I should like to say a word as to why this was done. As my hon. friend has said, he has been most assiduous in urging this on the government for a number of years. However, I know he will forgive me when I say he was not the first one that raised it. It has been urged for many years in the past.

Mr. Knowles: Certainly; it was even in the Income Tax Act in 1945.

Mr. Abbott: The position with respect to union dues and a number of other things was this: The information which my predecessor got during the war was that the only deductions which were allowed from salaries and wages were some allowances for the running trades who were on a mileage basis. That was then extended to include all railway employees of the running trades. My hon. friend is familiar with that. It was then extended to clergymen. My information up to the last two or three weeks was that those were the only deductions allowed. I was somewhat surprised to be informed by officials of the Department of National Revenue that in that respect I had been mistaken, and they too had apparently been mistaken. We found that in some parts of the country certain other allowances had been made. I think probably the hon. member for Cape Breton South will know for example that certain miners were allowed to deduct the expense of explosives they were using when they were on a piece work basis, and so on. There were some similar deductions of that kind.

I felt that if that was the case, and if it could be administered, it should be continued. Having arrived at the point where we were going to go into that field of deductions, I came to the conclusion that union dues should be given the same treatment. It is for that reason that they are included in the resolution now before the house. There will be a definition in the bill as to what constitutes union dues. It will include the fees paid by civil servants to associations which are formed for the purpose of promoting better conditions of work and employment. They might not come technically within the ordinary understanding of union dues, but I hope it will be found that there is a clear definition of what constitutes union dues when the bill is brought before the house.

Mr. Knowles: Could the minister give any further details as to that definition now?

Mr. Abbott: I would prefer not to do so. I think it would be better for the committee to have the definition before it. Then we can discuss it and see whether or not the committee considers the definition is adequate. I think the other items are pretty well self-explanatory. They are items which the Department of National Revenue have told me they can administer without any serious risk of abuse on the part of people who claim these particular deductions. It will be seen that they are all directly related to the contract or work which is being performed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There are one or two questions I should like to ask the minister. First of all, I am asked this question with respect to subparagraph (e), which the minister has just been discussing, and I should like to put it on the record and ask to have it answered. I should like to know whether this includes the amount of pension assessments which are necessary or compulsory for union members to retain their membership standing.

Mr. Abbott: I will answer that part, but I would prefer to have the detailed discussion of this matter when we have the section before us. Pension assessments as such will not be included in this item because they are deductible under another provision in the act having to do with approved pension plans. Therefore pension contributions as such will not be eligible for deduction under this section. However, I would suggest to the committee, if it meets with their approval, that the detailed discussion as to what union dues will include should await the discussion of the definition itself. I will be ready to listen to any suggestion that may be appropriate to make it a clear definition.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the phrase "contract of employment" imply a written contract?

Mr. Abbott: No, contract in the legal sense.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Just a working arrangement. Another matter which has been brought specially to my attention is the position of actors. I am told in a letter from one of them that they are not given the same status in Canada as they are in the United States and Great Britain. He says in part:

> Surely, sir, Canadian artists have had a singular struggle to gain recognition and a not too steady income without being burdened with unjust and illogical taxation. Both in the United States and in Great Britain the professional status of the free lance artist is recognized.

Is the minister familiar with that matter? Is that problem before the department?

Mr. Abbott: I will have to inform myself as to that. I am making a note of it, and I will give the answer at a later stage. I am not familiar with it, and the officials in front of me are not in a position to give me all the information that my hon. friend wants.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Perhaps the minister would like me to bring to his attention the material I have.

Mr. Abbott: I would be very happy if the hon. member would do that.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to say a further word to the minister regarding the definition of trade union dues. I accept his suggestion that we wait for further discussion until we have the definition in the bill before us. He said when that time comes he will listen attentively to any suggestions that we make. If the definition seems to have any flaws in it, will he be prepared at that time to listen to suggestions that are made and perchance accept some of those suggestions?

Mr. Abbott: Of course. We want to get the right definition. My officials have discussed it. They have done their best to draft what they think is appropriate. It may not be possible to distribute the bill tomorrow if we should conclude tonight but I would hope that it would be available by Saturday. My intention is to allow it to stand for four or five days, probably a week, for study by members.

Mr. Knowles: My point is that usually when a printed bill comes before us we can make all the speeches we want but cannot persuade the minister to make any changes.

Mr. Abbott: I think my hon. friend will recognize that in this sort of thing, as in most other things for that matter, I try to keep an open mind, and I want to get the right sort of definition.

Mr. Knowles: That's good.

Mr. Gillis: If the minister has any difficulty in arriving at a definition I shall be glad to help him. I am not going to pursue that matter any further but will wait for the bill. However, there are two matters of exemption that I should like to mention while we are dealing with exemptions because there is no other place to do it. The first one—and the minister himself brought it to my attention—is the question of miners, particularly those working underground, who have to purchase safety clothes such as shoes, a certain type of safety hat, and explosives. Explosives are not exempt for taxation purposes at this time. The minister might take that into consideration because practically everyone in a business in this country is permitted to deduct the legitimate expenses of operating that business. I think a man who has to buy shoes, a hat and explosives, which run into quite a bit of money a year, for the purpose of earning his income, should be permitted to deduct their cost for taxation purposes.

The second point I want to bring to the minister's attention is one about which the Department of National Revenue is a bit confused. I brought it to the department's attention on two or three occasions, and I got a mixed-up decision. I am not blaming them for that because perhaps this type of exemption of medical expenses applies to only one part of the country. The Department of National Revenue confused it with regular medical associations that collect from the individual and then pay his expenses for hospital and doctor. In the type of medical organization I have in mind that is not done. For example, the coal miners of Nova Scotia pay a doctor a dollar a week or $52 a year each as insurance. The doctor only supplies an examination and prescription. The individual pays for his medicine. The doctor keeps that money and pays nothing out of it. The type of service he gives is to diagnose your trouble and prescribe medicine.

In the second place the individual pays $52 a year to a hospital on a subscription basis. For that he gets ward treatment and ordinary services. I have brought two or three cases to the attention of the Department of National Revenue. The person affected, whose income was under $3,000 a year, had some $400 odd in medical expenses that year, minus this $104 by way of insurance, and he wanted to put in that $104 which he had paid the doctor and hospital on that subscription basis with his over-all hospital bill to make up the 4 per cent of his net income as an exemption for medical purposes. I know that whoever answered my letters confused that payment he made with payments made to associations that operate across the country and pay all medical bills. There is nothing paid back out of that $104, however. When the minister is reviewing this matter of exemptions I hope he will take these questions into consideration.

Mr. Abbott: I will not take time to deal with them tonight, but I will consider the points my hon. friend has raised.

Mr. Argue: I approve of the provision including union dues among the amounts which may be deducted for income tax purposes. The minister has now said that the definition will include fees to civil service associations, even though technically they may not be trade unions, and I am all for that. Before the minister draws up the final definition, however, I would like him to consider whether it might not also cover, as I think it should, the dues paid to farmers' unions and other farm organizations. It seems to me that if we are going to make this provision for professional people, for trade unionists and for civil servants, the same provision should be made for farmers.

Mr. Abbott: My understanding is that the farmer is a businessman, self-employed. This has reference to people on salaries and wages. However, I will make a note of that and be prepared to deal with it when we are discussing the section.

Mr. Knowles: In that case will the farmer be able to deduct those payments as an expense, as has been the case right along with doctors and lawyers?

Mr. Abbott: I could not answer that offhand. If it is a trade association I should think he would be able to do so. I have never even considered the position.

Paragraph agreed to.

4. That the governor in council be authorized to make regulations under which the income tax of members of the armed forces on their service income will be paid in full in respect of the pay and allowances of each pay period by a deduction therefrom in accordance with a special table subject to the right of any member to file a return on an annual basis.

Mr. Pearkes: What happens in the case of a man whose total income would not be taxable? Let me give the example of a university student who goes to camp for the summer, and who otherwise would not have any deductions. Will deductions be made monthly?

Mr. Abbott: I am told that is provided for in the table. I had hoped to take a little time on this resolution to put before the committee some considerations in connection with the complete exemption from taxation of those serving in foreign theatres. Perhaps it would be equally convenient if I were to do that on the bill. I want to review our experience.

I am sure many hon. members here, particularly the hon. member for Nanaimo, are familiar with some of the difficulties we ran into during the last war. I should like to deal with them, to outline what we did and the problems we had to face, but I think perhaps I should not attempt to do that on this resolution this evening.

This is a proposal for a very simplified form of tax collection from the armed forces, where a table will provide for complete deduction. They will not be required to file a return if they do not have income in excess of $50 beyond their service pay. There will be an allowance of $50 in lieu of charitable donations and so on; but it will be always open to the serviceman to file a return if it is more beneficial to him to do so. Of course the serviceman who is comparatively wealthy, who has an income in addition to his service pay, will be required to file a return and of course will get credit for the deductions made. My people tell me this new system has received the wholehearted endorsation of the national defence department. They believe it is a forward step over what we have had in connection with tax collection in previous times, and I think it is an excellent system.

When we are considering the section of the bill I should like to say a word on the general question of the taxation of our armed forces. That is something about which I know a good deal, since Mr. Ilsley had me spend a good deal of time on it during the last war. I should like to put before the committee some facts with relation to it; in view of the late hour I would prefer not to do that tonight.

Mr. Green: I point out to the minister that this question is of the utmost importance and also of the utmost interest to people from coast to coast in Canada.

Mr. Abbott: I agree.

Mr. Green: Many newspapers of all political stripes have taken very strong stands with regard to the taxation of men who are fighting in Korea. I believe the conscience of the Canadian people is very much troubled over this suggestion that the men who are doing the fighting in Korea are going to have to pay income tax. I hope the minister has changed his mind and that these men are not going to be taxed; but I am afraid we cannot wait until the bill is brought in to find out.

Mr. Abbott: It might be an excellent idea for me to deal with it tonight, then.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Green: I would suggest that the minister tell us now just what he is proposing with respect to the taxation of Canadians fighting in Korea.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps that is a good suggestion, and I will be happy to do so. The subject, as I say, is one with which I had a good deal of experience during the last war. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Royal the other day, such income tax exemption as has been suggested is very much more beneficial to the more highly paid officers than to the men. In the case of officers of the rank of general or higher it may be worth $140 a month or more. In the case of the other ranks it may be a few dollars a month at most.

The subject had considerable attention during the last war. The three main headings under which I would like to discuss it are: first, the inequities and anomalies created within the services by tax exemptions granted in world war II; second, the inequities and anomalies created in relation to the rest of the taxpayers by the armed forces exemption; and third, the difficult administrative problems encountered in carrying into effect the armed services tax provisions in world war II. As hon. members know, in the United Kingdom armed services there is no such tax exemption and never has been.

Under the first heading, the inequities and anomalies created within the services by the tax exemptions we had in world war II, here is the history. We started out by granting an exemption for the ranks and leaving the officers to pay the full tax. That had the troublesome result, of course, that the higher levels of non-commissioned officers were receiving perhaps several hundred dollars more net income than the lowest levels of commissioned officers. Under those conditions it was understandable that warrant officers, for example, would be unwilling to take out commissions. The second step was the rectification of this anomaly by granting an exemption based on income. Any single member of the armed forces with an income of less than $1,600 was exempt, and married members were exempt at higher amounts. In addition a complicated tax credit formula was employed to gradually increase the tax above those exemptions until the full rate of tax was paid. At the same time a complete exemption for servicemen overseas was granted.

The fact that some servicemen in Canada were required to pay tax created considerable resentment. This group felt that it was a condition of their enlistment that they be required to perform their duties anywhere, and it was not of their own choice that they happened to be stationed in Canada. I know from personal experience that there was a very real sense of grievance among those groups. Many officers, of course, whose services were required here, would far rather have been engaged in active duty at the front, and they felt that the imposition of income tax upon them completely disregarded that circumstance.

In the third place the position of one group of officers in Canada, who would otherwise have been taxable, was recognized by the granting of an exemption. These were the personnel of the services whose duties were normally performed either in the air or afloat. In the practical administration of that test, as I am sure a good many service members of the house will recall, it was necessary to adopt some simple rule as to eligibility. Unfortunately once a specific test had been adopted the temptation was presented to qualify for income tax exemption by meeting the requirements of the test. In short, it became possible to fly or float into a tax-exempt position, and of course it was impossible to establish any system for determining whether or not the exemption had been really earned. I might add that the possibility of obtaining complete exemption by a stint of duty overseas was also one that presented a constant temptation. I found, in my own brief experience in national defence, that there was a certain tendency to post people overseas in order to give them tax exemption, although they may never have got very much further than headquarters in London.

In the next place, another group that warranted special treatment were members of service units stationed outside of Canada but not overseas. Around the fringes of the continent there were units stationed in Labrador, Newfoundland, Kiska, and other places, which were from time to time engaged in combat duty. The position of this group was recognized by exempting them from half the tax that would have been payable had they been stationed in Canada.

These provisions covered the main elements in the tax provisions for the armed forces in world war II. They were the products of attempts to deal with specific situations as they arose, and represent one of the most unsatisfactory experiences in the history of Canadian income tax law.

My second heading refers to the inequities and anomalies created in relation to the rest of the taxpayers by the armed forces exemption. Even more serious than the problems involved in working out the tax positions of the armed services themselves were the innumerable difficulties to which the exemption gave rise in relation to the rest of the taxpayers. The exemption for the forces was generally interpreted as being a reward for the risk they underwent in performing their duties and, as a result, almost every other group, both overseas and in Canada, that was engaged in an activity involving an element of risk sought similar preferred treatment. Outside of Canada the firefighters, the auxiliary services, the merchant marine, the ferry command, radio and press reporters at the front and other groups, at one time or another, requested income tax exemption in whole or in part. Some form of concession was finally extended to many of these, and I had something to do with working out those concessions, particularly with respect to the auxiliary services. At home taxpayers who were test pilots, civilian flying instructors, employees of shell filling plants, fishermen exposed to the risk of being sunk by enemy action, and even miners engaged in dangerous work underground producing metals for the war effort represented that on the basis of the armed forces precedent they should also be given some exemption from tax. As far as I can recall, no concessions were given to any of these groups in Canada but it was, and still is, utterly impossible to draw clear, logical and reasonable distinctions in this field. From the initial precedent of the armed forces exemption, claim after claim was made by groups who, in many respects, were performing duties involving equal danger, and who could be excluded only by holding to rigid and arbitrary lines of distinction.

The third, and of course least important, heading is the difficult administrative problems encountered in carrying into effect the armed forces tax provision in world war II. I think there I should point out that, although the principal difficulties encountered were problems of equity as between taxpayers, there were very serious administrative difficulties in carrying out this complex and cumbersome system. The mere fact that there were so many different graduations and classifications of taxability made the whole system most complicated for the Department of National Defence, the Department of National Revenue, and of course for the serviceman himself.

In the light of that experience, my belief is that any consideration which should properly be given to our servicemen who are serving in foreign fields should really relate to their remuneration and not to a tax exemption, if for no other reason in addition to the ones I have indicated here that such tax exemption is manifestly of far greater value to the wealthy man or higher officer and of relatively little value to the man serving in the ranks. Perhaps I should add that the revenue implications are not of particular significance so far as the persons who are now engaged in Korea or who may later be serving in Europe are concerned. I was not in the house, but I believe the hon. member for Broadview made some suggestions about combat pay or something of the sort. It is not the function of the Minister of Finance to go into those matters, but if consideration is to be given to that type of service—let me say at once I do not say it should not be—

Mr. Green: Is it going to be?

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps my hon. friend could put that to the Minister of National Defence. I do not think it should take the form of an income tax exemption because such an exemption is of very little value to the ordinary serviceman and is of very considerable value to the high ranking officer or the officer who has a private income. It does lead to all these very difficult lines of distinction which I have outlined. I speak, as I say, with a very close personal knowledge of this matter because I had to live with it during the last three or four years during the war.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I appreciate fully the minister's earnestness in this statement he has made. Reverting to what he said towards the end of his remarks about an alternative, that is to say about combat pay, danger pay or whatever you want to call it—

Mr. Abbott: It might, for example, be called foreign service pay.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That seems to me a very practical point indeed, because I do believe that, as the member for Vancouver-Quadra has said, people's consciences are aroused. There is a great desire to have something done. Now, what is the practical thing to do? The Minister of National Defence is not here tonight, so is the Minister of Finance prepared to have this item left and, in the meantime, discuss this matter with the Minister of National Defence to see whether something can be worked out? While we desire to be co-operative I think there is no question but that the member for Vancouver-Quadra is right in saying that this is something to which the people wish to give expression. The minister has given a very formidable list of objections to income tax exemptions. Those of us who know something about the army, and about the way people get shifted or as the minister has said floated or flown into income tax exemptions, vividly describes the difficulties which arise. Can the minister make a practical suggestion with regard to combat or danger pay, so that we will not feel this thing is being closed out? That is our difficulty.

Mr. Abbott: It will never be closed out. I shall be very glad to discuss that aspect with my colleague the Minister of National Defence. I have already indicated that I have no personal objection to that sort of thing. I believe that is the proper way to handle it, if something needs to be done. I recognize the feeling which has been referred to this evening. I do not think the proper way to give recognition to that sort of thing is by creating what I conceive to be a most inequitable and unfair way of giving a benefit to higher income people. If anything should be done, I believe the proper basis is something in the nature of, let us call it, combat pay or special pay for service of this kind. I had hoped that we could have the benefit of discussion by some of our members who served in the last war under this system, because they will have seen the practical application of it.

I had hoped we might be able to conclude the resolutions this evening, but perhaps we cannot. I wanted to get the bills distributed. We can discuss this again on the bill. I do not believe we should hold up the resolution. For the reasons which I have given, and which I am convinced are sound ones, I do not think the income tax exemption is either fair or desirable. There probably are other ways of making provisions for what hon. members have in mind than the income tax exemption.

Mr. Green: I am afraid that the minister is looking at this problem from the point of view of the last war rather than from that of conditions which exist at the present time.

Mr. Abbott: Present conditions can quickly change to other ones, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. Green: If there is a change, then of course there can be a change here too.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend will recall the chain of events that I recounted in the last war.

Mr. Green: The fact was that during the last war we had the utmost difficulty in persuading the Minister of Finance to grant any exemption at all. I remember our fighting over here, day after day; and it was extremely difficult to get him to grant any exemption. Finally, when the exemption was granted, it was only a half exemption; and to some of the groups to whom the Minister of Finance has referred tonight exemption was not given when, obviously, it should have been given to them because they were risking their lives. What is the position today in 1951? We have a brigade fighting in Korea; and certainly anyone who is fighting in Korea should not be asked to pay income tax on the pay he is receiving for doing that fighting.

Mr. Abbott: The British brigade fighting in Korea are.

Mr. Green: That may be.

Mr. Abbott: And the Americans.

Mr. Green: Just a minute ago the minister was quoting the British the other way.

Mr. Abbott: The British are taxed in Korea.

Mr. Green: The minister talks about high ranking officers. The highest-ranking officer we have in Korea is a brigadier.

Mr. Abbott: It would be worth $172 a month to him.

Mr. Green: That may be. The minister is being quite petty, I think, when he tries to base his defence on that.

Mr. Abbott: I should have said $142.91.

Mr. Green: The government has a pretty weak defence when the best it can do is to try to throw a few bricks at the higher officers.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, no. I am just talking about fairness; it would be $6.85 for the privates.

Mr. Green: There is a principle involved here, namely whether these men who are actually doing the fighting and are offering their lives in order to protect this country should be charged income tax on that pay.

I submit that Canadians from one end of the country to the other are against any such thing being done, and are perfectly prepared to make up the difference in taxation from their own pockets. The minister himself has said tonight that this question does not involve the revenues to any extent; there is not a great deal of taxation involved. But what is involved is the treatment of these young men; and that is a serious factor. This is a matter of principle, and not just a matter of a few dollars. I have here a letter written to the minister by a wife in Vancouver. I think it sets out the position clearly. It reads in part as follows:

> Surely the men who answered the government's call to fight for our great nation, some never to return to their wives and families, should receive some small considerations.
> In today's trying times of international strife, we must all come to expect higher taxes and restricted luxuries, to assist our country's great efforts toward preparedness. But why should our gallant men in uniform, fighting overseas, be expected to pay for the bullets they are firing, the clothes they are wearing, and the food they are eating?

That seems to be the picture from the point of view of the person in the street. I have here an editorial which appeared in the issue of April 28 of the Vancouver Sun, which is a supporter of this government. The heading is "Taxation where it Hurts", and it reads in part as follows:

> Imagine the public uproar if the defence minister ordered our soldiers in Korea to buy their own bullets.
> Yet that's just about the government's attitude when it insists that they go on paying income tax. This mean gouge is bravely defended by Finance Minister Abbott as the principle that "no group" should escape income tax.
> Well, the men in Korea aren't just another "group" of Canadians. They're men who voluntarily gave up all comfort and safety in a time of high prosperity to risk their lives thousands of miles from home. Among the things they're defending is the freedom of other Canadians to stay home and enjoy the prosperity they've sacrificed.

There are editorials from many other papers to the same effect. I am afraid that the government is brushing this appeal aside because of administrative difficulties.

Mr. Abbott: No, it is not.

Mr. Green: The minister has stressed the fact that it is just too hard for the income tax—

Mr. Abbott: The minister had stressed the fact that it is most unfair.

Mr. Blackmore: What about equality of sacrifice?

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Blackmore: How much equality of sacrifice is there about that?

Mr. Green: Most of the minister's complaint is based on the difficulties of administration: they could not do this and they could not do that, and therefore—

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is not being fair. I put that consideration last, and I said it was far less important than the others.

Mr. Green: All the way through the minister stressed the difficulties of administration. Not only did he do that, but there was also this argument about the higher officers, to the effect that they were going to get away with something and therefore they had to be taxed.

Mr. Abbott: A disproportion.

Mr. Green: That type of argument is used only when there is a bad case to defend; and that is exactly what we are meeting here tonight. I suggest to the minister that further consideration be given to this question. I also appeal to the private members on the government side of the house. They must know, just as well as we do, that this thing is wrong. It is not a matter of partisan politics at all.

Mr. Abbott: I completely agree.

Mr. Applewhaite: Rot.

Mr. Green: Who said "rot"?

Mr. Applewhaite: I did.

Mr. Green: You are the man who is talking rot. This thing is wrong. These men who are fighting for us should not be charged income tax on their pay. As to the men in the forces at home, different considerations may apply. I am not arguing now on their behalf at all. But I say that the men who have gone to Korea should be exempted from income tax on their pay, and that they should be so exempted at this session. That particular case can be dealt with. There is no excuse for trying to bring in other people in order to break down the argument made for the men in Korea. Let us deal with them and them alone in considering this question at this time. If that is done, I am sure that neither the minister nor any other member of the government can get up on the floor of this house and justify the levying of an income tax on these men who are fighting in Korea. It is eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Abbott: I move that the committee rise, Mr. Chairman, and report progress. I hope that, before we conclude the discussion of this section, we shall have the benefit of the views of some hon. members who have had practical experience in this war. I would particularly welcome the views of the hon. member for Nanaimo and the hon. member for Broadview; and I know there are a number of others.

Mr. Ross (Souris): In the last war, you mean.

Paragraph stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall withdraw from the order paper Bill No. 193, respecting weights and measures and replace it by a new bill in a day or so. The motion will probably be made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). Then we shall continue with the budget resolutions. When discussion of them is completed, we shall go into committee of supply and take up the estimates of the Departments of Labour and Fisheries.

Mr. Green: You are not taking the Canadian Commercial Corporation bill?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, yes. Before we go into supply, we shall try to study Bill No. 284, to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 18, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

PRINTING BUREAU—REFERENCE TO INFORMATION GIVEN IN SESSIONAL PAPERS

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege affecting myself and other members of the house, I should like to point out that in sessional paper No. 107-D, dated May 17, 1951, which was tabled yesterday, I find the following question by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) with the following answer by the government. This is the third question in that sessional paper, and it has reference to the site of the printing bureau in Hull. The question and answer follow:

Q. How much was paid for the site on which the building is being erected?
A. Estimated cost—$496,817.56.

On checking back I find that in sessional paper No. 107-B, dated March 27, 1950, the following question was asked by the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. Hodgson), and the following answer was given by the government:

Q. What was the cost of the site of the proposed printing bureau in Hull, Quebec?
A. Cost of the site to date, $824,979.72.

It is quite evident that an explanation is due from the minister as to this discrepancy, in that the answer tabled yesterday indicates a figure more than $300,000 less than the figure given on March 27 last year as to the cost to date.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the figures in the two answers do not agree. I shall look into them. On listening to the hon. gentleman I was struck by the thought that in one case the officials probably were referring to the exact site on which the printing bureau is being built, while in the other case they were including other properties which were expropriated but which will not actually form part of the site. That may be the explanation, but I shall certainly have the facts when I give the answer.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VISITORS IN GALLERY—STUDENTS OF NORTH BAY NORMAL SCHOOL

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to refer to a group of eighty-five students who are now in the gallery to our left? These young people come from all parts of northern Ontario, as far west as the Manitoba border, as far north as Kapuskasing, as far northeast as Rouyn and Noranda, and as far south as Gravenhurst. They are students who attend the normal school in North Bay, and are now enjoying a two-day trip to the capital city. May I through you, sir, express the sincere hope that their visit to Ottawa, and particularly to the parliament buildings, will prove to be a pleasant and informative experience.

REFERENCE TO REPORT IN THE "CANADIAN TRIBUNE"—PAMPHLET "KNOW YOUR ENEMY"

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I regret very much to have to take a Toronto newspaper to task. I have always been taught that if a man hits you on one cheek you should turn the other, but when a newspaper hits you below the belt I think you have a right to stand up and fight. This paper accuses me of using my franking privilege to send out a pamphlet entitled, "Know Your Enemy." I absolutely deny that. Somebody must be using my frank in some illegitimate way, and therefore I say that that is hitting below the belt. They tell me that this pamphlet is anti-Semitic. If the Tribune condemns this pamphlet, then there must be some good in it. The pamphlet was just placed on my table; I looked at it only in a cursory way, but what I saw was good. It may be that I can find another issue of this pamphlet, because if it is as good as the first part then the world should know what the aim of this paper is.

I will not say any more on the matter. I will turn over the matter to the protective staff to find out who has been using my frank, and I will hand this paper to the Minister of Justice for future action.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say that I also received this pamphlet, but my copy was in an envelope with no frank and no stamp. I am wondering how it got in my box. It is most objectionable.

LENGTH AND MASS UNITS ACT

DEFINITION OF CANADIAN STANDARD YARD AND POUND

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 293, respecting units of length and mass.

Mr. Green: Could we have an explanation?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Weights and Measures Act as passed in 1873 provided that a specified bronze bar would be the primary standard of length in Canada and a specified platinum-iridium weight would be the Canadian standard pound. With the progress of scientific metrology since 1873, it has been found that a more scientifically accurate primary standard can be defined in terms of the international metre. The bill now before the house for first reading therefore defines the primary standards of weight and measure in terms of the international metre and the international kilogram.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Rene N. Jutras (for Mr. Bradette) presented the first report of the standing committee on external affairs, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

VISIT OF PRESIDENT OF FRANCE—SUGGESTED PLACING OF FLAGS IN MEMORIAL CHAMBER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. For the visit of the president of France four flags were made and placed in the anteroom of the memorial chamber, and they have since been removed. I ask the Minister of Public Works whether he will give consideration to having them placed there as a permanent memorial of that historic occasion, the visit of the president of France.

[Mr. McIvor.]

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I will certainly submit that request to my colleagues and do my best to meet the hon. member's wishes.

FISHERIES

SALTFISH MARKETS AND PRICES SUPPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In his statement to the house yesterday the minister said:

> It is only under special conditions that government action under the support act should be contemplated. There is, in our opinion, no need for such special action at this time.

Will the minister tell the house whether this statement applies only to the 1951 catch or also to the 1950 catch?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): The hon. member gave me notice of the question. I think it is quite apparent from the statement I made that I was referring to the 1951 catch. We have already given support to the 1950 catch in buying Labrador codfish. We have also agreed to make an investigation of returns to fishermen on shore fish for 1950. That investigation is now proceeding, and it will probably be July before it is finished. We are not going back on anything that we have promised to do. In my statement I was referring only to the 1951 season.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO SITTING ON VICTORIA DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the house will sit on Thursday, May 24.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The matter has not received any special consideration. In conformity with the practice that has been followed over many years past, I think it would be the desire of hon. members to sit on that day.

Mr. Fair: I have no objection whatever to the house sitting. In fact, I should like to do that, but because civil servants across the country will have a holiday on May 24 I should like to know whether consideration will be given to giving the members' stenographers staff Saturday morning off to make up for having to work on Thursday.

Mr. St. Laurent: The Prime Minister has no control over the stenographic staff of the House of Commons.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

ORDER FOR SECOND READING OF BILL 193 DISCHARGED AND BILL WITHDRAWN

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 193, an act respecting weights and measures.—The Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, before the motion for second reading is put I should like to move:

That the order for second reading of Bill No. 193, an act respecting weights and measures, be discharged and the bill withdrawn.

The reason for the motion is that the bill provides for the primary standards of length and weight. Earlier today we introduced a bill providing for those primary standards in another way. The provision therefore will be withdrawn from the Weights and Measures Act. The consequence of the withdrawal of that provision from the weights and measures bill involves some changes in the language of a great many sections as well as one main section. It was considered that it would be fairer to all members that they have before them the weights and measures bill that we are asking the house to consider rather than another bill to which many amendments would have to be made in committee.

Motion agreed to and bill withdrawn.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

INCOME TAX ACT

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, amongst other things:

1. That, in respect of income earned after the commencement of the 1951 calendar year, a corporation shall pay a defence surtax for the year equal to 20 per cent of that portion of its ordinary income tax for the year that is computed at the 38 per cent rate, or the 33 per cent rate if applicable (before allowance is made for tax credits) subject to a right to a refund of such tax to the extent that it would reduce the corporation's taxable income after payment of ordinary income tax to an amount less than 5 per cent of its capital employed.

2. That an individual shall pay a defence surtax equal to

(a) for the 1951 taxation year, 10 per cent and

(b) for each subsequent taxation year, 20 per cent of his ordinary income tax (including investment surtax) for the year before allowance is made for tax credits.

3. That, for the purpose of computing income from an office or employment for the 1951 or a subsequent taxation year, there may be deducted certain amounts paid in respect of

(a) travelling expenses that an officer or employee was required by the contract of employment to incur,

(b) professional membership dues where the officer or employee was required by the contract of employment to maintain his professional status,

(c) office rent or salary to an assistant or substitute required by the contract of employment to be paid by the officer or employee,

(d) supplies consumed directly in the course of the employment for which the officer or employee was required by the contract of employment to pay, or

(e) union dues.

4. That the governor in council be authorized to make regulations under which the income tax of members of the armed forces on their service income will be paid in full in respect of the pay and allowances of each pay period by a deduction therefrom in accordance with a special table subject to the right of any member to file a return on an annual basis.

5, That the right to elect to pay the 15 per cent tax on its undistributed income now enjoyed by a private company

(a) be extended to all other corporations, and

(b) be withdrawn, effective April 10, 1951, from a corporation that is controlled by another corporation except in respect of its undistributed income on hand at the end of the 1949 taxation year.

6. That for the 1951 and subsequent taxation years the provision under which the 15 per cent tax rate on the first $10,000 of income of a corporation applies to only one of several related corporations be amended so as not to include in the class of related corporations those controlled by persons not dealing at arms length unless such persons own shares in the capital stock of both corporations.

7. That for the 1951 and subsequent taxation years, payments made for insulin, cortisone, adrenocorticotrophin (ACTH), liver extract injectible for pernicious anaemia and vitamin B12 for pernicious anaemia purchased under a physician's prescription may be included in the medical expenses for which a deduction from income may be made for the purpose of computing taxable income.

8. That special deductions from income to taxpayers whose principal business is the production, refining or marketing of petroleum or petroleum products or the exploring or drilling for oil or natural gas or mining or exploring for minerals, be allowed for expenses incurred in the 1954 operations on the same basis as for expenses incurred in the operations in the years 1951 to 1953.

9. That special deductions from income and taxes to taxpayers whose principal business is production, refining or marketing of petroleum or drilling for petroleum be allowed for expenses incurred in respect of deep-test oil wells in 1952 operations on the same basis as for similar expenses in 1950 and 1951 operations.

10. That the exemption of the income from a metalliferous or industrial mineral mine for the first three years of production now applicable to mines that came into production during the years 1946 to 1952 be extended to mines coming into production in the years 1953 and 1954.

Mr. Drew: During the discussion of this measure before the committee rose last evening, Mr. Chairman, a good deal was said about the income tax provisions in so far as they affect men and women in our active service forces overseas. A number of hon. members expressed the opinion that members of our active service forces overseas should be exempt from the provisions of the Income Tax Act. In response to these suggestions it was explained that there were certain administrative difficulties; and it will be recalled that when this subject was brought up on an earlier occasion the Minister of National Defence pointed out the difference in dollars and cents that this exemption would result in as between a private in the ranks and a major general. Other considerations also have been put forward.

I suggest there are reasons why the recommendation that members of our armed forces on active service overseas should be exempt from the provisions of the Income Tax Act deserves further and favourable consideration by the Minister of Finance. It is not necessary to repeat the arguments that have been so well presented in favour of this exemption. However, it does seem necessary to refer to the fact that this was done during the last war. It is true there were administrative difficulties, as there would be today; but I submit that it is the duty of the government to decide what should be done and then take such steps as may be necessary to overcome any administrative difficulties.

This is something which particularly requires every effort on the part of the government, at a time when all Canadians are being asked to encourage enlistment in the armed forces. I submit the evidence is very strong that public opinion across Canada is overwhelmingly in favour of the suggestion that those who are offering life itself in the service of their country should be exempt from these taxes during their period of active service.

I recognize that hon. members should not regard as conclusive arguments the editorial point of view which may be expressed in newspapers across this country, important though that may be. But when there is a uniform request for this exemption, in very strong terms, on the editorial pages of the most responsible newspapers of Canada, we should recognize that it interprets public opinion without regard to political or other affiliations. Merely to look at some of the editorials which have taken a very strong stand on this matter one finds such words as "repugnant", "heartless", and terms of that kind used to describe the imposition of income tax on those on active service. I would refer to a statement such as this: "Imagine the public uproar if the defence minister ordered our soldiers in Korea to buy their own bullets". That statement, appearing in the Vancouver Sun, which is ordinarily very friendly to the government, merely indicates the sentiment being expressed from the Atlantic to the Pacific in regard to this tax.

Many anomalies can be suggested which indicate why such a tax would be most unfair. Let us consider, for instance, the case of a man killed in action—and unhappily we must recognize that we are called on to consider such cases; we are reminded of it from day to day by the casualty lists which indicate what Canada is suffering in a war, which is a very real war, being waged by the collective forces of the United Nations. Is the government going to make a claim against the estate of that man for arrears of income tax? Is the government going to pursue the ordinary course in regard to a debt of this kind? I am not raising this question for any other purpose than to illustrate one of the numerous difficulties that would arise and would have to be faced. I should think there would be a great reluctance to follow such a course. I am sure the Minister of Finance, a veteran himself, would be most reluctant to take such action. Then if that course is not right, the initial step should not be taken which would call for such action as an ultimate result.

I notice that a good deal of attention was paid to the fact that exemption from income tax would result in a substantial saving to a major general and a relatively small saving to other ranks. It may well be that there are discrepancies of the kind which require special consideration. I suggest, however, that that is no argument in itself. If it is right that the soldiers, sailors or airmen of the lowest non-commissioned rank should be exempt from this tax, the fact that someone else might be exempt in respect of a larger sum can surely be no conclusive argument against granting what would otherwise be regarded as a just allowance. As I recall the figure, it was estimated that for the lowest non-commissioned ranks the saving would be $6.85 per month. That, after all, does amount to some $80 in a year, which is not an insignificant figure in these days of rising costs of the necessities of life.

May I point out, Mr. Chairman, that on earlier occasions the government did not feel that this principle was so repugnant. It will be recalled that until comparatively recent times diplomatic and other representatives overseas in similar posts were exempted from income tax. As I understand it, that was done in recognition of the fact that those who served Canada outside of the country do not receive many of the conveniences, services, and amenities which are provided from the tax money which is paid. Furthermore, it was also a recognition of the fact that men and women who served Canada overseas are often called upon to bear dual expenses because of the necessity of maintaining a family or home in Canada, and also other facilities of a similar kind overseas. Evidently the government decided that this was not a satisfactory method. The exemption was discontinued but in its place came the provision of generous living allowances and expense accounts, intended to recognize that in addition to the ordinary cost of carrying out services of that nature outside of Canada, there were also unusual expenses involved. Although the method is different, the government still recognizes that those who serve Canada outside of our national borders are faced with special expenses, quite apart from their daily living, that at least call for recognition. I submit that if it is appropriate that we should recognize our obligation to those who serve us in civilian capacities overseas, we certainly should recognize that same obligation to those who serve us overseas in uniform in a much more dangerous capacity.

Apart from the great danger, apart from the hardship and the separation from their families experienced by those on active service, which they willingly accept in offering their own services to their country, there nevertheless is the fact that those who go on active service outside of Canada in our armed forces do, for a considerable time, remove themselves from the opportunity to make use of the public services, the many public facilities and conveniences, which are available to the rest of us from the money paid in taxes to the government of Canada.

For that reason, in addition to the other reasons which have been so clearly stated, I believe that while men and women are on active service in our armed forces they should not be called upon to pay the full taxes required for all the services that they would ordinarily receive if they were in Canada. I believe the least that can be done for those who are making it possible for us to enjoy these services is to exempt them from those income taxes which bear particularly heavily on those who are receiving armed forces pay.

There are times when the government must follow a course which is not necessarily related to general public opinion if they believe that course to be more convenient and more satisfactory from the administrative point of view. I contend that in this case there are special reasons why the government should be very sensitive to public opinion as it has been expressed by the editorials in our newspapers—which often clearly interpret public thinking—and by veterans organizations, municipal councils and other bodies which have taken a definite stand on this subject. We want everyone to feel that the utmost is being done to encourage young men and women to accept the great responsibility they assume in becoming members of the armed forces of Canada. With the opinion that has been expressed so clearly by these various organizations, by veterans bodies and by the press as interpreters of public opinion, I urge that the Minister of Finance reconsider this particular request and indicate to the house that there will be an exemption from income tax for all members of our armed forces serving overseas.

Last night there was some suggestion that this subject should be discussed in detail, and that hon. members of this house should say how this should be done or what alternative should be offered. I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that at this time we are considering a motion which says that it is expedient that certain things be done. As I understand it, the real purpose of the debate on this motion, and other similar motions, is that members of the house may indicate what they think is expedient or is not expedient. Then if their arguments have been sufficiently convincing, the minister responsible for the legislation which will be subsequently introduced has an opportunity to amend it accordingly before it comes into this chamber.

The point I am making, and the point I urge with the utmost earnestness upon the Minister of Finance, is that he should agree that it is not expedient to impose an income tax on those who are assuming the great responsibility of preserving freedom for Canada by taking their place in the armed forces of this country on active service overseas.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the leader of the opposition for the objective way in which he has dealt with this important question. I completely agree with the statement he made, and with the one that was made yesterday evening by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, to the effect that this is not a question which is to be determined on the basis of partisan politics or party interest. It is a question in which we are all interested, and our objective must be to do what is fair and just.

I again agree with my hon. friend that editorial comment does not necessarily indicate what public opinion is, although it is a fair indication of what a great many people feel. It was for that reason that I placed on Hansard yesterday evening a carefully-considered statement as to why I felt that an exemption from income tax for our armed forces was inequitable and unjust. I did not put it on the basis of administrative difficulties. At the end of my remarks, it is true, I referred to administrative difficulties, but

I expressly pointed out that this was not the important point, and that I was resting my case on the inequities and injustices created by such a system. As clearly as I could, I dealt with the history and with the reasons why I felt that it was unfair and unjust. I expressed the hope that those veterans who had had personal experience in the last war would give us the benefit of their views. I know that some have already done so. But I feel sure that the hon. member for Broadview could do so. He was of course a gallant officer; he had the benefit of these exemptions, and, by reason of the fact that he was an officer and fairly fortunately situated, would have received from that exemption substantial benefit, much greater benefit than the men serving under him. I myself never was in that position, but, speaking personally, I think I would feel uncomfortable.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Abbott: I am being perfectly sincere. It is easy to get cheap applause for urging something of this kind; but I am trying to do what the leader of the opposition did, namely, deal with the matter objectively.

I stated that I thought that blanket exemption for those serving overseas would be unfair. To take the case of the private who is in Korea today, as my hon. friend pointed out, his income tax liability is $6.85 a month if he is single. In the case of officers, of course, it is much higher. As against that he receives a tax-free foreign allowance now of $9 a month, which is in excess of his income tax liability.

The purpose of the resolution which is now before us, or the legislation which will be based upon it, is to provide that, as to service pay and allowances, if a man has no other income his total tax liability will be discharged by a special total deduction and he will not be even obliged to file an income tax return. Therefore the case which my hon. friend mentioned, that of trying to collect income tax from a soldier who had been killed, could not arise under those circumstances. Any liability which might exist would have been discharged as he went along.

After the most careful consideration, I have come to the conclusion which I have indicated, namely that of a blanket exemption for those who are serving overseas creates the most manifest inequities and injustices. It is for that reason that I am strongly opposed to it. I think that recognition of the service offered by our soldiers should take some other form than that of a blanket income tax exemption.

I suppose that one should not always argue by analogy, but I think there must be some reason, which is probably similar to the one I am putting forward now, why a similar practice should have been followed in the British forces and in the American forces. I am aware of the fact that we did it in the last war. Last night I indicated the historic sequence of events, how from time to time we had to amend it, and the difficulties that we got into in doing it. Such a system might create incentive to keep people in the field rather than back at headquarters; but honestly, from the best consideration I have been able to give to it, that is the only justification I can see.

If we look at this thing objectively and dispassionately, and try to disabuse our minds of the admittedly strong emotional appeal of an exemption of this kind, I would hope that we would come to the conclusion that there should not be any over-all blanket exemption such as is suggested, but that such recognition as may be appropriate should take the form, as it does now in the case of other ranks in Korea, of a tax-free foreign allowance. I would hope that those who have had personal experience in the last war—and I did not have it, although I had a bit of experience by being in touch with it through my association with the Department of Finance during that period—would give me the benefit of their views as to how it worked out and whether they honestly, sincerely and conscientiously believe that it was a fair system.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister permit a question before he sits down?

Mr. Abbott: I should be happy to do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister mentioned a blanket exemption.

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is there any reason why there should not be an exemption of those who serve, not in the nature of a blanket exemption but one to cover pay and allowances in the same way that we as members of parliament are exempt to the extent of $2,000?

Mr. Abbott: That is what existed. I am sorry if I misled by hon. friend.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister mentioned a blanket exemption.

Mr. Abbott: All service pay and allowances were exempt. I can give an example—I will not take anyone in the chamber. There is a friend of mine in Montreal who was in one of the high brackets. I think ninety-six per cent of his top dollar was taken in taxes. His rank during the war was that of major. The exemption which he got through serving overseas meant that he got virtually his whole pay, whereas if he had not had that exemption, a substantial amount would have been taken in taxes. It is perfectly obvious that a man benefits who either has high service income or high outside income. There is administrative difficulty but I do not consider that the administrative difficulty is the only thing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the reason the minister gave.

Mr. Abbott: I said that last night. I do not know whether my hon. friend read what I said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, I read it.

Mr. Abbott: It was a statement that I tried to make as comprehensive as I could. I set out the history in detail. We had fellows flying into an income tax free position and floating into an income tax free position. I would hate to be thrown back into that sort of situation again. I am sure that the committee will appreciate the fact that the revenue implications of this suggestion are relatively negligible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

Mr. Abbott: The suggestion that I have been hinting at, that is, of some form of combat pay or foreign service pay, would probably be considerably more expensive from the point of view of the treasury. But I suggest that it would be infinitely fairer than this haphazard impact of a general exemption of service pay and allowances, either for overseas service or otherwise. It is for that reason that I urge that all members consider this matter carefully. I should like to suggest that we do not attempt to decide it on this resolution. In this resolution I am providing for the authorizing of a simplified form of income tax liability for all service personnel who are serving in Canada or abroad. But that does not preclude another provision to the effect that they shall be entirely exempt.

The consideration I have given to the matter up to the present time will not enable me to conclude that the fair and proper thing to do would be to revert to the practice which we followed in the last war. Now, perhaps views may be put forward which will persuade me that that is wrong. I am not under any illusions as to what the easy course to follow would be. The easy thing to do would be simply to follow the practice which prevailed in the last war. I am sure that hon. members will give me credit for believing that the view which I am putting forward is not with the object of gaining any immediate popularity. While I may be mistaken, it is put forward because I believe it is in the best interests of the servicemen themselves and the taxpayers as a whole.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Certainly anyone would be impressed by the dispassionate way in which the leader of the opposition and the Minister of Finance have discussed this matter. However, as an example of the unfairness of granting a general blanket exemption the minister mentioned an officer who had a private income. My suggestion to him was that so far as service pay and allowances are concerned, they should be exempt. Certainly there is not much at stake from a monetary standpoint. If the entire force in Korea today were taxed the total amount would not exceed $1 million.

Some time ago the Minister of National Defence gave as his reason why the system that was followed during the last war could not be followed at this time, that a brigadier overseas, with a large income, would be exempt from income tax. That argument is not a very powerful one. The brigadier would pay approximately $120 a month in income tax.

Mr. Abbott: It would be $142.90.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was just figuring it out roughly. It is $142.90 for one brigadier. How many colonels are there?

Mr. Fulton: Four. The colonel's tax is $97.35.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, the number of officers over the rank of lieutenant would not be very large. The position there is that the many who receive the small rate of pay of $2.35 a day, the privates, and beyond that of course the non-commissioned officers, would have to pay tax in order to prevent the senior officers from escaping the payment of tax. Looking at the situation from the broadest standpoint, and aside from any sentimental consideration at all, the people of Canada as a whole ask that this exemption be given. Generally speaking, I think that members in all parts of the house—I know of no exceptions, although there may be some—are in support of the idea, as are the people generally.

I feel that even though the minister has rather categorically closed the door to consideration, the desires of the people of the country as a whole should be effectuated. There may be difficulties in administration.

Mr. Abbott: Not serious.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not serious difficulties?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then, if there are no serious difficulties in administration—

Mr. Abbott: There are inequities and injustices, not difficulties in administration.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If there are no difficulties in administration—

Mr. Abbott: No serious difficulties.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No serious difficulties; I took it from what the Minister of National Defence said the other day that there were, and the only reason is that it might create inequities. If that is so, then I feel that that of itself is not sufficient, because after all, the only reason for objection to inequities is that they are felt by others. I know of no person in this country who would feel it was inequitable to allow those who serve to be exempt from income tax on their pay and allowances—and I refer to those who serve today in Korea.

Members of parliament have an exemption of $2,000 a year. I know there are some who regard that as inequitable, but I know of no one who would say that an exemption to the men who serve in Korea would be inequitable. Let me give you an example. In the Department of External Affairs we have on foreign service many competent officials. They pay income tax on their income, but they do not pay on their allowances. The result has been that in recent years, while the pay has not gone up, the allowances have mounted. I ask any hon. member to look at the record of public accounts for 1950 at page E-20. These allowances are substantial. While I do not suggest to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the allowances have increased as a form of indirect exemption, the fact remains that they have materially increased in recent years.

I am just reading indiscriminately from these allowances. I am not speaking of the salaries of $16,000 a year and so on. Allowances, $13,092, $15,366, $15,000, $12,192, $23,592, $13,836, $13,992, $16,092. I pick out the larger ones as well as the smaller ones—$10,092, $12,792, $25,320, $12,552, $14,892, $13,536. The last one on the list is Pakistan, and it is the last one I gave. No one has suggested that these allowances are inequitable. In addition to these allowances the recipients receive removal expenses, travelling expenses and the like. These allowances are given in part because the officer on foreign service, as the leader of the opposition said, does not enjoy the benefits that his taxation would grant to him were he within this country.

I do not want to engage in any sentimental discussion. I went to the reading room about a week ago and I read the editorial comment across the country, in publications of different political persuasions, and without exception the general demand that was voiced was for the granting of this exemption. For instance, here is what the Windsor Star said in an editorial on May 14:

> Making it worse.
> The federal government's arguments against income tax exemptions for service men on overseas duty are going from bad to worse.
> The latest, offered by Defence Minister Brooke Claxton, is that it's difficult to devise a system of exemptions that would be fair to all concerned. By way of example he said that if the forces overseas were relieved of all income tax liability, a major general would gain $172.30 a month and a first-class private only $6.85.
> But a major general is at the divisional command level, and for every officer of that rank there are about 10,000 privates. Does this mean that to keep one major general from saving $172.30 a month in tax, the department is willing to nick the privates for $68,500?
> As it happens, we haven't a major general in Korea, nor are we likely to have one there or in Europe for some time. Our highest officer in Korea is a brigadier. Are 6,000 or 7,000 privates to be clipped for $6.85 a month each, therefore, just to keep one brigadier from saving about $120?
> Our financial wizards in Ottawa should come down to earth.

That represents the general viewpoint today. The minister has stated that it is not a question of administrative difficulty; it is the inequities or anomalous conditions that would be created. There would be no anomalous condition or inequity created if the pay and allowances were exempted. A person with a private income would make out his income tax return the way we do, and on top of page 2, I think it is, he would show as an exemption his pay and allowances from the armed forces the same way as we show our $2,000 allowance.

The inequity is caused by a few people having the idea that they are being discriminated aganst, that something unfair is being done. I cannot think of anyone in this country who would consider that an inequity was being created by exempting the pay and allowances of those who are serving in the armed forces. I hope the minister will have his officials look into this matter. It is little things like this that, while unimportant—the minister says it is only a matter of $1 million of revenue—undermine morale. It is this kind of thing that causes a feeling of resentment. It is this kind of thing that, as we all know, whether we sit to the right or the left of the Speaker, creates those pinpricks, those difficulties that so often undermine spirit and morale.

Mr. Abbott: As the hon. member suggests, I shall give consideration to all the views that are voiced today. But in order to keep the record straight I should like to point out that under the Income Tax Act the allowances of our diplomatic officials who are serving abroad are subject to exemption, and the same exemption applies to members of the military or air forces of Canada who are serving abroad and who are receiving allowances.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, we in this group strongly support the suggestion that the pay and allowances of men in the armed services fighting overseas should be exempt from income tax. To my mind there is something revolting about the idea that a man who is fighting for his country and who may be called upon any day to make the supreme sacrifice should also be required to contribute toward the financial cost of the war. Surely his sacrifices should be regarded as full payment on his part toward the cost of the war without his being required to make any other financial contribution.

We must remember that these men when they come back, if they are lucky enough to come back, will be required, by means of taxation in the years to follow, to contribute toward the cost of the war they have fought. Yesterday the minister mentioned the fact that there is no income tax exemption in Great Britain and the United States for men of the armed services. Surely the minister would not say that he supports everything that is done by the governments of Great Britain and the United States?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know of any country where complete exemptions are allowed.

Mr. Quelch: The minister must be aware of the fact that in Great Britain and the United States there is compulsory military service. Canada and Iceland are the only two countries that have not compulsory military service. There is a big difference between a country that has compulsory military service and a country that has a voluntary system.

If we had in this country a compulsory system whereby every man would have to go into the armed services at the age of eighteen years, we would be spreading the burden equitably across the whole country. But where you have a voluntary system there is no equality of service and sacrifice. In some cases whole families are wiped out. I know a case in the last war where five or six sons in a family were wiped out. That is not equality of sacrifice. I do not think the minister is making a fair comparison when he compares Canada, where there is voluntary service, with countries having compulsory service.

Mr. Abbott: We had compulsory service in the last war.

Mr. Quelch: The minister is aware of the fact that it is highly desirable that during his term of service a soldier should save as much money as possible toward the day when he must re-establish himself. The minister knows that the benefits granted by the veterans legislation are not sufficient to re-establish these men. The minister knows also that, judging from what has happened in the past, the veteran is usually discharged in a period of inflation during which he must face the added difficulty of re-establishing himself when prices are high.

While we have the dependents allowance board, many soldiers serving overseas are having to make substantial contributions toward the upkeep of their family made necessary by the high cost of living. Yesterday the minister gave a number of reasons why he thought exemption should not be granted to the members of the armed services.

Mr. Abbott: Is the hon. member advocating a general exemption for members of the armed services, or only for those serving in some foreign theatre?

Mr. Quelch: For those serving overseas. The minister referred to senior officers and stated that the benefits they would receive would be so much greater than those received by the men in the ranks. The minister has dealt with that point himself and shown how that difficulty was overcome in the last war. As reported on page 3152 of Hansard of May 17, he said:

> Any single member of the armed forces with an income of less than $1,600 was exempt, and married members were exempt at higher amounts. In addition a complicated tax credit formula was employed to gradually increase the tax above those exemptions until the full rate of tax was paid.

We could give the men in the ranks an exemption of $2,000 in the case of single men and $3,000 in the case of married men, and then steeply graduate the income tax above that so that the officers in the higher ranks would be paying the full amount of the tax.

The minister referred also to the difficulty of deciding who would benefit. That is a problem that is faced by the Department of Veterans Affairs in all their legislation. In every act it has been necessary to define just what type of veteran will benefit. For instance, under the War Veterans Allowance Act the beneficiary is the man who saw service in a theatre of real warfare. Under the Veterans Land Act the beneficiary is the man who saw service overseas or who served twelve months in Canada. I presume that if exemptions are granted from income tax the eligibility will have to be defined carefully, but it should not present any greater problem for the minister than has been presented in the veterans legislation.

I should like to say once again that we must realize that the men who are fighting our battles today are paying their full share of the war; therefore it would not be fair to ask them to pay income tax, because in doing so they would be bearing a double share.

Mr. Wright: On behalf of this group I should like to express our support for the idea that the men serving in Korea should be exempt from income tax. I am pleased that the discussion has been kept on a non-political basis, and that we are discussing the question in a straightforward manner in an effort to find a solution. I am sure that the minister is as anxious as we are on this side of the house to do the best possible. I do not think the administrative difficulty is such that it cannot be overcome.

Mr. Abbott: Not insurmountable. I have said time and time again there is no insurmountable administrative difficulty.

Mr. Wright: Then the only basis on which you can argue that you should continue the tax is that inequities might arise if the tax were not left in effect. I think that can be overcome. It is true that there were many difficulties during the last war when our troops were serving in a great many theatres. There were many different types of cases that had to be dealt with, but at the present time that is not so. We are only fighting in one theatre of war, and it seems to me that the difficulty experienced in the last war would be much less today. If the minister thinks there would be inequities between senior officers and privates at the present time, may I point out that there are very few senior officers involved, and therefore that is not an argument at all.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend appreciates what I said, that it is not only the inequity between officer and private but between one soldier and another.

Mr. Wright: If that is the obstacle, then I think the way to avoid it is to give an exemption of $1,000 on the pay of men in combat service overseas. You do that for men over sixty-five years of age. You give them an additional $500 exemption. If an additional exemption of $1,000 were given on the pay and allowances of men in combat service then that would take care of practically all ranks below that of captain. From every point of view that one can look at the matter it seems to me that something should be done at this time. I have read the newspapers, and I have not seen one organization expressing an opinion on this matter that has not asked the government to give consideration to exempting these men. The minister admits that there are no administrative difficulties.

Mr. Abbott: I did not say there were none. I said there were no insurmountable difficulties.

Mr. Wright: No insurmountable difficulties. There have been difficulties in the application of all income taxes ever since 1940 when we started to raise income tax levels. We have had to make amendments to the act to do away with inequities and to make it fairer. Therefore it does not seem to me that is a sound argument at this time. I urge the minister to give serious consideration to granting an exemption of at least $1,000 on the pay of men serving in active combat service for this country at the present time. As the hon member for Lake Centre indicated, it is the little pinpricks that very often carry more weight than something much more important. If it is possible to avoid them I think we should.

Mr. Fair: Having brought this matter to the attention of the government on at least three other occasions, I feel compelled to again voice my support at this time because I believe the minister is perhaps softening up somewhat and will make the necessary change to meet the wishes of members of the house.

Paragraph 4 of the resolution reads:

> That the governor in council be authorized to make regulations under which the income tax of members of the armed forces on their service income will be paid in full in respect of the pay and allowances of each pay period by a deduction therefrom in accordance with a special table subject to the right of any member to file a return on an annual basis.

Right from the start I have resented the principle of taxing men who are fighting overseas. A reading of this particular section makes me feel all the more resentful of the implications contained therein. The hon. member for Acadia has put the position very well. I feel that by giving single men an exemption of $2,000 and married men an exemption of $3,000 we would get away from quite a few of the inequities involved in this proposition. Last night the Minister of Finance suggested giving additional foreign service pay. In my opinion that is another way of passing the buck to the Minister of National Defence, and if this legislation is passed he will again throw it back to the Minister of Finance. By doing what has been suggested by the hon. member for Acadia, the pay and allowances of those in the higher pay brackets would be adequately taken care of. I think there is something the matter with the principle of this legislation and I should like to see it corrected before it is passed.

Mr. MacDougall: I had not anticipated participating in this debate, but I feel that the minister has given a very clear-cut statement with respect to the inequalities that would arise from the adoption of the program now being supported by the opposition. I should like to go back to the years of the first world war. As the hon. member for Lake Centre has stated, the pay is now more than 100 per cent greater than what it was from 1914 to 1918.

Mr. Fulton: So is the income tax.

Mr. MacDougall: It is very difficult for any member of the house to prevent himself from rising to speak on a question which by and large may be viewed at the moment as a popular one to support. It has been stated —and I recognize the truthfulness thereof— that there has been more or less of an uproar in the editorials of various newspapers across Canada with respect to this particular tax. If we look back I think we will find many instances in the past where for the moment a particular topic was popular with a great number of people, and to get up and kick about it was the popular thing to do. It is very hard for a person to resist doing that at this time. However, I think that we should look at this matter objectively, as the minister has stated. I have talked, as other hon. members have, with a great number of men serving not only in Canada but also in Korea. It has been stated during the debate that at the present time we have no major generals serving in Korea. That is quite true, but we unquestionably have a large and ever-increasing number of higher officers in the service. I do not think for a moment those to whom I have spoken would strenuously object to the payment of income tax. When we went overseas in the first world war there was no question of income tax, of course, because it was not in existence then; but neither was there in the minds of any of those who went overseas at that time any question of social security while they were serving or when they returned.

These are matters we should keep in mind. I believe the government made a mistake when they exempted $2,000 of a member's indemnity from the payment of income tax. I believe that, otherwise I would not be on my feet now. As lawmakers for Canada I think we should be taxed on our entire indemnity. Whether or not that indemnity is too low is another question, but I do not believe we should have an exemption, because we set a very poor example to the electorate throughout Canada. There are plenty of people in this country today on fixed incomes who will be in a very poor position to pay the income tax they will be charged. It is true that they may not go on active service either now or in the years to come, though there are thousands of such people who are preparing for active service or going on service today, to whom the income tax does not mean tuppence. I believe, and I would be prepared to maintain my stand before the various returned organizations of this country, that these people do not wish any particular preference. They want to serve their country in the way they can serve it best. Fundamentally it is a question of service to the country on the part of those men now in the active services, and the women who will be enlisted under plans which have been announced. They are desirous of giving something to the country, not of getting something from the country. So I sincerely and honestly believe there is not nor will there be any great resentment in the armed services of this country as a result of the imposition of income tax.

The Minister of Finance has stated that there would be no insurmountable difficulties with respect to the administration and collection of that tax. I do not wish to disagree with him, but I think because of his kindliness he may have minimized those potential difficulties as much as possible. We have an increasing number of men serving in various parts of Canada, and who will be serving in Europe and in Korea. We have stepped up our program with respect to technical personnel. We know that plans being followed today may be completely outmoded two or three months from now. As a result we may have large numbers of men being transferred from Korea to Canada or from Canada to the United Kingdom or from the United Kingdom back to Canada. I believe the difficulties that would arise because of that constant shifting of personnel would be very great.

As far as pay is concerned, as I have said the ordinary man in the ranks will never become a millionaire; but the fact remains that he is getting over 100 per cent more than we got in the first world war. I really believe the great majority of those in our armed services today will not resent the imposition of income tax at all. Rather I believe they will welcome it, because they want to see our whole defence program speeded up and they know the money taken from them in that way will increase rather than lessen the ability of this country to give them the necessary equipment in the shortest time possible, so that in the words of Winston Spencer Churchill they may be able to go on and finish the job. I do believe that with respect to this question of income tax we should completely divorce our thoughts from an appeal which may be popular for the moment. I am sure those in the armed services are not anxious that their stay in foreign lands should be prolonged, and the contributions they make in this way, small though they may be, will give them confidence that they will be able to conduct the war against the present enemy, and against any future enemy, to a successful conclusion so they may return to their homes and loved ones as soon as possible.

The hon. member for Lake Centre quoted a number of figures showing the allowances made to those in the foreign service. I am rather inclined to believe that those allowances may be out of proportion, though I do not know; I have not gone into the question. It seems to me, however, that the soundest way to look at this proposition is to realize that whatever our contribution may be by way of taxes, that money is going to assure victory and peace; to think of what we as Canadians are going to have after the money has been spent, and what would be our situation if the money to carry forward our preparedness program was not forthcoming. The alternative could quite easily be defeat. I cannot help but think of the words of the president of France who honoured us with a visit not long ago, and who said it was not so much a matter of the cost as long as the result was peace. I believe those words would be repeated by thousands of our fighting men, no matter where they are. The things they want are the tools of war. They want the war prosecuted with thoroughness and effectiveness. They want to have the most modern arms and equipment. It is our duty as legislators of the Dominion of Canada, Mr. Chairman, to keep our eye constantly fixed on the goal, and to see that these men are given just that. We can best do it by the quickest consummation of our whole program with respect to taxation, and our program to prevent aggression, in order that victory may result and peace be assured.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, while listening to the last speaker I felt sorry that he had not paid some attention to the tone set by the Minister of Finance in this debate. The minister correctly said that this is not a political issue. This is a matter in which all members of this house are equally concerned, and for which they are trying to find a solution in the best interests of the men about whom we are speaking. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard certainly got away from that. His case was very weak. He took the advice I have heard given by some of the ministers of the church here: when your case is weak holler very loud. He did not have much of a case, and I am sure everyone could hear him. This is not a popular issue, but is an honest endeavour by everyone who has spoken to find the best solution. I do not think the hon. member contributed very much towards the solution.

I listened to the minister's statement, and then I read it over very carefully. I agree with most of what he said He definitely came to the committee and said: this is a problem; I do not think I have the solution. He posed the problem for us. Solutions have been offered, and I think some of them are workable. I agree with the minister that a blanket exemption is not the thing. I believe that the method which would cause the least administrative difficulty, and which would relieve the people we are thinking about, is to grant another $1,000 exemption. The hon. member said that the $6.85 received by a private who is sleeping in a foxhole in Korea would buy a lot of equipment for him, but that does not mean very much to the private.

Mr. MacDougall: Will the hon. member repeat that? I did not hear it.

Mr. Gillis: To the private soldier this $6.85 is a lot of money. It represents a lot of beer. I know it means a lot to the private, because I have gone through the experience. When you go into a canteen without that $6.85 it is not so nice. That is the fellow I am concerned about, the fellow getting the $6.85 monthly tax. I should like the minister to consider granting another $1,000 exemption which would take most of these people we are worrying about out of the tax brackets altogether. Everyone concerned would get relief to the extent of the extra $1,000 exemption. The brigadier and the lower ranking officers would get that bit of relief, and they would be grateful for it. The department would not lose very much in taxes from the top group, but it would completely relieve those in the lower brackets; that is the $6.85 tax a month chaps, the men who do most of the fighting. The other fellow just directs it. I believe this extra $1,000 exemption would get us over the difficulty.

I do not believe combat pay is the answer. I think that is an excuse which has been set up. This combat pay arrangement creates more administrative difficulties. You have to have an extra staff to decide who is a combat soldier and who is not, who should receive the exemption. Then, the department takes it back in taxes. There is no doubt in my mind that the tax department will find a way of getting back that combat pay. I am not saying the minister will do that, but there are people behind him who are rather adept at getting back as much as possible. I do not feel combat pay is the answer. I believe it creates a lot of administrative headaches. Now we know who are in Korea, and we have them on the tax rolls. We could do as we have already done on two occasions. I want the member for Vancouver-Burrard to note this carefully. A tax exemption was granted to corporations under $10,000 in that the surcharge did not apply, and then there was a special exemption of $500 for men over sixty-five years of age. This exemption business is not new. It would be a simple matter to write in that additional exemption of $1,000, and in my opinion it will take care of the problem.

The hon. member made another point that is not germane to this discussion at all. I do not know why he dragged it in, but he mentioned the $2,000 exemption granted to members. Anyone in this house who feels that he cannot use that or who feels he is doing anyone an injustice by getting it, can return it or can declare it as taxable income. He can pay taxes on it. Sometime someone is going to raise that question in this house and give it a real analysis. I consider that the members of parliament who sat here all during the war—many of them lost a lot of money—were the greatest suckers in Canada. They fought for everybody in the country. Everyone got tax relief for the amount of money he spent in earning his income, that is everyone except members of parliament. A lot of members went into debt to the extent of $2,000 or $3,000 a year in order to stay here. I have never felt a bit reluctant about taking it. I considered I was entitled to it. Sometime this question has to be opened up, but I have not any intention of doing so now. I would suggest that any hon. member of this house who feels as the member for Vancouver-Burrard indicated, that it is a wrong thing to do, should return the money or pay taxes on it.

Mr. MacDougall: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I did not say anything of the kind. The hon. member is misinterpreting what I said. I did say this, and I maintain it, that as legislators of the Dominion of Canada we should not be the ones to place exemptions on our own salaries. I did not say that we are not entitled to it. I believe we are entitled to that and more.

Mr. Gillis: I am not going to argue with the hon. member, but I am glad he came around to my way of thinking.

Mr. Abbott: We are going to forget the soldiers pretty soon.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to leave the idea of that $1,000 exemption with the minister. Will the minister say whether the soldier in the field receives a living allowance—I think it amounted to $1.37 in the last war and was called a field allowance—and is that allowance included in his income for tax purposes?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know about field allowances. I am told that a married man receives what is known as a separation allowance if he is serving away from home. That is tax exempt. This foreign allowance to which I referred a bit earlier, which in the case of a private is $9, is also exempt. I know that these two are exempt, but whether or not there are other allowances I do not know. In the case of a man in the ranks it is $39, plus $15 for children. I am told that as much as $87 is paid in the case of a lieutenant general.

Mr. Fulton: I think what the hon. member for Cape Breton South had in mind was as to what was reckoned as the equivalent of meals and quarters which serving personnel would receive—I think that was calculated at something like $1.37 a day—or whether, as to those who pay tax in Canada on pay and allowances, their income from the services was reckoned including that amount which they were calculated to receive for meals and quarters, and that their total income was assessed on that basis. The question asked by the hon. member for Cape Breton South is whether the income of those who pay income tax today is calculated by including the value of their meals and quarters.

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid I am not too familiar with the present-day scale of pay and allowances; but I am informed that for the purpose of computing income tax, pay and allowances consist of basic pay of rank for officers, plus two-thirds of the allowances for rations and quarters. Then there is separation allowance when they are serving away from their families which is tax-exempt. But I will inform myself a little more fully as to the allowances.

Mr. Gibson: I should like to express to the minister for what it is worth my own personal comment. I think that the hon. member for Cape Breton South, when he was speaking, stated the problem well, and I must congratulate him on the way he did it. I am glad to see the attitude taken by the minister, by the leader of the opposition as well as by all those who have spoken in this debate. They have kept the discussion on a high, non-political plane. I would certainly hope that the minister would give the matter his consideration, and I know he will. I should like to see this $1,000 exemption taken into consideration.

Mr. Coldwell: Should the item not stand, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Abbott: No. Perhaps I might say at this point that I am glad to have had this discussion, and I am glad to have the views of all hon. members on this question. As I said at the beginning—and as others have said—I feel strongly, as I know we all do, that this matter should not be treated on the basis of party politics at all. I hope it will be settled on the basis of what is right and fair and not on the basis of emotion or sentiment. That is what I have been striving for, and I am sure that is what all hon. members have been striving for. I am sorry that so far most if not all of those who have spoken have been my fellow veterans of the first world war when we did not have any income tax problems. In considering the matter, I think we should project our minds a bit farther forward than Korea, as indicated by the hon. member for Melfort, because it is anticipated that we shall have troops serving in Europe as part of the integrated force; and I think we should give consideration to what may be the situation there.

As I have tried to indicate, this is far from being a simple problem. I too was impressed and interested in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South; and I am quite prepared to study that suggestion and all suggestions that have been made. I want to emphasize again the fact that this is not a matter of fundamental government policy. We want to do what is the right thing here, and what the members of the House of Commons, representing the Canadian people, want. But I want to be sure that there is full and adequate discussion of all sides of the thing so that, so far as possible, we do the right thing. I do not believe that what we did in the last war was the right thing; and that is the only reason that I have been attempting to put forward the suggestions which I have been putting forward.

If this meets with the approval of the committee, I would hope that we would pass this resolution as it stands. We have to bring in a bill. I shall be glad if any others who have views to express will voice them. We have not as large an attendance here this afternoon as we sometimes have. There may be others whose views on this question would be valuable. I should like to get the bill distributed and made available to members. But I am quite prepared to give an undertaking that if we come to the conclusion that some change is desirable, it can be made of course when we have under consideration the section of the bill relating to service pay. I think that is the practical way to deal with the matter.

I am quite sincere when I say that I am anxious to get just as many points of view on this thing as possible. It may be that a suggestion of some additional exemption, such as that made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, would overcome the difficulties in the putting in of a system of combat pay or foreign service pay. I should like to discuss that matter with my officials and with the service authorities, and see what the implications would be, before I attempt to take any firm decision on it. But that is my position. I want to do what is fair and just for the service personnel, and for the people of Canada as a whole. By the necessary discussion here, I think we can probably arrive at what that policy should be. But I deeply appreciate the tone that the debate has taken this afternoon. There has been nothing controversial in it, in the sense of party controversy; and I know that we can keep the discussion on that basis.

Mr. Fulton: Just in case the minister should attach any significance to what he pointed out as being the lack of expression of views by veterans—

Mr. Abbott: No, I did not.

Mr. Fulton: —may I say that I should have been glad to express my views, but I did not want to prolong the discussion because I am certainly in general support of the proposition put forward.

Mr. Abbott: We old soldiers have been doing a good deal of talking but have not had much experience with this.

Mr. Ferrie: I should like to say a few words with regard to this assessment, as you would call it, or the amount that a veteran will be assessed on. I agree that another $1,000 exemption would, to some extent, work all right. But on the other hand, why not take from him the assessment that you have made with regard to his board and his lodging? If you do that, then you take away practically the whole assessment from the Tommy himself; and he is the man who is earning $2.35 a day and his keep. Why add anything for his keep? Canada has guaranteed to keep him. If you take away that board and lodging, as you put it, when they are out by themselves, or if you exempt that, then the Tommy would not pay any income tax at all.

Mr. Abbott: I will give consideration to that suggestion.

Mr. Herridge: As one who is greatly interested in this question, I have been interested in this non-partisan debate this afternoon. I heartily support the proposals made with respect to further exemptions. I greatly appreciate the spirit in which the minister has accepted the proposals made from this side of the house.

Mr. Abbott: Thank you.

Mr. Goode: Before this discussion terminates, inasmuch as the minister has invited comments from the veterans of the last war, I think perhaps I could really express the view of some of the officers on both sides of the house, because I served in the barrack room up till towards the end of the war when I became a W.O. and perhaps heard what the officers were thinking about income tax. I give this suggestion to the minister. He has been good in this debate. He has given us an opportunity to speak. In fact, he has invited comment on this matter. I may tell him that the effect of this $6.85 on the morale of the barrack room will be most serious. That seems to me to be the important point, not whether a private soldier, or sergeant or W.O. should pay $6.85 or whatever the amount is. There is this fact to be considered. When you are sitting in a room or tent or hole, sometime you are going to start discussing this matter with someone else; and in the barrack room—as these things always are—the thing becomes magnified until you come to the end of the month and then the boys are all dissatisfied. That is not the way to do it. It is not just a matter of $6.85. It is a matter of morale. Do not charge those fellows $6.85 a month for income tax. You cannot do that and at the same time maintain morale; because some barrack room lawyer, talking to a bunch of privates during the week, is going to kick this thing in the face and you are going to have a lot of trouble. That is the important point, to my mind; not whether a private soldier has to pay tax, but whether he should pay it on the basis of morale. As I got up in the army a little bit I found out what officers think about income tax. I never did have much respect for second lieutenants and lieutenants, but so far as the ranks above that are concerned, I think they could well afford to pay their income tax. I am thinking of the lower ranks, and while, as the minister mentioned the other night, the W.O. I and W.O. II would not want to go up into commissioned rank, because of the payment of the tax, I have yet to see the W.O. who would not take a commission, especially in the army, even though he had to pay income tax.

Mr. Abbott: Even though it would cost him $200?

Mr. Goode: If they had offered me one in the army I would have taken it and paid income tax. I would suggest that whatever steps you have to take to ensure no income tax payment you should do it. I do not know whether you can or not, but in the interests of morale this $6.85 should not be taken from the non-commissioned ranks or the private soldier.

Paragraph agreed to.

5. That the right to elect to pay the 15 per cent tax on its undistributed income now enjoyed by a private company

(a) be extended to all other corporations, and

(b) be withdrawn, effective April 10, 1951, from a corporation that is controlled by another corporation except in respect of its undistributed income on hand at the end of the 1949 taxation year.

Mr. Fulton: Can the minister say whether it is possible to make this applicable to a corporation which had more than 75 shareholders, and which has gone into voluntary liquidation, and therefore was not qualified previously? Will that corporation be permitted to make distribution?

Mr. Abbott: Does my hon. friend know whether distribution has actually been made or not?

Mr. Fulton: Only partial distribution.

Mr. Abbott: Well, my hon friend is a prominent lawyer and knows that a corporation in liquidation retains its corporate status until the liquidation has been completed. I hesitate to give a legal opinion off the cuff —I am a little out of practice—but for what it may be worth I would think that, to the extent that profits were still undistributed, advantage could be taken of the amendment.

Mr. Fulton: That is—

Mr. Abbott: I do not guarantee the opinion; I am just giving it offhand.

Mr. Fulton: I wish the minister would ask his deputies to look into it to see if it will apply, because it does seem to me it would be unfair otherwise to put it in that way and not allow a corporation in the position in which it has undistributed income on hand to take advantage of this amendment. I can appreciate that there might be insuperable administration difficulties in applying it to that portion which has been distributed, but the legislation should be drafted to apply to the undistributed portion.

Mr. Abbott: Again with the necessary reservations, I do not believe there is any question as to undistributed income still on hand. I think advantage could be taken of this legislation.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not want to renew a discussion which was more or less closed last night, but I was not satisfied last evening with the minister's comparison between our method of taxation of corporations and those of the United Kingdom. I am no more interested in what is going on there than in the United States or elsewhere. I am not an expert regarding taxation, but I tried to get some information on this problem, and all I am doing this afternoon is to suggest to the minister in a brief, simple way just what I am informed is the type of legislation and methods of assessment for income tax on corporations in the two countries. Often this and similar matters are raised in this house either by ourselves or by somebody else. Last night I said, as reported at page 3148 of Hansard:

> The nation imposes an income tax of 9 shillings in the pound on what is left after the profits, taxes and the depreciation allowances have been deducted.

The minister said:

> The taxpayer takes credit for that.

I have here an extract from an official statement, and I shall read into the record from it. This is what it says:

> After the depreciation allowance is deducted from the gross profit, the net profit is left to the corporation. The corporation then decides how much of its net profit it will distribute and how much it will retain. The net profit is then taxed in the following ways:
> First, the nation takes 50 per cent of the profits which are to be distributed in dividends. Second, the nation takes 10 per cent of the amount which is to be put to reserve. Third, the nation takes, through income tax at 9s. 6d. in the pound, nearly half of what is left after the profits taxes and the depreciation allowance have been deducted. This is paid by the corporation. Fourth, the nation takes another 9s. 6d. in the pound income tax from the personal incomes of the shareholders as well as extra sums from those whose incomes are liable to surtax.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Coldwell: Reading that in conjunction with—

Mr. Abbott: Does my hon. friend want to complete that and add that in regard to the 9s. 6d. which is taken from the individual shareholder he can take credit for that on the amount which his company has paid out.

Mr. Coldwell: That is the point I want to raise.

Mr. Abbott: That is the English system, and always has been.

Mr. Coldwell: Now, as I say, I tried to make some inquiries regarding that, and my understanding is that the deductions which the minister said were allowed under the paragraph I have just read, and to which I have referred, refer—

Mr. Abbott: Which deduction is that?

Mr. Coldwell: The last 9s. 6d.

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: It refers to the 50 per cent tax that has already been—

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Coldwell: —paid by the corporations.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. Abbott: No; I had no relation to that at all.

Mr. Coldwell: As set forth in part I; no, I am saying that is my understanding. The third point was:

> The nation takes, through income tax at 9s. 6d. in the pound, nearly half of what is left after the profits taxes and the depreciation allowance have been deducted. This is paid by the corporation.

That is the one which the minister said the taxpayer subsequently takes credit for. My information is that the levy of 9s. 6d. in the pound is distinct and separate from the other 9s. 6d. and surtax, if any, payable by the individual taxpayer and in effect the allowance to the taxpayer is in connection with the 50 per cent of the profit distributed in dividend. That is the information I have.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is completely misinformed on that.

Mr. Coldwell: Coming to that point, in his budget speech of last year Sir Stafford Cripps made this statement:

> Some 55 per cent of all company profits are required for taxation; probably not less than half of what is left is used for new capital expenditure in one way or another; so that some three-quarters of the gross profits is already being utilized for essential economic purposes which otherwise we should have to finance in some other way: only a quarter goes to personal consumption, and even some of that may be subject to surtax.

That I believe was the amount of the corporation tax in Great Britain in 1950 and it is higher now. It works something like this.

Mr. Abbott: Will my hon. friend allow me? The income tax in Great Britain, and how it is levied, are a matter of fact. It is not a matter of opinion, it is a matter of fact and well known.

Mr. Coldwell: That is what I put on the record. I put the fact, an authoritative statement, on the record.

Mr. Abbott: I do not know who the author of your authoritative statement is, but the man in front of me is one of the greatest tax experts in this or in other countries.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not profess to be an income tax expert but I have tried to get the best advice I can on this matter. I am going to put that advice before the minister and he can tell me if it is wrong. I know that taking hypothetical cases is not always the best way to deal with a matter of this description, but I should like to take a hypothetical case of a British corporation having net profits of £100,000, after depreciation, half to be distributed in dividends and half retained. The 50 per cent tax on the one-half would amount to £25,000, and 10 per cent of £50,000 would be £5,000. That gives a total of £30,000, which would leave £70,000 in the hands of the corporation. As I understand it, the nine shillings sixpence tax on the £70,000 would amount to £33,000 in round figures, which would leave some £37,000 to be distributed. If that computation is correct the corporation would have paid £63,000 out of the £100,000, which would be 63 per cent.

Last night the minister said that we had a higher corporation tax. According to that computation based on a United Kingdom statement I would say that our corporations are still paying a lower percentage than the British corporations. I wanted to place that point before the minister and I would be glad to be corrected if I am wrong. As I say, I tried to get the best advice I could for income tax everywhere is very complicated.

Mr. Abbott: I appreciate that. I did not attempt to check my hon. friend as he went along, but I think his mathematics are substantially correct. They have not a straight corporation tax in the United Kingdom as we have here, they have a profits tax and on that portion of the profits which is set aside for distribution. The tax is now 50 per cent, with 10 per cent on the portion which is not to be distributed. As the hon. member mentioned in the case of the hypothetical company with profits of £100,000 after depreciation, if they decided to distribute £50,000 and keep £50,000, there would be £25,000 in tax on the £50,000 to be distributed and a tax of £5,000 on the other, which would make a total of £30,000, leaving £70,000. On that £70,000 the tax of nine shillings and sixpence would have to be paid at what is known as the standard or normal rate in the United Kingdom.

But under the British system, as distinguished from ours, that £70,000 when distributed to the taxpayers would be considered as already having been taxed to the extent of nine shillings sixpence in the pound. The shareholders would then take credit for the normal tax of nine shillings and sixpence which had already been paid by the corporation. Of course, the shareholders would have to pay whatever surtax might be levied.

The profits tax in the United Kingdom is completely analogous to our corporation tax. The corporation tax paid with respect to that £100,000 of income would be £30,000. In Canada today, using the same basis of computation, if it were in provinces other than Quebec or Ontario, the corporation taxes, federal and provincial, would be roughly £50,000 or £20,000 more than in the United Kingdom. The remaining available for dividends would then be taxed at whatever rate applied to the individual shareholder recipient.

I think that is a completely accurate statement or comparison of the impact of the Canadian corporation tax on the profits of £100,000 or $100,000, whichever you like, and the impact under the present United Kingdom scale. It is true that in the United Kingdom they have not in the past had a corporation tax like ours. They largely eliminated this double taxation system on corporate profits.

Mr. Gibson: Is it not true that there are some instances where the corporation and income tax amounts to more than 100 per cent?

Mr. Abbott: It so happens that with the 20 per cent surcharge we have imposed on personal incomes the rate of tax on the last dollar can be 100·8 per cent.

Mr. Gibson: Does that suit the C.C.F.?

Mr. Thatcher: There are a couple of questions I should like to ask. I wonder if the minister could tell us the revenue that he got in the past year from this tax and also the reasons for making these changes?

Mr. Abbott: I think the information to answer my hon. friend's first question is contained in the white paper, but the revenue was roughly $91 million. The reason for making the change is this: This was a new departure last year and we were not sure what the result might be in the case of publicly owned companies. If I remember correctly I think I indicated in the house that I was afraid that the announcement of this policy might result in some sort of market activity in the shares of publicly listed companies. As a result of the experience over the last year it has become clear to us that there is no reason for abuse. There are a good many closely held companies which nevertheless have shareholders in excess of 75 and it was thought to be eminently desirable to extend it to all classes of company and not make any distinction.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the reason for withdrawing the privilege or right from corporations that are controlled by other corporations?

Mr. Abbott: This change is necessary because a controlled corporation which has qualified for the special treatment of its earnings after 1949 may pay half its earnings out in dividends to its parent corporation free of tax and capitalize the portion remaining after payment of the 15 per cent in tax. If the parent corporation is in turn a controlled corporation it may pay out half the income so received in dividends to its parent free of tax and capitalize the portion remaining after paying 15 per cent in tax. This process could continue through a chain of corporations with the result that a substantial part of the earnings of the original corporation would be capitalized and bear only a 15 per cent tax instead of the tax they would have borne if received by individual shareholders as ordinary dividends. There were possible loopholes which we felt should be plugged.

Mr. Fulton: Did you find that you were losing revenue?

Mr. Abbott: We had inquiries which led us to suspect that someone might try it.

Mr. Adamson: The system of double taxation which we have in Canada is most unfortunate, to say the least, but it has been incorporated into our tax laws for a number of years and I do not suppose there is a great deal we can do about it. When does the cumulative tax on corporations in Canada increase over the cumulative tax on corporations in England? In other words, in England you have a 50 per cent tax, plus a five per cent tax—

Mr. Abbott: A 50 per cent tax on distributed and 10 per cent on undistributed.

Mr. Adamson: Then in Canada you have a tax of 40 per cent.

Mr. Abbott: Forty-five per cent.

Mr. Adamson: A 45 per cent tax on total profits.

Mr. Abbott: That is federal.

Mr. Adamson: Then on top of that the shareholder must pay income tax on the dividends he gets from the corporation.

Mr. Abbott: Right.

Mr. Adamson: At what income does the individual shareholder actually pay more? In other words, at what point does the government in Canada actually take more of the corporation profits than they do in England? There must be a point. Obviously at some point the government takes 100·8 per cent of the earnings of the company. There must be a point, and I think it would be interesting to the committee to know whether Canadian taxation is higher than United Kingdom taxation.

Mr. Abbott: I will have to study my hon. friend's question and see what answer I can give him. What I meant by the 100·8 per cent was that the highest bracket of the personal income tax now is 96 per cent plus a 4 per cent investment income surcharge. It is 20 per cent of 4 per cent. In effect if you are one of those relatively few fortunate individuals who have an income of $400,000 or more, on the income in excess of $400,000 you would pay out more than you received so that it would pay you to convert your securities into cash and not attempt to earn anything on them. That is why I indicated that in the revision of the rate schedule some consideration would have to be given to that fact. It illustrates the impact of horizontal surcharges in certain instances.

Mr. Knowles: To what base is that 4 per cent surcharge applied?

Mr. Adamson: I should like to know somebody in that class.

Mr. Abbott: It is on the investment income. Income in excess of a certain figure is taken to be investment income.

Mr. Fulton: $1,800.

Mr. Abbott: And the 20 per cent surcharge of course is on the 4 per cent as well as on the 96 per cent.

Mr. Adamson: I wish I knew somebody like that. I should like to shake his hand to see what it felt like. What I think the committee would be interested in knowing is whether the tax levied on corporation profits in Canada, the total taxes levied against the corporation and against the individual taxpayer, is actually higher than the same tax levied in the United Kingdom. In fact the taxes extracted from industry in Canada are enormously high despite the lesser schedules we have for individual income tax in Canada simply because of our double taxation.

Mr. Abbott: Of course to answer my hon. friend's question you would have to know the income bracket in which the individual recipient of the dividend happened to be, and what his other income was in order to compare it with the English company. You would have to know what proportion of its income was being distributed and what was being retained because there is a different rate for the two. However, speaking broadly, I think it is fair to say that corporation profits as such are taxed more highly in Canada and the United States than they are in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Adamson: That is the admission I wanted the minister to make, and I am delighted to have it.

Paragraph agreed to.

6. That for the 1951 and subsequent taxation years the provision under which the 15 per cent tax rate on the first $10,000 of income of a corporation applies to only one of several related corporations be amended so as not to include in the class of related corporations those controlled by persons not dealing at arms length unless such persons own shares in the capital stock of both corporations.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Abbott: Before my hon. friend makes his remarks, I should say that I have an amendment to correct a clerical error. The figure "1951" in line 1 should be "1949". I will ask one of my colleagues to move as follows:

That clause 6 of the income tax resolution be amended by substituting the figure 1949 for the figure 1951 in line 1.

It is purely a clerical error.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I so move.

Mr. Thatcher: Would the minister explain the significance of this?

Mr. Abbott: This is the section relating to related companies. The law now provides that only one of a group of related corporations may receive the benefit of the lower rate of 15 per cent on the first $10,000 of income. Corporations are considered to be related if 70 per cent or more of the common shares of each of them are owned by one person, or a group of persons, or by persons not dealing with each other at arm's length. By definition persons are not dealing with each other at arm's length if connected by blood relationship, marriage or adoption. As a result, under the law as it now stands a corporation owned by one brother in Montreal and a corporation owned by another brother in Vancouver have been considered to be related although they may each be carrying on an entirely different line of business and be separate in every way. It is proposed to relieve this situation by providing that corporations controlled by persons not dealing at arm's length be not considered as related unless one of the persons owns shares in the capital stock of both corporations.

Mr. Fulton: As it appears from a first reading of this paragraph, one would think that possibly the definition of related corporations was going to be made to depend upon the question of whether or not the same person owned shares in both companies. That is what it looks like here, and there is a question I should like to ask. Is there going to be any change in the definition so that if a person happens to own shares in both companies it will then make them related corporations as the result of the wording in this resolution?

Mr. Abbott: A person is not dealing at arm's length in that circumstance. We had a number of cases brought to our attention. I cited the example of the two brothers. I had one case brought to my attention of two brothers—and sometimes this happens in families—who were not even speaking to each other and had not for years. They were both in business with their own corporations. Under the definition contained in the act they were related corporations, and only one of them could get the benefit of the $10,000 exemption. Needless to say there was considerable difficulty in arriving at a decision as to who would get the benefit of the exemption. That was not the sort of thing that the law was intended to prevent. It is obvious that the restrictions are intended to prevent people splitting up larger businesses in order to get the benefit of the lower exemption. I think we have progressively improved the definition. This represents the result of a good deal of consideration and, I think, achieves an equitable result without involving any risk of tax evasion.

Mr. Fulton: Let me put the question I have for the minister by way of an example. The last three lines of the resolution read:

. . . so as not to include in the class of related corporations those controlled by persons not dealing at arm's length unless such persons own shares in the capital stock of both corporations.

At first it would seem that might widen the relationship as to when they would not be deemed to be related. However, let us take two companies that are not doing the same type of business but Mr. X happens to own one share in each corporation. Here you have a case of a person who owns a share of the capital stock of both corporations. The point I am worried about is whether it is going to be the result of this resolution that that fact will make them related corporations.

Mr. Abbott: I am not sure that I have followed my hon. friend quite as well as I should, but at present persons are deemed to be not dealing at arm's length if they are, as I said, connected by blood relationship, marriage or adoption. That excludes members who bear that relationship to each other. It excludes corporations in which those persons may be interested, and all of them. Therefore only one corporation owned by that family group would be eligible for exemption. As a result of the proposed amendment, if one brother owns all the shares in one company, another brother owns all the shares in another, the father owns the shares in a third, a sister owns the shares in a fourth, and another brother owns the shares in a fifth, they can all be considered as independent companies for the purpose of the $10,000 exemption provided none of them has any shares in any of the others. Have I made that clear?

Mr. Fulton: Then the other factor to determine whether the companies are related will be that one person must still own more than 70 per cent of the shares?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Fulton: That still stands?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct. It is a little complicated, I know.

Mr. Drew: As I understand it this expression of not being at arm's length is simply an acceptance of the proposition that where there is a member of the family in the other company there is a presumption that there is naturally some association because of that fact.

Mr. Abbott: That is exactly the position.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

7. That for the 1951 and subsequent taxation years, payments made for insulin, cortisone, adrenocorticotrophin (ACTH), liver extract injectible for pernicious anaemia and vitamin B12 for pernicious anaemia purchased under a physician's prescription may be included in the medical expenses for which a deduction from income may be made for the purpose of computing taxable income.

Mr. Applewhaite: I should like to try to make a point on this paragraph. Because of the evident desire of the committee to pass this resolution before six o'clock I would ask the minister to accept as read the deserved compliments on this extension. My point is that I understand the section being amended had as its original intention the protection of the taxpayer against being crippled financially owing to unexpected medical expenses. These medical expenses are quite closely restricted, whether by statute or by regulation I am not too sure. The point I tried to make a year ago and which I shall try to make again is that in some parts of this country, where people live at great distances from medical attention or hospitals, often the actual incidental expenses necessary to obtain medical attention are much higher in proportion than the medical expenses themselves. People may live where it would cost them $100, $200, $300 or more to make the return trip to obtain necessary medical attention, while on the other hand if they were able to get that attention quickly the cost of the medical service might be only one-sixth that amount.

It seems to me, therefore, an injustice that these people can get no credit as far as income tax goes for the amounts necessarily expended in order to obtain needed medical attention. I do not know whether this appeal should be addressed to the Minister of Finance or the Department of National Revenue. I will admit that there would be some difficulties in applying the principle which I am requesting. I will admit also that conceivably there might be cases where people desiring to go to the nearest city might try to take advantage of such a provision to finance their trip, though of course such people are not to be found in the riding of Skeena. So, if it cannot be done in connection with this year's budget, I would ask the minister once again to look into the possibility of giving a fair measure of relief to those people who must expend hundreds of dollars for medical attention, even though the whole expenditure is not made to a doctor or a hospital, but part of it is necessary in order to get to where treatment may be obtained.

Mr. Knowles: Like the hon. member for Skeena I heartily welcome the terms of the paragraph now before us. Also, I should like to add my word of support to the very reasonable request the hon. member for Skeena has made.

My main reason for rising just now is to express the hope that the minister will give further consideration to the whole question of the 4 per cent clause in respect of the exemption for medical expenses. I need not go into this matter at length, since I did just that on April 17 in a speech the minister can read at pages 2131 to 2138 of Hansard. The point I sought to make on that occasion was that medical expenses which are involuntary, and which often impose very heavy burdens, should get at least the same consideration as charitable contributions, which are voluntary. In the course of that speech I gave examples showing the tax relief to persons with certain incomes if they were faced with medical expenses, compared with the much larger tax relief they would get if they made charitable donations. I pointed out then that I do not disagree with the exemptions that are allowed for donations to approved charitable organizations, but it does seem to me the whole principle underlying this medical exemption requires that the government go a step further and put it on the same basis that is accorded to charitable donations.

I remind the minister that when this provision was first introduced the exemption applied only to medical expenses in excess of five per cent of one's net income. In those days we made pleas of this kind, and in due course Mr. Ilsley met us to the extent of reducing the figure from 5 per cent to 4 per cent; and that change was welcomed. I feel, however, the time has come to wipe out that figure altogether and allow all bona fide medical expenses as an exemption from net income before the tax is computed. The point raised by the hon. member for Skeena emphasizes the fact that many other items enter into the cost of sickness than those allowed by the statute. In the speech to which I referred, on April 17, I indicated some of those, and I need not repeat them now. I recognize that you cannot by statute include everything every person might say was part of the cost of sickness. Therefore it seems to me the government should help to meet the problem to the extent I have suggested by wiping out the 4 per cent figure and allowing all bona fide medical expenses to be deducted from the net income before the tax is computed.

Coming back to the specific subject of the paragraph before us, I am sure everyone in the house welcomes this decision to include a number of these expensive and important drugs as items that may be included in medical expenses. There are others some of us think should be included as well, but my study of the problem leads me to feel that the question I raised is even more important, namely that the 4 per cent level should be wiped out. I know from the interest the minister is showing in what I say that he has studied this matter. I dare to hope he read my speech—

Mr. Abbott: I did.

Mr. Knowles: —and I would be interested to hear his comments.

Mr. Abbott: I think I shall have to restrict myself at the moment to saying I shall give further consideration to my hon. friend's representations. One advantage of doing that is that I seem to have to open up this section every year; and with the persistence for which the hon. member is so justly noted I am quite sure he will keep this subject alive until possibly something further is done.

Mr. Knowles: I will.

Mr. Low: I wonder if the minister would answer this question with respect to the procedure to be followed. Under the regulations as they have existed up to the present time I understand that when such drugs as cortisone, ACTH and these others were purchased, they had to be obtained through a hospital or from a doctor before the purchaser was entitled to the exemption. Will that still be necessary?

Mr. Abbott: No, they can purchase them from a drug store on a prescription.

Mr. Low: That is fine. I just wanted to get that.

Mr. Higgins: I only want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Skeena. I wish to ask the minister whether at present streptomycin, penicillin and other antibiotics are included in these medical deductions?

Mr. Abbott: None of those are included, although if they were included in the doctor's bill or hospital bill they would be eligible. Most of them are available without prescription.

Mr. Higgins: I believe they should be included because they are as important as the others.

Mr. Abbott: We have been proceeding on these things year by year in consultation with the department of health and welfare. As my hon. friend will recall from last year, one of the difficulties is the ability to check the validity of the claim. But I will consider his representations. I think we will probably find that from year to year we will have to include more of these drugs.

Paragraph agreed to.

8. That special deductions from income to taxpayers whose principal business is the production, refining or marketing of petroleum or petroleum products or the exploring or drilling for oil or natural gas or mining or exploring for minerals, be allowed for expenses incurred in the 1954 operations on the same basis as for expenses incurred in the operations in the years 1951 to 1953.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I could say a brief word, Mr. Chairman, on this paragraph and the two succeeding ones. The amendments to be founded on these paragraphs will extend for another year the concessions now allowed for exploration expenses in the mining, oil and gas industry and will assure the exemption of the first three years of income of any new metalliferous or industrial mineral mine that comes into production before the end of 1954.

Mr. Gibson: It is a rather curious thing that the only natural resources receiving these special exemptions are oil, gas or mining and exploring for minerals. These commodities, of course, produce a great deal less revenue than the most important thing we have in Canada, our forest resources. I have been a rather patient soul, since I have been waiting for a number of years to hear that some consideration had been given to our forest resources. Always the government was considering this problem or giving it careful study. That has been going on for six years. While I know there have been many problems that the government has faced and solved in that time, I am afraid that they have put this forestry problem down at the bottom of the heap. Evidently they thought there was no necessity for giving it consideration.

As the minister will agree, our forests are our greatest source of revenue from a taxation point of view. They probably have the greatest potential value for the future. We are going to have forests today and forests tomorrow. I think we can guarantee that the minister is going to get a substantial part of his revenue from the forests as long as Canada is here. The way the matter stands now, a taxpayer can deduct his expenses so far as forestry and silviculture are concerned on the particular piece of property from which he is taking logs at the present time. No incentive at all is given to any of our great forestry corporations, large or small, to try to provide a supply of wood for the future. As a matter of fact, the government seems to have a negative approach to the whole question. They say, "Yes, we realize it is a desirable thing that forests be put on a sustained yield basis." But on the other hand, they do not give any encouragement at all to people to invest money in growing trees. I am wondering whether there is any possibility of the minister giving some definite consideration to this problem within the next year, with a view to encouraging people to invest their money in growing timber.

Actually, the government seems to feel that someone might make a capital profit out of growing trees. It is that negative approach that annoys me. The minister will say: It is desirable to grow trees; on the other hand, if we encourage anyone to grow trees he may make a capital profit and I would not get anything out of it.

I believe that is a negative approach to the matter. I think something should be done to encourage people to invest their money in the future timber of this country. We allow people to lay up treasure in heaven be permitting them to deduct their charitable donations up to ten per cent.

Mr. Abbott: Some avail themselves of the opportunity, and some do not.

Mr. Gibson: I think as most people get older they invest a greater part of their income in that way, because they are getting closer to the time when it might be of value to them. I would suggest the government should give consideration to allowing companies to invest say five per cent—I would not go as high as ten per cent by which they are allowed to lay up treasure in heaven—of their gross income for the practice of silviculture. That would limit it. I quite understand the difficulty with which the department is faced, but it does not seem to me there has been any constructive approach to this problem. We have not done anything about it. I sincerely hope the minister will give serious consideration to it this year.

Mr. Abbott: I do not know this of my own personal knowledge, Mr. Chairman, but I understand my colleague the Minister of Resources and Development is discussing the question which the member for Comox-Alberni has raised, not only with the provinces but with an interdepartmental committee he has formed in his department.

Mr. Low: It is an extremely important point.

Mr. Abbott: I agree it is a matter of considerable importance.

Mr. Herridge: It is not often I find myself in agreement with the member for Comox-Alberni on taxation proposals, but I believe this is an extremely constructive proposal. There is a great demand throughout the country for conservation, both on the part of the government and on the part of private timber owners. I believe it would be of much greater advantage to the country to allow a certain proportion of taxes to be used for silviculture, rather than to allow people to deduct from taxation the money they invest in developing mines which produce minerals that are not required at this time. I believe there is a more reasonable argument in favour of a tax allowance for those who are practising silviculture than there is in some cases of mineral production.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, I was happy to listen to other industries talk about this matter, and I may say I wish them well. I take exception to the statement just made that minerals are produced which are not required.

Mr. Gibson: Gold, for instance.

Mr. Adamson: We shall come to that next week, I hope. If there is anything this country needs today it is minerals, particularly metals that are in such desperate shortage throughout the free world. I notice that this measure merely extends for a period of one year the benefits, or the tax concessions, of previous years. In view of the increasing cost, and the increasing incidence of failures to discover mines as well as the lessening of prospecting throughout Canada, is the minister considering increasing these tax concessions? Has he had representations about this, and has he given any consideration to announcing the same concessions for a longer period than one year? In many cases it takes four or five, or possibly a great many more years, to bring even a most promising property into production. The raising of capital today is still a difficult matter.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend appreciates that this is a complete exemption. One can write off expenses entirely, and it is extended really for a period of three years. It is extended forward into 1953. Our practice has always been to give that much advance notice each year—in one case it goes to 1954. It has always been felt that it is desirable to review it each year, and that has been our practice for a number of years.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I believe the minister is quite justified in asking for an extension of this type of encouragement to prospecting. At the same time I believe the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has made a very important suggestion, and one which should be followed up. There is a much better case to be made for what he has proposed than there is for allowing certain income tax deductions for exploration preliminary to starting a gold mine on which the people of Canada have to start paying subsidies.

Mr. Abbott: This covers oil wells.

Mr. Low: Yes, it covers oil wells. Quite frankly, I think it has gone a long way to encourage exploration for gas and oil in my own province.

An hon. Member: That is real wealth.

Mr. Low: Yes, that is real wealth, of course; and you do not have to pay subsidies on that the minute you get the well started.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is liquid gold.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph 9 agreed to.

10. That the exemption of the income from a metalliferous or industrial mineral mine for the first three years of production now applicable to mines that came into production during the years 1946 to 1952 be extended to mines coming into production in the years 1953 and 1954.

Mr. Adamson: I cannot allow this comment about gold to go unanswered.

Mr. Abbott: We will have another debate on that subject.

Mr. Adamson: We are going to have a debate on that subject next week; but I want to tell the hon. member for Peace River and his entire party that gold is one of the most useful things we are producing today in Canada. When the minister comes to find what an adverse balance of trade we have with the United States at the end of this fiscal year, he will be wishing that the gold production in Canada was twice what it is today. But I reserve any further remarks on that matter until the debate on the gold bill.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO PERMIT PERFORMANCE OF SERVICES FOR DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 16, consideration in committee of Bill No. 284, to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act—Mr. Howe—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Minister.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Drew: Before clause 1 carries, I would remind the parliamentary assistant to the minister that there was a discussion taking place at the time the house rose when this bill was last under consideration. He will recall that the questions were directed to the relationship between the Department of National Defence, Department of Defence Production, the Canadian Commercial Corporation and Defence Construction Limited. The impression I gained from the explanation given by the minister, both on an earlier occasion and in the fairly brief remarks that were made a few days ago when this bill was last under discussion, was that the Canadian Commercial Corporation is diminishing its activities in relation to domestic contracts and is more and more becoming the agent through which contracts on behalf of foreign powers are executed.

Mr. McIlraith: That is right.

Mr. Drew: If that is so, I think there should be a statement that will clarify the position of this company in that respect so that we may know whether it is entirely divesting itself of responsibility for domestic contracts or only partially doing so; and also, if that is so, whether it is the Department of Defence Production or one of these other agencies which will assume the responsibility for domestic contracts.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I felt that the discussion, on the last day this measure was before the committee, got a bit away from the point and away from the legislation. The situation is that this corporation has ceased to carry on the wide functions it carried on last year and up until the end of the last fiscal year, as the procurement agency for the armed services. It is now left with the function of being a procurement agent for certain other countries, for their purchases in Canada in some fields; that is, the purchases may or may not go through this corporation.

For instance, as is well known, base metals are purchased in Canada by other countries directly from the companies concerned. But in other types of direct defence production, purchases would go through the Canadian Commercial Corporation. In order to illustrate just how sharp was the reduction, I indicated that the staff had been reduced from about 660 to about 40. Its function is as described by the leader of the opposition, namely, the purchasing agency for foreign governments in Canada.

There is one minor limitation on that description. Certain bulk purchases of one or two materials that may be made for Canadian account would continue to go through it. As hon. members will appreciate, I am referring to one or two strategic materials. They might be purchased through Canadian Commercial Corporation. But with that exception, there is no purchasing for the Canadian defence department through this corporation. I think that clarifies the point raised by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Drew: Without asking for a disclosure of the nature of the strategic materials—and I would concede that the nature of these strategic materials does not affect the point that I have in mind—will the parliamentary assistant indicate why it is desirable that strategic materials of that kind which are subject to domestic contract should be dealt with by the Canadian Commercial Corporation instead of through the Department of Defence Production, as in other cases?

Mr. McIlraith: Merely because some of them are bought in other countries and they may be under international allocation. By the very nature of the small number of these materials we are discussing, they are either bought in the main in foreign countries or, if they are bought in Canada, they relate to a distribution that may be of particular interest to our neighbouring country. In other words, it is not at all a matter of leaving in this corporation something that is ordinarily purchased for use by the armed forces. It is rather a matter of leaving this one small item there, because by the very nature of dealing with it, it is more or less international in its effect. I realize that I have not been quite as precise on that subject as I might wish to be; but I think hon. members will fully understand why.

Mr. Drew: In seeking to understand the reason for still continuing this function, it appeared to me that perhaps one of the reasons that the Canadian Commercial Corporation was to be continued as a corporate entity for the purpose of making certain of these contracts was the possibility that there might be certain desirable features in having contracts with foreign governments for certain types of supplies and armaments made by a corporation of this nature instead of between governments. Is that one of the reasons?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, that is so.

Mr. Drew: Just so that we shall have this relationship clear, am I to understand that the amendments that are now being made are mainly for the purpose of tidying up this act in relation to its remaining functions as an agent of the Department of Defence Production under the direction of the Minister of Defence Production in the negotiations of contracts on behalf of other governments, and as an agent in connection with strategic supplies, where those strategic supplies are being acquired in other countries, or where there may be some joint interest in the strategic supplies as between this country and some other country?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, that is quite correct. That is the correct view. The only section at all that involves a new principle is a very small section having to do with superannuation of employees. The others merely tidy up existing sections.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Purpose of the corporation.

Mr. Drew: In the case of clause 3, with the explanation that the assistant to the minister has given, I am mainly concerned with the extent of the powers conferred by section 3, paragraph (d). I would point out that the explanation that is given suggests—

Mr. McIlraith: What section?

Mr. Drew: Section 3 (d). It would add the following paragraph to the powers conferred on the corporation. It reads:

(d) to exercise any other powers or functions conferred upon it by any other act or for the exercise of which it may be employed under any other act.

Then I note in the explanatory notes on the opposite page the following:

These added paragraphs, conferring on the corporation the powers therein mentioned are inserted for two reasons: first, to replace part II of the present act being repealed by clause 7; and second, to resolve the legal doubt raised as to whether the corporation may exercise a power not included among its specified purposes.

I would point out that that is a very broad statement; because, if the corporation is exercising powers not included among its specified purposes when these are so widely stated, I should like to know the nature of the powers which are contemplated by such an amendment.

Mr. McIlraith: I think I can clear that up. It is a rather simple point, but purely technical. A doubt was raised as to whether this corporation would have the capacity to carry out powers that were authorized by another act to be given to it. It is one of those rather intricate legal arguments that I am not anxious to get into at the moment because it gets too refined.

The corporation was set up to perform the function we have been discussing. Then the question arose about its legal capacity to carry out functions provided for by other legislation. In other words, it was not a matter of what was legally authorized by legislation, but a matter of the capacity of this agent to carry out things as agent that are legally authorized by other legislation. I am quite frank to say that I do not know whether I agree with the legal doubt at all. The doubt was expressed. I quite frankly question the validity of the doubt. The doubt was raised.

Mr. Knowles: The doubt was doubtful.

Mr. McIlraith: The doubt was doubtful. That is precisely the difficulty. There was nothing beyond that involved.

Mr. Drew: This is exactly what I do want to know. Just what was the act to which this doubt referred, and what was the doubt?

Mr. McIlraith: I do not know that I can give a specific instance. In drafting this bill we had this situation. A question was raised, for instance, about what "minister" meant in the bill. Then there was a question about the pensions provision. We took any section where there had been any lack of clarity about what was intended, and had these amendments brought in at the same time. This amendment does not involve anything other than what was stated to be the capacity of the corporation when the corporation legislation was before the house. This is rather one of those technical things involving clarification of language. As I say, I do not know that I am prepared to say that the doubt raised was a valid one. I do not think I am prepared to go that far, but it had been raised. There is a similar situation in the next section. If you look back to the old debates you will find the section does precisely what it was stated was being done the last time the bill was up.

Mr. Knowles: It is six o'clock; there is no doubt about that.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

On the order for private bills:

Mr. J. W. Welbourn (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the unanimous consent of the house to move that Bill No. 269, to incorporate Independent Pipe Line Company, be dealt with as the first order of business at this time. I should like to stress to hon. members that this bill covers a matter of great urgency and importance, not only to the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia but to the Dominion of Canada as a whole.

There is at the present time a production of 205,000 barrels per day in Alberta. The Interprovincial pipe line can handle 95,000 barrels of oil, and the existing refineries in Alberta together with tank car shipments can look after approximately 55,000 barrels, leaving a surplus of 55,000 barrels which at the present time cannot be marketed owing to lack of transportation.

The Independent Pipe Line Company is an all-Canadian concern which is Canadian financed. If they are successful in obtaining a charter from the board of transport commissioners the line will be built by Canadian contractors using equipment owned and licensed to operate in Canada. The bill provides distinctly that an all-Canadian route will be followed. There is an estimated market in Vancouver and central British Columbia for from 45,000 to 55,000 barrels of oil per day. The line designed to be built by the Independent Pipe Line Company is designed to handle from 50,000 to 60,000 barrels per day, which can be raised to 125,000 barrels per day by the installation of additional pumping stations. For the second time I am asking unanimous consent to have this bill considered at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I cannot consent for reasons which I need not go into fully at this time. I might mention that there are five other bills before this particular bill, and in view of the large number of divorce bills before us, I think some of them should be disposed of first.

Mr. Speaker: Unless there is unanimous consent, I cannot put the motion.

Mr. Welbourn: May I say a further word?

Mr. Speaker: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Welbourn: I should like to say that I think that this bill is much more important than any provincial divorce bill.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is a negative vote, I cannot put the motion.

PRIVILEGE—MR. KNOWLES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I should like to raise a question of privilege. In the May 19 issue of The Ensign, a marked copy of which was sent to me, this paragraph appears on page two:

> Latest move by Stanley Knowles (C.C.F.—Winnipeg North Centre) to try and get divorce courts set up in Quebec and Newfoundland is his effort to have both houses of parliament deal with divorce suits from these provinces individually, instead of in batches as at present. Resulting delay, he hopes, might influence the provinces to set up their own courts.

Before I come to my question of privilege with reference to the report in The Ensign, may I also draw attention to a subheading to a Canadian Press story which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of May 16. The Canadian Press story was perfectly correct but the subheading read as follows:

> C.C.F. party insists Quebec cases be taken to courts of province.

My question of privilege with reference to the report in The Ensign and to the subheading in the Montreal Gazette is that both are incorrect in their suggestion that I want Quebec divorce cases transferred to courts inside the province of Quebec. I have read with interest many reports in newspapers in all parts of the country and I have heard radio broadcasts with respect to this matter and, except for these two instances, universally the point has been caught and made clear by the press and by radio reporters that what I am seeking support for in the house is that divorce cases should be transferred from parliament to a federal court here in the city of Ottawa.

I would point out further that not only is the suggestion that I want Quebec to set up divorce courts completely in error so far as my own wishes are concerned, but it could not be done. The British North America Act specifies that legislation respecting divorce is a federal matter. Quebec could not set up its own divorce courts if it wanted to. We all know that they do not want to. I for one am opposed to trying to force onto or into the province of Quebec, or the province of Newfoundland, any divorce courts. My whole claim is that these cases should be taken out of parliament and be dealt with in Ottawa by a federal court situated in this city.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. 114, for the relief of Paul Emile Piuze.—Mr. Winkler.

ANTONIO ROMEO

The house in committee on Bill No. 119, for the relief of Antonio Romeo—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to point out that this is a case where a child is concerned. This child appears to be in the custody of the father and husband who is seeking the divorce. The petitioner indicated before the Senate that at the present time the child is in a convent. It appears from the evidence that the guilty party is the wife. There is not much I want to say about this particular case. The story set out in this evidence is not recommended reading. However, having read it myself, I feel that this is another case that should have been dealt with in a court.

Mr. Hansell: I should like to make one comment. It very often strikes me, as it does in this particular case, that, while there may not be what is generally known as collusion among the principals involved, in this and many other cases there could be collusion between witnesses. I shall let the legal minds in the house battle the question through as to whether collusion between witnesses is permissible. However, I am under the impression that witnesses should be called separately not knowing the story that the other witness is going to tell. Too often in these cases, as in this case, the two investigators give evidence that sounds too much alike to me. If there was a slight difference here and there it would give more evidence that they were speaking the truth.

This is a rather sordid case. I think perhaps it should go through, but I should like to call the attention of the committee to a piece of evidence that the investigators gave which to me does not appear to hold water completely. As these investigators go into the room they find the door is not locked.

Mr. Winkler: What page?

Mr. Hansell: Page 10. That may or may not be particularly significant in the light of the fact that when they got in the room they found that this man and woman were very drunk. I have never been drunk in my life and I do not know what it feels like to be drunk,

An hon. Member: It would do you good.

An hon. Member: You should try it some time.

Mr. Hansell: I have seen a few people drunk, and it did not seem to me that they could talk in a very coherent manner. Nevertheless when the investigators talked to these two in the room they seemed to be able to answer the questions because they appeared to know all the answers in spite of the fact that they were very drunk. Judging the whole case as I see it, I am in favour of granting this application.

JAMES EDWARD THOMAS

The house in committee on Bill No. 120, for the relief of James Edward Thomas—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, there are a few particulars about this case of which I think the committee should be aware. In the first place it is noted that the petitioner is the husband and he is a private in the Canadian army. I am glad to note that the Senate committee recommended the remission of at least a part of the fees required in the other place in view of the difficult circumstances in which this man finds himself. It appears that there are two children, and that at the time the application was made before the Senate they were in the custody of the father and were staying with his mother. He indicated that the wife had access to visit them but of course he is supporting the children.

He said in the course of his evidence that he was not supporting his wife. If the evidence of adultery in this case is valid I certainly do not blame this man for not supporting his wife. Where is this place called Rawdon? It seems to have been the scene of the adultery, and I notice that it is named in a number of these cases as the place where the evidence is obtained. Again, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that parliament should be aware of the seriousness of the job that we are undertaking in dealing with these matters. This is indeed a sad case. This wife and mother has run out on her soldier husband and two children. Again it seems to me it is the kind of case that should have been dealt with in a court.

Mr. Knight: This is one of the cases in which I am interested because of the fact that there are children involved. One is four years of age and the other two. These little children are left to the mercy of people who were not able to get along in their marriage. That is an unsatisfactory situation, because no one knows who is to take care of them. In the meantime we are told they are in the custody of the mother of the father of the children, but that the wife who, according to the decision of the Senate, is the guilty party, also has access to them. I suggest to you, sir, that quite outside of the merits of the case there is a nasty situation. The two little children, one four and one two, are just getting to the stage where they can begin to recognize and love their parents. Yet nobody knows who owns them and nobody knows who is to take care of them. There will probably be another battle between the parents as to who will have custody of them.

That is one of the reasons why I suggested the other night that I thought it was a foolish procedure to have a court as at present constituted which, while it has the responsibility and the authority to dissolve a marriage, apparently deliberately takes the position, as I read in a case the other night, that it has no responsibility in the matter of the custody of children. So far as I am concerned, that is the main interest that I have in this and similar cases. I would say that in this case the home is already broken up irreparably, but there is one thing that can be done. The lives of these little children can be salvaged. I suggest that the method by which they can be salvaged is to have a properly constituted federal court under whose jurisdiction the business of such salvage would come. At the present time these little children are being sent from pillar to post without parents, without anybody, taking any interest in them.

I think the responsibility in this matter falls upon us. That is why I said the other night that, so far as I am concerned, if we are going to do this work we should do it carefully and well, from now on scrutinizing each case in the short time at our disposal. There is not much time available. It is a scramble to get the evidence read in time to be able to speak about it. I think we should resolve from now on that if the House of Commons is a divorce court we shall have to carry out our duty as best we can in view of the responsibility which we owe to the people who sent us here as well as to these parents and children. I am quite certain that the people who sent me here did not send me to be a judge in a divorce court.

Mr. Hansell: In this case I should like to point out something similar to what I pointed out the other evening in respect to another case, and I shall read a little of the evidence here. It is in respect to whether or not the marriage certificate issued by the officiating clergyman is proof of marriage. Mr. Phillips was the solicitor in this case and he asked the witness this question:

Q. I show you a marriage certificate giving the details of your marriage. Is that a true record of your marriage?

A. Yes, sir.

The Chairman: Who is that signed by, Vatcher?

Mr. Phillips: Yes, by the officiating minister.

The Chairman: You haven't one from the superior court?

There was no reply to that. The chairman then asked:

Q. This is the one you received from the minister at the time of the marriage?

A. Yes, sir.

The only evidence they had to prove this marriage was the certificate the clergyman had given them, and that is not usually accepted as proof of a marriage. The reason for that is that you can go to a book store and buy marriage certificates. You can tear marriage certificates out of family bibles. Such a certificate could be signed by Reverend John Smith of Timbuctoo and palmed off as a marriage certificate. The document that is proof of marriage is an abstract of the registration of that marriage; and the marriage is not registered until the official documents other than marriage certificates are made out and registered with the proper authorities in the various provinces. Upon the registration of that marriage one may obtain an abstract of that registration. That is accepted as proof of marriage, because the officiating clergyman signing the certificate must be licensed by the province.

I am not arguing against this case, for the reason that the wife of the man applying for the divorce testified herself, and on her evidence I believe the application should be granted. I just point out that an ordinary marriage certificate given by a clergyman is not necessarily legal proof that a couple are married.

MARY LOUISE WEBSTER HUNT

The house in committee on Bill No. 121, for the relief of Mary Louise Webster Hunt —Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the sponsor of this bill, the hon. member for Lisgar, can say how much time was spent on this case by the committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mf. Winkler: I believe this bill was dealt with in bulk with a number of others.

Mr. Knowles: I am not surprised at that answer, because that is the way most of them are dealt with as far as the committee on miscellaneous private bills is concerned. It is clear that the case was given fairly ample consideration in the Senate because the evidence runs to fifteen pages, which is a little more than the average of the books of evidence that come to our desks.

After reading this evidence I acknowledge the job the members of the Senate committee do. I have no quarrel with them and no reflection to cast upon the way they do their work. My whole point is that they should not be asked to do it, just as we should not be asked; and I am sure they would like, as we would, to be rid of the whole matter.

This case appears to be another of war's tragedies. This couple were married in 1937 and appear to have lived together quite happily for a number of years. They had one child. The husband enlisted and went overseas, and it appears that after a while his letters to his wife became infrequent and a bit unfriendly. She suspected that he must have formed another attachment overseas, but she had no evidence to that effect and it was her hope that their marriage was still intact. However, when he came back to Canada at the end of the war he got in touch with his wife and indicated that it was not his intention to live with her. It was not long after that before the wife lost all track of her husband, and she had to do her best to support herself and her child. As a matter of fact from the time he came home after the war until August, 1950, the husband did not contribute anything to the support of his child.

Sometime before 1950 this wife learned that her husband was living in Belleville, Ontario, with another woman. Indeed the information that reached her was that he and the other woman had another child and that they were living together in Belleville as a family. On learning that, this lady took steps to obtain a divorce from her husband. Before doing so she had applied to the Ontario courts at Belleville and obtained an order compelling this man to pay $25 a month for the support of his child. I am wondering just what happens to that court order once this divorce goes through. I do not find anything in the evidence to indicate what will happen to it, but in the absence of any question being raised by the senators who made up this committee I dare to hope that this man will be required to continue that payment of $25 a month for the support of his child.

To get back to the story of what this soldier did after he got back to Canada, as I say he got in touch with his wife and indicated that he did not wish to live with her any more. Later it appears that he was instrumental in persuading the Canadian immigration authorities to bring to Canada the girl whose name is Betty. Her last name seems not to be known, but she came from England. It is this girl with whom he is living at Belleville. Now, the evidence seems to be fairly clear. It seems to me it is evidence not only of adultery, but it is evidence of the first marriage having been dissolved by the action of the husband in going off and living with another woman and starting to raise another family.

Hon. members will recognize—

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I ask a question at this point?

Mr. Knowles: —that I recite these facts with nothing but sorrow. The whole story is a sad one, and everyone will feel—

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles: —that it is a tragedy.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I think that this literature is pornographic, to say the least very lewd, and it is very poor taste to bring it before this body in the presence of children. If the hon. gentleman wants to go ahead I would move that the page boys and persons of immature years be cleared out of the chamber.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I point out for the benefit of the hon. member, and I hope he has been listening, that in none of the cases I have read from on any of the nights we have been discussing these matters, have I quoted any evidence from those cases that could be characterized by the words he has used. In several of the books I have, I have portions crossed out so that I will not read them, not even by mistake. I submit that the point of order is not well taken.

The Deputy Chairman: I heard the point of order raised by the hon. member for Cariboo, and I heard the explanation that was provided by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I have been listening carefully to the remarks made by all hon. members who have participated in the debate this evening, and I do not think there were any references to parts of the evidence which might cause any alarm to the hon. member for Cariboo. His point of order is not well taken, and I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may continue.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I had just about finished my remarks on this case when I was interrupted. I was referring to the tragedy of this whole business. It cannot but make one feel that way. Nevertheless, one feels particularly sorry for the wife and the child in this case. There does seem to be nothing we can do but confirm the dissolution of the marriage that has already taken place by the actions of the husband. I feel, however, that this case, like all the rest of them, should have been dealt with in a court.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the objection which the hon. member for Cariboo has raised, and those of us who have attempted to discuss the evidence on these bills have purposely avoided anything that might be objectionable. Might I answer the hon. member by saying that this is the very reason we want these divorce bills taken to some other court and not have them brought before this body. Now, that is the objection.

Mr. Chairman, a question was asked of the member sponsoring this bill as to whether this particular bill was gone into when it was before the private bills committee. He answered that this was one, with a number of others, that had been recommended and was passed in bulk. Now, that is not to be regarded as any reflection upon the committee or the chairman of that committee. I happen to be a member of that committee, and I suppose it might be argued that I could have spoken to this bill in the committee instead of in this chamber. Well, a member has a right to argue it in either place or in both places. In fairness to the chairman of the committee I will say that should any of us have any objection to any bill, we do not have to pass them in bulk. The chairman is quite ready and willing for us to present our arguments on any one of these bills.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Will the hon. member please indicate to what chairman he is referring, because in this committee there is only one chairman. I believe he should refer to the sponsor or to the chairman of the committee on private bills.

Mr. Hansell: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I meant the chairman of the private bills committee, and not Your Honour. You are both excellent chairmen. I would say this, however, in respect to bringing these bills before the private bills committee. We do not always have the evidence before those bills are presented to us. I suppose we take it for granted that someone has read the evidence. I know there is sometimes difficulty in getting things printed because of the tremendous backlog of printing that has to be done by the printing bureau. I did want to mention that because we did not want to cast any reflection upon that committee.

MARIE BLANCHE AMILDA LESSARD DUPLESSIS

The house in committee on Bill No. 122, for the relief of Marie Blanche Amilda Lessard Duplessis—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knight: The other night, in talking about this matter, I cast some doubt upon the integrity of investigators. If we consider some of the bills before us here, I believe we shall come to the conclusion that a lot of these investigators make their money simply by this, what I consider, nefarious trade. My friend refers to it as a "racket" and I shall agree with him to that extent, but I would rather have my own phraseology. In the preceding bill, one might have noticed that the lady involved was unknown, except in so far as her first name was concerned. Apparently these investigators could not find out her second name. They could find out everything else, but they just knew her first name. There was no other name in the evidence, and no one knows what the lady's maiden name was. I come now to this Bill No. 122 which concerns a certain lady by the name of Duplessis residing in Montreal, who sues for divorce from her husband. It is sad to note that this marriage took place in 1921, almost thirty years ago. Now, we have a divorce case.

I was speaking, sir, about the integrity, or lack of it, of these investigators. I should like to draw to your attention that in this particular case the alleged adultery upon which the verdict was given was committed with an unknown woman in the city of Montreal. Now, sir, these investigators were able to find out everything else but were unable to ascertain the name of this woman. I believe, sir, it is a fact that some of these investigators are not as straightforward as they might be. I am going to suggest that these women can be obtained for the particular purpose of supplying evidence in these particular cases. There is a conviction in many quarters that a good many of these cases are the result of collusion and that the evidence at times is faked. I think that matter should be brought to the attention of the public.

May I say that the public knows nothing about these divorce bills. The public does not know to what extent we in the House of Commons are crucified by the study of these divorce cases, to say nothing of the senators in the other place. I think it is a good thing that it should be on the record of the House of Commons that one or two members at least, among whom I am one, believe that many of these cases are the result of collusion, the result of faked evidence which is deliberately obtained by the sort of investigators, lawyers and witnesses that we have in some of these cases. When I say that, I am casting no aspersions on the profession that I have named, because I am well aware of the fact that a reputable lawyer would have nothing to do with that kind of thing.

But there is the position as I see it. Some of these cases are those in regard to which I think there may be some suspicion. It is too facile, too easy to be able to go out and get divorce evidence. I am told that in certain cases you can go to these people, and you do not have to do anything. They simply provide the evidence. They provide everything. The whole thing is arranged and that is the end of it. It is disgusting but it is true, in my opinion.

Mr. Hansell: There are just one or two things I should like to bring out in connection with this bill and which I think might be of some value to members of the committee. In the first place, may I say that I have found some difficulty in being able to determine the difference between connivance and collusion. This is one case in which that difference appears to be explained. I should like to put this on Hansard; it is to be found at page 11 of this evidence. I should like to read it, with your permission, Mr. Chairman. Some little argument went on between the chairman and one of the solicitors in this case as to the meaning of these words. The solicitor said that he always understood "connivance" and "collusion" to be synonymous terms. The chairman, Mr. Aseltine, a man who has given some considerable study to this matter, puts him right on this particular point. He says no, that there is a difference in the meaning; and he pulls out a volume, I suppose by Power, because that is what he reads; and this is what he says:

The Chairman: Power on Divorce. It deals with collusion, connivance and condonance. It is the easiest thing in the world to study. For instance, if a woman arranged to have her husband found by detectives under certain circumstances—

Mr. Gaboury: That would be collusion.

The Chairman: That would be connivance, she was arranging the evidence. Collusion is an arrangement between them. To give you an example, after you commenced an action she could go to her husband, and arrange not to have a contestation.

Mr. Gaboury: That would be both collusion and connivance.

The Chairman: Or that she give him something. That is collusion.

Mr. Gaboury: And it is connivance too.

The Chairman: No, you only connive at the adultery.

That throws some light on that particular point. There is another matter, Mr. Chairman, that I should like to bring to your attention. I have always wondered how much it might cost these people to go through the process of obtaining a divorce; and I find that here that information is brought out. The witness is asked by the solicitor:

Q. How much have you paid now? A. $800, I think.

Q. $800? A. Yes.

Q. Does that include the full parliamentary fees paid, $210?

The Clerk of the Committee: Yes, it has been paid, Mr. Chairman.

Looking at this particular case, I feel that that is a great deal of money to pay for what this man got.

Mr. Knowles: This woman.

Mr. Hansell: For what this woman got, I should say. It is a woman in this case. Her husband had been actually living with the other woman for about a year. Even the chairman makes the remark—perhaps I had better read it to you. It is to be found at page 13 of the evidence:

The Chairman: I don't know why you want to hire detectives in a case like this, why didn't you take your client and go down there yourself?

It was only a matter of going there and finding that they were living there as man and wife; and they had been living there for about a year. Yet it cost this woman about $800. Perhaps that is cheap; I do not know. Some costs may run a great deal higher than that. But that is a great deal of money. I think the chairman of this committee is to be commended for calling that matter to the attention of the solicitors. I think the Senate committee that handles these cases are humane, and that they are to be commended for that action.

There is one other point in this evidence that I do not like, and I will read it to you. This investigator goes into this room, turns on the light and commences to say what he saw; and he says "An old woman—". Then Senator Howden rather butts in and asks the question: "Q. An old—?"; and before he can say anything else the investigator says:

A. An old lady, she looked to be fifty or fifty-five.

I do not like that. I do not call a lady of fifty or fifty-five an old lady or an old woman. Many of them look quite young at that age. Besides, if that is so, how old does that make me? Perhaps the investigator could be a little bit more careful in his appraisal of the age of the fair sex.

Mr. Knowles: It has been pointed out that the question of the cost of this case to this woman was raised in the Senate committee. That was done because the senators were aware of the circumstances in which this Mrs. Duplessis found herself. I am glad to know that the Senate recommended remission of all the fees, except the sum of $125. I should like to ask the sponsor of the bill if he knows why the Senate never seems to put the fee down to a lesser figure than that. There are many cases of poverty. In view of the $800 it is costing this woman I wonder whether it would have been possible for them to have put the fee at an even lower figure.

Mr. Winkler: I understand that in many cases the Senate committee does cut the fee down. What the lowest fee is I cannot say.

Mr. Knowles: I appreciate that. Perhaps the hon. member would get the answer to that question before we get back to this matter on another occasion. I may say I am a little surprised that we are dealing with these matters tonight. I understood that there was going to be a request for unanimous consent to go on with another bill. So far as I was concerned, I was only too ready to give that unanimous consent. I did so by my silence, and I have now confirmed it.

However, we are dealing with these matters. There is just one other point I would wish to make, namely, that in this case, sad as it is—this marriage of thirty years being dissolved—at least there are no young children to worry about. The members of the Senate committee became aware of that. Apparently it startled one or two of them. This is the record on this point:

By the Chairman:
Q. Was the marriage consummated? Did you live together as man and wife? A. Oh, yes.
Q. Did you have any children? A. One boy.
Q. How old is the boy? A. The boy is 28 years old.
Q. Oh, he is grown up? A. Yes.
The Chairman: Well, we don't have to worry about any infant children.
Mr. Gaboury: No.

ANNE FINEMAN SEGAL

The house in committee on Bill No. 123, for the relief of Anne Fineman Segal—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to say a word about this bill, if I may, because it has some very interesting features in it. This is another case where there is a child of the marriage. When I look at the evidence I find that the child is small, two years old or thereabouts. The mother of the child, who is suing for the divorce, is questioned as follows:

Q. And you continued to live with your sister and you still do? A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you work,—? A. Yes, sir.
Q. What do you do? A. I work in a restaurant as a cashier.

I just want to emphasize, as a cashier in the city of Montreal. The questioning continued:

Q. Were you working at the time these proceedings were started? A. No, sir.
Q. And your sister looks after your child? A. Yes.
Q. Is your sister married? A. Yes.
Q. Has she any children of her own? A. Yes, a little girl.
Q. And is her husband living? A. Yes.
Q. With her? A. Yes.
Q. And apart from your earnings as a cashier have you any substantial property? A. No.

Here is the point that I am going to emphasize:

Q. How much do you earn a week? A. $25.

Mr. Knowles: Shame.

Mr. Coldwell: She earns $25 a week working in a restaurant in Montreal as a cashier. We sometimes hear of cases where cashiers are accused of theft, and when you consider that a cashier in a restaurant is paid $25 a week at the present time when the cost of living is so high, and she contributes—

The Deputy Chairman: Order: Perhaps I did not follow the hon. member closely right from the start, but in the last minute I did hear him talk about salary and the cost of living. What the relevancy may be I do not know.

Mr. Coldwell: It was part of my argument. Because of the very high cost of living, a wage of $25 a week does not enable this woman to bring up that child decently. After all it is the child in this particular case that I am particularly interested in at the moment. I am pointing out that she has no income other than the $25 a week that she earns as a cashier in a restaurant, and she has to pay her board and the upkeep of her child to her sister. That is borne out by this question and answer:

Q. Have you received any money from your husband since he left you? A. No.
Q. Nothing at all? A. The first two or three weeks he would send $5 or $10, and then he didn't send any more.

Here is another case where there is a child. The woman appears to be the innocent victim, and she has to bear the cost of the upbringing of that child. I am quite ready to admit that a transfer of the matter to the exchequer court probably would not help in this particular, but in my opinion the whole matter of divorce, particularly as it affects children in these cases, should be gone into very thoroughly; because we have an obligation not only to the innocent party but to any children of the marriage. I am pointing out that it is impossible for this woman to bring up this child properly herself and maintain her appearance as a cashier when the wages are as low as those she gave to the Senate committee as having been received.

Here again we have one of those cases that have been so frequently mentioned tonight where investigators have been employed. They followed, according to their story, the man to a hotel in Montreal. They found the number of the room and they went to the room. Then they knocked on the door and the door was unlatched. The man in the case unlatched it, and then this statement is made:

And Mr. Golden and I forced our way into the room.

They forced their way into the room, and upon the basis of what they saw on that occasion divorce proceedings are commenced. One other point, because I think this may be a deserving case. Again you have the same story. Questions are put to the detective by the chairman of the Senate committee about the other woman in the case, as follows:

Q. Did you get her name? A. I tried to but she answered me in French in not very nice words.

In other words, no name again of the other party.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO PERMIT PERFORMANCE OF SERVICES FOR DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 284, to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act—Mr. Howe—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 3—Purpose of the corporation.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock we were discussing paragraph (d) of section 3 and I had indicated that this amendment was intended to clarify the power of the corporation because of a legal doubt that had been raised as to its authority. The leader of the opposition had asked what was the act to which this doubt referred, and what was the doubt. The act to which the doubt referred arose in connection with the purchase of some wool stock. There was no doubt raised as to the right to buy wool outside of Canada, but a legal question was raised as to the right to pay for wool bought within Canada; it was as to that part of the transaction that doubt was raised.

Mr. Green: Would that power not be given by paragraph (c) which gives the corporation the power to exercise on behalf and under the direction of the minister any powers or functions vested in the minister by any other act that authorizes the minister to employ the corporation to exercise them? Would that not be broad enough to enable the corporation to do this purchasing?

Mr. McIlraith: Apparently not. The purchase of the wool was authorized under what was then the Essential Materials (Defence) Act and a question was raised as to the payment for the part purchased in Canada out of funds of the Canadian Commercial Corporation under the other section. The hon. member has put his finger on the point. It was thought that paragraph (c) was wide enough and that the authority in the other act to use the Canadian Commercial Corporation to carry out the functions authorized by the other act would be wide enough. Apparently there was a question raised beyond that. As I made clear earlier, I found it difficult to concede that there was legal doubt, but that is the situation that has developed.

Mr. Green: May I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that there would seem to be a rather dangerous principle introduced by the latter part of this paragraph (d). The first part of paragraph (d) gives the Canadian Commercial Corporation the power to exercise any function conferred on it by any other act. If some other act sets out that the Canadian Commercial Corporation can do certain things, the corporation can carry on accordingly. But the latter part of this paragraph (d) seems to confer wide-open authority to do anything without parliamentary sanction and without any act referring to the corporation. It says:

—or for the exercise of which it may be employed under any other act.

The key word is "employed". That means that a minister administering any other act may decide to employ the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and that would be permitted under the latter part of this paragraph. Surely that is contrary to the whole intent of the act and is against parliamentary principles because there is no parliamentary check. In other words, broad power is being given here without any definition by parliament at all, power for other ministers to use this corporation. I think that is most unwise and is going too far.

It looks to me as though in trying to widen this power the officials have gone too far. It would not be the first time they have done that because they like to make sure that there is sufficient power in an act. Quite often they do not seem to think about the powers being excessive, but I suggest that here is a case where excessive powers are being sought.

Canadian Commercial Corporation

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, with due deference to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra I must say that the interpretation which he places on the latter part of the paragraph is much too wide. It simply provides that the corporation may exercise powers for the exercise of which it may be employed under any other act. There must be authority under another act to employ the Canadian Commercial Corporation. But having employed the corporation as agent to procure materials this paragraph makes it clear that the other powers granted in the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act can be used. For example, there would be the right under section 8 to use funds of the corporation. It has that much narrower interpretation.

Mr. Green: The parliamentary assistant interprets these words as meaning that there must be some other act which actually sets out that the Canadian Commercial Corporation can be employed?

Mr. McIlraith: That is right.

Mr. Green: If that is what it means, that meets my objection.

Mr. McIlraith: Some other act or some other legislation having granted the right to use the corporation, then the corporation can use all the provisions of its own act.

Mr. Green: The parliamentary assistant means that the Canadian Commercial Corporation cannot be employed by any other department or any other crown company unless there is an act which actually sets out that it can be employed by that branch or agency of government?

Mr. McIlraith: That is right; there has to be the other authority. Of course there is the earlier section which we are not amending about exports and imports. Perhaps I could revert for a moment to the act that caused the difficulty. It was a matter of payment, not the authority to be employed as the agent; it was the question of using the funds of Canadian Commercial Corporation to make payment for part of the wool which had been bought in Canada. I admit it seems to be a refined argument. The hon. member will realize that lawyers differ, and I thought it was an over-refined objection. However, there it was.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I do not think any of us want to split hairs in regard to the interpretation of this section, but like the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra I feel that there is a dangerous tendency to try to cure imaginary or uncertain troubles by simply saying, "Well, all right, we will put in something wide enough so that there will be no chance that it will not deal with everything that may arise." The parliamentary assistant was good enough between six o'clock and the time we resumed discussion of this bill to indicate some of the considerations that had led to the inclusion of this amendment. However, I would point out to him that there is one act in connection with which it is not necessary for the Canadian Commercial Corporation to be designated and in which there are wide powers. Under the Emergency Powers Act there is almost limitless power to set up any type of organization by order in council and then designate the Canadian Commercial Corporation as the agency for carrying out that particular function. One reason why I feel it is very unsatisfactory to put in a wide-open provision of this kind is because it is quite frankly stated in the explanatory notes on the opposite page that the purpose is to take care of any powers conferred upon it which are not specifically covered by its present designated powers. That would mean that, while at the present time Canadian Commercial Corporation has certain designated powers under the act which brought it into existence, and while under other statutes such as the Defence Production Act there would be some general limitation as to the nature of the activities that could be covered, under the Emergency Powers Act activities in no way contemplated by the general purpose of the Defence Production Act or the general designated purpose of this act could be carried forward, and then Canadian Commercial Corporation would be deemed to have powers for such purpose.

That might seem to be creating imaginary problems, but I believe the time has come when, unless there is some very clearly stated reason, we should hesitate to give these blanket powers under any statute. I do not want to labour the matter unduly but I would point out that the Emergency Powers Act passed during this session was passed with the statement that in the first place it repealed the emergency act passed last September and conferred wider powers on the government so that the powers might be wide enough to introduce price controls. That was the reason stated. The government needed no wider powers to establish priorities, to stockpile or to do any of the things contemplated from the point of view of positive control and allocation of supplies, but it was stated by the minister who assumed responsibility both for the drafting and the argument in support of the bill that the wider bill was needed so that the government might deal with price controls.

We have come this far in the session and the government has still given no indication that it has any thought of exercising the one authority for which it obtained wider powers. With that as an example I suggest that we should not give wide powers like these without specific information as to why they are needed, and not just a general statement that somebody may have some doubt about some wool contract. For that reason I move:

That subsection (d) of section 3 be deleted.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, there may be a question of order as to moving the deletion of a section, but leaving that aside for the moment and reverting to the argument, if the Emergency Powers Act is as wide in its authority as the leader of the opposition says it is then of course orders passed under it can re-enact any of the clauses asked for here. I submit that argument is wholly irrelevant to the section we are discussing. The section under consideration has to do with a situation stated clearly in the explanatory note referred to by the leader of the opposition. The note reads in part:

. . . and second, to resolve the legal doubt raised as to whether the corporation may exercise a power not included among its specified purposes.

Under section 4 of the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act the specified purpose in the wool contract related to the right to import wool, and the only other section dealing with powers was part II of the act which had to do with materials for the defence department. The wool purchase did not come directly and squarely within either of these two specified purposes in the Canadian Commercial Corporation legislation. Therefore we had an extraordinary situation where we were seeking to buy wool for defence purposes to provide uniforms—and I think properly seeking to do so—and we could pay for wool bought in other countries but could not pay for wool bought in Canada. The purpose is to clear up that sort of situation. The authority to buy wool of course arises from the essential materials legislation.

Mr. Green: Would not the very fact that it arises from the Essential Materials (Defence) Act enable the Minister of Defence Production to exercise these powers and others?

Mr. McIlraith: That is precisely my point. The answer is no.

Mr. Green: Under the new subsection (c) the Minister of Defence Production can ask the Canadian Commercial Corporation to exercise his powers. Surely subsection (c) covers it.

Mr. McIlraith: It is a curious situation but apparently it does not. Apparently the authority under the Defence Supplies Act to employ the services of the corporation is not wide enough to permit them to use their own money to pay for it in the meantime.

Mr. Green: Should that not be met by an amendment to the Essential Materials (Defence) Act rather than putting in a very broad subsection such as subsection (d)?

Mr. McIlraith: I think the answer to that is that subsection (d) is not broad. The authority must come from another act, and once the authority comes to use the Canadian Commercial Corporation then the corporation can exercise any other powers which it may be empowered to use under the other clauses of its act.

Mr. Green: If there is another statute passed which specifically states that the Canadian Commercial Corporation may do certain things, surely that is sufficient without then amending the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act to say it can do the things that the other act has said it can do. That is just duplication. Surely there is no need to bring in two statutes to achieve that end. I feel quite confident the parliamentary assistant will agree with me that it is not necessary to do that.

Mr. McIlraith: I suppose the answer to that would be to bring before the house all the other legislation authorizing the use of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, amend each section giving that authority and put it in the widest possible language, but this amendment makes it clear that the Canadian Commercial Corporation has, if authorized under other legislation, full capacity to act as authorized.

Mr. Green: The very fact it is authorized by other legislation—

Mr. McIlraith: Is not sufficient. We are back now on the argument that caused the doubt. If my hon. friend's interpretation had been the one accepted by the law officers then of course there would have been no doubt and the section would not have been necessary, but we are back to the original argument that caused the doubt. I must say that I rather agree with the hon. member's point of view, but that is precisely the argument that caused the doubt.

Mr. Green: The position then is that the parliamentary assistant agrees with me that the amendment is not needed so far as he personally is concerned. He has quite frankly expressed his opinion that the amendment is not necessary. Why should that not be sufficient without our being compelled to put aside our opinions and adopt the opinion of some law officer of the crown who may not know half as much about the legislation as we do? I have not found the law officers of the crown infallible. After all, they are only there to advise, but their opinion is not necessarily correct and need not necessarily be accepted. Here they have taken a pile driver to drive a tack. They have taken far wider power than is necessary to meet the situation which is worrying them. I suggest that the parliamentary assistant should accept the amendment of the leader of the opposition. If an amendment is necessary that amendment should be to the Essential Materials (Defence) Act, and not to this act at all.

Mr. McIlraith: I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra quite overstated my position. I did not assert that I either give the time, or have the opportunity to give the time, or at the moment think it perhaps desirable that the time be given, to a study of some of the more intricate legal arguments raised from day to day on a great many matters. I for one find it desirable and necessary to take the opinions of competent legal men in the various departments on their own work. I find it a very good rule to follow that, if you have an expert whom you trust, you should take his opinion. If you do not trust him then perhaps he should not be employed.

I am asked why I do not accept the amendment and leave out this section. The answer is that very shortly we would be right back in the situation in which we found ourselves previously. A short time ago we had to buy wool. We found that we could not pay for any wool bought in Canada, though we could pay for wool bought in other parts of the world, which was a most extraordinary position. This section clears up that difficulty; but I suggest it is not a wide section, and that the proper method is to amend this act to make it clear that the Canadian Commercial Corporation, if authorized by any other legislation, has the right to use all the powers given it under its own act. For that reason I have no alternative but to regretfully reject the amendment of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Thatcher: This section does give the minister fairly comprehensive powers. I do not think this group objects to those powers being taken, but we do wish the minister or the parliamentary assistant would use those powers to see that there is a greater diversification of the contracts that are being given out. Since the original legislation was discussed several months ago the minister has seen that western Canada has been given certain airport contracts, for instance. Perhaps the maritimes have been given a little also; but generally speaking I think it is still true that western Canada and the maritime provinces are not being given their fair share of these defence contracts by the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. McIlraith: That is nonsense.

Mr. Thatcher: A look at the statistics will bear that out.

Mr. McIlraith: No, it will not.

Mr. Thatcher: I beg to differ.

Mr. Claxton: Look at the figures.

Mr. Thatcher: I look at them every week when they come out; that is why I am speaking now.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps we should not go into the allocation of contracts by the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. Thatcher: Section 3 (d) gives the parliamentary assistant wide powers. All I want him to do is use those powers to give western Canada and the maritimes their fair share of these defence contracts. I still cannot believe they are getting it. If they are, let the minister say so tonight, and let him tell us what he is doing for our part of the country.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Thatcher: Would the minister not say a word on that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): He would be out of order, as you were.

The Deputy Chairman: I must tell the hon. member that in my opinion it is not in order on this amendment to discuss the point he has raised. Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Chairman. I know these legal arguments in regard to the interpretation of acts and the breadth of amending sections may seem at times very boring and like a waste of time. I would recall, however, that step by step we have been seeing the powers of parliament whittled away by the extension of wider and wider powers through amendments or whole new acts, in which very little definite information is given beyond the fact that someone thinks powers of this kind might be needed. I refer again to the Emergency Powers Act passed earlier this session, which gives this government the widest powers ever conferred upon any democratic government except in time of general war. Those powers were extended by the majority vote of this parliament with practically nothing before this house to demonstrate the need for powers of that kind.

As I pointed out earlier the one reason, the only clear reason, given for the extension of such powers was that it was necessary to make the earlier emergency powers still wider so the government could deal with price controls. There were general statements as to the need for stand-by powers; there was the statement that many of the things the government might require to do would never become necessary as long as sweeping powers of this kind were available, which those who might be affected would know might be exercised. Those powers are there. I would point out that under those powers there is no question, and none has ever been suggested, but that the government could by order in council—and this is merely an example—take over the operation of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario.

Mr. Jeffery: A good idea.

Mr. Claxton: What has that to do with this bill?

Mr. Drew: I am not going to be diverted by comments so ridiculous as those just made. If the hon. member who made that remark had any understanding of the extent of the experience, to say nothing of the efficiency, of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, he would not make an utterly silly and irrelevant comment of that kind.

That could be done. I ask the parliamentary assistant if he would question the proposition that if such an order were made, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce said in the earlier discussion of this subject it could be made, the Canadian Commercial Corporation could then be appointed as agent to operate it. I have used that only as an illustration. The same thing could be done to take over all the operating oil fields of Alberta, or to take over the iron development in Labrador. It could be done to take over any other operation regarded by the government as something that was needed for the general welfare of Canada during a period of emergency, which was the basis for the act that was passed earlier in the session.

That being so, Mr. Chairman, I simply repeat that this house in committee is disregarding the responsibilities of parliament if, without anything more than a general statement that somebody thinks they need powers of this kind to deal with a wool contract, we should confer powers so wide, when at the very time the amending bill is before us the parliamentary assistant says he does not believe it is actually necessary.

Mr. McIlraith: He did not say that.

Mr. Drew: Surely at some point this house must say it is not going to accord the government further and wider powers simply to resolve doubts, when the specific case can be dealt with if necessary by an amendment to the section of the act under which these powers were conferred. The Canadian Commercial Corporation was given very wide powers when it was brought into being by an act passed on August 31, 1946. Simply to illustrate why I am taking objection to the extension of wider powers with nothing more before us than we have at the moment, let me read section 4 which designates the purposes of the corporation:

(1) The corporation is established for the following purposes:

(a) to assist in the development of trade between Canada and other nations, and

(b) to assist persons in Canada

(i) to obtain goods and commodities from outside Canada; and

(ii) to dispose of goods and commodities that are available for export from Canada.

(2) The corporation shall comply with any general or special direction given by the governor in council or the minister with reference to carrying out its purposes.

Then, it goes on in section 5 to say:

5. (1) The corporation may do such things as it deems expedient for, or conducive to, the attainment of the purposes set forth in section four of this act; and, for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing, the corporation may carry on the business of:

(a) importing goods or commodities into Canada, and

(b) exporting goods or commodities from Canada, either as principal or as agent, in such manner and to such extent as it deems advisable to achieve the said purposes.

(2) The generality of subsection one of this section is not restricted by any provision of this act other than section four thereof.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with these wide powers which cover every aspect of the activities which the ministerial assistant has stated this corporation now requires, I suggest that there is no occasion to pass an amendment which extends powers beyond those wide powers; and that those powers, as conferred by the act itself, conform fully with what we have been told the act is now going to be called upon to do. I repeat that the explanation of the object of the amending section, written in by those who drafted the legislation, says—

Mr. McIlraith: Not by those who drafted the legislation.

Mr. Drew: Frankly I had hoped it was, because I had hoped it was drafted by those who knew what the purpose was. I take the correction. These words are put in perhaps by someone else, but whoever wrote them, the words which are supposed to explain the amendment as written on the left-hand pages say:

. . . to resolve the legal doubt raised as to whether the corporation may exercise a power not included among its specified purposes.

It means only one thing, namely that the intention of this amendment is to give to the Canadian Commercial Corporation powers not covered by these designated powers passed by parliament. I suggest again, Mr. Chairman, that with the statement of the parliamentary assistant that, in his opinion, it is not needed, without any specific legal argument to show why it is needed, parliament should not pass a power of this kind. Therefore I close my remarks with the hope that on this occasion an amendment of this kind may not be pressed so that parliament itself can, at least on this occasion, assert its authority to control legislation until it knows exactly why something should be done.

Mr. Green: These objections are raised in the best of faith in the belief that this section is too broad. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant would have no objection to letting this bill stand over the week end, and have it considered further by the experts.

Mr. McIlraith: No, I think there is every objection to that. We have had some questions about the defence production department awarding contracts in various parts of the country. I should very much like to answer that specious argument that is being put forward rather regularly, but this is neither the occasion nor, in my opinion, is it within the rules to deal with it here. I must say I would rather welcome the opportunity to deal with it.

Then we got into another discussion about the wisdom or lack of wisdom of taking over the Ontario hydro, and about how well run the Ontario hydro was. I also have some views about that, but I do not think this is the place or the occasion for me to express them.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt, but I would point out that I did not raise this subject. I simply raised this as an example, because the minister himself had on an earlier occasion said that this act had sufficiently wide powers for that purpose.

Mr. McIlraith: However tempting it might be to discuss the Ontario hydro, I assure the leader of the opposition that while he has strong opinions about it, I have equally strong opinions about it.

Mr. Drew: Knowing nothing about it.

Mr. McIlraith: Knowing something about it. I came to the conclusion, long before I reached the age I now have, that all knowledge was not given to any one man.

Mr. Fulton: That is self-evident.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, it is self-evident. It is one of those things I believe one should learn very early in life. I do not know that it is proper for one member to say to another member that he does not know anything about this subject or that. He may or he may not. I have an idea that all members know a great deal about a great many subjects, and I have never been tempted to take the attitude that other members do not know anything about the subject under discussion. I do not believe in that point of view.

In any event, that is not the point before the chair. At the moment, the point is rather narrow, and it concerns paragraph (d) of section 3. The leader of the opposition makes some such remark as, "Let's start asking questions". I should like to be permitted to continue my argument without a lot of questions about this or that. The leader of the opposition correctly read sections 4 and 5 of the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act. It will be noted that these sections deal exclusively with export or import. This power is being taken to clear up a difficulty that arose in another part of the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act having to do with the procurement of defence supplies. It was thought that the power in that legislation providing for the use of the capital made available to Canadian Commercial Corporation for making temporary payment of purchases would be sufficient in certain circumstances, but that was found not to be so.

I did not take the position that paragraph (d) of section 3 was not necessary. It is necessary, otherwise I would not have come here with the paragraph in the bill asking hon. members to approve it. The paragraph reads:

> (d) to exercise any other powers or functions conferred upon it by any other act or for the exercise of which it may be employed under any other act.

Now, we had an experience where this corporation was employed under another act in its proper function of procuring raw wool supplies. The point was raised that, having been employed to buy this wool, it could only buy the wool from other countries under the very sections read by the hon. leader of the opposition. It was found that the corporation did not have the power to pay for wool bought in Canada. Do hon. members want the corporation left in the position of having to buy only from foreign countries? If it is to pay for the goods itself, that is what happens. It can buy in Canada if it is not paying for the goods itself. Do hon. members want that situation to continue? I suggest the amendment is as simple as that, and I suggest the amendment is as narrow as that.

I indicated earlier the functions of the corporation, which are now much narrower than they were. Its only function now being performed where this situation would arise at all would be in certain types of bulk purchases, of which there are very few. To leave ourselves in the position where the corporation could not use its own capital to make certain emergency bulk purchases is not what the members of the committee want.

Mr. Green: Why could it not do that for the Department of Defence Production? It could act as purchasing agent for the Department of Defence Production?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, it could buy for the Department of Defence Production, and not use its own capital. It cannot make any firm contracts and use its own money to act quickly. The difficulty arose under the Defence Supplies Act in this specific instance. I was asked for the particular example, and that was it. It arose under the Defence Supplies Act where there was authority to employ the corporation and the corporation was employed, and then it was found that there was no way of handling the money end of the transaction.

Mr. Green: But the corporation can act as agent as well as do buying with its own funds.

Mr. McIlraith: Quite so.

Mr. Green: There is no reason why the wool could not be bought in that way.

Mr. McIlraith: How would it be paid for?

Mr. Green: It could be paid for out of the funds of the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. McIlraith: There is no fund at all under this legislation, I am told, out of which it could be paid for; that is, the Canadian part of the wool.

Mr. Thatcher: The parliamentary assistant said that the prairie provinces now were receiving their fair share of these defence contracts and he would welcome the opportunity to put the figures on record. If I am wrong in that—

Mr. McIlraith: That is not quite what he said.

Mr. Thatcher: I am sorry if I have not been accurate. Did he not say something along those lines?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. That information will be in order on some other occasion. It is not in order to have those figures given here. Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I hope we can deal with this matter without an attempt to set up a straw man, as was done with regard to an illustration that was used simply to try to clarify the extent of the activities that would be embraced by such an amendment as this, because that has some bearing on whether an amendment of this kind is necessary. The parliamentary assistant has now indicated that there is one specific case. He has indicated that this was a case which arose under the priorities act passed last September. We all know that that act was repealed by the emergency—

Mr. McIlraith: It is not repealed yet.

Mr. Drew: As a matter of fact, the act is automatically superseded by the act which was passed at this session; and the powers conferred now are much wider than those which were made available under the other act. Therefore it seems—and in that I was under the impression that the parliamentary assistant shared that view, from what he said earlier this evening in this committee—that it would be possible to deal with this contract in that particular way. But even if it were not, that could be dealt with by a specific amendment. But now we are asked to extend these powers to cases where they will go beyond the specified purposes of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, as approved by this parliament. We ought to know what it is we are doing; because this power is not to be limited to this one case; this is a wide general power to engage in activities not covered by the purposes established by parliament. If we are going to do that, then I suggest that we should know something of the scale of the activities. For that reason I think we should know exactly how many contracts have been executed by the Canadian Commercial Corporation which are now being handled by that corporation, and what the value of those contracts is, so that we may know something of the scale of the business being done by the corporation which is being given these increased powers. Can the parliamentary assistant give us that information?

Mr. McIlraith: Those precise figures, with the values, are on record and were given at an earlier stage in committee on section one. They are therefore all there.

I think I ought to point out to the committee, however, that a few minutes ago the leader of the opposition read sections 4 and 5 of the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act as it now stands. He then omitted to read part II of the act which deals with the whole subject of defence purchasing. He will note that by section 7 of the bill now before the committee, part II of the act is repealed, and that the only powers that the corporation has on this subject are those now under discussion in section 3 of the bill now before the committee.

Mr. Drew: That was the reason I did not read the other part.

Mr. Fulton: I would take it, from the wording of the amendment itself and from the wording of the explanatory note, that were it not for this amendment there would be a legal doubt whether the corporation could exercise any powers beyond those given it in its parent act and which it might be called upon to exercise, outside the scope of the powers in the parent act, by some other agency or body which asked it to do something for that agency or body. I would gather that if that were the case—that is, if this amendment did not pass—then the proper way to resolve the doubt expressed in the explanatory note would be on each occasion that some other body asked the Canadian Commercial Corporation to exercise some function for it—on each of those occasions if there were a doubt as to whether Canadian Commercial Corporation could in fact exercise that function—to pass a specific short bill amending the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act in order to give it that power. Is that not the case?

Mr. McIlraith: No; I am afraid that is not the case, Mr. Chairman. I am afraid that I must, with deference, differ with the hon. member. That is not the case at all. In the first place, I am not clear to which act the hon. member referred when he used the term "parent act".

Mr. Fulton: The parent act is the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act which gives the Canadian Commercial Corporation its power and defines its functions and duties.

Mr. McIlraith: The powers of the Canadian Commercial Corporation were to deal with export and import; and the powers are indicated in sections 4 and 5. Then under part II it was given authority to purchase for the national defence department. That was done in 1947. That part is being repealed. It has now been given authority limited to performing functions authorized by parliament in any other act. In other words, it is making clear that if another act in itself gives power to use the Canadian Commercial Corporation, the Canadian Commercial Corporation shall have the capacity to function in that instance. The amendments are as simple as that, and that is the extent of them. If I may pursue the matter a bit further, the reason why paragraph (c) was not sufficient, and the first part of paragraph (d), was explained in the illustration I used about the wool. The whole point is as simple as that.

Mr. Fulton: I think the parliamentary assistant and I are almost agreed on this subject. I am referring to section 3, paragraph (d); and the point I am trying to establish—and I think the parliamentary assistant has practically confirmed it—is that Canadian Commerical Corporation is given certain functions and powers under its parent act. It is being asked by bodies established under other acts to exercise certain additional functions. From the explanatory note I would gather that there is doubt whether Canadian Commercial Corporation has the legal authority to carry out those functions, because there is doubt whether the powers conferred in the parent act—that is, the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act—give it scope to do so. So I come back to the point I made at first. If it were not for the meaning embodied in paragraph (d) of section 3 now before us, the only way to resolve that doubt would be, each time the Canadian Commercial Corporation was asked to exercise some additional function about which there was doubt, to pass a short amending bill, amending the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act, saying that Canadian Commerical Corporation shall have power to exercise this function. Is that not the case? Instead of either leaving the matter in doubt or having that short amending act passed each time, you are now seeking by the broad, general scope of paragraph (d), to make it clear that Canadian Commercial Corporation has the power, whenever another agency calls upon it to exercise an additional function. That seems to me to be the situation. You are seeking to avoid the necessity of passing an amending act each time a new agency or board calls upon the Canadian Commercial Corporation to exercise some function which was not clearly and specifically given to it under the original Canadian Commercial Corporation Act. Is that not a fairly accurate statement of the situation with respect to paragraph (d)?

Mr. McIlraith: I am afraid I cannot accede to that explanation.

Mr. Fulton: What is the meaning of the explanatory note which says that the purpose is:

> To resolve the legal doubt as to whether the corporation may exercise a power not included among its specified purposes.

Mr. McIlraith: I have gone over that many times as best I could. I am sorry that I am not able to make myself very clearly understood, or explain the thing in such a way as would be understood by all hon. members. The Canadian Commercial Corporation is not seeking to get power under this to do things not provided, where it is not authorized to act under other legislation. In other words, it is complete control by parliament over any function it can perform.

Mr. Fulton: I never said anything to the contrary.

Mr. McIlraith: It is this other doubt as to whether it could use its own powers. I am sorry that the explanatory note 3 is drafted in the way it is. If it had been drafted to read, "not included among sections 4 and 5 of the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act", it would have been clearer and more accurate. Hon. members will see, for instance, there is a section, section 8, where the corporation is given some authority. Well, that doubt arose; section 8 is not applicable even though the corporation was performing the act authorized by other legislation for it. That is the doubt that is being cleared up by the legislation.

Mr. Fulton: Would it not be correct to say that paragraph (d) does constitute an enlargement of the powers of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, or a generalization of the powers? Is it not correct to say that previously the powers were outlined in clear and specific terms in section 4 of the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act? If you pass paragraph (d) of this amendment, then the powers will be generalized, and to that extent extended, because the corporation will be enabled to exercise any powers which any other agency or board set up in any other act calls upon it to exercise. Surely, to that extent it must be a generalization and an extension of the powers of the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. McIlraith: It is not a generalization of the powers, Mr. Chairman. If the other act provided that the Canadian Commercial Corporation may be employed to perform a service, then this makes it clear that the Canadian Commercial Corporation shall have full capacity to use its own act and all the provisions in its own act in the performance of all those services. That is the key.

Mr. Fulton: That is not what the paragraph says. It does not say to exercise its powers or functions, that is the powers or functions of the Canadian Commercial Corporation under the parent act. The paragraph says:

To exercise any other powers or functions conferred upon it by any other act—

It does not say what the parliamentary assistant just said.

Mr. McIlraith: It was the second part of paragraph (d) we were discussing as I understood it.

Mr. Fulton: I have been discussing paragraph (d) generally ever since I entered the debate, and my questions have been related to the whole of paragraph (d) in which it does appear to me very clearly to extend or to generalize the powers which the Canadian Commercial Corporation will be able to exercise; because if this paragraph passes it will not be confined in any way to the specific things which it was called upon to do under its own parent act, but it will be empowered to do any of the things which any other board or agency set up under any other act may ask it to.

Mr. McIlraith: May be authorized to ask it to do.

Mr. Fulton: Well, not exactly. That is not clear in the words of the section, which I will read again.

To exercise any other powers or functions conferred upon it—

Conferred by the Canadian Commercial Corporation. I continue:

To exercise any other powers or functions conferred upon it by any other act.

That is what the paragraph says. In addition then to the powers conferred by the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act, it shall have the power to exercise any other powers or functions conferred upon it—that is the Canadian Commercial Corporation—by any other act. How can it be argued that that is not a generalization or an extension of the powers of the Canadian Commercial Corporation?

Mr. McIlraith: I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, I must still argue it. I do not follow the latter part of the hon. member's argument. I do not agree with it at all. It is not a generalization at all. It is a particularization, if you like. It is making it clear that the authority must come under any other legislation, but if the authority does come under the legislation, then this corporation will have the capacity to exercise that authority. In other words, it leaves the whole thing squarely within the power of parliament on each occasion.

Mr. Fulton: That is what I said ten minutes ago, and the parliamentary assistant denied it and said that was not correct. Then, we are back at the proposition that I stated ten minutes ago, namely, that if another act passed by this parliament gives the board or agency set up under that act authority to ask the Canadian Commercial Corporation to exercise certain powers, then the Canadian Commercial Corporation can exercise those powers without the necessity of an amendment to the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act. That is clear. That is the effect of this amendment; whereas previously, according to the explanatory note, it would not have been clear. I will take a concrete example.

We set up a board to provide for the purchase of steel, and we will say the purchase of steel was not a power given to the Canadian Commercial Corporation under the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act. Now, we are setting up a board under a separate piece of legislation to exercise powers of the government in connection with the purchase of steel, and that legislation says that all its capacities and functions shall be exercised by the Canadian Commercial Corporation. We go back to the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act and we find that nothing was mentioned with regard to the purchase of steel; but, as the parliamentary assistant said, that act contemplated import and export business and not the domestic purchase of steel; so it was doubtful, according to the words of the explanatory note, whether the Canadian Commercial Corporation could exercise the powers involved in the purchase of steel for domestic purposes. There would have been two ways to remove that doubt. One would be a specific amendment to the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act to provide that it shall have the powers to purchase steel for domestic purposes.

Then, if you wanted to set up a board to purchase wool or to purchase nails or to purchase clothing or to purchase anything else you like, it would have been possible to enact at the time a specific amendment to the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act to give it the power to make these purchases. That would have been one way to do it. But now, I gather, it is not desired to pass these specific amendments, giving the Canadian Commercial Corporation these specific powers in each case. Therefore you are passing paragraph (d) of clause 3 of this bill, and you are saying now the Canadian Commercial Corporation shall have the general power. In addition to these specific powers that general power will enable it to exercise any function which it may be called upon to exercise under any other act, passed by this parliament. Surely that is the effect of the explanatory note, and the original act, and the amendment which we are being called upon to pass. Instead of having to pass a number of separate amendments, this is an omnibus clause giving the Canadian Commercial Corporation the power to exercise any other function it may be called upon to exercise in any other legislation.

An hon. Member: All clear now.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: I am glad one hon. member agrees. If it is clear to the parliamentary assistant then we shall have met some of the difficulty. Does the parliamentary assistant agree?

Mr. McIlraith: I do not think that I can accede to that long argument. A good part of it is correct, but in my opinion a good part of it is off base. I have sought to make the situation as clear as I could and I do not think I could usefully add anything more at this time. I am sorry to leave it in that position.

Mr. Fulton: It is a piece of legislative laziness.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, my only purpose in rising to say a word was to inquire if we could not get this amendment voted on. The parliamentary assistant gets me convinced that it is a good amendment and then either the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra or the hon. member for Kamloops or the leader of the opposition gets up and convinces me that it is a bad amendment. I think they have reached the stage where they are really convincing each other that something is required. I have come to that conclusion after listening to the hon. member for Kamloops.

I do not believe that he is taking the position that no amendment is required because the explanatory note states that the second reason for the amendment was to resolve the legal doubt raised as to whether the corporation may exercise a power not included among its specified purposes. The parliamentary assistant has told us that some legal doubt was raised in connection with the purchase of wool in Canada, and the hon. member for Kamloops said that that doubt could be resolved in one of two ways, either by passing a specific act every time the corporation came across something that it could not do in order to enable it to do it, or to pass this amendment.

It seems to me that if there are those two alternatives, the amendment is the better one. It would enable the corporation to act without having to wait for the passing of a bill to enable it to do something that we can give it authority to do by this amendment. It would appear to be all right.

Mr. Fulton: The parliamentary assistant said that I was wrong, that that is not the effect of the amendment.

Mr. MacInnis: No lawyer who is on the opposite side of an argument with another lawyer will say that anything he says is correct. They provide for such a situation in the courts by having a judge who says ultimately which lawyer is right and which is wrong. Unfortunately we have no judge here. Many of the judges here are laymen like myself and I think we should be given the opportunity to arrive at a decision before the matter becomes too confused.

The hon. member for Kamloops agrees that if the corporation is to do certain things an amendment is required. The only difference is as to what alternative will be used. I prefer the alternative of this amendment and if it comes to a vote I am going to vote that way.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to make one correction. I did not express any opinion as to whether this amendment is required to enable the corporation to exercise any powers. I merely asked if the amendment was as I outlined it and the parliamentary assistant did not agree that I had outlined it correctly.

Mr. Green: The parliamentary assistant based his argument in support of this amendment on a doubt which had arisen in connection with a deal to purchase wool in Canada. Could he tell us exactly how that deal was handled?

Mr. McIlraith: I am not an expert on wool. There is an advisory board on wool headed by Mr. Brown, which was announced recently. On the advice of that board wool is bought—I think the term is "bought forward"—but the amount of cash involved on the part of the corporation is not always the total value of the wool under commitment. The wool is allocated to the processor and of course is bought only in anticipation of the needs of the various services for the finished article.

Mr. Green: How was this particular transaction handled about which there was some trouble?

Mr. McIlraith: The transaction was put through on the advice of the wool advisory board under the chairmanship of Mr. Brown. It is not a transaction covering the whole quantity which is put through at one time. It is a case of forward buying of wool against the anticipated end use of the finished product. The wool is allocated to the processors to be made into yarn and cloth for fabrication into uniforms and other articles.

Mr. Green: Was the transaction handled by the Canadian Commercial Corporation?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Green: They actually did the buying?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Green: The complaint was that payment could not be made from their funds?

Mr. McIlraith: That is right. The legal difficulty arose in connection with payment for that part which was bought in Canada. There was no difficulty whatever about that part bought outside of Canada.

Mr. Green: From what source did the money come with which the wool was purchased if it could not be taken from the funds of the Canadian Commercial Corporation?

Mr. McIlraith: Apparently it could not be taken from the funds of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and I am not sure where it finally came from. The validity of the payment for the Canadian purchases was questioned but it was never anticipated that there was any lack of authority to carry out the transaction.

Mr. Green: Had the funds of the Canadian Commercial Corporation actually been used for that purpose?

Mr. McIlraith: I am not sure that they had been used, but in any event we had to stop buying Canadian wool with the funds of the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. Higgins: Apparently the explanation given by the parliamentary assistant does not jibe with the explanation given by the minister on Monday, as reported on page 2975 of Hansard. The minister said:

> This amendment defines the minister as the Minister of Defence Production, and removes any legal doubt that may exist as to the corporation's authority to perform such services as may be authorized by any other statute, for example the Defence Production Act, even though such authorities are not specifically set out in the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act.

That explanation seems to me to be a little different from the one given to the hon. member for Kamloops.

Amendment (Mr. Drew) negatived: Yeas, 10; nays, 48.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Grants and advances to corporation.

Mr. Green: As I understand it, this includes a new power. The present situation is that the Minister of Finance, on request of the Minister of Defence Production, must advance up to a total of $10 million. I think there is also provision for loans to the extent of another $10 million under an amendment made in 1949. Whether or not that is so, there is power given to the Minister of Defence Production to repay into the consolidated revenue fund such portions of the $10 million as he believes are not required. That has been the position for several years. Now we have this amendment under which the Minister of Defence Production will be able to require payment back to the corporation from the consolidated revenue fund of whatever portion of the money he has repaid which he might think at a later time was needed by the corporation.

There would seem to be this objection to that provision. All advances made to the corporation have to be approved by parliament under section 8, subsection 1, I believe, but with this new provision that will not be necessary. The minister pays some of the money back and then without a vote of parliament he can require payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of whatever portion he may think the corporation needs at a later date. I think that is the effect of the amendment, and I would ask the parliamentary assistant to explain whether or not that is correct, and also whether there is a provision of this kind in any other statute. I have never seen a provision of that type, and it seems to be most unusual.

Mr. McIlraith: That understanding is not quite correct. The original amount authorized to be advanced to the corporation was limited to $10 million. The Minister of Finance may from time to time advance funds out of any unappropriated moneys, and so on, up to $10 million. Let me illustrate the point by taking an example. Suppose that ten advances of $1 million apiece had been made. Then there would be no further authority to advance money to the corporation. It is again a case of obscurity of language and two opinions on it. The discussion on the bill when it was put through and when this authority was given was that this would be authority to advance up to $10 million at any time so that the funds could never at any time exceed $10 million but they could be advanced, be repaid and advanced again. That was always thought to be the position. Doubt has been raised as to that and it is made clear by subsection 7 that loans or advances up to $10 million can be made notwithstanding that two years earlier there may have been an advance that was repaid two years earlier. That is the purpose of it.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

General administration—

185. Departmental administration, $558,397.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, when these estimates were before us the last time we had a series of speeches of some length which were general in nature. It was my intention at that time to deal with a number of matters that come within the purview of this department. However, I will change that plan a bit, make only a few remarks now, and reserve the other matters on which I wish to speak until we come to particular items on which they can be discussed.

Before we leave the first item, I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the representations that have been made to the government from time to time by various labour bodies, and by others who are interested, asking for the introduction of the principle of collective bargaining into the government service. As the minister knows, I put a question on one aspect of this subject to the Secretary of State the other day. He did not give me an answer then, and I have been waiting hopefully for it day by day. The question I asked the Secretary of State was whether he was aware of the request of the Ontario Federation of Printing Trades Unions to the effect that the employees of the government printing bureau be accorded the right to collective bargaining. He told me he would answer in a few days, and I have a strong suspicion that when I get that answer it will be to the effect that as the legislation now stands there is no possibility of according collective bargaining rights to government employees in the federal printing bureau. Anticipating that I would get this answer from the Secretary of State I realized that my next question would have to be directed to the Minister of Labour, that I would have to ask him if consideration had been given to amending the federal labour code to provide that collective bargaining be accorded the printing bureau employees. Therefore, I assume we can take the answer of the Secretary of State as read, and so I move on to the next stage. Thus I am now putting the matter up to the Minister of Labour.

I feel very strongly that this matter should be considered. Indeed I feel there is a case for collective bargaining in many if not all the branches of the government service, but I suggest that one place it certainly could be started is in the federal printing bureau. It does not seem logical that employees of the Canadian National Railways, Trans-Canada Air Lines, Polymer Corporation and other bodies of that sort, which belong to the government, should be permitted to organize and enter into collective bargaining with their employers while those in the printing bureau, which likewise belongs to the government, are left in a different category. It seems to me that sooner or later this subject will have to be dealt with by the government as a whole, but the person upon whose recommendation the government would make any move in this direction is the Minister of Labour, because the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act comes under his supervision. I draw to the attention of the minister the fact that two of the labour congresses, at any rate, which presented their briefs to the government this year—the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour—asked for the right of collective bargaining for government employees.

I earnestly hope the minister is giving consideration to this matter. I realize that he has not been in the department very long, that he wants to get his feet, and get the feel of things in the labour field. But I can tell him there is a very strong feeling on the part of many government employees that this should be done. That certainly is the feeling over at the printing bureau. I want to be quite frank about this matter and say I am a member of the international typographical union, which means that I have contacts with many of the employees at the bureau and know how they feel about this matter. Similar representations from other government employees have been made to me, and I urge the minister to take appropriate steps.

That is perhaps the main point I wish to bring to the attention of the minister on this first item. One other matter I should like to draw to his attention is that in the two labour congress briefs to which I already have referred the minister and government are asked to include the check-off in the national labour code. The minister made some reference to this question in an earlier debate, as to whether or not labour really wanted the check-off in the code. I simply draw his attention to the fact that it was asked for again in the briefs of both these congresses. It was interesting to note that one of those congresses appeared before the government at about noon on April 10, asking amongst other things for the deductibility of trade union dues for income tax purposes. As the Minister of Labour recalls, that is one request that seemed to be granted in a hurry, because it was announced by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech that evening. That was, of course, only a coincidence, for that was a battle we had been waging a long time. It is good to know that some of these requests do get consideration, and I hope the minister will seriously consider the matters I have just drawn to his attention; that is, the question of collective bargaining rights for government employees, starting at the printing bureau and moving, I would hope, into other branches of the government service, and the question of including the check-off in the national labour code.

There is just one other matter on this first item, and I will leave the rest until later. This matter the minister may say I should leave until we reach the unemployment insurance item, but I should like to make the point now. The hon. member for Hamilton West referred to it in her remarks the last time these estimates were before us. I refer to the change that has been made in the unemployment insurance regulations respecting married women. As the minister will recall, I asked him a question about this on the orders of the day quite early this session. The point which it seems to me has not been sufficiently emphasized as yet in any public discussion of the matter is the fact that a married woman is now called upon, under the new regulations, to meet an additional requirement which is not imposed on other people in order to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. A great deal has been made of the argument that unemployment insurance is not supposed to be a fund to provide for a honeymoon. It has been argued that if a woman who has been employed and contributing to the fund marries and quits her job, that is her business and she should not expect to draw unemployment insurance. But there are cases in which a married woman finds it necessary to work because her husband is not able to earn enough to make both ends meet at today's high prices. That woman is available for employment; she reports and wants to work but cannot get work, and is still denied her benefits because she has not proven her attachment to the labour market by being actually at work for 90 days after her marriage.

Mr. Gregg: If my hon. friend will permit me to interrupt, I am sure he will be glad to learn that later on I have a statement to make on that matter arising out of a series of hearings the unemployment insurance commission has been holding during the last two weeks with representatives of labour unions and others. The recommendations to me will, I think, almost entirely overcome the objections my hon. friend raises. Later on I shall be able to put that on the record.

Mr. Knowles: When one gets action as quickly as that I am ready to accede to the minister's request and leave the matter until later. I am indeed glad to hear that consideration has been given the representations that have been made to the minister. I hope the changes to be made will meet the point I have just emphasized.

Mr. Gregg: On the other matter, I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would not want me to anticipate the reply of my colleague the Secretary of State on the question affecting the printing bureau personnel.

Mr. Johnston: I would like to say one word on this first item, because I do not believe I can say it on any other. It is a matter to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has already referred; that is, the check-off. Generally speaking I think labour throughout the country is asking for the check-off. Alberta is one of those progressive provinces in regard to labour legislation who have already taken that step. In Alberta we have the check-off if an employee so signifies; and furthermore that check-off is irrevocable for three months after it has commenced. I think that would settle one of the difficulties labour seems to have at this time. They have been endeavouring for a long time to get the check-off. Some provinces have now agreed to that, and I think it would be in the interests of both labour and management in Canada if that provision were incorporated in our labour code. I wish the minister would give consideration to that, and see if there could not be some regulation or amendment made to our labour code so that it would conform to that of some of the other provinces who have already given the check-off.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I shall be glad to give consideration to that matter. On second thought, Mr. Chairman, I believe I should like to put on the record a statement regarding the married women's regulations before this general item is passed.

On November 15, 1950, the unemployment insurance commission made a regulation restricting the payment of benefits to married women. This regulation was designed to stop an unintended drain on the unemployment insurance fund through payments of benefit to married women who had really withdrawn from the labour market.

When the regulation had been in effect for a few months the commission made a survey of its local offices. This disclosed that during the first month after the regulation came into effect a large percentage of married women, whose claims were disallowed thereby, made no further effort to keep alive their applications for employment. Out of 8,884 married women who were disqualified because of this regulation during that period, approximately 18 per cent kept alive their application for employment; 5 per cent reported that they had found work; and 77 per cent allowed their application for employment to lapse.

The first few months of operation, and submissions to courts of referees, also disclosed certain inequities. The commission proposed to make certain changes in the regulation, the principal amendments being: First, it was provided that the additional conditions imposed by the regulation would not apply to a married woman who left her employment voluntarily with just cause for reasons connected solely with her employment. This proviso was new, and was in addition to the other grounds on which a married woman claimant would not be subject to the regulation. Secondly, it was provided that the regulation would not apply to a married woman whose husband was wholly incapacitated for work for at least four consecutive weeks. The present provision is that the husband must be wholly and permanently incapacitated. However, the wife would not be relieved from having to fulfil the additional conditions imposed by the regulation if her husband was receiving compensation for the incapacity or was continuing to receive remuneration.

Before presenting these changes to the governor in council for approval the commission felt it desirable to consult representatives of the principal labour organizations. A meeting was held on April 10, 1951, to receive their views regarding proposed amendments, a draft of which had been circulated to these organizations beforehand. The organizations represented at the meeting were: The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, Canadian Congress of Labour, the railway brotherhoods. The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour was unable to send a representative but made known its views in writing.

In presenting the draft amendments for consideration by the unions, the commission pointed out that the result of this regulation, which came into effect November 15, 1950, amply justified the stand taken by the commission and the unemployment insurance advisory committee, and had proved conclusively that a large number of married women, who in the past have drawn benefit, were not actually in the labour market and were causing an undue drain on the fund.

The union representatives agreed that the amendments met many of their objections, but requested modification of two of the provisions as follows: The regulation provides that, to draw benefit, a married woman must be in employment for ninety days following marriage, if unemployed when married, or ninety days after the first separation from employment following marriage if she was employed when married. The unions asked that ninety days of employment should run from the date of marriage in either case. The commission felt that the adoption of this suggestion would make the regulation of little value as a large number of women continue to work without any interruption for a considerable period after marriage. However, the commission is prepared to modify the regulation to the effect that if a married woman was in employment at the time of marriage only sixty of the ninety days of employment required be after the first separation after marriage. The unions objected to the provision that benefit would be denied a married woman while her husband was incapacitated if he was in receipt of compensation or remuneration while so incapacitated. The commission has expressed its willingness to delete this restriction from the regulation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have a rather complicated outline here which I would prefer not to put on the record at this time because, while this recommendation has been made by the chief commissioner to the minister, it has not been finally adopted by the governor in council, which is necessary to put the regulation into effect. I am quite confident when that is done it will overcome the legitimate complaints that were made with regard to the married woman question.

Mr. Knowles: The minister's statement is a bit complicated, and we will have to study it closely before expressing a final opinion, but—

Mr. Gregg: That is the reason I put it on the record now.

Mr. Knowles: I realize that, but I am still doubtful whether it will meet some legitimate and deserving cases. I have in mind, for example, one about which I wrote the minister only a few days ago. The minister replied that he would have that particular case looked into. Even though you reduce to sixty days the portion of that ninety days' work that is required after marriage, you are still requiring of married women, before they qualify for benefits, something you do not require of anyone else. The ordinary person must prove, under the Unemployment Insurance Act and regulations, an attachment to the labour market. He proves that attachment to the labour market by being available, by reporting once a week to the unemployment insurance office, and being able and willing to take work if offered. But you require of married women, under the special regulations, not only that they be available and not only that they report once a week; you require that they actually be at work.

If a married woman needs work, wants it, and tries her best to get it but cannot get it then you deny her unemployment insurance benefits to which she is otherwise entitled because she has not proven her attachment to the labour market by actually being at work. It seems to me that is the aspect that is unfair; it is a discrimination against married women. If I have misunderstood what the minister has announced tonight and if he can prove to me it does meet that point I shall be happy to accept it. But I am afraid that what he has just said does not meet that point.

Mr. Gregg: Perhaps we could leave the matter there and refer to it again when we come to the unemployment insurance item.

Mrs. Fairclough: Like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I tried to follow this statement as the minister made it. I am sure he would agree, however, that it is very difficult to get a clear picture from a statement as complicated as that. I do think that, inasmuch as certain other groups were given an opportunity to study these regulations, they might have been made available to those of us who were interested in them. I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken that there is discrimination here. After all this clause in the regulations was designed apparently to curb what was agreed to be a practice that was detrimental to the workings of the act. It is not the only practice which has come into being through the vagaries of employment. There are many classes of workers who, from time to time, have tended to take advantage of the act and of the benefits. They have not been discriminated against in the same manner as this particular class of worker. There are a great many of them who leave employment at various periods, just on a whim, will take periods of leisure, and return again. They are not so penalized. I really cannot let this particular statement go by without making the remark that this is the one class of worker that has had a definite regulation placed against her receiving benefits. I believe it is actually a case of discrimination.

Mr. Higgins: I want to ask the minister one question, but I find no item to which I can specifically relate it, except the general item. On Tuesday last he was good enough to inform me with respect to the employment of labour at Goose Bay airport, the United States base. He answered the question as reported at page 2980 of Hansard. There is no doubt about the fact that large numbers of men are to be employed on the construction work at Goose Bay airport. The question I want to put to the minister is this. I have been informed, from what I believe is a fairly reliable source, that the United States government plans an expenditure of $200 million for the construction work at Goose Bay airport. I have been further informed that the expenditure by the United States government necessitates or requires by that government an extension of the lease or a new lease of the part of the airport that is being used by the United States forces. The other part of the question, if the minister can or will answer, is this. Is this not the real reason for the agreement by the United States government to the changes in the agreement with regard to United States bases in Newfoundland?

Mr. Gregg: I think I shall have to take that as notice of the question. I am sure that my hon. friend would not expect me to answer offhand.

Mr. Hees: I notice by this evening's press that the national advisory council had a meeting today and that the question of national registration was expected to come up for discussion. Is the minister able to make a statement or to give us some little information as to how the discussion went, or to tell us something about it?

Mr. Gregg: When my estimates were up for discussion previously, I indicated that that was an item on which the council asked that a report be submitted at their next meeting. It is on the agenda of their meetings today and tomorrow. I sat in at some of the meetings today, but a report on that item or on any other item, as a matter of fact, affecting the discussion today has not yet been submitted to me.

Mr. Gillis: The minister put on the record the deliberations of the committee that sat here recently in Ottawa for the purpose of making representations to the unemployment insurance commission. In addition to what the minister has already set out with regard to the controversy about married women, I understand there was another committee from the hospital associations across this country, arguing the question whether hospital employees should be brought in or otherwise. I am wondering if the minister has any information as to the outcome of that particular representation. I know that I have received many letters, as no doubt other hon. members have. I wonder if the minister can bring us up to date on that matter?

While I am on my feet, I should like to support my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think if the minister will take a look at the regulation that amended the section with regard to married women, and will read it over, he will have to agree that the drafting of that regulation leaves much to be desired. For a start, let me read section 5A (1). It is as follows:

> Every married woman shall be disqualified from receiving benefits for the period of two years following her marriage unless she is relieved sooner from any such disqualification as provided in this section.

From reading that you would imagine that because a woman married, she immediately put herself outside the Unemployment Insurance Act. I am sure that was not intended; but that is exactly the interpretation that I would give this section. Then when you go on and find what has been added to that particular clause, while the minister's explanation that he read into the record sounds rather plausible, it certainly makes it exceedingly ambiguous and, in my opinion, does not change the thing at all. You would be led to believe that the reasonable thing to do would be to decide that if that woman retained her employment for sixty days, as is provided now in the proposed amendment, she would then be eligible for unemployment insurance. But that is not the case. In the second amendment to that particular section, it is definitely stated that she has to prove her right to unemployment insurance by working. If she is working she does not want unemployment insurance. I think the whole thing is badly worded.

I have a fairly good idea of what the department is trying to get at, and I am sympathetic with the objective. But I do not think the minister has overcome the difficulty either in this amendment that I have here or even by the one he read into the record. All that has been done in what he has read into the record is to lower the number of days that she has to be working. It was ninety days. The act has been amended by bringing the period down to sixty days. But that amendment still means that she has to prove her eligibility for unemployment insurance by working. That is nonsense. I think that someone should take hold of this provision and write it in a plain and simple manner. I think if a woman is working for a firm, or is a stenographer for the government and wants to get married, she should not have any trouble in getting time off, coming back to her employment and continuing it. But according to this section here, the fact that she got married immediately constitutes a separation from her employer. I do not think that is intended; but that is exactly how it can be interpreted and is how it is in fact being interpreted in a great many cases. I still think that the minister's proposed amendment does not clean the thing up.

[Mr. Higgins.]

I wonder if the minister could bring us up to date on what was done about the representation of the hospital associations across the country in the matter of bringing hospital employees in?

Mr. Gregg: As I said before, I think we might leave the suggested changes to the regulations with regard to married women, for further study on the part of all of us; and I will promise to bring the matter up again under the unemployment insurance item. This has been a week of conferences. It is true that the commission has also been meeting representatives of the hospital associations of Canada. I have here a brief statement. I know that a number of members have had telegrams, and that some hospitals have been worrying for fear that there was an attempt on the part of the commission to put the main part of the hospital staff under the regulations.

The unemployment insurance commission had a meeting on May 16 with representatives of hospital associations, other charitable organizations and the principal labour organizations to receive their views on its proposals for extending unemployment insurance coverage to some classes of employees in hospitals and charitable institutions.

The proposals made a year ago had been modified and it was suggested that only the administrative and maintenance workers be insured. Most of the persons in these groups were in occupations where they are normally insured when in industry. The commission did not propose to insure medical, nursing or technical staff. Clergymen and members of religious orders would of course remain non-insurable also.

Briefs were received from thirty-eight organizations and individuals. Fourteen supported the proposal. Twenty-four were opposed.

The hospital associations stated that they were in favour of unemployment insurance but could not support the proposal at present because of the additional cost. They saw no way of meeting this except by passing it on to the patients or curtailing their services.

The labour organizations felt that as most workers in hospitals and charitable institutions were in the lower paid groups, and as the turnover was fairly high, it was important that those in occupations where they would normally be insured elsewhere should not suffer an interruption of insurance when employed in similar occupations in hospitals and charitable institutions. They were therefore anxious to see at least the non-professional and general labour groups insured.

I might add here, those in small or medium-size hospitals are not very many, elevator people perhaps, some people on the office staff, carpenters and so forth.

The commission stated that it would give consideration to these representations before any action was taken. It might be possible to make further modifications in its proposals so as to provide insurance for the most vulnerable groups without making too serious an increase in costs.

I can assure hon. members that no drastic action is being taken. The matter is being explored very carefully in the light of all the representations that have been received.

Mr. Johnston: Is the government planning to bring in an amendment to the act to cover these hospital workers? The minister said that no drastic plan is going to be introduced to cover all the workers.

Mr. Gregg: We would not have to amend the act to do this. If the hospitals want half their employees or any number of their employees insured, we could easily extend the regulations to do it. We do not have to amend the act to do that.

Mr. Johnston: I understand it could be done by changing the regulations rather than by an amendment to the act. But as I understood the minister's remarks, he said that preparation was being made to introduce regulations to cover some of these employees. Is that right?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, but we do not want to do that if the hospitals say they cannot afford to do it. That is the crux of the whole thing; and all the protests and telegrams that hon. members have been receiving this past week —I have received one or two myself—have been from hospital administrations who are fearful now. They are being strained to the limit, and they are fearful that this might be beyond their means. So it is out of consideration to hospitals' administration that we are only considering this at this juncture for those people who are described here as the "most vulnerable employees".

Mr. Johnston: Just a word on the point that the minister raised. He says that he does not want to do anything that will be an added cost to the hospital. In the presentations which were received from the hospitals their main argument is that they do not want all these employees brought in. In fact they do not want any in the institution brought in, because it would be an added cost to them, and their budgets now are overburdened. In my judgment that should not be a consideration. Certainly these people whom the minister indicated, like carpenters, the elevator workers, the charwomen and dishwashers, and such people as those, have a right to protection other than for charity's sake.

What is to be the condition of those people amongst whom, as the minister stated, and I think rightly so, there is a great turnover in employment? They work probably only four or five months and then they are kicked out and somebody else is brought in. I do not think we can just disregard these working people who are employed by the hospitals. We cannot just disregard them and say, we are not going to give you unemployment insurance protection because if we did it would break the budget of the hospital. Do not forget that the hospitals are not charity institutions. I have had a little experience with them, and I know that you pay for what you get from a hospital. Do not make any mistake about that.

If they cannot raise enough money in their ordinary budget to safeguard these working people—and I am not including the nurses who are in training or the doctors who have just graduated from medical school, and are working as internes—if they cannot raise enough money from their ordinary revenue they will have to get assistance from the federal government or the municipalities, but that should not be used as an excuse to disregard these people and kick them out from under the protection of unemployment insurance. The minister should give that very careful consideration. These people in that labour category who may be fired today or tomorrow or next month should have some protection from unemployment insurance.

Mr. Knight: The minister mentioned that he has received many representations from both sides of the case. Would it be correct to assume, as the hon. member for Bow River has assumed, that most of the representations received from management were in favour of one side of the case, while most of the representations received from the classes of workers which he described are all on the other side? Would that be a correct picture of the situation?

Mr. Gregg: Because of the fact that I knew it was a live topic I violated the committee rules by putting it on the record. I hoped that it would not be debated in detail, but since I have answered the other questions I shall answer this one. The carpenters, for example, would be represented by virtue of the fact that the unions were represented at the hearings with U.I.C. this week. I would hope that this general item might pass tonight so that we could get on item by item at the next sitting.

[Mr. Johnston.]

The Deputy Chairman: Is it not a fact that the general discussion has been over for half an hour? These unemployment insurance matters could be discussed on item 201 and others. If hon. members would accept the suggestion made by the minister, we could pass the first item now, and the other questions relating to unemployment insurance could be asked on item 201.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am as anxious to see this item passed as the minister, but I do have a specific question that I wish to ask on these estimates. I have a question to ask in regard to printing of departmental reports and other publications, as appears on page 217, and also the following item, newspaper, radio, film, displays and other publicity. The amount estimated is $8,500 less than last year in the one instance and some $14,500 in the other; in fact, a total of $23,000 less in these two items. I notice there are 13 fewer employees for the current year than last year. Is there any relationship between these two facts; that is, that there are 13 fewer employees and that the amounts in these two items mentioned are considerably lower than those of last year? What is the nature of the reports, and so on, that have been discontinued to effect this saving?

Mr. Gregg: There have been no reports of any moment that have been discontinued. Savings have been made on existing reports by making them not so elaborate and by cutting down on the cost. The 13 fewer employees in the grand total has no extraordinary relation to this item.

Mr. Fair: What I have to say will take one or two minutes. The minister has pointed out that 38 briefs were presented to the unemployment insurance commission. Fourteen of these wanted the hospital employees included, and 24 were against it. A year ago when an attempt was made to bring hospital employees under the unemployment insurance scheme I had representations from every hospital within the Battle River constituency and many objections were sent by all of them. All of them wanted to be excluded from the unemployment insurance.

Mr. Gregg: Excluded or included?

Mr. Fair: Excluded from the unemployment insurance commission, and I have not had any indication that they have changed their minds since. Since they have individually, in most cases, asked to be excluded, I do not feel at this time that heavier expenses should be imposed on them.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday we will proceed with government notice of motion in the name of the Minister of Labour. Before taking up the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister we will consider Bill No. 285, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. This bill has come back from the banking and commerce committee and the Minister of Finance tells me that he is anxious to have it passed as soon as possible. After that we will take up the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister referring the Torquay agreements to the standing committee on banking and commerce. When those matters have been disposed of we will move to go into committee of supply and call three departments, finance, national health and welfare and mines and technical surveys. If there is time left we shall take up Bills Nos. 191 and 192.

Mr. Knowles: When we go into supply are you just opening the departments?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Just opening the departments.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following item was passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

The house met at three o'clock.

HUMAN RIGHTS

STATEMENT AS TO ENACTMENT OF LEGISLATION AND APPROVAL OF UNITED NATIONS DECLARATION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on May 14 the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked the following question, as reported at page 2980 of Hansard:

> Will the government comply with the recent request . . . for the introduction in both houses of parliament this session of a resolution approving the inclusion in the Canadian constitution of a declaration of human rights and liberties, and that pending appropriate legislation such approval should affirm parliament's acceptance on behalf of Canada of the United Nations declaration of human rights?

The question asked by the hon. member divides itself into two parts.

The first part refers to the inclusion in the Canadian constitution of a declaration of human rights and liberties. This would require an amendment of the constitution affecting both the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures.

Under the present procedure such an amendment would have to be made by the parliament at Westminster, and this government would not recommend an application for such action by the parliament at Westminster without the consent of the provincial legislatures or governments.

The federal government is now discussing with the provincial governments the establishment of a satisfactory procedure to have future amendments to the constitution made by Canadian authorities here in Canada, and while these discussions are proceeding this government does not intend to initiate discussions about a matter like that referred to in the question, which is apt to be quite controversial and might retard the solution of the question relating to the establishment of a satisfactory procedure to make future amendments here in Canada.

As for the second part, the Canadian government has already, through the affirmative vote of the Canadian delegation in the general assembly of the United Nations, accepted the universal declaration of human rights as a general statement of principles to which we subscribe. Before the vote was taken on the declaration, the Canadian delegation stated that it had various reservations on details of the text. The head of the Canadian delegation added that certain important aspects of the declaration were within the field of provincial jurisdiction, and that in regard to any rights defined in the document the federal government did not intend to invade that field of provincial jurisdiction.

Now, since this universal declaration of human rights is not a legal instrument, the government does not propose to ask parliament, in advance of the submission for signature of the proposed convention on the same subject which is now under consideration by the United Nations, to endorse the approval expressed by Canada through its delegation.

Mr. Coldwell: I thank the Prime Minister for his extended reply. I should like to ask him, however, if he does not think that a resolution of both houses affirming parliament's support of this declaration would be of much value to those who are working for similar declarations in other parts of the world.

Mr. St. Laurent: I should not like to express any opinion as to what its value might be to those who are working for similar declarations elsewhere, but I would fear that that kind of declaration here would make it more difficult to proceed in the calm attitude which has been maintained up to the present time in our own efforts to secure agreement on a proper form to amend our own constitution in Canada.

Mr. Graydon: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if any other legislative bodies have endorsed the universal declaration of human rights.

Mr. St. Laurent: I would not like to give a snap answer to that question. I will ask that the records of the United Nations in that regard be examined, and try to get the information for the hon. member.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PAGE BOYS—HOLIDAY IN MONTREAL

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, the holiday that was arranged for the page boys was made possible by the dollars contributed by hon. members of this house, and I should like to thank those who helped bring this affair to its happy conclusion.

Those who provided their own cars and drove the boys to Montreal included the hon. member for Norquay (Mr. Wood), the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Welbourn), and the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), as well as Mr. Levesque, a member of the staff of the house.

I wish to thank four hon. members for the arrangements they made in Montreal. I refer to the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Houde), the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Healy), the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Whitman), and the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis). Mayor Houde went all out to show the boys of this house a good time. He knows how to treat a boy and give him what he likes.

The trip was arranged by the Clerk of the House and the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the boys were in charge of the chief page, who handled them like a veteran. Tonight, Mr. Speaker, you may go home feeling happy that the page boys have been treated by the members of this house as members in good standing of the family of the House of Commons.

POST OFFICE ACT

MEASURE TO CONSOLIDATE, CODIFY AND AMEND EXISTING LEGISLATION

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 322, respecting the Canada Post Office.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Rinfret: I should first say that there has been no revision of the Post Office Act since chapter 161 of the 1927 revised statutes, which at the time was little more than a consolidation of chapter 66 of the revised statutes of 1906 and the relatively few amendments enacted during the intervening twenty-one years. As a matter of fact, with the exception of a few amendments relating to the appointment of personnel under the Civil Service Act and to certain changes in rates, most of the provisions of the 1927 revision are the same as those found in chapter 35 of the 1886 revised statutes, and in the old Post Office Act of 1867.

The purpose of the present revision is to consolidate and codify all legislation relating to the activities of the Canada post office, to bring old and new provisions in line with present practices and conditions; to simplify and clarify sections where necessary; to eliminate redundant and unnecessary sections, and to improve the general style and arrangement by reducing the law to a systematic form.

Mr. Ferguson: Would this not be a good time to renovate all departments of the government?

[Mr. McIvor.]

Mr. Drew: Perhaps this would be the proper time to ask the minister if in the amendments he is presenting he has included a provision which will bring to an end inequalities in postal rates within a single community.

Mr. Rinfret: I have already told the leader of the opposition that when the legislation is introduced it will speak for itself.

Mr. Drew: That is not an answer.

Mr. Graydon: Is it the intention of the minister to permit this bill to go to a special committee which will deal with postal matters?

Mr. Rinfret: The government has considered the advisability of sending this bill to a special committee, but feels that no reasons have been advanced which would warrant a departure from the ordinary procedure of having the bill discussed in committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

HOUSING—WELLAND, ONT.

Mr. Noseworthy:

1. Did Wartime Housing or any other government agency build a number of houses in or adjoining the city of Welland, between 1939 and 1945?
2. If so, what type of houses were built?
3. How many of each type were built?
4. What was the total cost of each type per house?
5. Have any of these houses been sold?
6. If so, how many?
7. What was the selling price of each type per house?

Mr. Winters:

1. Yes; Wartime Housing Limited built 757 housing units in or adjoining the city of Welland between 1939 and 1945; 360 in the city of Welland and 397 in the township of Crowland.

2. Three types of houses were built: 4-rooms, regular; 4-rooms, large; and 6-rooms.

3.

	City of Welland	Township of Crowland
4-rooms, regular	233	328
4-rooms, large	23
6-rooms	104	69

4.

	City of Welland	Township of Crowland
4-rooms, regular	$3,569.50	$3,350.29
4-rooms, large	3,911.05
6-rooms	4,413.94	4,180.93

5. Yes.

6. 577, as of April 30, 1951.

7.

	City of Welland	Township of Crowland
4-rooms, regular	$2,750-$2,875	$2,300
4-rooms, large	$2,900-$2,950
6-rooms	$3,450-$3,550	$3,000

FISHERIES PRICES SUPPORT—NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. How many quintals of Labrador fish were purchased under the guarantee of the fisheries prices support board in Newfoundland in 1950?
2. What was the total amount paid?
3. How much of this fish has been sold, and what returns have been received?

Mr. MacNaught: The fisheries prices support board advises that precise answers cannot be given to these questions until the audit has been completed after all fish has been delivered, packed and sold or otherwise disposed of. It is understood that small quantities caught too late last season to be brought down from Labrador before the freeze-up are only now being shipped south.

1. It is estimated that 133,000 quintals of Labrador fish will have been covered by the guarantee during the marketing year ending June 30, 1951.

2. The estimated total cost of the 133,000 quintals, including inward freight, handling, drying and packaging is approximately $1,700,000.

3. To date, 104,000 quintals have been sold commercially for approximately $1,080,000; sales to relief agencies of 26,100 quintals returned approximately $246,000. Existing inventory is estimated at 2,900 quintals.

NO. 2 TEMPORARY BUILDING, OTTAWA

Mr. Lennard:

1. What contracts were let for the renovation of No. 2 temporary building, 70 Lyon street, Ottawa, Ontario?
2. Were these contracts cost plus or otherwise?
3. What was the cost of same?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Painting and decorating of offices of Department of Defence Production.

2. Cost plus fixed fee.

3. Approximately $35,000, including fixed fee.

FISHERIES—LABRADOR CURE—GUARANTEED PRICE AND ALLOWANCES

Mr. Higgins:

1. What was the price guaranteed to the fishermen for each type of cure of the Labrador codfish production for 1950?
2. Were the fishermen entitled to any allowances in addition to the set price?
3. If so, what are the particulars of such allowances?
4. Was the price computed on the fishermen's estimated cost of production?

Questions

5. If not, on what was the price based?
6. What were the arrangements made with exporters or others for handling the fish produced by the fishermen?
7. If handling charges were allowed exporters, what were these charges?
8. Were the allowances made to fish exporters or others for handling the 1950 production of Labrador salt codfish based on the exporters' estimate of cost?
9. If not, what was the basis of those handling charges?

Mr. MacNaught: The fisheries prices support board advises as follows:

1. Semi-dry, $7.00 per quintal (112 lbs.); ordinary-cure, $7.00 per quintal (112 lbs.); salt bulk, $5.50 per quintal (140 lbs); cullage, $3.00 per quintal (112 lbs.).

Note: Consideration of a differential between ordinary cure and semi-dry will be given when the review of the full year's operation under the guarantee takes place.

2. Yes, certain transportation charges.

3. (1) On fish produced by stationers and permanent Labrador residents, transportation charges from northern points to merchants' premises in Newfoundland were allowed as follows:

(a) north of Domino, $1.75 per quintal; (b) Domino and South Labrador, $1.50 per quintal; (c) north of Goose cape and Flowers cove in Newfoundland, $1.25 per quintal. (These rates include collection, handling, freight and insurance).

(2) On fish produced by floaters, transportation charges from home port to port of sale were allowed at 50 cents or 25 cents per quintal, depending on distance between ports, at the discretion of the Newfoundland fisheries board and provided that the fish was transported in the producer's vessel.

(3) Actual freight charges to fishermen who delivered their fish to Newfoundland ports by regular shipping services.

The effect of these allowances was that all fishermen received the appropriate guaranteed price at his home port.

4. Yes, in so far as information on such costs was available.

5. Another consideration was the estimated return to fishermen from such export sales contracts as had been arranged prior to the guarantee.

6. (1) Exporters

Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters Limited (NAFEL), the sole exporter of salted fish from Newfoundland, agreed to act as selling agent for the fisheries prices support board, for a provisional commission of three per cent of the f.a.s. sales value, subject to final determination on the basis of NAFEL's ultimate charge to its own members for handling 'shore' fish of 1950 production.

(2) Merchants

(a) The following costs, f.a.s. bulk per quintal, for the handling of the fish including labour, overhead, cartage, wharfage and shrinkage, by areas, were allowed: St. John's $2.43; Bonavista $2.07; Conception bay $2.32; north of Cape Bonavista $1.92.

(b) Where special drying was ordered by NAFEL to meet the requirements of certain markets, charges were allowed covering costs and loss in weight, as follows:

	St. John's $ per qtl.	Outports $ per qtl.
Semi-dry to hard dry..	2.02	1.73
Ordinary cure to semi-dry	1.78	1.49
Ordinary cure to hard dry	2.92	2.63
Ordinary cure to 40 per cent.....	2.20	1.91
Semi-dry to 40 per cent	1.46	1.17

(c) Packages were to be paid for in accordance with established rates.

(d) Freight costs were to be allowed for transportation from licensed packers to point of export and to another point of export, if necessary.

(e) Storage charges were to be determined by NAFEL and the Salt Codfish Association, subject to approval of the Newfoundland fisheries board.

(f) In certain special cases, a charge for brushing fish will be allowed, subject to approval of the Newfoundland fisheries board, at cost.

(g) In certain special cases on fish brought in to St. John's from outports, an allowance will be made to cover storage and handling charges in taking fish in and out of store and cartage where necessary to export vessel, subject to the approval of the Newfoundland fisheries board.

7. Answered by No. 6.

8. No.

9. (1) Exporters: The final commission to NAFEL will be based on actual costs incurred.

(2) Merchants: Allowances were agreed by negotiation between representatives of the fisheries prices support board and the Newfoundland Salt Codfish Association and were based on average costs determined through prior investigations conducted by the Newfoundland fisheries board.

[Mr. MacNaught.]

HEALTH AND WELFARE—INFLUENZA

Mr. Cleaver:

Has the Department of National Health and Welfare taken any measures with respect to influenza in Canada?

Mr. Martin: A national influenza centre has been established at the laboratory of hygiene with an advisory committee composed of a number of experts in virus diseases.

This centre is working in close co-operation with the world influenza centre in London, England, with the virus research centre at the Connaught Medical Research Laboratories at Toronto, and the regional centres in the United States, and exchanges with them the latest information on current epidemics and the development of new vaccines.

During the recent epidemic, our national influenza centre, in collaboration with the departments of health of all provinces, isolated and identified the influenza virus causing the epidemic. Comparative studies of this strain of virus revealed that it was identical with the strain which caused the recent epidemic in England.

In close co-operation with the American advisory committee on influenza, the problem of the efficacy of influenza vaccines was carefully studied in selected groups during the recent epidemic. These studies indicated that the older vaccines which were commercially available had little protective effect in this particular outbreak and newer improved vaccines are now being developed.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CRANBERRIES

Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne):

1. During each of the last ten years (a) what quantities of cranberries were imported by Canada from the United States; (b) what was the estimated production of Canadian cranberries?

2. During each of these years, what was the average wholesale price of (a) Canadian cranberries; (b) imported cranberries?

3. What was the average wholesale price on the New York market during each of the years 1948, 1949 and 1950?

4. What protection is now given Canadian cranberry producers against the imports of United States cranberries?

5. Has there been any change since 1940 in this protection? If so, what is the change?

C. D. HOWE COMPANY LIMITED

Mr. Balcer:

1. During the years 1935 to 1951, inclusive, in respect of what projects has the firm of C. D. Howe Company, Limited, been retained by the government of Canada, by any department thereof, by any dominion crown company, or by any other agency, board or commission to (a) prepare plans and/or specifications; (b) supervise construction; (c) assume responsibility for any other work or service?

2. In respect of any such work or service, (a) in what cases were tenders not called for; (b) in what cases, where tenders were called for, were lowest tenders not accepted?

3. On what basis were fees or other remuneration paid to the said company for such work and services?

4. What was the total amount of fees and remuneration so paid?

5. What is the total amount of fees and remuneration under contract and not yet paid?

COST OF CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCES

Mr. Fulton:

1. What was the total cost to Canada of representation at each of the 168 conferences listed in appendix B to the report of the external affairs department for 1950, exclusive of the salaries of permanent employees who attended as Canadian representatives?

2. Of the total cost, how much in each case was for (a) travelling expenses; (b) accommodation and allowances, whether living allowance or otherwise, while the conference was in session; (c) salaries and wages of such special assistants, secretaries, clerical help and advisers as were employed especially for the particular conference?

3. What was the total number of personnel, including those mentioned under 2(c), attending or assisting in any capacity at the conferences themselves?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

APPROVAL OF ILO CONVENTION FIXING MINIMUM AGE FOR EMPLOYMENT OF CHILDREN AT SEA

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Labour) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve of convention No. 58, fixing the minimum age for the admission of children to employment at sea (revised 1936) adopted by the general conference of the international labour organization at its 22nd session at Geneva on the 24th day of October, 1936, as modified by the final articles revision convention, 1946, and that this house do approve of the same.

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to obtain approval by parliament of a convention passed by the general conference of the international labour organization at Geneva at its 22nd session, October 24, 1936. Upon approval of its terms by parliament the government proposes to proceed to the ratification of the convention.

Convention No. 58 provides that children under the age of fifteen years shall not be employed for work on vessels other than vessels upon which only members of the same family are employed. There are two exceptions in the convention to this general provision. First, national laws may provide for the issue, in respect of children not less than fourteen years, of certificates permitting them to be employed in cases in which an educational or other appropriate authority is satisfied, having due regard to the health and physical condition of the child and to the prospective as well as the immediate benefit to the child of the employment proposed, that such employment will be beneficial to the child. Second, the provision does not apply to work done by children on school ships or training ships, provided that such work is approved and supervised by public authority.

This parliament has already approved the principle contained in this convention, and has given effect to it by an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act contained in chapter 35 of the statutes of Canada, 1948, repealing the former section 279 of the said act, and substituting therefor a new section 279 which provides that no person under fifteen years of age shall be employed on any vessel, subject to specified exceptions which correspond to the exceptions contained in convention 58, which I have outlined above.

It will be evident that Canada is already in full compliance with the provisions of this convention, and that no new legislation is required for this purpose. The convention has been ratified by ten other countries, namely, Belgium, Brazil, Bulgaria, France, Iraq, The Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, and the United States. Canada ratified an earlier ILO convention No. 7, in March, 1926, fixing the minimum age for admission of children to employment at sea at fourteen years of age. This convention is in fact a revision of convention No. 7.

Perhaps I should explain just what obligations follow upon the ratification of an ILO convention by a member state of the ILO. When the ratification has been communicated to the director of the international labour organization, the ratifying state is required to take such action as may then be necessary to give effect to the provisions of the convention by the enactment of legislation or otherwise if this has not already been done. Each of the member states ratifying the convention agrees to make periodic reports to the international labour office on the measures which it has taken to give effect to the provisions of the convention.

In effect, therefore, a member state ratifying a convention assumes the obligation that the provisions of the convention shall be given continuing effect, in that its legislation and practice on the subject matter of the convention provide labour standards on a level at least as high as the standards established by the provisions of the particular convention.

I therefore recommend to the house the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to delay the house at all on this matter. I imagine that will be welcome news. I have listened to the parliamentary assistant, and I have had the opportunity of studying the proposed resolution. It certainly appears to be one which should have the full commendation of the house. I understand that the principle has been endorsed already by some ten or eleven nations. It was adopted in 1936, and modified by the final articles revision convention in 1946. As all members are aware the ILO is now one of the specialized agencies of the United Nations, and I feel that as such any recommendation of this kind will have the general support of this house. I am sure that no hon. member wants to have children exploited as they have been in the past, and any measure to prohibit such exploitation is bound to have the approval of all hon. members.

There is one question which occurs to me, but I am sure there is a good explanation for it. I understand that the provision under family allowances is that the children must attend school until they are sixteen years of age, otherwise family allowances are not forthcoming. I presume the obvious explanation is that if children are working before they are sixteen—this measure provides that they may work after fifteen—there will be no need for family allowances. I suggest that is the only question about which there may be any doubt. Other than that, I see no reason why passage of this particular resolution should be delayed, and it should receive the wholehearted support of the house.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members of the house will welcome the ratification, not only of this convention but of any other ILO convention, because the purpose is to improve the conditions of those who make their living by working for someone else. I believe this convention came into effect first in 1939, after it received ratification by two members of the ILO. At this distance I could not hear everything the parliamentary assistant said, but I was wondering why the 1936 convention was not ratified by this parliament. I am just wondering why ratification has been delayed until this late date.

The parliamentary assistant said that the terms of the convention are perhaps not as good as the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act. While that may be true, I think most of us have had sufficient experience with conventions of this kind to realize that the terms of the convention do not mean very much. Unless there is adequate inspection to ensure that the convention is carried out, it may be only so many words on paper. I should like to have heard the parliamentary assistant explain the inspection provisions under the Canada Shipping Act which make sure that persons under fifteen years of age are not employed on any vessel except in conformity with the exceptions made in the convention. In this regard I would draw the attention of the house to a press release issued by the Department of Labour on February 8, 1951. The release was received from the ILO in Geneva, and concerns the health and welfare conditions of seamen who travel from port to port in various parts of the world. Their health conditions, the release pointed out, are such as to be a threat to the maritime nations as well as to the seamen themselves.

There are several conventions—I do not know whether we have ratified all of them—dealing with conditions on board ship and the health of seamen. Evidently they have been ratified by other maritime nations, and perhaps by our own. According to the press release I referred to, the enforcement of these conventions still leaves a great deal to be desired. I believe that this resolution should have been moved at a time when the house could go into committee, so that we could obtain information from the Minister of Labour and his experts as to how these conventions are carried out.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant whether in article 2, clause 1, which prohibits children under the age of fifteen from being employed on vessels other than vessels upon which only members of the same family are employed, there is a loophole whereby children may be taken from school to work with their own family when they are under the age of fifteen. It is not very clear. Probably our own law is more explicit in that regard. I should like to know whether or not that is the case.

In clause 2 of the same article, reference is made to "national laws or regulations," and in the fifth line it reads: "appropriate authority designated by such laws or regulations is satisfied." Does that refer to national laws, or to the fact that provincial and local authorities have the sanction of national authority to issue these certificates?—as has been the case, of course, in Ontario with respect to children leaving school for employment other than on vessels.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of arguing the merits or demerits of the resolution, but I should like to point out to the parliamentary assistant that this is a resolution which definitely should go before the committee on industrial relations. There is no hurry about this convention decision. It has been standing since 1936.

From listening to the parliamentary assistant I gained the impression that there is a reservation implied in this resolution as to the decision of the conference to exclude from the age limit laid down by the convention children employed on vessels on which only children of the same family are employed. I do not agree with that. I think it conflicts with the general principle of the resolution. In other words, the father, if he is so minded, can put the children, at ten years of age, aboard a vessel and thus exploit the family, ignoring much of the legislation that we have today with regard to what the province considers to be a proper educational standard before employment is permitted.

Some of the provinces have already established, for work purposes, a definite age limit. This convention decision is cutting right across provincial legislation, and I do not like the reservation that permits the father to exploit the family. The implications of this convention decision are sufficiently serious to justify reference of the resolution to the committee on industrial relations, so that we may at least gain a thorough understanding of what we are doing in accepting the proposal that is now before the house. I therefore move:

That this resolution and the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations for investigation and report.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the apprehensions of the hon. member who spoke last (Mr. Gillis) are not well founded. This exception in the convention would not override any legislation, whether federal or provincial. All that we undertake is that we will not have anything less stringent than what the convention provides. There are provincial regulations with respect to the obligation of parents to have their children attend school, and the exception contained in the convention would not override those regulations but would merely make it an obligation upon us, in the exercise of such jurisdiction as we may have, to endeavour to have the convention complied with. These international labour organization conventions require us to do everything within our jurisdiction that is necessary to compliance with them, and to use our best endeavours to get the other authorities who may have jurisdiction on any subject matter also to comply. But the purpose of these conventions is merely to establish a minimum which the signatories are obliged to comply with; there is no implication that they cannot do more if they feel that more is better suited to the situation of their own country.

I do not think there can be any serious objection to having the resolution go before the industrial relations committee, if hon. members generally feel that they would like to discuss it there with the Minister of Labour or the officials of his department. By our own legislation we do more than is required by this convention; and the purpose of the ratification, as was suggested on another matter by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), is to assist the officials of the international labour organization to get an agreement from others who may not be doing as much as we are doing. If there is any desire to have the matter considered in the committee on industrial relations, the government would have no objection to that being done. I do not know that it is necessary; but if the hon. member insists on his amendment, the government will offer no objection.

Mr. Gillis: So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I would still like to see the resolution go before the committee. I think it would be an education for a great many of us to meet with the officials and to discuss this particular form of legislation.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, may I just make one or two observations in connection with this proposal? As to a number of these conventions which arise out of the deliberations of the special agencies of the United Nations and of international organizations, it seems to me that a procedure such as that which has been recommended by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) ought to be followed. When the conventions come before parliament, they come in the form of a resolution, and there is no opportunity in committee of the whole to interrogate anyone in the government; they sometimes also come in fairly detailed form, as does this convention. On previous occasions, when resolutions of a detailed nature of this kind have been before the house, I have felt that proper provision is not made under the rules for a proper and full discussion unless the matter goes before a special committee of the house.

When the parliamentary assistant rises to answer the questions that have been put to him during this short debate, perhaps he might indicate why we have delayed so long, a circumstance which was mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). If it was a good convention—and I agree that it is—surely it should have been approved long ago. Delaying action of this kind only indicates that this parliament may have had some doubt as to the principle of it, and I think that any such doubt should have been removed long before now.

In addition we ought to know from the parliamentary assistant the dates upon which these various nations officially ratified the convention. That would indicate how far we are behind, or whether we are only keeping abreast of some other slow people in other parts of the world.

Mr. Speaker: Is the amendment in order?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Graydon: Yes, it is, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: Standing order 50.

Mr. Speaker: The motion of the hon. member for Cape Breton South is that the resolution and the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations for investigation and report. Citation 375 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, reads as follows:

> It is not an amendment to a motion to move that the motion go to a committee.

There is also a ruling on page 604, as follows:

> Mr. Woodsworth, seconded by Mr. Garland (Bow River) moved:
>
> That in the opinion of this house, Canada should refuse to accept any responsibility for complications arising from the foreign policy of the United Kingdom.
> And a debate arising thereon;
> Mr. Bourassa, seconded by Mr. Spencer, moved in amendment thereof: That the question be referred to the select standing committee on industrial and international relations for consideration and study with power to invite expert advice: such committee to report to the house during the present session.
>
> Mr. Meighen raising a point of order on the ground that the proposition was not an amendment, said:
>
> I do not rise to address the house on the motion, nor yet on the alleged amendment, but to take exception to the amendment as no amendment at all. It is not an amendment to a motion to move that the motion go to a committee.

Mr. Graydon: Could we not agree on this?

Mr. Speaker: With the unanimous consent of the house there is no doubt that the motion could stand, but I am doubtful whether the motion in its present form is in order. Is it the unanimous consent of the house that the resolution should go to a committee?

Mr. Sinnott: No.

Mr. Knowles: May I point out that when the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) moved his motion, as I understood it, he moved it not as an amendment but as a motion. I submit that that is the point in the ruling that Your Honour has just read from pages 604 and 605 of Beauchesne's third edition. The whole point made by Mr. Meighen was that the proposition being put forward at that time was not an amendment. It was a motion, and that is what is now before us. I submit it is the kind of motion that is provided for by standing order 50, which reads as follows:

> A motion to refer a bill, resolution or any question to the committee of the whole or any standing or special committee shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

What we have before us from the government side is a resolution, one of the items referred to in standing order 50. My colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton South, has moved a motion that this resolution be referred to one of the standing committees. Standing order 50 makes it clear that so long as that motion is before the house there can be no amendment to the main question moved on behalf of the Minister of Labour. Certainly standing order 50 makes it clear that while an amendment of this kind might not be in order as an amendment, as a motion it is. That is what my colleague moved.

Mr. Speaker: I do not see how the hon. member could move a motion at this time without notice.

Mr. Fulton: I have only Beauchesne's second edition before me, but I might point out that citation 49 on page 133 appears to contemplate that the proper time for presenting or making such a motion is the first occasion on which the resolution or matter comes before the house. I read:

> All instructions must be moved on the first occasion when the order for the committee on a bill has been read.

It seems to me that since it would not be known on this side of the house exactly when a motion or resolution was coming up for consideration, it would not always be possible by any means to give forty-eight hours' notice of a motion to refer the matter to a special committee; but since such a motion is clearly in order, as provided for under standing order 50, it does seem to me that the requirement of forty-eight hours notice would not apply to the motion now before Your Honour.

Mr. Speaker: I think the house will agree with me that we cannot have two motions before the house at the same time except in accordance with standing order 48. I think that is clear. In the circumstances, unless there is unanimous consent, I will be forced to rule the motion made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South out of order. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Sinnott: No.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the unanimous wish of the house that the motion proposed by the hon. member for Cape Breton South be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sinnott: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimous consent I must rule the motion out of order. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just before the parliamentary assistant speaks may I express the hope that he will answer some of the questions that have been asked from this side of the house, to which we had hoped we might be able to get the answers in the industrial relations committee. For example, following what the Prime Minister said, we should like to know what the regulations are in Canada at the present time. How much better are our requirements than those in the convention we are now being asked to approve? If possible, I think the parliamentary assistant should give us some detail along that line.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Knowles: He did not move the motion.

Mr. Speaker: The question has been raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the parliamentary assistant did not move the motion, but the parliamentary assistant is speaking for the minister who did move the motion. The minister who moved the motion did not speak, and I have ruled on at least one previous occasion that if a parliamentary assistant speaks on behalf of a minister in his opening address, when he speaks again he closes the debate.

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Mr. Speaker, in the first instance I wish to tell the mover of the motion which was ruled out of order a minute ago that I had no basic objection to letting the standing committee of the house on industrial relations study this particular convention. But I do wish to remind him that the approval which is sought this afternoon is one after the fact, as compared with the practice of other countries of approving and ratifying a convention before making any necessary readjustments in legislation. As a matter of fact, here in Canada it did happen in 1935 that by exception we ratified a convention before enacting any measure of legislation in compliance therewith. But the house will recall that after three conventions had thus been ratified and later on their provisions had been embodied in measures which this house passed, it turned out that this legislation was ultra vires of this parliament, and that it became null and void. Therefore I think it is a wise course that our country has followed over the years not to ratify any convention before the necessary legislation embodying the terms of the convention has been placed on the statute book. This means that today while we are studying the terms of convention 58 we are asked to consider a matter which parliament approved when it gave consideration to certain amendments to the Canada Shipping Act. The matter has already received approval. I am wondering what purpose would be served if the standing committee on industrial relations, in compliance with the suggestion of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), should go over a matter which has already received the approval of parliament.

The hon. member knows very well that, as a member of the standing committee on industrial relations, he is free at any time to express to the chairman of that committee his desire to have the committee called so that certain matters of concern to him and to the House of Commons generally may be considered.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. You have ruled out of order the motion of the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and I suggest the parliamentary assistant should not be allowed to discuss it further.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): It was not my intention to do so. I was using the incident only as an illustration.

Mr. Knowles: We will remember that.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I have been comparing the course followed in Canada with that followed in other countries in the approval and ratification of ILO conventions. I have concluded that the motion to refer the matter to the standing committee on industrial relations could have served a useful purpose only if the convention was to be ratified before any legislation was introduced implementing or embodying its terms.

A question was raised as to the long delay which has taken place between the time of the adoption of the convention by the international labour organization and today, when the approval of the house is sought. Let me point out that conventions of this kind are rarely dealt with by participating governments before the expiry of two or three and sometimes four years.

Mr. Graydon: Why?

Mr. Martin: There has to be time for study.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): In this particular instance, the main cause for delay was the intervening war years 1939 to 1945. As I said in my opening remarks, in 1946 the international labour organization studied and revised the subject matter of the convention. Afterwards it was considered that, in accordance with the policy followed in the past, it would be desirable to wait for the amendment of section 279 of the Canada Shipping Act, so that it might conform with the terms of the convention, and that this should be done before the convention would be submitted to the house for approval. I suggest this explains why, despite the original move in 1936, it is only today that the House of Commons of Canada is being called upon to approve the convention.

I will not add much more to the debate. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has already answered some of the questions put by hon. members. Another question had to do with the enforcement of the provision in the Canada Shipping Act embodying the terms of the convention. I would refer the hon. member to article 4 in part I of the first schedule to the Canada Shipping Act, which states:

> In order to facilitate the enforcement of the provisions of this convention, every shipmaster shall be required to keep a register of all persons under the age of sixteen years employed on board his vessel, or a list of them in the articles of agreement and of the dates of their births.

Now, to meet the request of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) I shall be pleased to have prepared, in tabular form or otherwise, a statement showing how far we are in advance of the strict requirements of the convention in this particular field. When the appropriate item of supply is before the committee I shall be pleased to see that the appropriate document is tabled.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle).]

EDUCATION

REPORTED STATEMENT BY CANDIDATE IN ELECTION CAMPAIGN CONCERNING FEDERAL AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister, founded on a dispatch of May 16, which says that one Norman Wright, the Liberal candidate in Winnipeg South Centre, said:

> There is a growing conviction among all parties that education in Canada must have federal aid.

Will the Prime Minister say whether the candidate was expressing the opinion of the government in this connection?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is that this is a free country, and candidates for election to parliament express their own opinions and ask, on the strength of their opinions, for the support of the electors.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

AUDIBILITY OF DEBATE—REQUEST FOR FURTHER INFORMATION ON SOUND-AMPLIFICATION SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to ask a question of His Honour the Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member asks the question, I would point out that it is not customary to address questions to the Speaker from the floor of the house. See Beauchesne's third edition, citation 302.

Mr. Graydon: Unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: I assure the hon. member, however, that I shall be pleased to see him at the very first opportunity and to discuss with him the matter he has in mind.

Mr. Low: Then I shall direct my question to the Minister of Public Works, and ask him to whisper with Your Honour in private. What progress is being made with plans to instal a sound-amplification system in this chamber? In asking the question I have in mind the splendid report Your Honour presented to the house on March 15, and I am also urged to ask the question because it seems to me to be getting much more difficult, as the days go by, for those of us in this part of the chamber to hear what is going on in other parts—and this afternoon has been no exception.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): When any hon. member is uncertain as to whom he should address a question, I am ready to answer to the best of my ability. There was a report read by Mr. Speaker to the house concerning this matter. Discussions have been taking place—if I am not divulging a secret—between Mr. Speaker and certain experts in these matters. I attended one meeting with these gentlemen.

An hon. Member: As an expert?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not being an expert, I learned quite a bit about the proposed system. Mr. Speaker really is the one who has authority over the House of Commons, and I will heartily support any decision that he may make.

Mr. Coldwell: I imagine that the Department of Public Works is involved in this matter, and I should like to ask the minister whether, so far as that department is concerned, the project is being pressed as rapidly as possible? I quite agree with the hon. member for Peace River that at times it is difficult to hear what is being said.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would hesitate to put pressure on Mr. Speaker in a matter such as this.

Mr. Coldwell: I was not thinking of Mr. Speaker.

DEFENCE CONFERENCE

QUESTION AS TO CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): In the absence of the Minister of National Defence, who I understand is away on public business, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has Canada received an invitation to the commonwealth defence ministers conference to be held in Malta next month?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There has been correspondence between the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Canada in that respect. No decision has yet been reached in the matter, but as soon as one is reached I shall be pleased to communicate it to the house.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

DAWSON ROAD, ST. BONIFACE, TO RICHER, MAN.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. Has the government given approval to detailed plans of construction of the trans-Canada highway from Dawson road, St. Boniface, south to Richer, Manitoba?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. The answer is no.

Mr. Bryce: Has the minister approved any other plans in eastern Manitoba so far as the trans-Canada highway is concerned?

Mr. Winters: To the best of my knowledge, the answer is still the same as the answer I gave the hon. member for St. Boniface a week or so ago, at which time I told him that the plans for the route between Winnipeg and the Manitoba-Ontario boundary had not yet been communicated to the federal government by the provincial government.

MANPOWER

NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL—QUESTION AS TO NATIONAL REGISTRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): In the absence of the Minister of Labour I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary assistant. Has the minister been informed that today's Citizen contains an article stating that the national advisory council on manpower does not think it necessary to conduct a national registration at this time? In view of the fact this is an important question, would the parliamentary assistant care to make a statement?

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): I am aware that the Minister of Labour has followed very closely the work of the advisory council on manpower. I would not go any further at this time. I shall be pleased to bring the question to his attention.

Mr. Drew: In view of the importance that was attached to the appointment of the council at the time it was announced, and in view of the fact that the activities of the council relating to the general problem of manpower affect not only the Department of Labour but the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production as well, will the Prime Minister indicate whether we are to have a report today of the decisions that have been made? If not, when may we have a report that will interpret the decisions reached on Saturday, which apparently are the first definitive decisions following the announcement of the appointment of the council?

Mr. St. Laurent: My understanding was that the committee was to make recommendations. Those recommendations have not yet reached the government, and the government necessarily has not made any decisions upon them. As soon as a decision is made it will be announced to the house.

Mr. Higgins: I should like to ask a supplementary question. The first paragraph of the official release of May 19 reads as follows—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I should have interrupted other hon. members. I think hon. members realize that they should not read dispatches at this time. Will the hon. member put his question without reading the dispatch?

Mr. Higgins: Yes. In the statement to which I was about to refer the suggestion appears that the advisory council is going to use the national census for some of its purposes. Is that correct?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I shall take the question as notice.

CIVIL DEFENCE

RETENTION OF FIRE PROTECTION BARGES AT VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Have reports been received from Vancouver urging that the two fire protection barges which were in use during the last war should not be disposed of to persons in the United States but should be retained in the harbour to assist in the civil defence program?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member gave me notice of his question just before I came into the house. I hope he will permit me to say that last week the hon. member for New Westminster made representations with respect to these barges, particularly in so far as they affect New Westminster. The situation is that the barges are the property of Crown Assets Corporation, and no decision has yet been made as to their disposition. However, the civil defence organization of greater Vancouver has made arrangements to hold them pending the decision that may be made by either the provincial or the federal government.

Mr. Green: I think the objection was to having them sent to the United States.

Mr. Martin: Yes. I have dealt with that by saying that pending a decision the barges are being held in this country.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PROFITS FROM PARTICIPATING POLICIES AND VOTING BY PROXY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 285, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I should say that the bill has already been carefully considered by the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Sections 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Mr. Abbott: If I have unanimous consent, I should like to get it to the other place.

Mr. Knowles: You do not need unanimous consent; second reading was given on a previous day.

Bill read the third time and passed.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

TORQUAY NEGOTIATIONS—REFERENCE OF SUBJECT MATTER TO BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That the subject matter of the Torquay negotiations, namely, the final act of Torquay; the decisions agreeing to accession; the Torquay protocol to the general agreement on tariffs and trade; the modifications of the schedules to the general agreement on tariffs and trade resulting from the Torquay negotiations; and the declaration on the continued application of these schedules, be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I propose to have something to say on this, but before making any observations on the subject matter of this motion I wondered if it was the intention of the Prime Minister to make any statement.

Mr. St. Laurent: Two statements were made to the house, one by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the other by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), on May 8, when the announcement was made. In drafting this resolution we have endeavoured to make it all-inclusive, so that everything that would have any bearing on the subject would be before the committee. That body, being a standing committee has, by virtue of its appointment and the resolution passed immediately after it was appointed, the right to send for persons and papers and from time to time to report its observations to the house. I understand the Minister of Finance has certain explanations to make to the house as to the manner in which the proceedings took place and as to the material which this resolution covers and which would go to the committee for investigation and such report as it may see fit to make. If it were the pleasure of the house to hear the Minister of Finance at this time I think he might be the one to open the discussion.

Mr. Drew: I was only asking the question for the purpose of determining the order of debate. I would prefer to wait until I hear any explanation that may be given.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I had assumed that would be what hon. members would wish; and the statement I have to make is purely supplementary to the statements made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and myself a week or two ago.

Hon. members will recall that when the results of the Torquay tariff conference were announced in the house some two weeks ago, my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a comprehensive statement outlining the benefits which Canada will receive under the new trade agreements. At that time I also spoke on the changes in the Canadian customs tariff which we had agreed to make as part of the Torquay agreements. In addition my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) issued a fairly lengthy press release outlining in somewhat greater detail the results of the conference. It is therefore unnecessary to cover that ground again today, but I would like to supplement the previous statements with a few explanatory remarks.

When the Prime Minister presented the resolution referring the Torquay agreements to the standing committee on banking and commerce, he referred to a number of documents which embody the results of the Torquay negotiations. These documents are somewhat technical and complicated. A brief explanation of what they contain may be helpful to the house in its consideration of the resolution.

First, a word about the final act of Torquay. This is a purely formal document, authenticating texts of the legal instruments which were drawn up to give effect to the agreements reached at Torquay. It simply states that representatives of the signatory countries had assembled at Torquay for the purpose of carrying out tariff negotiations; that they had achieved certain results; and that the results described in the accompanying instruments do in fact describe accurately what had been done. The final act was signed at the close of the conference by all the participating governments. All the other legal instruments which the Prime Minister mentioned in the resolution are annexed to the Torquay final act.

Annex I to the final act contains the decisions agreeing to the accession of six new countries to the general agreement on tariffs and trade. From the very inception of the general agreement in 1947 provision was made to allow additional countries to join the agreement and so enjoy its benefits, provided, of course, that they enter into negotiations with a view to granting tariff concessions equivalent in value to the concessions made by the original members. The question of admitting new countries is of vital concern to all members because, as hon. members know, under the most-favoured-nation clause once a country is accepted into the agreement it is automatically entitled to all the tariff concessions granted in the course of the three sets of tariff negotiations held under the general agreement since 1947. Hon. members will recall that these three sets of negotiations occurred as follows: 23 countries at Geneva in 1947, 33 countries at Annecy in 1949, and 34 countries at Torquay in 1951. In order to ensure that the new countries do in fact make adequate payment for membership, the agreement provides that a two-thirds majority of the present membership is needed before a decision can be taken to admit a new country. In this way, by giving members an opportunity to pass judgment on the value of the tariff concessions offered by the countries seeking admission to the group, the principle of reciprocity and mutual advantage is protected.

One of the main purposes of the Torquay conference was to increase the over-all value of the general agreement by expanding it to include Austria, the German federal republic, Korea, Peru, the Philippines and Turkey. As hon. members know, Canada concluded successful agreements with all those countries. Accordingly, together with the United Kingdom, United States, and other important countries, we are prepared to indicate readiness to accept them into the general agreement by signing the decisions agreeing to their accession. The last day for signing these decisions is June 20. It is expected that the necessary two-thirds majority will be forthcoming on behalf of all the new countries, so that they will all become members shortly after that date. Canada will extend the benefits of its tariff concessions to the new countries after they have been formally accepted as members and have extended their tariff concessions to Canada.

Annex II to the final act contains the Torquay protocol to the general agreement on tariffs and trade. The Torquay protocol is the principal instrument which emerged from the conference and, I believe, the document in which hon. members will be mainly interested. It is designed to achieve three things. First, it contains the detailed terms and procedures under which the new countries will be admitted to the agreement. Second, it amends the general agreement in order to extend the Geneva and Annecy tariff concessions for a further period of three years. Third, it embodies the results of all the tariff negotiations undertaken at Torquay. These results are contained in a series of tariff schedules annexed to the protocol, one for each of the present members, and one for each of the acceding countries.

I do not intend to review in detail the legal terms of accession which make up the bulk of the protocol, because they are quite technical and not of general interest. Briefly, the terms of accession provide for reciprocal rights and obligations, so that new countries will be essentially in the same position as the present members. I would, however, like to say a word about the arrangement to extend the Geneva and Annecy concessions for a further period of three years, because this is one of the important achievements of the Torquay conference. As hon. members know, one of the main purposes of the general agreement is to reduce tariffs and other trade barriers to reasonable levels, and in this way to stabilize the conditions of world commerce by agreement among the principal trading nations not to raise their customs duties beyond certain agreed maximum rates. Prior to the general agreement there were, of course, many bilateral agreements in which countries undertook not to raise tariffs on specified items for certain fixed periods of time. While these agreements did provide an element of stability in tariff levels between nations, they did not go far enough, because there were large areas of trade not covered by such agreements. The general agreement drawn up in 1947 was an attempt to overcome this element of instability in world tariff levels. This agreement, which includes all the principal trading nations, together accounting for over 80 per cent of world trade, was a most significant achievement in the field of international co-operation since the end of the war.

The reductions and bindings in the rates of customs duties which were negotiated at Geneva in 1947 and at Annecy in 1949 had an assured life only to January 1, 1951. Beyond that date the tariff concessions would remain in force, subject, however, to the right of members to make modifications or withdrawals after giving appropriate notice. It was felt that if the Geneva and Annecy concessions became liable to widespread modification or withdrawal, the stability of world tariff levels, one of the main benefits afforded by the agreement, would be imperilled. It was also quite clear that before further progress could be made by way of a new scaling down of high tariff barriers, or before additional countries would agree to accept membership, a decision would have to be taken with respect to the status of the original tariff concessions. Accordingly Canada, together with the United Kingdom and the United States, proposed that the previous agreements be extended for a further firm period of three years. This proposal was accepted by all the participating countries, and with minor modifications the original concessions were extended until January 1, 1954. Agreement on this basic issue paved the way for a large number of new tariff concessions among existing members, as well as with the six new countries. The formal amendment, extending the agreements for a further three years, will come into effect when the Torquay protocol has been signed by two-thirds of the present members. In the meantime, however, in order to secure the position until the formal amendment comes into force, the participating countries signed a declaration undertaking not to exercise their right to modify or withdraw tariff concessions prior to January 1, 1954. This declaration is contained in annex III to the final act.

Finally, I should like to say a word about the tariff schedules which are annexed to the Torquay protocol. These schedules, one for each of the participating governments, contain all the tariff items on which countries undertook not to raise their customs duties beyond the maximum rates stated therein for a period of three years. In most cases the rates shown in these schedules are reductions from existing rates, while in other cases they represent bindings of present customs duties against increase. There are thirty-seven such schedules, and the one allocated to Canada is schedule V which, as members of the house will recall, I tabled on May 8. The Torquay tariff schedules supplement and, in some instances, modify similar schedules which emerged from the previous conferences held at Geneva and Annecy. In order to get a comprehensive picture of the whole range of tariff items now covered by the general agreement, one would have to look at the separate tariff schedules which were drawn up at Geneva, at Annecy, and finally at Torquay. I understand that the secretariat is now in process of preparing consolidated tariff schedules showing, under one cover for each of the countries, all the tariff concessions granted under the general agreement on tariffs and trade since 1947.

The legal documentation embodying the results of the Torquay negotiations is, as you might expect, voluminous, so that we have only published the Canadian schedule V. I believe copies of schedule V have been distributed to all members of the house. The schedules of tariff concessions by all the countries, and the text of the Torquay protocol, have been published by the secretariat at Geneva and released in limited numbers on May 12. We are endeavouring to obtain sufficient copies, and these will be distributed to all members of the standing committee on banking and commerce as soon as they are available.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that after this resolution has been discussed and passed by the house, the question of this agreement can be fully considered by the banking and commerce committee where, as I indicated the other day, Mr. Hector McKinnon, chairman of the tariff board, who was one of our principal negotiators at Torquay, as well as other members, will be available to answer any questions hon. members may have in connection with the Torquay agreement, or the proceedings at Annecy and Geneva.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I expect that there will be general approval of the decision of the government to refer the Torquay agreement to the banking and commerce committee as proposed in this resolution. My remarks are directed, first of all, to the general effect of the Torquay arrangements, and second as to the essential considerations which it seems to me should be before that committee in addition to the consideration of the Torquay agreement itself. While this resolution deals exclusively with the results of the Torquay agreements, and the documents related to those agreements, the banking and commerce committee will of course have full authority to make such other recommendations as may appear to be appropriate in the light of the Torquay arrangements.

It is with that thought in mind I wish to make some observations concerning the Torquay agreement, and also on the general subject of trade. We cannot regard the Torquay decisions in a vacuum, but must regard them as part of an integrated picture of our world trade as a whole. I am speaking in that respect of Canada, and of the impact of those arrangements upon Canada at this time. First of all, I believe it is desirable that the Torquay agreement be kept in perspective, because, if there is a tendency to overemphasize the results of what took place there, there may be the same tendency to overlook other matters that are of equally great or perhaps greater importance, having regard to our long-range picture of world trade.

Undoubtedly the presentation of the results of that conference by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and the supplementary statement made public by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), did leave the impression that tremendous gains had been made at Torquay. I believe it will be necessary for all of us to wait and see exactly what happens before we assess in very precise terms exactly what the effect of the Torquay agreement is going to be upon Canada or upon the other countries. But one of the things which it seems to me might well be in the minds of the members of the banking and commerce committee in considering these agreements, and any other recommendations that they think it desirable to make, is that the headlines in the press are not, in themselves, going to bring results. It would be unfortunate if, through the great headlines that were given to the Torquay agreement, we got the idea that these agreements alone were going to produce immense gains for Canada.

I believe all hon. members of this house will welcome whatever extension of trade has resulted, or will result in the future, from these agreements. But there are definite limitations upon the results that can flow from those agreements, which it would be a good thing to keep in mind when we are considering the whole problem of world trade. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has stated that at the moment we have no worries about marketing our products. Undoubtedly that statement interprets the unusual situation in which we find ourselves at the moment, with certain reservations. The fact is that already there does seem to be some concern as to whether there may not be too great exports of some particular products.

The first thing that all of us are naturally concerned about is the longer picture of the future, and what is going to happen in the years ahead. Unfortunately it would appear that, in so far as greatly broadening world trade is concerned, Torquay has not lived up to the expectations of those who went there from the different nations that attended that important conference. For one thing, there was the effective burial of the international trade organization, to which so many people had attached such great hopes. It may well be that some other organization will emerge which will give alternative advantages. When we consider, however, the great expectations that were attached to the international trade organization, the demise of ITO cannot in itself be regarded with any considerable measure of satisfaction until we know what is going to take its place.

The London Economist, which is regarded as a modest and extremely well-informed publication in dealing with matters of this kind, put it in these words:

> ITO itself disappeared, with all the hopes built upon it, into the limbo of stillborn international organizations.

This is a time when all of us are hoping to strengthen international organization and to extend in every way possible a wider and wider association in international trade and in other fields of international co-operation. For that reason it seems to me that the demise of ITO is a regrettable feature of the discussions at Torquay.

Generally, the financial observers of this country have been inclined to modify greatly the first glowing reports which were given of these agreements when they were announced. As an example, a recent discussion of this subject in the Montreal Financial Times of May 11 is headed "Torquay Tariff Agreements Show Meagre Results." In the Financial Post published in Toronto, giving its general impressions of Torquay, we find the heading: "Little Gained from Torquay". These headings merely indicate the moderation with which we should accept the glowing statements that were made about the agreements and about their advantage to Canada. In the Winnipeg Free Press, for instance—which is generally favourable to the point of view expressed by the government in matters of this kind—their discussion of Torquay is headed "Trade Liberalization Postponed." Another heading, this time in the Windsor Daily Star of April 21, describes the general effect of the article under the heading as follows: "Wilgress Says Results Not So Great". Then in the body of a Reuters news agency dispatch from Torquay the conference chairman, L. Dana Wilgress of Canada, is said to have gloomily reported: "The results are not as great as many had hoped."

Mr. Speaker, these statements indicate reasons why this house should consider other aspects of world trade. Before this house discusses this subject again, the banking and commerce committee should be considering other aspects of world trade so that we shall not alone be dealing with the results of the Torquay conference at the time that this matter comes back before us for further consideration. If we become victims of the illusions created by the headlines which accompanied the formal announcement in this house of the Torquay agreements, then we may be diverted from the attention that should be given to other problems of trade which are of as great importance as and, in some cases, perhaps of greater importance than, the Torquay negotiations and the agreements which resulted from them.

I think that the committee on banking and commerce, in recognizing that the Torquay agreements relate to only a segment of the whole problem of world trade for Canada, might well take into consideration the recommendation made by a meeting of representatives of industry and commerce in Great Britain and Canada when they met in Toronto on May 18. At that meeting, which took place only three days ago, leading manufacturers and businessmen from Britain and from Canada discussed various problems of world trade and the possibility of extending it. The recommendation to which that meeting attached the greatest importance, and the one which received the most attention in the public discussion at that conference in Toronto, was that steps should be taken immediately—and may I emphasize that word "immediately"—to convene a conference of the governments of the nations of the commonwealth and of the other countries of the empire, for the purpose of extending trade within the commonwealth and empire, and of finding a solution of those problems and difficulties which today are raising barriers against that trade.

This conference which was simply an informal meeting of high-ranking representatives of business and commerce in both Canada and Great Britain was attended by men of outstanding experience; and I would mention the fact that, in addition to the general recommendation that the possibility of expanding trade and commerce within the commonwealth and empire be explored, they also urged the consideration of the possibility of finding some solution for the problem of making the pound and the dollar convertible.

I would recall to your mind, Mr. Speaker, the fact that on February 28 of last year we placed before this house a resolution urging the convening of such a conference. At that time the government did not see fit to accede to the arguments we presented in support of such a conference. In fact the suggestion was made that such a conference could not be productive of useful results at that time.

Now we have a recommendation of the very highest ranking businessmen from Canada and Great Britain, urging that there be a commonwealth economic conference at the earliest practical date. This, it seems to me, ties right in with the discussion of the Torquay agreements, because the value of the Torquay agreements, or otherwise, will depend very largely upon their relationship to trade within the commonwealth itself. Having said that, I would impress upon this house and, through the statements in this house, to members of the banking and commerce committee, that there is good reason for the sense of urgency behind that recommendation of the meeting in Toronto last week of the Anglo-Canadian trade committee.

I think this would be an appropriate time to recall what has happened to our export business to the United Kingdom. At the very time that our exports to the United States have been mounting so rapidly, our exports to the United Kingdom have been diminishing to a very dangerous extent. These are the figures from 1943 on, in millions of dollars, in exports to the United States: 1943, $1,149 million; 1944, $1,301 million; 1945, $1,197 million; 1946, $888 million; 1947, $1,034 million; 1948, $1,501 million; 1949, $1,503 million; 1950, $2,021 million. Placed side by side with the export figures to the United Kingdom, we see what has been happening in the percentage of exports going to our two greatest export markets. In 1943 our exports in dollars to the United Kingdom amounted to $1,033 million; 1944, $1,235 million; 1945, $963 million; 1946, $597 million; 1947, $751 million; 1948, $687 million; 1949, $705 million; 1950, $470 million. Thus, whereas in 1943 our exports to the United Kingdom and to the United States were in reasonable balance, amounting as they did to $1,149 million to the United States and $1,033 million to the United Kingdom, we find that last year the exports to the United States were $2,021 million and to the United Kingdom only $470 million. That represents in dollar value a drop to 37 per cent of what our exports were to the United Kingdom in 1943; but that itself does not give the whole picture, because, if we take the basic dollar value used by the dominion bureau of statistics in its regular cost of living index, we find that our dollar in 1943 had a value of 84 cents; whereas last year, or early this year, it had a value of approximately 55 cents. Thus we find that the actual value of exports to the United Kingdom in terms of equalized dollars amounts to only something just less than 30 per cent of what it was in 1943.

One of the answers, and one of the very important answers, to this difficult situation is the inconvertibility of the dollar, which has raised difficulties within the period I have mentioned. These businessmen, these financial, hardheaded, experienced men, who have been dealing in international trade and in international finance for many years, came to the conclusion at this gathering of the Anglo-Canadian trade committee that steps should be taken immediately to convene a conference of governments of the commonwealth at the earliest practical date to tackle this whole problem interpreted in those dollar figures that I have given, and to seek ways of breaking the log-jam that is threatening our traditional trade channels in the years ahead.

We have every reason to welcome the extension and expansion of trade with the United States. On many occasions in this house, long before any recent comments about the fact that Canada must not be a satellite of the United States, members of the party to which I belong have urged that we should make sure that we did not become a satellite of the United States by making sure that we preserved an appropriate balance in our world trade so that no matter how friendly our relationships with the United States might be we would not have all our eggs in one basket, and not find ourselves economically dependent upon the United States although we do regard them with such friendship. It was with that very thought in mind that on more than one occasion during the past years this party has presented motions calling for an economic conference of the nations of the commonwealth to find ways to remove those barriers, to break this log-jam of dollar-pound inconvertibility, and generally to lay the trade basis for first of all the recovery of our commonwealth markets, and then the expansion of those markets in the years ahead.

By all means, let us seek the expansion of our trade with the United States; but let us remember that this country is set up for trading with the United Kingdom and the commonwealth. That was not done with any thought of placing barriers between the United States and Canada. Our ties of blood, our ties of friendship and our ties of history are too close for the effective erection of barriers between the peoples of the United States and Canada, who know each other better than the peoples of any other two nations in the whole world.

But that does not get away from the fact that this country has recognized from the earliest days that our production is largely parallel with and not complementary to that of the United States. One of the reasons we have been able to export such enormous quantities to the United States has been one which none of us can welcome. Undoubtedly one of the reasons why there was such a tremendous increase last year in the dollar value of exports was the tremendous stockpiling that is taking place in the United States. Much of that business was abnormal; much of that business was business which took from Canada raw materials which, to the great advantage of our own people, we could be fabricating in Canada.

I suggest we should examine with great care many of the lines of raw materials and products we exported last year to the United States, and we should consider whether it is desirable that exports on that level, of those particular raw materials and commodities, should continue in future years. I do not wish to have that statement interpreted at any time as a suggestion that I do not welcome Canada's full participation in any joint steps which are necessary for the building up of the mutual strength of each of these nations. I suggest however that we should recognize why it was that the figure rose so rapidly from $1,503 million in 1949 which, up to that time was a record in dollar value of exports, to $2,021 million last year. The preparation for the defence of freedom was part of the reason for that great increase.

Along with that we see the alarming drop from the figure of $705 million in dollar value of exports to the United Kingdom in 1949—and this amount was less than half of the value of exports to the United States in that year—to the tragically and dangerously low figure of $470 million in 1950—and that figure is even lower than it appears, if we consider the depreciated value of the dollar. It will be noted that this last-mentioned figure is not much more than one-fifth of our value of exports to the United States.

There are many reasons why, by every device within our power, we should be seeking to find a solution for the problem of convertibility of the dollar and the pound as between Canada and the United Kingdom. That is our first problem. I think we should not be unwilling to explore the problem with the government of the United Kingdom and other governments throughout the commonwealth, without waiting for any general solution of the problem by the international organization built up under the United Nations.

After all, if for military purposes it is found satisfactory for a limited number of nations within the United Nations to deal with a particular military problem, as we have in respect of Korea, and as we did earlier in respect of the Atlantic nations, then I say that in the field of international trade there is no reason whatever why nations of the commonwealth should not seek a solution of this problem, to their own advantage and to the advantage of every trading nation in the world.

If we can find a solution to this problem as between Canada and other nations in the commonwealth, we shall have found the key which will unlock the door to vast trading possibilities throughout the whole world, which are being held back by this one almost insuperable problem. Today we are nearer this possibility than we have been at any time since the dollar and the pound were declared inconvertible. The very fact that it was necessary for the United States to buy essential requirements last year in such large quantities throughout the whole world has eased the dollar problem to an extent it has not been eased since this major difficulty first arose in the post-war period. For that reason I do believe that, when dollars are flowing to nations for essential defence supplies, we should seize this opportunity to seek a solution of the problem.

In a speech delivered in London over a year ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated why he thought trading possibilities between our two countries should not be limited by any artificial barriers of this kind. His statement was welcomed then by the United Kingdom, and I believe found general approval at that time. He was pointing out that, at a time when there are hungry nations in the world, it seems illogical that we should sit back and do nothing to break down the barriers which are preventing our selling food supplies we can produce in such quantities and which the people of other nations need so badly.

We can produce a great deal more. We can produce a great deal more of many types of essential products. It has been said over and over again that one of the devices by which we can most effectively fight communism is to see that there is ample food throughout the world. Today India, a sister nation in the commonwealth, is in many sections facing real and terrible starvation. Without delay, not only as a practical gesture of health and friendship, but also as evidence of our partnership within the commonwealth, Canada should make available to India all the wheat we can possibly spare to ship at this critical time.

Quite apart from that, we should be finding ways in which nations within the commonwealth which need our food supplies can buy that food, and buy it very largely through the rotating exchange which would be possible if we were able to break down this barrier of inconvertibility. There are humanitarian reasons; there are business reasons. There are reasons related to the strength of the British partnership itself which all suggest that when the Torquay agreements are before the committee on banking and commerce that committee should also consider this recommendation, which has been made in such urgent terms by the Anglo-Canadian trade committee.

I hope that when the banking and commerce committee reports to the house it will report not only on the Torquay agreements but also on other aspects of related trade, and that it will recommend that without any delay whatever the Canadian government, which is in a unique position to take such action, being the one nation of the commonwealth which deals in dollars rather than in pounds, should take the necessary steps to bring together a conference of the nations of the commonwealth to seek every possible means of extending trade and removing any barriers which still hinder the extension of trade and of contact of every kind within this great fellowship.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think that all of us who followed the Torquay conferences hoped that the name of Torquay might be associated with a much wider reduction of tariffs than was there achieved. I quite agree with what has already been said that, as far as one is able to see from the schedules that have been published in some of the newspapers, there is very little indeed that gives any hope of a really wide extension of trade and commerce. In his last few words I think the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) indicated that he had overlooked the content of the resolution. The wording of the resolution is as follows:

> That the subject matter of the Torquay negotiations, namely, the final act of Torquay; the decisions agreeing to accession; the Torquay protocol to the general agreement on tariffs and trade; the modifications of the schedules to the general agreement on tariffs and trade resulting from the Torquay negotiations . . .

And so on. The committee is not ordered to report back to the house. In December, 1947, there was a resolution on the order paper dealing with the Geneva agreements. It died on the order paper although we had been brought here specifically to discuss the Geneva agreements. The present resolution merely refers the subject matter of what took place at Torquay, and the results that were obtained, to the banking and commerce committee. They are not asked to report or to recommend anything.

Indeed the government has the right to make certain reductions or modifications in our tariff schedules by order in council. In other words, we are not requested as a parliament to confirm anything that the government might do with respect to reduction of tariffs under agreements of this description. Neither at Geneva, at Annecy nor at Torquay were changes made in our tariff schedules that required the approval of parliament. I imagine that the resolution is in this form because of the authority that the government now has. What we are really doing under the resolution is merely referring the subject matter to the banking and commerce committee in order that that committee may call before it the officials responsible for these negotiations and for arriving at the conclusions reached at Torquay.

In passing may I say that I think the committee of representatives we had at Torquay, headed by Mr. Hector McKinnon, was an exceedingly able one, and I am sure they did their level best to safeguard the interests of Canada. However, as far as we are concerned this afternoon, let me repeat that all we are doing is referring the subject matter of these agreements and conclusions reached to the banking and commerce committee for their study. All they need do at the end of their study is to do what was done with the Geneva agreements, transmit the evidence and report to the house that the committee has studied and considered the matter referred to them. No recommendations will be required of the committee. Indeed under a resolution of this kind no recommendations could be made to the house that would be at all helpful to us or enable us to modify these agreements in any way.

Like the leader of the opposition—and I am sure in this respect all parties in the house agree—we regret that the international trade organization has failed to do what we hoped it would under the United Nations. I do not think there are any members who do not realize that the freeing of the channels of international trade is one of the great problems confronting the world. Indeed the need to free those channels and, as the leader of the opposition indicated, at the same time have a universal currency in which all our values could be expressed and to which our trade relationships could be related, makes it clear that convertibility of the dollar and the pound is of great interest not only to the world but particularly to the country in which we live.

Our whole economy was built up in the past on what has sometimes been referred to as the Atlantic triangle. We sold vast quantities of goods to Great Britain and the sterling area generally, and with the credits we obtained from our trade with that area we were able to purchase vast quantities of goods from the United States. I am one of those who believe that at the present time our trading relationships are not healthy. While it has been valuable to increase our exports to the United States in the spectacular manner that we have, I believe that in reality that is not a sign of health so far as our economy is concerned. At the same time, as has already been pointed out, we have seen our exports to the United Kingdom drop proportionately. When we consider what our exports are from Canada to the United States we realize that they are largely made necessary because of the international situation and also because of the depletion of United States resources. The wasteful manner in which the forests and the great iron ore deposits have been exploited has compelled the United States to look across the border, with considerable interest and some envy, at the great resources of this country. Our exports to the United States perhaps are not the sign of a healthy economy we would like to think they are. We may find—perhaps not within the next few years, because the international situation may prevent it—that if and when the United States again builds up surpluses of goods, as she did in the past, she will no longer want many of the products and commodities we are now exporting to her, because she will no longer need them. Those of us who have lived in western Canada for any number of years have seen occasions when the United States was willing to take all the cattle and other commodities we could send her; but the time came when the United States was not able or willing to absorb the exports we had been sending, and we found ourselves cut off from the market we had built up. Of course to some extent that also applies to other markets, but in many instances and many respects I think the United States has been our most uncertain market.

As has been said already this afternoon, in many respects our economy, and particularly our agricultural economy, is not complementary to that of the United States, as it is to that of Great Britain and the sterling area. It is distinctly competitive. When surpluses occur in the United States, under the peculiar congressional system in that country powerful blocs can exert sufficient pressure upon members of congress and congress itself so that we may find ourselves in a very embarrassing position. I quite agree that we should do everything we can to encourage the maintenance and expansion of our trade with the United Kingdom and the sterling area, but I do not think we should go back to 1932 and in the building up of our trade with the commonwealth do anything that would be restrictive. If we entered into trading negotiations and arrived at trade agreements that were restrictive, in the sense that we were building trade within the commonwealth—if that were possible today, which I do not believe it is—we would be interfering with that larger expansion of trade at which I think we must all aim.

This agreement, like the others, is largely a matter of reciprocity in the hope that the nations agreeing at Torquay may obtain mutual advantages; and after all it is on mutual advantage that trading relationships are built. I hope we shall obtain more from this agreement than appears likely at the moment. Like most hon. members, I am sure, I have been able only to look over these schedules and get some general impressions of them. I do not note that the concessions we are making to other countries, particularly in regard to commodities we get from the United States, are offset to the extent some of us had hoped by the concessions we are getting from the United States and other countries. However, that is a first impression, which may be dissipated when the banking and commerce committee is able to question the representatives who negotiated this agreement on behalf of Canada. As things stand in the world today I think one of the satisfactory features of the negotiations is that the Geneva and Annecy agreements have been extended until January 1, 1954. At least that gives some guarantee of stabilization during that period and removes some uncertainty in our trading relationships. The reductions that are made are to come into effect, so the minister told us a few minutes ago, on June 20; but only, I believe, if they come into effect on that date mutually. We are not obligated to put anything into effect until the country with which we have negotiated is prepared to put into effect the mutual concession. I think the object of the extension of the agreements for three years, to prevent increases in these tariffs during that time, is something we should all welcome in this house; but really what I rose to say was that while we support this resolution referring to the committee the subject matter of these negotiations and agreements, we think it would have been well if we could have had a report and some recommendations from that committee so that we could have discussed the wider issues involved under these Torquay arrangements.

I do not intend to say more. I believe one of my colleagues is going to deal with several specific matters connected with these agreements. I do hope, however, that the agreements which have been made—Geneva, Annecy, Torquay—will never be regarded either by the government or by anyone else as a substitute for what we hoped might be done under the international trade organization of the United Nations. It seems to me that if we are going to build up the kind of world we hope to see we must have a freer flow of commodities all across the world, and that free flow must be in the nature of a two-way traffic. We cannot expect to sell in markets where we do not buy. Then, as was said a few moments ago, we must also consider the effect on the improvement in standards of living, so that Canada may play her part in meeting the threat to the world caused by the poverty, misery, want and economic insecurity to be found over such a large portion of the globe at the present time.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): It is a matter of regret to us, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution in the name of the Prime Minister does not provide for a report and recommendations to be made to this house after the committee has studied the Torquay agreements and decisions. I feel, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has just expressed himself, that much good may be lost in this discussion since no provision has been made for a report and recommendations by the committee.

We are keenly interested, Mr. Speaker, in any proposals for the expansion of world trade on a basis mutually satisfactory to all countries concerned. Possibly we may find in the subject matter of the Torquay negotiations, that is the final act of Torquay and the decisions agreeing to the annexations and so on named in this resolution, some evidence that the barriers to satisfactory trading relations between nations have been removed to a certain extent. I hope so. I am not fully enough acquainted with what happened at Torquay to be able to assess that, but I look forward to the study in the banking and commerce committee, and perhaps we shall have something to say at the conclusion of the studies there. I am hoping that the real debate will take place when the committee reports to the house, because then we shall have much more information on which to base a sound judgment.

We do welcome, however, any agreements that lead to the removal of barriers, and to a mutually satisfactory type of trading relations. Over the years in this house I believe we have made our position quite clear, that is that we were working towards a type of trading relationship which would result in a balance, not necessarily a balance between two countries, but a balance between any one country and the rest of the world. We are still convinced, Mr. Speaker, that this ideal, towards which we are labouring constantly, can only be reached if the great trading nations of the world will determine now, or at any rate soon, to buy from the rest of the world as much as they wish to sell to the rest of the world. Only by so doing can the currency with which to trade be made available.

We have been trying to follow an almost impossible method of trade. This matter of the convertibility of currencies, which has been one of the principles laid down upon which satisfactory trading relations can be carried on, is a fool's dream under present circumstances. There can only be convertibility of currencies if the great trading nations like United States, Canada, and Great Britain are prepared to purchase from the rest of the world goods to an amount equal to those which they are prepared to sell to the world. Now, I am afraid that Torquay has not made too many strides towards that ideal. It does not appear that is so, although we shall reserve a decision on that matter until such time as we have had a chance to examine more carefully what did come out of Torquay.

We welcome, Mr. Speaker, whatever reduced tariffs have been effected, particularly any movement towards a reduction to a reasonable level of tariff barriers. Now, that does not mean to say that we favour absolutely free trade, because we try to be realistic about it. Under present circumstances, no country could possibly remove all its tariffs. No country could go on a completely free trade basis. We must reserve the right to preserve our economic defences, and tariffs certainly constitute one of the bases of economic defence. I am afraid that we went a bit far in that regard under the Bretton Woods agreement. I am afraid we did agree there to surrender too many of our defences; tariff reductions or increases were amongst those that we did surrender. We have been breaking that agreement right and left ever since it was made. We have been ignoring it in many respects, indicating how foolish it was to enter into it in the first place.

In any event, we welcome whatever Torquay did to reduce tariffs to a reasonable level, so that there will be as few barriers to trade as possible. We are going to carefully study exactly what they were. We like the idea, which we have been constantly advocating, of a commonwealth economic conference. We feel that the commonwealth should and could be a great balancing factor in a world of trade unbalance. I do not know of any better way to try to restore balance, in a world of unbalance of trade, than to promote the solidarity of the commonwealth and agreement amongst ourselves—not restrictive agreement, but at any rate a solidarity that would be in many respects comparable to our good neighbour to the south of us in its industrial capacity first, and in its trading possibilities second. It would only be through having such a solid commonwealth bloc that we could possibly impress upon nations like the United States the importance of attempting to balance trade. I do not see any other way. Certainly, there is much merit in what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has suggested in that regard.

We are interested not only in those things, Mr. Speaker; we are also especially interested in what progress might have been made at Torquay in connection with the principle of discrimination. One could speak at great length about that matter, but inasmuch as we are in the dark concerning what was accomplished at Torquay with respect to discrimination, we have to reserve anything we might want to say about it until after we have had our study in the committee. But let me say this. If the world is still crippled through having to accept the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause in all trading agreements, then I am afraid Torquay has not accomplished very much. I am interested in finding out particularly just how far the foolish discriminations that are involved in the so-called unconditional most-favoured-nation clause have been removed. We have suffered, and other nations of the commonwealth have suffered, as a result of that foolish clause. We have fought wars over it, and I am afraid that unless the clause is modified, or unless it is thrown out altogether sometime and a much broader, more humanitarian principle imposed in its place, it will cause many more wars. I am going to reserve further discussion on that matter until I see just what the investigation in the committee brings out.

I am interested, and all of our group here are, Mr. Speaker, in what is going to be the future market for Canadian wheat and farm products. When I express that interest I have in mind what happened in 1949 and 1950, almost a godsend to the Canadian people, when the United States was prepared to spend over $960 million for Canadian farm products to send over to Europe under the ECA program. If it had not been for that, I just wonder where we would have found a market for that wheat and those farm products.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The government would have found it somewhere.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. Low: I imagine the optimistic suggestion of my friend the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) might have been made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe).

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is what they would perhaps have told us.

Mr. Low: That is right. That is what they would have told us. But the situation is simply this. Had it not been for the generosity of the people of the United States in spending that $960 million, we would have had a terrible situation in Canada. What I am anxious about, and what all the people here are anxious about, is this: what is going to be the situation in the future? Where are we going to sell those farm products and how are we going to be able to find a lucrative market for them in order that we can induce an all-out productive effort? That is an extremely important consideration for us. It is those things that we should like to study more carefully in the committee; and when we have all the information before us, Mr. Speaker, I hope we shall be able to have a real debate on the occasion of the chairman's bringing in the report of the committee and moving its adoption.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few rather brief comments on the situation we have before us. First of all, I should like to associate myself with what has been said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), in suggesting that it would be highly desirable that we should be able to get much closer access than we seem likely to get now to the nature of the discussion and the inside views of those able men who represented us at Torquay. I think what has been said on that matter is extremely sound, and I should like to associate myself with it.

When we are considering this Torquay agreement, it is not possible to prevent our minds from going back some three years and a little more to the time of the presentation in this house of the Geneva agreement. I certainly wish there were time to read to this house the speech that was made then by the late prime minister, in which he described to us the wonderful things that were going to happen, and in which we had a review of Liberal free-trade policy over the years, marred slightly by the fact that somebody reminded him of the Dunning budget in 1930. Nevertheless, the former prime minister had a great field day.

Those who were in the house at that time will remember that we were led to believe that we had been brought back here in December, or whenever it was, to a special session in order that we should press on with this great achievement and give effect to it as soon as possible. That was the beginning of it and here is the ending of it. That great speech was made on December 9, 1947. Then we come along, by toilsome stages, to June 26, 1948, when the leader of the opposition at that time asked the prime minister this question, as reported at page 5916 of Hansard of 1948:

Will the prime minister say whether he intends before prorogation—

Which was just on top of us at that time.

—to deal with either of the two resolutions standing in his name?

Later Mr. Mackenzie King says:

I beg my hon. friend's pardon. My hon. friend is referring to resolutions with respect to the Geneva agreement?

Mr. Bracken: Yes.

Mr. Mackenzie King: I would say that they will not be proceeded with this session.

That was the beginning and ending, so far as this house was concerned, of the Geneva agreement. And so far as my memory serves me, that is the last thing that happened. Certainly it has rested in peace, so far as this house is concerned, since June, 1948.

Mr. Howe: They have been in effect right along.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Oh, yes.

Mr. Fleming: Only in part.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In part; and with never any need of coming to this house. But of course we are used to that. That is just becoming routine.

Mr. Gardiner: You could have brought it here at any time.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I pass over Annecy lightly, and I come now to the new report from Torquay. Just in passing, I should like to stop for a moment to endorse what my leader has said about the importance of making all the progress towards convertibility we can. I do not share the views of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) that it is just a chimera that we should move towards convertibility. After all, after years or at any rate after a great many months of stubborn—shall we call it—pride or stubborn folly, or whatever you like, this government last summer—yes, it was last September—was forced to do the sensible thing; and I imagine that they know now that they should have done it long before then, but of course they will never say so.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would ask the hon. member to allow me to make my speech. I have only enough steam to carry on by myself. If I had to stop and answer questions, I might run down.

Mr. Blackmore: The trouble is you have misquoted the member for Peace River.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will try to answer when I am through. If the hon. member will allow me to make my speech, I will do the best I can to answer him privately afterwards. I never feel that I am equal to public discussion on that subject.

I should now like to draw attention to one or two estimates, from independent sources, of the actual effect of Torquay. I do not pretend to have studied every detail of the agreement, but I will read first of all a short extract from the Winnipeg Free Press, and then a short extract from the London Times, giving two opinions from those two quarters as to what the effect of Torquay was. First, I read from the Winnipeg Free Press of Saturday, May 12:

The new international trade agreements negotiated at Torquay and announced Wednesday probably mark the end, for the time being anyway, of the great postwar movement toward a freely-trading, multilateral world.

That is the sentiment of our own Winnipeg Free Press, and I suppose we can all earnestly hope that they are wrong. But at any rate that is their view. I continue reading from the Free Press:

Measured by the hopes which it had raised, the Torquay tariff conference was not a success.

I now turn to the London Times of May 11. I will not say they are more hopeful, but they are less pessimistic about the results of the agreement; and they have some interesting comments as to various ancillary features of the agreement which I think are of some interest and of some importance.

Mr. Howe: May I ask the hon. member a question before he reads from the London Times? Are they discussing the effect on Canada or the effect on England?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister will have to make up his own mind. I think they are discussing mainly the effect on Canada.

Mr. Howe: Why would the London Times be concerned about Canada? It is not their custom.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister may not know it, but they are still part of the British commonwealth. At any rate, they seem to be concerned.

Mr. Howe: That is a smart answer.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I read from the London Times:

As a result of seven months of negotiations at Torquay (which are the subject of a white paper issued yesterday) the general agreement on tariffs and trade is to remain in force for another three years. This means that the reductions of import duties and the other measures to remove restrictive practices in international trade which were agreed upon at Geneva and Annecy are now renewed until 1954. This was no foregone conclusion. By the beginning of 1950 many European countries were restoring their protective duties to at least the pre-war level. There was growing—and, in the end, successful—opposition in America to the Havana charter for an international trade organization. It is a matter for some congratulation that the effort to bring about freer world trade is to be continued after all.

So that they gleaned some comfort—perhaps not a great deal—out of the results. Then they go on to point out that there are some gains. I read again from the London Times:

The Torquay negotiations have achieved some new reductions in customs duties, and some new countries—above all, western Germany—have been brought into the general agreement.

Then they make a comment which I think is an extremely shrewd one. They say that probably one of the reasons that even a modicum of success was achieved was this, and I think this is a shrewd comment:

Probably the return of the sellers' market since the spring of last year is largely responsible; it has again dulled the edge of competition, and for the time being, fewer manufacturers feel the need for protection.

I suppose there is a certain amount of truth in that, and it raises in one's mind the question whether the period of active trade and of seller's market is not one which if at all possible should be availed of for the purpose of doing away with more restrictions.

Then they go on to speak about the imperial preference, and they have one or two things to say about that which I think are important. They had one very interesting comment, namely, the difference in attitude of the United States as between imperial preference and the Schuman agreement. I was interested in that partly because I was at Strasbourg last summer when they were discussing the Schuman agreement. I will read again from the Times because I think they put it very well. They say:

Any failure in commercial negotiations with America is to be regretted. It had been hoped that some valuable concessions which would have aided the increase of sterling sales in the chief dollar market might have been obtained. The Americans asked for concessions in return which the British government were not prepared to make, and they were above all anxious for a further reduction of imperial preferences. They wished to make arrangements with the members of the commonwealth one by one, for reducing the preferences which they give, without consulting the other member countries who benefit from them. This approach was rejected. With some reservations, all the proposed reductions of imperial preferences have been discussed by all the commonwealth countries concerned and in the end very few concessions have been made. The chief changes have come out of negotiations between Canada and the United States; they are a token of the strong natural attraction of trade over the Canadian frontier—and possibly also of Canadian disappointment over the restricted market afforded for Canadian goods in this country.

I think the minister, even though he does not think that the Times should have any interest in this matter, may agree that their comments are not without a certain amount of common sense. I will read on, because again I think the points are so well made that they cannot be improved on:

The American attitude in these negotiations has reflected the difficulties of the American government over the renewal of the reciprocal trade act and the bill for the simplification of the tariff. Rather than accept the amendments by the house of representatives to the reciprocal trade act the president may use his veto.

Later on this comment touches on the difference in the relation between preference and tariff, and puts it in what I thought was a rather pointed way. It says:

In view of the present uncertainties this country must weigh with the utmost care the obligations which are imposed upon it by the general agreement. This is especially necessary now because the next meeting of the members in the autumn may be concerned with trying to give permanent form to the present temporary organization.

If a permanent organization is to be set up, this country cannot allow the status of preferences to be left, as it is at present, inferior to the status of tariffs. The illogicality of the American attitude to imperial preference is illustrated by the American support of the Schuman plan,—

Hon. members will recall that the Schuman plan is that much discussed plan proposed by Schuman of the French government in an attempt to integrate particularly French and German, and also other minor European countries', iron and steel industries. Last summer it looked as though it was likely to break down because of lack of sympathy from Britain; but by reason of recent changes which they have made, it now seems likely to succeed. I continue:

The illogicality of the American attitude to imperial preference is illustrated by the American support of the Schuman plan, which sets out to create a new free trade area in Europe and is at least as likely to hinder as to help the more general extension of freer trade. Certainly, Europe cannot be regarded as a more satisfactory economic unit than the commonwealth; the countries of the commonwealth, in fact, are naturally still more complementary than are the predominantly industrial countries of western Europe.

There is one further quote I wish to make because it is on the same point. It says this, speaking again of the American attitude towards the Schuman plan:

The cause of freer trade can only be hampered by illogical and one-sided distinctions of this sort; and if the Schuman plan is a portent and the future lies not with many-sided free trade but with regional pacts, then the preservation of the bonds within the commonwealth will become even more vital for this country than it already is.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have read these extracts because it seems to me that the points which they raise are very practical, and they are particularly underlined by reason of what the leader of the opposition said this afternoon regarding the meeting of Canadian businessmen and their desire to have a conference on commonwealth trade. The setting up of this free trade area in Europe, if that is what it comes to be, may actually hinder rather than help the task of freeing world trade.

Of course, there is another thing which comes into this, and which I should like to refer to briefly, namely, the everlasting question of bulk trade agreements. That of course is one of the things that bother them in Britain, and it is one of the things that bother us here. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, if you can still refer to him in that way, said very frankly when we were talking about the wheat agreement—I think it was the wheat agreement we were discussing in this house some weeks ago—"If we had known four or five years ago as much as we know now we might not have done quite the same thing." I should like to read a short extract from the Free Press again, which shows what they feel the international wheat agreement is doing to the growth of wheat in western Canada. It reads:

According to farmers' present seeding intentions it is down by—

That is the wheat acreage. I continue:

According to the farmers' present seeding intentions it is down by more than 700,000 acres or nearly three per cent.

Then later on they say:

But in the main the explanation is simply this: The other crops are offering the farmer the chance of making more money. Their price has improved, responding as it does to the influences that make themselves felt in a free market. As compared with this time two years ago, the price of oats is now 14 cents higher; barley is four cents higher; rye is 87 cents higher and flax is 82 cents higher. But wheat on the other hand is 14 cents lower.

I mention that because it has often been mentioned in the house before in the discussions within the last few days. There is one other point I should like to raise, which seems to become prominent. It was made prominent first of all, as I recall, by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) in the speech he made on March 30 to the American arbitration association, if I remember rightly. At that time he referred with disappointment—indeed I think I might say distress—to the very small amount of American munition orders, or orders in connection with the essential program, which are being received in this country. I think at that time he said $17 million only. I know that just the other day the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) said—I am not sure whether the figure he gave is strictly comparable—that we had got orders for something like $25 million worth of equipment. The minister shakes his head.

Mr. Howe: It is much larger than that. You had better not use it. You cannot quote it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I had better get what the minister said, and he can correct me if he wants to. In passing I notice one interesting thing. The minister pointed out the difference between manufacturing for defence at war, and when we are not at war. He said, speaking of peacetime demand and wartime demand:

At the present time, we have no such demand and we must think in terms of say vehicle production at the rate of about five a day, rather than the hundreds a day we produced last time.

Mr. Howe: Where did he say all this and when?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This is very interesting. This is an address by the Right Hon. C. D. Howe—that is the minister, I take it—at Ottawa on May 14, 1951. Does the minister not think he said these interesting things?

Mr. Howe: But I do not know what it has to do with this House of Commons.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just threw that in. I have been looking for that figure, and when I find it I shall bring it to the minister's attention.

Mr. Howe: Write me a letter about it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister and I always agree, in the end, although we often look as though we disagreed.

Mr. Howe: The assistant financial critic, the boy clerk!

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The last thing I wish to say is just to point out that we, in the past, have tried to have discussions on the matter of the imperial preference and trading relations within the empire. In fact, we tried it about a year ago, in February of 1950, but at that time our friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in a rather offhand way said that he did not think there was much use in it—

Frankly, however, I do not think the trading problems of the world are going to be solved by simply calling another conference.

Anyway, another conference was called, and we can agree with him that it has not solved the problem yet. Then he goes on:

I for one do not like to either initiate or attend a conference unless I know exactly what we are going to talk about.

I hope the minister makes an adequate study of what happened at Torquay, and that perhaps he would read part of my speech so that he would know exactly what we think should be talked about. Then he goes on to say:

While I have no doubt it will be found desirable to hold further conferences to discuss trade matters, I do not know that the holding of a full-fledged commonwealth or empire conference at this time would add very much to the knowledge of this or any other member of the commonwealth in reference to specific solutions which can be found for these trade difficulties.

I hope the minister and the government will reach a very different view, in view of the frank opinions of something near failure of the Torquay conference, such as I have read from the Winnipeg Free Press and, to a lesser extent, from the London Times. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has indicated a strong desire from most responsible and reputable quarters for such a conference, and I hope with all my heart that this great and important question will not be allowed just to drift any further.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I believe in freer trade—I always have, and I hope I always shall. So far as this Torquay agreement goes—well, certainly I do not think any member in the house could find very much objection to it. Whatever steps they have taken must be accepted as progress, although we may be disappointed in the degree of that progress. I think, indeed, that everyone has been disappointed.

This would include even the chairman of the Canadian delegation, Mr. Wilgress, who, according to a Reuters dispatch, said on April 21 that the results were not as great as many had hoped, and pointed out that governments had been hesitant about agreeing to substantial reductions in duties.

As I understand, the chief disappointment in the agreement is that Great Britain and the United States could not get together in a sort of tariff-lowering pact. Had they been able to do that, other countries automatically would have benefited. We had all hoped there would be a kind of softening of the lines of division between the sterling and dollar areas. Instead however I think it is correct to say that those lines have been hardened; and every hon. member knows the implications that has for Canada.

I believe I am safe in saying that United States tariffs were the first and chief targets of the Canadian delegation at the conference. One of my first criticisms is that the United States out-negotiated and out-bargained us at Torquay. I should like to develop that point at eight o'clock, and for that reason I would ask that you call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, in order to bring a figure to the attention of the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe). The figure of $25 million to which I referred is for the production of the plants at Sorel and Longueuil. The minister's words were:

These plants are already committed to produce some $25 million worth of guns for the United States navy.

What the minister does not say is that that is all we are getting.

Mr. Howe: Is it all we are getting?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am saying that.

Mr. Howe: You said $25 million was the extent of it. Perfect nonsense!

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We have gone up from $17 million to $25 million.

Mr. Howe: Perfect nonsense!

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock when the house adjourned I had stated that, although the government obtained many concessions at Torquay which were advantageous to this country, in a general way the results were disappointing. In order to support that statement I should like to refer to what was said by Chairman Wilgress of the Canadian delegation who reported on April 21 as follows:

The results are not as great as many had hoped . . . governments have been hesitant about agreeing to substantial reductions in duties and preferences . . .

If I understand that matter correctly, the chief objective of the Canadian delegation at Torquay was the lowering of United States tariffs. The American delegation made some substantial concessions, and I think it was gratifying to the other nations of the world to find that they were inclined to be so co-operative at the conference. Nevertheless the fact remains that when the United States delegation went to Torquay they went more or less with their hands tied behind their backs. According to the United States law, they could not grant to other countries concessions of more than 50 per cent of the tariff levels existing on January 1, 1945. Of course many such concessions had already been made at Geneva and Annecy. Therefore Canada was often disappointed during the negotiations with our American friends.

When we look at the results of the conference I think we cannot help but realize that the Americans, as they have been able to do so often in the past, out-manoeuvred and out-negotiated us. If we can believe the last issue of the Toronto Saturday Night the United States gave concessions to Canada on 400 items which in 1949 were valued at $120 million. Canada on the other hand gave the United States concessions on 251 items which were valued in 1949 at $390 million. Therefore my first criticism of the Torquay agreements is the fact that we gave far more to the United States by way of tariff reductions than we received in return.

I am not overly enthused either about the nature of the concessions which Canada made, and which Canada received from the United States. What were the principal concessions that our United States friends made to us? They reduced the tariff on aluminum from 2 cents to 1½ cents a pound.

Mr. Blackmore: Raw material.

Mr. Thatcher: On lead from 2½th to 1½th cents a pound.

Mr. Blackmore: Another raw material.

Mr. Thatcher: They made concessions on zinc, plywood, canned salmon, and so on. In other words, most of the concessions that our neighbours made to us were on raw materials and natural resources. I welcome these concessions to a certain degree, but I should like to have seen more on finished products. It seems to me that in recent years far too many of our exports to the United States have been in primary form, and to a distressingly large extent we have merely exchanged our trees, minerals and the fertility of our farm lands for the processing skill of our American friends.

Mr. Blackmore: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thatcher: On many occasions we have shipped raw materials to the United States, had them processed there, and then bought them back in the form of finished products.

Mr. Blackmore: Imagine that.

Mr. Thatcher: It seems to me that we should be processing more of our materials ourselves. My second criticism of the Torquay agreements then is that most of the concessions which we extracted from the United States were on primary products and far too few were on finished products. One of the main concessions we gave was on machinery, a drop from 25 per cent to 22½ per cent, and from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent on machinery not made in Canada. There was a tariff concession on auto parts. Formerly they were 25, 27 and 30 per cent and now they are 17½ per cent. Tires dropped from 25 per cent to 22½ per cent. These concessions are welcome, but once again I am going to suggest that the reductions are not going to mean very much to the Canadian consumer at the present time in the way of price decreases, because we must remember that the sales tax is levied on the duty-paid value of imports.

Recently the government increased the sales tax to 10 per cent. I should like to give the house an illustration. Let us say there is a certain item of farm machinery invoiced at $100. Before April 10 the laid-down cost, duty plus sales tax, was $135. After June 6, with the lower tariff rate but the higher sales tax rate, that same machine is going to cost $134.75, or a reduction of 25 cents. Therefore my hon. friends can see that the tariff reduction, so far as farm machinery is concerned at least, is not going to be passed on to any extent to the farmers in the various parts of Canada.

Mr. Howe: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Thatcher: Yes.

Mr. Howe: What item of farm machinery is the hon. member quoting? Practically all farm machinery comes in duty free.

Mr. Thatcher: I used that as an illustration. I should like to refer to Buchanan's Bulletin, registered information on national affairs for businessmen. It makes this statement:

> The reductions in the Canadian tariff on industrial items are not spectacular, from 25 to 22½ per cent on machinery made in Canada, and from 10 to 7½ per cent on machinery not made in Canada.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend spoke of farm machinery. He should know that practically all farm machinery comes in duty free. The last item of farm machinery that was taken off the duty list was cream separators under the present budget. Practically all farm machinery was taken off the duty list several years ago.

Mr. Thatcher: I thank the minister for his correction.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend was talking about the duty on farm machinery. I asked him a very simple question as to what item of farm machinery he was talking about.

Mr. Thatcher: I thank the minister for his correction. I am very pleased to have it. He is correct and I was wrong, but the fact still remains that as to standard machinery what I said is correct. I say that despite the concessions which we have obtained from the United States at these three conferences the American tariff level is still considerably higher than the Canadian. The effect of Torquay, Geneva and Annecy is that it will facilitate the entry of more United States goods into Canada without bringing the United States tariff to a point where Canadian manufacturers can compete in the United States market. I think Canadians are going to be disappointed that something has not been said about armaments. I understood that Canada was going to manufacture arms for the United States. Now it appears that all we are going to make now is parts. I do not know if there is a tariff on munitions that we export to the United States. I assume there is. Perhaps this is one item on which we should have received a concession in these critical times.

I say again that the Canadian government was bested at Torquay by our United States friends, if you judge by the dollar value of the concessions obtained. I think at this time it is proper that we should consider the state of our trade with the United States. I would not deny for a moment the tremendous strides which the government has made in building up our exports to the United States. The fact that they have been able to build up our exports in that market, the most competitive in the world, is no mean achievement, and I do not wish to detract from it. Nevertheless when we recall that in 1950 two-thirds of our exports went to the United States we can see the dangers inherent in the situation. This afternoon the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said we were something like the man who put all his eggs in one basket. That is what we have done so far as our trade is concerned today. As has been pointed out already, the United States market has never been known as the most stable market in the world. Actually the opposite is true. It is subject to economic recessions, and going by past history, tariff policy can change overnight. I wonder what would happen to Canada if suddenly General MacArthur or Mr. Taft should become president of the United States. I think then we might have to worry immediately about higher American tariffs. Therefore I say one of our objectives in tariff and trade policy should be to diversify our trade to a greater extent in future.

The minister or some of his friends may ask how we can do that. Well, there are many possibilities. I have in my hand a clipping from the Financial Post of April 14, which states that France offers to exchange steel for our newsprint. They want our newsprint, most of which is going to the United States. We are pretty short of steel. There may be objections to such a procedure; perhaps the price of French steel is too high, or there may be other reasons why that is not feasible, but on the surface this would seem to be one way by which we might diversify our trade.

Our second chief trade problem today is the British market. A great deal has been said already about the deteriorating position of that market. In 1949 United Kingdom sales to Canada were only 43 per cent of her purchases from this country. In 1950 they were 85 per cent. Before the war Britain used to take nearly half our exports. Last year she took only one-third, and I think it is safe to say that all hon. members are alarmed at the way our exports to Britain have deteriorated. Prior to the war the British bought a great deal from us. Since the war they have not been able to buy as much simply because they lacked the Canadian dollars with which to make those purchases. British statesmen and opposition leaders in this house have warned the Canadian government repeatedly as to what would happen if we did not permit them to earn more Canadian dollars. To give only one illustration, I remember a Canadian Press dispatch back in 1949, which said:

> Cripps issues warning Canada to lose exports unless it "buys British."
>
> Britain will buy less food from Canada unless Canada buys more from Britain, Sir Stafford Cripps, chancellor of the exchequer, said Thursday.
> . . . he said the crux of the post-war Anglo-Canadian trading problems is expansion of British exports to Canada.

At that time, two years ago, Sir Stafford Cripps put the trade problem as far as England was concerned right up to this parliament. If Canada wanted to hold the British market he told us we had to buy from them. However in the intervening years, our government has been most apathetic in trying to increase British imports. As a matter of fact this government has taken several steps which have had the opposite effect. For instance, several years ago our government encouraged the British to send textiles to Canada. They said that in order to encourage that trade they would remove the tariff. The British textile industry went to work and produced at competitive prices, and began to earn a great many Canadian dollars. As soon as they began to do that our government decided to put the tariff back on again. Much the same thing happened in the automobile industry. Ever since the end of the war one cabinet minister after another, one government spokesman after another, has been urging British industry to become competitive, to get their prices down; yet when the British automobile industry did begin to compete, when they did produce a car that could be sold in the Canadian market, right away our government put on a dumping duty.

I cannot reconcile actions like those with a desire to increase British imports, and increase trade within the commonwealth. I think it is fitting also to mention what happened as far as our wheat agreement was concerned. The British government made an agreement in writing with the Canadian government to buy wheat at a fixed price. They fulfilled the terms of their agreement, and did so in writing; yet numerous members of this house accused the British of reneging, of failing to live up to a moral obligation. I do not suppose the British liked such statements very much. I think we in this house should remember that our chief market for farm products in the past has been Britain, as it probably will be in the future. When we do things like that and make statements like those in this house, I suggest that we are jeopardizing that market. Insulting your customers is not a good way to build up trade. I do not think you could do it in any other kind of business.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear now that another world-wide, multilateral trade conference like Torquay is most unlikely. If that is the case, any additional concessions we get must come from direct negotiations. Therefore I agree with other hon. members who have suggested that we should commence further trade negotiations with Britain. Probably we should do the same thing with the United States, and possibly with France and other countries. Our first objective in these negotiations should be to get back our old, traditional markets, and our second objective, the diversification of our trade. If we can do these things, our trade in future will remain in a healthy position.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, tonight I am not going to presume to assess the results which may or may not have been achieved in the Torquay agreements. We have had many discussions of these trade agreements in the past, as was pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), running from Geneva to Annecy and now to Torquay, and we are led to hope that much good will come out of this one. That is something that can be perhaps better determined by the committee to which this matter will be referred; and certainly we in the house will be in a better position to discuss the question after that committee has performed the functions required of it. However, I do suggest there are one or two questions raised by this report, some of them perhaps of particular interest to the east, to which I should refer tonight.

In connection with these agreements we see that some special arrangements are made with respect to Cuba. We are told that we will purchase some 75,000 tons of sugar annually for the next three years, and it is hoped that as a result we will be able to at least partially regain the position we held at one time in the Cuban market, but which unfortunately we lost. Just what we are going to gain by the concessions given us by Cuba is not clear; that is one of the questions the committee will have to determine. At one time that was a very satisfactory market for our potatoes, and it also took large quantities of fish products from eastern Canada. Then in the late twenties the government of this country negotiated a treaty with the British West Indies, no doubt thinking it was accomplishing a great deal in the development of our trade. I think most Canadians, however, and particularly those in the east will have to admit that as a result of that British West Indies treaty we gained very few benefits, and certainly we lost our markets in Cuba. If by these negotiations at Torquay the government has taken steps to rectify that position it certainly will be an advantage to us.

Then another question is raised. The British West Indies treaty has been in effect since 1927 or 1928. We built a fleet of ships, which we have subsidized. We have spent a great deal of money attempting to develop trade between Canada and the West Indies; but now we see that Mr. Donald Gordon, president of the Canadian National Railways, says that tremendous decisions will have to be made this year. He hopes parliament will provide money to cover the deficit of last year, which I believe was something like $845,000, but he doubts whether further deficits of this size can be covered in this way. More than that, he points out the fact that replacement of ships now in the British West Indian-Canadian service will have to be made if the treaty is to be maintained. Now, sir, there is a serious question.

The second question arising out of this one dealing with Cuba is: having once more sought to regain the Cuban market, are we also going to maintain the developments which we have achieved in the West Indian market? Certainly, there have been some definite advantages gained, particularly to eastern Canada. One of the questions to which I am sure this house, or at any rate the government, will have to determine before many weeks go by is what will be our position with respect to the British West Indian trade in the future. Are we prepared to make the capital expenditure which will ultimately be necessary if these advantages are to be maintained?

There is one ray of sunshine that some of us may see in Torquay, perhaps a minor one. Those in the east, at least in my constituency, will note with some satisfaction that apparently trade arrangements have been made with western Germany. At one time the German market was of tremendous importance to us in the valley in so far as the shipment of apples was concerned. During the years immediately preceding the last war we shipped large quantities of apples there. Of course, that market has been lost to us. We would be interested, and I know the house will be interested, in determining just what advantages we derive under Torquay from the apparent beginnings which we are making towards the resumption of trade with western Germany. But generally, Mr. Speaker, I think that Torquay leaves one with a great deal of disappointment.

This afternoon the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) referred to the triangle from Canada to Great Britain to the United States and back, which has developed over a period of many years. It has been of tremendous importance to all of Canada, but particularly to eastern Canada. Sometimes when we talk politically of the imperial preference one gathers the inference that imperial preference was something which developed under the aegis of the late Viscount Bennett. Our friends are sometimes disposed to shrug their shoulders, as if it were something of which they were not too proud. Of course, we know that imperial preference has been written into our tariff laws through generations. The preference was established by a Liberal government back in the days of Mr. Paterson, who was minister of finance. When Mr. Fielding was minister of finance we had the first imperial preference budget. It was written into our trade throughout the years, but we received no corresponding benefit from Britain, because she was a free trade country. Throughout the years, we did everything to develop that trade, and we succeeded in so doing.

Then in the thirties the matter developed still further, but today we have to face the fact, as suggested by the member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) a moment ago, that after Torquay it looks as if these conferences have reached the limit of their resources. From reports we have had about Torquay the United States, quite properly, was insisting on the one hand that imperial preference be reduced or be abolished, while on the other hand you had certain commonwealth countries such as the United Kingdom, New Zealand and South Africa refusing to compromise or to do anything with respect to these imperial preferences.

Mr. Blackmore: Good for them.

Mr. Nowlan: We in this country, because of our geographical position—I am not criticizing for the moment but I think this is a fact—felt we had to make some compromise between the two positions, and we did give away, rightly or wrongly, the preference on some two hundred articles or more in order to get some hoped for benefits out of the United States market. Whatever the situation may be, sir, we know that trade on the triangle has virtually gone. Figures have been given, and I do not want to weary the house with respect to them again, but our trade with Great Britain has diminished until last year our exports to Great Britain fell off some thirty-four per cent; our exports to other countries, outside of the United States, fell off by some twenty per cent, whereas our exports to the United States increased to a substantial degree. Instead of a triangle you have at the best a two-way street. For the sake of argument I will admit for the moment it is a two-way street, but it is a street, sir, which could be mined very easily. It is a street on which land blocks could be established, if not an iron curtain dropped. We could very easily find ourselves in the position where it became a one-way street or no street at all but simply a meandering path on which the grass will grow. Then, our trade will wither and disappear, because we have lost those traditional markets to which we have been accustomed; markets which we in the east have to depend upon if our economy is going to be maintained. It is for that reason we look upon Torquay with misgiving and with doubt.

So far as these concessions are concerned we feel that our government has gone about as far as it felt it could go. Other conference countries, commonwealth countries, refused to go that far. The United States has refused to go any farther. We know that sooner or later this government, or some other government, will have to make up its mind just what position we are going to take in the trading of the world in the future. Certainly, we hope for multilateral trade. Certainly, we hope for a lessening of the trade barriers. But, sir, I think we have to be practical. Living in this world today we have to realize how, not fantastic perhaps, but how very flimsy may be these hopes. This preference is more than a matter of trade to those of us in the east. Written into the trade agreements of the past there is the benefit of direct shipment, and the fact that preference will only apply to shipments made from the ports of origin in the commonwealth to a port on a river, lake or seaboard in Canada without transshipment.

In his statement the other night the Minister of Finance stated we had safeguarded the principle of preference. I am not quarrelling with that for the moment at all. It is for the future to determine. Since we gave away the benefits on at least two hundred items, then we automatically lost the benefits of direct shipment on those articles coming into Canada. They will now go into New York or Boston.

Mr. Howe: May I ask the hon. member what the two hundred items were on which we gave away the preference? We did not give up our preference, but we reduced the preference on certain items.

Mr. Nowlan: According to the statement made the other night by the Minister of Finance, and the statement which appeared in the press, we relaxed our preference to that extent. This is a matter which will be developed later, so I am not going to quarrel with the minister now. I am certainly glad to hear the minister make that statement that we gave it up on none, because that is not the impression that has been created in this country. Whether we gave it up on any or relaxed it on any—I do not think this point has been made in this house before—to that extent we lose the benefit of direct shipment to Canadian ports. The people employed in the ports of Halifax, Montreal, Saint John or Vancouver will suffer as a result of the relaxation of those benefits because that direct shipment clause was an important factor in the imperial preference agreements as originally drafted.

Mr. Howe: Will the hon. member, at this stage, accept my statement that there is no impairment of the privilege or obligation of direct shipments and the benefits accruing therefrom. He did not accept it before, he repeated his statement after I made the assertion.

Mr. Nowlan: I accept the minister's statement, and I am sure that will clarify the situation in Canada which is worrying many at the moment because that is not the impression which has been created. I am sure the minister will also admit that as we do relax or give away the imperial preference on any item, then to that extent we are weakening or undermining the principle of direct shipment which has been an important part of the economy of the ports of Canada during the past twenty years.

Mr. Howe: You assert we are undermining, and I am asserting we are not.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not asserting we are. I am asserting that if we are, then that follows. This committee can determine that after the matter has been referred to it. I can tell the right hon. gentleman that papers which have not been entirely critical of this government have certainly suggested that is one of the outcomes of any relaxation of the imperial preference which follows because of Torquay. But we are not debating what may or may not happen. At the moment we are debating the realities of the situation, and the fact that we in Canada are facing an extremely serious trade situation because of the emphasis upon our United States trade and the diminution of our trade with the United Kingdom, the commonwealth countries and other countries outside of the continent of North America.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition referred to the statement issued out of Toronto last Saturday by the British-Canadian trade group which has been studying our problems, and which had recommended and urged the establishment or the creation of a conference between the governments of the commonwealth in order to study this problem and to attempt to resolve it. Certainly I suggest that we all should support that proposal. If there ever was a time when such a conference was necessary, it is now. No stone should be left unturned. I realize that there are difficulties in the way. I realize that it is not an easy problem to solve. But the more difficult the problem, the more reason for prompt action and the less reason for delay. Having regard to the seriousness of the situation, and in view of the discussions which have taken place here today, I would hope that this government would take some steps to support the suggestion and to urge and to lead in the establishment of such a study in the immediate future.

Ancillary to that, may I say that I was intrigued to read in a press report the statement by the president, I think it was, of the British federation of agriculture—because agriculture, industry and trade were all represented at Toronto. The head of the British agricultural group suggested that the time had come when there should be, and would be on the part of the British government, greater relaxation of trade restrictions in so far as the importation of Canadian food products are concerned. I know the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) must have studied that statement with some particular interest.

In that statement some reference was made to the fact that the cheese contract showed a relaxation at least on the part of the British of their fixed determination to engage in bulk purchases. Those of us in the apple industry know that last year Great Britain relaxed the restrictions upon the importation of apples from all the sterling areas. In other words, New Zealand, South Africa and Australia exported their apples to the trade in Great Britain, and the apples were bought and sold direct without restriction; possibly that was only because they were in the sterling areas. But it has been suggested by more than one competent authority, or at least has been suggested, by one who had information on the matter, on Friday night in Toronto that this coming year arrangements could be made whereby Great Britain would import apples from Canada, independent of and apart from bulk purchases and for distribution direct to the trade.

The minister will know that last year importations were made and that purchases of apples were made direct from the trade in British Columbia and Nova Scotia, without the intervention of this government; and that was a step in the right direction. I suggest that there is now more than a possibility and that apparently, according to these men who are now here, there is a probability that, if we take the right steps and follow the right course, this year we can arrange for the direct sale of apples from Canada—from British Columbia and from Nova Scotia; those are the two great exporting, production areas—to Great Britain, to the trade there. It has been suggested that a mission ought to be set up there, representative of the two apple exporting areas, to handle our apples and to sell them direct to the trade. If that could be done, it would be of tremendous importance to the apple producers not only of British Columbia, I assume, but certainly of Nova Scotia.

We know that there are governmental committees engaged on various projects. We know that there is always consideration given to the problem of the dollar and sterling areas. We know that each year during the past two years the British—after discussion, after debate, after waiting, after the apples were probably picked, when no one knew whether they were going to be sold or not—made an agreement whereby they purchased a substantial quantity of our apples. I suggest that this year we take time by the forelock, that we do not wait until the frosts come next fall, that we pursue the matter now and that, if possible, we make arrangements so that the apples may be sold, in order that the producers will know of it well in advance.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Those are some of the minor and perhaps ancillary matters arising out of the discussion this afternoon of the Torquay agreement. By dealing with these matters, and by working at them unitedly and intelligently, we can and must solve the problem of regaining these markets in the sterling area; otherwise the economy of eastern Canada at least will be most seriously impaired in the future.

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I will be exceedingly brief, but I have heard such a spate of despondency over something that I had persuaded myself we should be overjoyed over, that I think someone should make a statement perhaps with particular reference to his particular part of the country.

I do not know whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has received many compliments from the province of British Columbia, but I am going to say that, if he has not, he should have, over the agreement which has been concluded. The general basis of the criticism has been that we were unable to get into the broad phases of over-all trading the world around. Theoretically, from that criticism we can only deduce that Canada is to be blamed for not taking complete leadership in everything. Perhaps Canada is to be blamed for the condition the world is in, if we carry that proposition to its logical conclusion. It always takes more than one to make a bargain; and in a conference of this kind, it takes a great many more than one to do so.

I have been reading the United States periodicals and the British papers, and I have been led to believe that Canada came out best of all of the countries in the conference. We in British Columbia were particularly delighted for a variety of causes. I am going to adopt the policy that was adopted by the opposition when they were dealing with the increase in the sales tax, and quote the decreases percentagewise. In the case of aluminum going into the United States, we secured a reduction of 25 per cent in the United States duty against Canadian aluminum. That is going to mean a tremendous boon to our province of British Columbia because we are getting a huge development by the Aluminum Company of Canada which is going to alter entirely the face of our province, particularly in the region represented by my good friend the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite). That development is going to change the entire face of the province of British Columbia. This reduction will induce the early sale of their product in the United States. In zinc ores there is a reduction of 15 per cent in the duty; in zinc blocks, there is a reduction of 14 per cent. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) said something to the effect: Oh well, those are only things that the Americans want anyway. That is not a sound argument, Mr. Speaker. Of course they are things that the Americans want; but likewise they are things of which the Americans themselves produce vast quantities; and the reduction of their duty against our product makes it that much easier for our product to enter their markets. He seemed to indicate that we had given reductions in American manufactured goods. Why, of course! I understood that it was Canada's policy to have multilateral trade, to trade with everybody who would trade with us. A trading arrangement is a two-way street, as one of the hon. gentlemen opposite has already said. In order to get you have to give something. I think for the manufactured goods and the concessions that we have given we have reduced the cost of those goods to our Canadian consumers by that much, and it will not affect Canadian enterprise in any particular.

The next item to which I am going to make reference is the most important item of all, namely, Douglas fir plywood. We secured a reduction in the United States market of 50 per cent; in other words, a reduction from 40 per cent down to 20 per cent. This is of redoubled importance to us because it means a further manufacturing of our timber resources. There was a time in British Columbia when we British Columbians used to look askance at people who came along with rafts of logs with the bark on and threw them into the holds of boats which went to Japan. After that the best we could do for many years was to sell what we called squares. They too were manufactured abroad into finer lumber, or finished lumber. This agreement means that we are getting the most out of our lumber when we put it into plywood; and the plywood manufacturers in my riding tell me that even at 40 per cent they were almost able to get into the United States market. They tell me that at 20 per cent they will now have no difficulty at all. And we were wise enough to secure a reduction in the steel knives which cut our plywood, and they are a terrific expense. They are a knife I think of about 30 or 32 inches, and I think they run somewhere in the neighbourhood of $300 a piece, and they wear out fairly rapidly. We secured a reduction in those knives. The best knives are made in the United States, although they come from European countries as well. But the great development there is that we are going further with our manufacturing. And today in broom handles, in paint brushes and in other things we also have advantages in that market, and now in plywood. I would suggest that we are getting out of our lumber resources three labour dollars for every one that we took 20 years ago. That is of tremendous advantage to British Columbia.

We have obtained a reduction in that market in canned salmon of 40 per cent. I do not know how great that may be to us in British Columbia. I rather imagine that we have pretty adequate markets for our salmon in British Columbia at the present time; but I want to emphasize that this is a long-range deal. Had anything of this nature been announced in our province in the period 1925 to 1940 it would have been greeted as the greatest news that ever came to our province; and if there is any tendency at the present time just to accept it as another announcement it is because our industries are exceedingly busy at the present time, and have markets for nearly all the products that they can produce. But again I say this is a long-range proposition, and we should solidify and consolidate it as time goes on.

As I said, I wanted to speak just for a very few minutes, because after being a loyal Canadian I am a loyal British Columbian, and this agreement is of tremendous advantage to our province. I should like to say that our people in British Columbia are almost unanimously of that opinion, too. We have in this country today I think only two great sources of money to keep everything going. One is the wages of labour, and the second great source is the annual income of the Canadian farms from cash crops.

As a result of this agreement we are certainly going to step up the industrialization of the province of British Columbia, which is already a very great industrial empire. I should like to add my few words to those which the minister himself graciously gave to the splendid staff that Canada sent over there, headed by Hector McKinnon. I know some of the other men in agriculture, and in various other phases who accompanied the mission, and who I think did a magnificent job for Canada within the territory in which they were permitted to work.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, some of us who in the debate on May 3 urged on the government that an opportunity should be provided for the house to debate trade policies in general and the Torquay agreements in particular welcome the opportunity afforded by the present resolution to discuss these two very important topics.

It is just as well perhaps, Mr. Speaker, that the importance which the house attaches to subjects brought before it for discussion is not measured by the time actually spent on them; otherwise, so far as this session is concerned, it would appear that the house does not attach great importance to the subject of trade; for this is the first occasion that has been offered to the house to debate trade policies, so far as I recall, at the present session.

Trade, Mr. Speaker, has certainly lost none of its importance for Canada, and in approaching this subject we are approaching something which is part of the economic life-blood of our country. In the early post-war years we used to speak very freely about the fact that Canada had risen to the third place among the great trading nations of the world; that she was perhaps more dependent upon export markets for the employment of her people than any other country in the world; that three out of every eight persons in Canada owed their employment to our export trade. And although perhaps the proportion has been reduced slightly, to about one-third, nevertheless the subject is one of paramount importance for every Canadian. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think that the house should welcome this opportunity of spending a little time considering trade, and in particular these agreements which have been announced by the government as having been concluded at Torquay.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing), who has just spoken in fulsome terms of the way in which the agreements have been received in his province, has used quite strong expressions. He has pictured the people of his province as overjoyed. Now, Mr. Speaker, to the extent to which there are benefits in these agreements for the people of Canada I am sure all hon. members will be glad to commend them. At the same time the house will not fail, I am sure, in the discharge of its duty to examine the price that is being paid for the benefits that have been gained, and also to measure what has been gained against the hopes that we were led to form in anticipation of this conference, and also to compare these benefits with the picture that has been given to the house by the government concerning the effects of these agreements.

Those who sat in the house when we were called to meet at the beginning of December, 1947, and recall the way in which the government at that time introduced the Geneva trade agreements, and saw later the way in which some of the colour came out of the picture on closer examination, will, I think, perhaps approach the government's rather grandiose description of the benefits of these agreements with at least a measure of reservation.

One recalls so well that broadcast to the nation on the evening of November 17, 1947, when the then prime minister went on the air and announced that as a result of the trade agreements which had been negotiated by the Canadian representatives at Geneva the new heaven and the new earth had come. And then, as soon as the prime minister had finished, the Minister of Finance came on the air to announce to the Canadian people that the advent of the new heaven and the new earth was postponed because it was felt necessary by the government to apply what were then absolutely illegal and unconstitutional taxes and restrictions upon imports into this country, measures applied by orders in council, which eventually found their way into the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act.

And so the new heaven and the new earth announced by the prime minister on that occasion were at least postponed. And by and by we found we were going to obtain only part of the new heaven and the new earth, at best, because only part of the Geneva agreement has ever come into effect. If I remember correctly the statement made a few days ago by the Minister of Finance, if not one made in an earlier session, the Geneva agreements have come into effect with respect to about half of the items to which they purported to apply. And even on that limited basis the effect of the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act over a period of three years was to reduce still further the area within which the agreements were permitted to operate.

Some of us in approaching the present agreements, however hopeful we may be, cannot dismiss from our minds the recollection that every time the government has come out from a conference it has announced at that time whatever it had to offer in the way of an agreement as though that were the advent of the new heaven and the new earth. This necessarily leaves those who have grown accustomed to these tactics with the feeling that we must approach the government's statements with at least a generous measure of reservation.

I am sure that on the part of every member in the house there will be a desire to commend the able representatives of this country at Torquay. They included some of the ablest of men in our civil service, men of whom the country is justly proud. I am quite sure that through them Canada was able to discharge her part in those negotiations with credit, in the manner in which the negotiations were carried out.

I have a feeling, sir, that if the government would really break down and forget, for once, trying to sugar everything that it brings before the house, or paint everything it has done in glowing colours—it is my view that if the government would really break down and be candid with the house it would tell us that it has been disappointed with the results at Torquay.

What was accomplished at Torquay? Well, we will welcome the extension of the Geneva agreements for a further period of three years, to January 1, 1954. Then, as to the other fact that has been put before us as an accomplishment, namely the negotiation of sixteen new agreements, I suppose we are glad to see agreements in a world in which it is necessary more and more for the free nations to show the nations behind the iron curtain that the free nations are prepared to work together. Trade is one way in which we believe we can work together.

Having said that, I think we must admit—and I believe if the government were frank it would also admit—that the sixteen agreements are rather narrow in scope. And, even apart from those two factors, the rest of the negotiations at Geneva has been written into a record of failure and disappointment. I do not say, and I wish this to be clear, that the failure is attributable to Canada or to the Canadian representatives. Unquestionably the position taken by some of the nations represented at Geneva made it exceedingly difficult for Canada, and other countries that would have liked to enter into agreements with them, to do so.

Nevertheless we must, in reviewing these agreements, try to see them in their true light and, so far as we can, in their precise proportions. And whatever may be said on their behalf, the fact of the matter is that their benefits are very narrow in scope; and, on the whole, the Torquay agreements in years to come will be remembered largely, I suggest, because of the disappointments that were encountered there.

Torquay is not the only milestone in the post-war record of disappointments in the field of trade negotiations. How hopeful we were in 1945 and 1946! We looked at the draft charter of the international trade organization and we saw a new spirit in Washington, a new attitude toward freeing the channels of trade in the world. We saw throughout the free nations of the world what on all sides appeared to be a desire to further and to extend world trade on a multilateral basis. We were all filled with hope. That, of course, was in the days before Russia had shown to us that she was determined to sabotage every effort of the rest of the world to advance toward either prosperity or peace. And it was also before some of the harder facts of the trading position of many nations were fully appreciated.

We did not appreciate in those days the difficulties Great Britain was shortly to face with respect to her trade and her currency. We underestimated, I think, the material exhaustion of the nations of western Europe; and we certainly underestimated the complexities involved in multilateral trade negotiations.

Mr. Blackmore: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: That belongs to history now. I think most of the free nations of the world tried to do their best, with due regard for their own interests, to give some play to the principles of multilateral trade. But, apart from Geneva and some very limited success at Annecy, and even more limited success at Torquay, it seems that many of those high hopes that were held five years ago have passed now into the limbo of disappointments.

We will not forget, either, in measuring the benefits we have enjoyed as a great trading nation, the fact that we owe much to the enlightenment which has distinguished not only trading policies in the United States, but also those policies that have sought, even at considerable cost to the American public, to assist other nations on the path to recovery. Whoever in this world, living twelve years ago, could have foreseen that the policies of the United States which, up until that time, from the Canadian point of view presented a great handicap and barrier to the freeing of the channels of international trade, would have been supplanted by policies which have been marked by generosity rarely equalled in history? And Canada has been the beneficiary of those American policies of trade, and those economic policies which have been designed to assist Europe back onto its feet. The European recovery plan gave great benefits to Canada.

I think the house will welcome, in general, the proposal to send these agreements and the accompanying documents to the standing committee on banking and commerce for more detailed examination. That, I think, is a highly proper course with respect to a measure of this kind, particularly as it seems to me some attempt will have to be made with respect to many of these items to measure the advantages against the possible disadvantages involved for Canada. We shall have to work within obvious limitations, and the judgment that we shall apply in the committee or in the house must necessarily be tentative, until the agreements have been in operation and there has been an opportunity to see them at work.

However, I think we may well pause to consider the rather limited terms of the reference to the committee, and shortly I should like to say a word concerning the terms of the resolution and to compare it with the course the government invited the house to follow with respect to the Geneva agreements in the session of 1947-48.

May I first offer some comments with reference to the background against which we ought fairly to measure either the benefits or the disappointments of the Torquay agreements. I am not going to weary the house with statistics. As a matter of fact very few statistics need to be emphasized now beyond those that have already been recorded in the course of the debate this afternoon. But let me deal with our fundamental problem, and it is a problem. Whatever joy we may take out of the fact that our markets in the United States have been expanding as a result of the stockpiling policies of that country, the fact nevertheless remains that our trade problem increasingly becomes one of seeing our eggs to an ever-growing degree being placed in one basket.

Let us look at the figures for only the last two years. I will not trouble the house to go back beyond that. In 1949 our total export trade amounted to $2,993 million. Of that sum we exported to the United States $1,503,459,000, or 50 per cent in round figures. To the United Kingdom we exported $705 million in round figures, or 23·5 per cent. To the other commonwealth countries we exported $310 million or 10 per cent of our total exports. That means that in 1949 we exported half our produce to the United States and one-third to all commonwealth countries.

What is the picture in 1950? Our total export trade expanded to $3,118 million, the largest figure in our history. The United States purchased $2,021 million out of that total, or 65 per cent of the aggregate. The United States, even with a much larger total of exports, moved up from 50 per cent the year before to 65 per cent of that considerably larger total. United Kingdom purchases dropped from $705 million in 1949 to $470 million in 1950, and that figure represented only 15 per cent of our total exports. That is a fact that must arrest the attention of the house and give concern to the Canadian public.

Our exports to the United Kingdom dropped from $705 million in 1949 to $470 million in 1950, and in that year they represented only 15 per cent of our total exports. In 1950 the commonwealth countries purchased $185 million of our exports, a very substantial drop from the $310 million the year before, and at that figure of $185 million they were only 6 per cent of our total exports. Therefore, as applied to the larger total of exports in the year 1950 compared with 1949, we see that the United States has moved up from 50 to 65 per cent, and all commonwealth countries, Great Britain included, have dropped from 33·5 per cent to merely 21 per cent. Only one-fifth of our exports went to all commonwealth countries combined last year.

One has scanned the figures for the first two reported months of this year 1951 in the hope that the trend would have been arrested, but we see that for the first two months of the calendar year 1951 our exports to the United Kingdom have dropped—I will give round figures—from $79 million to $73,600,000, and total exports to all commonwealth countries are about what they were in 1950. In those two months our exports to the United States have increased from $260 million to $339 million. Now, sir, let us be fair. We are glad to see the increase in our exports to the United States, but let us remember that they are due to what may be temporary policies. These high exports to the United States are due to their policies of stockpiling, but even if it is only temporary we are glad to see the trading gap between Canada and the United States, which has traditionally existed, being closed under pressure of world events.

But no Canadian can view with any degree of equanimity this situation when our exports to the United Kingdom have shown this very alarming decrease accompanied by an equally alarming decrease in our exports to all other commonwealth countries. When I say all commonwealth countries I am referring not merely to the aggregate; I am referring to all commonwealth countries because it is one of the alarming features of our trading statistics of 1950 that the decrease in our exports to commonwealth countries applied right along the line. All commonwealth countries were purchasing less from us than in the previous year.

In the face of that situation what is the course that we urge upon the government? We urge, as we have consistently urged, that the government should take every step open to it to arrest this alarming decline in our exports to the commonwealth countries, and in particular to the United Kingdom, that great traditional market, a great market particularly for the primary produce of Canada. This danger of which I have spoken, of putting all our trading eggs in one basket, is a danger that confronts the primary producer in this country more than it does any other person in our Canadian economic system. Therefore as one who regards the primary producer of this country as still the bedrock of the soundness of the Canadian economy, I make no apology for attaching the highest importance to this decline in our exports to the United Kingdom and to all commonwealth countries.

It is a fact that stares every one of us in the face, and I submit that the house cannot be content to sit back and watch the government apparently viewing this alarming decline with apathy. In case hon. members think that is a little strong, may I come back to this point, that we have urged upon them the calling of a conference of these very nations who are purchasing less from us, as I have indicated. Why should we not sit down together and see if we cannot do something to eliminate the very real difficulties that stand in the way of restoring the kind of trade they were doing with us previously? It is not simply a case of trying to expand our trade. It is a case now, so far as Canada is concerned, of seeking to win back markets that we have been steadily losing in the past fifteen months at an alarming rate. It is not good enough simply to sit back and watch that going on under our very eyes. It is far too dangerous a trend for any Canadian to sit back and watch without grave concern.

There are difficulties on the other side of this picture. The difficulties are not simply on the part of Canada, or any unwillingness on the part of Canada to trade. We will frankly realize, if we approach the problem realistically, that there are in the policies being followed by the United Kingdom government difficulties in the way of increasing trade between Canada and the United Kingdom. The bulk purchasing policies of the United Kingdom government have not in the long run assisted Canada's export trade to expand, no matter what some of the ministers opposite may say about temporary benefits. As a country we have not had much benefit from some of the bulk purchasing policies followed by the socialist government of the United Kingdom which has been directing many of its bulk purchases to countries which are competitors of ours.

The difficulties in the field of exchange are very great; unquestionably the negotiators who represented Canada were confronted with the problem very frequently. But, sir, when difficulties arise do we simply sit down and say it is no use, and throw up our hands? I say this situation is too serious to justify an attitude of that kind. Not once, but on many occasions we have urged the government to call a conference or to recommend the calling of a conference by other nations within the commonwealth, in order that sitting together we might seek to grapple with this problem and see if we cannot at least reduce some of these very real and admitted difficulties in the way of the expansion of trade with one another. The house will not have forgotten that on February 28, 1950, a motion was introduced in this house on behalf of the official opposition by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) which will be found at page 308 of Hansard for that date. This was on a motion to go into supply; and after moving that all words after the word "that" be stricken out the official opposition sought to substitute this motion:

> this house is of the opinion that the government should take immediate steps to convene at the earliest possible date a conference of the nations of the British commonwealth and the countries of the empire to devise policies to restore our lost markets, and thereby to provide jobs for our Canadian people.

If one turns to pages 337 and 338 of the same volume the unhappy fact will be noted that the government whipped up its big majority to defeat that motion by a vote of 148 to 55. What was the result? A situation which was then commencing to assume serious proportions was permitted to assume more and more imposing proportions until now the export trade of this country to Great Britain has dropped from $705 million in 1949 to $470 million in 1950, and to commonwealth countries from $310 million to $185 million. I do not say that whole drop could have been avoided by the calling of a conference. We have to be frank and admit the difficulties which brought about this situation, helped along by policies the British government felt compelled to adopt. But there is no possible extenuation for the failure of the government to do what ought to have been done to meet these conditions by seeking to call a conference at which everything possible would have been done by men of good will from our sister nations within the commonwealth to at least reduce those difficulties. So time has gone on and the situation has steadily become worse.

Mr. Ferrie: Water under the bridge.

Mr. Fleming: Well it would not have been water under the bridge if the government had adopted the very constructive suggestion offered by the Progressive Conservative opposition on that occasion. We would not now be facing a situation in which our exports to the markets of the United Kingdom and the commonwealth countries have experienced this further critical drop. And when I speak of the serious drop that has occurred in the last fifteen months, I do not confine to that period the falling off in our exports to the United Kingdom and commonwealth countries. That has been going on for some years, ever since war purchases dropped out of the picture. But the situation became infinitely more critical during the fifteen month period beginning toward the end of 1949 and running now into 1951. A great deal of this loss of trade would not have been water under the bridge today if the government had been prepared to move in the direction they were asked to move at that time and on other occasions.

I said something about the procedure indicated by the government on this occasion. What I have just said relates to the background of the trading situation against which we must measure the Torquay agreements to judge their value and relative importance in influencing a trade situation that has been characterized by an increasing lopsidedness. In 1947, after the Geneva agreements were signed and the then prime minister made the announcement on the air to which I have referred, parliament was summoned at a very unusual time. The reason given was that parliament was to be asked to meet on December 5, 1947, for the purpose of ratifying the Geneva agreements. Such was the importance of those agreements, such was the urgency attached to their ratification by parliament, that nothing short of immediate ratification was proposed at that juncture. So parliament was called to meet two and one-half weeks before Christmas. If you will examine Hansard for December 5, 1947, you will see at page 2 a paragraph in the speech from the throne relating to the course the government asked parliament to follow with respect to the Geneva agreements. That paragraph read:

> A permanent solution of our exchange problems and the future well-being of the nation depend upon the revival of world trade. An important step forward in this direction has been the successful conclusion of the recent discussions at Geneva. A positive achievement was the conclusion of trade agreements with eighteen other nations.

Then mark these words, if you please:

> You will be asked to approve these agreements. Canada is now represented at the United Nations trade conference in Havana, which it is hoped will result in the establishment of an international trade organization along lines agreed to at Geneva. The trade agreements and the establishment of an international trade organization will provide a sound foundation for the expansion of world commerce, production and employment.

I have already alluded to the fact that the Geneva trade agreements were to a substantial degree neutralized by conflicting policies adopted at the same time by the government. But to contrast the course the government invited parliament to take at that session with respect to the Geneva agreements with the course suggested in the present motion may I refer to the resolution introduced in the house, which will be found at page 106 of Hansard for December 9, 1947:

> That it is expedient that parliament do approve the general agreement on tariffs and trade, including the protocol of the provisional application thereof—

Then it goes on to set out the various documents, and in conclusion states:

> —and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

In the course of the debate objection was taken to parliament being called upon to vote approval of those agreements before there had been detailed examination of them. On March 12, 1948, the then prime minister introduced the following motion, which was seconded by the present Prime Minister, and which will be found at page 2145 of Hansard:

> That the subject matter of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, including the protocol of provisional application thereof, together with the complementary agreement of October 30, 1947, between Canada and the United States of America, be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

You will see, sir, that the resolution is one which has been followed quite closely by the government in the resolution now under debate. I make this one observation in respect to the course that was followed in the banking and commerce committee and in the house. Following the adoption of that motion on March 12, 1948, the committee held several meetings and it heard some evidence. Then, the committee suddenly ceased to be called. The Geneva trade agreements rested literally in the lap of the banking and commerce committee, and that was the last that was heard of them. They have never been approved by parliament. The resolution which was introduced by the government at the beginning of that session was never disposed of because the agreements, apparently by the deliberate tactics of the government, were never reported back and have never been debated since.

Now, attention has been called in the debate today to the fact that the committee on banking and commerce is not being called upon to make any recommendations with regard to these agreements. The resolution simply proposes that the subject matter of the Torquay negotiations be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce. What happens after they are referred there will remain, I suppose, in the inscrutable realm of government strategy. If it suits the political interests of the government to have a resolution passed in the committee reporting these Torquay negotiations back to the house, unquestionably that will be done. If it suits the political fortunes of the government that the study of the agreements should die in the committee, no doubt that is the fate that awaits this agreement, just as it was the fate that overtook the Geneva agreements in 1948.

Mr. Knowles: The committee only has the subject matter of the agreements referred to it, not the agreements themselves.

Mr. Fleming: The committee has the subject matter of the agreements, but apparently will not be given the opportunity of passing judgment directly on the agreements.

Now, sir, it seems to me that this method, while commendable from the point of view of getting before a committee the details of the negotiations, is not a satisfactory method, having regard to the relationship between the committee and the house; and the relationship between the government, acting in pursuance of such powers as it possesses in the matter of negotiating a trade agreement, on the one hand, and the house on the other. It is no happy reflection upon the Canadian parliament, as it certainly is no happy reflection upon the government opposite, that measures such as these Geneva trade agreements which were pictured to be the new heaven and the new earth, in that broadcast of November, 1947, so important that parliament was summoned to meet on the eve of Christmas to pass judgment on them, were simply allowed to be forgotten. Such a course reflects no credit on the Canadian parliament, and it certainly reflects no credit on the government opposite. While I repeat that I am glad to see the banking and commerce committee given an opportunity of reviewing the details of these negotiations, I am nevertheless regretful that the government now proposes to simply follow a course which is a repetition of an incident which does not reflect credit on parliament or the government.

The government goes ahead with trade negotiations on what we were led to believe was a very broad and important scale, in pursuance of the powers it possesses to reduce the Canadian tariff. Surely, sir, if those measures have the importance pretended on their behalf by the government, this parliament should have the opportunity of passing judgment on them, whether favourable or unfavourable. It seems to me that what we have before us is a very halfhearted permission from the government to have a peek at the details of the agreements, but apparently no opportunity of expressing some judgment upon them. I urge, Mr. Speaker, that the terms of this resolution should be broadened so that when the committee meets it will not be stultified, it will not be confined, but as a committee possessing the dignity of parliament will be a responsible committee to consider the matter which the government pictures as one of importance, and will have an opportunity of conducting such a review and inquiry with respect to these negotiations and agreements as will be a credit to the Canadian parliament.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to refer the documents executed at Torquay to a committee of parliament for the information of the members of the committee, and for such report as may emanate from the committee to the House of Commons. Objection has been taken that the committee cannot change the agreement. Well, I agree that is the situation. To have forty countries enter into tariff negotiations and not make it possible for representatives of those countries to bind the governments that they represent to agreements reached during the conference would of course make tariff negotiations of this kind impossible. All the countries at Torquay were acting under executive authority. For the United States, Canada, Great Britain, all the countries there represented, the executive of each took the responsibility for signing the agreement on behalf of his country. It is the method followed by British countries, and it has been accepted in countries outside of the British commonwealth.

I do hope that the committee will give careful study to the results at Torquay, because it seems to me that this uninformed debate we are having indicates that a study of the terms of agreement will be very helpful, particularly to members of the opposition who have spoken. We are told tonight that the results at Torquay have been unimportant to Canadian trade. I believe that many parts of the country will take a different view. We have heard the viewpoint of British Columbia, and I believe we shall get an even stronger viewpoint in the same direction from the maritime provinces. I believe the farmers of this country—

Mr. Hatfield: No, no.

Mr. Howe: The hon. member sees no virtue in anything but potatoes. We did not do anything about potatoes but we did get concessions for other maritime products.

We are told that Canadian trade is in a very serious situation, but that the whole situation can be saved by calling an empire conference. If hon. members were reading the newspapers they would know that an important trade conference is taking place in the city of Ottawa today with a high level team of British and Canadian experts. On the British team are the heads of three departments of government, the treasury, the board of trade and the ministry of food. This trade conference will continue throughout the week. I can say that conference is to be followed by a trade conference with the republic of France; that is to be followed by a trade conference with the British West Indies; that is to be followed by a trade conference with New Zealand. I believe this government is not wholly oblivious of the fact that conferences may be helpful.

The minister of external affairs (Mr. Pearson) has called my attention to the fact that last year Canada attended 169 conferences, so that if conferences, the cure-all of the opposition parties, can be helpful, I think we have done well by international conferences.

We are told that our Canadian trade is in a dreadful position. I will admit that the Conservatives have come quite a distance since 1911 when they said: No truck or trade with the Yankees. They now admit that some trade with the Yankees is not too bad, but they say that we have far too much of it at the present time.

Then trade figures are quoted to show that our trade with the United Kingdom has fallen off tremendously. I was interested in the base figure that was used by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). He used the trade figures for the year 1943. In 1943 Canada was at the top of its production of munitions of war and we were sending those to England in tremendous quantity, with no price tag on the munitions. We built up a tremendous trade in that way, but it was wholly abnormal, of course. Using that base, he showed—

Mr. Fulton: He did not use it as a base.

Mr. Howe: He started with the year 1943 as a base.

Mr. Fulton: He did not say it was a base. He just started there, it is true, but he did not say it was a base nor did he look upon it as a base.

Mr. Howe: We will call it a point of departure, then. In other words, his comparison was with the year 1943. Then he showed that after we had that level of trade established in 1943, through to about 1947, it began to drop away. But what he did not say was that today the trade between Britain and Canada is exceedingly high, compared with any pre-war year in history. It is still high. It is true we have not trade in munitions of war, but we are still doing a big business in the United Kingdom and with the empire, comparing the figures of today with any pre-war trade figures.

There is a certain limit to the trade that a country can have. A country cannot export more goods than it produces, minus the goods that it consumes within its own borders. That is the limit of exports, and we have been producing exports up to that limit continuously since the year 1943. I will take the same point of departure as that taken by the leader of the opposition; we will use that as a base. Every year since then we have been selling everything that we could produce. I claim that no country can do more than that in the line of exports.

There is a limit to the amount any country can import. That limit is the amount that it can afford to pay for imports; and we have been importing about to that limit.

It has been said that we have been increasing unduly our exports to the United States. Why have we been doing that? We either had to do that or we had to limit our imports from the United States; and this country cannot get along without substantial imports from the United States.

My hon. friend has referred to the session of 1948, or of 1947, I believe it was.

Mr. Fulton: 1947.

Mr. Howe: Yes, 1947. At that time we were going bankrupt in United States dollars. In other words, up to that time we were exceeding our ability to buy in the United States. We had to meet that situation. We met it partly by cutting back our imports from the United States, but we met it to a larger extent by building up our exports to the United States and thus building up our ability to import from the United States. It seems to me that that was the logical development of trade. Today our trade with the United States is not in balance but, counting shipments of gold and certain invisibles, we are certainly trading on a basis that is manageable and that is within our ability to pay for imports.

The United Kingdom has been in the same position in its trade with Canada. We have never refused to export anything to England; we have pressed exports on England every year; and England has bought to the extent of her ability to pay. We have been told repeatedly by representatives of the United Kingdom that Britain would gladly spend in Canada all the dollars that she could earn in Canada. Canada therefore has promoted the sale of British goods in Canada; and exports to this country from Britain are today at far the highest level in the history of either country. In other words, we have been building up our trade with the United Kingdom by building up the ability of the United Kingdom to pay for goods purchased in this market. Through our efforts and through the co-operation of the British government, the balance of trade today is in favour of the sterling area. In other words, the sterling area is selling Canada more goods than it is buying from Canada. Surely that is a sound position for both countries to be in, because it removes the balance of payments situation as an impediment to trade and it places both countries in a position so that the trade of each can increase, step by step and in parallel.

Our trade with South America has been increasing greatly, particularly in the last several months. There again that represents a fairly well-balanced trade presently somewhat in our favour. Our over-all trade position is that exports and imports are almost in balance. In 1950 the figure for our imports was slightly larger than that for our exports. Usually there has been a slight difference in in our favour; that is, exports were greater than imports. Surely that is a sound trading position.

We speak of the old triangular pattern of trade. Under that pattern, we made most of our purchases in the United States, sold most of our products to England and said to England: You pay our bills in the United States; we cannot find the dollars; you must do it for us. That was the triangular pattern of trade. We bought in one market, sold in another market and asked our two principal customers to square up our balances with each other. Today our trading position with all our customers is nearly a balanced one, as nearly as it is desirable to get in the nature of multilateral trade in which Canada participates.

We are told that we are sacrificing the British preference. As a matter of fact, we have given up no important British preference. The margin has been cut on a few items. At the Annecy conference Britain, for reasons that were good to both Canada and the United Kingdom, unbound the preference margin as far as the United Kingdom was concerned; and in a few items the margin of preference has been shortened. But no important preference has been given up and no preference has been taken away from any empire country.

A good deal has been said about empire preferences. Hon. gentlemen opposite speak as though those would be the salvation of any situation. Any British country can ship to Canada and can take advantage in Canada of the British preference. But I know of no article that Canada can ship to any British country freely and as to which Canada can obtain a British preference. The preference is on the statute books, but behind the preference is a prohibition or a quota. Therefore, unless trading methods change within the empire, I doubt whether the British preference is going to find markets for us within the empire. With the improvement in the balance of exchange that I have mentioned, I hope that those quotas and prohibitions may be removed, in time; if so, the British preference will be to the advantage of Canada. But today Canada is not gaining the advantage of the preference which inures to other British countries trading into this market.

I do not know that I need to touch on any other remarks in this debate. It was suggested that we have not been standing behind India. It was said that we should have given wheat to India. Well, I can say for the benefit of the house that we delivered wheat to India this year. We delivered our last cargo just a few days ago. We have delivered to India in this calendar year 300,000 tons of wheat, which represents something over 10 million bushels. I think that 300,000 tons of wheat from Canada compares reasonably well with 2 million tons just voted for delivery to India by the United States. It compares very well with 50,000 tons from Russia, and a very much smaller amount from China. I think it is well for hon. members to know these facts when they are being critical of the government for our not doing anything to help out this situation in India.

Then we are told that the only reason we are selling our products in the United States, apparently the only reason we are able to export at all, is due to stockpiling in the United States. I can say to hon. gentlemen that that is utter nonsense.

Mr. Fleming: Nobody said that.

Mr. Howe: That was said by two speakers of the opposition.

Mr. Casselman: It was given as one of the reasons.

Mr. Howe: If that was one of the reasons, let us dispose of that one reason. I can say that the general demand for everything that goes into the United States stockpiles has been far greater than the supply, and the effect of the stockpile is not in any way important as far as exports from Canada to the United States are concerned.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Not to any extent?

Mr. Howe: Not to any extent. Had the materials not been sold to the United States, whether for stockpiles or anything else, there are other markets begging for them.

Talking of conferences, I might say that the lord privy seal of England was here today, and the purpose of his visit was to obtain greater quantities of raw materials from Canada of the very same items that have been going to a very limited extent into United States stockpiling.

I think that the sessions of the committee mentioned in this resolution should be very helpful. I hope that all opposition members who have taken part in this debate will attend the sessions regularly. I am sure anyone in the house can obtain great benefit from the information that will come out of these sessions of the committee, and I commend the work of the committee to all hon. members who are fortunate enough to be members of the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the very low opinion which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) seems to place on the suggestions which have been made to the house during the course of this debate today, I am going to be bold enough to put a few more thoughts before him and my fellow members of the house. I really believe that the subject is a great deal too serious, and of far too much importance to Canada, to be treated in quite the way in which it was treated by the minister in his remarks a few moments ago. However, be that as it may, I do plan to be analytical in my remarks about the Torquay agreements, and about the problem of Canada's external trade.

There is no doubt that the objective in these various negotiations held at Geneva, at Annecy and more recently at Torquay is very much worth while. That objective has been to expand trade, and I think that in each case there has been a valuable expansion of trade among the free nations. Of course the unfortunate position is that the Soviet and her satellites, as I understand—and the minister can correct me if I am wrong—have taken no part whatever in any of these negotiations, and the result must have been that the negotiators of all the countries, including those from Canada, have found the work difficult and discouraging. Our vision of a world in which there would be free trade among all the nations is certainly very far even from our imaginations under present conditions.

While there has been value in all these treaties, I do not think the minister will question that Canada, in telling the results of the treaties, has put her best foot forward and I suppose that is only natural. I believe the United States has done the same thing. The American government, in announcing what it has gained in these various negotiations, always emphasizes the favourable side of the story, and the Canadian government has been doing the same thing. For example, in his statement on May 8, the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out that exports to the United States from Canada of the goods in the categories on which there had been a reduction of tariffs granted at Torquay amounted to $120 million in 1949. He did not give the figure of the value of the goods coming to Canada on which the tariff had been reduced under the agreements, but we find this figure given in the announcement made from Washington. The Americans claim that they got reductions on trade with Canada amounting to over twice as much, the figure they give being $290,-049,000 on United States products coming into Canada.

Their review of the results is quite interesting. I hold in my hand a clipping from the last edition of United States News and World Report of May 18, 1951, which sets out that tariff cuts negotiated by the United States with seventeen countries at Torquay involved about $500 million in imports, that being six per cent of all imports into the United States. On the other hand United States exports which got tariff benefits amounted to $1 billion in 1949, which hon. members will notice is about twice as large a figure; it is pointed out however that the figure of $1 billion would be well above any normal export year.

The statement goes on to set out that Canada and western Germany made the greatest concessions to the United States; that Great Britain and other nations of the commonwealth made no concessions at all; that France and some other countries actually raised duties on some United States export items. Then it sums up the results of the Torquay conference in these words:

> Results of the Torquay conference, therefore, were not all successful. Actually, the tariff concessions negotiated are not expected to affect trade in the near future. Tariffs do not mean much when goods are scarce, demand high. Problem in world trade now is primarily to increase output of basic materials.

Mr. Howe: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Trade and Commerce says, "hear, hear." I believe that that summary fairly sets out the main problem today in world trade.

There is very little in the agreement which will bring down the cost of living in Canada. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in making his speech the other evening referred to a few of the items on which there have been small cuts, and made special reference to grapefruit juice and half a dozen other items. But I do not believe the new agreements will give much help, so far as the cost of living is concerned. It may be that in the years ahead there will be some help for the little man; but he does not stand to gain much at the present time.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) dealt with the benefits to British Columbia, and said that these treaties were wonderful things for that province—perhaps the most wonderful trade development there had ever been from the point of view of British Columbia. I rather think the minister would not have gone that far, in so far as that province is concerned. Certainly the results are not that good. In his statement the other night the minister referred to canned salmon, plywood and base metals as being the three commodities produced in British Columbia which received the most assistance under the Torquay agreements.

The duty on canned salmon entering the United States has been cut from 25 per cent to 15 per cent, but at the same time Canada has cut her duty on canned salmon coming from the United States from 27½ per cent to 15 per cent. We have always been in pretty tight competition with the canned salmon producers of Washington and Oregon, and it is too early yet to say what the results of this reciprocal change in the tariff will be.

Upon the announcement of the results of the negotiations Mr. S. M. Rosenberg, chairman of the salmon canners' operating committee in British Columbia, and president of the Canadian Fishing Company, said that Canadian costs were still too high to meet United States competition. I believe that British Columbia packers of canned salmon have never been able to get into the United States market to any large extent and, even with this cut, I doubt very much whether they will be able to do so.

As for the cut in the tariff on plywood going into the United States, I find in the same article the statement that at present British Columbia mills are going full blast to fill Canadian orders, bolstered by defence and other demands. While that may be the position at the present time, I believe the reduction in the tariff will be of benefit over the years.

Mr. Howe: They have shipped large quantities of plywood into the United States over the 40 per cent tariff.

Mr. Green: This statement in the article may be incorrect. Then, with regard to base metals: there, too, I believe the Americans have been taking all they can get, and for the time being the reduction in duty will not make much difference.

The hon. member for Vancouver South also mentioned the cut in the duty on aluminum. Well, we are not yet producing aluminum in British Columbia, and will not be for four or five years; so that the benefits are not apt to accrue on that commodity for a long time. Furthermore when aluminum is produced, it is earmarked for Great Britain; so that it would not be available for export to the United States.

The minister mentioned apples. While I believe some reduction has been given by Peru in respect to the tariff on apples, Canada has dropped her tariff on apples coming in from the United States from three-quarters to three-eighths of a cent per pound and has also extended the time each year during which apples can come in free. I believe the extension is from July 12 until July 31. So that once again apples seem to be getting a bad deal. In 1947 the preference on apples to the United Kingdom was given up; certainly in the negotiations at Geneva they came off very badly.

There is one point in connection with these negotiations which I cannot understand, and that is why Canada should give away negotiating points. In the debate on the resolution leading up to the changes in the Customs Tariff, statements were made to the effect that irrigation sprinkler systems were one type of commodity under negotiation at Torquay, but that Americans would not give any concession. Yet, in spite of that fact, a change is being made in the present budget cutting off the Canadian tariff on this product completely.

I cannot understand why that has been done. Where we have been actually in negotiation on a certain type of equipment, and have been unsuccessful in getting any concessions, we turn round and, without any quid pro quo, take off the protection.

Mr. Howe: That is to help the farmers.

Mr. Green: I believe the farmers of British Columbia, who are the ones using this particular kind of equipment, were perfectly satisfied to have the tariff remain as it was.

Mr. Howe: They did not say so.

Mr. Green: The farmers will probably lose in the end, because I am afraid that once the American producers of this equipment get a corner on the market the prices will be what they can get, for the competition from a Canadian firm will be removed. I believe it is bad business to negotiate on an item such as that, and then, when our requests are turned down, to take off the tariff entirely, thereby giving the other side the very best they could have got in the deal. I believe a mistake was made in that connection.

These negotiations and agreements really bring up for consideration a problem much deeper than that involved in the actual items covered, and that is the question as to what is to be the Canadian policy in future years in the matter of external trade.

I believe it is clear that Canada is becoming more and more dependent upon the United States market, both in the matter of her exports and her imports. Someone pointed out today that sixty-five per cent of our exports are now going to that one country. There are certain dangers in that situation which the minister must see. One is that the basic United States policy, for as long as I can remember—probably right from the days of independence—has been to protect the American people first. The whole of their trade policy has been designed to protect their own people. The Hawley-Smoot tariff, which goes back to about 1930, is still in effect. That is still the basic United States tariff. Of course it is true that the president was given power to make reductions amounting, I think, to 50 per cent on items, and then still further power was given to him to make further reductions on the items as they stood at January 1, 1945, up to a maximum of 50 per cent. There are those provisions in the United States tariff law, but they are subject to change at any time, and the fundamental United States policy continues to be one of very high tariffs, much higher than Canada has ever had no matter what kind of government has been in power here.

Another fact which makes the situation dangerous is that Canada and the United States produce goods of the same type in many cases. On the west coast, for example, our lumber has always been in competition with the lumber of Washington and Oregon states. The same is true of canned salmon, as I mentioned a few moments ago. Our apples compete with apples from those two states, and the United States apples ripen earlier because they are grown farther south. To a degree we have had the same situation with many of our base metals. If you go right across Canada from one coast to the other you will find commodities produced by both countries. For example, there is grain on the prairie provinces and in the prairie states; manufactured goods in Ontario and Quebec and in the industrial eastern states; fishing in the maritime provinces of Canada and in the New England states to the south.

There will always be many commodities which both countries are producing, and especially when there is no great demand for goods there is bound to be difficulty for Canada with respect to these particular commodities. The United States producer has a much larger home market. He does not have to depend on exports to the same extent that Canadians do, and for that reason our position has always been and always will be difficult.

Then there may very well be changes in the United States government. The present government has been in power for many years, and if there should be a change in the next year or two I think the minister will agree that Canada is apt to have a great deal more difficulty in getting her goods into the United States market than she has under the present administration. Even as things are today, while the Americans perhaps have not been responsible for killing the international trade organization, certainly it is now a thing of the past, and no doubt the attitude of the United States has been largely responsible for the failure of the free nations to set up that agency under the United Nations.

Another thing we must remember is that the Americans for a long time have been attempting to destroy the commonwealth preferences. They have been against the preferential system ever since it was brought into effect. In the recent Torquay negotiations they set out to break down the preferential system. I am afraid that Canada, willingly or unwillingly, has been aiding in that attempt.

It has been pointed out today that the British preference was first created by the Laurier government about fifty years ago. Hon. members know that about 1932 the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett negotiated extensive British preferential agreements. I do not know what their effect was in other parts of Canada but they saved British Columbia. The preferences on lumber, apples, canned salmon and metals saved our province at a time when we were in a desperate position. That was the one time when trade agreements meant a great deal to the west coast province.

Mr. Mackenzie King and the Liberal party fought the imperial preferences from start to finish. I am told there were extremely bitter debates in the house, and only one member of the Liberal party voted for those preferences, that member being Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, who of course was representing an apple constituency in the province of Nova Scotia. When Mr. King came into power in 1935 it was not very long until he renegotiated the agreements and the preferences were reduced. In my opinion that has been the attitude of the present government right from 1935. They have looked on the imperial preferences as Bennett treaties, and therefore as something that should be dealt with pretty harshly, to say the least. Step by step since 1935 we have found Canada whittling away at the roots of the preference system.

I have here a statement made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on March 17, 1947, when I believe he was secretary of state for external affairs. He made a statement on the situation with regard to imperial preferences. Members will find it at page 1414 of Hansard for that date. The present Prime Minister quoted a statement which had been made by Prime Minister Attlee setting out the situation of the preferences at that time, in which, and it was accepted by our present Prime Minister as correct, we find it set out there that these preferences would not be altered in the forthcoming Geneva negotiations unless all the parties thereto agreed to such alterations. The key sentence reads as follows:

> There is thus no question of any unilateral surrender of preferences. There must be adequate compensation for all parties affected.

In other words if a preference was to be cut down or eliminated, all the parties thereto must agree and must get some quid pro quo. That was the situation in March of 1947. But in December, 1947, after the Geneva agreements had been negotiated we find Mr. King, who was then prime minister, making statements to the effect that any country of the commonwealth must be free to change the preferences. In fact he had a letter to that effect written to the British delegation, the stand taken being that Canada, or Great Britain for that matter, could simply give notice and withdraw the preference on any item, rather than having the items bound by an agreement for a term of years. That, of course, was going quite a lot further than the present Prime Minister had gone in March of the same year.

Then in 1949 we find the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), who was then a minister of the government, expressing his views on the British preference. That was on October 12, at page 705 of Hansard, where the minister was answering a question asked by the late member for Broadview, Tommy Church. After the answer had been given Mr. Church said:

> May I say to the hon. gentleman that the proposal also hangs preferential trade on the sour apple tree, like John Brown's body.

The reply of the minister was very short but very enlightening. He said:

> That is a good place for it, too.

This question and answer had to do with the Annecy agreements, so we know exactly where the present Minister of National Defence stands with regard to all these British preferences.

Mr. Howe: If my hon. friend will permit a question, with all this discussion of British preferences will the hon. gentleman explain in what way British preferences have contributed anything to Canada's trade position during the past ten years?

Mr. Green: I have pointed out to the minister what they meant to British Columbia before the war.

Mr. Howe: That was twenty years ago.

Mr. Green: That situation existed right up to the outbreak of war. Of course when war conditions intervened the whole trade picture was changed. I do not suppose agreements of any kind made any difference during the war. I had hoped that after the war we would be able to retain this system of British preferences.

Mr. Howe: We are retaining the system.

Mr. Green: I am complaining of what appears to be a constant whittling down of these preferences by the present Canadian government. I am not too sure that this government would not do away with the preferences entirely if they felt they could get away with it as far as the public were concerned.

Mr. Howe: Who would stop us? Don't take yourself too seriously. If we wanted to get away with it who would stop us?

Mr. Green: That is just typical of the minister; if he wanted to get away with anything who would stop him? I tell him he is not yet the dictator of this country, and he is not going to be. He grows more and more dictatorial every session. Some day the Canadian people are going to wake up and realize what a dictator they have here running this country.

Mr. Howe: Some day the people of British Columbia will wake up and see what kind of representation they have here.

Mr. Green: The minister need not worry about the people of British Columbia. They will take care of the choice of their own representatives without any advice from him. They have experienced his visits to British Columbia, when he flies off the handle and uses abusive language not fit for any public man. They know of his doing that. One of the great tragedies of public life in Canada today is that the minister has such little control over his temper. That anyone in such a responsible position should have so little control is tragic. I am going ahead with my remarks. If the minister does not like them he can at least keep still; perhaps someone else will have the courtesy to listen to them, whether or not he does.

I dealt with the attitude of the Minister of National Defence in 1949. Now let us go on a year and see what was the attitude of the Canadian representative at Torquay in 1950. I have here a newspaper clipping dated September 29, 1950, headed "Wilgress startles tariff parley". I have great respect for Mr. Wilgress; I think he is an excellent civil servant. He was chairman of the Torquay negotiations, and this dispatch says:

> At the formal opening, chairman Wilgress said the countries represented in GATT (general agreement on tariffs and trade) must face the "fundamental question" of eliminating restrictions on trade.
> By inference he referred particularly to the British system of imperial preference which is expected to come under strong criticism.

There we have the Canadian representative dropping a pretty broad hint that Britain had better do something about giving up the preferential system. Now this year, in 1951, we have another press dispatch dated May 9, headed "Trade pacts may doom preferences". It is from Ottawa, and reads:

> Canada today had seventeen new tariff and trade agreements that many observers said spelled the doom of this country's participation in the British empire trade preference system.

Then it goes on:

> Officials here said Britain's failure to work out new tariff agreements with the U.S. had been "regrettable." They indicated that the failure had been partly political—a resolve to maintain the empire's trade structure for its own sake.

There you have Canadian officials again criticizing the British for the stand they took; and in the statements made by the two Canadian ministers on May 8 we find much of the same. For example, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had this to say at page 2830 of Hansard:

> From the Canadian point of view, it is a matter of regret that these countries failed, at Torquay, to add to the substantial body of tariff concessions which they made to one another at the earlier negotiations.

Mind you, he was dealing there with the British countries and the United States; and the Minister of Finance also made statements much to the same effect. Tonight, I suggest, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has shown pretty clearly that he is not a very strong advocate of the British preference. Incidentally he made a statement directly contrary to that made by the Minister of Finance on May 8. Tonight the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that no preferences had been eliminated. At page 2832 of Hansard, on the other hand, the Minister of Finance had this to say:

> . . . we agreed to the modification and in some cases to the elimination of certain margins of preference.

Somebody is wrong.

Mr. Knowles: Somebody left out a comma.

Mr. Green: Somebody left out more than a comma. Somebody is telling one story and somebody else is telling another, and we will have to find out which is right. Then tonight the minister said these preferences do not mean anything, because even if we have them there are prohibitions and quotas put on by the British; that we cannot get into the British market and therefore, presumably, the preference system is of no value. Well, for the time being it may be necessary for the British to adopt measures of that kind. They have been in a terribly difficult position, far more difficult than Canada has ever encountered, and they have had to take drastic steps. But because those quotas and prohibitions exist at the present time it does not mean they are to continue indefinitely or even for very long. You know, there may very well be a change of government in the United Kingdom before the year is out. I believe it is only a matter of time until the British, the Australians, the New Zealanders, the South Africans and the Indians will be able to deal with this country on a normal basis. When that time comes, these preferences are going to be of great value to Canada. Incidentally, while Canada cut out some of the preferences she has been giving to other British countries, under these Torquay agreements we still retain our preference in the other British markets because those British countries refused to reduce any preference.

Mr. Howe: I am sure my hon. friend would not like that statement to stand. There is no change in any preference between Australia and Canada, New Zealand and Canada, or South Africa and Canada. The only change is between the United Kingdom and Canada, and that was with the consent of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Green: Was that contained in the Torquay agreement?

Mr. Howe: The margins were reduced, but not as they affect Australia, New Zealand or South Africa.

Mr. Green: The statutory preference for Canada in the other British markets remains, does it not? It has not been reduced at all by the Torquay negotiations?

Mr. Howe: The margin has, yes.

Mr. Green: Not the margin in other British territory. Our margin of preference on the goods we sell New Zealand, South Africa and Australia has been retained, because those countries did not give the United States any concessions at all; that is the point I am making.

Mr. Howe: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Green: I suggest that Canada should not be critical of the stand taken by these other British countries at Torquay. They only took that stand as a matter of self-preservation. I am sure that they were not trying to make any trouble, but were doing it as a matter of self-protection.

Then, finally, a word about the future. I believe that the long-term trade policy of Canada should be to diversify our trade far more than is the case at the present time. There have been tremendous developments in this country. We are producing a great many products that we did not produce before the recent war. They will be coming into competition with United States products in just the same way as many of our primary products are in competition with similar products in the United States. I believe that our wisest course is to diversify to the greatest extent possible.

For that reason, not only should we seek to promote trade with all nations, for example in South America and Asia, but also I believe the preference system should be retained. Little has been said today about trade with Australia and New Zealand, but for us on the Pacific coast it has always been of great importance. We believe that trade with these sister nations, and with other nations across the Pacific, could develop to a greater degree than trade with nations in any other part of the world. I would hope that Canada will always retain the preferential system for her dealings with other nations of the commonwealth. It may be necessary to alter that system from time to time, but I do believe that the plan is a sound one. I believe also that it may turn out that Canada will have good reason to be grateful to the other British countries for their refusal to abandon the preference system at Torquay. After all, the essence of that preferential system is to increase trade amongst the British countries. Here we had the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and India refusing to give up that preferential system—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must inform the hon. member that he has now exhausted his time.

Mr. Green: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that probably the best thing we could do would be to endeavour to persuade the United States to change from a high tariff policy. If she altered that policy and became a low tariff nation, I believe that would be the greatest contribution that could be made to freeing the trade between all the countries of the world today, because the United States is undoubtedly the leader. I suggest that Canada's main effort should be to endeavour to encourage the United States to take a step of that kind.

Mr. H. H. Hatfield (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has been talking about the importance of the Torquay agreements to the maritime provinces. Before these agreements were tabled, there was a press dispatch in the Citizen of May 5 stating that Canada was receiving the same concessions from Cuba as the United States was receiving. After the agreements were tabled we found out that this was not the case. On May 8 the Minister of Trade and Commerce said at page 2829 of Hansard:

> In the case of Cuba, I wish to make an announcement of considerable importance.

He then said that Canada was going to buy 75,000 tons of raw sugar from Cuba which would be distributed to the Canadian sugar refineries. He goes on and says:

> The Cuban government has now undertaken to revalidate until January 1, 1954, important tariff concessions which were originally granted to Canada at Geneva, including amongst others, codfish, wheat flour and potatoes. This will be of definite interest to our maritime provinces.

Now, we received no advantage from the Geneva agreement in respect of either potatoes or fish. The only advantage received at Torquay was a fractional reduction on codfish in the Cuban market. The Cuban market was the greatest market the maritime provinces ever had for potatoes, fish, lumber, apples and other commodities. Since the freight rates to the central provinces have advanced, we cannot ship to the central provinces. The only markets the maritime provinces have are in Cuba, South America and the United States, and those are the only markets that are any good to us. I do not say that reciprocity is any good to us. I do say that while there is a favourable government at Washington, this government should negotiate a long-term treaty arrangement with the United States so that the maritime provinces can exist.

I should like to know what the minister meant by that statement on May 8. The Torquay agreements even took four of the concessions away that Canada did have. The only concession given to Canada was a fractional reduction per hundred kilos on codfish. There is very little advantage to the maritime provinces from this Torquay agreement. So far as I can see the only concession that was any good to my constituency was a reduction on ground oats to the United States from 25 cents a hundred to 12½ cents a hundred. That was the only concession that my constituency received, and that was the only concession the province of New Brunswick received. The member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) spoke about a reduction of 50 per cent in plywood. This treaty only covers Douglas fir plywood, and that plywood is only manufactured in the province of British Columbia. No Douglas fir plywood is manufactured in any other province.

Mr. Howe: There is birch plywood.

Mr. Hatfield: There is birch plywood, and the reduction there is only 5 per cent.

Mr. Howe: 25 per cent.

Mr. Hatfield: There is little or practically no advantage to the maritime provinces. He says: In the case of Cuba I wish to make an announcement of considerable importance. Is there going to be a reduction? Are we going to receive anything further? Is there going to be any other agreement with Cuba so that, by taking this raw sugar, we might have the same concessions that the United States have with Cuba? Before the West Indies treaty we shipped there immense quantities of potatoes and fish, and that was a great market for the maritime provinces. Since the West Indies treaty went into effect we lost the Cuban market. Cuba immediately retaliated with an exceedingly high duty against fish, flour, potatoes and lumber from Canada; and we have lost one of our best markets.

We in the maritime provinces must have trade agreements with Cuba, South America and the United States in order to exist. When this article came out in the Ottawa Citizen of May 5—I do not know where they obtained this statement—it built up high hopes in the maritime provinces that we were going to receive in Cuba the same concessions as those received by the United States. Since the West Indies treaty, the United States has had all the table potato market in Cuba. We have never been able to ship any commercial potatoes from the maritime provinces. What we did receive was a reduction in duty or freedom from duty on seed potatoes. What Cuba cannot grow from our seed, she buys from the United States. Cuba has been a great market for the United States, since the West Indies treaty came into effect. The West Indies treaty is now blocked. We have our ships going down there empty. It is costing us an enormous amount of money to keep those five ships which, by that agreement, we agreed to put on that West Indies trade. We get no advantage. Those ships are losing money. They are going down empty. We have blocked sterling. We get a permit to ship a few tons of potatoes once in a while, but they hardly ever make up carload lots. With the quotas we get from the West Indies, the market is practically finished down there for our fish and potatoes. I hope this government will make with Cuba, the West Indies, the United States and South America a treaty that will help the maritime provinces.

[Mr. Hatfield.]

Mr. Wright: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) a question based on the statement he made a few minutes ago with regard to Canada's shipping wheat to India. According to this trade report, we have shipped to India 11,200,000 bushels under the international wheat agreement. We have not shipped any to India outside of the international wheat agreement, have we?

Mr. Howe: No. We have made all our shipments under the international wheat agreement. The United States will make their shipment of two million tons under the international wheat agreement, I hope. Russia has sold wheat not under the international wheat agreement, because it is not a party to that agreement. China has sold wheat to India.

Mr. Wright: According to these trade figures, the United States has shipped 27,773,000 bushels under the world wheat agreement and Australia has shipped 15,589,000 bushels, as compared with Canada's 11,200,000 bushels. The United States, I believe, have now passed a bill authorizing the shipping of another two million tons which, if they make delivery, will be about a further 70 million bushels on top of the 27,773,000 bushels they have already shipped. As mentioned by the minister, I do not think we have as yet fulfilled all our obligations to India.

Mr. Howe: We would have shipped much more had we had the wheat available when India made the inquiry for further wheat. Unfortunately we had only enough milling wheat to take care of part of the commitment. We offered No. 5 wheat but India did not wish to take No. 5 wheat. All we can ship is what we have.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to ask a question of the minister. A few minutes ago he said that our exports to the United Kingdom were greater than those in any pre-war year. Was he measuring in terms of dollars or goods?

Mr. Howe: Dollars.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wonder why the minister would give us a figure of that kind? Does he not think that is very misleading? You cannot eat dollars.

Mr. Hatfield: The minister has not answered my question as to what concession the maritime provinces received from Torquay, outside of that with regard to codfish.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Howe: We are not in committee, but to answer the question as to what concessions they received at Torquay, the principal concession was an extension for three years of the agreements they made at Geneva. I may tell my hon. friend that it took long and difficult negotiations to get that extension; and without the sugar purchase the concessions made at Geneva would have been cancelled as far as Canada is concerned. If that is not a concession, we got nothing—if my hon. friend says that is of no value.

Mr. Hatfield: What did the maritime provinces get with regard to fish and potatoes in the Cuban market at Geneva?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—TURNOVER TAX OF THREE PER CENT

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Before this motion carries, Mr. Speaker, there is a matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the house. It concerns the proposal which has been made by the federal government to the various provincial governments to amend the British North America Act so as to enable the provinces to impose an indirect sales tax or turnover tax of 3 per cent. This proposal has been the subject of a great deal of criticism by private individuals, by the press and by some of the provincial governments across this country. It is to be hoped that the proposal is dead and that the government will not proceed with it. But because we have not had that assurance and because the time when these amendments to the British North America Act must be passed, if they are to be passed, is coming closer and closer, we in the official opposition think that it is timely to ask the house to express its opinion in opposition to any change in the constitution whereby the provinces will be given the power to levy an indirect 3 per cent sales tax.

It may be helpful, Mr. Speaker, to review briefly the history of the proposed amendment to which I have referred. It was discussed at the recent dominion-provincial conference and it was at first suggested—and it certainly became generally accepted in the mind of the public—that the proposal for the 3 per cent sales tax was in part at any rate to enable the provinces to bear their share of the increased cost of the revised old age pension scheme. So for a time, as I will show, certainly in the minds of many of the provincial premiers and in the mind of the public, it was assumed that the two proposals—the revised old age pension scheme and the constitutional amendment on the 3 per cent sales tax—went hand in hand and that one was dependent on the other. In the course of a recent discussion in the house the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) to some extent confirmed that that had been the impression, when he said that it was suggested that the two might conveniently be considered together.

Mr. Martin: One never depended on the other, and that was clearly stated in the house.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has said that one never depended on the other. I have said, and as the correspondence with the provinces shows—I will refer to that correspondence in some detail—certainly the provincial premiers were under the impression that one was dependent upon the other, and it was suggested by the provincial premiers that they be separated, and they stand now on an entirely separate and independent basis.

The proposal to amend the constitution to allow the provinces to levy an indirect sales tax was first put forward in the following form, and I am reading the correspondence which has appeared at various times as appendices to Hansard. In the appendix to Hansard for February 1, 1951, at page 43, the following proposed amendment is set forth:

> 2. Re-enact head 2 of section 92 to read as follows:
>
> "2. The raising of revenue for provincial purposes by
>
> (a) direct taxation within the province, and
> (b) indirect taxation within the province in respect of the sale of goods (except goods sold for shipment outside the province) to a buyer for purposes of consumption or use and not for resale, at a rate not exceeding three per centum of the sale price, but not so as to discriminate between sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured within the province and sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured outside the province."

Turnover Tax

It became obvious to the government that the proposed sales tax would be attacked, as it has in fact been attacked, and therefore efforts were made to offer the proposed amendments in various particulars so as to make it more palatable. We find, for instance, the following letter from the Minister of Justice to the premiers of the provinces, as reproduced at page 45 of Hansard of February 1. I am reading in part. There was a growing feeling across the country that this tax was unpopular and undesirable and the Minister of Justice went on to say:

Apparently the attack will be made partly on the plausible ground—

These are rather odd words, I think, Mr. Speaker, to come from the Minister of Justice in discussing the proposal which the federal government had put forward, seriously and honestly it is presumed, to the provinces. These are his words:

Apparently the attack will be made partly on the plausible ground that if provincial governments are allowed the right to levy indirect sales taxation, they may discriminate between different classes or types of retailers based on their residence—

Then he went on to say:

You will recall that it was on this general ground that a somewhat similar proposal was defeated in the Senate in 1936.

And so the Minister of Justice submitted to the provincial premiers on January 20, 1951, the following words to be added to the proposed amendment:

And not so as to discriminate between sellers or classes of sellers of the same class of goods.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the fact is that this proposal to allow the provinces to levy an indirect sales tax may be attacked on a number of grounds. Whether the minister may classify some of them as plausible or not, the fact is that it is a bad tax, and every ground of attack which I have seen mentioned in any of this correspondence, or in the newspaper articles dealing with the subject, is a valid one because the tax is a bad tax, and when it is examined and analysed it does not stand up. It is clearly shown to be contrary to the best interests of the Canadian people to transfer to the provinces this power to impose this type of taxation. And indeed the arguments which are used by the provinces and by those people in newspapers and elsewhere against this tax in the hands of the provinces apply with equal force to the use of this type of taxation by the federal government. The whole subject, Mr. Speaker, is closely related to the discussion which recently took place in connection with the budget, and the proposals to increase the general sales tax. The same arguments against this form of indirect taxation apply in both cases.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Well, then, another objection to the proposed tax became evident when it was seen that some of the provinces, at any rate if these amendments were passed, would use the authority contained in the amendment to apply the indirect sales tax to more than the retail sales of goods; that is, on other things besides goods, on services, and so on. This becomes clear when one reads the letter from Premier Campbell to the Minister of Justice, reproduced at page 991 of Hansard for March 6, where he said:

This proposed amendment deals only with the sale of goods. It would therefore presumably not apply to such things as electrical power, or services provided by laundries, theatres, hotels, restaurants, barber shops and the like. It was our understanding that this amendment should enable the province to impose this type of tax wherever it is a more convenient method of raising revenue from the people in the province who get the benefit of goods and services available in the province. It therefore seems to us that the proposed amendment should make it clear that it covers these other types of industries, which provide services directly to the consuming public.

In that approach to this problem the objectionable feature of this tax becomes most obvious when it is to apply not only to the retail sale of goods but also to services provided by laundries, theatres, hotels, restaurants, barber shops and the like, wherever it is a more convenient method of raising revenue, wherever it may be conveniently hidden so that the people will not know in fact the extent to which they are being taxed. There was another letter from a premier showing that the tax would be enlarged from the original proposal, as found in the letter from the premier of New Brunswick to the Minister of Justice, dated February 2, in which he says:

As to the second proposed amendment involving constitutional changes which would permit the provinces to impose indirect taxation by way of a sales tax, we feel that the proposal advanced will not meet the situation of the provinces, fixing as it does the maximum tax that could be levied thereunder at three per cent.

In our view the main and overriding purpose of such an amendment is to be found in the advantage which would accrue to the provinces through being able to impose such indirect taxation in lieu of a purchasers' or consumers' tax such as is now found in five of the provinces.

He went on to say:

We would strongly urge that the federal government amend its proposals to permit the imposition of a tax at a higher level; to meet our situation it should be at least four per cent.

Then a letter from the premier of Nova Scotia contains a somewhat similar suggestion. This is the letter of March 12, and is found at page 2729 of Hansard. The quotation is as follows:

I should like, however, to repeat what I have already said in my memorandum which accompanied my letter of January 19. That was that the amendment constitutes the sole source of the provinces' power to impose an indirect tax. It ought, therefore, to be sufficiently wide in its terms to authorize any tax which it is contemplated the provinces should have a right to impose.

Therefore it becomes clear from this correspondence, Mr. Speaker, that some of the provinces at any rate intended and feel that they should be allowed to use this constitutional amendment, if it passes, not merely to impose a limited three per cent tax on retail sales, or retail turnovers on sales of goods, but to impose indirect taxes on all forms of commercial transactions, on the rendering of services, on amusements, on theatres, hotels, and on anything else, as Premier Macdonald says, on which it is contemplated the province should have a right to impose such a tax. As we have seen, some provinces felt it should be a higher rate even than the three per cent rate at first suggested.

Then, coming back to the question as to whether or not the two constitutional amendments were at first considered together, I should like to read a few letters to make it clear that they were at first considered together. But the point I wish to establish by these references is that it is not necessary that the old age pension amendment must be accompanied by the sales tax amendment.

That being so, and that being clearly agreed and established—and it must be said that it was a pity that the confusion was ever allowed to develop; and the purpose of the amendment I intend to move is to enable the house to express its opinion—I hope nothing further will be heard of the proposal that this undesirable, discriminatory and vicious form of taxation should be imposed, thereby increasing the already heavy burden of inflation and high taxation being borne by the Canadian people.

I am convinced that, when the people of Canada realize they do not need this proposed sales tax amendment in order to have the amended old age pension scheme, they will speak even more clearly and unequivocally against the sales tax amendment than they have up to the present time. But it was necessary for provincial premiers to make the first suggestion that the two constitutional amendments should be considered separately. This will be seen from consideration of one or two letters. For instance, there is the letter from the premier of New Brunswick to the Minister of Justice, as set out at page 2734 of Hansard. Reading from that letter, as it is continued on page 2735, the premier said:

> The government of this province would welcome an assurance from you that so far as the federal government is concerned the two amendments are not inseparable; and in particular that the old age pension amendment will not stand or fall with the other.

And in another passage:

> On the assumption that general agreement is arrived at with the provinces on both proposed amendments we have another suggestion to offer. It is that the matters should be dissociated when laid before parliament. In other words they should, in our view, be made the subject of the two separate joint addresses.

And then at page 2736, in a letter of April 16, addressed to the premier of New Brunswick, and copies sent to all the other provincial premiers, the Minister of Justice makes it clear for the first time in this correspondence that the two proposals will be considered separately, when he says as reported at page 2736:

> In line with the thought that these two constitutional amendments are separate and distinct, we are quite agreeable, if the provinces wish it that way, that these two constitutional amendments should be made the subject of two separate joint addresses to be presented to the parliament of Canada requesting respectively that these two constitutional amendments should be passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom.

There are other extracts from letters of provincial premiers I could read, to the same effect. But the extracts I have read make it clear that it was at the suggestion of the provincial premiers, first, that the two constitutional amendments were separated. So that we are now in a position clearly where the one is not dependent upon the other.

That being so, it seems to me that this house should and must approach the question of the proposed sales tax amendment on its merits, and not be moved in any sense or influenced, or be placed under any pressure to approve of that proposal because we are told, or because we may be told, or because it may be suggested or has been suggested, that without it we cannot have the old age pension plan.

Turning, then, to the merits of the sales tax amendment proposed to the provinces by the federal government, this can and should be said, that the proposal is one which envisages the imposition of a tax by the provinces of Canada which is undesirable, vicious and unnecessary. I have said, and I repeat, that the arguments used against the sales tax at the provincial level apply, in my view, with equal force to any proposals to increase or to apply the sales tax at the federal level.

But I said that the tax in the hands of the provinces is unnecessary. The provinces can now levy a direct retail purchase tax. That is done by several of the provinces, the one with which I am most familiar being the one in British Columbia where there is a 3 per cent retail purchase tax, which is perfectly constitutional because it is completed on the purchase and collected at the retail level. It is not an indirect tax. That tax yields in one year, in round figures, at the rate of 3 per cent the sum of $28 million to the provincial treasury—and that is from a population of approximately 1,200,000 people. So that it is not essential to have a constitutional amendment in order to enable the provinces to levy a retail tax, even if it is desired to do so.

Then, other objections to the tax, on its merits, are that these forms of indirect tax, such as contemplated in the proposed amendment, are multiplied from the time they are imposed at the source, all the way down the line, through the hands of the distributor and the retailer to the consumer. So that the tax itself is multiplied many times over in the ultimate purchase price of the commodity. To that extent they are directly inflationary, which is of course the main objection to this type of taxation.

On motion of Mr. Fulton the debate was adjourned.

IMMIGRATION

COUNT JACQUES DE BERNONVILLE—TABLING OF FRENCH DECREES

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if I might have unanimous consent to revert to the order for motions, I would table certain documents requested some weeks ago by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault).

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will move again to go into committee of supply, and continue this most interesting debate.

Mr. Fulton: I shall not be long.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): And we will listen to the amendment—and see if it is in order, Mr. Speaker.

Following that we will take up Bill No. 198, to amend the Customs Act; Bill No. 293, respecting Units of Length and Mass; Bill No. 191, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act; Bill No. 192, to amend the Petition of Right Act, and, last, Bill No. 322, respecting the Canada Post Office.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 22, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VISITORS IN GALLERY—HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS, GUESTS OF OTTAWA ROTARY CLUB

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to draw the attention of all hon. members to a representative group of young Canadians from collegiate institutes and high schools in many parts of Canada who are distinguished visitors in the galleries this afternoon. These students, numbering 132, are the guests of the Ottawa Rotary club, which, in association with well over one hundred other Rotary clubs in Canada, deserves high praise and credit for this outstanding adventure in citizenship promotion, furnishing, as it does, a very special opportunity for these fine samples of young Canada to gain a first-hand appreciation of the beauties and facilities of our national capital and the workings of our free democratic way of life at the national level.

As a Rotarian myself I take deep pride in calling their presence today to the attention of the House of Commons, at the same time extending to our visitors on behalf of all hon. members a warm and enthusiastic welcome to parliament hill.

Mr. Speaker: It has come to my notice that there is not enough room for our visitors in the galleries ordinarily used by the public; perhaps on this occasion we might extend to them the facilities of the other galleries. If there are students who cannot get in the public galleries, they may be allowed to sit in the Speaker's gallery.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN

TABLING OF GENERAL REPORT AND LETTER OF TRANSMITTAL FROM FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I wish to lay on the table a copy in English and in French of the general report of the plan for a national capital, and the letter of transmittal from the chairman of the federal district commission, together with the recommendations made to the federal district commission by the national capital planning committee.

These documents will be available for distribution to hon. members, and there will be an opportunity in the consideration of the estimates for an expression of appreciation to the members of the federal district commission, the national capital planning committee and the Gatineau park advisory board.

I believe hon. members would wish me to express at once our appreciation of the devotion to a national cause that has been exhibited over the years by the members of these commissions and boards, and by those who have supplied them with their technical advice and assistance in the preparation of this work. I am sure hon. members will find that this is a plan for a long-time job to be done by the Canadian people to testify to the continuity of their institutions and their pride in those institutions. Hon. members will feel, I am sure, that it is a privilege for us of this generation to have some part in the furtherance of that national scheme.

I am certain it will be a pleasure to the young ladies and young gentlemen who are guests of the house in the galleries today to have been present when the final plan for the national capital was placed before their elected representatives.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in expressing gratification that the plan, which I believe is to be regarded as the final plan, has been presented to the commission and forwarded by the commission to this house for consideration. As the Prime Minister has indicated, the efforts of those who have served on this commission so unselfishly and so faithfully is evidence of that very citizenship which we are seeking to impress upon the minds of all Canadians at this particular time. It is one of those contributions that men and women can make in the furtherance of their own national developments, which has been done so well in this case.

To those who are visiting the parliament buildings there is now an opportunity to see something of what those plans will mean, interpreted in the actual form that they are intended to take. May I suggest, however, that these plans should not be regarded as providing only a beautiful community which will house the buildings in which the business of the nation is done, but also as being directed to the beautification of a city which to all Canadians is the capital of a nation which is assuming increasing importance in the world.

In every country, the capital city is something more than just a city. In a way it is an expression of the loyalties, the hopes and the expectations of the future. To the people of the United Kingdom, London is no mere city. It is the home of all that they cherish in the form of the great traditions of that nation with which we have been and will continue to be so closely associated. So it is with Paris, and with all the memories of the pride and glory of that other nation with which we have such deep and affectionate ties. So it is with Italy, where Rome holds the memories of their greatness in the past and their hopes for the future. So it is with every nation.

As we accept these plans, and as we have an opportunity to consider them, I hope there will be in the minds of all of us the belief that in the years ahead Ottawa is to be the capital of a nation of increasing importance which will give to all its people reason for pride in calling this their capital city.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

REPLACEMENT OF GLASS IN WINDOWS OF LIBRARY

Mr. R. M. Warren (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My question relates to the beauty of Ottawa and the parliament buildings. During the months I am in Ottawa I live up in room 669, which is a small office. I am not fussy, but there are no conveniences—not even running water. It is all right for me. I do have, however, a good many visitors, among whom are many students. There is a window in that office, and the first thing a student wants to do is to put his head out the window and take a look. What does he look at? He looks at the library of parliament, that tower, and what does he see? Some years ago the glass in those windows was broken, and they are now covered by boards. The glass has not yet been replaced. I wonder if the Minister of Public Works would consider replacing that glass to make the view more attractive.

The thing that really makes me grumble is the lack of a bridge across the Ottawa river. This bridge should have been built fifty years ago, and when the minister is considering my problem he could also keep that in mind.

IRRIGATION

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has a final report been presented to the government on the South Saskatchewan river scheme? If so, when may we expect the tabling of that report?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of his question. The first question is: Has a final report been made on the South Saskatchewan river project? The answer is yes.

The second question is: If so, when will a copy of the report be tabled in parliament? The answer is that the detailed final report on the South Saskatchewan river project was tabled in the house on Friday, September 8, 1950. The only other reports are summaries of parts of the report which are submitted from time to time to the government for consideration.

Mr. Coldwell: I thought that a report had been made recently.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask a supplementary question on this matter. Is the work to be proceeded with this summer?

Mr. Gardiner: That is the question which is being considered when we get the summary reports.

HOUSING

REFERENCE TO SPEECH IN TORONTO BY MEMBER FOR PARKDALE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. In view of the announcement of a new government housing policy, made last night in a Toronto speech by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter), will the minister acquaint the members of this house of this new policy?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, I know of no such new policy.

Mr. Fraser: That puts the hon. member for Parkdale on the spot.

Mr. Noseworthy: I should like to ask two supplementary questions of the Minister of Resources and Development, arising out of the one asked by the hon. member for Broadview. First, has the minister's attention been directed to the article referred to? Second, did the hon. member for Parkdale have any authority for speaking with such assurance of a new government policy?

Mr. Winters: I am well aware of the importance the hon. member for Parkdale attaches to the matter of housing, especially in Toronto. He has spoken to me about it on a number of occasions. I presume he was speaking in Toronto last night in his capacity as a private citizen.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

MEETING OF CONTINUING COMMITTEE—PENSIONS FOR HANDICAPPED PERSONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is it the intention of the government to seek to place on the agenda of the federal-provincial conference, which has been called for tomorrow, an item which will permit discussion of pensions for handicapped or incapacitated Canadians?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman gave me notice of his question, and I would answer it by pointing out that the continuing committee of the federal-provincial conference which is meeting tomorrow in these buildings derives its terms of reference from the agreement reached with the provincial governments in December, as stated in the following terms by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) at the conclusion of that conference:

> That a continuing committee should be set up to consider the character of legislation which would be appropriate respecting persons between the ages of sixty-five and sixty-nine and to what groups thereof and under what conditions it should be made applicable in each province.

Mr. Coldwell: This government is not seeking any change in the agenda in order to discuss this matter?

Mr. Martin: As I pointed out, this is a conference which has been called as a result of an agreement with the provinces, and the provinces and the dominion have agreed as to terms of reference and as to the agenda of the conference.

Mr. Coldwell: The answer is no.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO MORNING SITTINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I have not sent him notice of my question, but I think it is an urgent one. Having regard to the extent of the progress that has been made in this house over the last few weeks, can the Prime Minister say when the government will give us the opportunity to sit in the forenoons and, if necessary, on Wednesday nights, so that we shall be able to complete the work and get out of here at least by the end of June?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The government notes the applause that seems to have followed the suggestion made by the hon. member.

Mr. Green: All from the Liberals.

Mr. Coldwell: On a question of privilege, in view of the Prime Minister's comment on the question asked by the hon. member for Moose Mountain, that his suggestion was received with hearty applause, I think the Prime Minister misjudged the temper of the house.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Coldwell: At this stage of the session many of us are opposed to morning sittings.

CRIME

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF COMMITTEE OF INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It is based on an article in the issue of the Montreal Standard appearing yesterday which contains the second instalment of a story entitled—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: —"The Case of the Missing Gamblers". In this article it is stated—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Cruickshank: Where is the missing stone of Scone?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: The question I wish to put to the Minister of Justice is whether he knows of a request which was made by the wife of one of these missing men for assistance by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to locate her husband, and of the reply which was given to her, as alleged, that the R.C.M.P. would assist in locating her husband, which reply was given last February. In the second place, I should like to ask the minister whether, in view of—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Write him a letter.

Mr. Fulton: —in view of the allegations of the importation of American gunmen into Canada and the existence of organized crime in Montreal and elsewhere,—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Mutch: That is a speech, not a question.

[Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain).]

Mr. Fulton: —including counterfeiting and gambling—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question, he must ask it briefly. It must not be a long question.

Mr. Fulton: I would ask the minister whether the government has given any consideration to conducting an inquiry into organized criminal activities in Canada along the lines of the inquiry which has produced such startling results in the United States.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as I understand my hon. friend's question, he wants to know whether we have given any consideration here to setting up what would correspond to the Kefauver committee in the United States. My answer to that question is that no consideration has been given to such a proposal.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister be kind enough to answer the first part of the question, with regard to a request for assistance from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. Speaker: Order. What has just taken place shows how improper it is to ask at this time questions which are long and involved. Questions which are asked on the orders of the day should be urgent ones which can be asked briefly and which can be replied to briefly. I would think that the hon. member might withhold this question until some future time.

Mr. Fulton: If I might be permitted to say so, Mr. Speaker, I think the disappearance of men—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The steam roller.

Mr. Fulton: My question is based on—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Probably we would not have had this difficulty if the hon. member had asked a short question. If he wants to do so now, I will allow him to do it; but it must not be a long and involved question.

Mr. Fulton: I would ask the Minister of Justice whether the Royal Canadian Mounted Police made any investigation, in response to the request from his wife, into the disappearance of that man in Montreal.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend has given me no notice whatever of this long question.

Mr. Fulton: I telephoned the minister's office yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have given the hon. member a great deal of leeway. I think he should allow the minister to answer the question.

Mr. Garson: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has given me no notice of his long and, as I find it, rather involved question. I should therefore like to take his question as notice and answer it tomorrow. Before doing that, however, I think I should like to have a conference with him in order to find out just what it is he would like to find out.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I do not think it would be proper to allow this discussion to continue.

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pouliot: It does not pay to ask a twisted question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fulton: I wish merely to point out, with reference to the statement of the minister, that I phoned his office yesterday and advised him of the subject matter of the inquiry which I was to make.

CEMENT

QUESTION AS TO PRIORITIES FOR FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I should like to draw the attention of the house to a group of our population which, if they are not already considered to be one of our most important groups, should be so considered. I refer to the good farmers of Canada. Why are they being discriminated against in the matter of priorities on cement?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): That is hardly a question; it is a statement. I think I can say they are not being discriminated against. There are no priorities on cement. Cement is distributed by the dealers—we hope, fairly to all. I have received no complaints from the distinguished citizens whom my hon. friend claims to represent.

Mr. Cardiff: I had a letter this morning from a farmer—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think we should have a discussion at this time on that question.

Mr. Cardiff: Could I make just one statement? The only cement that the farmers—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Graydon: Don't howl down the farmers.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Huron North wants to make a brief statement. I am sure he has the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to ask the minister why it is that the only cement the farmers in my part of the country can get is United States cement at 40 cents to 45 cents a bag more than the price paid for our own cement.

Mr. Howe: I have no idea. I am not responsible for the distribution of cement. I have no authority to distribute cement, and I do not know of any importations of United States cement.

LOCKPORT BRIDGE

REQUEST FOR EXTRA SHIFTS ON REPAIR WORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the great inconvenience to the local people, would it be possible to have extra shifts employed to speed up the repair work being done on the bridge at Lockport?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): May I congratulate the hon. member on his short question, and I think I can answer right now. This work is under contract. I have instructed my officials to get in touch with the contractor to see whether he can speed up the work.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

STATUS OF EMPLOYEES WHO ENLIST IN AIR FORCE OR NAVY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? Is it so that the Canadian National Railways will not guarantee jobs or seniority to those who enlist either in the air force or in the navy?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow me to accept his question as notice. I received it just as I was coming into the house. I have not had an opportunity of discussing it with Canadian National Railway officials.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

REQUEST FOR ORDERS IN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. It arises out of the last figures released by his department, listing Canadian firms awarded new defence orders in excess of $10,000. Does he know that once again there was not five cents for Saskatchewan? If he does know that, can he take some steps in the future to see that we do get more defence contracts?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion that Saskatchewan is being overlooked is not correct. Only a few days ago I signed a very large order for blankets with a Saskatchewan woollen mill.

Mr. Thatcher: These are your figures.

Mr. Howe: Nevertheless I am having an analysis prepared, a proper analysis of the location—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Howe: —of defence work.

Mr. Harkness: Weighted?

Mr. Howe: The list to which my hon. friend refers names the post office from which the tenders were filed. It does not necessarily name the province in which the goods are to be manufactured. If he would accept it as such it would save him a good many speeches in the house. I will have a proper list prepared in which we will show all the defence expenditures in the province of Saskatchewan. Incidentally, my own department is at present spending a few million dollars there through Eldorado Mining and Refining.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

AIR TRAINING PLAN, SASKATOON—HOUSING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): On May 10 a question of mine was passed as an order for return, as appears on page 2875 of Hansard. I should like to ask the Minister of Resources and Development, or the Secretary of State, whether that return can be expedited. It is a matter of importance in connection with housing in Saskatoon.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I shall be very glad to look into that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knight: The minister's nod does not show on Hansard.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

SUPPLY

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—TURNOVER TAX OF THREE PER CENT

The house resumed, from Monday, May 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, when this motion came before the house last night I indicated that the official opposition wished to take the opportunity which such a motion affords to bring before the house and the country the question of the opposition which exists to the suggestion that the British North America Act should be amended to allow the provinces to impose an indirect sales tax to the extent of three per cent.

Last night before the house adjourned I had dealt with some of the aspects of this matter, which might be briefly summarized as follows: It is now established that the proposal for an amendment in order to revise the old age pensions scheme and the amendment with regard to the three per cent sales tax are entirely separate; that this separation was brought about mainly as a result of the representations made by the provincial premiers, who had desired that the two matters should be considered separately, and their request was acceded to by the federal authorities, as outlined in a letter by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) on April 16.

There is, therefore, at this time no pressure with respect to the three per cent sales tax amendment, no pressure which could result in the fact that it might be said to be necessary in order to bring about an amendment to facilitate the revised scheme for old age pensions. Therefore this house can now express its opinion on the three per cent sales tax question entirely without pressure, and without any suggestion that to oppose the one amendment might jeopardize the introduction or the facilitation of an amendment dealing with the old age pensions scheme. So we have arrived at the point where we can consider the sales tax amendment entirely upon its merits.

Just before eleven o'clock last night I had suggested also some grounds for opposing the three per cent sales tax amendment. The first ground is that it is unnecessary that there should be any such amendment to the constitution. It is unnecessary that the provinces be empowered to impose indirect taxation, because they now have the power to do the same thing, namely, to raise revenue by a turnover tax, provided that that levy is in the form of direct taxation.

There are several provinces which have such a form of taxation. Notably I have in mind the province of British Columbia, where it is at the rate of three per cent, and yields in a fiscal year, in round figures, the sum of $28 million from the taxpayers of that province.

The second objection to the proposed amendment is that it would enable the provinces to impose a hidden form of taxation. Much has been written in economic textbooks about the objection to hidden forms of taxes. I think, however, the matter has never been more succinctly or clearly expressed, and in language that those who are not economists can understand, than in a recent editorial in the Windsor Daily Star of April 5 of this year. It says:

> The difference between the direct sales tax and the turnover tax is that the sales tax is added to the amount charged for an article and is known to the customer, but the turnover tax is on turnover and is hidden. The customer is charged so much and he does not know how much is tax. So far as that goes, he usually thinks the merchant is sticking him for a higher price and does not realize he is paying a tax.
> Apart from this feature there is the unfair burden a turnover tax places on those least able to pay. It applies to everything. Those in poorer circumstances pay much more in proportion than those in higher incomes.

Then the article concludes:

> The idea of a turnover tax is a cowardly method of raising revenues. It sticks the tax knife into the customer after he has been given an anaesthetic.

Perhaps the most important of the objections to this type of taxation is that it is directly inflationary. It is imposed at the manufacturer's level, based on turnover. Each succeeding dealer, whether he be the middleman distributor, or retailer, adds to the price of the goods, which already includes a tax, his normal margin of profit. Through each succeeding pair of hands that particular article passes there is an increased mark-up, based on the initial price plus the tax, with the result that the tax at three per cent at origin may well be an additional increase in price of from five to six per cent by the time it reaches the hands of the consumer.

This type of taxation increases the prices of goods people must buy, out of all proportion to the revenue it actually brings to the treasury. It increases profits, because the mark-up is placed on the tax as well as on the initial price of the goods. To that extent it directly increases prices, increases profits and contributes directly to inflation. It is inequitable in that it bears most heavily on those who are least able to pay, because the man with a low income and a large family has to pay as much tax on the goods he buys as the man who has a large income and perhaps only a small family.

These are the objections on economic grounds which might be advanced with respect to the tax. There are other objections, not the least of which is that at the present time we have much too large a proportion of our taxation being raised by way of indirect taxes. In years gone by—and not so many years at that—the major proportion of the revenue of the federal government and of most provincial governments came from direct taxation. That trend has now been reversed to a point where practically fifty per cent—I believe in 1949 it was over fifty per cent—of the national revenue is raised by means of indirect taxation.

Looking at the figures tabled by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, we find that the federal government now raises $1,200 million by means of indirect taxation. This amounts to forty per cent of the revenue collected by the federal government. If one bears in mind that the federal sales tax has just been increased to the general level of ten per cent, and the fact that the proposed amendment would enable the provinces to impose a similar tax of three per cent, both taxes being applied at the source on turnover, one will see, as was shown by an analysis made by experts on the subject, that the increases in prices of the goods when they reach the hands of the consumers would be in the order of from sixteen to eighteen per cent. With the burden of inflation and heavy taxation now being borne by the Canadian people reflected directly in higher prices and a spiralling cost of living, it surely cannot be denied that a tax impost which would result, when coupled with the federal government tax, in an increase in price of from sixteen to eighteen per cent should not be contemplated at the moment.

Another objection which might be offered is that the power to the provinces to impose this tax would be divisive and discriminatory. All the provinces do not now have equal sources of revenue. Some provinces have indicated that they would not resort to the three per cent tax. Other provinces have indicated that they would definitely impose the three per cent tax, and in fact would like to impose it at a higher rate.

If one of the objects of recent dominion-provincial financial discussions, from 1945 forward, has been, as I understand it, to distribute equitably among the people of the country the fiscal burden they have to bear, so that the poorer provinces particularly would be in receipt of provincial incomes which would enable them to render services comparable with the services rendered by the richer provinces, with respect to social security; and if generally the idea has been that there should be a redistribution of income among the provinces, perhaps on the basis of fiscal need—if, as I say, that is an accurate statement of the general approach to the problem, then I submit that this proposal to allow the provinces to levy a three per cent sales tax would be a complete negation of that principle.

This is true for the very reasons I have pointed out; some provinces which are in a fortunate position say they would not use the tax, even if the power to use it were granted, and other provinces say that as soon as the power is granted they intend to use it, and indeed would like to have authority to impose a tax of perhaps four per cent or even more.

Other provinces say they would like to apply the tax not only on the sale of goods but also on the rendering of services such as electric power, theatres, hotels and all that sort of thing. It would render quite unequal the cost of living as between the various provinces. A person passing from coast to coast and stopping off in the various provinces would find an entirely different cost of living in each province. It is a form of taxation which is unnecessary and particularly vicious, in that it would be discriminatory as between the provinces and the people living in the provinces. The very fact that the suggestion should now be put forward indicates that dominion-provincial financial relations are in pretty much of a mess as a result of the policies pursued by this government over past years, particularly as a result of their failure to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference which sat first in 1945 and completely overhaul the fiscal system of this country and follow it through to a logical and successful conclusion.

The provinces were practically driven by the federal authority into such a position that they very reluctantly, in many cases, gave up certain taxation powers. As a result of this whole process the provinces are now offered a most unpopular, a most unsatisfactory and most uneconomical form of taxation, namely, a sales tax. That is the position at which we have arrived. The provinces are strapped for funds as the result of the dominion-provincial agreements which have been imposed on them by the federal government, and are now in such a position that they have to contemplate asking for power to impose an unjust, unfair and discriminatory sales tax on their people in order to get revenue.

The final consideration I should like to lay before the house in asking it to pass its opinion on the amendment which I shall move is that there is a very strong body of opinion which holds that this is an entirely wrong method to use to bring about a change of the constitution in this respect. We have been witnessing a development under which eleven officials, ten from the provincial governments and one from the federal government, are undertaking to amend our constitution in fundamental particulars, with regard to the division of taxing powers between the central and provincial governments.

The division of taxing powers was laid down first in the British North America Act by the fathers of confederation. After years of study and conference they arrived at the division that we now have. Although it may well be suggested that the time has come when a revision of that distribution is necessary, I think the strongest objection should be raised to an alteration in our constitution in any fundamental respect being brought about by eleven people, none of them elected for that purpose. I am not being personally critical of any of the people who have taken part in the conference, but I think that if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), who has carried forward most of the negotiations with the provincial premiers, will analyse the situation he will agree that he was not elected, nor was any provincial premier elected, to amend the constitution. That is not one of the things which the people of the provinces or of the dominion had in mind when they voted in either provincial or dominion elections. But eleven men are seeking to take to themselves the power to amend the constitution in perhaps its most important particular, the distribution of financial powers as between the federal and provincial governments.

In support of my contention that this is a wrong method to use to amend the constitution, I should like to quote from an editorial by Mr. Sandwell in the last issue of the Toronto Saturday Night. He points out that none of these eleven people was elected to assume the responsibility they are now assuming, and in the course of his editorial he says:

> The correct position, it seems to this column, is that neither the government of the dominion nor the governments of the ten provinces have any right to change the distribution of taxing powers, or any other arrangement of the powers of legislation and administration, that are established by the British North America Act. The dominion parliament—wrongly, we believe—has acquired from the British parliament the right to change the constitution in respect of the classes of subjects assigned to that parliament's legislative power. It has not, so far as we can see, acquired any right to change, with or without the consent of one, two, six or ten of the provinces, the extent of those classes, and yet that is exactly what it is purporting to do.

The whole idea of the amendment of the constitution becoming a matter of bargaining between the dominion government of the moment and the ten provincial governments of the moment seems to us illogical, undemocratic and revolting.

In conclusion I desire to move, seconded by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that further consideration should not be given to the proposal to authorize by amendment to the British North America Act an indirect provincial sales tax of three per cent."

On a recent occasion when we were discussing the proposal to increase the federal sales tax from eight to ten per cent, all members, on the opposition side at any rate, were agreed that that proposal was unnecessary at the present time and that this form of taxation is generally undesirable, because it is hidden, because it is inflationary, and because it would increase the already heavy burden of the high cost of living. All members of the Social Credit party, the C.C.F. party and the official opposition were united in opposing that increase. I am confident that those members will be united again on this occasion.

Since this is a proposal which invites an expression of opinion from the house and does not in any way involve legislation presented by the government, I would hope that members on the government side might feel free to express their opinion, because that is all they are being asked to do by the amendment—to consider or reject the proposal that at this time there should be no power given to the provinces to increase the cost of living by the imposition of a three per cent indirect sales tax.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will consider whether or not this amendment is in order, and I do not intend to discuss the question. I do wish to point out some of the inaccuracies—quite involuntary, I am sure—in the speech of the hon. member who has moved this motion. His very first words last evening in opening this matter, which I find at page 3257 of Hansard, were:

Before this motion carries, Mr. Speaker, there is a matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the house. It concerns the proposal which has been made by the federal government to the various provincial governments to amend the British North America Act so as to enable the provinces to impose an indirect sales tax or turnover tax of three per cent.

I am sure the hon. member must know that is not a proposal that was made to the provinces by the federal government. A conference was called of the provincial governments, which met here in December of last year. At the end of that conference an agreed statement was issued to the press, which is to be found at page 137 of the report of the proceedings of the conference of federal and provincial governments, Ottawa, December 4-7, 1950, headed "Statement to the press by the Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent at the conclusion of the conference." I quote:

The conference discussed:

1. The offer of the federal government for new tax agreements.

2. The offer of the federal government respecting old age security.

3. A provincial proposal for an amendment to the constitution to permit the provincial legislatures to levy an indirect sales tax at the retail level.

Why should the hon. member wish to create the impression that this proposal was made by the federal government, when it is perfectly clear, from the statement agreed to and issued after the conference, that it was a provincial proposal that was made at that time?

Mr. Diefenbaker: What province made that proposal?

Mr. St. Laurent: Several provinces made the proposal, and it was generally discussed. I think the first to voice it at that conference was the premier of New Brunswick. I believe the hon. member will find that at page 30 of the report of these proceedings. I do not think it was referred to by any of those who spoke before the premier of New Brunswick, whose speech commences at page 29 of the report. This is the way he put it:

This, however, prompts me to suggest that there is another constitutional amendment which should be considered at the same time. It has relation to the taxing powers of the provinces whose jurisdiction under the British North America Act is limited to direct taxation.

Under the authority so vested in them, five of the provinces have now in operation a consumer's tax, so-called. In effect it is a sales tax but cannot be imposed in that less unattractive form. In 1950 the legislature of New Brunswick adopted legislation authorizing such a tax, notwithstanding the problems presented in its collection. It is quite possible that as time passes other provinces will find it necessary to rely upon this method of taxation to meet their revenue requirements.

We hope that all provinces will agree that a constitutional amendment should be sought to permit such a levy through the simple expedient of a sales tax. One would assume that if the provinces are in agreement on this point the federal authorities would readily concur.

That is the manner in which this arose. At that time the federal government had proposed to the provinces new tax agreements, had called the attention of the premiers to the report of the joint committee of the two houses of parliament on old age security, and had stated that if it found a constitutional amendment necessary to enable contributions to be attached to a no-means-test old age pension it would attempt to implement at the earliest possible moment the recommendations of that joint committee. I think it was considered by the public generally that it would be desirable to have that kind of amendment made to the constitution.

At the same time, and concurrently with this general conference, there was an adjourned conference of the provincial premiers to discuss the method by which amendments to the constitution should be made in Canada. We had been discussing these matters on their merits in an amicable and cordial manner, and it appeared that it would not have been conducive to maintaining that cordial and amicable manner of discussing the problem if we said: No; so far as we are concerned all amendments must be just one way amendments; there must be no amendment transferring any part of the federal powers to provincial legislatures; they must be amendments transferring some part of provincial jurisdiction to the federal parliament. We did not think an attitude of that kind would have been conducive to the discussion of these matters in the spirit which was being displayed by all those who were then in conference.

The hon. member chooses to say that this constitutes an offer by the federal government to the provinces to take jurisdiction to impose an indirect sales tax. Well, he may view that as he likes, but he cannot change the facts, nor can he change the printed report or the agreed statement.

The hon. member goes on to say that we have now reached the point where it is admitted that the two constitutional amendments are entirely separate and can be treated in that way, and that this is due to the insistence of the premier of Nova Scotia in a letter of April 16.

Mr. Fulton: That is not quite accurate.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member should have read the correspondence more carefully if he was going to make an assertion such as that. Had he read it more carefully he would have seen that in a letter dated March 12 the premier of New Brunswick had this to say, the letter appearing at page 2729 of Hansard:

> Some confusion seems to have developed in certain quarters—

That was even before it developed in Kamloops.

> —where an opinion or view has developed that the sales tax amendment was part and parcel of the old age pension plan which was under study at the December federal-provincial conference. All governments there represented are fully aware that there is no relation or connection between the two and that the old age pension plan can go forward without any sales tax amendment.

Then he added:

> In order, however, to emphasize this point I am referring herein only to the old age pension amendment and shall make the proposals regarding a sales tax amendment the subject of another letter to follow shortly.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) replied to that letter fully, agreeing that there was no connection whatever between the two amendments. The one concerning old age pensions can go forward without any sales tax amendment.

Mr. Fulton: When was that first put into writing by the federal authorities?

Mr. St. Laurent: That was first put forward by the federal authorities at the very opening of the conference. It was stated that the tax agreements, old age pensions and the matter of the sales tax could all be considered separately. The tax agreements were not dependent upon agreement on old age pensions, and old age pensions were not dependent upon agreement on the tax agreements. Those were the two proposals put before the conference by the federal government, and the only proposals put before the conference by the federal government. It was only upon this question being raised afterwards by Premier McNair that we did not take the stand that we would not give consideration to their request, if they all wanted that power, to impose an indirect sales tax.

After all, in spite of what may be said by any editor of any newspaper in Canada, the provincial premiers do have a certain representative capacity when they meet with the federal government. They are elected to look after the interests of the people of their provinces, just as we are elected to look after the interests of Canadians generally without regard to the province in which they happen to have their homes. I believe that if ten provincial premiers, having given serious study and consideration to a problem, come together and say that in their opinion and judgment it would be in the interests of the people of their provinces to have a certain form of taxation available to them, it would be, I shall say, impertinent for the federal government—in whatever aspect it may be regarded when it comes from the hon. member for Kamloops—to say the proposal is so ridiculous that we will not give it any consideration whatever. Certainly that would not be an attitude that would be conducive to obtaining the kind of co-operation between those who exercise legislative and administrative authority in this country that is desirable for the promotion of the interests of the people.

I am not going to discuss the merits or demerits of an indirect sales tax. The hon. member for Kamloops says it would bring about discrimination. He himself stated that there was that kind of discrimination. He says that in his province there is now a direct sales tax of three per cent that is payable by all those who are either residing in his province or who just happen to be there and want to buy some commodities. There are at least five provinces in which there are no such sales taxes. There is one in which the sales tax, instead of being three per cent, is five per cent. This kind of discrimination has existed, and the people of Canada have carried on. Since those discriminatory measures were put into effect there have been provincial elections, and those who were responsible for putting them into effect got the support of the majority of the elected members in their respective provinces. That seems to be the way in which democratic institutions operate in this country.

The hon. member says that this kind of tax would be a tax put on at the manufacturers' level, and would pyramid in the hands of each successor who dealt with the same commodity. There again I am afraid the hon. member has been rather shortsighted in reading the form of the amendment which the Minister of Justice was asked by the ten premiers to approve, which he did approve, and which he sent out to them with his letter of January 2, 1951. It is printed on page 43 of Hansard of February 1, and reads as follows:

(b) indirect taxation within the province in respect of the sale of goods (except goods sold for shipment outside the province) to a buyer for purposes of consumption or use and not for resale . . .

It is apparent that the hon. member has built up a windmill against which to direct his speech and his motion, without regard to the documentary evidence that he had before him.

The hon. member says that amendments to the constitution should not be made by eleven men. If that means anything, I believe it does convey the implication that there are amendments made in that way, or that are being proposed to be made in that way. The hon. member knows that there have been a certain number of amendments to the constitution of this country since 1867, and that for the last fifty years at least the procedure which has become the established procedure is for those amendments to be made by the parliament at Westminster on a joint address of the two houses of the Canadian parliament. No one who has been prime minister of Canada has at any time attempted to make amendments to the constitution. The government from time to time has recommended to the houses of parliament that a joint address be presented to His Majesty requesting that an amendment be made. The joint address does not go forward until the members of this house, and the members of the other place, have had an opportunity of deciding, by a majority of the votes of the elected or appointed representatives of the people, whether it is in their interest that the amendment should be made.

The hon. member has been here long enough to have heard from that side of the house the thundering tones upbraiding the government for daring to suggest any kind of amendment to the constitution without the consent of the provincial governments. Frequently that has been the subject of strong denunciations from the other side of the house. The hon. member professes a devotion to democratic processes; then he suggests it is this house which should determine through what form the provincial authorities will put their consent when it is to be expressed to the presentation of an address for an amendment. This party feels that that is a responsibility for those who speak for the provincial government. I know that in fact several of them had their legislatures pass laws or resolutions in connection with the amendment which is now being sought from the parliament at Westminster to establish a no-means-test old age pension in this country. As to what the other governments did I do not know, and I do not think it should be my concern. If one should undertake to put its view forward as being the view of the whole province, the electors of that province will have a democratic opportunity to deal with its conduct. All the provincial legislatures having been in session since this dominion-provincial conference of last December, I am convinced that there was ample opportunity for those legislatures to make their views known and that the ten provincial premiers who have expressed their acceptance of the form of amendment to be requested with respect to old age pensions had the authority of the people of their respective provinces to express such consent. I am not going to deal with the merits of that situation. But this conference was adjourned.

From what I have read in the newspapers it seems that there are some of the provincial premiers who do not think that it would be a good thing for the provincial legislatures to have the right to resort to an indirect sales tax at the retailers' level. Quite frankly, I would be sorry if they all agreed that there should be any transfer of taxing jurisdiction from parliament to the provincial legislatures. But at this time, when we are merely at the stage of an adjourned conference, both on the method of making future amendments to the constitution here in Canada by some Canadian authority, and on the question of further tax agreements between the federal government and the provinces, it would not appear as if this house had any confidence in this government if it were to say that it should withdraw from the subjects under discussion for the continuation of this conference the possibility of consideration being given to an amendment that would work to transfer some jurisdiction from the federal authority to the provincial authority.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the Prime Minister permit a question at this point?

Mr. St. Laurent: Certainly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What attitude did he, on behalf of his government, take as to the propriety of the provinces having power to impose a three per cent sales tax by the necessary amendment?

Mr. St. Laurent: I was not in a position where I could express the decision of the Canadian government. That was not a part of the authority that had been given to those who were representing the federal government in those conferences. If there was a unanimous request from the provincial governments for that kind of amendment at this period of our constitutional development, with the matters that are now pending for decision between the provincial authorities and the dominion government, I would recommend to my colleagues that we do not refuse to go along with them.

Mr. Green: Even though it is a thoroughly bad tax.

Mr. St. Laurent: Even though the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) calls it a thoroughly bad tax, and had the opportunity of having a vote in this house which showed in what a small minority he was.

Mr. Green: Better hold your temper.

Mr. St. Laurent: The fact that the hon. member calls the thing "thoroughly bad" does not necessarily mean that everyone in Canada agrees with him; because he has called this government thoroughly bad on more than one occasion and he has had ample evidence that there are not many in the country who agree with him.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. Ferguson: Over fifty per cent of the people agree with him.

Mr. St. Laurent: This strategy has another effect. This is a motion to say that this house is not prepared to go into committee of supply to provide this government with the money required to carry out the administration of the country. The amendment is that all the words after "that" be struck out and be replaced by this expression of no confidence in this government to carry on further discussions with the provincial authorities on a matter such as that which is involved in the terms of the amendment.

Mr. Fulton: That is a far-fetched assumption.

Mr. St. Laurent: The motion is that the house resolve itself into committee of supply to consider the estimates that have been placed before the house. This amendment seeks to express in advance an opinion upon something that may never come before the house. There could not be any attempt to amend the constitution in order to give the provinces the right to impose indirect sales tax without an address voted on affirmatively by this house. This amendment seeks to express the opinion that further consideration should not be given to the proposal to authorize, by amendment to the British North America Act, an indirect provincial sales tax of three per cent. There is no such proposal being given consideration by this house. A proposal was put forward by the provincial premiers at a conference which is now adjourned, and with respect to which their views were expressed—as to nine of them, I think—in the correspondence that has been tabled. I have read in the newspapers, since the dates of that correspondence, that some views were expressed by another provincial premier in a public speech at London recently.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who was that? Was it the premier of Ontario?

Mr. St. Laurent: I understand that the premier of Ontario, in a speech at London recently, expressed the opinion that it would not be desirable to have that kind of amendment. There is no direct expression of his views in the correspondence that has been tabled; but my understanding is that both he and the premier of Quebec have now expressed the opinion that it would not be desirable to have that kind of amendment. The premier of Quebec seems to be quite satisfied with the system that he has established of having the dealers act as collectors of a direct tax on the commodities that are sold to the consumers. As a matter of fact, the tax is five per cent in some cities. I would not be at all surprised if it was preferred to raise five per cent in that manner rather than to be limited to raising three per cent in another manner.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He would not be denied both ways, then, if an amendment passed, would he?

Mr. St. Laurent: He would not be denied both ways; but it is something for which those administering public affairs would be responsible to the people of their respective provinces; and the hon. gentleman knows, as I do, that in provincial politics the volume of taxes and the form of taxes imposed by a party in power are always live issues at election time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is in the provincial arena.

Mr. St. Laurent: That has been my experience over the last fifty years. Though I was not of his party, I was somewhat incensed over the fact that my good professor of Roman law was generally called "the taxer", he having headed a provincial administration during whose tenure of office some unpopular forms of taxation had been enacted. There is no doubt that all these taxes are rather obnoxious. But there is no doubt that present conditions in this country require methods whereby there are transfer payments from some income groups to other income groups. That has become necessary. We have discussed in this house problems with respect to social welfare, problems with respect to education, and the needs that are so urgent in all these public services. I think that these matters should be discussed on their merits, and that this house should wait until something comes before it, before it expresses any veto on proposals that may never come before it.

When we sit around the conference table with the elected representatives of the ten Canadian provinces, we are all fellow citizens interested in the same degree in the good administration of the affairs of the whole country under a system whereby a part of the sovereignty is in one place and another part of the sovereignty is in another place, and where the whole of the sovereignty has to be used to satisfy the legitimate interests of the people of the country. Well, when we do that I think that it is preferable that we try to arrive at the best possible solutions, and that we do not go there with a declaration made in advance that we will not even give consideration to any one thing that might come from the provincial representatives.

I think that we have to be prepared to give these matters consideration. It may very well be that the consensus will be that there should not be at this time any attempt to interfere with the respective taxation jurisdictions of these authorities. It may very well be the basis upon which we were acting at that time; that nothing was going to be decided by the majority; that unless there was unanimity with respect to any of those constitutional proposals they could not be proceeded with. That is the basis upon which the matter was put before the ten provincial governments. It was a transfer of jurisdiction, something which interested both the federal government and the provincial governments, and that in those cases until there was agreement that the provinces would be bound by a majority we would not attempt to proceed without the unanimous consent of all those who were to be affected.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does there look to be any possibility that the provinces will agree to any such change by a majority vote?

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, here I would not like to express any opinion. I know that there was no agreement to be bound by anything but unanimous consent so far; but they have not, any of them, declared that there was no use pursuing the matter further. They are still studying it, and still considering it, and I think they are considering it in good faith, and in an honest endeavour to serve the best interests of those whom they represent in their elected capacities. They have not said that there was no use pursuing it further.

This being a request by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) for a vote of no confidence in this government, of course the government cannot accept it. The government has confidence in itself. It hopes that there are enough members in the house to support it in that stand; but the rejection of this amendment does not mean anything at all. It does not mean that this house would be prepared to join in an address requesting an amendment to authorize a sales tax. It merely means that this house is not prepared to turn this government out because this government did not refuse to give consideration to that matter when it was raised in the dominion-provincial conference by one of the provincial premiers. That is all it means.

If ever there was any unanimous agreement by the provinces that they should have that power, the government would then have to take the responsibility of deciding whether or not it would recommend to parliament the adoption of an address; and if it recommended to parliament the adoption of an address, parliament would then dispose of that address as the hon. members might feel was in the best interests of the Canadian people as a whole. But at this time there is certainly no such urgency of expressing such an opinion as would displace the urgency of getting on with the normal business of voting the supplies that are required for the administration of this country's affairs.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has placed this motion upon the basis of a want of confidence motion, and has left the impression that to support it would be to vote want of confidence in the government. It seems to me that the words of this motion are not susceptible of such interpretation.

The words of this motion constitute an expression of opinion by hon. members that further consideration should not be given to the proposal to authorize, by amendment to the British North America Act, an indirect provincial sales tax of three per cent. That I submit is an appropriate motion at such a time. In fact, this is a long established practice. This is a procedure with a long tradition behind it.

The motion to go into supply affords an opportunity to obtain an expression by the house in regard to any matter that the house is competent to deal with. Obviously, a motion cannot deal with some other motion that is before the house. It cannot deal with any legislation that is before the house. It can deal only with something that is of concern to hon. members which is not before the house in any other way. That is exactly what we have in this instance.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this motion is not only a motion well within the rules, but it is a very proper thing that hon. members at this time should indicate what their opinion is in regard to this form of taxation, so that the time of this government, and of other governments, will not be wasted if in fact hon. members do not believe that any tax of this kind should be introduced. That is the purpose of the motion, and that is the result that would follow. The government then would have an indication of the sentiment of this house, and could very properly say that it did not consider it was wise to proceed with the discussion of an amendment of this kind to the British North America Act.

I must confess, Mr. Speaker, to a great deal of surprise as to why the Prime Minister should be so exercised about the fact that it was stated a proposal had been made. A great deal has been said about where this suggestion came from. It was stated that the suggestion had come from the premier of New Brunswick. That will undoubtedly be interesting to the people of New Brunswick. It is of course a matter of interest that New Brunswick already has a four per cent tax; and also it is a matter of interest that the premier of New Brunswick has indicated that he does not think that the amendment put forward by the dominion government—and it is an amendment put forward by the dominion government—is in itself adequate; because he wants an amendment which would make it possible to impose a four per cent indirect tax, or such higher tax as he sees fit.

In other words he has made it clear that he does not think there should be any limitation of this kind. Of course it would have the advantage of being a hidden tax. The premier of New Brunswick is within his rights in presenting that opinion, and the members of the House of Commons, who also must assume responsibility, are within their rights if they also express an opinion as to a tax of this kind.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are other reasons why I find it difficult to understand why such vigorous exception should have been taken to the word "proposal". In the house this subject has been under consideration before. It is interesting to note that this was brought forward for at least consideration by the house in the speech from the throne. If it was worthy of inclusion in the speech from the throne as something for members to consider, and if it was put forward by the governor general as such, then surely it is appropriate for us to discuss a resolution of this kind in an orderly way.

Mr. Ferguson: The Prime Minister just changed his mind, that is all.

Mr. Drew: I would remind hon. members of the words in the speech from the throne when reference was made to these two proposed amendments to the British North America Act—and there were only two. One was an amendment that would make it possible to proceed with the old age pensions plan, and the other was an amendment which would make it possible to introduce this new form of indirect taxation. There were just those two.

Therefore with that in mind it is interesting to read the words in the speech from the throne, and I quote from that document as it is recorded at page 2 of Hansard in the present session:

> The provincial governments are at present giving consideration to these proposals and to proposals for constitutional amendments which may require to be submitted to you before the close of the present session.

Every hon. member knows that the speech from the throne is drafted by the government, and that the government itself has described these as proposals. Therefore one of the proposals is the amendment to the British North America Act to provide for this indirect form of taxation.

Surely if we adopt the wording of the government itself there should not be any reason for such vigorous opposition to the adoption of that term. But what is a proposal? Surely a proposal is something put forward—and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was certainly putting something forward, on January 20 of this year, in his letter t the Hon. A. L. Macdonald, premier of Nova Scotia. I think in view of the objection that has been taken to the stand that the dominion government has assumed any initiative in this matter, it would be well to put that letter on record at this point. It says:

Dear Mr. Macdonald:

Since I wrote you on January 2 enclosing a suggested constitutional amendment to make it possible, inter alia, for provincial governments to impose an indirect sales tax at the retail level, it has become clear that such a proposal will be subject to the most powerful opposition of the retailing industry throughout the country. Apparently the attack will be made partly on the plausible ground that if provincial governments are allowed the right to levy indirect sales taxation, they may discriminate between different classes or types of retailers based on their residence, or their ownership, or their marketing methods, or what not—thus setting up effective trade barriers between different parts of the country. You will recall that it was on this general ground that a somewhat similar proposal was defeated in the Senate in 1936.

I think you will agree that it would be most unfortunate if as a result of a similar attack based on similar grounds, we should fail—

"We should fail"— —to secure the enactment of a measure which provides for an extension of the taxing powers of the provincial governments. After very careful consideration, therefore, we would propose that there be added to the draft amendment already sent you, dealing with retail sales taxation, the following words:

"and not so as to discriminate between sellers or classes of sellers of the same class of goods."

Yours very truly,

Stuart Garson

Thus, Mr. Speaker, we have the word "proposal" used several times by the dominion government in regard to this very matter. Therefore in drafting the resolution let me point out that the government itself provided the word that was used in that resolution, which is now before the house.

The Prime Minister was unduly caustic and, in fact, not by any manner of means in his best form, when he became so critical of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) in his apparent misunderstanding of what the thoughts of some people had been in regard to the two proposed constitutional amendments. He emphasized the fact that there never had been any doubt, that there could not be any doubt, about the fact that these do not go together. May I suggest that if there has been any confusion it is not the hon. member for Kamloops alone and it is not hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party alone who have been subject to any confusion on the score.

I merely place before the house how this confusion has arisen elsewhere. I hold in my hand the issue of the Charlottetown Guardian of April 24, 1951, and in big capital letters I see the words, "Here are the facts". Then, in somewhat smaller capitals, but still conspicuous, these words:

If the Conservatives under R. R. Bell should be elected, his promise to veto the sales tax amendment to the constitution would also block the old age pension amendment—

Mr. Fulton: Who inserted that advertisement?

Mr. Drew: I was coming to that. Then this paragraph concludes——and the proposed old age pensions would never be paid.

Whom was this inserted by? It was inserted by the Prince Edward Island Liberal party, in a full-page advertisement, just prior to the recent election down there.

Mr. Winters: And how did they do in that election?

Mr. Drew: Who won that election? Oh, I am very glad the hon. member has asked that! Yes, it is perfectly true that Premier Jones did win the election, with statements of that kind printed in the press and given to the public in the province of Prince Edward Island. And if the hon. member wishes to take credit for getting into power by false pretences, then by all means let him gain whatever measure of comfort he gets from that source. But let us just look at the bottom of the advertisement—and this all refers to the objection taken by Mr. Bell to the amendment that would provide for this indirect tax. After the statement I have quoted, down at the bottom of the page we find, "Vote Liberal, and protect the old age pension."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: That applause would seem to suggest that there is some confusion also in the minds of Liberal members in the House of Commons, because they are applauding either a dishonest statement or the fact that people should be misled by the suggestion that the refusal to accept the amendment permitting an indirect sales tax would block old age pensions. There is no other reading of what appears on this page. I have put that forward merely to indicate clearly that if there was any confusion in people's minds that it had been suggested there was some relationship between those two amendments, most certainly that confusion was not confined to any member of this house who has discussed this subject.

The argument put forward this afternoon by the Prime Minister was in effect an argument that we should not now discuss this particular subject because the dominion government should be ready to proceed to hear what the provinces have to say in regard to this amendment, no matter whether they think it is a good amendment or not. The dominion government and this parliament cannot absolve themselves from responsibility in regard to this. Either this is something that should be put forward or it is not. Members of this parliament should not support a submission to Westminster if they do not believe that that submission is something which should properly be put forward as an amendment to the British North America Act.

The Prime Minister said, and I quote his words: I am not going to discuss the merits or demerits of an indirect tax of this kind. I submit that we should discuss the merits or demerits of a tax of this kind because if members of this house do not believe that there should be such a tax then time would be saved for the dominion government and for the provincial governments if they had an indication of opinion from the members of this house. They then could proceed to discuss with the provinces the appropriate adjustment of taxation that would give them the taxing resources they desire without introducing an objectionable tax of this kind.

The Prime Minister has placed a sort of emphasis on his belief that it is the democratic thing to let the provinces decide what they want and then, no matter what view may be expressed here, to accept that if they happen to get agreement among the ten provinces. There were many who thought that the consideration of this tax was a dead issue in view of certain public statements that had been made. However, a short time ago the Prime Minister made it clear that this was by no manner of means a dead issue. On May 4, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) asked the Prime Minister whether this constitutional amendment was still under consideration and the Prime Minister replied, as reported on page 2682 of Hansard:

> The federal government declared at the dominion-provincial conference that if the provinces were agreed that they wanted the other, the federal government would go along with them, and that is still the position.

The "other" that is referred to there is the amendment to the British North America Act which would permit the imposition of an indirect sales tax of that kind. However, if the Prime Minister had made no such statement on May 4 he would have left no doubt in anyone's mind here that this is very much a live issue. Because it is a live issue I suggest that it is appropriate that the members of this house express their opinions without any suggestion that such an expression of opinion would or would not be a vote of confidence in the government. In fact the Prime Minister has indicated that the government has not expressed an opinion. Since it has not expressed an opinion I suggest that it is preposterous to place on the basis of a vote of confidence an expression of opinion which would merely assist the Prime Minister in understanding what the sentiment of this house really is in regard to this tax.

Having dealt with that, let me refer to what the Prime Minister said about the British Columbia tax. He showed a measure of irritation that was out of keeping with the manner in which the arguments have been put forward. He was extremely sarcastic about what the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) had done in presenting some of his arguments and his references to the British Columbia tax.

The British Columbia tax is a sales tax. The Prime Minister left the inference that since they have already dealt with a tax of this kind there would not be much difference if they had this amendment. But the fact is that the British Columbia tax is a direct and open tax. I am not expressing any opinion in favour of a tax of that kind; in fact I have expressed an opinion to the contrary on other occasions, and I refer to when I had a certain responsibility in regard to provincial taxes of that nature. There is a vast difference between these two taxes. The direct provincial tax indicates clearly to the purchaser what the purchaser is paying, but this indirect tax is a hidden tax which hides from the purchaser what he is paying and is not in any way made up in the real value of the article itself.

They are very different and they create great differences in any goods that are merchandised on a national scale. Where goods are merchandised on a national scale the price can be fixed in the advertisements and the purchaser knows that that is the price. When a direct tax is paid the purchaser knows he is paying a tax. That is his choice; that is his decision. In this case, however, the provinces would have the right to impose or not to impose a hidden tax. Consequently it would be made extremely difficult to merchandise on a national scale products of the same kind that are distributed throughout the whole of this country.

Let us look again at what the Prime Minister said. He said: I do not think it should be my concern. I think it should be his concern; I think it should be the concern of every member of this house whether this is the kind of amendment that should be brought forward. Following the Prime Minister this afternoon one was led to the conclusion that the Prime Minister had the idea that this was something for debate only in the provincial legislatures. If there was agreement, that settled it and we had nothing to do. This matter has been up before the House of Commons in years gone by and never before was there any suggestion that this was not a subject for discussion in the House of Commons. The fact is that the primary responsibility is in this house because it is from this house that any proposal must go forward for consideration by Westminster.

Having said that, and hoping that there still may be an expression by members of this house at this time, may I once again point out the reasons why there should be a clear declaration that this amendment will not be adopted by this house to meet any of the problems that we face today. First of all, let us remember that an amendment of this kind would change the fundamental allocation of taxation which has existed ever since 1867. There are many people who will say, "Well, we have come a long way from 1867." That is quite true, but those who drafted the basic constitution at that time could never have contemplated the problems we face today, and I am one of those here who for years have been urging that these changes should be recognized and that there should be a re-examination of the whole tax structure. I have urged over and over that there should be a conference which would deal exclusively with the whole problem of taxation, so there might be an allocation of taxes at the dominion, provincial and municipal levels which would bear most easily upon the taxpayers of this country and make it possible for the administrative responsibility of those bodies to be matched by their taxing authority so they could in fact have independent discretion as to what they should do.

The suggestion here would simply provide a temporary solution. It would break away from our traditional tax position without providing any satisfactory solution from the long-term point of view. Why should the dominion government make an amendment to the basic constitution and say to the provinces, "You can just have a little 3 per cent nibble at this tax, and no more." Either it is right to let the provinces into the indirect field without any limiting declaration of that kind and have both fields open to provincial and federal governments, as they are now, or there should be clearly defined taxes available to both bodies. The dominion government should not say that the provinces should have so much of this and so much of that, and beyond that they can just whistle for it; that they can only do what may be possible within the amount the federal government is allowing them. That is not the basis on which it should be done.

I know that in answer to what I have just said it can be suggested that this cannot be done at all unless the provinces agree. That is so; but the provinces are being asked to consider—and I repeat "asked to consider"—a draft put forward by the dominion government which would impose that limitation at this time. Already we have an indication that one of the provinces does not think that is enough. Therefore we know that if this were done now it would not be very long before there would be a request for an increased amount. After all this is administrative in function, and should not be the subject of a constitutional amendment of this kind.

This form of indirect taxation not only carries with it all the objections which apply to any other indirect tax; it has special objections in addition. An indirect tax imposed by the dominion government would apply over the whole field evenly. An indirect tax which could be levied by some provincial governments and not by others would constitute in effect something in the nature of a tariff barrier between the provinces; and the amendment proposed by the Minister of Justice would not prevent evils of that kind creeping in. When he suggested the addition of the words "not so as to discriminate between sellers or classes of sellers of the same class of goods" he did not suggest anything that would prevent the inequities which would follow the application of a tax of this kind. Let us take just one of the absurdities that would be met. In the proposed amendment the Minister of Justice has placed before the provincial governments, there is a provision that this would not apply to goods shipped out of the province. Just think of the very interesting situation that would arise right here in Ottawa and in Hull, across the river. Anyone living in Ottawa could order goods in Hull, which could then be shipped across the river and would not carry this tax, if there were such a tax in Quebec. Anyone in Hull could telephone to a store in Ottawa; and if the tax were imposed in Ontario it would not apply to goods shipped across the river. Therefore you could have a device by which there would be discrimination against merchants in one place or the other, a very open device for avoiding the consequences of the tax itself.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You know we have that tax in Quebec now?

Mr. Drew: Not this indirect tax.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not this turnover tax, but we have a sales tax in Hull.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) knows there is a sales tax and he knows when he pays it, because it is a direct tax. He has a chance to pay it or not as he sees fit, and I have no doubt there are occasions when he does not pay it, simply because he is able to determine whether or not he will.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I cannot recall when I did not pay my tax.

Mr. Drew: But this is a discretionary tax which the minister can pay or not pay, depending on which side of the river he happens to be on any particular day. I hope he will not suggest that he has never bought anything in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, no.

Mr. Drew: Then may I also point out that those provinces which have the greatest tax resources at the present time could most easily avoid putting into effect a tax of this nature. Those provinces which already have their tax resources limited would be more inclined to impose this tax. Therefore those in the provinces regarded as more fortunate from that point of view would not pay the tax, while those in a less fortunate position would be called on to pay it. It is the kind of tax that would tend to divide this country, that would tend to create inequalities, that that would tend to increase inequalities, at a time when this parliament and the government, which is the executive of this parliament, should be seeking methods of taxation and of allocating tax funds which would equalize opportunities and remove inequalities right across the country.

Then may I point out that this is a tax at the top level, at the retail level, and because of that fact it is a tax on every other tax that goes into the cost of goods in this country. It is a tax on the municipal tax; it is a tax on the federal tax paid by the merchant; it is a tax on every other tax, federal, provincial or municipal, which the merchant is called on to bear. Hon. members know that all these taxes go into the cumulative cost of the article, and it is that cost on which this three per cent would be imposed. We have been warned of inflationary trends. Only yesterday there was a warning no one should ignore as to the danger of continued spiralling inflation. At such a time this house should be seeking every possible method to reassure the public that artificial pressures increasing inflation will not be created. Certainly this would be a highly inflationary pressure, and assurances should be given by the members of the house at this time that they do not believe this kind of tax should be imposed.

Having pointed out that I believe there are reasons why this tax would be very improper; that it would be an iniquitous tax to introduce at this time; that it would bear most heavily on those least able to pay it; that it would in fact be a tax to soak the poor: I think this amendment, couched in terms that do not condemn and do not repudiate the action of the government but simply express an opinion, gives hon. members an opportunity to say to the government that while we certainly respect the point of view expressed in any other legislative body, we also have the right and duty to express our own opinion, and our opinion is that this iniquitous tax should not be considered at this time.

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I feel that there is a great deal of merit in what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said. I think in this instance I am going to afford myself the luxury of supporting the amendment of his party. Despite the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said that he will interpret the defeat of this motion as want of confidence in his government, I do not choose to interpret it that way. Under these particular circumstances I wish to express my disapproval of this sales tax constitutional amendment. I merely want to say at this time that, despite my vote on this issue, I have not lost confidence in this government.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, from reading the exchange of correspondence between the dominion government and the various provincial governments, it appears that the amendment to the British North America Act which is under consideration this afternoon would read as follows—I hope the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) will correct me if I do not have the right wording; I am reading from page 2736 of Hansard for May 4. This amendment is to section 92 of the British North America Act, and would constitute a new subsection 2a, reading as follows:

2a. The raising of revenue for provincial purposes by indirect taxation within the province in respect of the sale of goods (except goods sold for shipment outside the province) to a buyer for purposes of consumption or use and not for resale, at a rate not exceeding three per centum of the sale price, but not so as to discriminate between sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured within the provinces and sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured outside the province and not so as to discriminate between sellers or classes of sellers of the same class of goods.

That, I take it, is the proposed amendment. Section 92 being the one which sets out the powers of the provinces, this would be an additional power granted to the provincial governments. It would seem to be accurately summed up in the resolution which was passed by the British Columbia legislature a few weeks ago in the following words:

—granting of power to the provinces to impose an indirect sales tax up to but not exceeding three per cent in such a manner as not to encroach or interfere with interprovincial trade;

I understand, further, that all the provinces have expressed approval of this proposed amendment with the exception of the province of Quebec, or if they have not expressed such approval only the province of Quebec has definitely opposed the amendment. If I am incorrect in that, I would ask the Minister of Justice to correct me.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is as much in possession of the facts as I am. In the correspondence the province of Quebec has indicated that it opposes or at least that it does not approve of this amendment. The province of Ontario has expressed no opinion at all in the correspondence, but I believe the premier of that province has since publicly expressed the view that it would not likely be proceeded with.

Mr. Green: And the other eight provinces have approved of that amendment, is that correct?

Mr. Garson: The correspondence indicates that.

Mr. Green: So today we come to consider the merits of this proposed amendment. I was somewhat surprised and disappointed at the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). He took a very detached view of this proposal, declaring that he was not going to discuss the merits of the amendment. He said he would be sorry if all of the provinces did agree to such an amendment, but that should they do so then he would recommend to the house that the amendment be accepted. I believe that was the definite statement he made at one stage of his remarks.

Mr. St. Laurent: To my colleagues, I meant, and then to the government, because if I made a recommendation to the house it would involve the responsibility of the whole government. I would have, first of all, to recommend to my colleagues and the government before I could make a recommendation to the house.

Mr. Green: Yes. Well, the point I am trying to make is that if all the provinces agreed to this amendment, then the Prime Minister would recommend to the members of his government that the change should be made. In due course, such a recommendation would be brought to the house. Of course, the offer is still open. It is still possible for all the provincial premiers to approve of this amendment. If they do so, then the Prime Minister, following out his statement of this afternoon, would automatically recommend that amendment to the government and to the house. No doubt in due course the change would be made.

My criticism of his attitude is that he must accept some responsibility to the taxpayers of Canada. On questions of this kind involving taxation from coast to coast and involving a very drastic change in the taxation set-up of Canada, the Prime Minister and the government have a direct responsibility to the Canadian people. He cannot evade that responsibility by saying that if all the provinces ask for this change, then they are going to get it. I repeat that is nothing more or less than an evasion of responsibility.

What is the attitude of the provincial governments? They are offered an opportunity to get the right to levy an indirect sales tax. Naturally, that is a great temptation to them. For example, take the province of British Columbia. In that province a direct sales tax of three per cent is now being levied. Every time any person in that province goes into a store to buy certain goods he has to pay a few coppers, perhaps five or ten cents or perhaps a few dollars if he is buying articles such as furniture. That money has to be paid by him and it is annoying. Every time that tax is paid the buyer is reminded of it, and naturally the provincial government would be very glad to have an opportunity to cover up that tax. I believe any one of us would be severely tempted, if given an opportunity to change over from direct to indirect taxation.

Furthermore, the direct tax is not imposed on foodstuffs. If this indirect tax right were given, I believe you would very soon find that foodstuffs would be taxed because there would be no way for the buyer to trace that tax. There would probably be a wider coverage of goods taxed than there is now under direct taxation.

Some of the provincial governments have said that if they got this power they would not use it. I believe that attitude has been taken because they know that the proposal is unpopular; and in order to mollify the people of their own provinces, the promise is made: "Oh well, let us get this tax, but do not worry; we are not going to levy it." But hon. members can judge for themselves how long that attitude would last if a provincial government should find itself in need of further money.

On one thing they are all agreed, namely that they do not require this additional tax in order to pay their share of the new old age pension which, as we know, is 50 per cent of the pension for people of the ages 65 to 69 inclusive. I believe that the province of British Columbia will have to pay, under the new plan, only a few thousand dollars more than it is paying at the present time. The correspondence from our attorney general shows clearly that British Columbia at least does not need this additional tax in order to be able to implement the new old age pension plan.

This same attorney general, Hon. Gordon Wismer, has shown clearly what he thinks about the proposed tax. He sat here during the conferences. He is a prominent Liberal and a public man of long experience. Just a few weeks ago he made a statement in which he frankly expressed his views of the tax. I have here a clipping from the Vancouver Province dated May 3 containing the heading "Wismer Lashes Tax Proposal as 'Unfair'; Condemns Plan His Own Government Backed." This was after the provincial legislature had passed the resolution to which I referred a few moments ago. Now we have Mr. Wismer telling what he really thinks about it. The clipping reads as follows:

Attorney General Wismer complimented retail merchants Wednesday on their fight to block indirect sales tax powers being given the provincial government.

I am sure the Minister of Justice must feel that is a case of the dog biting the hand that fed it.

"Such a tax would be unfair to public and retailer alike," he said.

Mr. Wismer was addressing the conference which elected W. C. Mainwaring president of the B.C. board Retail Merchants' Association.

Recalling a resolution passed in Victoria endorsing an amendment to the British North America Act, which would have given B.C. the power to apply "hidden taxes"—those included in sales prices—Mr. Wismer said:

And this is a quotation from Mr. Wismer's speech:

"B.C. tentatively agreed in Ottawa to support the amendment although, personally, I knew it was not proper or fair."

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member knows that the treasurer of the province has already said that they would support this amendment.

Mr. Green: Who?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Anscomb, the treasurer of the province.

Mr. Green: I am not speaking for Mr. Anscomb. He will have to speak for himself.

Mr. Martin: He is your leader.

Mr. Green: The quotation continues:

"Quebec has not agreed to it, so it will not go through.

"We did not ask for the amendment and it does not hurt my feelings.

"If we did have such a tax, the retailer would bear the brunt of it."

Surely there could be no more sweeping condemnation of this taxation proposal than the statement made by Mr. Wismer. Yet we have our Prime Minister saying that the offer is still open and that if these provinces agree to take the power, they are going to get it.

Finally, there is the attitude of the people across the country to be considered. I have had representations from many women's groups in Vancouver. They of course are primarily concerned because they believe that this tax would bring about a further increase in the cost of living. I have had these representations from church women's groups and all sorts of associations. I have no doubt that other members of the house of all parties, have had the same representations. If this tax were to be levied it would bring about further inflation and would add to the cost of living. These people who are objecting to it are not political in any way. I believe they are accurately reflecting the views of the men and women out in the constituencies.

There have also been representations from the retail merchants who are concerned because the merchant is going to have all the problems of collecting this tax. In some cases it would be impossible for him to pass it on to the buyer. There can be no doubt that taxation of this kind would be particularly unfair to the small retailer.

I do not believe that there have been in recent years many proposals about which there has been such a unanimous expression of disapproval. The members of the government must know of the editorials which have appeared in papers in all parts of the country. I believe that this proposed tax is thoroughly unpopular, and for a good reason, namely that it is a thoroughly bad tax, if I may again use those words which seemed to rile the Prime Minister so much a few minutes ago. I suggest to him and to the other members of the government that now is the time to put a stop to his foolish proposal and to decide that there will be no such amendment to the British North America Act.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I rise not to discuss the merits or demerits of the proposed tax; I rise at this time because I think that the people of Canada must be badly confused about this question of old age pensions. For the last couple of years particularly most of the members of this house have been discussing the possibility of relieving the aged people of this country, and the government brought forward a program. That program was to abolish the means test at age 70 and to reduce the age limit to 65. That program has been pounded fairly thoroughly into the minds of the Canadian people.

Most of those who are affected think, as they have thought for some months, that at last the members of the House of Commons have got down to business and have worked out a formula whereby their problem is going to be taken care of. They are badly mixed up on that particular angle.

The second thing that they are badly mixed up on is this. We in this house discussed at great length the possibility of Canada's amending her own constitution. A great many nice speeches were made. We were told that Canada at last has grown up, that we go it alone, that from now on we decide our own destiny. Everybody assumed that we had that right, and that matters that were federal in scope could be decided in the House of Commons. But when we get the first test, what happens? The people outside write to members and say that the matter of old age pensions is a federal one. It is a matter dealt with by a federal act that was passed in the first place over the opposition of most of the provinces. After this country has grown up and we have taken the right to amend our own constitution, in order to abolish the means test with regard to old age pensions, we have to apply to the British parliament. The average person is asking himself: In what respect has Canada taken the right to decide her own destiny? Dominion-provincial conferences are called, and the premiers are brought in to decide what is to be done about these two important questions. In my opinion the decision was arrived at in 1945, and the program then brought in by the federal government is the program that we should be discussing in this house at this time. Instead of that we have the minutes of the last conference, and agreement was arrived at so far as the elimination of the means test is concerned. But the other matter is just as important as the first one—the matter of lowering the age limit in the group 65 to 69. The real suffering in this country is in that age group. What is the solution? The solution was offered by the provinces. They said: It is going to cost us considerably more money to accept the lowered age limit. It is going to mean a lot more people on pension in the provinces, and we are going to pay 50 per cent of it.

The premier of Saskatchewan said that it would cost his province at least fourteen per cent more. That money has to be raised. The premier of Nova Scotia apparently considered the imposition of this sales tax very necessary, because in his last budget he budgeted for approximately $1 million which would be raised through this tax, and I think he was budgeting for a deficit of $2 million or $3 million. I would judge from that action that he considers this tax is necessary if he is to implement the lowering of the age limit.

In presenting his case to the dominion-provincial conference, the premier of Newfoundland stated that out of a population of 350,000 they had at that time about 11,000 on pension. He said that if the age limit were lowered it would mean not 11,000 on pension but 22,000. The number will be doubled, and it is an unbearable load to carry so far as Newfoundland is concerned.

To say that the question now before the house, the abolition of this idea of a hidden tax, has no connection with the second part of the program of old age pensions is not correct, because, in my opinion, they are tied together. Most of the provinces in this country will have to depend on raising new revenue somewhere, and this is the way it was suggested the revenue should be raised. In my opinion, you cannot divorce the two questions. It is definitely tied up with the full implementation of the old age pension program, and we are going to have to make decisions on it. Personally I am opposed to the hidden sales tax. We have been over the years, and I have not changed my opinion on it. But the thing I want to focus attention on is this. Let us not kid ourselves into thinking that, by moving a motion in the house that we are not going to pass the sales tax, we are not injuring the latter part of the program of lowering the age limit.

British Columbia might be able to handle her own problems, and possibly Alberta will. Saskatchewan says that they will have to raise fourteen per cent more money for that purpose. That is a problem. Perhaps Ontario can stand on its own feet, and also Quebec; but very definitely New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland are going to have to get a revision in the existing agreements by way of subsidy, or new revenue will have to be found in the province if the sales tax is not to be proceeded with.

The thing I want hon. members to recall is that if we were earnest in advocating the lowering of the age limit, we do not want to brush it off in this house with a motion saying that we are not prepared to pass an amendment in this house to implement the sales tax. I am concerned about Nova Scotia because I know that, unless some new sources of revenue are found, there is not much chance of going through with lowering the age limit to 65. From correspondence I receive and from hundreds of people who visit me when I am back home I know it is in that large group that there is real suffering. Many women who have raised families and have no income are in that large group, and every one of them looks forward to something being done and done quickly. By the look of things now it would appear to me that it might be held off for some considerable time.

I should like to say that in my own province, in lieu of a sales tax, there are things that could be done to raise additional money. For example, there is quite a large gypsum industry in that province. The raw materials are shipped out to the United States. Millions of dollars are lost in the province in the application of royalties. Additional revenue could be raised in that province from that source. The royalty on the sale of coal that was fixed away back many years ago could be stepped up one or two cents and a lot of revenue could be received in that way. I notice that last year the total liquor sales amounted to $21,058,000.52. A five or ten per cent tax on that, or an increase in the price of it, would bring considerable revenue to that province. These methods of raising the additional money to implement the pension at 65 to 69 are things that should be done before we adopt the practice of giving the provinces the right to apply that indirect tax; because as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) pointed out, it is very definitely a change in the whole tax structure.

Anyone who went over some of the Sirois report will agree that that report pretty nearly wrote a new constitution for Canada, and particularly the allocations of the taxation fields suggested in that very comprehensive report. Therefore there are a lot of things that we could do by way of allocating revenue other than changing the constitution to give the provinces the right to apply indirect taxes.

The only reason that I rose was to point this out. Let us not forget for a minute that while some of the provinces may be able to proceed to implement to the full the old age pension proposals that we have been considering for years, yet there are many of the provinces that cannot implement these proposals without some additional ways and means of raising revenue. The best way may be a revision of the agreements between the dominion and the provinces.

No figures are available as to what it is going to cost each province, except what the premiers of Newfoundland and Saskatchewan have said. Some hon. members to whom I have talked will argue that it is not going to cost the provinces any more when they are not contributing on the original basis of 25 per cent; that that 25 per cent is revenue that they are going to have. That is quite true, but at the same time the picture is not going to be the same in every province. It certainly is not going to be the same in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, because in that age group 65 to 69 I am safe in saying you will almost double the number of people on pension. It is much easier to find, say in Newfoundland, 25 per cent of $40 for 11,000 people than it is to find 50 per cent of $40 for 22,000 people, and the picture will change from province to province. I believe it is well for the House of Commons to make up its mind that, so far as we are concerned, the right to change the British North America Act is the prerogative of the House of Commons. We have that say, in the final analysis, regardless of what the provinces may think. And it is right for us to make that known, because there is a dominion-provincial conference coming up in a day or so. This matter is going to be gone into again; and if the premiers are depending upon implementing old age pensions by that method of taxation, then it is just as well for them to know that, so far as we are concerned, we are not prepared to go along with them. We say other means must be devised to raise the additional revenue necessary to bring about full implementation of the old age pension program.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, there is one point in this connection which I think would stand some stressing, a point which has not been greatly stressed, or at least not so much as some others have.

It will be within the memory of hon. members that this question was debated some fifteen years ago—the very same point we have before us now. At that time they backed away from it and the great point made then, which as I understand was given effect to at that time, is that it was really creating a situation where it would be possible to have tariffs between provinces. I say at once to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that the form of the proposed resolution at this time attempts to remove that difficulty—but I shall have a word to say about that later.

Let me read from a speech made on May 19, 1936, by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, who was then leader of the opposition in the Senate. He says this—something with which I am sure we would all agree—

> But hon. members undoubtedly realize that there never could have been a dominion of Canada unless the power to tax by customs and excise was taken from the provinces and reposed in the dominion.

Under questioning at that time as to what the possibilities of such discrimination were the speaker, Mr. Meighen, gave an illustration from New Brunswick where, actually, an attempt had been made to give effect to that kind of discriminatory legislation. I am not sure that it ever was given effect to, but it was on the statute books. It may be that it never got past the stage of validity tests. Undoubtedly, however, it was a clear attempt to impose certain restricted taxes on certain companies. As Mr. Meighen said—

> If goods are manufactured within the province the tax does not apply; if they are manufactured outside the province the tax does apply.

I need not labour that point further, because I am sure if members felt there was a substantial danger of that happening, there would be no disposition whatever to support a resolution of this kind. Therefore I continue for the moment to refer to that particular aspect of the matter.

In this connection I would read from a staff article appearing in the Financial Post of January 27. It raises the question and, while it does not pretend to lay down any dogmatic conclusions, it raises certain questions which were in my own mind. Because one knows that the world is full of ingenious lawyers, when I read the wording of the proposed amendment the question in my mind was: With all the facilities and with all the intricacies of company structure and company relationships, I would think that there would be some people ingenious enough, if not entirely to evade the aim of the resolution, at any rate to create such legal and other difficulties that the world would be filled with cases trying to interpret the section.

I turn now to this article in the Financial Post, because it puts very plainly the point I wish to bring before the house and which it seems to me, even if there is any substantial danger of its happening, should be sufficient to deter us from having any truck or trade with this plan. This staff article, speaking of the proposal, says:

> It is also said to be open to wide possibilities of discrimination as between firms with head office in or outside the province.

On this latter criticism of "discrimination," it is claimed here that something can and will be done to prevent abuse if and when it arises, but that this matter has not been broached now because Ottawa would not wish to imply that any province would be likely to be guilty of applying the proposed amendment in discriminating fashion.

It is delightful to read of the charitable and magnanimous nature of Ottawa. But we have already got considerable evidence that it is not a matter of theory, but rather a matter of tactics. The provinces would be very glad to avail themselves of the right to discriminate, if the way was open for them to do so. I continue to read:

> In the draft legislation forwarded to the provinces, there is a safeguard against any tax which would hinder interprovincial trade, but none specifically aimed at the more subtle discrimination that might arise if the provincial authority were to pass regulations to favour firms with head office within its own boundaries.

That of course was done in the case of the New Brunswick statute to which I referred a short time ago. And, without labouring the matter further, I think it would be very unrealistic to dismiss as quite impossible devices of that kind. I do not think we should undertake to sit in judgment on the provinces concerned, either. Once they get this right they will be wanting to use it for the benefit of their own citizens. That is their duty; that is what they are elected for. And if we are to abandon this primary safeguard which the fathers of confederation thought was essential, and which fifteen years ago was thought so essential that legislation, as I understand it, was then abandoned, it seems to me we ought to stop, look and listen.

There is one other point I wish to bring out from this same issue of the Financial Post. This is a very interesting statement made by Mr. J. R. Petrie, director of research of the Canadian Tax Foundation, and a recognized tax expert. I read this brief paragraph from what he says. After making various other comments, he added:

> The year 1951 is likely to be a turning point in our peacetime fiscal history. Important policy decisions are in the making. As important as any is the decision on sales tax policy. There is still time to reappraise our over-all requirements and to formulate a policy which will really reach the root of the sales tax problem.
> If the current proposals, which are not yet public, simply involve a concession to the provinces to levy indirect sales tax, even though some limitation be placed on the concession, they represent a retreat from the problem rather than a solution to it. Constructive policy is needed urgently. Now is the time to produce it.

The only observation I wish to add is that, notwithstanding what the Prime Minister said as to the position of the House of Commons—the house seems like a conduit pipe for forwarding the views of the provinces, though perhaps that is an exaggeration —it does seem to me that if we wait until the provinces, let us say, have agreed to recommend a certain course, then I would have thought it would be extremely difficult for this House of Commons to snub them by saying, "You all wanted it, but now you cannot have it".

I understood the Prime Minister this afternoon to go to the length of saying that if, in fact, the ten provinces came along and asked for it, the matter was pretty well decided, so far as we are concerned. If I understood him correctly he said that if that happened he would then submit the matter to his colleagues and—again, if my recollection is right—the matter would be put before the house. We have had a considerable amount of experience as to what happens when something is put before the house by this government. We do not have to make many guesses as to what happens then. Whatever other qualities our friends of the Liberal party may have, we can certainly accord to them the praise which goes to well disciplined troops.

The Prime Minister seemed to indicate that we were merely going to leave it to the provinces. I felt that he felt that it would be rather improper for us to have views on this, but I suggest that if we do not have views now it may be practically too late for us to have them later on.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) I hope will not be offended if I tell him that I am more interested in what he says than in what was said years ago by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. The hon. gentleman is familiar with the law and he must know that the basis of confederation is the exclusiveness of the respective jurisdictions. Does he consider the constitution to be a straitjacket on Ottawa and the provinces? It was for a time. That is the reason why Ottawa has paid three-quarters of the cost of old age pensions and has left the management to the provinces. This was done supposedly in order to respect the constitution.

What is the purpose of a dominion-provincial conference if it is not to provide an opportunity to representatives of the federal government and the provinces to discuss matters of mutual concern and to reach agreement with respect to modern times? I can tell my hon. friend that very few people are for streamlining the constitution. That is not the point. The point is that we are facing new issues. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) mentioned the agreements between Ottawa and the provinces in connection with the assumption of responsibility for the payment of pensions to needy persons between the ages of 65 and 69 years.

This is a new proposal. If the provinces have not sufficient revenue to pay the share they have agreed to pay in order to provide pensions for these unfortunate people who are not self-supporting, then the only thing to do is to secure enough money in order to do that. If all the provinces are in unison, if they all agree, what can we do? If that is the general desire of the people, can we place obstacles in their way? Can we tell them that just because it was decided by the fathers of confederation that there was to be no change in the constitution this cannot be done? That was the idea in the back of the heads of the fathers of confederation. The British North America Act was not intended to be changed and that is why we have so much trouble about it.

We live in different times. My hon. friend knows that. The representatives of the provinces from Newfoundland to British Columbia have their own responsibilities. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) referred to his professor of Roman law. He was mine also. He is a man for whom I have great regard, but he was not a success as a politician. He had the responsibility of imposing certain taxes that were unpopular and he suffered defeat. He had to decide what tax should be imposed upon the people of his province.

It is the responsibility of the premiers to discuss matters that come within their jurisdiction. It is true that Ottawa cannot interfere with the jurisdiction of the provinces or infringe upon it, but when all the premiers attend a dominion-provincial conference and agree to do a certain thing provided they are given the means to do it, it is a matter for their judgment to decide what taxes shall be imposed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Supposing all the ten provinces decided that they wanted a certain change made in connection with taxes to which this house manifestly would object, would we still have to approve it?

Mr. Pouliot: When there is unanimity among the provinces it is hard for Ottawa to oppose it. The hon. member knows that. If he were Prime Minister of Canada he would make the same speech as the Prime Minister did, except the reference to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). That would have been the only difference.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

On the order for private bills:

Mr. J. W. Welbourn (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, if I could have unanimous consent I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore):

That Bill No. 269, an act to incorporate Independent Pipe Line Company (letter D-8 of the Senate), be dealt with as the first order of business at this time.

My reasons for desiring to make this motion are the same as those outlined last Friday evening.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since the hon. member has not unanimous consent I cannot put the motion.

IDA WEINSTEIN YAPHE

The house in committee on Bill No. 124 for the relief of Ida Weinstein Yaphe—Mr. Weir—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Hansell: I should like to ask one or two questions on this bill. I notice in this evidence, as in a good deal of the evidence submitted in these cases, that questions as to connivance and collusion were asked. One can get a fair idea of whether or not a witness understands what he or she is going through and is being questioned about by reading the evidence. Sometimes witnesses do not appear to have a very clear understanding of some of the questions asked, but when they are asked whether there has been any connivance the answer is given immediately, no; or if there has been any collusion, the answer is immediately given, no. This causes one to wonder whether or not the person giving evidence knows the exact meaning of those terms. Those questions were asked and answered in this case, and that gives rise to some suspicion. That is not so in some cases; it is so here. I notice that in this case the deputy chairman did not ask the person giving evidence whether she understood these terms. Evidentally he took it for granted that the witness did understand them.

The Deputy Chairman: May I ask the hon. member when he refers to the chairman of the Senate committee on divorce to so state in order to avoid confusion.

Mr. Hansell: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I made that mistake a week ago and I shall try not to repeat it. When the answers were given to the questions as to connivance and collusion, the deputy chairman of the divorce committee did not ask the witness whether or not she knew what the terms really meant. I can quite understand that lawyers may brief their witnesses to make certain they understand these questions, and I suppose to some extent that is permissible; but even at that I am not fully satisfied that it is the proper way to approach these cases. Might I ask the sponsor of this bill whether or not he is certain the witness in this case knew the meaning of those two terms.

Mr. Weir: I think that is very obvious from the positive answers she gave to the questions she was asked.

Mr. Hansell: That is rather an abrupt answer. I fancy the sponsor of the bill was waiting for that question, but he really has not answered it. He says that is obvious. I am asking a question which can be answered.

Mr. Weir: This witness was sworn, and she must have given the evidence as it is set out in the printed report from which my hon. friend is reading. Nothing further I could add would place any greater emphasis on the evidence she gave.

Mr. Hansell: I agree that perhaps there is nothing further the sponsor of the bill can add, but there is still the question whether or not the witness understood. I fancy the sponsor of the bill does not know; and as a matter of fact I am wondering whether he understands the difference between the two terms.

Some hon. Members: Do you?

Mr. Hansell: If hon. members will look at Hansard for last Friday night they will find that I put on record the difference between the two words as explained by the chairman of the divorce committee in the other place.

Private Bills—Divorce

YVETTE ERNESTINE GAGNON LYONS

The house in committee on Bill No. 126, for the relief of Yvette Ernestine Gagnon Lyons—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Hansell: You were going a little too fast for me, Mr. Chairman. Are we on Bill No. 126?

The Deputy Chairman: We are now on Bill No. 126, section 1.

Mr. Hansell: I should like to say something about this case, because it is very interesting to follow the methods of some of these investigators. I do not call them investigators; I choose to call them something else.

Mr. Weir: What else do you call them?

Mr. Hansell: Well, I think I would call them keyhole peekers, or snoopers. I doubt very much whether they would get very far in life. This is one job where a little muscle might be of some use. I notice that most of them put their foot in the door and push their way in, then begin to toss things around a little bit.

This investigator answers a question. The question is, "Anybody else?" The answer is:

and then I asked the house detective, Mr. Desjardins, to come up to meet me, because he had a master key.

Now, there was a hotel detective in this case, and the investigator asked this hotel detective to come up with him so he could unlock the door. He said:

I did not want to take no chance.

That is a double negative there, but I guess we will not have to spend too much time criticizing this snooper's grammar. Will the sponsor of this bill say, since there was a house detective there who went in and discovered the situation, whether that house detective took any steps to have this man arrested for his misdemeanours?

Before the sponsor of this bill answers that question, might I point out something that I think is more or less commendable in this case. This witness is giving evidence and the attorney, in questioning the witness says:

It was pointed out to me yesterday, and I will try to follow the terms—I hope the witness understands them. Have you in any way connived at this adultery? Do you know what that means?

A. I am not too sure.

Well, that shows that this witness is honest, and is giving an honest answer to the question. Then, the Hon. Mr. Howden says:

Have you had anything to do with bringing your husband and this woman together?

A. Oh, gracious me! No.

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Chairman, I believe that the evidence in these divorce cases should not be repeated in committee. This evidence was given in camera, and is regarded as privileged. I do not believe it is proper, therefore, to have it regaled here and sent out in the public press and over the radio. I can refer you, Mr. Chairman, to Beauchesne with respect to statements which are offensive to members of the house. I shall not go any further than that. I say that this is very offensive to a good many members of the house, and therefore out of order.

It is quite proper to say that we have received from another house the report of a committee dealing with a certain divorce. The facts are there and the committee recommends a certain procedure. Very well, we shall accept their recommendations. But I say that we may not go into the sordid details of the events which led up to the application for divorce. We could amend the Criminal Code, but we may not use offensive language with respect to the facts which are brought out here. I could give you the reference, and later I will gladly give you chapter and verse which prohibits any pornographic or lewd material being placed before the House of Commons.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member has raised a question of privilege, and has referred the chairman to Beauchesne, third edition, particularly the citation referring to offensive language. I should like to ask him to what particular citation he desires to refer.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): If the chairman would postpone the decision on the matter and let it stand until the next meeting of the committee, I would be glad to give him chapter and verse.

The Deputy Chairman: I am afraid I cannot do that. Since it is a question of privilege, it must be taken up immediately. Does the hon. member for Simcoe North wish to speak on the point of privilege?

Mr. Ferguson: Yes. May I point out to the hon. member that we are elected by the people to do our duty, and one duty happens to be acting as a court in the passing of these divorce bills. It may be unfortunate from various angles, but it is part of our duty. Surely, we cannot pass all these bills blindfolded. If any member desires to bring out all the harrowing details in order to get a clear picture of what we are passing, then he is free to do so. If it is offensive to any member of the committee, he has the privilege of all other members, and that is to retire and not pass acts he knows nothing about.

The Deputy Chairman: I am afraid it may not be useful to have too lengthy a discussion on this question. It is true that the reports of the evidence in these divorce cases are the results of the taking of evidence in camera. The public is not invited to the sittings of the divorce committee, nor is the press able to attend. When the evidence comes here and is discussed in the house by hon. members, I quite understand the feelings of the hon. member for Cariboo.

Hon. members will recall that he raised a point of order last week along the same lines as his question of privilege this evening. I would say to him that should it be considered by hon. members of this committee that the reading of the evidence is of such a nature that the people in the gallery, for instance, should not hear that evidence, the only move for him to make would be to ask that the galleries be cleared. Because of the seriousness of the matter, I would report to Mr. Speaker, and Mr. Speaker would put the motion as to whether or not strangers should be ordered to withdraw from the galleries.

The hon. member referred to citations in Beauchesne, third edition, but if he does not mind I shall use the second edition because I have it here. This is the section in which offensive language as used by members is discussed. I do not believe it is offensive for any hon. member of this house to use documentary evidence with which one can study the clauses of a bill. I refer the hon. member to citation 294 of Beauchesne, second edition, which reads as follows:

> If a member should say nothing disrespectful to the house or the chair, or personally opprobrious to other members, or in violation of other rules of the house he may state whatever he thinks fit in debate, however offensive it may be to the feelings, or injurious to the character, of individuals; and he is protected by his privilege from any action for libel, as well as from any other question or molestation.

The hon. member for Macleod has said nothing which I believe to be offensive to hon. members. He referred to the investigators as snoopers, and in other qualified terms. He does that on his own responsibility. The only persons to whom he could not refer in this house in derisive or offensive manner are the presiding officers of courts, judges, high officials. I have not before me the citation in Beauchesne, third edition, but I am sure that it is there. I will therefore say that the hon. member for Macleod is in order to carry on in the way he is doing.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): If I may, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one remark. I bow to your ruling, of course; but if the evidence with respect to these divorce cases is to be discussed in the house, I do not think that hon. members should quote one paragraph, one page or one section of that evidence only; I think that the evidence should be quoted in full so that the house would have before it the full information with regard to the matter.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member is being ridiculous.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): It is a serious matter. My colleague has been a judge of the juvenile court; and other hon. gentlemen have acted as magistrates; and at times, when certain cases have come up, the court has been cleared, the press has been excluded and every effort was made to see that justice should prevail. In this great court, the House of Commons, are we to set aside all those rulings and allow this place to become a common sewer for the offal of the city of Montreal and other cities?

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: I think that the matter has been discussed fully. As I told the hon. member for Cariboo, since he raised the point of order the other evening, I have thought about the seriousness of the problem that might be involved. Hon. members, by citing parts of the evidence, go into details which, of course, it may not be proper to disclose before the house with strangers in the gallery and also members of the press. I inquired as to how this evidence was taken before the Senate committee on divorce, and I came to the conclusion either that I myself should decide to report to Mr. Speaker that the gallery be cleared, or that a member move that I do so. To me, that is the only solution.

Mr. Graydon: May I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman? Is not the argument that has arisen over this point a further indication of the necessity for this parliament not dealing with things of this kind at all?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. That is not a question of privilege. The hon. member for Macleod has the floor.

Mr. Hansell: I will not prolong the discussion of the hon. member's point of privilege. Nothing would be gained by that. I do not think it is necessary to clear any galleries. We have not read anything that might be offensive. In fact, some of us have skirted all round the matter in order to avoid being offensive, and have put a great deal of this evidence in our own language. The hon. member for Lethbridge says that I am not saying anything that I would not say in the pulpit on Sunday. Sometimes that may be offensive; I do not know. However, the logic of the hon. member for Cariboo was so profound that it left me petrified, and I have almost forgotten the question I was going to ask.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I have given a ruling on that point. Clause 1.

Mr. Hansell: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. Might I ask the hon. member who sponsors this bill whether or not the house detective in this case who found this man guilty of a misdemeanour took any steps to have him arrested?

Mr. Winkler: Does the hon. member refer to the investigator or to the house detective?

Mr. Hansell: Perhaps the hon. member who sponsors this bill has not read the evidence. In order to get into this room the investigator got "pally" with the hotel detective because he had a key to the room. Surely, if there is a hotel detective, he must be there for some purpose; and I fancy that purpose is to keep law and order.

Mr. Graydon: It is a matter of property and civil rights.

Mr. Hansell: That might be so. But if he is there to do his duty, I am wondering if he did it and had this man arrested. I am wondering if my hon. friend has any information on that point.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member is going to go into the details of this evidence—

An hon. Member: We cannot hear a word of what he says, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): —I would move that you do report to Mr. Speaker in order that he may take the sense of the house as to whether or not the galleries should be cleared.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Cariboo has moved that I do report to the Speaker in order that he may take the sense of the house as to whether or not the galleries should be cleared. If anyone wishes to speak to the motion—

Mr. Weir: Is the motion in writing?

Mr. Casselman: It should be in writing.

Mr. Hansell: Is the point debatable, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: No; it is not a debatable motion. But the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas indicates that the motion should be in writing.

Mr. Casselman: That is right.

The Deputy Chairman: It is not necessary in this case.

Mr. Casselman: It always is.

[Mr. Hansell.]

The Deputy Chairman: It is an old formula. The hon. member could have said: I spy strangers. This formula has been used before in this house. As I say, if an hon. member makes that motion, I must accept it. My duty now, as I see it, is to report to Mr. Speaker so that he can take the sense of the house on the matter.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, will you accept a point of order?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: I see nothing in standing order 13 that makes it necessary to call in Mr. Speaker.

And Mr. Speaker having resumed the chair:

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Beaudoin of the committee of the whole has reported that the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) has requested that the sense of the house should be taken in order that the galleries should be cleared. Standing order 13 reads:

> If any member takes notice that strangers are present, Mr. Speaker or the Chairman (as the case may be), shall forthwith put the question, that strangers be ordered to withdraw, without permitting any debate or amendment.

Is it the wish of the house that strangers be ordered to withdraw?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Then I take it that the motion does not carry?

Some hon. Members: Correct.

Mr. Coldwell: Call the yeas and nays.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the sponsor of this bill whether he was able to get the information I asked for the other night, namely, as to what the practice of the Senate committee is in the matter of reducing fees? To how low a figure do they go?

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, the Clerk of the Senate sent me the following memorandum. Since it is very brief I will read it:

The parliamentary fees payable on divorce petitions under Rule 140 amount to $210. In cases where it is shown to the satisfaction of the committee on divorce that the applicant is unable to bear this expense the fees are usually reduced to $125, and in a few special cases to as low as $75.

For the present session, of 280 petitions heard to date, the fees were reduced as follows:
In 17 cases fees reduced to $125.
In 8 cases fees reduced to $100.
In 4 cases fees reduced to $75.

The reason that the fees are usually reduced to the sum of $125 is that the cost of printing the evidence, bill, et cetera, is approximately that amount.

L. C. Moyer,
Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. Knowles: One of the reasons why I asked the question on this bill, Mr. Chairman, is that I was surprised there was no reduction of the fees in this case because it is the wife who is seeking the divorce and she seems to be having a difficult time. She has to work for her own support. She has two children whom she is helping to support. In using the word "helping" I have in mind the fact that she and her two children live with her father and mother. It appears from the evidence that there was no assistance from the husband. I had thought that this might have been a case where a reduction in the fees would have been in order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, this is a case where the fees were reduced, in spite of the fact that there do not happen to be any children.

I should like to ask one other question with regard to the fees. When fees are reduced in the Senate do I understand that in such cases, where the poverty of the client is pleaded and the fees are reduced, the lawyer in the case is required to submit a statement as to the amount that he is charging his client?

Mr. Winkler: I have been told that in cases such as that outlined by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the Senate tells the lawyer what he is to get.

MABEL CAROLINE LAY REDBURN MCCORMICK

The house in committee on Bill No. 133, for the relief of Mabel Caroline Lay Redburn McCormick—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knight: I am sorry that two or three of these bills have been passed without what I consider any examination, or any thorough examination, which would justify us in breaking up a home on these terms, without knowing anything about the conditions.

I notice that this bill is sponsored by a private member, the hon. member for Lisgar. I was going to suggest that a great number of these bills are sponsored by the same private member. May I suggest that since there are some other private members' bills on the order paper, they may want to get them before the house. If there is any way consistent with a thorough examination of these divorce bills, I wish that they might be allowed to stand so that the private members who have bills on the order paper might get a chance at them. As I say, these bills are all sponsored by the same private member, except one sponsored by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa, and with all respect to the hon. gentleman, for whom we all have the highest respect, I think he is getting too much of his share. Of the private members' bills on the order paper of the House of Commons of today's date, May 22, we find that on page 19 there are three private bills, one sponsored by the hon. member for Simcoe East, one sponsored by the hon. member for Skeena and one by the hon. member for Hamilton East. I think that these gentlemen should have a chance to get their bills before the house. I wish they could get them before this house, but only with some method which is consistent with a thorough examination of these divorce bills. Apparently what we have to do is to give these things a thorough examination, and I think we shall have to do just that. Personally, I should be very glad if it could be arranged that these other private bills—

Mr. Cameron: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member must speak to the bill and not discuss procedure generally. Therefore I would ask him to speak to the bill.

Mr. Knight: The hon. member has asked me whether I would permit a question. Certainly I shall do that, but I will not say I shall be able to answer it.

Mr. Cameron: Does the hon. member not think that the proceedings which took place before the committee of the other house, dealing with these matters, and the consideration and care which are given to these matters when they come before the committee on miscellaneous private bills, do not indicate that they have been carefully gone into?

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member is now asking a question of a general nature relating to divorce procedure in the other place. It is not in order to do so on section 1 of the bill.

Mr. Cameron: I was following the argument of the hon. member, and answering him.

[Mr. Knight.]

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Saskatoon may continue.

Mr. Knight: I would be delighted to answer the question but—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, I could not allow the hon. member to answer the question. Only this bill is before the committee.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, I was just proceeding to say that I would make no attempt to answer the hon. member's question, although I would be delighted to do so if the rules permitted.

We are now discussing Bill No. 133. The lady in this instance is suing her husband for a divorce. I am interested in this case, as I have been in others, because there is the question of the custody of a thirteen-year-old child. It is one of those unfortunate cases in which the children suffer for the sins of their fathers, or in some cases their mothers—or, I am afraid, in many cases, both of them.

At any rate there is the question of this thirteen-year-old child. The court in the other place makes no provision for the care of the children. It simply says that the marriage is dissolved. Then these people have to come to as friendly an arrangement as possible, or have to go through further court proceedings, with further expense, to decide upon who shall have the custody of the child. In some instances the custody has remained with the guilty person. Surely that must be unfortunate from the point of view of the moralist. In some cases the child has lived with its grandmother, and in other cases with anyone who would keep it. In other words, the child is out on the street.

I suppose there is no use asking the sponsor of the bill if he knows anything about the custody of the child in this case—or does he know?

Mr. Winkler: The custody of children, I take it, is not within the jurisdiction of this committee, or of any committee of this house.

Mr. Knight: Before resuming my seat I should like to say another word about the case. There has been some criticism of the type of investigator employed in these particular cases, and also the type of witnesses—I was going to call them exhibits—used. Perhaps the proper term is co-respondents.

I would point out that in this case, as in many others to which we have referred, the name of the co-respondent was not discovered during the investigation carried out by the Senate committee. The name was not asked for. Sometimes the name is asked for, and the lawyer on the other side of the case will say that that has no bearing. Here is a woman who was seen—and that is enough. It is strange that while the investigators were astute enough to find out everything else that happened, they could not find the name of the co-respondent.

I am firmly of the belief that today there are people who are professionally working at this game of giving professional evidence in these divorce cases, and that without shadow of a doubt they are faked cases.

Mr. Ferguson: Speaking to this bill, let me say that this is a great exhibition that is taking place in the Dominion of Canada. One must realize that it costs about $2,000 for every forty minutes the house is in session.

An hon. Member: More than that.

Mr. Ferguson: That is the minimum. Here is a group of men in the House of Commons, men without any experience in these cases, with very few exceptions—and those exceptions would be the members connected with the legal fraternity. We are making a farce of divorce; and in this particular case—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member is discussing divorce generally.

Mr. Ferguson: No, I am discussing this particular bill.

The Deputy Chairman: Oh, no; when the hon. member says that the House of Commons is making a farce of divorce cases, he is not referring to this particular bill, section 1. I must ask him to confine his remarks to the section before the committee.

Mr. Ferguson: I have Bill No. 133 in my hand. Here is the evidence—truthful and untruthful. In most instances in Canada we attempt to follow precedents, and that is a good practice. In the past, experience has been a great teacher. Surely in this year of 1951, trying this particular case, the particular government in office, with more power than any previous government, could put this law on a basis where members of the House of Commons would not be asked to pass upon this particular bill, and to act in the disgraceful, illegal and unethical manner in which we have to act when passing these bills.

It is time members of the House of Commons put their foot down and demanded that, so long as we are going to be asked to pass on this particular bill, the laws of the Dominion of Canada should be amended so that there would be a proper court set up to pass upon this bill, from now on.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, in looking over the evidence in this case I find it is almost identical with that of Bill No. 123, which I discussed on Tuesday evening. The same investigators were used and the same story told to the committee:

By the Clerk of the Committee:
Q. Tell me your full name?
A. Harry Maxham.
Q. And your age?
A. 36.
Q. Where do you live?
A. Montreal.
Q. What is your occupation?
A. Private investigator.

Then the private investigator proceeded to give evidence and said that he saw the man, and followed him on several occasions. He saw him with a woman, and followed them to an hotel. He said that he saw them register, that he then proceeded to room No. 3.

An hon. Member: The same room?

Mr. Coldwell: He says he knocked at the door, and that the door was unlatched, and "I entered the room by using force against the unlocked door." Looking at the evidence of this same man in the other case, Bill 123, which was before us last Tuesday evening, I find that he said, "We forced our way into the room"—in similar circumstances and described almost in the same language.

I want to say it is about time these bills were removed from the House of Commons and placed in the courts.

Mr. Ferguson: An awful waste of the public's money.

Mr. Coldwell: There may be reasons why this bill should be passed; but it seems to me we are getting too many bills with evidence of the type I have just referred to, and with the same investigators appearing time after time and giving the same sort of evidence. I object to being made a party to the passage of bills of this description in the House of Commons. We are going to see to it, as the days go by, either that something different is done or these bills be not passed at all.

Mr. Winkler: I have no further information than is contained in the printed evidence, and it does not appear here.

Mr. Knowles: I believe that that applies only when the fees of the Senate are reduced or remitted. If the petitioner pays the full fee to the Senate the lawyer does not have to say what he is charging his client for his work on the case.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the remark that was made on an earlier bill there is a question I should like to ask with respect to this one. The remark I refer to was to the effect that these bills received careful consideration in the House of Commons committee on miscellaneous private bills. Can the hon. member for Lisgar tell me the length of time that was given by that committee to the consideration of Bill No. 138?

The Deputy Chairman: Is that question pertinent to the principle of this clause which concerns the dissolution of the marriage of these two people? I do not think that that question is in order.

Mr. Knowles: Before we are asked to accept the report of a committee of this house that this marriage should be dissolved we have the right to ask the chairman of that committee what consideration was given by the committee to the bill before it recommended its passing.

Mr. Winkler: I was asked that question before and the answer given was that the bills were all considered in bulk. That is the answer that applies.

Mr. Coldwell: How long did the meeting last in which these bills were considered in bulk?

Mr. Winkler: I did not time it.

JACQUELINE YVONNE SUZANNE STUCKER GRANT

The house in committee on Bill No. 142, for the relief of Jacqueline Yvonne Suzanne Stucker Grant—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Are any children involved in this case?

Mr. Winkler: I have not got up to that evidence yet and I do not know whether there are or not. I suggest that the hon. member read that himself.

Mr. Knowles: There is the point. We have put through several divorce bills in a couple of minutes—

Mr. Robinson: On a point of order: on several occasions on clause 1 of these bills questions have been asked with regard to the children. I do not think that such questions are relevant under section 1, which provides merely for the dissolution of the marriage, and I would ask for your ruling on that point.

Mr. Knowles: When this House of Commons is asked to dissolve the marriage of a husband and wife—many hon. members say it should not take place at all—we have the right to ask whether there were any children of the marriage. That question is frequently asked by the Senate committee and I think we have the right to have that information before we are called upon to pass on the dissolution of the marriage.

The Deputy Chairman: If questions pertaining to the children have not been asked in the Senate committee on divorce no one here can answer them because the witnesses did not appear before the committee on private bills. If the information does not appear in the printed evidence, no one here can give it. As to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Simcoe East, I would think there is something in his point. I doubt whether it is in order to ask questions about the children and what treatment they are going to receive. It is not within our jurisdiction to deal with children. The only reason I thought that perhaps questions with regard to the children might be allowed was that it is a well known fact that in doubtful cases the decision of the Senate committee on divorce might be affected one way or another when there are children. But we have no jurisdiction as far as children are concerned and I would ask hon. members to consider that fact in future discussions.

Mr. Knowles: May I make just one comment on that point of order. We know that we have no jurisdiction over children, but we do have power to pass or turn down a bill. Our decision to pass or turn down a bill may depend upon what is going to happen to the children. That is why we are anxious to know about the children.

Mr. Winkler: There are no children involved in this case.

SUPPLY

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—TURNOVER TAX OF THREE PER CENT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) that the house go into committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Fulton.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Before the question is put I think I should ask the opinion of members of the house as to whether or not the amendment is in order. I have not been able to find a similar amendment. The motion before the house is that I leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply. The amendment is:

> That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house is of the opinion that further consideration should not be given to the proposal to authorize by amendment to the British North America Act an indirect provincial sales tax of three per cent.

Upon reading the speech from the throne I find it contains a reference to legislation to amend the constitution, and I am sure that reference is to the legislation referred to in the amendment now before the house. It occurs to me that the house has come to the decision that it will consider an amendment of the constitution if and when presented. Another difficulty I find is that this amendment appears to anticipate by a negative motion certain legislation foreshadowed in the speech from the throne, which may or may not come before the house.

I am very doubtful whether the amendment is in order. I have given it very careful consideration for the reason, as I have said already, that it appears to be without precedent. If any hon. member cares to make any observations I shall be very glad to hear them.

Mr. Fulton: It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that perhaps the first thing one should consider in this connection is the citations in Beauchesne which refer to the moving of amendments to the motion that Your Honour leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply. The first is citation 345 at page 137 of the third edition, and it reads in part as follows:

> The ancient doctrine that the redress of grievances should be considered before the grant of supplies is maintained in the House of Commons of Canada by the provision of standing order 49 that the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair can be amended; and the amendments need not be relevant but may relate to every question connected with public administration.

The other citation is No. 467, at page 174 of the same volume:

> Whenever an order of the day has been read for the house to resolve itself into the committee of supply or the committee of ways and means, the motion "that the Speaker do now leave the chair" must be proposed, except on Thursday and Friday as provided by standing order 28. When such motion is proposed, it shall be permissible to discuss any public matter within the powers of the federal parliament or to ask for the redress of any grievance . . .

It seems to me the wording of those two citations, particularly citation 345, which says it is competent to a member to move an amendment which need not be relevant but may refer to any question connected with public administration, indicates that the subject matter of this amendment, which is the amendment of the constitution and the imposition of a three per cent sales tax, a subject which is before a dominion-provincial conference, certainly is a matter affecting public administration which if decided in the conference would require an address of this house before such an amendment of the constitution could be made. So it seems to me the matter of the amendment is quite within the scope of the two citations referred to.

Then to deal with the point made by Your Honour that there was reference to constitutional amendments in the speech from the throne, and the speech from the throne having been voted already that might preclude further consideration of this question through a substantive motion at this time, it seems to me, though I have not the citations before me at the moment, the relevant rule there is that a matter on which a decision has once been reached cannot subsequently be raised at another stage in the session. But does it not seem to Your Honour, as it does to me, that this rule refers to questions which themselves have been the subject of motions, amendments or subamendments and have been decided by a vote? I doubt very much whether it would be feasible to extend the rule to apply to the whole subject matter of the speech from the throne. If one particular phase of the speech from the throne is made the subject of a specific motion or amendment, I suggest that it is not proper to extend the rule to apply to the whole speech, but that only the one part which has been made the subject of a motion may not be raised again. If you were to say that once the speech from the throne has been adopted no motion referring to any of the subject matters of the speech from the throne could be made, debate in the house would be almost pointless, and the field within which one could bring up a subject would be so restricted as to almost eliminate debate during the session. Indeed it would be almost impossible to move an amendment to a budget motion, because some matter on which it was desired to move an amendment there might have been referred to in the speech from the throne. Supposing the speech from the throne said, "It is anticipated that it will be necessary to lay before you proposals for higher taxation to meet defence costs." To extend the rule in the way it seems to me Your Honour has indicated would mean we could not move an amendment on the budget because, the speech from the throne having been adopted, Your Honour would say that had been decided already.

So it seems to me that unless a particular part of the speech from the throne has been made the subject of an amendment or a motion, the rule to which Your Honour has referred does not preclude it from being made the subject of an amendment or a motion at a later stage in the session. This particular question of constitutional amendments was not the subject of any prior motion or amendment this session, and I submit therefore it is open to a member at this stage to move a substantive resolution or amendment dealing with that subject.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to take part in this debate on the regularity of this amendment. When studying the case yesterday and today I thought the test might be that if a member were entitled to move a private resolution such as we have on the order paper at the beginning of the session, in about the same terms as this amendment, then the amendment could not be declared out of order. On the other hand when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) spoke he laid great stress on the speech from the throne, and I think even read the two references to these negotiations with the provinces. Once the speech from the throne is carried I do not think a private member can anticipate any legislation that may be based upon it. The speech from the throne says:

The provincial governments are at present giving consideration to these proposals and to proposals for constitutional amendments which may require to be submitted to you before the close of the present session.

Now, this was debated in the house and decided in the affirmative. When a member can stand up and tell the government, "Well, you cannot bring in legislation to amend the constitution after having had an affirmative vote on the speech from the throne", that would, in my mind, be the strongest point to support the opinion that the amendment is out of order.

There is only one earlier case to which I shall refer. It is not similar to this one, but it is a decision of Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Mr. Glen. It is found at page 631 of Beauchesne, third edition, and concerns a subamendment to the amendment moved by the opposition. It was ruled out of order. The subamendment was moved by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). The headnote on that decision reads:

On the motion for the address in reply to the speech from the throne, a subamendment expressing regrets that His Excellency's advisers are contemplating a reversal of policy cannot be entertained because it deals with future action, is based on an unapproved assumption and seems to be holding the government responsible for something it has not yet done.

That is the only decision I could find which has some similarity to the present amendment. I believe, as has always been the case in the past, your decision will satisfy everyone.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that you would give your earnest consideration to this before reaching such a decision as you have indicated is a possibility, because I would suggest, with deference, that a decision that this motion is not in order, for the reasons suggested, would constitute a most dangerous precedent. After all, the book to which we refer so frequently for guidance in reaching decisions on matters of this kind constitutes very largely the record of precedents established in the very manner in which we are now dealing with the subject under consideration. The suggestion has been made that this motion is not in order because of a reference to the subject matter of this motion in the speech from the throne. May I refer you, Mr. Speaker, to the appropriate paragraph in Beauchesne, third edition, page 174, the paragraph numbered 467. That paragraph makes it clear that it is the established practice, and that it is appropriate, to raise by way of such a motion as this any subject that it is competent for this house to deal with, save the exceptions which have in themselves been established by the precedents which have accumulated over the years in this house through decisions such as that which might be made at this time.

Now, the only exception to the right to bring before the house a subject that it is appropriate for this house to discuss at any time is, of course, that it shall not relate to some motion already on the order paper. I shall quote Beauchesne, third edition, at page 174:

. . . shall not relate to any decision of the house during the current session, nor to any item of the estimates, nor to any resolution to be proposed to the committee of ways and means, nor to any matter placed on or whereof notice has been given in the order paper.

Now, working back, it is quite obvious there is no notice on the order paper that precludes consideration of a motion of this nature. Second, there is nothing in any motion proposing that something go to the committee of ways and means that precludes consideration of this amendment. This does not deal with any item of estimates which we shall be called upon to consider. Therefore, the only exception which could possibly be raised against the consideration of this motion is that there has been a decision of this house during the current session in regard to the subject matter of the motion.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) said that I had laid great stress on the speech from the throne. I laid great stress on the speech from the throne only to the extent that it was in the speech from the throne itself that the word "proposal" was used to describe the amendment to the British North America Act which is under consideration. But let us see whether there has been placed before the house in the speech from the throne anything which calls for a decision. This, Mr. Speaker, I submit is the key to whether or not the exception would relate to a decision by the house.

What was said in the speech from the throne was simply this, as it appears at page 2 of Hansard for January 30:

The provincial governments are at present giving consideration to these proposals and to proposals for constitutional amendments which may require to be submitted to you before the close of the present session.

That, Mr. Speaker, is simply information communicated to the house. My reference to this was not because any decision had been reached on that but because it was in that very paragraph that one of these amendments, which is of course the amendment under consideration, was described as a proposal along with the other amendments. No decision has been reached by the house in regard to a statement prepared by the government and placed in spoken form by His Majesty's representatives. All that this says is that the provincial governments are at present giving consideration to these proposals. Mr. Speaker, it did not require any decision of this house to determine whether or not that was so. The fact that the house has not tried to declare that they were not being considered by the provincial governments neither strengthens nor does it weaken the argument in favour of permitting an amendment of this kind.

It is only by carrying a precedent of this kind to the point of absurdity that one can see just where a decision of this nature would lead. Let me refer to another statement of a similar nature in the speech from the throne.

The Supreme Commander, General Eisenhower, has recently visited Canada to consult with the government and the chiefs of staff.

Is that a decision which would prevent anyone here from introducing a proper resolution at some stage that we would welcome a visit by General Eisenhower to this country, or that we approve of the decisions which have been made by General Eisenhower? Certainly, if this constitutes a decision which precludes discussion of a subject mentioned in an informative statement of that kind, it would be equally true that the fact the house has passed the speech from the throne which informs us of the very welcome fact that General Eisenhower was here would prevent us from discussing anything connected with a statement which might be made by General Eisenhower, or any views we might like to express in regard to views he may place before us.

Then, let us look at another subject in regard to which information was given to this house in the speech from the throne. Again I quote from the speech from the throne:

> The urgent need of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project in relation to the security of this continent is becoming increasingly apparent.

If the mention by the dominion government of this proposal to place before Westminster, should the provinces approve, the request for an amendment to the British North America Act is to be regarded as something in respect of which a decision has been made, to such an extent that it would preclude discussion here, then I would say that obviously it would be equally true that we must decide that the decision has been reached with regard to the St. Lawrence seaway which would preclude the possibility of a resolution being introduced in this house which would call for an expression of opinion by the hon. members of this house to the effect that the government of Canada should proceed with the construction of the power development on the St. Lawrence if co-operation with the United States does not in some way become a reality. One could go through statement after statement in the speech from the throne which was merely indicated as a statement which would give information to the house. If those are to be regarded as decisions which preclude the introduction of either a substantive motion by way of the ordinary notice or a motion by way of an amendment introduced in this manner, then all that would be necessary to prevent the effective introduction of motions of any kind during the session would be to make brief references to enough subjects in the speech from the throne; then effective debate in this parliament would be completely stultified simply by the fact that the speech from the throne had been passed. I submit, Mr. Speaker, in all earnestness that the result of such a decision would create an established decision on record—which future interpreters of the rules of this house would be called upon to recognize—which would invite an absolute barrier being placed upon debate simply by the device of including in the speech from the throne every subject which might conceivably come up during the session and which the government did not itself intend to introduce by way of legislation or by some motion. One hesitates to use such a term, Mr. Speaker, but a decision of this kind could establish within the framework of a democracy the effective practices of dictatorship.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I urge you, Mr. Speaker, to recognize how far a decision of this kind could go in precluding all discussion except that which is formally introduced by the government itself.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, speaking to the point of order, may I say that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has established a point upon which perhaps most of us can agree. But there is another point upon which we would find great difficulty in agreeing with him. When a clause such as that which he has just read to the house is included in the speech from the throne, it indicates the cogent possibility of legislation at some time later on in the session. It would seem that, once such a clause has been so included, quite apart from any effect that may have resulted from the passage by the house of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, it is improper to introduce any amendment or other motion which anticipates such government legislation.

For example, let us suppose that in this particular case the provinces, instead of reaching a disagreement with regard to the desirability of this sales tax amendment, had, we will say, less than a week ago advised the federal government that they were in agreement as to the necessity for this amendment; then suppose that we for any one or more of a number of reasons did not find it convenient to introduce, until a week or ten days hence, the joint address which was required to secure the passage of such an amendment. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it would not then be open to any member of the opposition, by a motion such as that moved by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), to force the government, in advance of the time that it might wish to introduce the joint address, to bring it into the house and have it debated; because I think it is a generally accepted principle that as to when those measures of government policy which are indicated in the speech from the throne are brought in, the government has the privilege of bringing them in, at any time that fits in with the public business which is in charge of the government.

Mr. McIvor: I should just like to state how the matter appears to me, Mr. Speaker. Not being a lawyer, this looks to me like a matter of legal technicalities, not clear to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) or to the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton); otherwise they could explain it in far shorter time than they have taken.

Mr. Drew: To refer to what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has said, there is of course a decisive difference between those measures which the government announces that it is going to introduce and subjects which are only referred to by way of general reference. It should be pointed out that in the speech from the throne there is no statement that the government is going to introduce something or in what form it will be introduced. The nearest that it comes to an indication that anything might be brought before the house is to be found in these words:

> . . . amendments which may require to be submitted to you before the close of the present session.

That, Mr. Speaker, is just simply a general statement with regard to the possibility of something which may or may not be introduced. I can only repeat that, if a decision of this kind were reached, it would only be necessary for the government to set down a list of things which it did not think it was going to introduce and say "we may introduce them"; then when the speech from the throne was finished, all discussion of them by way of resolution or amendment to a motion of this nature would be precluded, and the ordinary rights of the opposition to introduce subjects for discussion in this way would be terminated by a decision of this kind.

Mr. Coldwell: May I just say one word, Mr. Speaker. I have listened to the discussion and it seems to me that this matter can be decided by thinking of an ordinary procedure at a public meeting. I do not think the chairman of a public meeting would take a motion that something cannot be introduced or considered. I think the chairman would say that when this is introduced for consideration, at that time you have the privilege of voting it down. Taking it from that point of view, it seems to me that this motion is analogous to the situation arising if somebody at a public meeting rose and said that something shall not be considered. Consequently, apart altogether from the long discussion of the rules and all the rest of it, in my opinion this amendment is not in order. That would be my view.

Mr. Fulton: If I may just reply to the point made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), it seems to me there is a fundamental confusion between the two things that he has referred to. This resolution which I moved this afternoon does not say that the house must not consider something. I have not the text of it before me at the moment, but what it says is that the proposal submitted by the government to the provinces should not be proceeded with. It does not say that the house must not consider something which is not before it at all. It refers to things which the government is doing, admittedly in another place, and which it is doing now. It is not hypothetical. The question of this amendment has been considered at sessions of the conferences, has been discussed in correspondence and is to come up again. It is a matter which is under active consideration. This resolution merely asks the house to express an opinion on something which is now under consideration by the government.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: May I say first of all that I raise this question of order because I realize, along with the leader of the opposition, that it is a very important matter. The leader of the opposition says that it would be a dangerous precedent not to allow it. I was concerned with whether or not it would be a dangerous precedent to allow it. I do not know to what length members might go in introducing motions of a negative character.

For instance, if this motion is allowed to stand I suppose I could not object to a motion, if an hon. member decided to make it, to the effect that further consideration should not be given by this government to bringing in legislation in connection with old age pensions, or a means test between 65 and 70. If I allowed this amendment I am afraid I would have to allow a similar amendment.

I realize the importance of this decision, and for that reason I have allowed full discussion of the point of order. I wanted to be very sure that I was right, and that I was doing an injustice to no one, and I was not establishing a precedent that would not be a sound one.

I made some notes of what has been said. I will not refer to all the remarks that have been made; but if this amendment is allowed, would it not have been in order for an hon. member to have moved an amendment similar to the one before the house to the effect that at this session further consideration should not be given to a complete revision of the Indian Act? If this amendment is in order then I think an amendment to that extent would have been in order on a motion to go into supply because all that is said in the speech from the throne regarding the Indian Act is:

> You will also be asked to consider a complete revision of the Indian Act.

By adopting the speech from the throne I take it that the house agreed to consider an amendment to the constitution along the lines referred to in the amendment, should such an amendment be submitted to the house. Might I say also that the question in connection with an amendment of the constitution is not to the effect that the house would amend the constitution; it was not to the effect that the house would amend the Indian Act and the other statutes. The effect of the speech from the throne was that the house would give consideration to an amendment of the Indian Act and the constitution, and other matters which are referred to in the speech from the throne.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would Your Honour allow me to point out the difference in wording of the two? In the one case it says:

> You will be asked to consider a complete revision of the Indian Act.

In the other case it says:

> The provincial governments are at present giving consideration to these proposals and to proposals for constitutional amendments which may require to be submitted to you before the close of this present session.

I submit there is a great difference there.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the point raised by the hon. member for Greenwood, but when the speech from the throne was prepared it was not known whether it would be necessary to present to the house amendments to the constitution. But by adopting the speech from the throne I take it that the house agreed to consider amendments to the Indian Act, and also agreed to consider amendments to the constitution, should they be presented to the house.

As I say, I realize this is an important decision. I have listened carefully to all the representations that have been made. I came into the house with an open mind, and after giving careful consideration to what has been said on the point of order, I am now prepared to make my ruling.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said that this is a negative motion, and he doubts whether it would be allowed at a public meeting. The amendment anticipates by a negative motion something which may be presented to the house at a later date. In my opinion, by the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the house indicated its willingness to consider the measures set forth in that speech, particularly:

> The provincial governments are at present giving consideration to these proposals and to proposals for constitutional amendments which may require to be submitted to you before the close of the present session.

As I have said, these constitutional amendments are referred to in the speech from the throne, and I understand that the proposals for the amendments in the speech from the throne were then a matter of public record and related to the proposals in relation to an indirect provincial sales tax.

The present amendment before the house, which would prevent further consideration being given to the sales tax proposal, is, in my opinion, not reconcilable with the earlier decision where, by a vote of this house, the house indicated its willingness to consider such a proposal if and when introduced by the government. I therefore rule that the amendment is out of order because it anticipates by a negative motion something which may be presented to the house at a later date, and as being in conflict with a previous decision of this house.

Mr. Drew: I appeal the ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And some members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

To the motion that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply, Mr. Fulton moved, seconded by Mr. Drew:

"That all the words after 'that' to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that further consideration should not be given to the proposal to authorize by amendment to the British North America Act an indirect provincial sales tax of three per cent."

I ruled the amendment out of order on the ground that it anticipated by a negative motion a measure which the government had indicated it might present to the house at this session, and also on the ground that it was not reconcilable with the previous decision of the house in adopting the address in reply to the speech from the throne to give consideration to such a measure, if and when presented.

From this ruling Mr. Drew and others appealed.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. Gardiner: I was paired with the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). Had I voted, I would have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

WHEAT—COST OF PRODUCTION

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, before the question is put I have a grievance which I wish to raise at this time and which affects hundreds of thousands of wheat producers in western Canada. I refer to the fact that during the present crop year the wheat producers have produced wheat now selling at a price which does not adequately compensate them for their increasing costs of production.

We in this group have always held that the wheat producers and other farm producers of Canada, and the industrial workers for that matter, should have a parity income, should receive for their services a price comparable to the cost of producing those services. There is no method at this time by which the wheat producers of Canada can protect themselves against the ever-increasing costs of production. In order to indicate how these costs have risen I might say that in 1945 the eleven factor cost of production index for farmers stood at 152·1, whereas on January of this year that index had risen to 216·9, an increase of 64·8 points or 42·6 per cent. I want to point out that when the 1950 crop is finally disposed of there will be little or no chance of the western wheat producers receiving any more for it than they received for the 1945 crop, even though since that date the cost of production has gone up by more than 40 per cent.

Wheat

As I have said, we in this group have always believed in parity prices. We believe there should be some fair relationship between the farmer's cost of production and, in this instance, the price of wheat. I remember that during a debate in 1946 the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made the statement that a parity price for wheat at that time would be $1.41 or $1.42 a bushel. He went on to explain that this was the parity price previous to increases which had occurred in implement prices and farm labour costs. If one looks at the eleven factor index at that time, that is, January of 1946, one finds that it stood at 149·7. In April of 1950, when farmers were undertaking expenditures for the production of the 1950 crop, that index stood at 209·7. In August, 1950, when the farmers were harvesting the 1950 crop, that index was 218·7. On that basis the 1950 average for the eleven factor index was 214·2. This means that on the basis of the parity price given by the Minister of Agriculture in 1946 and the change in the cost of production since that time as given by the bureau of statistics, parity price for the 1950 crop would be $2.02 a bushel. One might figure parity prices on a different basis. If one makes the assumption that the price for wheat during the five year pool period bore a fair relationship to the cost of production, taking the average of the eleven factor index for that period as 175·6 and considering the average for 1950 as 214·2, then parity price for the 1950 wheat crop would be $2.24 a bushel.

I have heard it said altogether too frequently in this house that the farmers in Canada are making more money today than ever before and that the wheat producers of western Canada, being the elite among farmers, so it is said, are making even more than the average of all farmers in Canada. I have before me a report of the bureau of statistics showing the net income of farmers in the prairie provinces in 1949 and 1950. The income of farmers in the three prairie provinces in 1949 was $803·5 million. In 1950 the income of those farmers dropped to about $644 million, or a loss in that one year period of $159·5 million or more. I realize that certain adjustments will be made which will change that picture to some extent; but considering the cost of production in 1949 as compared to the cost of production in 1950, and the very large drop in income indicated by the bureau of statistics, I submit that the position of the farmers in 1950 even including any subsequent payment on the 1950 crop will be considerably worse than the position of the farmers in 1949.

Mr. Gardiner: It is already $200 million.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Argue: Yes, but $200 million does not buy nearly as much today as it bought in 1949. The minister could not have been listening to what I said. I pointed out that the effective buying power of the farmers' income for 1950 will not be as great as it was in 1949. I have here a publication of the Department of Agriculture, the Economic Annalist. It contains a table showing the value of production in constant dollars per farm worker, starting back in 1901, omitting some years and going up to 1949. In looking over these figures I was amazed to find that the farmer's production, in other words his income, has gone down from a peak of $2,211.60 in constant dollars in 1942 to $1,857.10 in 1949.

Mr. Blue: If I may ask the hon. member a question, is he speaking from books or from experience?

Mr. Argue: I am speaking from both, and I doubt if the hon. member who asked that question speaks from either. As I said, the statistics I have been quoting are from an official publication put out by the Department of Agriculture, and for my part I would not question their accuracy. While there are certain variations up and down from 1942 to 1949, these figures certainly prove that the farm net income in constant dollars has been going down. On Wednesday, May 16, I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) this question:

> In view of rising costs of production and an increasing world price level, has the government made any attempt to have reviewed the present ceiling price under the international wheat agreement?

The Minister of Trade and Commerce replied:

> The international wheat agreement is an agreement among some forty governments. It is now in its second year of operation, and the only action Canada could take to vary its terms would be to denounce it. Canada has no intention of denouncing it, nor has it any desire to do so.

That was not an answer at all to the question I posed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I did not suggest in that question, I do not suggest now, and I never will suggest that the Canadian government should in any way denounce the international wheat agreement. All I was asking the government was whether or not they had considered the suggestion made in the presentation to the cabinet by the farmers union of Alberta, the British Columbia bloc, the Saskatchewan farmers union and the Manitoba farmers union that the government do what it could to have the international wheat agreement reviewed in order that the farmers might be given some compensation because of the rapidly increasing cost of production since that agreement was signed. This idea did not originate with me. I do not know whether it originated with the farmers unions; but I do know that Mr. Danielson—

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Argue: Surely.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): The hon. member says it does not originate with himself; I should like to know from what source it comes.

Mr. Argue: I am sorry I did not hear the hon. member.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): You said it does not originate with yourself, and I should like to know from where it comes.

Mr. Argue: If the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane would contain himself, I was just about to say where that suggestion might have originated. It may have originated with Mr. Danielson, a Saskatchewan Liberal member of the legislature. Mr. Danielson's motion presented in the Saskatchewan legislature as shown in Votes and Proceedings for Thursday, April 5, reads as follows:

> That this assembly requests the federal government to take action to renegotiate the international wheat agreement, with a view to having an additional term added to the said agreement providing for an annual conference between the parties thereto, such conference to have the power to increase the minimum and maximum price each year, so that such prices may be set at an amount which would give the same purchasing power as the said prices did when the agreement was signed.

I may say that a number of amendments were moved to that motion. If the house desires I can read the motion as amended, but the amended motion in no way changes the intent of the first motion moved by Mr. Danielson. When that motion asking for a revision of the international wheat agreement was put to a vote, I might point out that it received the unanimous support of the members of the Saskatchewan legislature.

I believe that Canada, one of the chief exporting countries under the international wheat agreement, and a country that has over 400 of the some 2,000 votes distributed amongst the countries signing that agreement, might very properly suggest to the other signatories that a conference should be called to discuss this matter. That was all I had suggested, that was all the farmers of the nation have suggested, and that was all Mr. Danielson, the Liberal farm critic of the Saskatchewan legislature, suggested. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) threw up his hands in holy horror, and said that the government were not going to repudiate the international wheat agreement. I thank him for saying that, but I wish he had replied to my suggestion.

Almost all the wheat being sold today by the Canadian wheat board is being sold on the basis of $1.89 or $1.90 or $1.91, right in that neighbourhood, for No. 1 northern, basis Port Arthur-Fort William or Vancouver. The wheat outside of the international wheat agreement sold on Saturday last for $2.29½ per bushel, which was 38 cents a bushel higher than the wheat being sold on that date under the international wheat agreement. This means that on that basis the wheat producers of Canada are subsidizing the Canadian consumer today to the extent of 38 cents a bushel. I am against a government policy that forces the wheat producers to subsidize the Canadian consumer. I do not want to see bread prices rise, but if bread should be subsidized then I believe the country as a whole should pay that subsidy, not the wheat farmers alone.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, there should be a final settlement in view of the increasing cost of production, and in view of the fact that the western farmer is still being forced to subsidize the Canadian consumer, for the 1950-51 wheat crop of not less than $2 per bushel. I suggest that is a very moderate request. It is a request for the dominion to guarantee a payment of only some 8½ cents more than the price at which No. 1 wheat was being sold by the wheat board to international wheat agreement countries and to Canadian millers on Saturday last. In my opinion it would amount to no more than the farmers of Canada are doing during the same year by way of subsidizing the Canadian consumer. All I am asking in this suggestion is that the farmers of western Canada be allowed to recover from all the Canadian people, through the federal treasury, an amount approximately equivalent to the subsidy that the western wheat farmers are now providing for the Canadian people.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Argue: No; I do not think I will permit the hon. member the opportunity of asking me a question now.

Mr. Blue: You could not answer it.

Mr. Argue: I will answer any questions at the end of my speech. I am not afraid of the question, but I should like to conclude my remarks. Considering what I have said, Mr. Speaker, my request for the $2 a bushel is fair and reasonable. It will not in any way totally compensate the farmers for the terrific increase in farm costs brought about by the fact that this government would not take adequate measures to hold down the farmer's cost of production. The farmer is the only person in Canada today who has to sell his commodities at a frozen price when his costs of production are rising by leaps and bounds.

When most issues are being discussed in this house I usually hear one of the cabinet ministers refer to what is being done in the United States as an argument for Canada doing something similar. I want to tell the house what the United States government is doing for the United States farmers. The United States wheat producers are selling a larger quantity of wheat under the international wheat agreement than is the Canadian wheat producer. On the Chicago market at the present time wheat is approximately $2.35 a bushel. The United States government does not say to the wheat producer, "All you can possibly get for your wheat is the price under the international wheat agreement." Instead of that the government guarantees the farmers a certain percentage of parity. For the 1950 crop the United States government guaranteed the farmers 90 per cent of parity, a guaranteed price of $1.99 per bushel. Then the United States government said to the wheat producer, "For every bushel of wheat you produce you can receive the highest possible price." So, while wheat has been selling for $2.35 per bushel on the Chicago market, the United States farmer is receiving the full benefit of that price. I want to read a comment in this regard taken from the Country Guide of May, 1951. It is a monthly commentary, furnished by the United Grain Growers Limited. It reads as follows:

The United States has now completed sale of its full agreement quota, and Australia's sales are practically completed. Consequently it is to Canada that buying countries now look for remaining quotas under the agreement. This country has still to sell about 35 million bushels before completing its commitments. The United States is refusing to enlarge its quota, and any wheat bought in that country for export is at the prevailing market price, 60 cents per bushel or more above the maximum price stipulated in the agreement. The United States government has subsidized all sales this year under the agreement at a total cost which cannot be very much less than 100 million dollars. Farmers in the United States have received the full market price for their wheat, and the government there has absorbed the full burden of the agreement. The government of Canada has undertaken no such expenses, and to whatever extent the maximum price under the agreement represents a burden, that has fallen upon the Canadian wheat producer.

That is the situation in the United States. I do not ask the government to do for the Canadian wheat farmers everything that the United States government is willing to do for their wheat producers. But I ask the government to do something for the Canadian wheat producers and that something is to guarantee them a final payment for their 1950 crop of at least $2 a bushel. The United States guarantee their farmers 90 per cent of parity plus anything they can get above that. We are asking that our government take into consideration the terrific increase in the farmer's cost of production, also the fact that the farmer will get but little more for the 1950 crop than he received for each crop from 1945 to 1949, even though those crops were produced at considerably less cost. We further ask that this measure be undertaken so that the farmers of western Canada may be compensated for the subsidy which today amounts to 38 cents on every bushel of wheat consumed in Canada. Because we think that should be done, and that it is a moderate suggestion, I wish to move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright):

That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out, and the following be substituted therefor:

"in the opinion of this house, in view of drastic increases in the cost of production, the government should give consideration to the advisability of making the final payment on the 1950-51 wheat crop an amount that will bring the total payment for the said crop to not less than $2 per bushel for No. 1 Northern, basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver."

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Gardiner: It is out of order.

Mr. Knowles: Not at all.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those in favour of the amendment will please say "yea".

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those opposed will please say "nay".

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Argue) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Chevrier: Too late.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, you did not make clear what question you were calling.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, he did.

Mr. Howe: There is only one question before the house.

Mr. Speaker: There was only one question before the house. I do not wish to be unfair to the hon. member, but I thought I had waited a sufficient length of time.

Mr. Howe: Certainly you did.

Mr. Chevrier: Too late.

GOVERNMENT FINANCIAL POLICY—PROVISION OF DEBT-FREE MONEY

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I desire first of all to associate myself with the expressions of the hon. member from Saskatchewan who spoke recently on the wheat question.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: I rise to voice a grievance against the practice of the government of Canada.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Blackmore: My grievance is that His Majesty's present government in Canada has mismanaged the financial affairs of Canada—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Blackmore: —and that as a result there is obvious danger to the people I represent in this house. Specifically, Canada's Department of Finance is failing to keep enough money circulating in the hands of the appropriate people to ensure the health of the body economic of Canada.

Money has been fittingly characterized as the bloodstream of any community's economy. It is essential therefore for the economic health of Canada that money should visit regularly in adequate quantities every unit of the Canadian community.

In this age of abundance in which we live, abundance resulting from the employment of machines, solar energy and technological skills, it is no longer possible for any government to maintain adequate working circulation of money in the state with only debt-money at its disposal.

To help focus attention upon the thesis I desire to dwell upon, may I place before the house two monetary pronouncements of compelling significance for these times we live in? The first of these is from a report by the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, chairman of the Midland Bank, made to his directors in 1936. This quotation appears in the January 30 issue of the Times in that year:

> Additional currency, however, can now be furnished by the authorities, if they choose to exercise their powers, without reference to the central bank's holding of gold. Thus the nineteenth century, which brought into general use a means of payment hitherto scarcely known outside London, brought also the machinery whereby it could be subjected to intelligent control.
>
> We learnt that a shortage of money may be just as vicious in its effects as an excess, though deflation has still a touch of virtue about it in the minds of many people. Nevertheless it is becoming more and more widely recognized that greater productivity calls for an increased supply of money, for otherwise prices will fall, business will stagnate, and the growing productive capacity will be unused.
> For money to be truly sound there must be enough of it to finance an ordinarily growing volume of trade, yet not so much as to give rise to an inflationary movement of prices.

The next quotation to which I would draw the attention of the house is from a booklet called "Your Money" by Sir Norman Angell, published in 1936.

At page 13 it states:

> Now, it would make no difference to the value of Law's money that it should be "backed" by the resources of the Mississippi valley, or to the French revolutionary money that it should be a mortgage upon the national possessions, if the money were issued in too great a quantity in relation to the exchange of goods to be effected.
>
> Both of the moneys just mentioned became utterly worthless, although the whole resources of France and the French empire did "stand back of" them. If the quantity had been limited it would not have mattered in the least that nothing stood behind them in the material sense. So long as they were legal currency, and their quantity was limited, their value would have been maintained.
> What wrecked them was their excessive quantity. If the effect of putting material wealth "behind" money is to limit the quantity, to cause it to bear some quantitative relation to goods, the device, of course, serves the purpose of limitation. But it is the limitation of quantity which constitutes the guarantee of its value. Ricardo saw this quite clearly when he wrote:
> "There is no point more important in issuing paper money than to be fully impressed with the effects that follow from the principle of limitation of quantity. It is not necessary that paper should be payable in specie to secure its value; it is only necessary that its quantity should be regulated."
>
> Now, the truth, that the value of money depends, in the last analysis, not upon the material of which it is made, or upon being "backed" by this or that commodity, but upon its quantity, opens up great possibilities for man. He is not necessarily in this vital question of money the slave of a circumstance outside his control like the discovery or the failure to make adequate discovery of gold. He can control his money, make it his servant instead of his master, if he can learn the trick, the technique.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

These two pronouncements convey to us four most vital truths affecting our very lives today. They are:

1. The financial authorities of a sovereign state can furnish additional currency without reference to gold;

2. Such currency can be subjected to intelligent control;

3. The amount of such currency soundly available for active working circulation in a state is directly dependent upon (a) the exchangeable goods and services available in that state and (b) the number of people able and ready to effect the exchange of those goods and services, granted the means, and (c) the adequacy of the resources of that state to keep up the constant replenishment of the goods and services supply;

4. If, other things being equal, there is too little money in active—working—circulation to effect the exchanges that should be effected, then there will be depression or deflation because of too little money in active or working circulation, so that prices will fall too low, thereby raising the value of a dollar too high and thus rendering the money unsound. If, other things being equal, there is too much money in active or working circulation for the exchanges of goods and services to be effected, then there will be a boom or an inflation, prices will rise too high, thereby running down the value of the dollar too low, thus again rendering the money unsound.

These four vital truths about money I discussed in a measure in my speech of April 30, and I refer hon. members to pages 2519-2526 of Hansard; and in my speech of May 1, pages 2558-2562 of Hansard; and paved the way for such discussion in the series of questions I asked in my speech of April 19, pages 2195-2202 of Hansard.

To help the house and the country realize the hope-giving truth that our Canadian financial system can be better managed than it has hitherto been, or now is, may I place before the house a brief account of two well authenticated monetary experiences which occurred within the last 140 years of history.

These were, first, the Guernsey island experiment, particularly in progress during the years 1815 to 1829, and, second, the greenback experiment in the United States, particularly in progress during the American civil war and the post-war period of 1862 to 1879.

Each of these two historical monetary experiences clearly indicates at least three general truths.

They indicate, first, that under suitable circumstances a sovereign state can print or otherwise create either currency or credit-money, without reference to gold, and employ it greatly to the advantage of the people of that state. Second, that such created money has been and therefore logically could be still further subjected to intelligent control by a democratic state. Third, that since these two experiments were conducted with success under conditions which could be characterized as abnormal, it would seem reasonable to assume that monetary experiments of a somewhat similar nature ought to succeed yet more gratifyingly in times of relative normalcy such as the year 1951 in Canada.

Shall we now take a look at the two experiments? May I summarize the story of the famous Guernsey island experience? In 1815 the Guernsey island legislature, democratically elected, desired to build a markethouse. The 32,000 people of the tiny island, five-and-a-half miles wide by nine-and-a-half miles long, were suffering from depression. Their public debt was £19,500 and the taxation rate was very high. They could produce adequately many kinds of goods and services, but they could not consume or distribute their production.

On April 12, 1815, the parliament appointed a committee to consider a scheme for enlarging the markethouse. The committee recommended that the government issue £3,000 debt-free in state notes to build the markethouse. The state created £3,000 of debt-free money with no specie behind it and spent it into circulation: First, to buy stone from Guernsey island's quarry, and second, to have the stone transported, dressed and laid up into the markethouse. The notes were to be withdrawn from circulation in ten years with the proceeds of the renting of the markethouse.

Therefore, the Guernsey islanders got their markethouse at no financial cost to themselves. There is no evidence that prices rose and consequently there was no inflation in the strictly modern sense that inflation means a rise in price. Extensive but careful use was made of such notes throughout the next fourteen years. The island government built roads, schools, a very costly dike and paid off thousands and thousands of pounds of their national debt throughout the fourteen year period that followed 1815. In 1829 William Collings, a member of the finance committee, reported to the government that there were then 48,183 notes in circulation, with apparently no inconvenient results.

For verification of this information see "The Story of Money" by Sir Norman Angell, published in 1929, pages 265 to 271, and "An Example of Communal Currency" by J. Theodore Harris, published in 1911.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, if we look at pages 2198 and 2199 of Hansard of this year we find almost an exact repetition of the speech the hon. member is making. He is repeating the same speech for the fourth time. At that time he indicated that there were three main reasons for inflation, and then he went on to describe what he referred to as debt-free money and how happy we would be if we adopted his system. There is a rule that a member cannot repeat the same speech four or five times during the same session. I do not know if my point of order is well taken but I protest against having the people's money spent in that way, even if it might be debt-free.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, may I just reply to the hon. member. I think that without very much effort I could go back into the pages of Hansard and find hundreds of times where hon. members have risen and stated, "We cannot get money anywhere else except from the people."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You have told us that for sixteen years.

Mr. Blackmore: If the rule as to repetition is to be applied it will not be very long until we have no speeches in the house at all. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member might take into consideration the remarks of the minister and consider whether it is appropriate to continue this speech when the motion to go into committee of supply is called again.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue or close this debate. Then we will take up Bill No. 198, to amend the Customs Act; then Bill No. 293, respecting units of length and mass; then Bill No. 191, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act; then Bill No. 192, to amend the Petition of Right Act; and finally Bill No. 322, respecting the Canada post office.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 23, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

PARLIAMENT HILL

QUESTION AS TO FACILITIES FOR PARKING OF MEMBERS' CARS

Mr. L. A. Mutch (Winnipeg South): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. This question affects the personal privilege of every member in this house, and certainly the privilege and convenience of more than thirty-five of them. I should like to draw to Your Honour's attention, and, through Your Honour, to the attention of the appropriate person concerned, the parking situation for members on these grounds. I believe that if I had kept them I would have had one of the superior collections of these little yellow tickets, one of which I hold in my hand. I freely confess to destroying most of them, but this one I have brought with me because it affords me an opportunity of bringing this situation to Your Honour's attention. It is a situation of which I have grown quite tired.

I have made some check of it, and I find that there is ample space on these grounds to accommodate all members' cars if the grounds were treated as they were intended to be, as an adjunct to the parliament of Canada and not either a park or a thoroughfare. I have in my hand here, and this is the second one today, a ticket which says that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police inform me that "the driver of this vehicle has committed a breach of the traffic regulations governing traffic on dominion government property as indicated below". I say at once that I am guilty. Down below it says, "Parking in a reserved area, space No. 69, reserved for Hansard reporters." I hope that my relationships with Hansard reporters, as with all other employees of the house as well as the members, are good. The Hansard reporter did not leave his seal or even his car on the space. As usual when I came here this morning there was no place to park. I was waved down in that direction. I refrained, sir, from doing what I have often been tempted to do, and that is to park the car in the vacant space opposite your own door or at the peace tower. I am convinced that if someone did that, this matter would be righted.

This situation is intolerable, and I believe that view will be shared generally. There are persons who have spaces on this hill reserved for them personally who are neither members of the parliament of Canada nor particularly prominent servants of the house, with the exception of yourself, sir, as the first commoner. I protest against the idea of there being any space reserved, unless it is proposed to reserve adequate space for every member of the Commons, whether or not he has a car here. Under these circumstances, perhaps the rest of us would have a chance.

I think perhaps I have said enough to draw to Your Honour's attention the desirability of something being done about the matter. I live two miles from the parliament buildings. I like to enjoy some of the amenities of home life; and two of these tickets per day are too many to tear up.

Mr. Speaker: In reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) may I say that the question of parking has been receiving the attention of the Sergeant-at-Arms for some time. As hon. members know, there is only a limited space in the neighbourhood of the parliament buildings which can be made available for parking motorcars. The Sergeant-at-Arms has endeavoured to ascertain how many members have motorcars and wish to park them on parliament hill. There are officials of this house, for whom space has been reserved, who come here regularly, often they arrive earlier than members of parliament, and they are required to stay here very late at night. The question of parking on parliament hill is a problem, just as it is in every city. I can assure hon. members that the Sergeant-at-Arms is doing his best to provide parking facilities for all members. In view of what has been said today, I am satisfied that he will again go into this question.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I too have a complaint with regard to parking on parliament hill. As yet, I have not received one of the tickets mentioned by the hon. member who spoke a moment ago (Mr. Mutch); but I expect that there will be one on my car when I go out in a few minutes, because, if I am not mistaken, I parked in a space reserved for cabinet ministers. I did so because although I drove around the buildings three times, trying to find a place to park, I was unable to find one. Then when I went back to inquire from the mounted policeman where I could hang the car, perhaps somewhere from a tree, he was not even around. I was therefore compelled to park my car wherever I could find an available space.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why not take it over to the Senate side?

Mr. Johnston: May I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that one of the difficulties we encounter with respect to parking might be overcome if a little bit more caution were practised by some of the hon. members when they park their cars. On several occasions when I have come to park my car I have found that other members have left their cars parked with the front end over one line and the back end over the other, thereby taking up two spaces instead of one.

Mr. Cruickshank: They should learn to drive.

Mr. Johnston: I may also say that when I was trying to find a parking space a little while ago, there were two other members who were in exactly the same position. It is absurd that when we come to the hill to park our cars, in order to be here to attend to the business of the house—because I am always here and am never late—there is no space available. I want to register my protest along with that of the hon. member for Winnipeg South.

CRIME

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF COMMITTEE OF INVESTIGATION

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Yesterday the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) asked me a rather long question, and in reference to it I said that he had given me no notice of it; whereupon he stated, as reported at page 3265 of Hansard:

> I wish merely to point out, with reference to the statement of the minister, that I phoned his office yesterday and advised him of the subject matter of the inquiry which I was to make.

I am sure that my hon. friend will be the first to admit that he did not telephone me at all on Monday. I wish simply to make that point.

Mr. Fulton: On the question raised by the Minister of Justice, I want to agree immediately that I did not contact the minister personally, but I did advise his office. My intention was to ask today, on a question of privilege, that Hansard be corrected so that the statement would read "to advise him" instead of "and advised him"—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Mr. Fulton: —which is what I actually said yesterday when the matter was being discussed.

[Later]:

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Kamloops asked me certain questions, of which I said I would take notice. I said I would get in touch with him in order to get the exact text. This I have done.

This morning the hon. member supplied me with information in which he pointed out that he had asked the following question:

> The issue of the Montreal Standard on Monday contains the second instalment of an article "The case of Montreal missing gamblers." In this article it is alleged that Mrs. Balazo, the wife of one of the missing men, appealed to the Minister of Justice and the R.C.M.P. for assistance in tracing her husband and was promised an investigation would be made. That was in February. I would like to ask two questions:
> (2) In view of the allegations of the importation of American gunmen and of the existence of organized crime in Montreal and elsewhere, including counterfeiting and gambling, has the government given consideration to conducting an inquiry into the organized criminal activities in Canada along the lines of the inquiry which has produced such startling results in the U.S.A.?

It will be remembered that I answered the second of these two questions yesterday.

The answer to the first is that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were requested by the Montreal city police to publish particulars of the missing persons, Alex and Frank Balazo, in the R.C.M.P. Gazette, a publication which is distributed to all police forces in Canada. Stop notices were also placed in the R.C.M.P. fingerprint files in the event that fingerprint impressions of either of these men were later received.

Mrs. Alex Balazo wrote to the Minister of Justice on January 30, 1951, and asked if any assistance could be given in locating her husband. The letter was passed to the commissioner of the mounted police and was acknowledged by that official. At that time the item on these missing men had already been published in the R.C.M.P. Gazette, but a special notice was then sent to the large R.C.M.P. divisions instructing that investigators in the major cities be alerted in respect to this case.

I believe I should say also that the administration of justice, including the enforcement of the Criminal Code of Canada, by section 92(14) of the British North America Act is exclusively assigned to the provincial authorities, which create provincial and municipal police forces for these purposes.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police provide certain national services which are available to all provincial and municipal forces. These include the police Gazette, the fingerprint bureau, and the firearms registration section. These services are used regularly by other provincial and municipal forces, and it will be noted that they were so used in the present case. Additionally, the R.C.M.P. are always ready to assist when requested by municipal and provincial forces; but if not requested they do not interfere in matters beyond their jurisdiction. Frequently the R.C.M.P. are asked by private citizens to investigate cases which are the primary responsibility of another law enforcement body, and in such instances they simply refer the inquiry to the proper police authority. In the present case, the R.C.M.P. took no action in or about Montreal, but merely used their machinery to circularize other police forces and their own personnel.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister whether the R.C.M.P. do not have a special responsibility with respect to counterfeiting, which perhaps would transcend the other jurisdictional boundaries he has described?

Mr. Garson: That is right. There are one or two exceptional cases of that kind, where the federal government is involved. There is counterfeiting, and then the same would apply where some major robbery took place in a federal department building, or something of that kind.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RULES RESPECTING STRANGERS IN THE GALLERY AND SUBJECTS OF QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE

On the order for motions:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I rise to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to a matter which I believe requires some consideration on your part. I might add that I have hesitated to direct attention at the time to what I believed to be violations of the procedure and the rules of the house because of the risk of being misunderstood by the member or members involved.

Under standing order 13 hon. members may draw attention to strangers in the gallery for the purpose of requesting their exclusion; but I believe it is a violation of the rules to draw attention to the presence in the gallery of students or persons other than a special or distinguished representative of a friendly country. In the same connection, the practice has grown up recently of hon. members rising on matters of privilege which are clearly not permitted by the rules. I refer specifically to recording the distinctions conferred on persons, places or constituencies by the winning of sporting and other events or awards.

Some hon. members may be misunderstood when, observing the rules of the house, they refrain from recording the winning of sporting or other events by their constituents, or fail to refer to the presence in the gallery of groups or persons in whom they are interested.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that both Your Honour and hon. members of the house will realize that in raising this question I am doing so in order that you may give some consideration to the problem and perhaps give some guidance thereon to hon. members so that all may be governed accordingly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) for bringing this matter to my attention. I have noticed this breach, which has become almost a practice in the house. I will give consideration to the remarks which the hon. member has made and which, I understand, meet with the approval of the members of the house, and will make a statement with regard to the matter in the near future.

INCREASE OF PRICES IN CAFETERIA—TEA AND COFFEE

Mr. J. H. Rooney (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, on a matter of privilege, I should like to ask a question. Within the last three days—yesterday or the day before, I believe—there was an increase in prices in the cafeteria. I am not complaining of the increase in prices in the restaurant. I was wondering if the committee which has to do with the matter could not see their way clear to making no increase in the price of coffee or tea. If this committee would sit down and consider the matter, they might decide to leave coffee and tea at the former price. To my mind, it is a matter that affects only the workers here—the page boys and many others—who have to do without certain things; and this increase means a good deal to them.

I speak of this because during the depression, through my clubs in Toronto, we distributed thousands of cups of tea and coffee, and perhaps the odd biscuit. I know what it means to people when they have to deprive themselves of a cup of coffee because it is priced at ten cents instead of five. We should be able to avoid that by raising the prices on some other things. Possibly this committee can sit down and correct their budget. If they cannot correct it themselves they might call in the Minister of Finance for some advice.

STANDING ORDERS

Second report of standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. MacLean (Cape Breton North and Victoria).

MEAT PACKING INDUSTRY

DECLARATION OF INDUSTRY AS WORKS FOR THE GENERAL ADVANTAGE OF CANADA

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 333, to declare the meat packing industry works for the general advantage of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): The purpose of this bill is to make that part of the meat packing industry which carries on operations in two or more provinces subject to paragraph (g) of section 53 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. In matters of collective bargaining the industry will then be able to negotiate on a national basis and the government of Canada will have the authority to deal with disputes in an industry whose smooth functioning is essential to the national economy.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DIVORCE JURISDICTION ACT

EXCHEQUER COURT TO HAVE JURISDICTION IN ACTIONS ORIGINATING IN QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 334, to provide for the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada in matters of divorce.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: The purpose of this bill is to free parliament from the necessity of processing individual divorce cases, a practice we all dislike, and at the same time to put an end to any agitation for the establishing of divorce courts in provinces where they are not wanted.

This bill does not establish divorce courts in Quebec or Newfoundland. It does not make available to persons residing in those provinces any facility not now available to them. It merely transfers the hearing of Quebec and Newfoundland divorce petitions from parliament to the Exchequer Court of Canada.

This is the same bill I have introduced on two previous occasions, except that it has one additional clause which provides categorically that the exchequer court shall exercise its right to hear divorce cases only at the city of Ottawa. I have added this clause to make that point crystal clear.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 323, for the relief of Jane Stirling Stephens.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 324, for the relief of Mavis Elizabeth Thomas Wrathall.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 325, for the relief of Ida Courland Rubin Flesch.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 326, for the relief of Yvonne Winifred Kathleen Walker Andrews.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 327, for the relief of Elizabeth Cochrane Aitchison Lalonde.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 328, for the relief of Violet Taylor Carey.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 329, for the relief of Julia Saykaly Hajaly.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 330, for the relief of Doris Auclair Gingras.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 331, for the relief of Georges Paquin.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 332, for the relief of Marion Agnes Kelsch Cleghorn.—Mr. Winkler.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—RECRUITING OFFICES

Mr. Thatcher:

1. During the past fiscal year, how many recruiting offices were there in Canada for (a) the air force; (b) the navy; (c) the army?

2. What was the cost of maintaining these offices for each service?

3. As at March 31, 1951, what active service personnel was engaged in the operation of recruiting stations in each service?

4. Has the Department of National Defence considered the amalgamation of recruiting offices in each city?

5. If no amalgamation is to be proceeded with, what are the reasons?

Mr. Blanchette:

1 and 2. (a) 19. Cost of maintenance for fiscal year 1950-51, borne by the Department of Public Works, was $64,720. (b) 1. Cost of maintenance for fiscal year 1950-51, borne by the Department of Public Works, was $360. (c) Nil.

3. Navy: On part time basis, two officers and 25 men; on full time basis with mobile unit, four officers and two men; army: On part time basis, 60 officers and 162 men; air force: 61 officers and 62 men.

4. Yes.

5. The only place where there is duplication of separate recruiting establishments is at Victoria, B.C., where the R.C.N. and R.C.A.F. both have offices. The cost of maintaining the R.C.N. office at Victoria was $360 in 1950-51, as noted above. It was considered that the advantage of having there a separate office more than outweighed this additional cost. It should be noted that in addition to the 20 separate offices referred to in the answer to questions 1 and 2 above, recruiting was also carried on by the R.C.N. in the 21 naval reserve divisions, in the Canadian army in active and reserve units, command, area and other headquarters, etc., and in the R.C.A.F. at command headquarters and regular and auxiliary establishments. All the accommodation is fully used. In any event it would not be considered desirable to endeavour to recruit personnel for the army or air force at naval reserve divisions or vice versa, for the following reasons among others:

(a) under the present arrangements the three services for the most part employ personnel for recruiting who are primarily engaged in other duties and utilize accommodation which exists for other purposes. During period of decreased numbers of applications recruiting staff carry on other duties.

(b) amalgamation of recruiting offices would require the setting up in each city of additional office space and personnel from each of the three services would have to be provided on a full time basis.

(c) in order to stimulate competition, it is considered more advantageous to maintain a clear-cut distinction between the services with the appropriate service atmosphere for recruiting services rather than impersonal recruiting offices staffed on a tri-service basis.

(d) experience in both the United Kingdom and the United States when these countries were on an entirely voluntary basis supports the present arrangements for separate facilities.

RESEARCH ENTERPRISES

Mr. Noseworthy:

1. Did the government dispose of Research Enterprises after the war? If so, how was it disposed of, and to whom?

2. If sold, what price was realized on the sale of (a) land and buildings; (b) machinery and other equipment?

3. What was the original cost to the government of (a) land and buildings; (b) machinery and other equipment?

4. What is the estimated cost of (a) land and buildings; (b) machinery and other equipment required in the present expansion program for Research Enterprises?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Yes. A part of the plant consisting of lands and buildings was sold by War Assets Corporation to the following industrial purchasers: Corning Glass Works, Toronto, Ontario; Rogers Majestic Limited, Toronto, Ontario; Reo Motor Company of Canada, Toronto, Ontario; Parkhurst Realty Company Ltd., Toronto, Ontario; J. R. Thompson, Toronto, Ontario.

Part of the land comprising the extension of Vanderhoof avenue was granted to the town of Leaside as a public thoroughfare.

The balance of the original property known as Research Enterprises Limited was taken over by the instrument and radar division of Canadian Arsenals Limited, a crown corporation.

2. (a) Sales for industrial use of lands and buildings were as follows:

Corning Glass Works	$150,000.00
Rogers Majestic Limited	628,214.55
Reo Motor Company of Canada	130,740.00
Parkhurst Realty Company Ltd.	175,000.00
J. R. Thompson	24,400.00
	$1,108,354.55

(b) Part of the machinery and equipment was retained by Canadian Arsenals Limited. It is impossible to compute the selling price of the balance, as it was found necessary to move such machinery and equipment to War Assets warehouses, from which points disposal was made. Identity of such equipment as to its source was lost; consequently no sales figure is obtainable.

3. The original cost to the government of the entire plant was as follows: (a) lands and buildings, $3,660,174.49; (b) machinery and equipment, $5,400,053.70.

4. The crown company known as Research Enterprises Limited was wound up in October, 1946, and its charter surrendered. There is, therefore, no present expansion program for Research Enterprises as such, since the nucleus that was retained is now part of Canadian Arsenals Limited. (See answer to No. 1.)

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FEDERAL CONTRACTS WITH LEVY AUTO PARTS COMPANY LIMITED

Mr. Lennard:

1. Has the government placed orders with Levy Auto Parts Company Limited, 1400 Weston road, Toronto, Ontario, from January 1, 1951, to May 1, 1951?

2. If so, what were these orders for, and what was the value?

PENSIONS—VETERANS—TUBERCULOSIS

Mr. Higgins:

1. How many war pensioners are in receipt of pensions for disability incurred as a result of having contracted tuberculosis?

2. What is the total amount of such payment?
3. How many war veterans are in sanatoria suffering from tuberculosis contracted while in the armed forces?
4. What is the estimated annual cost of caring for such war veterans?

PENSIONS—VETERANS—CORONARY THROMBOSIS AND SCLEROSIS

Mr. Black (Cumberland):

1. As at January 1, 1950, how many veterans were being paid pensions of 50 per cent or more, due to coronary thrombosis and sclerosis, incurred during service?
2. During 1950, how many of the above had their classification altered from incurred during service to aggravated during service, and as a result suffered a decrease in pension?

VETERANS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE AMOUNT PAYABLE AT DEATH, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Veterans Insurance Act to extend the scope of the act and the period during which a contract of insurance may be entered into; to increase the amount payable at time of death and, in certain cases, to permit the estate of the insured to receive the full amount payable under the policy contract; to provide for the insertion in the policy contract of a war clause in certain cases; and generally to improve the administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

POSTAL SERVICE

COMPENSATION TO LETTER CARRIERS FOR OVERTIME WORK

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General. Will the Postmaster General say when an announcement may be made as to the form of compensation to be given to postal carriers for overtime work in the transition period of instituting the new delivery service?

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): I will take the question as notice and give an answer to the hon. member as soon as possible.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

REQUEST FOR UTILIZATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES OF ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. What plans, if any, has the minister for speeding up defence production through utilization, within the province of Alberta, of the natural gas, oil, coal and other very important materials that are available in quantities in that province?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): The department for which I am responsible is doing everything possible to speed up the development of the natural resources of Alberta for the defence effort. The largest drilling program for gas and oil that has ever been known in that province is under way. To aid that program the federal government is undertaking to provide steel pipe, which is in very short supply, for stockpiling at Calgary and Edmonton in the government stockpile, and it will be issued when required to keep pace with the development. There are three or four refinery projects in Alberta, running into some $20 million, and again the government is undertaking to supply the steel and other scarce materials required to keep these programs under way.

There is a chemical development, using natural gas and salt found in the province, for the production of caustic and similar products. The government is supporting that program with materials. There is, as my hon. friend may or may not know, a $65 million petro-chemical project being started there—

Some hon. Members: Wheat.

Mr. Howe: No, petro. Petro means petroleum; chemical means chemical made from petroleum, and the government intends to support that program through the supply of essential materials and steel. When we speak of the petro-chemical industry, I might remind my hon. friend that this government pioneered the chemical industry in Alberta when it built the Alberta nitrogen plant, which is still the cheapest producer of ammonia of any plant that I know of in the world.

I have touched only the fringe of development in Alberta, and the government assistance thereto; but I will say that we are giving industry in Alberta exactly the same support that we are giving industry in every other province. The only difference is that there seems to be a little more initiative in Alberta than in some other provinces.

REQUEST FOR CHEMICAL INDUSTRY BASED ON NOVA SCOTIA SALT DEPOSITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Defence Production if any steps have been taken to develop a chemical industry based on the tremendous natural resource of salt, or sodium chloride, in Nova Scotia? There are beds extending for thousands of feet in that area.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Consideration is being given to the problem. However the project has not advanced to the point where any announcement can be made at the present time. Serious consideration is being given to it.

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO DEAL WITH DEPORTATION OF FRED ROSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice, arising out of this week's issue of The Ensign. Does the minister intend to bring in an amendment to the Criminal Code at this session that will lead to the deportation of Fred Rose when he comes out of the penitentiary, because of his conviction for sedition?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter to which the hon. member has referred is one which would be connected with the annual Criminal Code amendment bill which is now being considered by the government. Any decision in the matter will be announced when the bill is brought into the house.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT AT THE PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will there be any amendment at this session to the Canada Grain Act?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): There will be no amendment at this session.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

STATUS OF EMPLOYEES WHO ENLIST IN AIR FORCE OR NAVY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) asked whether it was so that the Canadian National Railways would not guarantee jobs or seniority to those enlisting either in the air force or the navy.

I have consulted the management of the Canadian National Railways, and the answer I receive is that if an employee of that organization joins a special force for a special purpose and for a specific length of time in a period of emergency, and is planning to return to his employment in the railway, he is protected as to his job, his pension and his seniority. If however he joins the permanent army, the air force or the navy he is considered to have separated himself from his employment and to have embarked upon a new career, and actually to have abandoned his position with the railway. In that case he is not entitled to the same privileges as in the first case.

STRAIT OF CANSO BRIDGE

REQUEST FOR FURTHER STATEMENT AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Transport any further report to make on the causeway or bridge over the strait of Canso?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I have no further report to make. I have already indicated that I expected to get a report from the reconvened board of engineers on the subject matter, and I said that as soon as I had it I would indicate it to the house, either during the consideration of my estimates or at some other opportune moment.

INDIA

FOOD SITUATION—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister, arising from the answer he made to a question asked last week about the policy of Canada with respect to emergency famine relief in India. Will the government soon be in a position to announce a policy in that regard?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I will not overlook the promise I made to the house to announce any decision the government arrives at just as soon as it has arrived at that decision.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) for committee of supply.

GOVERNMENT FINANCIAL POLICY—
PROVISION OF DEBT-FREE MONEY

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, last night at 10.45 I rose to voice a grievance, namely, that the government of Canada has mismanaged the financial affairs of Canada and, more specifically, that the Department of Finance is failing to keep enough money circulating in appropriate hands to ensure the health of the body economic of Canada. To show that Canada's Department of Finance could better manage the financial affairs of Canada, I proposed to discuss two great monetary experiences of the last 140 years. The story of the first of these, the Guernsey island markethouse experiment, I summarized. May we turn now to consider the much more extensive experiment of the greenbacks of Lincoln's time in America?

The greenback was a unit of United States government created and issued currency, a debt-free dollar bill. Its use began in 1862 with the issue of $150 million of greenbacks to be spent into circulation debt-free. By 1863, $450 million of greenbacks had been issued and so spent. In June, 1864, there were outstanding $431 million of greenbacks. This money had all been spent into circulation for government purposes. A greenback was therefore a debt-free dollar when originally issued. The greenback was not supported or backed by specie. The greenback was legal tender for all debts except the payment of customs duties and interest on the public debt. For verification of these particulars see Sir Norman Angell's "The Story of Money" at page 293.

There were circumstances that would seem to make dangerous the use of the greenback by the United States at that time. When the new administration of Lincoln took office there were a number of serious financial disabilities, with which I shall deal briefly later on. The nation was engaged in a dangerous civil war, the outcome of which was by no means predictable. This fact would naturally result in public apprehension and pressure for increasing prices, inflation in our modern usage of the word.

Production in the United States was disrupted seriously because of at least two obvious factors. First, there was the relatively enormous number of men taken out of production to don uniforms and to engage in war industry, not to mention the horsepower taken out of production. Second, there was the considerable disorganization of normal commercial relations between the northern and the southern groups of states. Manifestly every degree of deterioration in the supply position of the northern states made goods and services scarcer and resulted in rising prices, now called inflation, and constituting the only real inflation.

A whole nation accustomed to specie as the guarantor of the soundness of its money found itself suddenly absolutely upon a paper basis, with even its banks refusing, and being unable, to redeem either their own paper, or government paper, with any kind of specie.

The greenback was incessantly under attack from the money powers, as were the assignats, mentioned in my quotation from Robert McNair Wilson's "Monarchy or Money Power," to which I referred the other day, as reported on page 2525 of Hansard. To show the insidious part played by the United States bankers in opposing the greenbacks I should like to quote from the proceedings of our Canadian banking and commerce committee of 1934, at page 664. I quote from a statement by G. G. McGeer, the famous monetary authority, who said:

> The national bankers' circular was issued by James Buell, the representative of the bankers' association in the United States, and a copy was sent to each banker in the States and it read as follows: "Dear Sir:
>
> It is advisable to do all in your power to sustain such daily and weekly newspapers, especially the agricultural and religious press, as will oppose the issuing of greenback paper money, and that you also withhold patronage or favours from all who will not oppose the government issue of money. Let the government issue the coin, and the banks issue the paper money of the country; for then we can better protect each other. To repeal the law creating national banks, or to restore to circulation the government issue of money, will be to provide the people with money and will, therefore, seriously affect your individual profit as bankers and lenders. See your member of congress at once, and engage him to support our interest that we may control legislation."
>
> Mr. Irvine: What is that number?
> The Witness: The national bankers' circular. This is part of the Congressional Record of a later date. It is published in several books; one, "The Management of Credit," by T. Cushing Daniel, is a well-known document.

A statement such as that may help hon. members to understand why they have heard only disparaging remarks about the greenbacks.

Then there was no form of price control in use by the United States federal government. The greenback was not subjected to intelligent control as debt-free money now could be, either as to the amount created, or as to the manner of spending it into circulation. There was besides no rationing or over-all control or direction of material supply.

What were some of the phenomena associated with the use of greenbacks? Opponents of debt-free money, state-created money, affirm that the greenbacks are unsound; that they caused enormous price increases from an index of 100 in 1860 to 217 in 1865; that they hurt the wage earners whose wages during the same period rose only from 100 to 143; that those on fixed incomes, such as schoolteachers, were severely hurt; that soldiers were severely hurt; that the civil war cost the people of the northern states $389 million extra because they used the greenbacks.

But any kind of money, $450 million of it, spent by the government into circulation in the northern states in so short a period would have produced exactly the same rises in price. All we have to do is remember our own experiences in the recent war and in the first war. Specie borrowed directly from the United States banks would have done it. Currency borrowed from the United States banks or credit borrowed from the United States banks would have done it. Solid gold in the form of five dollar gold pieces stamped in the United States mint and spent by the government would have caused exactly the same price rise and created the same other effects, other things being equal. The rise of prices, therefore, could not with justice be blamed upon the greenbacks.

Fundamentally the price rise accompanying greenbacks was a result of having too few goods to buy with the greenbacks and all the other different kinds of money already in circulation. May I repeat that the price rise had and could have little or nothing to do with the kind of money the government used to spend, whether it was debt-free paper, debt or borrowed bank paper, paper backed by specie or gold in any percentage, coins of either silver or gold, either minted by the government and spent, or minted and borrowed from the banks and spent. A relative shortage of goods was the only monetary cause of the price increase. Of course, where there was no price control or rationing, price rises could have been the result of profiteering.

But there were several other contributing factors besides the spending into circulation of $450 million, no matter what kind of money those millions might be. Many weaknesses existed in the general financial situation prevailing at the beginning of the administration of Lincoln.

When the new administration of Lincoln took office, I quote: "it found the national finances in a very bad way". "The treasury was practically empty," "customs receipts had fallen off considerably," "the public credit was shaken," "the administration did not feel itself able to impose severe taxation on the people," and "three out of every four dollars the government spent was borrowed money." See "The Story of Money", pages 292 and 293.

Soon after war broke out the government borrowed $150 million from the banks, demanding it all in specie, thereby weakening their specie position enough to force the banks off specie ultimately, and on to a strictly paper basis. Even at that the government had so little specie in its subtreasury that the government had to go upon an inconvertible paper basis.

Against this disquieting background, the government, sorely in need of funds, began issuing greenbacks. See Sir Norman Angell's "The Story of Money", pages 292 and 293. To recapitulate the adverse factors affecting the greenbacks: A dangerous civil war was unpredictable as to its outcome, thus engendering lack of confidence. Production was very seriously disrupted in the whole nation. The nation was accustomed to specie and so naturally was anxious about being only on paper. The greenback was constantly under attack by bankers and financiers. On the other hand, as I have already indicated, there was no form of price control. The greenback was not "subjected to intelligent control" as to amount created, or as to manner spent into circulation. There was no rationing of either retail goods or of raw materials for manufacturing. Finally, from any standpoint either of orthodox or of non-orthodox monetary thinking, the greenback was at a real disadvantage on the United States money market because of the fact that the government would not accept it in payment of customs duties and interest on the public debt.

Any just and accurate appraisal of the greenback experience must be made bearing all of these considerations strictly in mind; but when men talk of the greenback I notice they never bear any of these considerations in mind. They becloud their thinking.

What is the importance to us and our generation of state-created debt-free money? With it men can make financially possible what in a community is physically possible. This is a fact of epoch-making significance if men can only come to realize and appreciate it. If members of this house could come to appreciate that fact, it would mean the possibility of an epoch-making event in Canada, greatly to the benefit of this nation.

Let us now review the facts about Guernsey island. In Guernsey island the government in 1815 created and spent three thousand one pound notes with no gold or other backing except the going-concern-goods-and-services-producing-and-consuming-activities of the island. These notes the government spent into circulation to build a markethouse from its resources, material and human, with the understanding that those notes would be redeemed with revenues derived from renting the markethouse. Records indicate no inconvenient rise in prices. The state notes were therefore unquestionably sound money. The Guernsey islanders, therefore, built the markethouse at no financial cost whatever to themselves.

Did they get something for nothing? No. They merely set to work resources, human and material, that were not in actual use, and would have remained unused, except for the creation and spending of the state pounds. Before the government created and spent the three thousand state-note pounds, many of its workers were idle or partly idle. The stone in the quarry was idle. The tools were idle. Considerable food, clothing and shelter were unbought in the markets, and were therefore more or less idle or unused. Resources like soil and fisheries, ready to produce more food, etc., were partly or wholly idle. In other words it was physically possible for the islanders to build that markethouse. The physical potentialities of producing the necessary goods and services to build the markethouse were available to the islanders.

But they could not get the money essential to set those potentialities into action, to make their existing goods and services begin to be built into the markethouse, and then to turn such of their resources as fertility of soil, hay, milk cows, fish in the sea, fishing equipment, stone in the quarry, into replenishing goods and services, and to cause those additional replenishing goods and services, thus brought into being, to be built into more and more of the markethouse, and so on, until the markethouse would be completed.

The state pound notes, when created and wisely spent, provided the money essential to turn Guernsey island's physical possibilities of building the markethouse into the physical realities that constituted the completed markethouse. Therefore the Guernsey islanders did not get their markethouse for nothing. They built into the markethouse the requisite amount of stone from their quarry, their food, clothing and shelter up to that time being left unused, their human energy and skill up to that time unused. To effect the building process, to motivate it, they employed their state-created one pound notes. In other words, they made what was physically possible, as regards a markethouse, financially possible as regards that markethouse, by the use of the debt-free pound notes that the government created and issued.

Their markethouse cost them a substantial amount of depreciation of the stone in their quarry, of the fertility of their soil, and of certain of their other resources, together with whatever wear and tear took place in the bodies and the lives of the people who toiled in building the markethouse, and the people who laboured to supply the builders with the needs of life to give them energy. But the Guernsey islanders paid no financial cost through taxes, either immediate or deferred, or through higher cost of living. Let this be learned and pondered with the greatest of seriousness by all people concerned.

Putting it another way, we might say the Guernsey islanders built the markethouse by using their collective capacity to produce goods and services out of their resources, human and material. The technique by which they enabled themselves to use their resources was, let me repeat, the state-created Guernsey island debt-free one pound note.

What made one of the three thousand Guernsey island one pound notes acceptable to the people? What gave them confidence in it? First, it was a government note. Second, it was probably legal tender. Third, it was to be withdrawn from circulation within ten years. Fourth, the amount to be issued was (a) predetermined, (b) agreed to by the legislature and (c) not so great in amount as to cause any serious concern.

What made the Guernsey island note sound? First, the fact that there must have been enough food, clothing and other goods and services available in the markets and storehouses of Guernsey island to absorb the three thousand notes as they were spent into active circulation in paying wages and in buying goods. Second, there must have been, either idle or only partly in use, enough resources to produce new goods at least as fast as the available supplies were moved into consumption. Thus there would be no undesirable rise in prices.

Other notes were issued evidently with great care. Some of such issues were: £4,000 in June, 1820, to pay off part of the public debt. Further issues followed. Then there were £580 in June, 1821, to pay off part of the public debt; an issue in March, 1826, to improve Elizabeth college and parochial schools. It was then stipulated that the total in circulation should not exceed £20,000.

I should like to quote now a statement made by Sir Norman Angell upon the use of the Guernsey island note at that time. This quotation is to be found at page 267 of his work, "The Story of Money". He says:

> In summoning the states on this occasion the bailiff, Daniel de Lisle Brock, expresses the opinion that paper money is of great use to the states. There is no inconvenience because the notes are issued with great care.

There is the testimony of Daniel de Lisle Brock, a man who had seen this wonderful experiment in operation for years and years, over eleven of them, and who says what he says in the presence of the Guernsey island people right near to him.

Then there was an issue of £2,000 on the 28th of June, 1826, £8,500 for the college, and £11,000 in connection with the rue de la Fontaine scheme. These issues, as I have already indicated, resulted in 48,183 notes in circulation in Guernsey island in 1829, all with no apparent rise in price.

What kept all these issues sound? Evidently the island's production of goods and services through the fourteen years had increased in response to the greater amount of money in active or working circulation in the people's hands. The number of potential exchanges to be effected had increased.

The use of the notes had begun to make what was physically possible in Guernsey island financially possible. Improvements of every kind could have gone on being made in Guernsey island as long as the people's resources would support them. Guernsey islanders had found the key to make money their servant, not their master.

Let us now review the case of the greenbacks. During 1862 and 1863 Lincoln's government issued and spent into circulation $450 million of bills. No care was exercised, it seems, to restrict the quantity issued. The quantity of greenbacks issued was determined by the government's needs, not as it would have been, if subjected to intelligent control, by the nation's available goods and services or its capacity to produce more goods and services fast enough to maintain or increase the supply. This alone indicates by far the greatest of the reasons why prices rose. The greenbacks were spent into circulation with no care as to the best possible channels through which to spend money amongst a people in order to put more purchasing power where it would best promote exchanges and most effectively stimulate most valuable production. In fact, no care was exercised to subject the greenbacks to intelligent control.

Yet, notwithstanding all handicaps, the performance of the greenback was admirable. It won the civil war. It saved $450 million of debt to the United States government and all interest up to our own time. It has been computed that if the interest on $450 million from 1863 to 1951 was figured at simple interest of three per cent, the interest alone would be well over $1 billion. Even at that the greenbacks caused no more increase in prices than any other kind of money would have caused.

Every greenback was a debt-free dollar. It was not borrowed from anyone; it was not redeemable by the government, and it bore no interest. Yet it was legal tender. It was a claim on every bit of production or property of the state. It had the whole United States nation behind it.

It was physically possible for the northern states to win the civil war. Without the greenbacks, however, it would have been financially impossible for the north to win. The greenback made what was physically possible in respect of winning the war, financially possible.

The greenback, so far as it went, made Lincoln the master of his country's money rather than the slave of his country's money. If Lincoln had been permitted to live, he would have used his greenback device to win the peace that followed the war. He would have made the white American free, just as he had made the coloured man free. He was not permitted to live. It is an interesting question as to who engineered his death!

Canada could employ a system resembling the greenbacks. Canada could put such money into circulation in the form of discounts on price, subsidies on price, or as cost of living bonuses—intelligent control of spending it.

Canada could lend such money to producers at considerably reduced rates, or could enable our banks to lend at greatly reduced rates, thereby substantially increasing Canada's available productive potential. Canada could render money available for developing our resources, as, for example, iron production. Furthermore Canada could thus avoid too much foreign investment. It must be a cause for real anxiety on the part of the people of Canada to know that even the Canadian Pacific railway, one of our most valued assets, is now largely in the hands of the United States. According to a pamphlet I have at my disposal 48·29 per cent of the stock of that railroad is now owned in the United States, while the United Kingdom and other British countries own 31·5 per cent of the stock. Why should the government have allowed that to take place? Surely if we had been using intelligently debt-free money, we could have avoided that, and maintained some sort of control over this great asset, the C.P.R!

Such measures as I have indicated, something similar to the greenbacks, would revitalize democracy in Canada. It would revitalize the British commonwealth. We commonwealth peoples could have something resembling sterling, which was so successfully used by the British, to enable members of the commonwealth to exchange their goods freely to the benefit of the commonwealth and to the benefit of all mankind.

Debt-free money is the only means of scientific distribution. Hon. members will recall that men have solved the problem of production, but we must now solve the problem of distribution. Debt-free money is the key to the solution of the distribution problem. International plans such as the Colombo plan and others depend upon money. If you cannot or dare not obtain by taxing and borrowing enough money to finance Colombo plans, you cannot achieve your goal. With debt-free money and adequate production, men would be able to do all they desired to do with the Colombo plan.

Debt-free money, Mr. Speaker, used in conjunction with adequate production, constitutes the only possible means of preserving freedom, the only possible way of successfully combating communism.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON MANPOWER

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the grievance which I rise to voice is the use which, it appears to me, is being made of the advisory council on manpower. I hold in my hand two news releases, issued by the Department of Labour, reporting on the deliberations of the advisory council on manpower held last Friday and Saturday, May 18 and 19. After studying these releases, I believe it is only possible to come to one conclusion, and that is that the government is advising the advisory council, instead of the advisory council advising the government.

Now, these reports comprise eighteen typewritten pages, and are filled almost entirely with statements and recommendations made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), the deputy minister of labour and the economic adviser to the Department of Labour. In all of those eighteen pages there is only one statement made by a person other than a member of the government. It is contained in one short paragraph, and is a statement by Mr. Rhys Sale, president of the Ford Motor Company. There is no mention of anything having been said by any other member of the council who was not a member of the government.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we should re-examine the purpose for which this council was set up with such a fanfare three months ago. I should like to refer back to the speech made by the Minister of Labour on February 5 of this year, and recorded on page 71 of Hansard, in which he describes the composition and purpose of this manpower council. In outlining the composition of the council he said it would consist of——four representatives of labour; four representatives of employers; two representatives of agriculture; two representatives of the women of Canada; two representatives of the veterans of Canada;

Then, he goes on to mention the representatives of the various departments of government who would be members of the council. I do not think there was any doubt in the minds of the members of parliament, or the people of Canada at that time, that this was a well constituted council. It was made up of the kind of people who could give a great deal of assistance in advising the government on this most important problem.

Then, in his speech the minister goes on to describe the duties of the council and he said:

The duty of the council will be to consider various aspects of manpower questions; to advise on plans under review, and to suggest plans which should be developed so as to make for the most effective utilization in the national interest of the present and potential man and woman working force of Canada.

Then later he says:

This council is intended to advise the minister, or the government, or both, on any question affecting manpower.

I believe we would all agree, Mr. Speaker, that this manpower council was, and still is, ideally composed and qualified to do a much needed job, which is to advise the government on national registration and other manpower problems. It has been supplied with the statistics and other information which it would need to carry out its task. I believe that we had every reason to feel confidence in the job it would be able to do. However, judging by the news releases which were issued by the Department of Labour, it seems to me that the advisory council has not been permitted to do the job for which it was established, well equipped to do that job though it may be.

Having read the accounts of the meetings, it is only possible, I believe, to come to the conclusion that these meetings were monopolized by government spokesmen, who told the advisory council how the government wants to be advised, instead of the advisory council, with all its special knowledge, advising the government. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, regrettable indeed that once again a committee set up by this government has simply been used as a front for government policy. It seems to me very regrettable indeed that this committee, comprised of excellent people, well selected and well qualified to do an extremely important job, should be misused in this way. I strongly urge the government that in the future they use this advisory council for the purpose for which it was set up, namely to advise the government.

EXCISE TAX—GRUEN WATCH COMPANY V. ATTORNEY GENERAL OF CANADA—RETROACTIVE EFFECT OF 1949 AMENDMENT

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the grievance which I should like to raise this afternoon is one which, I regret to say, involves the good faith of the government in relation to assurances given on behalf of the government to the house and accepted by the house. The assurances in question were given to the house on November 30, 1949. The matter has to do particularly with a retroactive piece of legislation of the kind which parliament normally abhors passing and which it did not understand on that occasion that it was passing to have retroactive effect.

May I sketch briefly, sir, the background of this incident and the unhappy results which have flowed from it. On March 22, 1949, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) introduced his budget in the house. This was the famous pre-election budget. Among other resolutions introduced by the Minister of Finance was one to amend the Excise Tax Act in these words:

2. That the retail purchase tax be repealed and replaced by an excise tax of 10 per cent, payable by the manufacturer or importer, on all articles now subject to the retail purchase tax.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that prior to that time there had been a 25 per cent retail purchase tax applied to a wide variety of articles; and the purpose of this resolution, as stated by the Minister of Finance, was to eliminate that retail purchase tax and to substitute in its place a 10 per cent excise tax levied upon the manufacturer or importer. This would have involved amendments to sections 80 and 85 of the Excise Tax Act. But before it had an opportunity of dealing with that resolution, parliament was dissolved and a general election was held. In the meantime, however, even while these resolutions were being left suspended in the air—something that I hope will never again be allowed to happen during an election campaign—the government proceeded to apply these various changes contemplated by the resolution, although they had no legal authority whatsoever for doing so. There the matter remained, so far as parliament was concerned, until November 30, 1949, by which time litigation had been embarked upon by a number of litigants, arising out of the interpretation of this resolution introduced on March 22 and its doubtful meaning.

Just to fill out the history of the matter, I might add that on April 19 the government, acting under the resolution but without any authority from parliament, issued regulations purporting to define those to whom the new tax was to apply, listing instructions of a detailed nature with respect to the imposition and the collection of the tax.

May I now say a word, and I shall be brief about it, concerning the nature of the litigation which had been embarked upon in May of 1949. I shall not go into this matter in any great detail; there are technical questions involved. The essential point that I am making in giving this background information has to do with the way in which the rights of the litigants then before the courts of the land were treated by the government in this house and in subsequent actions.

As plaintiffs in the litigation there were certain importers of watches, watch movements and watch cases into Canada, these being in all cases finished articles. The practice was that the Canadian importer would purchase from the manufacturer abroad and would sell to the retail trade in Canada. These importers, of course, had not been previously personally affected by the 25 per cent tax because it had been levied at the retail level. When the resolution was introduced by the Minister of Finance in the terms in which I have quoted it, as you will recall, Mr. Speaker, it applied to a manufacturer or importer of goods as described in the resolution in the following terms:

—on all articles now subject to the retail purchase tax.

The litigation related to watches adapted in Canada to household or personal use. Briefly, the question in litigation was this. First of all, were these persons who imported the watches, watch movements and watch cases into Canada—so far as the putting of the watch movements into watch cases was concerned—manufacturers or producers within the terms of the resolution? If they were, did the new retail tax apply at the import level, payable at the time of import or at the time of sale by the importer to the retail trade?

There were important differences in the consequences that flowed from those two alternative interpretations; and one of the important consequences was that if the tax applied at the import level, these importers could not import apart from an import licence in the ordinary form of manufacturers' and importers' licence issued under the Excise Tax Act.

The interpretation put by the department on this resolution which, as I have said, was enforced for some months without any authority from parliament, was not an immediate interpretation. The resolution was not interpreted as applying to these importers for some weeks, but after the regulation dated April 19 was issued an attempt was made to apply the regulation to these particular firms, and they issued a writ in the Supreme Court of Ontario on May 7, 1949, seeking a declaration. I do not think that I need to dwell at length on the terms of the declaration they asked for, but briefly they asked for a declaration that they were not manufacturers or importers within the terms of the resolution, that the excise tax was not applicable at the time of import, and that they were entitled to import without the manufacturers' or sales licence.

The statement of claim in the action was delivered on May 23, two years ago today. The action was set down for trial on September 20, and was waiting trial, when the incident to which I refer in the House of Commons occurred on November 30, 1949. I do not dwell further on the issues in the litigation except to point out how entirely different were the two positions, the one being taken by the government, the other being taken by the litigants; the fact that these litigants seriously took their case to court, and that the action was well advanced and was simply awaiting trial when the question was raised in this house.

In the budget speech of the Minister of Finance at the second session of 1949, the Minister of Finance introduced new resolutions, and the resolution with respect to the Excise Tax Act amendment was similar in form to that introduced in the previous March. However, when the bill founded upon the resolution was introduced in this house questions were raised in committee of the whole following second reading. In the bill, which was Bill No. 175, which was before the house in the second session of 1949, amendments were proposed to sections 5 and 7 to amend sections 80 and 85 respectively of the act for the purpose of making the act clearly apply to such persons engaged in business in the way in which these particular firms were. There is no doubt that on the interpretation of the bill, it sought to amend the act for the purpose of making this tax applicable to these particular firms or persons engaged in similar business. Therefore the question that arose in the house naturally was: when will these new amendments, amendments before parliament for the first time, come into force and effect? In the house on that occasion I raised the question, sir. It is to be found at pages 2503 and 2505 of Hansard of November 30, 1949.

May I remind you, sir, that the essential provisions designed to make the tax applicable to persons engaged in the manner I have described were sections 5 and 7 of Bill No. 175. When section 5 was reached I am recorded in Hansard as having said this:

> Sections 5 and 7 are related for the purposes of the matter I should like to raise, which has to do with the imposition of an excise tax on the assembly of watches, clocks and certain kinds of jewelry. If I am correctly informed, this has become the subject of litigation as well as having been agitated by correspondence with and representations to the government. I understand that this litigation is pending and I am concerned as to whether this legislation will not cut right across the issues involved in the pending litigation which directly concerns the government.

Then the report proceeds, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance being in charge of the bill at this committee stage:

> Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member has put his finger on an amendment which I propose to move a little later. It is quite true that a case involving sections 5 and 7 is now before the courts, but I would direct his attention to the fact that section 14 provides for the coming into force of sections 5 and 7. When that section is reached I propose to have a minister move an amendment which would change the present date of March 23, 1949, to November 10, the date when first reading was given to this bill. There would then be no retroactive effect which would have a bearing on the cases before the courts.

I am recorded as saying:

> Mr. Fleming: May I express my complete gratification at that announcement.

Now, sir, I happen to know that I was not the only member in the house making representations on this subject. I know that at least one or two hon. members on the government side of the house were making representations to the government at the same time for the same purpose, in the interest of fair play, with some regard for the rights of persons then under litigation in the courts of law. There is one member, then a private member, who is a member of the government today, who I happen to know was making the same kind of representations, and who shared with me on that day the same gratification that I am recorded as having expressed here to the government for giving the assurance that amendments were being introduced which would have the effect of preventing any application of this new bill to the litigation then before the courts.

Then at page 2505 the amendment that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance had referred to on page 2503 was introduced, and the report reads:

On section 14—Coming into force.

Mr. Sinclair: This is the section on which the minister will move the amendment about which I spoke in answering the hon. member for Eglinton. The amendment is as follows:

That subclause (2) of clause 14 of Bill 175 be amended by striking out the words "second day of May," and substituting therefor the words "tenth day of November."

That is the date when this change first became public knowledge by reason of the first reading of the bill.

Mr. Howe: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Then we read on page 2506:

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

The bill was passed, sir, on the strength of the statement made on behalf of the government by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance when he said:

The hon. member—

Referring to what I had said—

The hon. member has put his finger on an amendment which I propose to move a little later. It is quite true that a case involving sections 5 and 7 is now before the courts, but I would direct his attention to the fact that section 14 provides for the coming into force of sections 5 and 7. When that section is reached I propose to have a minister move an amendment which would change the present date of March 23, 1949, to November 10, the date when first reading was given to this bill. There would then be no retroactive effect which would have a bearing on the cases before the courts.

What do we find, sir? We find that the government has, in the litigation which was then proceeding in the courts, set up that the bill then passed by this house and the other place later, on that representation and statement, did apply to the then pending litigation, and thereby defeated claims made in that litigation by those plaintiffs. The litigation that I mention is the litigation that the parliamentary assistant was referring to on that occasion. There is no room for any misunderstanding. But we find that in this litigation this bill, having been passed by parliament on that occasion, November 30, and having received royal assent and come into effect on December 10, 1949, is, if you please, set up by the crown in the pending litigation for the purpose of defeating the claims of the litigants.

Had it not been for the effect of the bill passed by parliament in November, it is quite clear from the course the litigation has taken, both before Chief Justice McRuer at the trial and before the Ontario Court of Appeal, that those litigants would have been completely successful. They would have been awarded the declaration which they sought in their plea.

This is the language of Chief Justice McRuer in the case. The case is the Gruen Watch Company versus the Attorney General of Canada, and it is reported in 1950 Ontario Reports at page 429. It is a very lengthy judgment of the chief justice of the high court. I quote from his judgment at page 450:

Had I been trying the action prior to the 10th December, 1949,—

May I interject, sir, that this reference is to the date on which this new bill came into effect. It received royal assent and came into effect on December 10.

Mr. McCann: Was this at the appeal?

Mr. Fleming: No; this is the judgment of Chief Justice McRuer at the trial. In a moment I shall have occasion to refer to the recent judgment of the court of appeal. I continue:

Had I been trying the action prior to the 10th December, 1949, I would have made a declaratory order that the plaintiffs were not liable to pay excise tax in respect of the goods in question either on importation or on delivery to purchasers and that they were entitled to have such goods pass through customs upon payment of the lawful taxes then in force.

I also think that in such case the jurisdiction of the court should have been exercised to declare the regulations of the 19th April, 1949, ultra vires.

Then he refers to certain English decisions, and proceeds:

This peculiar right of recourse to the courts is a valuable safeguard for the subject against any arbitrary attempt to exercise administrative power not authorized by statute, and judges ought not to be reluctant to exercise the discretion vested in them where a declaration of the court will afford some protection to the subject against the invasion of his rights by unlawful administrative action.

Chief Justice McRuer went on to make it clear that, apart from this bill passed by the house on November 30, he would have given effect to the plea of the plaintiffs for the declarations which they sought. He would also have held that the resolution of March 22 introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) would have no application to the business carried on by these firms and, secondly, that the regulations issued by the Department of National Revenue in pursuance of that budget resolution which had no force or effect whatsoever, in law, were thus invalid and ultra vires.

But the defendant in the proceedings, the Attorney General of Canada, set up as a defence, if you please, the legislation which was passed in November, and in the very teeth of the undertaking given to the house to which I have referred, the undertaking given on behalf of the government that the bill then before the house would not apply to the pending litigation.

The crown, as defendant, set up this legislation, this bill passed in November, as a defence in these proceedings. The chief justice of the high court, in the face of that, felt constrained to interpret that bill—contrary, I may say, to the understanding in the house—as applying to the pending litigation, and proceeded to hold that in the face of this November amendment he could not give effect to the plea of the plaintiffs in the action. That is the basis upon which his judgment proceeds, that the November amendment has application to the litigation before him.

Appeal was taken by the plaintiffs to the court of appeal of Ontario, and judgment was delivered on April 16, 1951. I might say briefly that the court of appeal in its judgment goes even further than did Chief Justice McRuer, in holding that the plaintiffs, apart from the November amendment, would have been entitled to everything they asked for. They would have been fully entitled to all the declarations they sought in their pleadings.

But the court of appeal felt its hands were tied by this November legislation which, contrary to the understanding in the house, and contrary to the assurance given to the house on behalf of the government, was then pleaded to defeat the rights of the plaintiffs in that litigation.

Now, everyone in the house who was present on that occasion accepted without question the assurance given by the parliamentary assistant on behalf of his minister, the Minister of Finance. If anyone in the house had had any question in his mind, after that assurance, that the bill could have any possible application to pending litigation, then certainly, had he raised the question, he would have been challenging the very plain statement and assurance given by the parliamentary assistant.

And yet—and here is where the bad faith enters into it, bad faith practised upon parliament, bad faith against subjects of the king in litigation pending in His Majesty's courts at that very time—notwithstanding those assurances given to the House of Commons; notwithstanding the interpretation put upon those amendments in the house when they were passed; notwithstanding the interpretation and understanding possessed by every member in the house, the crown, as defendant in the litigation, sets up this amendment as being applicable to that litigation then pending, as having the effect of defeating the rights these plaintiffs had prior to the enactment of the amendment of November 30, 1949.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Sir, there was a time when the good faith of the crown was regarded as unimpeachable: it was accepted by all. It was the highest standard of good faith known in the land. But in these proceedings the good faith of the crown has been dragged into disrepute by His Majesty's advisers and representatives. By a deliberate government decision faith is broken with parliament. The statements made by the parliamentary assistant on behalf of the minister are soon ignored and, in effect, completely repudiated.

Counsel appearing in this case, on instructions of the Attorney General of Canada, simply acted—and could not do anything else—on the instructions given to him by the government, instructions which had the effect of reducing the assurance given in the house to the status of a scrap of paper.

Mr. McCann: Why did you not insist that it be stated specifically in the act?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, when the government makes statements like these, I think hon. members are entitled to assume that the government speaks truthfully and that it means what it says. And if the minister—

Mr. McCann: The court gave judgment because of the fact that it was not stated specifically.

Mr. Fleming: And whose responsibility was that? The responsibility rests upon the government. Because what they have done was to repudiate the statement made on their behalf in the house as to the effect of legislation which parliament was then in process of enacting. It was a specific statement made on the government's behalf by a parliamentary assistant.

Is the minister going to say that when a parliamentary assistant speaking on behalf of his minister makes a statement to this effect, those statements are not to have truth attached to them, and are not to be believed?

Let me quote to the minister again these words uttered on behalf of the government, as they are found at page 2503 of Hansard for 1949, second session:

> When that section is reached—

That is, section 14, which dealt with the date of coming into force of the amendment.

> —I propose to have a minister move an amendment which would change the present date of March 23, 1949, to November 10, the date when first reading was given to this bill. There would then be no retroactive effect which would have a bearing on the cases before the courts.

I may tell the Minister of National Revenue that if the law of this country permitted reference to debates in the House of Commons, in connection with litigation, that would have been introduced. An attempt was made to introduce it, but counsel for the crown took the stand that it was irrelevant and could not be used in connection with the interpretation of the bill.

If the minister was in his place in the house at that time I wonder why, in view of the calm attitude he takes today, in a situation where good faith is involved, I wonder why he did not rise in his place and correct the statement of the parliamentary assistant given on behalf of the government, if the minister knew that this amendment was intended to have or could have any bearing upon litigation which was then before the courts, and which was discussed on the floor of the house that night. I would like the minister to say whether he knew that the amendment was not going to have the effect stated concerning it by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. Because—and let us take it both ways—if he knew that the amendment the parliamentary assistant was about to introduce was not going to have the effect stated concerning it by the parliamentary assistant, then what is to be said in the house as to the conduct of a minister who, knowing that that is not the effect, permits the House of Commons to be misled by statements which he knew were not in accordance with the facts?

Mr. McCann: On a question of privilege, the hon. member should withdraw the statement that I allowed the house to be misled. I want him to understand that my position as Minister of National Revenue is not that of directing policy or making the laws with reference to the customs or Excise Tax Act. My position as minister of the department is one of administration. I suggest to the hon. member that it was his place to insist that that be stated specifically in the act. I am not a lawyer, nor am I competent to discuss this matter on its merits from the point of view of the law, but I do know enough to understand that both the trial judge and the court of appeal decided that unless it was stated specifically in the law, it did not apply.

Mr. Fleming: I did not say that the minister knew. I am inviting the minister to say whether he knew that the amendment introduced by the parliamentary assistant fell short of having the effect that the parliamentary assistant said it would. I asked the minister if he knew that. If so, I think we will have to say something in this house about his having sat back and permitted that statement to be made on behalf of the government by the parliamentary assistant. If the minister did not know, then I would like to know why subsequently his department takes the responsibility for instructing counsel representing the crown in this litigation to repudiate completely a statement made to the house and on the strength of which the house accepted the amendment.

The minister talks about the effect of the amendment. When we came to section 14 on November 30 the parliamentary assistant rose in his place to introduce an amendment that sections 5 and 7 would not be deemed to come into force until November 10, 1949. I think we were prepared, and I think we were justified in being prepared to accept the statement made by those who spoke for the government as to the effect of the amendment. There was a plain and unequivocal statement by the spokesman for the government that the effect of this amendment would be to postpone the application of sections 5 and 7 of the bill and that therefore the amendment would have no application whatever to the litigation then pending in the courts of law.

What has happened is crystal clear. The government has reduced to shreds and tatters the good faith of the crown. The government must take the responsibility for having in the most callous and barefaced manner broken good faith with this house. If we are to be told now by the Minister of National Revenue that from now on we had better be on our guard about statements emanating from spokesmen for the government as to either the effect of—

Mr. McCann: My hon. friend cannot put words into my mouth that I did not use. He can banter away with lawyers if he wants to, but I have common sense enough to know when he is trying to put something into my mouth that I never said or never thought.

Mr. Fleming: I say to the minister that his words are on Hansard, the interjection he made a moment ago, and the plain interpretation of those words or the sense that one could draw from them amount to this: Anybody in this house had better be on his guard in the future as to accepting statements emanating from government spokesmen as to the effect of amendments they are introducing in the house or as to the use they are going to make of such amendments with respect to existing litigation on the rights of His Majesty's subjects.

The minister said, "Why didn't you see to it that the amendment went as far as the spokesman for the government said it would go?" My answer is that I did what other hon. members did. I thought we could accept a statement made in intended good faith on behalf of the government for the purpose of inducing this house to take a particular course and to pass legislation in the form in which it had been introduced in sections 5 and 7 of this bill.

The minister says that he is concerned only with the interpretation of the act. Have we in this government a series of watertight compartments? Can the representative of one minister state to the house that this legislation will not have any retroactive effect upon the pending legislation that is being discussed on the floor of the house, and then can another minister come along and say, "I am not concerned with what is said in the house. It is being applied in the courts of law and there is an amendment there which does not represent what the house understood it did. I have a weapon in my hands to beat the litigants in a case which is now pending".

That is precisely what happened. The Minister of National Revenue in effect pleads before the house today that he is not responsible for a statement made to the house by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, that his task is one of administration and apparently in that task of administration he can proceed roughshod ahead without the slightest regard for statements made to this house as to the interpretation that will be given to these amendments.

Where has the good faith of the crown gone in all this? This government has reduced the good faith of the crown to shreds and tatters. It has been proved by this utterly disgraceful incident—

Mr. McCann: This is a fine forum for you to earn your fee in.

Mr. Fleming: I want either a clear statement from the minister or a withdrawal. If he says that I am earning a fee in raising this question, I want him to say so because he will have to withdraw that statement for it is an utterly untruthful statement. It is a base insinuation and I give that to the minister in his teeth. If the minister has not enough moral perception left to see that there is an issue of good faith being raised here then we have come to a very sorry pass indeed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. Drew: I suggest that there is something that should be withdrawn. There is no question about the imputation made by the minister. The minister should either make it perfectly clear that he carelessly made an imputation, or he should withdraw it.

Mr. McCann: I have nothing to withdraw.

Mr. Fleming: When the minister stands up and says that this is a fine forum for me to be earning my fee in there is no other interpretation to be put upon that than that I am receiving a fee for raising this question in this house. There is not a word or syllable of truth in it. I ask you to call upon the minister to withdraw that base insinuation.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I just intervene for a moment. When we hear language used such as disgraceful and untruthful and words like that, I think we must assume that it is used in a moment of nervousness. Perhaps both sides have exceeded the limits and might be advised to use more parliamentary language in carrying on this discussion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that the minister had no intention of imputing motives.

Mr. McCann: Will the hon. gentleman deny that he has acted in his legal capacity for some of these people concerned?

Mr. Fleming: There is more of the same contemptible insinuation. I have never acted for any of these litigants in any respect at any time. I am here in my capacity and on my responsibility as a member of this House of Commons to put before the house a grievance, something that should certainly be aired here and which affects the good faith of the crown. The minister does not reduce or palliate the insinuation he made a moment ago by getting up and asking that question. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, in fairness to members of this House of Commons, and under the rules of the house, to call upon the minister to withdraw any statement and insinuation of that kind, an insinuation that he has repeated now by this question.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, I accept the word of the hon. gentleman. If I have said anything which hurts his feelings or is unparliamentary I will withdraw it.

Mr. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two on this matter because my name and the statement I made two years ago have been mentioned. The first point raised by the hon. member was the fact that the resolution was brought in in March, parliament did not actually adopt the resolution and the bill until November, and royal assent was not given until December. Of course that is the practice in this parliament. So far as excise tax changes are concerned, and for that matter so far as all tax changes are concerned, the night that the minister makes the budget address the tax changes are regarded as then being in effect. If parliament should later disapprove of the tax changes, then the people who paid the tax in the interval would get a refund. If parliament confirms the tax changes then of course collection proceeds in an orderly fashion.

The British have a little different system. They pass a special bill to cover the gap between the introduction of the budget and the adoption of the bill. I well remember the incident, although not the details to which the hon. member referred, because between the introduction of the resolution in the spring and the actual passage of the resolution and the bill in the fall the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and one or two other hon. members, in whose ridings there are watch-making industries, raised this question. There was one particular case of litigation before the courts concerning a ruling of the taxation department as to whether or not the case and works if imported separately constituted the importation of a watch.

Because of the interest shown by members, the minister himself looked into the matter. I piloted the excise tax bill through that year as I have done in other years, and it was on the minister's instructions that I moved the amendment to which the hon. member has referred. Certainly I was acting for the minister and speaking for him. I must confess that I have not followed the court cases. I would not be expected to for two reasons. First of all I am not a lawyer, and second, the administration of this act once it is passed by parliament falls under the Department of National Revenue. One thing concerning which I am a little surprised, however, is that I cannot recall any correspondence between the hon. member and the minister in that time, and I do see that part of the minister's mail affecting the part of the department with which I have something to do. That is why I am not prepared to answer today.

Mr. Fleming: May I tell the hon. member there was no correspondence between the minister and myself. I know that representations were made by Liberal members to the same effect. I made my representations in the house, and I have referred to the quotations from Hansard.

Mr. Sinclair: The point I am making is that this happened two years ago, and it comes as somewhat of a surprise to have a matter raised which is now two years old. The assurance I gave at that time for the minister apparently is the key to the case. I do not know why the hon. member did not come to me in the interval and say: Sinclair, were you speaking for the government when you gave that assurance? Or to the minister and say: Was your assistant speaking for the government? My point is that I am not prepared to answer now because this is the first intimation I have had about the matter. However, I will say that when the excise tax bill is before the house next week the minister, or if he should not be available I myself, will make a statement at that time on the issue the hon. member has raised.

Mr. Fleming: May I tell the hon. member on that point that I am aware there has been voluminous correspondence exchanged between counsel for these litigants—and incidentally he is a well known Liberal—

Mr. McCann: That does not matter.

Mr. Fleming: —and the minister and officials of his department. There is voluminous correspondence in which these same complaints have been made about a breach of faith.

Mr. Sinclair: I am not concerned about correspondence between counsel and the department. I am a parliamentary assistant. The words which were referred to by the hon. member, and upon which apparently the hon. member makes his case, are words that I as a parliamentary assistant used in the House of Commons. Therefore I would have thought that if he really wanted to know whether this statement was made on the authority of the government he would have come to me some time ago or to the minister instead of raising the matter suddenly in the House of Commons. If he wants to do that it is within his rights to do so, but because of the way he has done it I cannot answer him today. However, I will give the assurance that next week when the excise tax bill for this year is before the house, the minister or myself, if the minister is not available, will answer the points he has raised today.

Mr. Fleming: On a question of privilege, may I point out to the hon. member that the court of appeal gave judgment in this case on April 19. The point could not be raised in the house while the matter was sub judice. It is just a month ago that judgment was finally given in this case.

POST OFFICE—SERVICE TO MONTGOMERY PLACE, SASKATOON

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I too have a grievance that I want to air very briefly this afternoon on behalf of my constituents. Among the veterans housing projects is one which is in my constituency but is adjacent to and often considered to be within the city of Saskatoon, although it is just outside the city limits. These veterans were established there, built their homes under the Veterans Land Act, and settled there with their families. Of course they required certain facilities including postal service. The matter was taken up with the Post Office Department, and as a result after two years of negotiation they were accorded the privilege of having their mail taken from the city of Saskatoon post office for distribution in the area known as Montgomery Place. I think I cannot do better than to put the correspondence on the record. May I say at once that if anyone raises a question about reading correspondence in the house, it is available to the house, and I shall be prepared to table it or do whatever is suggested regarding it. The first recent letter which has a bearing on the matter was written from Saskatoon and is dated October 23, 1948. It is from the office of the postmaster at Saskatoon and is addressed to Mr. G. Edwards, president, Montgomery Place ratepayers association, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan. It reads as follows:

Several months ago a request for postal services for the residents of Montgomery Place was received and forwarded to the Post Office Department for consideration. Although the total number of residents in the community is small—

I believe the number has grown since.

—the Post Office Department, following its policy of providing the best possible service to the people of Canada wherever feasible, has now arranged for a daily service to your community. On this inaugural day, on behalf of the Post Office Department I wish to extend to you and the residents of Montgomery Place our congratulations on the commencement of this new service. We trust that this service will prove adequate to your needs for postal facilities, and wish the community continued growth and prosperity in the coming years.

Yours very truly,

H. F. Hardy, postmaster

In other words, the representations of the veterans living at Montgomery Place were reviewed by the Post Office Department, obviously at Ottawa. After that review facilities were accorded and they were congratulated in the autumn of 1948 on the inauguration of this service. Everything went fairly well until a week or so ago. Then quite suddenly Mr. Tregaskis, who is now president of the Montgomery Place ratepayers association, received a registered letter reading as follows:

Dear Sir:

I have received a letter from the director of communications in which I am advised that our department is not prepared to continue payment for the mail service which has been in existence between Saskatoon city office and Montgomery Place. It appears that this arrangement, which has been in effect for two and a half years, is not in accordance with the general policy of the department.

The service was authorized in the first place through a misunderstanding or a lack of understanding in the department as to the whole situation, and it has been decided to discontinue this service.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

If I may comment there, when a service of this sort is requested and representations are made over a period of time, in this instance two years, surely the officials of the department should have no misunderstanding, certainly no lack of understanding of what the situation happens to be. I continue reading the letter:

Accordingly, Mr. A. C. Suffredine, the contractor for service between Saskatoon and Montgomery Place, is being notified today—

That is May 16.

—of the termination of the temporary arrangement under which he has been operating, to take effect at the end of the present month.

I have been asked to add that if the residents of Montgomery Place wish to have the service continued and are willing to make suitable arrangements at their own expense, there will be no objection by our department. In any such plans which might be made by your association it would necessarily be understood that the responsibility of the Post Office Department would end with delivery of mail to the representative of your association at the city office.

Will you please advise members of your association at the earliest possible date.

Yours very truly,

L. S. Cumming,

District Inspector

In other words, two weeks' notice is given of the discontinuance of this service. If these people desire it continued they must pay for it themselves. Several post office matters of this description have been raised in this house in the past several weeks. I have always understood the post office was a service organization giving service to the citizens of Canada. Apparently just lately something has happened to the Post Office Department, and services that have been given are being withdrawn—I think I use the word advisedly in the light of this letter—arbitrarily.

Of course a protest has been made through the president of the ratepayers association. I might as well put that on the record too. It is dated May 21, 1951, and reads:

The Director of Postal Service,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

It was with great surprise that we received the attached copy of a letter from Mr. Cumming, the District Postal Inspector.

We would like to point out that it was with great difficulty that we obtained this service after two years of correspondence and interviews.

I know that to be the case, so there should not have been any misunderstanding or lack of understanding in the first place as to what this service involved. As I have said, I think the negotiations did cover a period of approximately two years.

When the service was instigated, we were of the impression that everyone concerned was very pleased to extend the service.

That would be indicated, of course, by the letter from the Saskatoon postmaster to the president of the ratepayers association of that day.

> It would seem to us, that if there had been an error in supplying the service it should have been caught before two and a half years had gone by.
>
> We hereby strongly protest the discontinuance of this service and ask that the matter be given further review with the circumstances of all concerned be taken into consideration, and a full explanation as to the reason that this service cannot be supplied.
>
> The Montgomery Place Ratepayers Assoc.,
> I. G. Tregaskis, President.

I may add that a copy of this correspondence was sent to me, and I see from the note on this letter a copy was also sent to the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I believe this matter should be reviewed by the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret). I believe it will be reviewed favourably by the Postmaster General, because I think this is a case where a service was granted after two years of negotiation, where it has been in effect for two years and a half and is absolutely necessary to the people of the district. As the hon. member for Lake Centre will know, and the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) will know, this is in fact a suburb of the city of Saskatoon, although so far as parliamentary representation is concerned it is included in the constituency of Rosetown-Biggar which I have the honour to represent. I hope the Postmaster General will see that this situation is carefully and sympathetically reviewed. I believe that when he thus reviews it he will see the justice of the protest that is being made, and of the representations I am making in which perhaps other members will join me. That, Mr. Speaker, is the matter which I rose to deal with primarily, but there is one other grievance that I wish to bring before the house while I am on my feet. It will take only a very few minutes.

This concerns the matter raised by the member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff) yesterday, cement. I listened to what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said, that he had no responsibility in that regard, but I believe the government should assume some responsibility. I am saying that because again today I had a telephone call from a small contractor just before I came to the house this morning who, in common with other small builders and contractors who have spoken to me or those associated with me, is unable to get supplies of cement.

Mr. Fraser: Unless they pay through the nose.

Mr. Coldwell: I was just going to say that this contractor, who lives in southern Ontario, telephoned me this morning and said he had been unable to get a bag of Canadian cement to fulfil his contracts. He has had to buy imported cement from the United States.

Mr. Fraser: Or Belgian or German cement.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not know whether it is German or Belgian. I do not know whether he has been buying imported cement from those countries. The price of the Canadian cement was $1.15 per hundred pounds, and for the United States cement after the duty is paid on it, $1.75 per hundred pounds, about 60 cents difference in the price. If this man agreed to get ready-mixed concrete from the big cement mixers, he could get it delivered but he wishes, naturally, to mix his own concrete. He believes there is an unfair distribution of this product. In fact, it has been suggested to me that the big concrete mixing concerns are obtaining practically all the Canadian cement available because of their relationship or the relationship of some of their directors with the manufacturing companies. Of that I cannot say anything because I do not know. But I do know that this is a matter which requires the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the members of the government, so that there may be a fair distribution of this important building commodity at a time when many people with small financial resources are trying to build homes and so on in our country, and to improve their property generally. Since I am on my feet I thought I might bring that to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the hope that consideration will be given to this matter. I notice the minister said yesterday that he had not received any complaints. It is a strange thing that some of the rest of us have received complaints coming all the way from, as I said just now, a small city to the south of us right to Halifax, Nova Scotia. I am surprised that the minister has not received complaints; but at least I am bringing to his attention the specific complaint I have today because I believe that the discrimination is fairly widespread across the country at the present time.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to spend a moment or two in supporting the theme of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in regard to the mail service at Montgomery Place. I have here in my hand some correspondence on the matter which goes back over the last year or two; but I shall not take the time of the house to read it, as my leader has already used some of his. Montgomery Place is a veterans small holdings settlement just outside the west boundary of the city of Saskatoon. Prior to the last electoral redistribution, this settlement was within the boundaries of my constituency. But for some reason the redistribution committee saw fit to give it to my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

In passing I should like to say that I think where a city constituency has any rural lands at all close to it, some little space around the city's boundary should be part of the city itself because there are many people who live close to the city and whose interests are in the city. May I say that the people in Montgomery Place are in that position. They send their children to school in Saskatoon, they do their shopping there, and so on. They are really Saskatoon people, and that is the reason for my interest in them today.

Montgomery Place is a settlement of progressive young veterans. They have a sort of little civic organization of their own there which promotes their community interests. They have fought for their rights. They have had trouble with transportation; they have that now. As my hon. friend has shown, they have a problem with respect to getting mail service. It was only a limited mail service but it was a useful one, and they engaged in a long struggle for it. I spoke in this house at the time in their support. The mail was taken out from the post office and distributed locally. As I say, these people carry out all their business—except perhaps the one business of voting—in the city of Saskatoon. Up to the present time they have been served by the Saskatoon post office. As I say, they might be termed Saskatoon people. I would join in the plea made by my hon. friend that this service which they have, and which they now enjoy, should be left with them.

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to intervene in this discussion. I have not before me the information that would be necessary to answer the charges that have been made against the Post Office Department.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister will not think that I was making charges. I was making representations.

Mr. Rinfret: I came into the chamber just at the end of the hon. member's speech. I do not know what was said before that. But I was not referring particularly to the speech of the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell); I was referring to some of the other speeches that had been made in the house.

It seems to me that all these complaints that have been made against the Post Office Department could properly be discussed when the estimates of the department are called before the house, at which time the department officials will be here, and we shall be able to give all the necessary answers. I may say that there are answers to every one of those complaints. As to the question raised by the leader of the C.C.F., may I say that I will certainly look into it. I tried to obtain some information over the telephone a moment ago, but the officials had gone home.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say that the reason I raised this matter this afternoon—I received the complaint this morning—was that the service is to be withdrawn on May 31. It was a matter of urgency.

Mr. Rinfret: I will look into the matter.

INCREASE IN EXPRESS RATES

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, there is a matter that I should like briefly to bring before the house at this time, arising out of a development which occurred yesterday when it was announced that the express rates on shipments of fish from the maritimes to other parts of Canada—and I presume that this would apply to express rates on shipments generally—have been increased by amounts averaging up to 53 per cent of the rates prevailing only a short time ago.

This is a matter of particular importance to the fishing industry of the maritime provinces in general, and particularly in my own constituency where we catch and process a substantial quantity of fresh fish. I am not going to take the time of the house to emphasize the importance of this industry to the maritime provinces in general and to our own province in particular. I think the figures would substantiate the fact that approximately 35,000 people are engaged in this industry in the maritime provinces, not including the new maritime province of Newfoundland; and that last year the value of the fresh fish that was exported—that is, fresh and frozen—was over $33 million. Of that shipment, according to the figures of the Canadian National Railways, over 10 million pounds was sent to Canadian points by express.

That is a substantial quantity of fish moving in that way, although it is true that a larger proportion is hauled either by truck or by freight; and of course that is not affected by the increase. But there are particular advantages in express shipments of certain types of fish; and for those types, it is almost essential. This increase is going to weigh heavily upon the producers.

Unfortunately, despite the importance of the fish industry, as we all know the consumption per capita is not as great as we should like to see it. The per capita increase in the consumption of meat, for instance, between 1939 and the present time was relatively great. I have the figures here, and I will put them on the record briefly. The consumption of meat then was 118 pounds per capita. That consumption has gone up now to 138 pounds per capita. On the other hand in the same period consumption of fish per capita has gone up only from 11·9 pounds to 12·3 pounds, a minor increase, despite the fact that the increased cost of production has been far less than the increased cost of the production of meat. This fact shows that there is a certain sales resistance to the marketing of this product, which has an adverse effect upon it.

There is no doubt in my mind that the increase in these express rates will adversely affect the sale of this product in the Canadian market. Although our consumption per capita is low as a nation, we find that the farther one gets away from the seaboard, the lower that per capita consumption falls. For instance, in Halifax I believe we have a consumption of 35 pounds per capita. When you get to Montreal, that consumption falls to 17 pounds; when you get to Toronto it falls to 15 pounds; and, as I have said, the average for all Canada is less than 12 pounds per capita. An increase of 53 per cent in rates—all the rates are not that high; the increases run from about 20 per cent to over 53 per cent—is going to result in one of two things. Either the consumer will have to pay more or the producer will get less. I do not think there can be any alternative to that whatsoever. If, as I have suggested, in view of the sales resistance, the consumer will probably not pay more, the producer will therefore be compelled to take less if he is going to remain in business. In other words one might say that this will be another indirect tax passed on to the producer and which he will have to bear. I am not at the moment criticizing the express companies for having increased those rates. They have, of course, to earn a profit on the business which they are doing. Possibly they can justify, or have justified, that increase, although I know that many suggestions could be made whereby they could reduce their tolls; but that is a matter which I think deserves the attention of the government.

This government and preceding governments have done a great deal for the development of the fisheries. This government today is spending thousands and perhaps hundreds of thousands on biological research, in development of processing, and in assistance in many ways. All that money is well spent. We appreciate it, but unless you can put your product on the market, sir, unless you can maintain your markets, then those other expenditures are wasted. The money might just as well go down the drain.

The government, having the interests of the industry at heart, I suggest must do something about this new situation which confronts it at the present time. I have a statement which the Minister of Fisheries made some two years ago. The then minister of fisheries said this on May 5, 1949, in so far as the government's responsibility for the fishing industry is concerned:

> This government over the next five years should take further positive steps toward the greater realization of the great fishery potential of the dominion. To help develop these resources and to expand the markets at home and abroad, the federal government should co-operate with the fishing industry in a program of development on the following lines.

I am quoting only one of them.

> (a) for the industry as a whole the federal government should aid both in production and in the greater development of distribution, particularly in the domestic market.

Now, sir, this is a problem of distribution in the domestic market, and a problem which affects the future of this industry in so far as fresh and frozen fish are concerned. It is of tremendous importance to eastern Canada. The industry can grow and develop into a very vital economic factor—it is that anyway. It can develop into a still greater factor. Modern processing equipment and quality products, which are now being produced, augur well for the industry, provided that transportation facilities at a reasonable cost can be made available to the industry. I direct the attention of the government to that.

One other matter, Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet, with respect to the fishing industry; this is a matter which I am sure has been directed to the minister's attention already. Within the last day or two resolutions have been sent to me concerning the effect of the operation of trawlers in the bay of Fundy and in St. Mary bay. The valley boards of trade, representing all the boards of trade in my constituency and I believe in the constituency of the hon. member for Digby-Yarmouth, joined in a resolution, the original of which was sent to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) or is in transit to him, and a copy of which was sent to me.

The situation there is a most serious one. In the old days, as you know, fishermen along that coast were fishing with hand trawls. They were what are called line fishermen. During the last two years there has been quite a development of the trawler. Everyone realizes that, so far as the deep sea fishermen are concerned, trawling is absolutely essential. That is the only way in which you can get large quantities of fish, process them and bring them to market and maintain adequate supplies. But here we are dealing with inshore fishermen, fishermen who go out in little rowboats or motorboats two or three miles off their coast, fishing in inland waters. The operation of the trawler is an entirely different thing

You have two types of trawlers operating, sir. You have the large trawler, the deep sea trawler, coming into the bay of Fundy. There are American trawlers for example operating within three miles of our coastline; but sometimes their navigational aids apparently are in error, and they are found strangely enough close to the coastline, especially on foggy nights. They have been found within a hundred yards of the coast where they have been known to catch lobster pots. That was an error on their part, perhaps. Whereas our Canadian trawlers, operating with Canadian crews, financed by Canadian money, government assistance, are not licensed by this government except conditionally on their remaining twelve miles off our coastline, it is certainly an anomalous thing, Mr. Speaker, when United States trawlers, operating with United States crews and United States money, are allowed to fish within three miles of our coastline. The menace of the trawlers is such that we prohibit our own trawlers from operating within twelve miles. I presume that is a matter for negotiation with the United States government. It is a matter certainly on which some action should be taken.

Then there is the smaller trawler, the otter trawler, which operates under a different licence, and is allowed to fish anywhere near the shoreline. I see by the resolution which came to me this morning from the boards of trade that in the little waters of St. Mary bay, an inland arm of the bay of Fundy, 23 flounder trawlers were operating there the other day and five haddock trawlers, 28 trawlers in all in a little narrow arm of water, catching on the average around 8,000 pounds of fish a day, catching everything, big and small, with spawn and everything else, and each day throwing out hundreds of thousands of fish into the waters, which pollute the water, destroying the fishing beds and destroy the gear of the inshore fishermen.

The big haddock on the coastline of the bay of Fundy that come up there in the spring and summer to spawn and which go back in the fall have been caught for years by our hand fishermen, who thereby have been able to earn a reasonably good living. Now, all these fishermen are finding it extremely difficult to catch fish. The trawlers are capturing these fish by the thousand, and the hand-line fishermen who fish out of these little villages from Scotts bay right down to Victoria beach, in the constituency of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis, are facing ruination unless some action is taken in the very near future.

I bring this matter to the attention of the minister and urge that, with respect to the operation of the large trawler, negotiations be entered into with the United States government to prohibit unconditionally their entry into the bay of Fundy. So far as the otter trawler is concerned, the small trawler, they should be relicensed, and licensed conditionally on their operating at least three miles off our coastline.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT AND CANADA GRAIN ACT

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I shall take but a few minutes to bring a matter to the attention of the government. It arises out of the question asked today by, I think, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) as to whether or not at the present session any amendments were to be made to the Canada Grain Act. The reply of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) indicated that such a possibility did not exist.

I rise for the purpose of bringing the attention of the government to two matters that are more or less connected with the question that was asked by the hon. member. On May 16 the question was asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), followed by a question by myself, which questions appear on Hansard at page 3077. The hon. member for Assiniboia said:

> I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of rising costs of production and an increasing world price level, has the government made any attempt to have reviewed the present ceiling price under the international wheat agreement?

To which the Minister of Trade and Commerce replied:

> The international wheat agreement is an agreement among some forty governments. It is now in its second year of operation, and the only action Canada could take to vary its terms would be to denounce it. Canada has no intention of denouncing it, nor has it any desire to do so.

Then the hon. member for Assiniboia added this question:

> Could the minister not say whether any effort has been made to call in the countries and to talk it over?

No answer being given, I asked this question:

> Without there being any repudiation of the international wheat agreement, could not the government give consideration to communicating with the signatories to the agreement with a view to a revision in prices, having regard to increased costs?

Then the Minister of Trade and Commerce replied:

There are three producing countries involved in the agreement, and at least thirty-seven consuming countries. My hon. friend is optimistic if he thinks that the wishes of the three would prevail against the wishes of the thirty-seven. I presume that the signatories to the agreement would have equal standing in the agreement.

Having regard to the general attitude today in the western provinces, that under the international wheat agreement great losses will be suffered by the Canadian farmers unless there is a revision, that there has been a greatly increased cost of production to farmers, that the agreement is one which endeavours by anticipatory vision on the part of the government to determine conditions in the future, and that having regard to present world conditions, and the probability of those conditions continuing and bringing about a loss to Canadian farmers amounting possibly to hundreds of millions of dollars, something should be done now to secure a reconsideration of the basic prices laid down under the international agreement.

I realize that everything we might want cannot be secured upon request. But at least one would expect the government of the day to sound out the possibility of something being done under that international wheat agreement which does, in fact, contain a provision for periodical revision of price levels.

Yet the attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is simply one of brushing the question aside. There are only three countries which are producers, he says, and thirty-seven that are consumers; and he brushes aside as being impossible the success of any application on the part of the Canadian government for a rewriting of price levels. The international wheat agreement provides for a rewriting of the terms, and for periodical revision. Under that agreement, which will run until August 1, 1953, wheat this year brings $1.80 at Fort William to the Canadian farmer. It provides for the disposal of 500 million bushels of wheat, as follows: Canada is to supply 230 million, the United States is to supply 185 million, and Australia, 85 million.

I make the request of the government that it do something by way of endeavouring to secure a revision in price, in order to secure an increase in the minimum price, as at present set down in the agreement. Unless that is done this international wheat agreement will result in losses being suffered by the Canadian farmers beyond anything we can comprehend at the moment. It is a serious question and deserves more serious consideration on the part of the government than for the Minister of Trade and Commerce simply to brush it aside by saying, in effect, "We have not done anything, because I do not believe that doing anything would secure any results."

I think the time has come for the Canadian government to point out the situation—for, after all, it controls the wheat board, which in recent years has been its puppet for the purpose of carrying out government policy. I believe something can be done, with the international situation as it is today. Nations that are signatory to the international wheat agreement will realize that in the interests of our common defence, if for no other purpose, the producers in the producing countries should be assured a fair and reasonable price, or one more in keeping with present conditions than the international agreement provides.

Secondly I suggest that amendments are necessary to the Canada Grain Act. I say this because of certain facts which have come to light in connection with overages that elevator companies have been able to secure during the last few years. In the report of the wheat board, part IV, addressed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and signed by the board, there is this paragraph that is of interest to every farmer in the prairie provinces. It states in part:

Deliveries to the board on the 1945-49 pool account totalled 1,435,955,510 bushels, of which 1,427,587,096 bushels were purchased from producers and 8,368,413 bushels were purchased from other than producers. The latter purchases represented principally country and terminal elevator overages purchased from agents of the board and for which no producers' certificates were issued by the board.

This means, if these figures are correct—and I believe they are—that the amount of the overages for which payment was not received by the farmers who produced the wheat in that period was 5,621,938 bushels.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. member permit a question? I notice that in placing the figures on record he uses the words "wheat" and "grain" interchangeably. I presume the hon. member is referring to grain.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am referring to purchases made.

Mr. McIlraith: Of grain.

Mr. Diefenbaker: By the wheat board.

Mr. McIlraith: Of grain, not wheat.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The overages totalled 5,621,938 bushels. That is a great many bushels of grain by way of overages for which the farmers have received no payment. I feel there should be an investigation into this matter, with a view to determining the situation in connection with this whole question of overages, and also thereby providing an investigation into the necessity for the making of amendments to the law, so that this situation, if found to be unfair and unjust, will be changed. For, after all, our concern should be for the producer to receive the largest possible return for that which he produced.

Therefore, to sum up what I have endeavoured to place before the house, I would say, in two sentences, first that the time has come for the government of this country to rid itself of the nonchalant attitude exhibited by the Minister of Trade and Commerce regarding the international wheat agreement, and to have representations made to the other countries signatory to the agreement to the end that, having regard to the increased cost of production in this country, there will, in fact, be a revision of the basic or minimum prices provided by the international agreement. That should be done now. This is 1951, and the agreement has still two more years to run. Certainly it will be a matter of great enjoyment to those countries that will be paying less than they should be paying if they know in advance that the Minister of Trade and Commerce simply takes the attitude that nothing can be done even though no representations have been made.

Then, secondly, in connection with the Canada Grain Act, I say consideration should be given to the necessary revisions of the act, if upon investigation it is found that the present system does not properly protect the farmer and assure him proper payment for his product.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

CUSTOMS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO CLARIFY ACT AND TO FACILITATE ADMINISTRATION AND ENFORCEMENT

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 198, to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Government vessels to report.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This section provides that all the provisions of the act relating to certain things "are binding upon His Majesty in right of Canada or a province." This seems to be a rather unusual piece of legislation which is binding, not only upon His Majesty in the right of Canada but also upon His Majesty in the right of a province. The explanatory note reads:

> The proposed subsection is new and is designed to make it clear that federal and provincial governments and their officers must comply with such parts of the act as are designed to give that control of import and export which is essential to the proper administration of the act.

This section purports to go beyond the ordinary tenor of a dominion act and provides that it shall be binding upon His Majesty in right of Canada or a province. While the minister is explaining that, will he explain also just what is the gap in the legislation that this is supposed to cover?

Mr. McCann: There is nothing new in the principle of it affecting provincial as well as federal authorities. As an example, it might be applicable in seizures by provincial authority of liquor coming into the country. They would have to be turned over to a customs official for appraisal.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Do I understand that this legislation undertakes to deal directly and not through the agency of provincial officials? Is that its effect?

Mr. McCann: This is to enact that a provincial official is not free from the application of the law any more than any person else. It applies to provincial officials as well as to federal officials.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We understand that all citizens are bound by any law passed here. The minister has said that this was not unusual, but can he give us an instance that it has been done before? I repeat, we understand that this law will apply to everyone, but it seems to me that the minister is going beyond that.

Mr. McCann: This new subsection merely clarifies the law by placing beyond doubt the legal obligation on all persons, including officers of the federal or provincial governments, to report to customs when entering or leaving the country. The noncompliance with this requirement of government-owned vessels, through misunderstanding of the law, has made it advisable to propose this amendment.

There may be unusual circumstances where for reasons of emergency or convenience certain exceptions might have to be made and, as will be seen later, section 9 of the bill enables the governor in council to exempt from the regulations certain cases or classes of cases. An example would be the reporting by Canadian naval ships in time of war.

The second part of the subsection is similarly intended to make it clear that officers of the crown in the right of Canada or of a province must, like all other persons, meet the requirements of customs in regard to importation of goods, including flotsam, jetsam or wreckage.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister has said that this is not unusual. Will he give another instance where legislation goes beyond dominion officials and is binding upon provincial officials?

Mr. McCann: Subsection 3 of section 2 of the Customs Act reads:

> The rates and duties of customs imposed by this act or the Customs Tariff or any other law relating to the customs, as well as the rates and duties of customs heretofore imposed by any customs act or Customs Tariff or any law relating to the customs enacted and in force at any time since the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven, shall be binding, and are declared and shall be deemed to have been always binding upon and payable by His Majesty, in respect of any goods which may be hereafter or have been heretofore imported by or for His Majesty, whether in the right of His Majesty's government of Canada or His Majesty's government of any province of Canada—

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Detention.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to know something more about the acts which are referred to. The explanatory note reads:

> The proposed subsection is new. A number of acts not administered by the Department of National Revenue nevertheless contain clauses prohibiting under certain conditions import and, in some cases, export of goods of various classes. A customs officer while often directed by the act concerned to give effect to these prohibitions is under the section as it stands directed to release the goods immediately on payment of duty. The amendment will provide statutory authority for existing practice.

I should like reference made at any rate to some of the acts concerned, and I should also like an explanation of the statement that the amendment will provide statutory authority for existing practice. What has been the existing practice and what authority was there for it?

Mr. McCann: As is indicated by the explanatory note, there are acts which permit importation or exportation of certain goods conditional upon their meeting specific standards or requirements laid down by other acts such as the Food and Drugs Act, the Fisheries Act, the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, the Seeds Act, the Fruit, Vegetables and Honey Act, and others. In such cases the government department responsible for the act enforced by our officers is the logical final authority as to whether or not the goods in question comply with the specific conditions or terms of entry. To refer such cases to the competent authority requires the temporary detention of the goods, and all the new section does is to provide the statutory authority for that detention.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What authority has ther been in the past?

Mr. McCann: It is doubtful whether there was any authority. This would save the importer a great deal of trouble and perhaps expense if after his goods were declared they had to be seized and the duty assessed by another branch of the government which could act under its act, for instance, the Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think I can see the reason for it, but what I am interested in is this. I should like to know a little more about it. The minister said a minute ago that it is doubtful whether there has been any authority. How long has that been in existence, and what kind of things have been done without authority? Have people's goods been detained without any authority of any kind, and how does the point arise now?

Mr. McCann: The point arises because of the fact that the act says at the present time that on the importer paying his duty the goods must be released immediately. We contend that it would be advisable to detain the goods until such time as we have received information from the other departments concerned as to whether that type of goods should be admitted to the country.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then do I understand correctly that the act has said that when the charges are paid the goods should be released?

Mr. McCann: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): But notwithstanding that you have been detaining goods in certain cases because you thought, for the purposes of the other acts, it was the wiser course to follow. Is that correct?

Mr. McCann: We try to co-ordinate one department with the other, and in some of the acts governing the importation of goods it says that they shall be held for examination.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We have grown accustomed to orders in council, but is this a case where you did not even bother to have an order in council? Were these just minister's orders?

Mr. McCann: It is stipulated in these other acts. For instance, the Animal Contagious Diseases Act specifically states that animals imported into this country must have a clearance from the authorities of the Department of Agriculture, which administers the act, before we are allowed to release them, even if the duty has been paid.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): But you evidently feel that does not cover you because you are now passing this new legislation. I am just interested in knowing—and I think it is worth knowing as we pass—to what extent power is just taken in your stride, so to speak. We have often made complaints about orders in council but this seems to be a case where, as I said a moment ago, there was no authority of any kind, not even an order in council.

Mr. McCann: There is a conflict of authority that we want to get away from. Our act as it stands says that goods shall be released immediately upon the payment of duty. Some of these other acts say that they shall be detained until there is a clearance from the particular department. In order to remove that conflict or repugnance, if you want to call it that, we are attempting to remove that difficulty by amending this section.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not imagine it is worth pursuing the matter very much further. I am interested to know why the minister speaks about a conflict of authority. I would not regard this as conflict of authority. I would regard it as absence of authority, but I suppose we ought to be thankful that the minister is at last getting the power to do legally what he has been doing illegally.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Goods otherwise exempt, dutiable in certain cases.

Mr. Wright: I should like to ask the minister a question with respect to this clause. It has to do with the collection of duty on goods brought into Canada for use by the armed forces or the government and their resale later. The effect of it is that, where a resale of goods is made to parties who are not entitled to import without paying duties, the duties shall be paid in full. Let us take a piece of equipment which is imported into this country and is used for two or three years. Is the duty payable on the depreciated value of the goods or on the cost value? I ask this question because I have been given to understand that a considerable amount of equipment was imported into Canada in this manner during the last war, and that when it came to pay the duty it was cheaper to ditch the equipment or throw it in a gully than to pay the duty, although there was still a lot of use in the equipment. Do the customs duties have to be paid on the original value or on the depreciated value of the equipment?

Mr. McCann: The hon. member is entirely correct in his observation. When goods are brought in free or at a lower rate of duty, and then pass to other hands, the goods are dutiable in the hands of the new owner at the depreciated value at the time of the transfer.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Overpaid duties not returnable after six months.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will take up the estimates of the Department of National Defence. If we finish them, we will take up agriculture.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 24, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

PRIME MINISTER'S RESIDENCE

Mr. Hodgson:

1. What are the total expenditures for (a) the purchase of a residence for the prime minister of Canada on Sussex street, Ottawa; (b) remodelling such residence to date; (c) who is the architect in charge of the work, and what is the basis of his remuneration?
2. Is the remodelling completed and, if not, what is the estimated expenditure necessary to complete such work?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. (a) The Edwards property at 24 Sussex street, which was expropriated for $140,000; (b) $299,200; (c) (i) Messrs. Allward and Gouinlock, architects, Toronto; (c) (ii) A percentage of the cost of the work as done by them.

2. Remodelling completed.

INDIANS—TUBERCULOSIS

Mr. Winkler:

1. Is the trend toward a reduction in the Indian tuberculosis mortality rate continuing?
2. How many Indians were hospitalized during 1950 for (a) tuberculosis; (b) other conditions?

Mr. Martin:

1. Yes. The death rate per 100,000 for all Canada in 1948 was 488·5 and in 1949 it was 399·6, a reduction of 18·2 per cent.

2. (a) 2,558; (b) 18,497.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct to the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question of which I have not given him notice, but which relates to a conference which has just been concluded. Is he in a position to inform us whether as a result of that conference we may expect to proceed during the present session with the legislation dealing with old age pensions?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As my hon. friend has stated, Mr. Speaker, we have just concluded a meeting with the ten provincial governments in respect of that phase of the proposal which has to do with the age group between sixty-five and sixty-nine. With regard to the government's program in connection with the legislation, as I announced at the conference yesterday, the government hopes to be able to implement its program during the course of the present year.

Mr. Drew: May I ask a supplementary question? I would point out first that the minister did not answer my question whether it was expected that the legislation would be dealt with during the present session. I would also ask the minister why the legislation affecting this age group from sixty-five to sixty-nine could not be dealt with at the same time.

Mr. Martin: Unless I have failed to understand my hon. friend's question, Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can add anything to what I have already said. I am sure that is all I could say under the circumstances at the present time.

GRAIN COMMISSIONERS

QUESTION AS TO REFERENCE OF 1950 REPORT TO AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of which I sent him notice; but in his absence perhaps his parliamentary assistant could take it as notice.

1. According to the Canada Grain Act, the board of grain commissioners must make a report to the minister not later than January in each year. When can we expect to have the 1950 report of the board?

2. Will the minister give consideration to having the 1950 report placed before the agriculture committee of the house for consideration, particularly for the hearing of evidence of producers organizations and other interested parties with regard to (a) grades, and (b) overages?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): With respect to the first question, the annual report of the board of grain commissioners is in the hands of the printer. I am unable to say when it will be back from the printer, but I expect that it will be back very shortly.

With respect to the second question, I will draw the minister's attention to it, and it will be answered in due course.

HISTORIC SITES

REFERENCE TO CONDITION OF OLD FORT YORK, TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): One of the most reliable newspapers in Canada today carries an article to the effect that old Fort York in Toronto is in a deplorable condition. In view of the fact that the property was deeded to the city of Toronto on condition that Fort York be kept in first-class repair, and that not being done, apparently, according to the report, the Department of Public Works may have to take the property over—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Orders of the day.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

VISIT OF PRESIDENT OF FRANCE—SUGGESTED PLACING OF FLAGS IN MEMORIAL CHAMBER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works in connection with the matter of the flags that were in the anteroom of the memorial chamber during the visit of the President of France, to which reference was made the other day. Has he anything further to report?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Yes. I hope to have a definite answer in the near future when I consult Mr. Speaker about it. That should be done in this case, since his jurisdiction comprises the parliament buildings. As soon as we come to a definite undertanding, or the moment I have Mr. Speaker's reaction to the request, I shall let my hon. friend know.

Mr. Graydon: Is there a fair chance of an understanding about it?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I hope so.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence forces—

245. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services and defence research and development, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $3,831,270,000 including authority notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $1,924,170,835 and commitments against future years of $1,907,099,165 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1951-52 will not exceed $1,595,050,000 of which $183,050,000 will be provided from section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, as supplemented by item 246, $1,412,000,000.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): When the committee was last sitting on this item, on Friday, May 11, we were considering the item appearing at page 269 of the book of estimates, civil salaries and wages, $3,489,842. Some hon. members asked for a break-down of this item so as to present the information in the same form as for other departments of the government. At that time I indicated that the information was not readily available in that form. These details were not put in our estimates, at the direction of the treasury board itself, for the reason, I understand, that the growth in the department was so great that any information given would be out of date and not very useful for the purposes of giving consideration to these estimates.

As to the usefulness or otherwise of the information, I think hon. members can judge for themselves when they receive the information which I now give them. As I pointed out at the time, when I was asked for this it took some time to secure the information. I was not aware, at the time I said that, just how much work would be required. The work was started the next day, Saturday, May 12, and the employees worked over both week ends, but only this afternoon did I receive the information, and it is now here on the same basis as for other government departments. It covers a total of 28,154 civilian employees of the department. In a month or two it will be 30,000. Before the end of the year it will probably be 35,000.

To obtain this information it was necessary to run through the cards of all civilian employees in the department and then sort them out by classifications and wage groupings. Altogether a total of fourteen personnel were involved in the task for two weeks and over Saturdays and Sundays.

The information was asked for, and here it is. It was not possible before today to have it mimeographed or printed. I do not think it would be desirable or useful to have it done. If hon. members so desire, it might be printed as an appendix to Hansard, or in the Votes and Proceedings, but I would be the last person in the house to suggest that that be done, or to object if anyone wants it done.

This is not a static department. Since September the development in defence operation, measured in terms of money, has been,

I believe, greater than at any period of corresponding length during the second world war. Perhaps this may be brought home by recalling that during the fiscal year 1939-40 the defence expenditures were $125,679,888, whereas during the following year, 1940-41, they were $647,922,940. But the appropriations voted by parliament for the current fiscal year, 1950-51, which was still in effect when the special session was held last August, amounted to $425 million. Now, as I have informed hon. members, there is available out of the money voted last year, and in the consolidated revenue fund for this year or sought by these estimates for the year 1951-52, a total of $1,879 million.

The change is made plain by considering the number of service and civilian personnel in each of the last four years. Perhaps I might put this short table on Hansard. I will give it to hon. members, though I think it ought to go on in tabular form. It is as follows:

	Civilian Personnel
	Services	Civil Servants	Prevailing Rate	Total Civilian	Total Service and Civilian	Percentage increase over previous year
1947-48	35,419	8,651	11,670	20,321	55,740	....
1948-49	41,676	8,917	11,905	20,822	62,498	12
1949-50	47,185	9,885	13,352	23,237	70,422	13
1950-51	68,427	13,544	14,610	28,154	96,581	37

At the present time the figure for service and civilian personnel in the three armed services, and the department, totals approximately 103,000, and I expect that by the end of the fiscal year it will total considerably over 125,000. Hon. members can see that the figures disclosed for other government departments which are relatively static, showing the number of civil servants in each classification, the salary range and the total for each, is very useful information indeed; but in the case of this department at this time it is of no more use than it would have been during any year of the second world war, when, so far as I know, such information was neither sought nor given. However we have obtained this information here. Here it is; and I shall have photostat copies for each of the parties concerned, as soon as they can be prepared. Meantime if anyone wishes to see these figures, I shall place them on the table so that they will be available.

I should like to indicate in a word or two the policy with regard to the employment of civilian personnel in the Department of National Defence. We find it very difficult indeed to estimate, with close accuracy, the number of civilians we shall be able to engage this year, or the number that will be needed. I suppose that will depend upon circumstances entirely outside the control of the department. This year we shall be working on the re-establishment of seven major air stations, and the creation of a large gunnery range on the northern boundary of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and in addition will be increasing the size, accommodation and operations of a large number of units. How much we can do will depend, in part, upon what equipment we can obtain from the United States, upon events in Korea, and upon the rate of construction made possible by the supply of materials, labour and engineering plans. Upon these results will depend the number of civilian personnel we can usefully employ during the current fiscal year.

Our policy is to employ civilians in every position in which civilians could be properly employed in the event of war. That is, it is our policy to use just as small a number of service personnel as is possible on what may be called civilian occupations. I believe that, compared with other countries, we have succeeded in working that out to good advantage. Our proportion of service to civilian personnel is not far from what it is in the United Kingdom or the United States.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is it in the United Kingdom and the United States?

Mr. Claxton: It is about the same as in our country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Have you the figures?

Mr. Claxton: No, I have not, but I have read them. The reason for this condition is twofold, the first being that civilians cost less than service personnel. The average cost of an other rank in the navy, army, or air force, including pay and allowances, pension, food, clothing, medical and dental services, transportation and other expenditures corresponding to those of a civilian wage or salary, is $3,200 a year. The corresponding expenditure in the case of a civilian doing similar work would average about $2,300 a year.

The second reason, however, is more important, and that is that we want just as large a proportion as possible of our service personnel to be engaged in training and operational duties, and we want to have as large a proportion as possible of service personnel—men, and now women—who are trained and physically fit and of an age suitable to perform duties appropriate to their rank and job throughout the first year of a general war.

This policy has enabled the Canadian forces, navy, army and air force, to be operational to at least as great as if not a greater extent than is found in most other countries, and yet at the same time to maintain the essential services, including communications, training and reserve units and so on, necessary in a country of this size, and to provide the basis for a maximum potential in the event of a general war.

The other day the hon. member for Nanaimo asked me the number of veterans who had had the advantage of veterans educational grants and university training, and who had been taken on in the armed forces. I found we had taken on some 2,600 veteran officers during the period since they might have had the advantage of a university training. We sent the names of those personnel to the Department of Veterans Affairs to see if they could verify from their records how many of these had been the product of the veterans educational grants provisions. We were told that could not be ascertained without going through the files of every one of these veteran officers, and also without having the names in full and, in the case of other ranks, the numbers, of the personnel employed. This would have been a heavy task for the Department of Veterans Affairs, and I did not think the hon. member would want that department to go to so much trouble.

Mr. Pearkes: If it is all that trouble, I shall drop the question.

Mr. Claxton: However, I was able to find that under our own plan of extending educational assistance to veterans who had already joined the active armed forces, or who had expressed the desire to join, there were some 800. This I suggest is a very good yield indeed from that source.

Mr. Pearkes: Would those be persons in the services who still received—

Mr. Claxton: No. This applies to a group who had ceased to be in the services, who had gone to universities and whose university grants had run out. We either enlisted them or secured their undertaking to join the armed forces, with commissions. We subsidized them throughout their final year or, in some few cases, the last two years, and secured some 800 officers as a consequence. It was an extension of the veterans benefits in the case of men who had indicated their intention to join the regular forces.

Mr. Pearkes: The figures given by the minister are slightly confusing, not only because of the vast statistical data given, but because he seemed to wander away from the question originally asked. The question was asked with regard to departmental administration, civil salaries and wages, and the minister gave a total number of civilian employees of 1,220. I presume that those are mainly people located at headquarters. It will be noted that the figures reported on page 2963 of Hansard of May 11 deal with headquarters only, whereas the minister apparently covered the whole field.

Mr. Claxton: The leader of the opposition asked the question with regard to each item, so I gave the answer in one place. Under the head of administration there are 149 permanent and 1,081 temporary, a total of 1,230. The total salaries amount to $3,393,842. In addition, under prevailing rates we have one permanent and 39 temporary, a total of 40, with an additional cost of $96,000. The total for salaries under administration is $3,489,842, which is the figure on page 269. Attached to this are the corresponding details under the heads of navy, army, air force and defence research.

Mr. Pearkes: I am presuming we are dealing now with the numbers given on page 2963?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Pearkes: The other was simply additional information which can be referred to as we go on?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Pearkes: I presume we shall follow the same system which was agreed to at the last sitting and take each one of these items detail by detail and then pass the whole item at the end. I should like to refer briefly to the figures given on page 2963, which show 33 civilian personnel in the minister's office, 44 in the deputy minister's office, and 727 in the inspection service. I presume that the employees in the minister's and deputy ministers' offices are responsible for the preparation in final form of the estimates which have been submitted by the minister. Would those same personnel be responsible for advising the minister as to expenditures being made under the different items, and would they also point out to him that all the money had been expended under one item but had not been expended under another so that, if necessary, changes could be made from one item to another?

Mr. Claxton: That would be ordinarily the function of the deputy minister and those advising him, particularly the associate deputy having to do with finance. They would work closely with the officials of the Department of Finance, the treasury board, the comptroller of the treasury and the services themselves.

Mr. Pearkes: When the minister's attention has been called to the fact that one item has been fully expended and there are still demands under it, has he authority to take money from one item and transfer it to another? If so, where is the line drawn? For instance, the details on page 269 of the estimates show items covering civil salaries and wages and professional and special services. Can changes be made from one of those items to another?

Mr. Claxton: Not at all. We sometimes find that we are able to get more equipment than we expected, or that recruiting is better than we expected; that we are getting more men and that the need for pay and allowances is increased. The deputy minister, with the support of the service concerned, will submit the case for my attention. It is then sent to the treasury board, where it is looked into by their officials. If it is approved by the treasury board, we can proceed.

Mr. Pearkes: There is no authority for making changes?

Mr. Claxton: None.

Mr. Pearkes: So that these various amounts which we pass hold good unless the treasury board grants authority to make a change?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Pearkes: This brings out the value of asking questions and finding out details of expenditures in connection with each of these items, so that we may know exactly where the money is being spent and have the assurance that it cannot be switched unless referred to the treasury board.

Mr. Fair: On May 10, as reported on page 2919 of Hansard, I asked the minister what provision had been or was being made for housing accommodation for the wives and families of men attending the Wainwright camp. On that occasion and at other times previously I pointed out that there was considerable agitation to have something done about housing. I pointed out also that the town of Wainwright had provided school and hospital accommodation as well as water and sewer facilities, but they wanted something done about housing. There just was not enough housing in a general way to take care of these people. I notice that an appeal was made recently by the board of trade to the people of the town, and only nine offers of accommodation for the wives and families of servicemen were received. The situation there should have immediate attention.

I noted a little while ago that something like $2 million is to be spent at Rockcliffe to provide housing accommodation. If Wainwright is to be a permanent camp, something should be done. I should like to know what has been done up to the present time and what is contemplated for the near future.

Mr. Claxton: I suggest that this question might properly come under the head of army on page 271, but since the hon. member asked it in the general discussion and I omitted to answer, perhaps I might do so now. It was not our intention to have Wainwright an all year round training camp. For one thing, and I say this with all respect to the hon. member, it is one of the coldest places in Canada. During Exercise Sweetbriar the temperature went to 58 below and the troops were living out in tents. It has a considerable snowfall as well.

It is an exceedingly good training area during the summer, and it was our intention to use it as a summer training camp for the active and reserve forces. To that end it was intended to make only a limited number of permanent improvements. It was intended also to have a limited amount of Arctic and sub-Arctic winter training done during the winter months for which we would not want married quarters. However, our intention with regard to this camp has changed. It will be necessary to provide accommodation there for a larger number of men. In the first place, we plan to make it a camp which will be suitable for occupation by 5,000 officers and men, about a brigade group, and perhaps later to develop it further. It is the largest single training area we have in Canada with a very suitable terrain for training in summer, but unsuitable for general training in winter. It has 125,000 acres, or about 600 square miles. At the present time, therefore, our program does not include any provision for married quarters there, but in view of the development in our plans which has come about in the last few weeks or months we are reconsidering the situation as to married quarters, not only at Wainwright but also at other camps of a similar type that are being or will be established at places like Gimli, Portage la Prairie, Macdonald, Claresholm, and of course the big area at Lac la Biche, as well as at Penhold. All that is being re-examined in the light of further developments.

Mr. Fair: Have any representations been made during the past two or three weeks with reference to housing accommodation? The minister pointed out the temperature may go down to 58 below zero in the winter, but we also have weather there in the summer that is not suitable for wives and families to live out in the open. We should not treat the wives and families of our officers and men in that fashion.

Mr. Claxton: It is intended to be a highly operational camp where we give personnel more advanced training, although not exclusively for that purpose. Generally speaking in those circumstances it is desirable to put men there for limited periods of time and not to move their families there. That is entering into our considerations. In the same way it is quite unsuitable to have married accommodation for students at corps schools or at air stations, but it is desirable that we have it for the administrative and training staff.

As to representations, I have received two or three letters from the board of trade, the mayor, I believe, and possibly others over the last year or two. I have also received representations from Senator Stambaugh and several others to the same effect, advocating that we proceed in this way.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, at the conclusion of the meeting of this committee on May 11 I asked the minister a question which is recorded on page 2973 of Hansard. It reads as follows:

> Mr. Hees: What is the name and the salary of the temporary director of public relations which the minister mentioned?
> Mr. Claxton: The name is William Dumsday. He is not a temporary director, he is the director of public relations. His salary is $6,000, but he is still a temporary civil servant. He was a wing commander during the war and did the same kind of work with the air force.

On looking at the public accounts for 1950 I find that Mr. W. H. Dumsday, of the Department of National Defence, is listed as receiving a salary of $6,600. The first question I want to ask the minister is whether Mr. Dumsday received the increase which most civil servants received this year.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, he received it.

Mr. Hees: How much did that increase amount to?

Mr. Claxton: I have not the figure for his increase. It would not be ten per cent at that level. His present salary is $6,780.

Mr. Hees: I should like to ask the minister what the explanation is for giving a completely inaccurate answer to a very straightforward and simple question. Can he answer that?

Mr. Claxton: Certainly. I asked the official in front of me; the official, speaking from memory, gave me the answer, and I gave it to the committee. I have filed the correct answer.

Mr. Hees: The correct answer was filed only because I brought up the question just now. I think this brings out the importance of our going into every single item of the estimates one by one, and perhaps if necessary checking every answer with other records such as the public accounts. Does the minister feel that the kind of answer he gave me, which was more than ten per cent wrong, is the kind of answer members of the committee should receive to questions they put to him? Would he mind answering that?

Mr. Claxton: I am not infallible, particularly when I ask an official, he gives me the answer and I give it, incidentally, at about eleven o'clock or 11.01. I might have said that I would wait and give the answer later. In future I shall have to do that, although it will take a longer time, and I do not think the public profit therefrom will be very great.

Mr. Fulton: This seems to me to bring to the fore a question I wanted to ask the minister with respect to the procedure in dealing with these estimates. I do not wish to revive a debate which has taken place a number of times as to the extent to which a committee of the house can go into defence policy, or even the extent to which this committee should go into defence policy. However, I want to refer to the question whether the defence estimates, the financial details, and the financial results of the defence estimates should not be studied by a committee other than this committee of the house, to effect the saving of time to which the minister himself has just referred. He has indicated he doubts whether the public benefit will be promoted by the kind of detailed checking and inquiry which the hon. member for Broadview has indicated he feels should be made.

Mr. Claxton: I can answer that right off by suggesting—

Mr. Fulton: I have not finished the question yet, so I do not know how the minister can answer it.

Mr. Claxton: I thought you had.

Mr. Fulton: No, I am sorry. It may well be argued—

Mr. Claxton: Then, Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. This matter has already been decided by this committee at this session. It has also already been decided by the house to refer these estimates to the committee of supply, and I suggest that the hon. member's remarks are out of order.

Mr. Drew: Surely that is not the kind of suggestion that is going to help to advance the discussion of these estimates. There is no time during the session when it is not open to the ministry to recommend to the house that appropriate steps be taken for the reference of items to another committee. There is no reason within the rules or practice that would prevent the minister at this point from moving that the committee rise and report progress, if it can be called that, and then indicating that he had asked the committee to rise in order to move that the items be referred to such a committee as deals with similar items in the case of the Department of External Affairs. I simply rise to point out that the answer the minister has just given is inconsistent both with the rules and with the practice.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, may I speak to the point of order? The leader of the opposition surely has not overlooked the fact that the house has referred these estimates to the committee of supply. We got into supply by order of the house, and, having done so, it is not proper for us to do anything but pass an item, or reduce an item, or rise and report progress.

In the second place, on May 11, as reported at page 2942 of Hansard, a motion was made that the committee rise and report progress pending reference of defence expenditures to a select committee. On that motion there was a vote, and the committee itself voted it down. That being so, that matter cannot be further discussed by this committee. So I submit that on both grounds any reference to any method of dealing with defence estimates except the method parliament has decided upon and the committee has confirmed is entirely out of order, completely useless, and a waste of the time of the committee.

Mr. Drew: I find it difficult to believe that the minister is putting forward this argument at all seriously. After all, these items have come before the committee on previous occasions, and the motion has been made that the committee rise and report progress. The minister is now suggesting that once a motion of that kind has been made it cannot be repeated. The motion to rise and report progress can be and is made over and over again. I am pointing out that if the minister became convinced that it would be the wiser and more sensible course, as we believe it would, to have these estimates referred to a committee, it would only be necessary for him to move that we rise and report progress, and then, with the Speaker in the chair, move that these items be referred to such a committee as deals with similar items in the case of similar departments. That was the point I made, and that has not been answered in any way by what the minister has said.

Mr. Fulton: On the point of order may I indicate that the motion on May 11, at page 2942 of Hansard, to which the minister has referred, suggested that the estimates be referred for detailed study by a select committee. The point I wished to bring to the minister's attention was that the motion to refer these estimates to a standing committee, namely the standing committee on banking and commerce, has in no way been decided by the motion to which reference has been made. I say this particularly in view of the fact that in the other place the estimates of all departments are referred to a committee. There is no objection to the estimates going before the committee on finance of the Senate, one of the standing committees of that body which is now examining deputy ministers in connection with their estimates. No objection is raised by any department to the procedure being followed there. It seems to me the only committee of this house that would be qualified to deal with the estimates in that way so far as this house is concerned is the standing committee on banking and commerce.

My purpose in rising was to ask the minister, in view of the fact that in the other place estimates are referred to the standing committee on finance, whether he would object to having these estimates referred to our standing committee on banking and commerce, particularly since the minister himself raised the point that the type of questioning which we feel should be pursued in connection with these estimates, and which I think the public feel should be pursued to get all the details of expenditures—and the last details, if necessary—would not be conducive to the public benefit. If that is the feeling—and there may be an argument in favour of it in committee of the whole—why not refer the estimates to the banking and commerce committee, in exactly the same way as the estimates are referred to and examined by the committee on finance in the other place?

The Chairman: Does any other hon. member wish to speak on civil salaries and wages? I understood we had agreed to proceed with this item by item.

Mr. Fulton: I asked the minister a question. The hon. member for Nanaimo pointed out that the deputy minister, whose salary is paid under this vote, is responsible for the estimates. The hon. member for Broadview raised a question in connection with the salary of another official who is paid out of the civil salaries vote. The minister said he did not think this type of questioning was proper or useful in this committee, in that it might involve delay which would hold up the public business. Therefore I made the suggestion that we should have the estimates referred to the committee on banking and commerce so that we would not hold up public business, and I would like an answer from the minister on that point.

Mr. Claxton: We have already decided to have the estimates dealt with in this committee of supply. I do not know why hon. members want to defeat the will of the house.

Mr. Fulton: I am asking the minister what his objection is to the suggestion—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: —that these estimates be referred to the banking and commerce committee, a question which we have not decided. We did have a motion that they be referred to a special or select committee, which motion I agree was not adopted. I am now pointing out the procedure followed in the other place. I am referring to an objection by the minister to the type of question being asked and the delay involved. The minister himself has furnished the best argument as to why this whole matter should be re-examined. If he will look at it I submit he will find that we have not made any binding decision in this matter, so if he will I should like him to answer the question I have raised.

Mr. Claxton: I would like to get on with the discussion of these estimates which hon. gentlemen have been talking about for a long time. I would like to get on with that discussion in accordance with the rules of this house.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has just objected that too many delays would arise from the procedure that is being followed. In reference to the question asked by the hon. member for Broadview the minister said he did not think the delay in obtaining answers to questions of that type would be conducive to the public good. He says he is anxious to proceed with the discussion of these estimates, but he has also told us he does not want this type of discussion. It seems the minister has made up his mind to get his estimates through in the way which will permit him to give the least information, because if the estimates were referred to a committee he would have to give more information than apparently he is willing to give.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The last time these estimates were before the committee the hon. member for Nanaimo became impatient, I think, and asked whether we were through with the general discussion and if we could determine the procedure we would follow. Right at the adjournment it was agreed that at the next sitting we would take the details of these estimates on page 269. Today the hon. member for Nanaimo rose and said he believed it was understood that we should proceed with the details on page 269. No one raised any objection; if I recall correctly the Minister of National Defence replied in the affirmative. Now I would like to know if the hon. member for Kamloops agrees with the hon. member for Nanaimo. We have to follow some directive; we have to come to some decision, and that decision has been arrived at twice since we began to discuss these estimates. The hon. member for Kamloops wants to talk before the banking and commerce committee. That committee is sitting regularly; he can go there and present any argument he wishes. Now, however, we are in committee of supply, following the procedure suggested by the hon. member for Nanaimo, and perhaps he would have enough influence to pacify the hon. member for Kamloops on this matter and let us deal with the estimates in the ordinary course.

Mr. Pearkes: On a question of privilege, the Minister of Public Works has suggested that I showed impatience. I want to assure him through you, Mr. Chairman, that my patience is inexhaustible, and that I do not think I have shown impatience at any time in this house. In accordance with the rules I asked at the commencement of the discussion this afternoon whether we were going to proceed detail by detail, in the hope that we might make progress. But there are a lot of questions, as I pointed out, which have to be asked under this item of civil salaries. I have several more questions I want to ask under this item, because, as has been pointed out, this is our only chance of examining these estimates and advising the people of Canada on the expenditure of this money which the minister has already said will be allocated in definite ways which cannot be changed except by reference to the treasury board. I do not think the opposition would be carrying out its duties properly unless it went through these estimates item by item. I am inclined to think that the word "progress" is not parliamentary any longer; and because no progress is being made, it has been suggested that another system be followed. If there is any other system than the one I have suggested, I am only too pleased to follow it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Never were we ever so close, Mr. Chairman. We agree. The difference does not arise between the hon. member for Nanaimo and myself. The difference is between what the hon. member for Kamloops wants us to do and what the hon. member for Nanaimo wishes to have done. It was decided—and I do not think the hon. member would contradict me—that we take the details, found at page 269, of the national defence estimates. Now the young hon. member for Kamloops is not satisfied. That is why I suggested a conference between those two members of the same party who disagree on this question, in order that they may come to some understanding so that we may make progress.

The hon. member says no progress is being made. If every time we bring forward a detailed item it is suggested that we go before some committee of the house and we spend twenty minutes or half an hour discussing that point, I cannot see that we shall ever make any progress. If the hon. member will just look at the details, he can see what is given, and then with all his cross-examination he can get those he wants. If he does that—and I think the hon. member for Nanaimo does it well—I think he will be more appreciated even in his own party.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Public Works, whose genial approach to the problems of the house usually advances matters more than has just been done in these last remarks of his, has obviously missed the point that was being made by the hon. member for Kamloops. .There is no difference between the point of view which has been expressed by the hon. member for Kamloops and that of the hon. member for Nanaimo.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Drew: What happened arose out of the fact that the hon. member for Broadview pointed out that, to a question as to the salary of one individual civil servant certainly covered by the very item under discussion, namely, "civil salaries and wages", he had received the answer that the salary was $6,000. He then referred to the public accounts for the year ended March 31, 1950, which show that up to that time the civil servant in question had received $6,600. I might point out that since that time there have been substantial increases, and that unless there was discrimination against this particular individual, he is probably receiving substantially more than that now. When asked for an explanation as to the discrepancy between those figures, the minister gave an utterly unsatisfactory answer which implied that this was not the kind of thing which was going to produce useful results. If there is to be a complete disregard of the necessity for explanation of a discrepancy in regard to a figure—it is true that in this instance it is only $6,000—

Mr. Croll: $600.

Mr. Drew: The basic figure under consideration is $6,000; because the hon. member for Broadview then said "ten per cent". If there is a ten per cent margin of error all the way through here, it becomes quite a serious matter when we get into single items of $30 million or more, as we shall be doing in a moment; or perhaps that is optimistic, and I should say that we shall be considering it some time.

An hon. Member: Within a few days.

Mr. Drew: We shall get there much more quickly, however, if an attempt is not made to create the impression that we are getting all the information when we do not get the information that is asked for when particular items are discussed in this way.

There is no difference between the view expressed by the hon. member for Nanaimo and that expressed by the hon. member for Kamloops. The hon. member for Nanaimo has made it perfectly clear that he too believes that a committee should deal with these estimates and get the kind of information that we should have, without our taking up the time of the committee in trying to ascertain why inaccurate answers have been given by the Minister of National Defence.

The Chairman: Order. I think it would be a good thing for me to read what was said by the deputy chairman, and what was agreed upon, on May 11, as reported at page 2943 of Hansard. The deputy chairman then said:

> We had a discussion on civil defence, and the consent of the house had been given earlier to this type of procedure, which has been interrupted by the motion which has just been defeated. Is it the wish of the committee to follow from now on the procedure which was agreed upon earlier?
>
> Some hon. Members: Agreed.
> The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I should point out to the committee that the way I propose to call these items will be in the order in which they appear on page 269 of the estimates, under the various headings, the first one being departmental administration, including inspection services and civil defence; the second one being imperial war graves commission; the third being navy; the fourth, army; the fifth, air; and the sixth, defence research and development. This is item 245 as detailed under these various headings. Is that satisfactory to the hon. members?

Mr. Drew: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Therefore, I will now call the first section of these detailed sums of item 245, appearing under the heading "Departmental administration, including inspection services and civil defence." These details appear on page 269.

The first sub-item is actually what we are considering—"Civil salaries and wages".

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to point out that in the course of examining item 245, civil salaries and wages, the Minister of National Defence himself suggested that the method being followed in the production of answers would impose a delay which he felt would be detrimental to the interests of the country and the progress of the house. It was because he said that this does not appear to be the best way to deal with it, when we were making an effort to deal with it in that way which had been suggested, that I said: All right, if you say that, and if you make that point, then how about referring it to the banking and commerce committee?

That is how this matter arose. We were trying to follow the only method open to us, and in the course of the discussion the Minister of National Defence said that we were wasting too much time. In effect, that is what he said. That is why I have suggested that the estimates be referred to the committee I have mentioned.

It is nonsense for the Minister of Public Works to say that the hon. member for Nanaimo and I are in disagreement. We were following the method suggested and were considering the details one by one. In the course of the examination, the Minister of National Defence suggested that this method will not work, that it is too wasteful of time. I then said: Very well; let us refer it to another place. The Minister of Public Works will find that it is his colleague, the Minister of National Defence, whose attitude has given rise to this discussion today and who suggested that we should depart from the agreed procedure.

I still feel that we might have from the Minister of National Defence an answer on the merits. In view of the detail which is being asked for here, and the care with which the replies have to be checked—and I feel that he is on quite proper ground in saying that—if he feels that that procedure will necessitate such delay as to hold up unduly the work of the house, then I should like to hear from him on the merits of the question why it would not be proper and expeditious to refer the estimates to a standing committee of the house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, we cannot be moving at every sitting on these estimates to report progress and then have a motion made to refer them to a special committee or to a standing committee. I think I would follow the advice of one of the wise men in the house on these questions, namely, the hon. member for Nanaimo. He is ready to put many questions, if some of his young colleagues would give him a chance to do so.

Mr. Fulton: This is just nonsense, Mr. Chairman. We put a question—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Can the hon. member not find another word?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I should like the hon. member to withdraw that word. I never use it at any time. He seems to have the habit of thinking that he has the monopoly on sense and that everyone else lacks it.

Mr. Fulton: The minister's suggestion that we were not following the procedure suggested by the hon. member for Nanaimo is so far from the fact as to have the appearance of nonsense; we were following that procedure.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is the only word the hon. member knows.

Mr. Fulton: We were following that procedure, and the Minister of National Defence himself suggested that to follow that procedure would be to waste the time of the committee. If the Minister of Public Works will reconcile the attitude of the Minister of National Defence with his own attitude, as he has just put it forward, we might make progress.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Is the hon. member trying to interpret what I said?

Mr. Fulton: If we follow along the suggestions made by the Minister of Public Works, his colleague says that we are wasting time. I suggest that the two ministers get together and work out the best procedure. When they do that we might make some progress.

The Chairman: Order. Speeches in committee must be strictly relevant to the item under consideration. Are there any other questions on civil salaries and wages?

Mr. Harkness: Yes. Having done a little checking up in Hansard for the last two or three days during which this discussion has proceeded, and also in public accounts, I find that the matter brought up by the hon. member for Broadview is just one of several in which there are either discrepancies or apparent discrepancies between the information contained in public accounts and that given by the minister in committee of supply. I should like to ask him about two or three of these.

At page 2969 of Hansard the hon. member for Nanaimo asked this question:

> Is there any other officer under this heading who is drawing a salary of $10,000? For instance, is there a controller of the inspection services? If so, what is his salary?
> Mr. Claxton: His salary is $8,500.

I refer to page N-49 of the public accounts for 1950 and I see that W. G. Mills, controller general of inspection services, receives $12,000 instead of $8,500. What is the explanation of that?

Mr. Claxton: I shall be very glad to give it. Mr. W. G. Mills was at that time the controller general of inspection services at a salary of $12,000. At the present time P. S. Conroy is director of inspection services at a salary of $8,500.

Mr. Harkness: This Mr. Conroy whose name appears further down on the list on page N-49 at $6,300 is the same man, I presume?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: He has been promoted to this job at this lesser salary?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: Why the difference in salary between $12,000 that the job formerly carried and $8,500 now being paid?

Mr. Claxton: In order to save money.

Mr. Harkness: Is there a scale of $8,500 to $12,000? Is that what the minister means, or is this—

Mr. Claxton: No; this is a special appointment. The salary is fixed by the treasury board on the recommendation of the civil service commission.

Mr. Harkness: A little further down on the same page, the hon. member for Nanaimo asked about the assistant deputy ministers, and the minister says there is one assistant who get $8,000. I see one assistant listed in the public accounts at $6,900. Does that mean his salary has been increased $1,100 in the year?

Mr. Claxton: There is only one assistant deputy minister. He receives a salary of $8,000 per annum.

Mr. Harkness: He is listed in public accounts for 1950 at page N-49, Mr. Sharpe, $6,900. My question was: Has this salary been increased by $1,100 in the last year?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: Was that saving money also, as the minister intimated in the last instance?

Mr. Claxton: Making an adjustment in accordance with recommendation of the royal commission on salaries for the senior civil servants, and which I think has been long overdue in a great many cases.

Mr. Harkness: Then a little later on the hon. member for Nanaimo said:

> Having dealt with that, how many special advisers has the minister?

The minister replied:

> None. I beg your pardon, yes. Engineer Rear Admiral Stephens—

And so forth. It seems to me that either in the public accounts committee or somewhere else I received information that there were special advisers or special assistants to the minister. Probably one of them is General Worthington. He is listed here as a special adviser, but last week I think the minister said he was no longer acting in that capacity, since he has gone over to civil defence.

Mr. Claxton: That probably would be one of the cases. In the department he was called co-ordinator of civil defence, but since February 23 he has been transferred to the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Harkness: Is there any other special assistant now?

Mr. Claxton: No, there is no special assistant; there is an executive assistant to the minister.

Mr. Harkness: Who is he, and what is his salary?

Mr. Claxton: Paul Pare, $5,600.

Mr. Harkness: Then I notice a man listed here as B. B. S. Campbell, salary $8,300. Then the following words appear: "including terminable allowance, $1,400". This note appears in public accounts at page N-49. Is he still on the staff? Does the phrase "terminable allowance" mean that he has been discharged? What is his job?

Mr. Claxton: He is still on the staff. He has to do with real estate, acquisition and disposal.

Mr. Harkness: Is there an official position called co-ordinator of construction?

Mr. Claxton: Works and construction. He has to deal with real estate, works construction, for the whole department.

Mr. Harkness: I thought all construction and so forth was handled by the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, but somebody has to send submissions and contact the men of the Canadian Commercial Corporation; also the department decides what it should do and then asks the Canadian Commercial Corporation or Defence Construction Limited to do the job for us on our instructions. But we have quite a considerable staff, both in the department and in the services, engaged in deciding where we shall go, what we shall do, looking after inspections to a certain extent, and also of course supervising the design of buildings.

Mr. Harkness: The minister means that this Mr. Campbell is to some extent an architect, or carries on work of that kind?

Mr. Claxton: No. As far as I recall he was a former official of the Canadian Bank of Commerce engaged in construction, and since the war has been engaged in this operation for the department. He is, I think, considered, and very rightly so, highly skilled in matters of real estate, construction, planning and the like. He looked after this for the Canadian Bank of Commerce, I understand, and has had a great deal to do with this work in the department. That is a very large part in the department's operation.

Mr. Harkness: What is his salary at the present time without this terminable allowance?

Mr. Claxton: It is $8,000.

Mr. Harkness: What is this terminable allowance? Why is he to be paid that?

Mr. Claxton: The reason for that is that his work is considered to be a very great responsibility, and a job that really justified a higher rate than this. The decision was that it should not be a rate above that of an assistant deputy minister, for which the current salary is $8,000. However, in view of the magnitude of the operations, the amount involved, and the great skill shown in handling them by Mr. Campbell it was established that he should require an additional allowance of $800 terminable on his ceasing to fill that appointment.

Mr. Harkness: Does the minister mean by that that he will continue to get this extra $1,400 every year above the salary of $8,000?

Mr. Claxton: No; this $8,000 includes the terminable allowance. It was $6,600 salary plus $1,400 terminable allowance. They have now been consolidated into a salary of $8,000, which is the same salary as that of an assistant deputy minister.

Mr. Fleming: I understand the minister, in the course of the statement he made earlier, indicated that in the inspection service under this item there are 727 persons employed. I should like information on the item. First of all, are they all civilian personnel, and will the minister indicate the particular type of inspection service they render?

May I say in connection with that subject that this, I suggest, will call upon the minister for some indication of the way in which this inspection service is carried out vis-à vis the inspection service rendered previously by Canadian Commercial Corporation and now, under the new set-up of the Department of Defence Production, by Defence Construction Limited. Are any of those persons engaged in the inspection service in connection with the acquisition of property? Does their inspection extend that widely, and what is their relationship to the inspection service carried on by those charged with the negotiation of contracts, and the acquisition of properties or supplies under those contracts?

Mr. Claxton: The employees of the inspection service listed here are all civilians. They inspect all equipment of every kind purchased for the department, or the armed services, which requires inspection—except in a few and rather limited number of cases where an outside inspection firm is hired. They have to do with the inspection of ships, aircraft, armament, ammunition, food, clothing, barrack-room stores and everything else used by the armed forces.

With regard to their relationship to Canadian Commercial Corporation, while they work closely with that organization—or with Defence Construction Limited—they do not duplicate any of the work being done. The inspection of construction by architects or engineers is done by architects or engineers engaged by Canadian Commercial Corporation or Defence Construction Limited, but acceptable to this department, reporting directly to it, and working very closely with it.

In the case of operational buildings inspection is done by members of the armed forces themselves. In addition to the civilian personnel to which I have referred, a considerable number of service personnel are engaged in inspection. Our effort is to integrate the two, so that they will be kept in line with each other. We hope to increase that so that we will have service personnel, who represent the user, working closely with civilian personnel in the inspection service. I should like to add, as I said two weeks ago, that the inspection of equipment is carried out at every stage, so that at a plant such as that of the A. V. Roe Company there will be a large number of inspectors inspecting every part of each plane as it is made.

Mr. Fleming: I take it then that it is clear that none of the 727 persons referred to is engaged in any respect in connection with the inspection of properties or defence projects. They are all on other forms of equipment or supplies; is that correct?

Mr. Claxton: They would be involved in the inspection of materials entering into construction which was undertaken by a department of the services themselves. We would ordinarily employ architects or outside engineers, through Canadian Commercial Corporation and Defence Construction Limited, to inspect finished properties.

Mr. Fleming: There is a point in that connection that is not entirely clear. The minister has indicated that these 727 persons are all civilians. We are aware of the fact, of course, that some of the military personnel in the department do carry out the inspection of construction, and give their approval before a construction project is finally assumed by the department. In other cases professional persons or firms outside the department are engaged for the purpose of supervising and checking construction projects. But I understood from the minister's earlier statement that the kind of inspection that was carried out by the department was carried out exclusively by military personnel. I had taken from his earlier answer that none of the 727 persons has anything to do with the inspection of properties—that is to say, construction projects and properties. The minister's last answer leaves me in doubt as to whether that is the situation.

A considerable number of these 727 apparently are engaged in the inspection of equipment and materials coming in. Then he went on to speak about materials entering into construction projects.

Mr. Claxton: I went on to speak about materials entering into construction projects undertaken by the armed services, or the department itself. There are a limited number of construction projects, and that number is becoming fewer and fewer, in which we do a job of adding to a building here or there, without letting it out as a contract. In those cases the materials and construction would be inspected either by service personnel or by a member of our inspection service. We would not go out and, in addition, hire an architect or a contractor through Canadian Commercial Corporation to make that inspection.

Mr. Fleming: Then, one other point, which is suggested by a reference made in another place. Has there been any change within the last year or two in the method of carrying out this inspection service, either with reference to construction projects on the one hand or the inspection of supplies and materials on the other?

Mr. Claxton: I would have to make an inquiry to ascertain that. There must be changes every day in the technique and operation of inspection, particularly as the type of equipment is changing. For example we are now making a three-inch 50-calibre naval gun, requiring a large number of inspections. But that work is supplemented at Sorel Industries Limited by inspection made by United States naval personnel. How much they co-operate and how they interchange their information, I do not know but I can find out. There must be many developments of that kind.

Mr. Fleming: That is not the point; it is a question of some change within the last year or so in inspection procedure, or the method followed in the department in reference to inspection. The point is as to whether that has any bearing upon the respective functions of the Department of National Defence on the one hand and Canadian Commercial Corporation or the Department of Defence Production on the other.

Mr. Claxton: I am afraid the hon. member has not made his inquiry sufficiently clear to enable me to understand what he is getting at, or what information he wants to have.

Mr. Fleming: Information in regard to the inspection procedure now obtaining either in the minister's department, on the one hand, or, on the other hand, the Department of Defence Production, Defence Construction Limited, or its predecessor, Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. Claxton: I should think that there would be steady development in the practice. I do not know personally of any major change in procedure and none has come to my attention or to the attention of the officers before me. I shall make inquiries, however.

Then with regard to the question asked by the hon. member for Broadview, I recognize that I was in error and I am sorry to have made the error. The reason for making it was that Mr. Dumsday was appointed to his position at a salary range of $6,000 to $6,600. The official before me, speaking from memory, told me that he was at the minimum of the salary range, or $6,000. Instead he was appointed at the maximum of his range, or $6,600. When the general increase for civil servants was passed his classification was increased to $6,180-$6,780, and Mr. Dumsday's salary was increased to that maximum. His increase in consequence of the general increase was only $180.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask a question following that of the hon. member for Eglinton in connection with inspection and the sharing of duties of inspection. I am rather troubled by the number of agencies engaged in this work. I am rather reminded of the old rhyme:

> Larger fleas have smaller fleas
> Upon their backs to bite 'em;
> And these again have other fleas
> And so ad infinitum.

I do not minimize the importance of inspection because I realize it is a most serious matter. First we have national defence with its inspectors—I notice that the minister has said that he is hoping to increase the number of service personnel working on inspection along with the civilian personnel—then we have Canadian Commercial Corporation, although I understand that their status is to be reduced somewhat. Then we have defence production and defence construction, and then Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation acting as special advisers. It is almost inevitable when you have so many agencies employed at the one task that duplication occurs.

We had some rather frank and clear statements from the officials in the public accounts committee as to what the practice used to be. We are not allowed to come up to date in the public accounts committee. Would the minister indicate, first, whether he is satisfied that these duties are well apportioned and, second, if there has been any overlapping?

Take the case where the defence department orders aeroplanes. I understand that first they would determine what they want. Then they pass that information on to some other agency, I suppose defence production. Then they would have to follow it through to see that they get what they want as to both specification and quality. The Minister of Defence Production told us the other day that that department plays a part in this matter, and I should like to quote his statement, as reported on page 3099 of Hansard of May 16:

> The engineering staff of defence production is small, but engineering services available to Defence Construction Limited are retained for the purpose of inspecting construction.

My understanding is that that refers exactly to what the minister said, to various types of construction and not to munitions of war. I come back to my question and ask the minister to indicate the division of duties among these agencies. I cannot say that it is too clear, but I should like to know whether the minister is satisfied with what they are doing. Let us take the question of aeroplanes. Will he indicate the division of the functions of the Department of National Defence, defence production and its ancillary companies?

Mr. Claxton: I should like to ask the hon. member who has just expressed these vague fears if he knows of any reason for having them. If he knows of any failure of the services engaged in inspection to do their job properly I should like to hear about it. I have not heard about it and therefore I can assure him that I know of no reason for expressing dissatisfaction with the present situation. I hear of all cases that involve trouble, and I have heard of no case.

The hon. member asks me if I am satisfied. I am never satisfied with anything because I believe that everything can be improved. But we like to have constructive proposals upon which we can base improvement. This situation has been explained twice already, and I think again in the public accounts committee, but I shall try to do it again. There is no confusion.

The inspection services, acting for the Department of National Defence and the three armed services, navy, army and air force, either themselves or by means of outside inspectors in a small number of cases who are engaged because they have special experience and facilities and equipment which we have not—for example, in road building—inspect everything that we buy that requires inspection. That is, almost everything.

With regard to construction, that is done by architects or engineers engaged by Canadian Commercial Corporation or Defence Construction Limited, but with our recommendation of the persons involved. But at almost every stage on important undertakings there are service personnel involved also.

Let us trace an order for aircraft from the beginning to the end. In the case of the F-86E we negotiated with the United States government for the acquisition of the right to make the aircraft in Canada. Air force experts were sent down to the North American Aviation Company plant at Los Angeles where they studied the production of the aircraft. They were joined by representatives of Canadair Limited who also studied the production of the aircraft. They then brought back to Canada not only plans and blueprints but jigs and dies and perhaps the special inspection instruments required.

Then construction was started at Canadair Limited. Throughout the whole operation representatives of the armed forces would be present in three or four capacities, one being that of inspection. There would also be civilian inspectors who would inspect every part as it is made. Then finally the armed forces, with such civilian assistance of the inspection services as they may require, would inspect and flight-test the performance of the finished product. This works the same as it does in other countries. It applies the principle of inspection by the consumer for the consumer, and we think it is a good arrangement. If anyone suggests any improvement we will be very glad indeed to consider it.

Mr. Drew: Since the minister has raised the question of examination of aircraft as an example of the inspection service mentioned, would he take this opportunity to deal with a question that was asked earlier as reported at pages 3027 and 3028 of Hansard? It has to do with a press report of May 15 that approximately 1,000 planes are to be borrowed from the United States. Since this would tie in with the question of inspection, I would think it would be appropriate to explain how this is being handled, what inspection methods are being devised, and what the actual number of aircraft is that is being brought in in this way.

Mr. Claxton: I think it would be a good thing to deal with civil salaries and wages at this time.

Mr. Drew: It is interesting how quickly the minister decides that we should only deal with salaries and wages after he has just used as an illustration the inspection of aircraft. Since he has dealt with inspection of aircraft, I suggest it would be appropriate that he explain whether the same inspection groups will deal with the inspection of the aircraft that are being brought in, and which for obvious reasons would require perhaps an even more exacting type of inspection.

Mr. Claxton: The question of the leader of the opposition extended far beyond the realm of inspection. In the first instance he asked about the whole deal, but I do not mind when I answer these things, and I will try to do my best. But I do think it is a good thing to proceed in an orderly way. With respect to this matter, these aircraft do not number 1,000 but 100. They are borrowed from the United States. They are the T-6, which is the Harvard with modifications. They are being delivered at Trenton by the United States air force, and are in good working condition. Any inspection that is done on them is done by service personnel, and is largely in the nature of test by flight. These aircraft are aircraft with which we are very familiar.

At the end of the year we will return to the United States 100 equivalent aircraft, and whatever inspection arrangements are provided with regard to one lot of aircraft will apply equally to the other. We will get from the United States aircraft in good working condition. We will return to them aircraft in good working condition. The operation has just started. I have not had brought to my attention details of inspection in addition to anything I have said. If it is desired I can get it.

Mr. Hees: What are the qualifications for these civilian inspectors? I am particularly interested in four categories of manufacture: guns, small arms, aircraft and motor vehicles. I should like to know what kind of qualifications a man has to have before he can be an inspector employed by the Department of National Defence to inspect in plants manufacturing these various articles of war, and also what kind of salaries are paid to those performing these various services?

Mr. Claxton: The appointments are all made by the civil service commission in accordance with classifications that have been established by them. They were worked out during the war in connection with the joint inspection board, and have been changed from time to time since. Of course they are also in accordance with the views of our department. The salary ranges vary. They are scattered all the way through. For example, for an engineer grade 1 the range is $2,700 to $3,240; engineer grade 2, $2,976 to $3,888; engineer grade 3, $3,888 to $4,524; engineer grade 4, $4,272 to $4,896. Then there is inspector grade 1, $4,584 to $5,208; inspector of stores grade 1, $2,064 to $2,496; grade 2, $2,568 to $2,904; grade 3, $2,976 to $3,444; grade 4, $3,444 to $3,888.

Then there is technical officer, grade 2, $2,904 to $3,576; technical officer grade 3, $3,576 to $4,212; technical officer grade 4, $3,888 to $4,524; technical officer grade 5, $4,272 to $4,896. Then there is technician, grade 1, $2,772 to $3,028; grade 2, $2,904 to $3,240; grade 3, $3,240 to $3,576; grade 4, $3,576 to $3,888.

Mr. Hees: What kind of inspection staff would we have at the gun plant at Sorel inspecting the manufacture, for example, of the 3-inch naval guns that have been mentioned? What kind of personnel would be there making sure we get the right kind of guns?

Mr. Claxton: We have largely armament inspectors who have qualified in work of that kind during the war and in Canadian Arsenals Limited since, and are of the type of official mentioned here. Some of them inspect each item in the equipment as it is made. I would estimate that there are between fifty and one hundred inspectors at Sorel Industries at the present time.

Mr. Hees: All civilian?

Mr. Claxton: In addition to members of the navy as well.

Mr. Shaw: Earlier the minister indicated the department's intention to utilize civilian personnel as far as possible, thus freeing service personnel for the duties for which they were enlisted. Would the minister indicate how far that policy will go? In the actual operation of an air station such as Penhold, to what extent would you utilize civilian personnel?

Mr. Claxton: There we would utilize civilian personnel in works services, that is, maintenance work, painting, ground keeping, road keeping and the like. As civilian guards we would use either the corps of commissionaires or other guards. In the kitchen services they would be used as assistant cooks, waiters, dish washers, and in work of that kind.

Mr. Shaw: I should like to point out to the minister that I agree wholeheartedly with this policy. What about the age restriction? I recall that during the last war many of our older people found employment at Bowden under civilian administration and to a limited extent at Penhold. They were persons who could not fit into industry but were quite capable of doing the types of work mentioned by the minister. Is an age restriction to be imposed, or have you gone that far in your plan?

Mr. Claxton: It is entirely governed by the civil service rules. Some of these employees may be temporary civil servants and others will be prevailing rate employees. Both classes will be governed by the civil service rules.

Mr. Shaw: Would the minister know whether or not that was the case during the last war?

Mr. Claxton: I am informed that at Penhold at that time the operations were carried on by a private company.

Mr. Shaw: I think that was Bowden, was it not?

Mr. Claxton: Bowden. It acted as a contractor for the department, and engaged personnel itself. We have that kind of arrangement at the present time for catering for summer camps. We pay the caterer so much a day, give him the food, and he supplies the staff which he hires.

Mr. Shaw: Does the department contemplate having any of these fields operate on a similar basis, namely, administered by a civilian organization? I think it was the Edmonton flying club that administered Bowden. Is there any intention of following the same policy again?

Mr. Claxton: Not at the major air training stations.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I ask to what extent women are employed as cooks and so on, and whether the department has under consideration the possibility of using more women in different capacities in order to release men for active service.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, indeed.

Mrs. Fairclough: Then with respect to the service schools in which the children of service personnel are educated at various points across the country, do those teachers come under this item of civil salaries and wages, and are those teachers service men and women or are they civilians?

Mr. Claxton: The teachers in the schools operated by the department for the children of service personnel are civilians. They do not come under this heading; they come under the heading of civilian employees in each of the services, navy, army and air force. Incidentally, they are usually engaged in co-operation with the provincial school authorities and have to be qualified according to the regulations of the province in which they are employed.

Mrs. Fairclough: I had intended to ask whether there was a connection with the provincial authorities.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, there is; and the schools are inspected by the provincial authorities. We meet local provincial standards, and indeed in most of the provinces we work, by arrangement with the provincial authorities, in exactly the same way a municipal school organization would. For example, the school at Barriefield will have a school board created and operated exactly the same as a school board would operate in an adjacent civilian municipality, with the same number of members on the board, the same titles, the same functions and the same responsibilities.

Mrs. Fairclough: Do the members of these school boards receive any compensation for the services they render?

Mr. Claxton: None at all.

Mrs. Fairclough: Then there is no charge against this department for inspection service or anything of that nature with regard to the schools?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Does Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have anything to do with the construction of homes on R.C.A.F. stations?

Mr. Claxton: Central Mortgage and Housing built a very large proportion of the homes for us until two or three months ago, when that operation was taken over by Defence Construction Limited. C.M.H.C. are still carrying on with a very considerable number of homes that are unfinished.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Following that up, no doubt Central Mortgage and Housing have their inspectors looking over these houses from time to time. Does the air force also maintain an inspection staff for this purpose?

Mr. Claxton: Not specifically, but the air officers in charge of works co-operate closely, and if they are not satisfied with the type of construction they report that fact and it is brought to the attention of Central Mortgage and Housing.

Mr. Low: I wonder if the minister is in a position to say what plans the department has, if any, for the use or expansion of the Grande Prairie airport. Is it proposed to make any extensive use of it in the defence of the great northwest?

Mr. Claxton: Like all other airports in existence Grande Prairie of course is under consideration in the event of any future development, but there is nothing in mind at the present time.

Mr. Low: Of course the minister understands the importance of that airport in connection with the threat to the northwest. I was also wondering whether any negotiations have been carried on with a view to having the United States share with the dominion and provincial governments the cost of building a communications link, which no doubt would be a road, between Fort St. John, let us say, which is the end of the Alaska highway, and the industrial centres of the middle western United States. That would entail quite a construction program over the area between Edmonton and Fort St. John, of course. I understand the provincial government is going ahead with a survey between Edmonton and Valleyview, if I remember correctly, which is very close to Grande Prairie. I wonder if any thought has been given to asking the United States to share in the cost of that road.

Mr. Claxton: We have had representations from the chamber of commerce of Edmonton and other bodies that we should undertake this job as a defence project. We have considered it, and have decided that it is not so very different from fifty other proposals that have been made that the federal government should assist in the development of transportation facilities which it is true would be an advantage in the event of war but which we feel would be of far greater civilian advantage. These matters are always under consideration, but so far we have not decided to do anything in the case mentioned by the hon. member. With regard to the United States participation in it, under our arrangements with the United States we have assumed responsibility for maintenance for the northwest highways in Canada. That seems quite a proper contribution by Canada to joint defence. While we do not exclude the possibility of United States assistance in the development of transportation facilities in peacetime, there would have to be a very positive and immediate advantage to the United States to justify us in contemplating any such request. Our present opinion is that if things of that kind are to be done at all they should be done by Canada.

Mr. Low: There is, of course, this particular reason why the United States should be brought in to share the cost of that link between Edmonton and Fort St. John. Today, as for many years past, great truck trains carrying tons of materials pass over the Alberta highway from Montana, through the Crowsnest pass and up into that country. These materials are necessary both for defence purposes and for the maintenance of United States posts. I would think it proper that they should be asked to share in the cost of maintaining and/or rebuilding those highways, because they are cutting them to pieces and the provincial government has to pay the cost of rebuilding them. During the last war when it was thought Alaska was in danger the United States found it greatly to its advantage to have some form of highway up into that country. They did build from Fort St. John away north into the Yukon and Alaska, but there was no link between Fort St. John and the industrial centres of southern Alberta and the United States. It seems to me this is the time to be negotiating for the completion of that highway so that if and when trouble arises it will be there and the United States will have contributed at least its share to the cost of construction, because certainly they will be using it.

Mr. Hees: I was very interested in the minister's reply to the hon. member for Hamilton West regarding the replacement of male personnel by women, in the civilian branch of the department. Could the minister give us an outline of the plan in effect at the present time to replace men with women? I think it is most important because of the need for men both for the armed services and for industry.

Mr. Claxton: I am afraid this is not the sort of thing that can be done in any set way. The general attitude of the department and of those engaging people for us, such as the civil service commission, is that wherever possible women are employed, where they can do the job as well as or better than men.

Mr. Hees: Another matter I think is of importance is the replacement of serving staffs, cooks and so on, by civilians. I know that at Petawawa camp, where I have gone for several summers, the catering has been by civilians, and it has been done to the great satisfaction of all military personnel. I wonder to what extent that has become general or is going to become general? It seems to me that the practice of using army personnel for cooks or waiters is waste, and that is a good plan. I wonder if it is going to be general.

Mr. Claxton: For the army, my recollection is that we made contracts with twelve contractors, and that those contracts are still in force. They supply the services—we supply the food—at charges which vary with the locality, the facilities and the number of meals served. The cost is approximately forty cents to sixty-five cents per day. The satisfaction depends on both the skill of the caterer and the direction he has been able to give to his own staff, and also the co-operation and services of the messing officer or dietitian of the armed forces on the spot. Where they have worked well together, it has gone very well. It is our intention to continue to do this in the places where we have exceptional peak loads, such as Petawawa, Valcartier and so on where summer training is done. In establishments where we have to have messing done on a fairly full level all the year round, our practice is to have service cooks and their immediate assistants who belong to one of the services; the subordinate job is done by civilians. We do this in order to build up as large a reservoir as we possibly can of trained and good cooks. During the last three years we have had considerable success in attracting more men into cooking branches and also through training courses. I think the standard has improved.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The hon. member for Peace River introduced a matter that I think is of some importance to western Ontario as well as to the province of Alberta, namely, using the problem of joint defence between the United States and Canada as the thin edge of the wedge. During the past war trucks in bond were passing through from Detroit to the Niagara frontier with tremendous loads, and they did considerable damage to No. 3 highway. Now this procedure is being reopened, and while we want to do all we can as Canadians in order to facilitate the war effort, just what part of the burden is Canada going to bear with respect to damage to the highways? Then there is another angle. In the city of St. Thomas alone, some 270 men have been laid off by one of the railways there. This is something that affects the welfare of the city, and it is something that should be considered before these permits are issued.

Mr. Pearkes: There is one point that arose out of the minister's remarks about the inspection service. He referred to the inspection of ships and vessels. Do the inspectors of the steamship inspection service of the Department of Transport carry out inspections of His Majesty's vessels?

Mr. Claxton: The hull is inspected by Lloyd's for us; and the machinery and equipment is inspected by our own inspection services, not by the Department of Transport.

Mr. Pearkes: The Department of Transport maintains a steamship inspection service which makes periodical examination of the engines of all steamships. Are those inspections carried out in His Majesty's ships?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Pearkes: Then what form of inspection do we have which would replace or be the counterpart of the inspection service carried out on ordinary commercial vessels by the Department of Transport?

Mr. Claxton: I understand that the object of the Department of Transport is primarily to safeguard the lives of passengers and, of course, to ensure the safety of the ship as regards seaworthiness and the like. Our ships are inspected by Lloyd's and the equipment is inspected by the inspection services, including service personnel.

Mr. Pearkes: I am quite aware that the Department of Transport carry out those inspections with the idea of ascertaining the seaworthiness of ships which are now afloat and of inspecting, as the minister says, as to provisions for the safety of the passengers and so on. I am asking what similar service is carried out in His Majesty's ships, because I do not think the Department of Transport inspection service is limited only to passenger ships. Freighters are also inspected.

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Pearkes: Ferries are inspected. I was wondering what sort of staff was maintained in order to carry out the inspection service for His Majesty's ships which are now afloat, in order to see that they are seaworthy and in order to safeguard the lives of our sailors and the ships' company on those vessels. With 725 men to carry out all the numerous services which have been outlined today, it seems to me that that number is quite inadequate to perform all these duties. I am wondering how that particular form of inspection is carried out.

Mr. Claxton: If a ship is in commission, it is inspected by the Royal Canadian Navy itself. If the navy desires to have any outside opinion, it would engage, through the agencies I have mentioned, a firm of marine engineers or others to do a special job of inspection for it.

Mr. Pearkes: As to educational services, the minister mentioned the system for teaching the children of servicemen. I want to ask about the position of the civilian professors and assistant professors at such colleges as Royal Roads and the Royal Military College. Are they included in these civil service salaries as well?

Mr. Claxton: The civilian teaching staff and scientific staff at Royal Roads and R.M.C. are engaged through the civil service commission; and they are paid, as civil servants, the salaries for their classification.

Mr. Pearkes: They are not paid out of the administration vote, then?

Mr. Claxton: They are paid; for R.M.C., out of civil service salaries for the army and for Royal Roads, out of civil service salaries for the navy.

Mr. Pearkes: They are not included in the estimates we are now considering for civil servants under the head of administration.

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Pearkes: They are not shown under the civil service salaries for the army and the navy?

Mr. Claxton: They are shown under the civil salaries for the army and navy.

Mr. Pearkes: They will come up later?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: It is not shown in this?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Drew: I want to return to a question that I raised at the time that these estimates were before us approximately two weeks ago. At that time I asked for the number of civilian employees under different departmental groupings. In referring to what I said at that time the Minister of National Defence gave certain figures as to total civilian employees; but he did not comply with the request that was made at that time, namely that we should have information similar to that which is given to us in the public accounts and similar to that which is furnished to the House of Commons in Great Britain under the estimates provided to the members there. I ask that we have full information respecting the category of the various civilian employees and the salary range of those categories. I pointed out that the most convenient way that this could be presented was to present it in the same way that it is presented to the members of the House of Commons in Great Britain. I suggested that an appropriate number should be mimeographed so that they could be furnished to the members of the house. May I first ask the minister whether such forms are available. If so, may we have them at this time?

Mr. Claxton: They are certainly not available, Mr. Chairman. I have already given the committee the information in one form, which is the form followed by the civil departments in Canada. To give them in addition in the form followed by the armed forces in Britain would require that our figures, books and cards be kept in a different way. If that is the desire we can keep them in a different way. It would cost a good deal and we can arrange to do it, but it is not possible to do it out of the records we have today, without looking at every file, and I have indicated that there are 29,000 employees.

The hon. member asked for them to be grouped in categories, salary range and also at the places, with the establishments I think in which they were working. Without a count of the number of such places or establishments, I am informed that there are between 700 and 800. Certainly that seems reasonable, because there are over 400 reserve army units alone, and most of them have civilian employees, or many of them have, on one basis or another; so that it would not be possible, even in a couple of months, to give this information in the form in which the leader of the opposition has asked for it.

It would be possible to do it if parliament, or the treasury board, decided that that was the right way to do it, in another year. I am sure it would mean a substantial addition to the number of civil employees we have, and what the benefit would be I cannot say. But I simply cannot give it within a couple of months.

Mr. Drew: I for one am simply not prepared to accept the statement that the minister cannot give it. The minister is able to pick out details in regard to individuals whose names are mentioned, or whose particular services are mentioned; and I am satisfied that the accounting organization in his department is much too efficient for it to be possible that their records are in such hopeless state that they could not give the kind of information that is being requested.

Let us see what is furnished in this respect to the members of the House of Commons in Great Britain. May I point out that after they have this information they then are able to bring it before a committee which deals with the estimates, a subcommittee on defence estimates, so that they get still more information on this. Let me indicate the kind of information, and then I shall ask any hon. member of this house simply to ask himself whether he does not think the records of the Department of National Defence would give this information fairly readily.

Let us take first of all the department of the chief of the imperial general staff, which would correspond to the chief of the general staff here, with whatever variations may apply to different descriptive names or changes of that kind. I am dealing now only with the civil staff, because we are dealing with civil salaries and wages at headquarters.

Under the details of the civil staff in the department of the imperial general staff they give such information as this. There is one scientific adviser to the army council. They give his salary as £2,500. There is one deputy scientific adviser, and they give his salary. There are two senior principal scientific advisers, and they give the salary range. There are three principal scientific advisers, and again they give the salary range, in that instance from £1,000 to £1,375. There are five senior scientific officers. Again the salary range is given. There are two scientific officers, and again the salary range is given. There are five higher executive officers. Again the salary range is given. There are 38 executive officers, and in brackets 15 temporary. The salary range is given for both men and women, and the total carried out in each case. There are three map curators, three temporary, and the salary range is given. There is one records officer, one photographer, one assistant technical officer, one retired officer, 203 clerical staff, 42 other technical staff. Then, other technical staff, overtime, national insurance scheme staff, federated superannuation system for universities and the payments required there. I would point out that down to clerical staff the salary range is given. From clerical staff on we come into that group that was mentioned by the minister who are employed on a different basis, and in these instances the total is given.

That is simply dealing with the department of chief of the imperial general staff. I am convinced that in a very short time, in fact, by nine o'clock tonight, the efficient accounting system of the Department of National Defence could give us precisely corresponding information from the records of the department. I know they could do it because the minister is able to obtain information of this kind as questions are asked in regard to other matters. Similarly, he could obtain the information on a corresponding basis with the chief of the naval staff as to civil salaries and wages, and he could also obtain equally quickly the information in regard to the chief of the air staff.

One of the reasons that it is necessary to come back to this repeated reference to the kind of committee that they have at Westminster, Mr. Chairman, which we want here, is that if we had such a committee we could ask the chief accountant to come before us and find out what the books contain. I am convinced that if we had that chief accountant before us we could demonstrate in a few minutes that all these figures would be available not in months, but in some cases in a matter of hours, and in other cases at the very most in a few days.

Two weeks have elapsed since we last met, and if any serious effort had been made to give the basic information that is made available to every member of parliament in Great Britain, where they have much larger forces than we have here, we now would have that information before us, and would be discussing it with some knowledge of what the facts actually are.

To suggest that it is useless is to suggest that every other department which gives out the same information is filling the records with useless information and wasting time and money; and to suggest that it is useless is also to suggest that this waste of money takes place in Great Britain where they have had very much longer experience in handling accounts of that kind than we have.

Most certainly we cannot compel the minister to do anything that this house will not ask him to do by a majority vote; but I do ask him one specific question. Does he suggest that it would not be possible to have for us by tomorrow at the latest, without any substantial difficulty, figures corresponding to those which I have read, under similar headings, of the chief of the imperial general staff?

Mr. Claxton: I have already expressed that view, but I will do it again. I have asked officers of the department responsible for the preparation of such material how long it would take to get the information just asked for by the leader of the opposition—I had asked them before in fact—and I am told it would be three or four weeks.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt the minister, but does he mean in relation to what I have just mentioned to him, in connection with the chief of the imperial general staff?

Mr. Claxton: We can ask General Foulkes, or go to his office tomorrow and list his employees. There would be no difficulty about that. But there would be difficulty about getting information which would be useful, and which would answer the hon. member's question, with regard to employees at every location across Canada. That is what he asked for the other day, and that is what he asked for, in the beginning, today.

As I say, there are between 700 and 800 places; and when one got the information it would not mean anything to anyone. All the information is kept on punched cards, which operate in conjunction with a mechanism supplied by International Business Machines. They are efficient machines. We can run cards through those machines, and print the lists of employees, as we did here, and put them in order, by classification. But we cannot do that, for locations, without having experienced personnel go through and interpret the code in the cards for each locality. I am told that would take three or four weeks. If the leader of the opposition does not believe me—and apparently he does not—then I would point out to him that the associate deputy minister will be before the public accounts committee tomorrow, and he can give that answer. He was there today, and he could have given it at any time.

Mr. Fulton: He would not be allowed to ask it.

Mr. Claxton: Ask it for 1949-50, and do a quick modification for yourselves.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, may I point out—

The Deputy Chairman: The leader of the opposition will realize that he cannot interrupt the hon. member who has the floor, unless he has the consent of that hon. member. However, he may be speaking to a question of privilege.

Mr. Drew: I would point out that the deputy minister cannot answer in regard to these estimates, in the light of a ruling made in the public accounts committee.

Mr. Claxton: The leader of the opposition surely heard the answer I gave the hon. member for Kamloops in this matter, that it could be asked quite properly for 1949-50, and then he could make a calculation for himself.

Mr. Drew: There is no need to, because it is in the public accounts, in this form, for that year.

Mr. Claxton: It is not in this form; it is in alphabetical order. If the hon. member wishes us to operate the machines and to put a list of all the employees of the department in alphabetical order, we can work the machine and that can be done. That does not require any interpretation at all. But when he wants us to give the information by localities for each of the three services of defence, research and civilian administration, located at 700 or 800 places across the country, and in addition to have the number in each category as well as the salary range, it would be a long job. We could keep our accounts that way, but we do not think it is desirable, and neither does treasury board. We could do it, though.

Then, in relation to what the leader of the opposition said about my saying that this is useless: I repeat that it is useless. Obviously it is useless to endeavour to check here or anywhere else in respect to the increase in the number of employees when we say we are going to increase by 5,000 this year. The figures are changing so rapidly—

Mr. Pearkes: Five thousand?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: Under this item?

Mr. Claxton: No, in relation to the total civil employees, and not necessarily this year, but rather over the next two years. On that account the figures we are now discussing will be out of date within a matter of weeks or months. That is why we think, and treasury board thinks, it is not useful to give the results in the form in which I have already given them. To give the information as to locations it would mean either a hand operation, after we had run through the cards, or keeping our books in a different way.

Mr. Drew: May I point out that the question I asked the Minister of National Defence was whether or not he could by tomorrow give the information in regard to the civilian employees of the branch of the chief of general staff, on a basis similar to that furnished in regard to the office of the chief of the imperial general staff, in the manner indicated in the paragraph I have already read. That was the question I asked; and I asked it because we are dealing here not with civil salaries and wage rates across the country but rather with civil salaries and wages, in this particular instance, at national defence headquarters. I mentioned the chief of air staff and the chief of naval staff, but the particular question was whether it would be possible to obtain the information in regard to the office of the chief of general staff here, similar to that I have just read in relation to the office of the chief of the imperial general staff.

Mr. Ferguson: I do not wish to interrupt but—

An hon. Member: Just a minute.

Mr. Claxton: My information is that we cannot give it in respect of one branch, without making a considerable search, because we do not keep separately records of the personnel for the office of the chief of general staff. We could go there and find out, of course. But what we do is to keep the general staff branch of the army separate—we can arrange to do that, and get it for one branch. However if the same question is put for localities outside Ottawa, for command headquarters, area headquarters, naval reserve divisions,—Esquimalt, Halifax and others—and everything else then, as I say, we will require three or four months to get it together.

Mr. Drew: May I ask a simple question. We are dealing with the first sub-item under the heading of departmental administration, which includes inspection services and civil defence, and which relates alone to national defence headquarters. Is that not correct?

Mr. Claxton: This figure does not have anything to do with the chief of general staff.

Mr. Drew: What is that?

Mr. Claxton: This figure.

Mr. Drew: Are not the civilian employees of the chief of general staff included in this?

Mr. Claxton: No, they are in the army.

Mr. Drew: There would be no staff figure included in this?

Mr. Claxton: No, not at all.

Mr. Drew: Then that makes it simpler, because if they are not included in this I will repeat my question when we come to the army item. I thought they would be kept under the item for civilian employees. We understand, then, that these civilian employees at national defence headquarters are in addition to the civilian employees employed by the branch of the chief of general staff, the chief of air staff, the chief of naval staff, and any other senior staff establishments in Ottawa?

Mr. Claxton: Of course.

Mr. Drew: Then that does open up a new figure as to the total of civilian employees. But does the minister say that in regard to the civil employees in his own department, excluding these military offices, he is not able to furnish the information as to the number of employees in different categories, and the salary range?

Mr. Claxton: We have already done it in one way.

Mr. Drew: No.

Mr. Claxton: That was the way which corresponded to the method adopted by the civilian departments. We have done it for administration, and I thought I had explained it before. It began with the administrative assistant, and so on, and totalled 1270 civilian employees for a total wage of $3,489,842. That would be easy for us to do. We can list the individuals here or answer inquiries about individuals. That would be available by tomorrow night. But if we have to do that for each and every branch, the department, navy, army and air force, in every part of Canada, by localities, occupation and salary range, it would take three months. I hope the position is just as clear as I can make it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask two things. First I would point out that I am simply asking questions with regard to headquarters, the civilian employees covered by the item we are now discussing. At the moment my questions relate to that alone and as to whether the minister can furnish us with a list of the various categories of employees at defence headquarters and the salary range of those employees. That is the question I have asked, not with regard to the various areas outside.

Mr. Claxton: I think the hon. member will see from Hansard of last week, of this week and of today that he did refer to occupations across Canada. Right at the outset he referred to the general staff, from which I took it that his inquiries included navy, army and air force as well as the civilian side. If he wants the information he has asked for with regard to civilians at national defence headquarters, described by classification and if possible by branches, we can give that by tomorrow night. That is a much more limited thing than I understood he was asking for, although I may have been mistaken. If he wants the same thing for the navy, army and air force and in each locality, then we have to tell him it will take three or four months—weeks.

Mr. Drew: Which is it, months or weeks?

Mr. Claxton: I said weeks before.

Mr. Drew: May I ask the minister if this list which I have in my hand and from which he was reading refers to civil employees in national defence headquarters, not including the army, navy, air or other military establishments?

Mr. Claxton: This list covers those who fall not within the services, navy, army, air force or defence research, but do include public relations, inspection services and one or two other activities that come under the minister or the deputy minister of national defence, providing services right across the country.

Mr. Drew: I gather that this list which I have in my hand was obtained without any substantial difficulty?

Mr. Claxton: The leader of the opposition has only the part applicable to administration which we are considering now. The whole operation took fourteen employees two weeks to prepare.

Mr. Drew: What I have in my hand?

Mr. Claxton: I have assured the leader of the opposition that what he has in his hand, plus what is here, which relates to army, navy and air force, and gives the same information with respect to these branches as the hon. member has with regard to the item we are now discussing, is what has been prepared.

Mr. Drew: May I ask that these sheets be printed in Hansard. The reason I ask that is that they contain the very information I have been asking for. This is precisely the information which I have been asking for in so far as the classified positions under national defence headquarters are concerned. It is just the kind of information I have been reading from the army estimates in regard to officers of the chiefs of the general staff. Let me read one or two items. Administrative assistants, salary $2,772-$3,570; one permanent, six temporary, total seven; total payments, $23,184. Administrative assistants, auditing and examining: five permanent; nine temporary; total 14; total payment, $37,800. And so on right down through the list giving precisely the kind of information I have been asking for.

That being so it will be most helpful if this and the other lists which have been referred to, and which I understand cover the chiefs of the general staff, the chief of the naval staff, chief of the air staff, and research establishments, are printed in Hansard so that we can have them available. Otherwise the members of this house will not have this information available for the purposes of this discussion.

Mr. Claxton: I understood the leader of the opposition was in his place when I tabled these lists this afternoon at about three-thirty o'clock. I am happy if he is satisfied with the information that is given, but in so far as their being printed in Hansard is concerned I think hon. members should consider whether that proposal should be acceded to. I said I would make photostatic copies available to the leaders of the various parties, which is being done and can be done overnight. To print these lists in Hansard would be quite an operation.

Mr. Drew: I am sure that many lists much more extensive than these are printed regularly. With the excellent printing service we have I am sure that we could have these in quite satisfactory form by tomorrow morning. I was here this afternoon when the minister announced that he was tabling certain papers but it is only now—I have only one of them in front of me—that I find that this is the very information to which I have been referring. This is simply part of the information which is furnished in printed form to the members of the House of Commons in Great Britain. If it can be placed satisfactorily in printed form before the members of the House of Commons over there, and dealing with a much larger force, I think we should have it here. If it were printed as an appendix to Hansard in the ordinary way it would be available to hon. members.

Mr. Claxton: I do not want any misunderstanding on the part of the leader of the opposition. He has referred to these lists as satisfying himself and has made the request that the lists be made available to hon. members. The lists have been available, as I say, since about three-thirty. If that were so I would be very happy. I do not want him to change his mind, but I do not want the record to show that I have acquiesced in the statement he has just made.

Mr. Drew: You mean that you acquiesced that they are satisfactory?

Mr. Claxton: The lists are what I described them to be when I tabled them. They contain the civil employees of the Department of National Defence in the three armed services according to classification, wage group, the number of both permanent and temporary employees, and then the total wage for each group. The total of the prevailing rates employees is also given. They are classified in four parts: 1. Administration; 2. Navy; 3. Army; 4. Defence research. That is what the lists are, and they are available, as I so indicated, and we will have photostatic copies made which can be used by the parties.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the minister talks about this being available to the members. I certainly do not want any statement left on Hansard which would convey the impression that members of this house have had the slightest opportunity to examine these figures, or that they would have any practical opportunity to examine them between now and tomorrow. When I say that these are satisfactory, I am now talking about the form in which the figures I have seen are presented, and these are the ones that relate to the classified positions of civil employees of the administration branch of the Department of National Defence. Although I have not seen the sheets themselves, I am now told that similar sheets have been prepared for the civil employees of the army, navy and air services.

This shows exactly how easy it would have been to have given these figures and to have had them before us in either printed or mimeographed form, as was suggested when we last met. I said at that time that the minister would be able to prepare these and have them in mimeographed form for the members of the house. What he has now produced indicates that I was correct and that it was possible for him to do it because on the occasion that we next take up the estimates, which is today, we find that these are available. This table gives the various classifications, salary ranges, number in the salary ranges, and the totals. They are under the heading first of all of administration, classified positions, then army classified, navy classified and air classified. These lists could be printed without any difficulty. We frequently have much more voluminous information printed in the ordinary way in the next day's Hansard. The proper way to place these tables before members for their information and for discussion is to have them printed in Hansard in the usual way. I move that the records which have been placed in my hands by the minister, and which have been tabled, should be printed in Hansard.

The Deputy Chairman: The leader of the opposition will understand that these documents are either tabled or printed as an appendix to Hansard by leave of the committee. It is not done by motion. There is one point I wish to clear up at this time. We are now discussing the sub-item, as it was called a moment ago, of civil salaries and wages under the heading "defence services". The question asked the other day by the leader of the opposition, and which is now answered by the Minister of National Defence, was one which related to the sub-item, civil salaries and wages, under all the headings where such a sub-item appears. If we are going to be in order I will have to obtain the opinion of the committee to see whether or not only the list relating to civil salaries and wages under the heading "defence services" will be printed at this time as an appendix to Hansard, and then when we come to the sub-item civil salaries and wages under navy I will have to ascertain whether it is the desire of the committee to have that list printed. It is only a matter of order which can easily be settled, but the committee will understand that I am bound by the agreement that was made and which we have to carry out. Has the Minister of National Defence leave to have these documents pertaining to all sub-items relating to civil salaries and wages printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Ferrie: Not the name of the person.

Mr. Drew: There are no names.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the Minister of National Defence leave of the committee to have the list pertaining to civil salaries and wages under the heading "defence services" printed as an appendix?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For table of civil salaries and wages, defence services, see appendix, pages 3390-91.)

Mr. Drew: I would point out that the heading on the top sheet is "administration", but it obviously relates to the same heading as in the item because it reaches a total of $3,489,842. Then it is agreed that this table be printed as an appendix to Hansard. I will not pursue the matter further except to point out that, whether it was appropriate or whether it was not, I understood the others had been tabled, and if they are tabled I submit it is proper at any time to have them printed for the convenience of members. Since they have been tabled and since they are available I would suggest that this would be the proper time to have them all printed.

Mr. Ferguson: I am sure the Minister of National Defence does not want to give any person the idea in listening to this debate that this is the old shell game, in other words, that you cannot get your eye on the pea, that you have got to guess. It is the old sleight of hand question, and you can never locate the pea. A great deal of time has been expended in the house in trying to get some information which a certain member believes is essential for the reason that he wants to get the information on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada. In sitting and listening to the debate, it has been most difficult to extract the information which some hon. members believe he is entitled to, and which I am sure he is entitled to. After a great deal of argument it finally comes to light that the information was sitting on the desk of the minister across the house, and it was not divulged to the person seeking it.

The minister's department probably has 30,000 employees. The situation is probably not due to his fault but because of the general scheme and plan of keeping records in his department. I am sure that every department probably has the same jumbled up mess. Take a corporation like the Canadian Pacific Railway with 60,000 employees on pension and salary. I believe that if an executive in the head office of the C.P.R. in Montreal asked a question regarding a man's salary that information could be located in five minutes.

Mr. Claxton: I can get the answer in five minutes about any one of them.

Mr. Ferguson: It certainly was taking a terrific length of time to locate the information as to the salaries of about fifty. You must be thinking of one individual member of the staff whose salary you know, or you know that some person can locate the information about the salary in five minutes. The minister spoke about increasing the staff but it is almost impossible to keep your finger on the pea or to secure the information. We are going to have an increase of 5,000. I hope that the war situation does not get much worse, so that the department will have to administer an army of 700,000. We would not know whether we were paying Chinese communists or Russians. We would not know who was on our payroll if we ever had an army of 700,000. We have a comparatively small army. The chiefs of staff, their staffs, and other civil servants apparently find it most difficult to be able to give the Minister of National Defence information that is available at any time in any well run corporation. It certainly is not available in the minister's department. I am not saying that is his fault, but I do suggest that apparently a change is necessary. Efficiency should be sought in the department, so that in future he will not be placed in the embarrassing position of having to tell the members of this house that he cannot give information which I believe should be available almost instantaneously. He should have a proper list of employees, with their salaries, their ages and where they are located.

I bring to the attention of the committee the example of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which has 60,000 employees. I remember that while travelling on that railway some years ago the engine ran into some difficulty. When I reached Montreal I visited the office of the administrator of rolling stock and remarked that this engine, giving the number, had run into this difficulty which delayed the arrival of the train by some hours. The man in charge of rolling stock at that time pressed a button and called for the history of that engine; and there it was in full detail. He showed me the fuel consumption of the engine since it had been placed in service, the number of miles it had travelled, the number of times it had been repaired and so on. He assured me that applied to every single piece of rolling stock on that railway; he had all that information right under his thumb. I believe the Canadian Pacific has as many pieces of rolling stock as we have in the army, and on the railway they travel more frequently and more rapidly than is the case with our armed forces; yet the man in charge of that department could tell any visitor the cost of any piece of equipment, the cost of its operation and so on, by pressing a button and calling for a number.

Surely some similar method, or something almost as good, should be introduced to keep track of the employees of this government, whether they be members of the armed forces of whether they be on the civilian staffs of those forces. This discussion today has been most enlightening in that it has brought out the lack of system and lack of efficiency in this particular department. As I say, I am not blaming the minister. Very often a man is placed in a department and has to carry on for years under the set-up that was there long before he got there; but we certainly suggest to the present minister that if the present system is as cumbersome as it appears to be, it should be changed. Either those in charge should be changed, or they should be instructed that the system must be improved so the representatives of the people may obtain the information which will place them in a position to judge how the affairs of the country are being run. That is particularly so with the members of the opposition, who are here for no other purpose than to be the critics of the government, the watchdogs of the treasury, on behalf of the people of Canada.

Mr. Claxton: I cannot let statements be repeated time and again which are contrary to what I said this afternoon at the beginning of this discussion. Four or five times now I have repeated what I said then, and I hope this will be the last time. At three-thirty or shortly after that I tabled all the information about civilian employees of this department, navy, army, air force and defence research. I described what the sheets contained. I said it corresponded to the arrangement regarding civilian employees in the other government departments. I then said this could not be mimeographed or reproduced or printed earlier because it had been made available to me only today, and that was because it required fourteen days to get it in this form. Every bit of information that is asked for can be obtained, but it is a question of time to arrange it in the order which suits the convenience not only of the opposition but of this committee as a whole, because we are all members of it. I have been asked for that information by members of the opposition in one form. Because we did not keep it in that form, since it was not considered desirable by the treasury board, it took fourteen people fourteen days to get it in that form. That is the only reason it was not available earlier. Remarks about the efficiency of the department can be judged by the efficiency of the armed forces for which this department acts as housekeeping and administrative agent.

With regard to the time required to do any single job, it depends upon how closely that job conforms to the practice we follow and what it requires in the way of a large scale operation. If I am asked the salary, occupation and location of any individual employee I can get that information by telephoning the department, or if I am in the department I can get it within a minute and a half. But if I am asked to arrange the information concerning a large group of employees in some way other than that in which we keep it, that takes some time; and I think hon. members should consider whether the time involved both in the department and in this committee is worth the results in the circumstances. That is the responsibility of hon. members and apparently they are quite willing to face it, when we see what is going on.

The Deputy Chairman: Before I call it six o'clock may I refer to what has been said about the tabling of these documents. Such documents are usually tabled when motions are called under routine business. Since the minister, the leader of the opposition and all hon. members are under the impression that these documents were tabled at the proper time, perhaps by leave, and if the procedure is otherwise regular, we could now agree that these documents have been tabled regularly under motions, so the records will show—

Mr. Claxton: They were tabled at the beginning.

Mr. McCann: As I understand it these documents were produced as the result of inquiries that were made, and when the minister brought them in he distinctly said he tabled all the documents.

Mr. Drew: Since you have raised the point, Mr. Chairman, and since I do not want the Hansard record to convey an inaccurate impression outside this house, I point out that the documents were not tabled. The minister announced that he proposed to table them, and as you have pointed out he did so after the calling of motions. No one raised any objection, but since the minister has emphasized that these were tabled that conveys the impression that they were available, and I would point out that they were not tabled at that time but that only within the last ten minutes did they find their way to the table. The first time I saw them, and the first time anyone had an opportunity to note what they contained, other than the general statement by the minister, was when at my request the minister delivered them to me for my examination. They were then conveyed to the table. I would certainly hope they might be accepted for tabling in the ordinary way, but I do point out for the record that it was only about ten minutes to six when they actually found their way to the table.

Mr. McCann: I must entirely disagree with that statement. I sat in my place here, and immediately after the documents were referred to the minister said he tabled them, and that was at about a quarter to four. That included all the documents.

Mr. Claxton: And ever since then they have been available to every hon. member.

Mr. McCann: The leader of the opposition may have been engaged with something else, but I am positive of what the minister said with reference to the documents he had in his hand. They were put on the table here; and the fact that the page boy did not place them on the table of the house was not the fault of the minister.

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege may I make it quite clear that because the minister said he was tabling the documents, that does not constitute tabling. I repeat that the documents were not tabled until ten minutes to six. The minister announced that he was tabling them, and I am quite satisfied that it was his intention to do so. But I must confess that the statement just made by the Minister of National Revenue suggests the extent to which the government is disregarding the ordinary procedure, when he suggests that the mere statement of a minister that he is tabling something actually constitutes tabling. Documents are tabled when they reach the table, and that was ten minutes ago.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, may I just say this—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think I have heard enough on the point of order.

Mr. Fleming: You have heard others. Is an hon. member not to be heard?

The Deputy Chairman: When the documents were produced, hon. members will understand that I was not in the chair. It is the usual practice that, when documents are produced, the page boys pick up the documents and bring them to the table. Now that I am in the chair and this incident has occurred, I just want to make sure that the record will read correctly tomorrow—I refer to the Journals; that is what I am interested in—that these documents be considered as having been tabled regularly just as if leave had been asked to revert to motions when Mr. Speaker was in the chair. Is that agreed?

Mr. Fraser: Oh, no.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Drew: Since this discussion has arisen, the record must be kept correct; and I suggest that it be recorded that it was agreed that the documents which were tabled at ten minutes to six should be accepted as tabled in the usual way.

Mr. Fleming: I simply wish to say this, in enlargement of what has been said by the Minister of National Revenue. What the Minister of National Defence said at the conclusion of his opening remarks today—and I followed him closely—was "I table these documents". Then the page boy or the usher started to get the documents but the documents were not given to him by the minister or those with him. They were retained on the minister's desk and the usher was sent back without them.

Mr. Drew: You mean they were retained at his desk.

Mr. Fleming: They were simply put on the desk beside the minister. They were not put on the table. When the usher came to get them in order to take them to the table, he was told to go back without them. He was waved back.

The Deputy Chairman: It may be difficult to clear up the point; it is a bit confused. The intention was there, and I am not going to be the arbitrator now.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House again in committee of supply on defence estimates, item No. 245, sub-item "civil salaries and wages." Before we go into the study of this sub-item may I say that before six o'clock we discussed the manner in which the documents pertaining to salaries were to be tabled. During the dinner recess I looked up the point and discovered that documents are tabled on the order for motions under routine business of the house. If they are to be tabled now I shall have to leave the chair, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day, and take Mr. Speaker's chair. The minister will ask leave to revert to motions and table the documents, and then come back to committee of supply. It will take only a minute, and that will regularize the whole procedure. I think it is advisable that this should be done.

Is it the pleasure of the committee that I do now report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS PERTAINING TO CIVIL SALARIES AND WAGES

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house, I move that we now revert to motions in order to table certain documents pertaining to civil salaries and wages of the defence estimates.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Has the hon. gentleman leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Claxton: I table the documents.

(See appendix, pages 3390-91.)

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence forces—

245. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services and defence research and development, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $3,831,270,000 including authority notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $1,924,170,835 and commitments against future years of $1,907,099,165 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1951-52 will not exceed $1,595,050,000 of which $183,000,000 will be provided from section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, as supplemented by item 246, $1,412,000,000.

The Deputy Chairman: The house again in committee of supply on item 245 of the defence estimates. The hon. member for Nanaimo.

Mr. Pearkes: I presume that the documents which were tabled will now be printed in Hansard in accordance with the wishes of the leader of the opposition.

The Deputy Chairman: I must point out to the hon. member for Nanaimo that there is a distinction to be made between leave of the committee to have certain documents printed as an appendix to Hansard and documents being tabled. Documents cannot be tabled in committee. It must be done with Mr. Speaker in the chair. When it is asked that certain documents be printed as an appendix to Hansard, that may be done by leave in committee or in the house with Mr. Speaker in the chair.

What happened at six o'clock was that by unanimous consent the committee ordered to be printed as an appendix to Hansard the details pertaining to civil salaries and wages under this sub-item which is under discussion. The other details are now tabled. Hon. members can go downstairs and get the information they want. At a later stage, when we come to another heading under which appears a similar sub-item, civil salaries and wages, if it is then the wish that the documents be printed as an appendix to Hansard we shall have to ask unanimous consent, and, if we obtain it, the documents will be printed.

Mr. Pearkes: I just wanted to make certain that the table dealing with civil salaries and wages under administration will be printed, as was requested by the leader of the opposition.

The Deputy Chairman: It will be done, as it was ordered to be done this afternoon, by leave of the committee. Has the discussion terminated on civil salaries and wages?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No. I take it that it is proper under this item to introduce a general question with regard to the organization of the department in respect of civilian employees. I was startled—I think it was a year ago—to find the large number of civilian employees. I think at that time one was startled because of the relationship which they bore to the active army at that time. Since then of course the situation has changed very greatly. We have waked up more to the altered world situation, and our army has increased, and also our civilian employees have increased very largely. They constitute a tremendously large organization, and it was with regard to that that I wanted to ask the minister one or two questions, for I consider he has a tremendous job to organize in respect of both.

My understanding is, and the minister will correct me if I am wrong, that there are some 30,000 civilian employees—these are rough figures—and that that represents an increase of some 5,000 within the last year. If I am approximately correct I will go on from there. My point is this. I wanted to ask the minister how that organization, which I call a very large one—perhaps the word "tremendous" would not be an exaggeration—is set up? What means has the minister taken to satisfy himself that this tremendously large body of men and women is organized to the best possible advantage, and in particular whether he is following the example that I think has been followed in at least one other department; whether he has availed himself of any outside assistance—what we may call expert assistance—in the matter of organizing? Perhaps the minister would answer that question before I go any farther.

Mr. Claxton: It is set up in accordance with the practice which has obtained in the Department of National Defence over the years. There has not been much change. We have to do a job, and we do it.

With reference to the numbers, they vary from time to time, in relation to the job we have to do. We have to secure the approval for the establishment of every position, the recommendation of the civil service commission, and that has to be approved by the treasury board. Teams of the civil service commission, the treasury board and representatives of the department and services have gone about to ascertain how many people we need to do each job in each place.

We have proportionately reduced the number of civil service employees in the department year after year since I came into the job, until last year. And now, with the expansion of the armed forces from the 1st of July, 1950, to the present date by almost 28,000, speaking from memory, that has naturally resulted in an increase in the number of civilians, because we feel civilians should do the jobs civilians can do. We anticipate a further substantial increase in the number of civilians, just as we anticipate a further substantial increase in the number of service personnel. We think that is the best way to do it. Each job or group of jobs has to be approved by the civil service commission and treasury board, and filled through the ordinary government channels or, in the case of prevailing rate employees, through employment obtained usually through employment offices of the Department of Labour. I do not know what else the hon. member wants, in answer to the question.

Mr. Laing: He does not know.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sorry that apparently I have succeeded in making the minister feel that my question was a hostile one. It was not intended in that way. I assume we are here trying to look at these things as citizens regarding ourselves as more or less reasonable. This seems to me a matter of great importance which we might discuss on its merits.

Judging from his tone, apparently the minister resents my questions; but I hope that perhaps he will change his mind as we go along. He began by saying that, "We have a job and we do it," and that "We have always had an organization in the defence department," and, "We have developed as we have gone along." He has also said—and I applaud it—that they have the civil service commission and the treasury board teams to look after what they are doing, with a view to effecting economies, and trying to see that the number in the department is not greater than is necessary. That is all commendable.

Mr. Laing: Sure.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes; we are in agreement; thank you for your help. We all agree that is commendable; and I gather also that the minister, in spite of this very large task facing him, has not felt the need of availing himself of what I think ordinarily would be regarded as expert outside assistance. I would point out to the minister that I understand the film board which, I suppose, has perhaps only two or three per cent of the number of civilian employees in the defence department, did avail itself of a most reputable and respected organization which specializes in studies of efficiency.

I would be very interested to know why we would use it in a case where it would appear that efficiency ought to be much more easily scrutinized and ensured, as in the case of the film board, and would not care to use it here.

Mr. Cruickshank: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes.

Mr. Cruickshank: Would the hon. member suggest that an efficiency expert be called in to say whether, for instance, army camps and airports, where cadets are in training, require hundreds of extra civilian help during the summertime? Would the hon. member suggest an expert to say how many cooks are required?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me make it clear that I am not suggesting that there are any experts I know of who should be called in to assist the Department of National Defence in dealing with troops. I am talking wholly about the civilian staff.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am speaking about the civilians.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will try to answer the question, but perhaps I should make my speech first.

Mr. Cruickshank: I asked a question.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would have thought it might be reasonable if an expert organization was brought in, yes, to find out how many civilians were needed to run a camp here or there. I was going to say, when the hon. member for Fraser Valley interrupted, that, having had some little experience in the army, although it was some time ago, and having great respect for the people in the army, nevertheless I suggest that it is no part of the ordinary training and no part of the attitude of the ordinary commanding officer in peacetime to try to do with as few men as possible. As a matter of fact, while it is not as true now as it used to be, the difficulty used to be to find enough for the men to do.

So I do not expect for one moment that the commanding officer would be greatly experienced in the matter of reducing civilian personnel, and perhaps it would be unfair to expect that he would be. I just wish to try to point this up by asking the Minister of National Defence again why he feels so definite, as I gather he does, that no outside assistance should be sought. When there are 30,000 people working there can be an enormous amount of wasted action and wasted money, if the organization is not set up to the best advantage.

I am going to ask the minister who are the people primarily responsible for the organization, and I am going to say that notwithstanding the team of the civil service commission and treasury board, who no doubt have a great many other duties to perform, I do not consider them, by their background, training or functions, necessarily the best people to go into an organization, to observe it and to find out whether it has functioned to the best advantage.

Mr. Claxton: Have you any facts or figures to back up your suggestion? Is there anything wrong?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I find that rather tiresome. This afternoon when I asked the minister a question as to whether there might be some duplication in the matter of inspection, he seemed to think I was suggesting that the inspection was not even well done, and that I was suggesting there was something wrong. All I was doing was to check on the organization. And I am not suggesting now there is anything wrong, except possibly we may have two men doing the work one can do.

Mr. Claxton: And you have not the slightest sign of evidence of that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I did not hear the minister.

Mr. Claxton: I beg your pardon; I should not interrupt.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What did you say?

Mr. Claxton: I said that surely you have not the slightest sign of evidence of that in any respect whatsoever.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I find it a little difficult to understand the minister's point of view. I am saying something with which most people will agree, and that is that when you have 30,000 men and women at work it is important, to be sure, that they are efficiently organized.

Mr. Claxton: Sure.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister has really told us—and I wish to be accurate in what I say—the minister has, in effect, told us, or has said that he is going to tell us that they are well organized. I am not quite prepared to take that. I know the minister was competent in his own profession, and I am sure he has many other competencies I may not know about. But I do not think the minister will ask us to believe either that he is an expert on organization or that, with all the other things he has to attend to, he is able to give a great deal of time to the question of organization. I would imagine that a comparatively small amount of the minister's time could be spent on that subject. If I might hazard a guess I might think, judging from the many important things he has to do, and the many important journeys he has to take, that it is likely that the minister could not spend one-tenth of his time on this subject. But that is beside the point. All I am attempting to state is that other departments, perhaps with not one-tenth or perhaps not one per cent of the employees his department has, have thought it worth while. Therefore I suggest it is not entirely a silly suggestion. The minister has given us the assurance—"We have a job, and we do it"—and perhaps they are doing it; but our business is to find out whether it is being done economically. I hope that we shall have a great deal more evidence before we are through. There should be some looking into of this huge organization to see whether it is actually functioning with one hundred per cent efficiency.

Let us remember this important fact. In any business organization you have one very definite acid test which is going on all the time. They are either making or losing money. Everybody spending money is called upon to account for it. If everybody spends too much, the company goes broke. We have no test of that kind unless it is the bottom of the taxpayer's pockets. Really I find it rather trying at times to accept the minister's attitude when I make suggestions in good faith that possibly he might be assisted in what I admit is a most onerous task if he had some outside assistance. All he says is, "All right, go away and be a good boy." I do not find that to be a satisfactory answer.

Mr. Claxton: I appreciate the spirit in which the hon. member has made his suggestion. As I have said before in this house, my hon. friend and I have been friends for thirty years. I am not going to refer to that again. I am just as much inclined to bore this committee with my responses to questions of the opposition as they are inclined to bore the committee with their questions. I am quite prepared to spend as much time or more in answering questions as they spend in putting them. As we know, the questions are not put for any other purpose than to force the government to adopt a course which so far the government has not seen fit to adopt.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege I ask to have that withdrawn.

Mr. Claxton: I will withdraw it. It was not even suggested by the hon. member that we have too many civil servants in the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would you rather that we made insulting suggestions to you, or asked civil questions?

Mr. Claxton: I would rather have something I can deal with than just inquiries and suggestions of apprehensive fears. I should like to deal as best I can with some of the several points raised. According to the opposition, we seem to have more civil servants in the armed services in proportion than we should.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I did not say that.

Mr. Claxton: I am glad to hear that withdrawal, or suggestion, or correction.

Mr. Fleming: Find out what he did say.

Mr. Claxton: I should like to deal with some of the general remarks that have been made and suggest to hon. members that the method we have in Canada for working out the number of civil servants, for working out their salary levels, for promoting the efficiency of government is as good as or better than any method anywhere in the democratic world, judging by results.

These suggestions and inquiries are made without any basis. They throw out fears and apprehensions, but what are the facts? It is high time we looked at the facts about the efficiency of the government or the efficiency of the Department of National Defence with which I am primarily concerned, and for which I am exclusively responsible in this house. I am proud to be responsible because I think one of the best ways to judge the efficiency of the Department of National Defence is to consider the way in which our troops perform, whether they be of the navy, army, air force or defence research. So far as I know there has not been any question based on those grounds put by anyone in this house in the last three years.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Claxton: You say "No." The question is whether or not the defence estimates are suitable for the magnitude of the job we are doing and the build-up we are going in for, and whether or not we are spending the money in the right way. My submission is that the place to deal with whether or not we are spending the money right is in the public accounts committee.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Eighteen months old.

Mr. Claxton: We have all seen the familiar failure of the public accounts committee to provide a quorum on about four out of ten or fifteen meetings this session.

Mr. Pearkes: Who has the majority in that committee?

Mr. Harkness: The Liberals constitute three-quarters of the committee.

Mr. Claxton: I can give a record of the attendance of the Conservatives. They get just as bored as do the Liberals.

Mr. Pearkes: They still stay on.

Mr. Claxton: Dealing with the question as to the number of civil servants in the department, according to the figures which have been provided by various government departments concerned, the proportion of civil servants in Canada to the civil labour force, and the proportion in other countries with which we are concerned are as follows:

	Per cent
United Kingdom	1·333
Australia	1·478
Canada	1·126
France	2·286
United States	1·395

I recognize the difficulty of making comparisons, but I suggest to the hon. member that that indicates an effort to promote efficiency on the part of the treasury board and the civil service commission which has succeeded, measured in those terms. About all I can say to the hon. member, whose sincerity I entirely respect, is that the same apparatus which has been applied to the other agencies of government has been applied to defence. We have the same application of civil service rules and treasury board regulations.

In addition we have conducted during the past three years a series of studies of our own establishment, both service and civilian, in an endeavour to promote the utmost economy. These studies were carried on by teams of the civil service commission, the treasury board, service personnel and officers of the department. My answer to the hon. gentleman is that we have been doing a good deal to promote what he wants. The results have been rather good between 1946 and 1948 or 1949 in the number of civil service personnel as related to the service personnel. The hon. member said that I could not possibly give much of my time to this matter. I can assure him—and I am sure he will accept my assurance—that I give a great deal of time to this as to every other branch of the department's work. With regard to having an outside agency, a team of efficiency engineers, do a job on us, we have considered that. We looked at the Griffenhagen report—I think that is the name—of about 1919 or 1920, and I must say that was not very encouraging.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Did you look at the film board report? Was it better?

Mr. Claxton: I have not been responsible for the film board for three or four years, so I have not seen it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I thought you might have been interested in what they did.

Mr. Claxton: We have continuously under examination the strength of the service and civilian population of our department. I must say we have had nothing but the utmost co-operation from all three services. The hon. member referred to the natural tendency of service personnel to increase their empire. Perhaps I have ascribed to him more than he said, but I have not noticed that. Service personnel have co-operated in doing everything possible to make the most economical use of the civilian and service personnel they have. But the test of the pudding is in the eating. I think I have said in the course of this debate, and several times before, that judging by every possible form of comparison, whether it be in the case of the navy the proportion of men at sea, in the case of the air force the number of man hours flying per month per aircraft or per total manpower in the air force, or in the case of the army the number of people who are truly proportionately operational, we can stand comparison with any country despite the fact that we have to service our own country.

I had not intended to say this. I thought we were discussing civilian personnel, and I think every now and then we ought to get back to the program we have agreed to. I say the proof of the pudding should be in the eating. I ask hon. members to think about achievements of our armed forces with regard to Exercise Sweetbriar, the rescues of Canon Turner and that carried out by the Haida, the raising, training and employment of the 25th infantry brigade, including the Princess Patricia's, in Korea, the raising now of the 27th infantry brigade, the production of two of the greatest aircraft in the world, the development of anti-submarine vessels which I think are in advance of those of other countries, and then see whether what some hon. members are saying about the efficiency of the operation is really justified.

Here we are faced with the job of raising troops for service abroad, if necessary on two continents, the brigade group in battle in Korea today, the other group in Europe as part of the integrated force, the promise of eleven squadrons in Europe, the building up of 100 ships for the navy, new or refitted and rearmed, and the provision of all the training equipment and everything else necessary to see our way through the first year of a general war. Therefore I suggest that in the consideration of these items we should not lose sight of the major objective. As to the items themselves, as I have indicated I am ready and prepared to give every possible bit of information that can be given. I hope I have indicated that to be my attitude before, and I will continue to do so throughout the discussion no matter how long it lasts.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Harkness: It seems to me that the minister has, if I may put it in these words, permitted himself an orgy of broad general statements in connection with Canada's defence efforts instead of answering the specific questions put by the hon. member for Greenwood. The statement that the minister has just made has resolved chiefly around two phrases or sentences, "let us look at the facts", and "the proof of the pudding is in the eating". I am all in favour of looking at the facts, and I certainly accept the fact that the proof of the pudding is in the eating. It has been on a basis of that sort that a great deal of my criticism of the Department of National Defence has been made over the past two or three years, on the very fact that in spite of the fact that we were spending several hundreds of millions of dollars a year, amounting in total up to last year of upwards of $1,500 million since the end of the war, we did not have much pudding.

In spite of these efforts that the minister has been talking about, in spite of the hundreds of millions that were spent, when the war broke out in Korea less than a year ago we were in the position of having only one battalion of infantry fully trained and equipped. In other words, there was only one battalion of infantry, so far as the army was concerned, that was ready to fight. We had no other unit up to strength and completely equipped. So far as the air force was concerned, we did not have a single, completely equipped, up to strength, modern squadron ready to fight. So far as I can see them, there are the facts, and there is the proof of the pudding.

An hon. Member: The pudding is not cooked.

Mr. Harkness: According to the minister, we have apparently had all these efforts, but when the time came that we needed forces for the defence of this country we did not have them. I will admit that in the last few months the department has been doing much better. They have raised the 25th brigade and they are in the process of raising the 27th brigade. They have, as the minister indicated, put in orders for two new types of jet aircraft. They are building some new submarine chasers for the navy. In other words, things have been going ahead better in the last year. But if the minister is going to apply to the criticisms that we make the statement about looking at the facts, and that the proof of the pudding is in the eating, I think he is going to have very sour pudding to eat.

Mr. Thomas: This afternoon the minister indicated that they were trying to get as many civilian personnel as possible to work in the training camps. He also said that such civilian personnel came under the civil service commission. It is my understanding that any man over forty-five years of age would be barred under civil service commission regulations. There has been a great deal of talk about the shortage of labour in this country. Men over forty-five are and have been automatically barred because they are not fit to carry out the onerous duties involved in civilian production. However, there are a great number of these men over forty-five who could be extremely useful and could carry out the duties required of them in these training centres just as well as younger men. I would ask the minister to consider giving a preference to older men who cannot take their places in industry, that they may have jobs in these training camps as guards, dishwashers, waiters, cooks or whatever it may be, to take the places of men more able to play their part in industry during these trying times.

Mr. Claxton: The course suggested by the hon. member is the one we are following.

Mr. Cruickshank: I understood it was the civilian help the hon. member for Greenwood was speaking about, not particularly civil servants. There happens to be in my riding not only the largest but the finest army camp in Canada; as a matter of fact it is the finest engineering camp in the British empire. The hon. member for Nanaimo visited us there in an official capacity when the camp was being built. Since he left his official capacity we have added to that camp, under the general direction of the very efficient member representing that riding. At the present time we are trying to get as many civilians as possible. One of the things the army has to put up with —and I say this with all due deference to Queen's university—is the training of a great many young men in the summertime. We have them even from McGill university in your home town, Mr. Chairman. We are training those young men to be the officers of the future, because you know you can do almost anything with almost any material when it is trained in the Fraser valley. We also have in my riding the finest airport in Canada.

Mr. Stick: Oh, go on.

Mr. Cruickshank: I invite you to come and visit us.

Mr. Stick: Come down to Gander.

Mr. Cruickshank: Gander is not a military airport; Gander is where the hit and miss try to land between oceans. As I was saying, at that army camp we have these cadets. I speak as an old soldier with a certain amount of experience, though not very much. The first experience I had in the army was going around with a stick that had a nail in the end, picking up pieces of paper. The hon. member for Nanaimo knows more about these things than I do, because he also started as a private and rose to great heights where he could order men to do these things. My second experience was peeling onions. We did not have automatic peelers then; and if any hon. members here like to peel onions or potatoes by the sackful, I do not. Then we had another fatigue, which I understand, because of modern science and facilities, is not quite as onerous as it was in those days, when we had little cotton tarpaulins around these places which now have running water. It is a lot more efficient and easier to handle now.

I did not like those jobs, and I do not think the soldiers at the engineering camp in my riding like them either. These are the finest men, under the finest officers, in our whole army. They are volunteers who have offered to serve here or anywhere, and they do not want to peel potatoes and wash dishes for these fine young cadets taking summer training. For that reason only last week in Chilliwack we were advertising for civilians of the age group mentioned by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin to take over this work from the troops who are carrying out this training in a very efficient manner. There are many things for which I might condemn this department, but this is not one of them. For instance, I would sooner devote my time to saying the Department of National Defence was underpaying the private soldier even today, than take up time suggesting there are too many men peeling potatoes. As far as I am concerned I would rather see three civilians peeling potatoes for four good soldiers than one good soldier peeling potatoes for a man and a half. I think it is a wise program for the national defence department to use all the civilians they can in that class of work. We are doing exactly the same thing at the Abbotsford airport; we are calling for civilians to do this kind of work. I think the hon. member for Greenwood will realize that civilian help soon multiplies—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cruickshank: I do not mean that in the way some hon. members have taken it.

I am serious about this; instead of condemning the minister and his department in this connection I think they should be congratulated. I would rather see the hon. member for Greenwood join with me in asking that the private soldier who signed up to go anywhere is paid a little bonus as compared with the man who has the very onerous task of driving a general's car here in Ottawa. We cannot talk pensions under this item, I understand, so let us do what we can to help the front line soldier, and let the civilians go on peeling potatoes for the man who after all is responsible for the fact that we are able to sit here and talk about anything we please.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to ask the minister a question arising out of an experience I had with civilian personnel during the last war. At one time I was a staff officer and had a certain number of civilian personnel working for me. When I found out what they were getting paid I considered it inadequate; I asked how they could get more money, and they said by being upgraded. Being very new at the job and not knowing much about the civil service I asked who did that. They said I did, if I wanted to; so I put in a chit and had the whole staff advanced one grade. The D.O.C. signed the chit, the paymaster paid them, and I had a very contented staff for a considerable period. About three months later, however, the civil service commission paid me a visit and wanted to know what right I had to upgrade my civilian staff. I said well, they were efficient, I thought they were inadequately paid, and so forth, and I put up a case strong enough so that each member of the staff was given an advance in grade.

I consider that my actions were perfectly justified. I had a loyal staff; they were doing confidential work and doing it very well. I want to ask the minister what mechanism there is now for rewarding members of the civilian staff who show exceptional efficiency. Is there any way of giving them accelerated promotions? We are endeavouring to get as many civilians as possible on the headquarters staff, and I believe they are doing extremely important work, some of it perhaps secret and confidential. There must be some way of giving them some incentive to work perhaps longer hours than are prescribed for the civil service; to work on holidays and at night, to work a little harder and perhaps under a little more pressure than those in other departments. Certainly there are those who, whether they like it or not, have to handle secret and confidential information, and I should like to know what provision there is for accelerated promotion, which is what the army calls it, or upgrading for exceptional ability, efficiency and devotion to duty.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member asked a couple of questions. One was: What do they get for working overtime? The ordinary civil service rule, as I understand it, is that they get equivalent time off, in addition to their regular hours; and that is done, of course, in this department as far as possible. But I must say that many of the people working about there, that I am familiar with, would be off for some months if they took the overtime to which they are entitled. Most of them work a great deal more time than they take off through their credits. With regard to promotion, that is done through the ordinary civil service arrangements. As to accelerated promotion, if anyone does a superlatively good job, you can be sure he is pushed along, either in our department or in any other department. I am very glad indeed to have somebody who has done a good job in our department see a better opportunity in another department. I then give him the appropriate recommendation, unless I want to promote him to equivalent status in our department.

Mr. Adamson: Does the promotion rest with the civil service commission?

Mr. Claxton: With the civil service commission.

Mr. Adamson: Not with the director, the senior officer or the chief of the branch in which they are working?

Mr. Claxton: No. We have civilian control.

Mr. Adamson: Civilian control completely?

Mr. Claxton: Not completely, no; because the recommendation of a person by service personnel, like that of anyone else concerned, will help a great deal.

Mr. Pearkes: I think the hon. member for Fraser Valley unwittingly put his finger on the very point which is causing some of us concern. He said that civilian employees multiply in number; and that is rather the fear that some of us have. He went on to suggest that there might be three civilians peeling onions for four soldiers. There you are; he is suggesting the idea of the extravagant employment of civilians. I suppose he made the last remark in jest, but there is among some of us over here the fear that there is a danger of these civilian employees multiplying in number out of all proportion to the work they are doing.

The Minister of National Defence asked the hon. member for Greenwood: Have you any particular cases in which you can point to extravagance? Mr. Chairman, members of parliament do not have the opportunity of going around and inspecting the various camps. We cannot go and see whether there is extravagance here and there. We have other duties to attend to. One of the duties that we as an opposition have is to try to find out whether there is any extravagance; and if there is the least fear or suspicion of it, it is our duty to offer suggestions as to how that might be checked.

The hon. member for Greenwood offered the suggestion that there should be some sort of committee of civilians. I do not think that is a new policy at all. In the past there have been committees—not necessarily composed of civilians—who have gone around, visiting camps and have seen whether the establishments are being padded, to use the army term. During this last war there were three inspectors general in Canada travelling around this country inspecting the units and reporting upon their administration; going into the camps and reporting not to the chief of the general staff but direct to the minister on questions of extravagance, where money could be saved, where there was inefficiency in organization and in administration. The office of inspector general existed, not always, but on and off between the two wars when there was a much smaller military establishment than there is now. I am going to offer the suggestion that now is the time to appoint a qualified officer of experience who will act as inspector general and who will be continually touring around the various camps and units, reporting to nobody else but the minister, keeping the minister informed if there is any extravagance, any padding of establishments, and where it may be possible to have one civilian peeling onions for four soldiers instead of three doing that sort of thing.

I am making that suggestion in all seriousness because I know that system worked effectively during the last war and that money was saved. It is all very well to say that the proof of the pudding is in the eating. That is quite true; but if it is going to cost us too much, we are going to go bankrupt, and we shall not have any pudding to eat, and we shall not have cake or anything else; but somebody else will be stepping in here and will be taking advantage of our ruined economy. We cannot be too careful about insisting upon this government's taking every possible step to ensure that there is no waste in any department.

Mr. Cruickshank: As my name has been mentioned, Mr. Chairman, may I say another word on this matter. I will admit that I might have been exaggerating when I spoke of three men peeling one sack of onions. But I must disagree with my friend the hon. member for Nanaimo, although I hesitate to do so because naturally he has had far greater military experience than I. First we heard from the hon. member for Greenwood that we should have an efficiency expert come in here to tell us how to run the army. We have had a great many efficiency experts in the province from which I come. For instance, we have had about fourteen efficiency experts —most of them from the east unfortunately; some from the city of Montreal and some from the city of Toronto—to tell us how to cut educational costs. That great authority from the blossom riding of Kamloops will correct me if I am wrong, but that is one of the great troubles. We have had too many efficiency experts out there, as he knows, with too few results. I am going to disagree with the hon. member for Nanaimo, although he has had vast experience. But I think one of the troubles during the last war was that we had too many generals floating around; and instead of getting efficiency we got the direct opposite.

I know something about the camp in my riding; unlike my hon. friend, I visit the camp within my riding. If a member refrains from golfing or fishing, he finds time to visit the military institutions within his own riding, as I do. We have at that camp most efficient officers who check on this very thing. We do not need any generals coming in there, with red all over them, four batmen and two cars. We have efficient officers out there who will do that checking as to whether there is extravagance or not. I admit that I exaggerated with regard to three men peeling a sack of onions; but I am just as much interested in economy as is any other member of the committee. But in my opinion, you can over-expert a thing. I think that the biggest trouble down at what I believe is called Cartier square is that there are still too many experts playing around, too many generals. If we were to eliminate about half the generals and put a couple of sergeant-majors in there, they would get us some efficiency. I must disagree with the hon. member. I do not want any more generals in there. There are enough now.

Mr. Stick: Like John Knox's army, one general for every three soldiers.

Mr. Cruickshank: One general for every two soldiers, I think my hon. friend said. I know that in the 29th battalion one soldier was equal to twenty from anywhere else.

But in all seriousness, may I say that I think you can overdo matters with respect to these experts. The most successfully run business in the province of British Columbia is the British Columbia Electric Company Limited. I say that without fear of contradiction. It is one of the most successfully run anywhere in Canada. Well, we had a change of management, and for a short time, owing to what they started to do out there, they brought in a Rhodes scholar as personnel director. These are facts. They brought in this efficiency expert, and what happened? The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra knows this is correct, and so does every other member from British Columbia. You could not get a job on the section unless you had a university degree. That was one of these experts' ideas.

I am not so keen on these experts, whether they are generals or privates. A little common sense can do these things. If the minister will get behind the officers he has in the Chilliwack army camp they will guarantee there will be no waste, no inefficiency, and we do not need any more generals fooling around there trying to tell us how to do it.

Mr. Hees: Our remarks in this regard are directed through you, sir, to the minister. Might it be possible for the minister to find it convenient to return now so that we can talk to him?

Mr. Cruickshank: That comes from the visitor from Toronto?

Mr. Hees: I should like to refer to some of the remarks that the minister made following the remarks made by the hon. member for Greenwood. The minister seemed rather hurt that we had suggested that an efficiency survey of his 30,000 civilian employees might show some positive results. He implied that unless we could point our finger at some place where inefficiency was occurring, there was no justification for asking for a survey.

There has been no allegation by any member of the opposition, to my knowledge, that we have too many civil servants, simply because we have absolutely no way of knowing whether we have or not. We have not been taken into the confidence of the government. As the hon. member for Nanaimo said, we have not the time or the opportunity to go around to these camps and examine just what is going on there. All that we can do is to ask questions, and ask questions we certainly intend to continue doing.

Regarding this idea of an efficiency survey, I have known a number of companies, of less than one thousandth the size of the force that we are dealing with here, that have had efficiency surveys. They have been able to cut down anywhere up to 25 per cent of the personnel they had on their staff before the survey took place, and with fewer staff they have been able to operate far more efficiently than they ever did before. This staff of 30,000 is no more than a business organization. What we are suggesting is that ordinary business practices, which have been employed by firms that must show a profit, might be employed and found useful there. It is a sincere suggestion by the members of the opposition to the minister. It is very regrettable that he should take this as a personal criticism of him and of his department, and find it necessary to cite the fighting qualities of our troops. There is nobody in this house who criticizes the fighting forces or even thinks for a moment that we have not got the finest army, navy and air force in the world. We know we have. The fighting men that we have are terrific. We all know that. We are simply suggesting ways in which we might help the minister make savings in a very large labour force. This is a suggestion which is utilized many times in the life of any successful business organization.

Most business organizations, as anybody who is a businessman knows, are continually examining ways and means by which they can cut down personnel and increase their efficiency. Having been in the services, I know that there never was, and I am sure there never will be, a commanding officer in any service who ever willingly cut down on personnel, civilian or military. You just do not do it. The commanding officer does not have to pay the personnel. He does not have to show a profit. He simply wants a good operation to show his superior officers, and the more men he has on his staff the easier it is for him to do so. There is not the slightest incentive for any commanding officer to cut down on personnel, and he just does not do it. If you expect commanding officers to be efficiency experts, you are barking up the wrong tree, because they are just not going to do it.

Mr. Ferrie: That is not so.

Mr. Hees: If you were in the service, and if you know of any commanding officer who ever willingly cut down on personnel, I should like you to cite the case right now.

Mr. Ferrie: Here is one man here who has just said that.

Mr. Hees: Absolute nonsense.

Mr. Ferrie: That is all you fellows have, just the one remark.

Mr. Hees: The idea of an efficiency survey is not a new one. Since the last war, this government has had an efficiency survey carried out in certain departments, by the firm of Walter Gordon and Company of Toronto. This government saw fit to employ Mr. Gordon and his associates to do the kind of job we are suggesting should be done on a very large scale, and therefore the suggestion is not a new one.

The minister also suggested that perhaps this was extremely boring to hon. members; that the opposition were in some way at fault for taking up the time of the house by going into these matters. Well, obviously, the minister would rather have it done in the committee of the whole than in an armed services committee. If that is the way the minister wishes to have it done, that is the way the opposition are going to proceed. We have suggested the other way. He wants it done this way. We feel it is our job to scrutinize these tremendous expenditures, to ask all the questions that we feel need to be asked, and we fully intend to continue to do so.

An hon. Member: Ask questions.

Mr. Hees: Nobody in the opposition that I know of has suggested that they would not want civilian personnel to replace military personnel, or naval, or air force personnel. That is common sense. We would like it to be done to the greatest extent possible; but we would like to feel that the tremendous amount of the taxpayers' money that is paid out to these people to do this job is paid out in such a way that the people who receive it will operate as efficiently as possible, and cost the taxpayers of this country as little as possible. That is all we are asking. It is a simple business proposition, accepted by all successful business firms. It is a sensible and sincere suggestion. I would like to hear the minister say why he is so much against a survey, as suggested by the hon. member for Greenwood, being carried out, in order to see if we cannot cut down on this very large civilian labour force, and perhaps save the taxpayers some money.

An hon. Member: We do not want duplication.

Mr. Claxton: I should like to give the hon. member all the assurance he would like to have, but I could only do that if I felt honestly they were good things to do. Unlike a good many corporations, we have a continuous check-up on the efficiency of government operations, first, through the department; second, through the civil service commission; third, through the treasury board; and fourth, through parliament itself. The figures I gave before indicated that, in regard to the efficiency of government administration, judged by the proportion of civil servants to the over-all labour force, we were not too bad; in fact, we were the best in any country that is comparable at all.

Our experience in regard to efficiency experts is varied. If you get very good ones they give you very good advice on a pretty high level, but you have got to apply it right across the board, and so we have to go in the end to our own department, to the civil service commission and to the treasury board working together to apply anything that has produced any consequence by one of those efficiency experts. I am all for it, you bet. I have had them. They usually produce an increase in the over-all strength required to do a job, but—

Mr. Hees: The right one.

Mr. Claxton: Well, who is to pick the right one? We have had this kind of operation done in respect of certain things in our department and we are still working on them.

Mr. Hees: What is the opinion of the government of the job that Gordon and Company of Toronto did some years ago?

Mr. Claxton: I think Walter Gordon is a fine fellow.

Mr. Hees: And did he do a good job?

Mr. Claxton: I think he did a great job. I think he also did a good job when he advised me in respect of certain changes which should be made in my own department. And I will consult Walter Gordon any time he and I find it convenient to get together—you bet! There is no quarrel about that.

But when it comes to doing an over-all cutting job, then the only cutting knife there is is that of treasury board. And that has to be rough and tough; and that is done by my colleague the Minister of Finance. And what he has done in order to reduce the total number of civil servants outside the Department of National Defence has been quite amazing, in this time of national growth. I think I have impressed upon our department—because we are spending about three and a half times as much as all the other departments combined—that they have to be responsible to the utmost cent. And that is what I hope we will do.

Mrs. Fairclough: I would suggest to the minister that the best, as judged by any standard, whether it be that of another nation or another department within our own government service, does not necessarily mean that the job we are producing is the best that can be produced. I would ask the minister whether he would give serious consideration to an examination of all these services, with a view to replacing men where possible with women, so as to release those men for active service.

In discussing this matter before the dinner hour it was suggested that there were many places in the services where women could serve admirably so as to release men for active duty. I also say on behalf of the women that they will carry a great load—possibly greater than that now being carried.

Mr. Claxton: Wherever possible that will be done.

Mr. Shaw: It occurred to me, after having listened to the past several hours of discussion, that if the Kremlin had recording equipment in this building they would have considered by this time that any contemplated war they might start would be half won already.

The minister has been accused of giving broad and general answers to questions. But in all my experience here I have never listened to such a battery of broad and general statements and questions as I have heard during the past several hours. The whole thing is boring, as someone has asserted. I think it is boring particularly because there has been a complete absence of ability on the part of someone to sink his teeth into something concrete. It appears to me as though it might be the product of frustration.

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Greenwood, and I would sum up what I heard him say, or what I thought I heard him say. He said, in effect, that something should be done, that something may be wrong—although he was not just sure what may be wrong. But something may be wrong, he thought, and therefore something should be done; and since he could not determine what was wrong—"Would you appoint an efficiency expert to tell me what is wrong, so that I can criticize?"

It is all right to talk about efficiency; we all desire to have it; but efficiency has taught us one thing, if nothing else, and that is that as a rule, and especially as applied to the armed services, where efficiency experts have been employed it has resulted in the immediate issue of a grand collection of new forms which are used for a short period of time, and then promptly forgotten—and, as the hon. member for Peace River suggests to me, as a rule they are put out, at the rate of twenty-five copies each.

I feel there are several extremely important issues relative to national defence that could be occupying our time profitably now; and that we should not have to listen to the mere assertion that something may be wrong. I will criticize when I can find something wrong, something which I believe should be criticized. But I think we are not justified in repeating the simple assertion that something may be wrong—"We don't know what is wrong, but if you will tell us what is wrong, and let us determine how it is wrong, we will have something to criticize".

I am not questioning the right of anyone to adopt that course of action; but in my estimation when we have certain much more important issues before us including, I may say to my friends of the Progressive Conservative party, the whole manpower question, we should devote our time to a discussion of those questions, which are far more important than these simple issues to which we have been devoting the past several hours today and on previous occasions.

I suggest that in these grave times we would be well advised to get down to business and deal with certain of those factors which, to me, are of much greater importance at this extremely serious time. I doubt if anyone will deny that these are serious times.

Mr. Hees: I should like to ask a question of the hon. member who has just spoken, and who has so generously given us the benefit of his great experience—and he seems to have had vast experience—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: —in the matter of efficiency experts dealing with military establishments. I should like to ask him the number of these, and if he would give us the benefit of his experience in that regard. He seems to have had a great deal of experience. He has said that in every case this or that has happened. Then, could we not be honoured or favoured by a further discourse in which he would set out specific instances where efficiency experts have caused less efficiency than before they started?

Mr. Shaw: May I advise my hon. friend—because perhaps he does not know—that I did serve for quite a number of years on the war expenditures committee. May I also advise him of a complete absence of any specific charge or declarations on his part, or any evidence whatsoever to indicate that during the course of his military experience the use of so-called efficiency experts did bring about the results which he seems to indicate would be inevitable, should the government at this time undertake to appoint such persons.

I have indicated to my hon. friend that practically throughout the period of the war

I did serve on the war expenditures committee. Certainly I am not without experience so far as war expenditures are concerned.

Mr. Hees: I would ask the hon. member to name some particular experiences where efficiency experts tried to do a job, and failed to do it.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I wonder if we are not getting away from the subject matter of the discussion.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Very far away.

The Deputy Chairman: It is the subject of civil salaries and wages. I know that certain questions have been asked respecting the efficiency of civilian employees, but I do not think we should undertake a discussion respecting the firms or experts engaged in the examination of personnel as to efficiency, and the like.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I ask the hon. member a question?

The Deputy Chairman: I have just ruled that the matter is closed.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to ask the minister one question with regard to security. We are dealing with civilian employees of the Department of National Defence, and acting in their different capacities nearly all of them at one time or another will have access to material that is restricted, if not secret and top secret in character. What is the machinery for screening prospective employees who have to take the oath of secrecy under the Official Secrets Act? What percentage have taken this oath? What percentage of those who have been screened have taken the oath? I am not saying this in any spirit of criticism, but in view of what is going on in the world I do not think we can be too careful and we would like to know what is being done.

Mr. Claxton: All of those who have access to top secret, secret or restricted information are screened before they have such access. All civil servants take the oath.

Mr. Adamson: Is that the official secrets oath?

Mr. Claxton: It is the oath of allegiance and, in some cases, of secrecy.

Mr. Adamson: Does every civil servant, no matter what department or branch he is in, take the oath of secrecy?

Mr. Claxton: It takes some time to get around to all of them, but that is done.

Mr. Pearkes: The last item in these details concerns 80 personnel employed by the co-ordinator of civil defence, and I believe that it is under this item that the salaries of these employees would be paid and possibly also the salary of the co-ordinator of civil defence. I do not know of any other item under which we could ask questions relating to civil defence. On May 11 the Minister of National Health and Welfare made a statement with reference to civil defence, after which the leader of the opposition stated, and I quote from page 2941 of Hansard:

> If that disposes of the review of civil defence at this stage, recognizing the item will of course come up again at a later point when it is called—
> Mr. Martin: I hope not tonight.

He was referring to May 11. At that time we deferred to his wish, but I know that some hon. members would like to discuss a number of general matters dealing with civil defence and it would seem that this is the appropriate and perhaps the only time when we could discuss those matters. Would either the Minister of National Defence or the Minister of National Health and Welfare be prepared now to answer questions on civil defence?

Mr. Claxton: I think the hon. member for Nanaimo is quite right. My understanding was that it was agreed by the committee that we would deal with civil defence when that came up after the completion of the items on page 269 under defence services, departmental administration, including inspection services and civil defence. At that time I asked the committee if they wanted to proceed with civil defence as the minister responsible for that branch was present, and they indicated that they wanted to do that, and did. That was done. There was quite a discussion at that time. If there is a desire to revive that at some future date when he is here, I will bring it to his attention.

An hon. Member: He is here now.

Mr. Claxton: All right, if he is prepared, it does not matter. But we have already passed from that subject.

Mr. Pearkes: No, we have not.

Mr. Claxton: Yes. I am quite wrong. We have no way of controlling this committee, no way at all except by agreement. We have had agreement three times and each time it has not been observed. However, we will work along.

Mr. Martin: May I say one thing in deference to my colleague, the Minister of National Defence. As far as I am concerned, my duties not being anything as onerous as his, and knowing how his time is preoccupied, knowing something of his ensuing engagements, it might meet in part what he had in mind if we could dispose of the matters with which he is directly concerned on the understanding that questions could be put later on with regard to civil defence. I would be most happy to meet his wishes if that is what he had in mind.

Mr. Claxton: Let us get rid of it now.

Mr. Martin: If it is the wish of the committee to go on, I am ready to do so.

Mr. Pearkes: I think the Minister of National Defence said, "Let us get rid of it now".

Mr. Claxton: Yes, but with all respect I think we have agreed—I think Mr. Chairman will agree with me—three times, informally it is true—it cannot be binding on any member—that we will proceed in a certain way. I suggest that that is the only way a democratic country can proceed, by agreement and decision and, once a matter has been decided upon, to move on from that. It is a difficult situation because at any stage any member can upset the agreement. It has been upset. Let us go back.

The Deputy Chairman: If I remember correctly, when the Minister of National Defence made his statement on the first item of general administration and was suggesting procedure he indicated that the items relating to civil defence would be dealt with by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and on this item we have had a wide general discussion pertaining to civil defence.

I understood that the agreement was that we were to carry on with whatever items belonged to the Minister of National Defence and were to have a detailed study of the civil defence items with which the Minister of National Health and Welfare would be concerned. That was the understanding.

Mr. Pearkes: I believe the salaries paid to the 80 employees in the office of the civilian defence co-ordinator, referred to on page 2963 of Hansard, will be paid under this item. According to the statement on that page of Hansard the total is $271,702.

The Deputy Chairman: Has it not been announced by the Minister of National Defence that payments to be made in connection with civil defence would come under his vote, but that later they would be transferred?

Mr. Claxton: Let us deal with them now.

The Deputy Chairman: It is true, as the minister announced in his opening statement, that while these salaries come under the national defence vote, later on they would be transferred to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It was suggested that the Minister of National Health and Welfare would give any information that was requested when we came to discuss the items pertaining to national defence. Suppose we pass this item covering civil salaries and wages, which would provide for the payment of salaries having to do with civil defence, and then later on the Minister of National Health and Welfare will come before the committee and the eighty people in whom the hon. member for Nanaimo is interested can be dealt with at that time.

Mr. Fleming: Will the money have been voted for the eighty persons in the meantime?

The Deputy Chairman: Necessarily it would be if we adopt this vote, but the committee would reserve its right to discuss the item when the Minister of National Health and Welfare comes before it to discuss the four or five items pertaining to civil defence.

Mr. Fleming: With respect, it would seem a little strange to vote the money, simply reserving the right to elicit information later regarding these eighty persons. Would not the proper thing to do be to defer the item until that remaining matter has likewise been disposed of?

The Deputy Chairman: I agree with the hon. member that it would not be done unless the committee is unanimously agreeable to it. I do not want to have a long discussion over procedure. If hon. members do not agree to that course then the Minister of National Health and Welfare has offered to reply now.

Mr. Claxton: In reply to the questions of hon. members, I think I ought to give them the details of the estimates on civil defence as we arranged them back in December or January. That is what I understand has been asked for. They are as follows: Civil salaries and wages, $271,702; travel and removal expenses, $88,500; freight, express and cartage, $5,000. Hon. members will observe we are following the ordinary form of arrangement for all estimates.

Mrs. Fairclough: In order to enable members to follow the minister, may I ask him to tell us where this appears in the estimates?

Mr. Claxton: It is on page 269. It provides for a vote of $13,419,162 of which part is for civil defence, and I am taking out for the hon. member the items related to civil defence.

Mr. Green: Taking them out.

Mrs. Fairclough: From each item?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. We have followed the items established by the comptroller of the treasury and the treasury board. I think the last one I mentioned was freight, express and cartage, $5,000; telephones, telegraph and other communication services, $2,500; printing of departmental reports and other publications, $51,500; office stationery supplies, equipment and furnishings, $18,500; materials and supplies, $4,303,500.

Mr. Harkness: What was that figure?

Mr. Claxton: $4,303,500. Acquisition and construction of buildings and works, including acquisition of land, $350,000. All other expenditures other than special categories, $5,000, a total of $5,096,202.

Mr. Pearkes: What was the total?

Mr. Claxton: I should indicate that our estimate is that of that amount it will not be possible or likely that we will expend during 1951-52 $900,000, so the amount in the estimates is $4,196,202.

Mr. Pearkes: $4,196,202.

Mr. Blair: These figures are rather confusing. Did I understand the minister to say that only $900,000 of the total amount is going to be spent in 1951-52?

Mr. Claxton: $900,000 would not likely be spent.

Mr. Blair: $900,000 will not be spent?

Mr. Claxton: That is the estimate.

Mr. Blair: So you are going to spend approximately $4 million?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Blair: May I ask the minister how many civilians are employed in this organization and what salaries they are receiving?

Mr. Claxton: Eighty.

Mr. Blair: What are the eighty people getting? What are their salaries? What does the co-ordinator receive?

Mr. Claxton: $10,000, less of course what he gets as an army pensioner. As a major general having thirty-five years plus service I should think that he was working full time, and working very well, for about $3,500 a year.

Mr. Blair: What are the salaries of the other eighty?

Mr. Claxton: The projected figure throughout the year is eighty but at the present time there are only twenty-seven.

Mr. Blair: What do you propose to pay each of them per year?

Mr. Martin: They will be paid in accordance with the regular salaries for persons engaged in that kind of work.

Mr. Blair: What is the regular salary for people engaged in that kind of work?

Mr. Martin: Will my hon. friend tell me what post he has in mind particularly?

Mr. Blair: What are the positions? We do not know what the set-up is.

Mr. Martin: There are filing clerks. There is a solicitor, for instance, in my own department who is now doing legal work in connection with civil defence. The work of directing the medical committee is now being carried on by a regular official of the Department of National Health and Welfare who has made a specialty in this particular field. We are also contemplating securing the services of one or two individuals who, we hope, will find it possible and convenient to contribute their services to the government without pay in this particular work. I have in mind one who is an export in the field of telecommunications.

Mr. Cruickshank: On a point of order, may I ask which estimates we are discussing? If it is civilian defence, or rather the lack of civilian defence, I want to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare some questions.

The Deputy Chairman: We are now discussing the sub-item, civil salaries and wages.

Mr. Cruickshank: Then I cannot ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare any questions.

An hon. Member: Sure you can.

The Deputy Chairman: We are discussing the civilians employed in the office of General Worthington who is in charge of civil defence.

Mr. Fleming: By leave of the committee there was ordered to be placed on Hansard this afternoon certain information with regard to personnel and salaries on the civil administration staff of this department. Are the positions and salaries of the persons to be attached to the civil defence organization set forth in that list? We have not seen it yet. Of course it was ordered to be printed but we have not seen it.

Mr. Claxton: It has been available since 3.30.

Mr. Fleming: Those of us who were in the house when this business came up this afternoon still have not seen the figures. We shall see them in Hansard tomorrow, but we have not got them tonight.

Mr. Martin: May I deal with my hon. friend's question. With respect to those officials who were in the civil defence division under the Department of National Defence, those persons will be in that list, but there are now engaged officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare, such as the one in charge of the medical committee to whom I referred, who is normally a functionary of the Department of National Health and Welfare but who is now doing civil defence work almost exclusively. His name would not appear on that list. He will continue as an official of the Department of National Health and Welfare. He is the chairman of one of our divisions.

Mr. Cruickshank: Apparently I am in order in asking the minister a question.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member for Eglinton wants to put a supplementary question.

Mr. Fleming: There are several questions that arise out of the minister's statement. In the first place, he will appreciate that we have not seen that list. We shall see it tomorrow. Do the personnel to be attached to the civil defence administration appear in segregated form on that list, or are they mingled with all other civilian personnel on the administration staff?

Mr. Martin: I am advised that they are not segregated.

Mr. Fleming: Then do I understand also from the minister's last statement that in the case of personnel of the Department of National Health and Welfare who are engaged in the work of civil defence, they will continue to be on the staff of his department and will draw their salaries as officials of that department, and not through the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Martin: As my hon. friend will appreciate, that must be fairly clear. The transfer of responsibilities took place after the estimates had been decided upon. If the present situation continues next year obviously those now engaged in civil defence who are attached to the Department of National Defence will have their attachment transferred to the Department of National Health and Welfare and perforce those in national health and welfare will continue to appear, as indeed they are, as members of the staff of that department.

Mr. Fleming: Then in taking the figure of eighty as the strength to which the staff is to be built up, will that include officials or personnel still attached to the Department of National Health and Welfare, or will it be in addition to them?

Mr. Martin: Some twenty-seven persons are now on strength at the head office and at the training school, and approximately sixty additional positions may be set up. That would include officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare as such. I am not saying all those positions are going to be filled. As I go through the work I feel that some of those posts need not be filled, in view of the fact that some of our own officials can deal with these matters. However, I cannot be too precise in that particular.

Mr. Fleming: Even accepting the minister's closing reservation, would he indicate to us how this personnel of eighty, not including those on the staff of his own department, was arrived at? Can the minister give us an outline of the general functions which those eighty people were expected to perform when that number was arrived at? There must have been some planning done before that figure was reached. What is the break-down? Can the minister give us the different categories within the group, and some indication of the functions to be discharged by at least the senior officials of that group of eighty?

Mr. Martin: Well, for instance, in my judgment it is not necessary to create a special post or posts in the legal division, because the personnel in the legal division of the national health and welfare department have the time and ability to deal with legal matters. It is not necessary to create special posts for certain medical assignments, because my department has certain people who are trained and whose time will permit them to give their services to this group. In our Indian health service it will be possible to utilize a number of our personnel to do work which, if this had been left as it was, it might not have been possible to get done. The instructors in the training school now in progress at Connaught Ranges are not entirely special appointments; two of our own officials who have had training at the civil defence training school in the United Kingdom are being attached for that purpose.

Mr. Cruickshank: I raise a point of order, Mr. Chairman, and I would like a ruling. I was ruled out of order when I asked some questions of the Minister of Resources and Development, and now I think the minister is entirely out of order. If we are going to talk about civil defence let us all know, so the rest of us can talk about it too. I thought we were on the national defence estimates. If we are going to open up the matter of civil defence I want to say a lot about the lack of civil defence in my province.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Fraser Valley will appreciate that when a minister replies he requires perhaps more latitude in order to give a full explanation than hon. members would be allowed in putting their questions. What we are discussing now is the Department of National Defence, the item covering civil salaries and wages. Among these civilian personnel for whom money is voted under this item are some eighty civilians employed in the office of civil defence. We are discussing civil defence under this item because some employees belonging to the civil defence branch receive their salaries under this item.

Mr. Cruickshank: I quite appreciate that; so apparently I am in order if I go on with a discussion of civil defence.

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order—

Mr. Cruickshank: I am speaking to a point of order. I sat down for Toronto the last time; I am not sitting down this time.

The Deputy Chairman: Both hon. members will please take their seats. I think we must continue with the discussion of this item covering civil salaries and wages. If the hon. member for Fraser Valley wishes to ask questions coming within the scope of this item, he will be perfectly in order. Now, the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. Fleming: I was just going to ask the minister to complete his answer to me. He got as far as the instructors. So far in effect he has said that they do not need any more personnel on the legal side, or on the medical side, or in health services, or as instructors. I am wondering what the eighty are going to do. So far we have not been told, though we have been told the people they do not need. Can the minister answer the question, please?

Mr. Martin: I most certainly can answer it, and I think I have answered it. I have said there are now twenty-seven posts. There was a plan for sixty additional posts. As I see it at the moment—and I can only speak of the moment because we are having discussions with the provinces, who have some obligations in connection with this matter—it will not be necessary to fill all these sixty posts. But that matter depends upon contingencies which I cannot possibly foresee at this moment. For instance, there was the thought of some nursing aides. I find that we have in our own department personnel of that kind who can be utilized.

Mr. Fleming: I am sure the committee will commend any minister who is seeking to use his present staff for suitable purposes instead of building up a big staff which is not necessary. Are we to take the minister's last statement to indicate his present view that none of the additional sixty are likely to be required?

Mr. Martin: I cannot say more than I have said for the time being.

Mr. Fleming: The minister made a statement which he may not have realized was somewhat ambiguous. He indicated his present view was that the other sixty would not be required.

Mr. Martin: No, I did not say that. I said that at the moment it would not be necessary to fill the sixty posts but that I could not foresee all possible contingencies. We are now having negotiations with the provinces in respect to this matter and it may be that they will not be prepared to assume certain roles the government believes the provinces should be prepared to assume. Those are circumstances that have to be borne in mind. I cannot say more and be as unambiguous as I know my esteemed and hon. friend wants me to be.

Mr. Fleming: Will my highly esteemed friend the minister be kind enough, then, to say what the twenty-seven persons who I understand are engaged in civil defence exclusively are doing? What is the set-up?

Mr. Martin: Well, there is General Worthington, the civil defence co-ordinator. There is his assistant; there is Colonel Croteau, who is in charge of the school. Under him are other officials.

Mr. Fleming: How many?

Mr. Martin: At the school I think there are five. Those are permanent. They are helping in one way and another. There is the stenographic staff. There are clerks. There are one or two officers.

Mr. Fleming: How many stenographers and how many clerks?

Mr. Martin: Offhand, I do not know how many there are; but I could give you that information.

Mr. Fleming: I was not able to hear what the minister said.

Mr. Martin: I do not know offhand how many clerks or stenographers there are. But I can tell the hon. member that the general thinks that there are not enough.

Mr. Fleming: What does the minister think?

Mr. Martin: I think a happy compromise is likely the right decision.

Mr. Fleming: I am serious, Mr. Chairman, in asking for this information as to the functional break-down of the present staff. If the minister has not this information available tonight, perhaps he would be agreeable to providing the committee with it later. He may not be able to push a button and get information in five minutes, as one minister said this afternoon that he could. Perhaps the Minister of National Health and Welfare does not push buttons with such immediate results. But would he be kind enough to obtain that information for us during the course of the consideration of this item?

Mr. Martin: I will do that.

Mr. Fleming: I think the committee is interested in this, first of all, because of the paramount importance, under present conditions, of civil defence. I think the committee will want the fullest information about the plans that are being laid for preparation for civil defence in this country.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member will realize that he cannot go beyond asking questions pertaining to the employees that come under this vote.

Mr. Martin: May I say to the hon. member that I shall be glad to do as he has requested.

Mr. Fleming: I think I am entitled to make some comment upon the number of employees in relation to the responsibility parliament has to expect of them. The minister has indicated that he thinks that twenty-seven apparently are going to be needed,—

Mr. Martin: No, I did not say that.

Mr. Fleming:—as he foresaw the job at the present time.

Mr. Martin: No, I did not say that.

Mr. Fleming: Then I do not know what the minister said, because he intimated that, as he sees the situation now, the twenty-seven, as I understood him, would be sufficient to do the job; and he says he does not think it will be necessary to fill the sixty posts.

Mr. Martin: We might save a great deal of time if my hon. friend will allow me to repeat what I said. What I said was that we now have twenty-seven posts. Plans have been made for sixty others. I do not believe we will perhaps need the full sixty but I cannot make a definite commitment at the present time, for the reasons that I gave.

Mr. Fleming: The minister has now changed his statement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. Fleming: Earlier, when I was trying to clear up this ambiguity, in his statement the minister said he did not think it would be necessary to fill the sixty posts. Now he says he does not think it will be necessary to fill the full sixty posts. That is a different matter entirely.

Mr. Gardiner: That is what he said from the beginning.

Mr. Fleming: Maybe he is going to fill fifty-nine.

Mr. Cruickshank: Maybe we will get our proceedings in order, too.

Mr. Fleming: Surely this is a serious matter in all the municipalities of this country which could easily be targets either for attack from abroad or by a fifth column here in Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I will again ask the hon. member, in his remarks, not to go beyond questions or comments pertaining to the employees who come under this vote. If his remarks are to be relevant to the item under discussion, that is what he will have to do.

Mr. Fleming: With great respect, Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: My ruling has been given, and it is not debatable. I know that the hon. member will want to enlarge upon that. But I have asked him for the second time to observe the rules, and I will expect him to do so.

Mr. Fleming: With great respect, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I cannot imagine anything more relevant to the matter of this situation which the minister is describing to the committee tonight.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member has no imagination.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We had a general discussion on civil defence. Now we are past the stage of general discussion. We are discussing a specific item. The hon. member for Eglinton may disagree with the chairman when the latter does not think that certain remarks are relevant. But it so happens that someone must take the responsibility of deciding whether or not a discussion is relevant. Although he disagrees with me, I say that his remarks are not relevant. I have made a ruling, and that ruling is not debatable. The hon. member may appeal that ruling, but that is all he can do. He must observe the rules.

Mr. Pearkes: For the first time tonight, Mr. Chairman, we have been told the total figure which is going to be spent on civil defence—

Mr. Martin: If the hon. member will permit me to do so, I should like to say here that I gave that figure the other night, when I spoke, in outlining the general policy of the government in this matter. I gave it in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Kamloops, who nods his head in approval.

Mr. Pearkes: It was given tonight and broken down into detail. I feel that the people of the country are going to be stunned when they hear that we are spending only $4 million on civil defence out of a defence budget of almost $2 billion, and that they are going to ask very definitely this question: What is the co-ordinator of civil defence doing? I feel that I can endorse every word that the Minister of National Defence said a few minutes ago—

Mr. Cruickshank: I again rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman, and I want a ruling. My municipality is just as much interested in civil defence as is any other municipality. If these other hon. members are going to be allowed to discuss civil defence in general, under national defence estimates, then I want to know whether I am going to be accorded the same privilege. Either we are in order or we are not in order; and I maintain that this general discussion is out of order.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. Low: No, I do not wish to speak to the point of order. I want to get on with the business.

The Deputy Chairman: A point of order has been raised.

Mr. Harkness: I wish to speak to the point of order, something which I seldom do. What I should like to know is this. If we are not going to be able to discuss these other items on civil defence now, when are we going to be able to do so? The minister gave a break-down under the heading of salaries, travelling expenses, freight, telephones, et cetera. On the basis of your ruling that is being discussed, I would take it that when we come, for example, to the item of travelling and the removal expenses, which is the third item down on page 269, we will discuss this $88,000 of travelling expenses which the minister gave in his break-down.

If we are going to carry on in that way, I would submit that it is going to result in a disjointed discussion in connection with civil defence, and it is going to be extremely difficult to know just where we are at at any given time. There will be this constant difficulty over whether this question can be asked or that question can be asked. I would humbly suggest that it would be much better for us to take up at one time all the questions we are going to ask with regard to civil defence and get them out of the way. I think that procedure would expedite matters considerably. Whether we do it now or whether we do it at a later time, I do not care. But I would suggest that it could all be done at the same time instead of being scattered all through the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member for Calgary East has made a pertinent suggestion.

Mr. Martin: I was just going to suggest that I might act on that very suggestion.

Mr. Pearkes: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Martin: I am going to give the information that the hon. member for Calgary East has asked for, covering not only the third item, with the consent of the committee, if it is felt that that is the best way of dealing with the matter. As for myself, I think perhaps it is.

Mr. Pearkes: On the point of order—

Mr. Martin: The hon. member for Calgary East asked me to do that. If the hon. member for Nanaimo disagrees with him, I will have to ask the leader of the opposition to make a decision as to which of the two hon. members I shall recognize.

Mr. Pearkes: This is perfectly ridiculous, Mr. Chairman. We are discussing a point of order. I do not mind whether this whole subject of civil defence is discussed or not. But under this particular item, the salary of the co-ordinator of civil defence is paid. I am asking, or I started to ask, questions with regard to the duties and functions of that officer. This is the right place to do that.

The Deputy Chairman: That is right.

Mr. Pearkes: If you want to go on to further questions, well and good. Here would be perhaps a good opportunity to branch out. But surely I am in order to discuss the duties of that official.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Nanaimo is perfectly right.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend is asking me the duties of the civil defence co-ordinator.

Mr. Pearkes: I was very much interrupted when I started to ask them.

Mr. Martin: I must say that my young friend, the hon. member for Calgary East, participated in the intervention. Now that we have peace for a few moments I will be glad to deal directly with my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Harkness: Thanks for the "young" anyway.

Mr. Martin: As he knows, the civil defence co-ordinator is a distinguished soldier and a man who has, with regard to a very difficult task, admittedly done a very good job as civil defence co-ordinator in this country, as will be reflected in the opinion which I know every minister in each of our provinces responsible for civilian defence would vouchsafe to give.

The job of the civil defence co-ordinator in principle is the same as that of his predecessors, of whom Dr. Manion, a former leader of the opposition, was a very distinguished one. The job consists, under ministerial authority, responsible to the government as a whole, in establishing liaison with those groups, such as the provincial governments, who are responsible for their creatures the municipalities, and in establishing relationships with them in trying to bring about a policy of co-ordination in respect of civil defence.

Hon. gentlemen will remember what I said in my opening statement, that the federal government, in the pursuit of this problem, does not feel that it is possible to provide at the centre, on an operational level, a full effective measure of civil defence. We have certain functions, the function of getting out training manuals, of publications, all of which come under the civil defence co-ordinator, the use of films, the purchase of equipment of various kinds, which we are prepared to give to the civil defence directors and workers who operate under the provinces or under the municipalities—generally we have the role of co-ordination.

But one should not judge the adequacy of civil defence in this country only by the recital of policy, or the recital of achievement of the federal government; for we cannot do this job alone, as I said quite frankly the other day. If one is going to provide for a measure of adequate civil defence it has to be done through a policy of decentralization, through the provinces and through the municipalities, which must carry on the primary responsibility of an operational endeavour.

I am happy to be able to say that as a result of the work of the civil defence co-ordinator, who has worked tirelessly during the last year and a half, every city in Canada but one, of 50,000 and over, has a civil defence director. These directors are paid by the municipality, and the civil defence co-ordinator of this country has been largely responsible for stimulating action by way of appointments in so many of these municipalities.

One of his first jobs of course was to establish contact with the United Kingdom civil defence authorities. It was the civil defence co-ordinator who made all the detailed preliminary arrangements for the agreement that we were able to arrive at with the United States in respect of a policy of common civil defence, so that we could say that for purposes of civil defence there would be no border.

It is the function of the civil defence co-ordinator to continue contacts with these various bodies. To give an example, the other day in Sault Ste. Marie—this is a point of some interest in this connection—the minister in charge, the Hon. Mr. Welsh, telephoned me and asked me if the services of the civil defence co-ordinator could be used to deal with a problem that had arisen in connection with a civil defence matter in Sault Ste. Marie. The civil defence co-ordinator was dispatched there. This morning I had a letter from Colonel Welsh commenting upon the value of these services and other matters.

A month ago the civil defence co-ordinator went to the province of British Columbia, to deal with the government of that province.

Mr. Cruickshank: He had a task there.

Mr. Martin: He met with the officials of the city of Vancouver as well in connection with his task.

The civil defence co-ordinator was responsible for the three schools that we had during the course of the winter, as a result of which we have trained over 200 people, who in turn have gone back to their municipalities to take on local civil defence direction jobs, or perform some function or other in that particular.

It was the civil defence co-ordinator who organized the present school that is under way at Connaught Ranges. I have just given a general survey which I know my hon. friend will appreciate. I may say that General Worthington has a very full job, and I want to say what I said at the beginning; he is doing that job admirably.

Mr. Pearkes: I doubt whether there are many people in this country who are more familiar with the integrity, industry and the great ability of General Worthington than I am. I am going on record to say that never has a public servant in this land been asked to make bricks with less straw than General Worthington is being asked to do today. I say that out of a total of almost $2 billion to be spent on defence we are spending now the small sum of about $4 million for the whole of civil defence. I repeat what I said a few moments ago; I believe this country will be stunned when it realizes what a paltry effort is being made in this direction.

The minister has told us some of the functions. You have instructors; you have a school at Connaught. Films are to be purchased. Then there is some suggestion of linking in with the medical officers in the department looking after Indians to help out. The big function which has to be faced today as far as civil defence is concerned is that of establishing a warning system, and there is no warning system whatever in this country at the present time. I believe no results have been achieved in so far as co-ordinating a plan for a warning system with United States—

Mr. Martin: Just a minute; I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but he is now dealing with policy, and he is making a general statement. I am prepared to take up and answer point by point what my hon. friend is saying and to sh w point by point how inaccurate he is. If my hon. friend is to be allowed to make this general statement I want to tell him that I will expect immediately after he has spoken to be permitted to make a similar statement by way of reply.

Some hon. Members: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Martin: Your predecessor, Mr. Chairman, ruled the hon. member for Eglinton out of order because he was engaging in a general discussion.

Mr. Cruickshank: He ruled me out, too.

Mr. Martin: He ruled my little—

Mr. Cruickshank: Not little.

Mr. Martin: He ruled out the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I would think it would be very unfair to accord to the hon. member for Nanaimo the privilege that was denied to the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I would simply call your attention, sir, to the fact that on this item, unless I am allowed to carry on, as the hon. member for Calgary East has suggested, the hon. member who has just spoken is wholly out of order. If he is going to be in order he must confine himself to the item under discussion, namely, staff.

Mr. Pearkes: I was confining myself to the item under discussion. I asked, what were the functions of his official who is paid under this item, and certain functions were enumerated. I call attention to the fact that the function of providing a warning system was not mentioned. I now ask the minister, what has been done to provide a warning system?

Mr. Martin: I am very well prepared to deal with that, but the chairman ruled that that kind of question was out of order in this discussion. There will be an opportunity later on.

Some hon. Members: When?

Mr. Adamson: On a point of order, sir, I think you reversed your ruling after the hon. member for Calgary East—

Mr. Cruickshank: He did not.

Mr. Adamson: —suggested that it would be more advantageous for this committee to deal with this matter fully at this time. I think I am correct in that.

The Deputy Chairman: If I may comment on the remarks just made by the hon. member for York West, I would point out that I did not reverse my ruling after listening to the hon. member for Calgary East. I rose to say that he made a pertinent suggestion. His suggestion was either that we deal with the civil defence votes now, or that we do that later. I did say that the discussion must be relevant however to whatever item is before the committee, from now on. Hon. members will recall that we had a general discussion which was opened by a statement from the Minister of National Defence. At the conclusion of the general discussion it was the suggestion of the hon. member for Nanaimo that, since civilian defence was to be dealt with by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, it might be appropriate at that time to have a general discussion of civilian defence.

That general discussion took place, having been opened by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The hon. member for Lanark took part in it; and I believe it was the suggestion of the hon. member for Nanaimo that we begin the study of the details appearing at page 269 in the estimates. We have been doing that.

As it appeared that the debate relating to civil salaries and wages was exhausted, it was then pointed out that since there were eighty people employed in the civilian defence branch, the Minister of National Health and Welfare could be available to reply to questions asked on that score. When the hon. member for Nanaimo asks as to the functions of General Worthington, or anyone on his staff, he is perfectly in order; but when anyone proceeds to enlarge upon the functions of that particular branch, and to discuss policy and to refer to the astonishment that might be expressed by municipalities across Canada in respect of the small amount made available for that purpose, I suggest he is not at that point speaking to the item under discussion. I am sure the hon. member for Nanaimo realizes that.

Mr. Pearkes: I am sorry if I veered from the straight and narrow path. I assure you it was unintentional. Would it be in order to ask if, as one of his duties, the co-ordinator of civilian defence is responsible for the provision or the establishment of a warning system?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: If so, what has been done? What results have accrued?

Mr. Martin: If I am in order in answering I would be prepared to answer; but I am not going to answer if I am going to be out of order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Go ahead; you don't know about that.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says to go ahead; but we have to have order. I think the hon. member for Calgary East made a sensible suggestion and I urge that we act upon it. The hon. member for Nanaimo disagreed, and we are in this difficulty as a result. I am prepared to act on the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary East.

Mr. Drew: May I make this comment as to the difficulty which would be raised if we try to make too fine a distinction as to what may or may not be asked in connection with wages and salaries. This is a very important subject which, for reasons which I do not think anyone is criticizing, does not appear as a segregated item in the estimates of the Department of National Defence. It is wrapped up in a number of other items all contained within the bracket of departmental administration. It is perfectly true that the amount that would be set aside for the physical material, including such things as warning systems and things of that kind, would not come in under the first line, it would be included somewhere down below—although we do not know where.

It seems to me that where we have a wrapped-up package like this, we shall get along faster and further if we carry forward with the idea the minister seemed ready to accept, namely that this be opened up for discussion and that we do not try to put it into airtight compartments. One might ask under wages and salaries what form of organization was built up to handle equipment, and then when the question was asked as to whether that type of equipment was available the ruling might be that such a question would be out of order. You would be left with the fire squad, but with the hose pipe somewhere else.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

It seems to me a reasonable approach to the suggestion is that, in view of the fact that, for reasons which we need not debate at the moment, this item is rolled up in a number of other items, it would be best to be prepared to deal with it, to let the minister discuss this subject and to have questions asked. I believe time would be saved if that were done.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): There is a lot of good in the suggestion of the leader of the opposition. But would it not be proper to apply the same principle to this item for departmental administration, in the Department of National Defence? If we take them in bulk, and have a discussion on each item at random, without just limiting ourselves to civil salaries and wages, could we not apply that good principle to the whole department, and thus take up the item of $13,419,162—because this afternoon, although we were on the first item of civil salaries and wages, most of the time was spent in a discussion of other details which go to make up this total sum of $13,419,162. I see no way of making any progress, unless we permit questions on each of these items, so that when we have exhausted these subjects we would carry that amount.

The leader of the opposition is correct in what he says, but he should go a step further and apply it to the whole item, as it concerns national defence.

Mr. Drew: As the minister has directed his remarks to what I have just said, I should like to point out the very great difference. The Department of National Defence is one that, in one form or another, has existed in Canada both before and since confederation. There has been a long-established organization, which the members who have been interested are able to understand. However, in the present instance we have a new organization which is just taking form; in fact the very uncertainty and vagueness of the organization, in the minds of many members —and that is not said as a critical statement —is related to the fact that there are no separate items dealing with civil defence.

As the minister has indicated, by next year this will have taken form and there will be civil defence items. The point I make is that because this is a new branch of activity in the department, and because it does not appear under any separate item, the minister might now deal with it. May I suggest this does not apply to the general problem of defence, where we have been dealing with precisely the same organization, on a greater or smaller scale, for a great many years.

Mr. Martin: I am in your hands, Mr. Chairman. The leader of the opposition and I are in disagreement with the hon. member for Nanaimo. If you agree with the leader of the opposition and me, then I am prepared to proceed, as has been suggested—of course, if the committee consents.

The Deputy Chairman: May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of National Defence if all the moneys to be expended for civil defence are to be voted under item 245. If they are, then I think it might be agreeable to the committee that we accept the suggestion of the Minister of Public Works that the whole of item 245 be put before the committee.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would not insist upon that.

Mr. Claxton: I do not think the Minister of Public Works wanted that.

Mr. Drew: No.

Mr. Claxton: He did suggest that this amount of $13,419,162 might be put forward, because we have been covering the ground with regard to civil defence and other matters, and it is up to the committee. They have not observed any agreement they have made so far, and no doubt will not in the future. I think the suggestions made by the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I think supported by the leader of the opposition and others, with regard to how this should be discussed might be dealt with in that way.

The Deputy Chairman: I did not express myself correctly. I should not have said that the whole of item 245 should be put before the committee. What I meant was that the amount of $13,419,162 under the heading of "Defence services. Departmental administration, including inspection services and civil defence" should be dealt with. That is what I meant.

Mr. Drew: With deference I suggest that that will create confusion worse confounded. What has been suggested now as an attempt to bring together discussion on civil defence was that we discuss that one subject and dispose of it. But if we are going to deal with all the items that make up this $13,419,000 when we are discussing the whole range of civil defence through navy, army and so on in so far as headquarters is concerned, there would be no time that we would be away from civil defence. We would be creating further confusion. I do repeat the suggestion that we proceed with civil defence and then when the questions asked by hon. members who have questions to ask have been disposed of, civil defence would be disposed of.

May I say most emphatically that there has been no repudiation of any agreement. The one thing that has been causing difficulty is the fact that we do not deal with these things in a way that makes it possible to discuss this one subject. If there is agreement that we discuss civil defence now, we shall be able to dispose of it. We did not have a general discussion of civil defence, as has been stated. The minister made a statement and replied to certain questions asked. It was then asked if we would go ahead with it and the minister of national health said it should not be proceeded with that night, but it would be dealt with when the first item was before us.

We have this item before us, as well as the different items in this first grouping. For that reason I think the only way we can do this in an orderly fashion is to say that we are going to deal with civil defence at this point. Then when civil defence has been disposed of there will be agreement to that effect and we can go on with a general discussion of national defence.

Mr. Claxton: The leader of the opposition is in so friendly a mood that I do not want to differ with him. As reported on page 2928 of Hansard, I asked if the committee wanted to discuss civil defence, and the hon. member for Nanaimo said they did. The committee then went on to discuss civil defence for a good many pages of Hansard.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister turn to page 2941 of Hansard where it was stated we would take it up later?

Mr. Claxton: We took it up for almost the rest of the evening.

Mr. Fulton: Look at page 2940 where it was agreed that we would take it up later on.

Mr. Claxton: That is all right. Do we take it up now as a general subject or under particular headings? I do not mind. I have been trying to work with the committee so as to make sure that hon. members have an opportunity to get every possible bit of information in the best possible order. We have had a general discussion on civil defence before; we have had another one tonight when we are supposed to be discussing civil salaries and wages, and we can go on and discuss civil defence and other items under each of the sub-titles on page 269. There are only four other important categories, so it is not a very important point. I agree with you, Mr. Chairman, and others who have taken part in this discussion that it would be a good thing if we got on with the operation.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, may I remind you what did take place. As distinguished from a discussion of the items, there was an extensive general review of the affairs of the Department of National Defence on one of the items. It was pointed out that civil defence was included in that item but was under another minister. It was suggested that it would be desirable to have a general review of civil defence at that time, and that was done. A statement was then made by the hon. member for Lanark and then there was some discussion as to when we would proceed again. It was at that time that the Minister of National Health and Welfare mentioned the figure of $4,196,202, but it was not indicated just where we could find those items. I am not suggesting that anything was being held back.

Mr. Martin: I said plus other figures.

Mr. Drew: Then the minister gave other figures, and then I made a short remark. I point out that this was some time after the general discussion to which the Minister of National Defence referred. I stated as reported on page 2941 of Hansard:

> If that disposes of the review of civil defence at this stage, recognizing the item will of course come up again at a later point when it is called—
> Mr. Martin: I hope not tonight.
> Mr. Drew: That, of course, is a matter of procedure. I wish to return to a discussion of the manner in which we are to deal with the estimates that are before us.

It was quite clear at that time that it was the intention to return to it. A number of members have indicated that they wish to speak on this matter. I suggest that we can deal with it most effectively under this item concerning wages and salary. Then when the discussion of civil defence has been closed and there is agreement that it is closed—I am sure nobody is going to raise any question that it has been fully disposed of—

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee that we deal now with the subject of civil defence?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming: Generally?

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will have to agree to that. As far as I am concerned, what we are going to discuss is the money which is being voted for civil defence. If it is decided to open up again the general discussion of civil defence, I want to be clear on that. I do not know that I place the same interpretation as do some hon. members upon what is reported on page 2928 of Hansard, and the following pages. I note there that the Minister of National Health and Welfare was asked to make a statement on civil defence. Then followed a general discussion pertaining to civil defence. The hon. member for Lanark took part in that discussion, as did the hon. member for York South, the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for Kamloops. Then the committee discussed the procedure as to how they were going to study the particular items which appear on page 269.

The hon. member for Eglinton asks if we are going to discuss it generally. I would want to have some direction from the committee on that point. Do we re-open the general discussion on civil defence or do we study all the items pertaining to civil defence in a specific way?

Mr. Harkness: I would think that civil defence is one subject and that all hon. members should be free to ask any questions which they think are pertinent, whether it is called a general discussion or whatever you want to call it.

Mr. Martin: Ask questions.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee has heard the statement made by the hon. member for Calgary East. If that is what members generally understand, is it agreeable that we proceed in that way?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Coldwell: On a point of order, is it not rather difficult to discuss civil defence without having the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare before us? I can see that you can have a very narrow discussion.

Mr. Harkness: It is not in welfare; it is all in defence.

Mr. Coldwell: There is no item in health and welfare?

Mr. Martin: It is in national defence. The transfer took place—

Mr. Coldwell: If that is the only one, the only thing to do is to allow a discussion.

Mr. Martin: To bring the matter to a head, I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary East is satisfactory. If hon. members will put their questions, I will endeavour to deal with them as completely and as concisely as I can.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreeable to hon. members to proceed in this way?

Mr. Fleming: I simply wish to offer this suggestion. We will be permitted to ask our questions but in all fairness we should not be deprived of the opportunity of making comments. The minister may make answers, but certainly hon. members should not be denied the opportunity of making comments on the minister's answers in relation to this whole question of civil defence. That is not a question of opening up a general discussion. The general discussion came at page 2941 of Hansard where the minister suggested that it should not continue that night.

Mr. Martin: Let us try to get on and see what happens.

Mr. Fleming: I am all for getting on with this, and frankly I thought I was on the right track some time ago, but I do not want another repetition of that experience. If there is a reasonable answer given to members—

Mr. Martin: I will be very reasonable, so let us get on.

Mr. Fleming: —and hon. members are permitted to make such comments as they feel it is their duty to make on whatever information is given to the house and on whatever discussion may arise, I do not think there will be time wasted. I do not think there will be a lot of time taken. I think we will get to the nub of the matter.

Mr. Martin: Let's go. Let us have the first question.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member will agree that the chairman is always reasonable.

Mrs. Fairclough: If we are going to discuss this matter in its entirety, as I presume we are now, I should like to say a few words with regard to the total. I tried to copy down the items as the minister read them. I seem to have missed a small item of $1,202, but the total amount is $5,096,202. According to the statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare the other night the amount was $4,196,000. I have a discrepancy of $900,000. However, I want to deal with a point to which the Minister of National Health and Welfare referred a little while ago. Certain individuals within his department have been placed in civilian defence work. When that was done did their salaries continue under the Department of National Health and Welfare or are they included in the total of $5,096,000?

Mr. Martin: No. I can save time by saying no. I have already answered that. The officials in the Department of National Health and Welfare continue in that department. Their salaries are not transferred to this item.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is exactly what I thought the minister meant but I wanted corroboration because if these men and women, if there are such, are actively engaged now in the civilian defence program, and their salaries are being charged to national health and welfare, then the amount of $5,096,000 does not constitute the total cost—

Mr. Martin: Correct.

Mrs. Fairclough:—allocated to civilian defence for this year.

Mr. Martin: Correct.

Mrs. Fairclough: How many of these individuals within the Department of National Health and Welfare are now engaged in civilian defence? That would be in addition to the number of eighty?

Mr. Martin: Twenty-seven.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister has already explained that. There are twenty-seven.

Mr. Martin: No, I said there are twenty-seven who have been transferred. Sixty were planned. I could not give the exact number in the Department of National Health and Welfare. There are quite a number of individuals with other functions who are carrying on civil defence work. The two deputy ministers have to spend quite a bit of their time on civil defence, particularly the deputy minister of welfare. Dr. Charron on the health side is doing some direct work in this field, and so are others. It would take quite a while to give the full list but I will say that their functions carry on into civil defence as well as into health and welfare.
